In New York they are held to be manufacturing companies with reference to taxation; 129 N. Y. 543 (reversing 15 N. Y. 718); contra; 145 Pa. 105, 131; but by paying a state tax they are exempt from local taxation; 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 626.

Implied Powers of the Municipality. The right of a municipality to light the streets is generally conceded as a part of the police power and while usually enumerated in the charters, its omission would not deprive the city of such right, whether by electricity or other means; 130 Ind. 149; 33 S. C. 1; 53 Kan. 477; 37 Fed. Rep. 832; 146 U. S. 258; and the right of the municipality, not only to own, operate, and control an electric light plant, but to raise money for such purpose by taxation has been upheld by the courts; 130 Ind. 149; 33 S. C. 1; 53 Kan. 477; 29 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 243; and to issue bonds for that purpose; 121 Ind. 212; 49 Hun 550; but the town must follow strictly the provisions of the statute authorizing such issue, and keep within the limits of such statute or the issue is void; 111 Mo. 365. The contrary view of such implied powers was taken in 153 Mass. 129, where the court decided that the existing statute giving towns the right to maintain street lamps and to raise money by taxation for such purpose did not carry with it the right to maintain the more costly electric light plant, and that to authorize such a purchase an express statute must be passed, thus settling a question raised but not decided in 150 Mass. 592. An act was accordingly passed in that state granting this power to the municipality and limiting and defining the conditions under which it should be exercised; act 1891, c. 370; 1893, c. 454; 1892, c. 259. The states of Connecticut, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have also conferred this right by statute.

Commercial Lighting by the Municipality. Where the right of maintaining an electric light plant has been conferred upon towns by statute, it has been usually held to apply as well to private property as to public streets, lanes, highways, etc; 42 Fed. Rep. 723; 130 Ind. 149; but where public lighting by electricity has been only implied from existing statutes the implication will not extend to a commercial use by the municipality; 33 S. C. 1; 121 Ind. 212. This right has been created by statute in Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, and the courts have declared the constitutionality of these acts; 150 Mass. 592; 160 Pa. 511.

As to Rights and Privileges. A municipality may grant a franchise to an electric light company to use its streets without making such right an exclusive one; 28 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 94; 48 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1005; but it must have legislative authority to grant such franchise; 5 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 340; 33 Fed. Rep. 659; and in Iowa it must be submitted to a vote of qualified electors; 48 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1005; 57

id. 689. It may confer the right on one company to use poles erected by another company; 95 Mich. 531; and may fix the compensation to the latter for their use; 10 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 531; but unless the limit of such use is fixed and the manner of stringing the wires prescribed such a permission is unreasonable and void; 53 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 452; and a company will be enjoined from use of another's poles without permission from the city, the court, or the other company; 23 Wkly. Law. Bul. 137. In Louisiana a grant to an electric light company included the right to remove poles erected under a preceding contract with a gas company; 40 La. Ann. 474. A contract with a gas company to light the streets with gas was held not to deprive the city of the power to contract with another company to furnish electric lights for the same purpose; 30 W. Va. 435; 28 Fed. Rep. 529. The right of the city to grant franchises for electric lighting carries with it the right to purchase or operate a plant even if there be an existing organized corporation and the city violates no contract by so doing; 42 Fed. Rep. 723. As a rule, however, the statutes provide for the purchase of an existing plant by the municipality and for arbitration in case of disagreement as to the price. In Massachusetts an existing company is not compelled to sell its property to the town; 161 Mass. 432.

Conflicting Electrical Companies. Where a telegraph and an electric light company had each obtained a franchise for the use of the same street, it was held that the company which first obtained the franchise was entitled to priority, and the other company must so adjust its wires as to prevent danger from juxtaposition or interference with the business of the first company; 46 Mo. App. 120; and that where the street was already occupied by the telegraph company the electric light company would be enjoined from placing its wires so near as to interfere with the transmission of messages; id. The distance at which a wire will affect the wires of the telegraph company need not be stated in the bill; 76 Fed. Rep. 178; but where the electric light company had already strung its wires the telegraph company could not compel their removal; 46 Mo. App. 120. In the case of a telephone and an electric light company, both having valid franchises, the telephone company was refused an injunction against the latter company on the ground that they had first occupied the streets, but on streets not occupied by either company, the electric light company was enjoined from using the same side of the street for lights and from stringing wires within such a distance as to injure the service of the telephone company; 27 Neb. 284; 12 Ont. 571; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 902. If two electric light companies have the use of the same street, the first to occupy them has the prior right, and the second company will be restrained from stringing its wires so near as to interfere with the business of the first company or cause danger to the public; 65 Vt. 337; 94 Ala. 372. In the latter case the decision was based rather on the ground that such juxtaposition of the wires was dangerous to public safety, than on any business consideration.

As to the liability for negligence as applied to electrical companies regarding both the employes of such companies and the general public, see POLES; WIRES.

ELECTRICITY. A natural force utilized mainly for the production of heat, light, and power.

A powerful physical agent which makes its existence manifest by attractions and repulsions, by producing light and heat, commotions, and chemical decompositions, and other phenomena. Encyc. Dict.

The great increase in the use of this force and its application to the purposes of everyday life not only for power to be used for transportation and manufacturing, but also for lighting and heating, have naturally brought it constantly before the courts. As a result there is a large and constantly increasing body of law on the subject which will be found under the several titles which deal directly with electrical appliances. As to trolleys see RAILROAD; and with respect to telegraph, telephone, electric light, poles, and wires, see those titles.

ELECTROCUTION. A method of punishment of death inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convicted person a current of electricity of sufficient force and continuance to cause death. See 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 663.

It is in use in New York under the act of 1888, and in Ohio was adopted by Act of April 9, 1896, to go into effect on July 1 of that year.

Punishment by death is not cruel within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the infliction of unusual and cruel punishments; and while the infliction of the death penalty by a new agency is unusual, the adoption of such an agency which is not a certainly prolonged or extreme procedure is not violative of this constitutional provision; 119 N. Y. 569.

This act of New York is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States when applied to a convict who committed the crime for which he was convicted after the act took effect, 136 U. S. 436. See 119 id. 584; CRIMES.

ELEEMOSYNARIUS (Lat.). An almoner. There was formerly a lord almoner to the kings of England, whose duties are described in Fleta, lib. 2, cap. 23. A chief officer who received the eleemosynary rents and gifts, and in due method distributed them to pious and charitable uses. Cowel.

ELEEMOSYNARY CORPORATIONS. Such private corporations as are instituted for purposes of charity, their object being the distribution of the bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he directed. Of this kind are hospitals for the relief of the impotent, indigent, sick, and deaf or dumb; Ang. & A. Corp. § 39; 1 Kyd. Corp. 26; 4 Conn. 272; 3 Bland 407; 1 L.J. Raym. 5; 2 Term 346. The nature of eleemosynary corporations is discussed in the Dartmouth College case. They are in no sense ecclesiastical corporations as understood in the classification of Blackstone; as Marshall, C. J., said that if the act created a civil institution to be employed in the administration of the government, it would be a public corporation, but it was in fact a private eleemosynary institution created for purposes unconnected with government, —and none the less so because for public education; 4 Wheat. 681. See, also, 8 id. 464; 1 Bla. Com. 471.

A recent writer says: "In the English law corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay; and lay corporations are again divided into eleemosynary and civil. It is doubtful how far clear conceptions of the law are promoted by keeping in mind these divisions. They seem, for us at least, to have an historical, rather than a practical, value. In a country where the church is totally disassociated from the state, there is little room for a division of corporations into ecclesiastical and lay; and while charitable corporations have many features which distinguish them from other private corporations, as will hereafter appear, it is very seldom that the word 'civil' is used in our American books of reports in order to distinguish corporations other than charitable."

ELEGIT (Lat. eligere, to choose). A writ of execution directed to the sheriff, commanding him to make delivery of a moiety of the party's land and all his goods, beasts of the plough only excepted.

The sheriff, on the receipt of the writ, holds an inquest to ascertain the value of the lands and goods he has seized, and then they are delivered to the plaintiff, who retains them until the whole debt and damages have been paid and satisfied. During that term he is called tenant by elegit; Co. Litt. 289. See Pow. Mort.; Wats. Sheriff 206; 1 C. B. N. S. 568.

The name was given because the plaintiff has his choice to accept either this writ or a fi. fa.

By statute, in England, the sheriff is now to deliver the whole estate instead of the half. See 3 Bla. Com. 418, n. The writ is still in use in the United States, to some extent, and with somewhat different modifications in the various states adopting it; 4 Kent 431, 436; 10 Gratt. 580; 1 Hill, Abr. 555; 3 Ala. 560.

ELEMENTS. A term popularly applied to fire, air, earth and water, anciently supposed to be the four simple bodies of which the world was composed. Encyc. Dict. Often applied in a particular sense to wind and water, as "the fury of the elements." Cent. Dict. It has been said that "damages by the elements," and "damages by the act of God," are convertible expressions; 35 Cal. 416.

ELEVATED RAILWAYS. See RAILWAYS.

ELEVATOR. A building containing one or more mechanical elevators, especially a warehouse for the storage of grain; a hoisting apparatus; a lift; a car or cage for lifting and lowering passengers or freight in a hoistway. Cent. Dict.

A passenger elevator is not a device dangerous, to life, per se; 90 Wis. 497.

A landlord who runs an elevator for the use of his tenants and their visitors thereby becomes a common carrier; 41 Minn. 207; and is charged with the highest degree of care which human foresight can suggest, both as to the machinery and the conduct of his servants; 54 Fed. Rep. 637; 80 Cal. 595. A carrier of passengers by elevator is not an insurer, but is required to exercise the highest degree of care; 62 Fed. Rep. 139; 114 N. Y. 312; 159 Mass. 26. In constructing an elevator the utmost care must be exercised; 41 Minn. 209; competent workmen must be employed and suitable material used; 20 Col. 292. In case of a casualty, it is not enough to show that the elevator is one of a kind in ordinary use; 50 Mo. 390; 136 Ill. 170. But the absence of safety appliances is said not to be conclusive evidence of negligence; 142 Mass. 83. An elevator is not supposed to be a place of danger, to be approached with great caution; but when the door is opened a passenger may enter it without stopping to make a special examination; 114 N. Y. 318. One who habitually rides on a freight elevator, in contravention of a posted notice, does so at his own risk; 156 Mass. 511. See as to injury to passengers, 25 L. R. A. 33, as to freight id. 34.

The business of elevating grain is a business charged with a public interest, and those who carry it on occupy a relation to the community analogous to that of a common carrier, and may be controlled by public legislation for the common good; Munn. v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113; 143 U. S. 517.

For liability of owners of buildings for accidents at elevator shafts, see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 640, n. See, generally, Webb, Elevators; L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 30.

ELIGIBILITY. The constitution of the United States provides that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house. The acceptance by a member of congress of a commission as a volunteer in the army vacates his seat; Cl. & H. 122, 395, 637. But by a decision of the second comptroller of the treasury, of Feb. 24, 1894, it was held that there was no incompatibility of office between that of a member of the house of representatives and the military office held by an officer of the United States army on the retired list, and that he was entitled to pay for both offices. A centennial commissioner holds an office of trust or profit under the United States, and is thereby ineligible as a presidential elector; 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 15; S. C. 11 R. I. 638. A state cannot by statute provide that certain state officers are ineligible to a federal office; 1 Bartl. 167, 619.

Duelling has been made in some states a disqualification for office; see DUELING. In Kentucky, it was held that the doing of any of the prohibited acts was a disqualification for office without a previous conviction; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 22; but this opinion has been questioned in a note to that case. See McCrary, Elect. 189.

An alien cannot, even in the absence of any provision forbidding it, hold an office; 14 Wis. 497; 54 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 525. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 748, n.; but he may be elected to an office; 28 Wis. 96; 50 id. 103. And members elect of congress, who were ineligible on account of participation in the rebellion, have been admitted to a seat, their disqualification having been subsequently removed; McCrary, Elect. 193.

As to the effect of the ineligibility of the candidate having the highest number of votes, see ELECTION.

ELIGIBLE. This term relates to the capacity of holding as well as that of being elected to, an office; 15 Ind. 327. See 15 Cal. 117; 3 Nev. 566; 14 Wis. 497.

ELISORS. In Practice. Two persons appointed by the court to return a jury, when the sheriff and the coroner have been challenged as incompetent; in this case the elisors return the writ of venire directed to them, with a panel of the jurors' names, and their return is final, no challenge being allowed to their array. 3 Bla. Com. 355; 1 Cow. 32; 3 id. 296. See CHALLENGE.

ELL. A measure of length.

In old English the word signifies arm, which sense it still retains in the word elbow. Nature has no standard of measure. The cubit, the ell, the span, palm, hand, finger (being taken from the individual who uses them), are variable measures. So of the foot, pace, mile, or mille passuum. See Report on Weights and Measures, by the secretary of state of the United States, Feb. 22, 1821.

ELOGIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A will or testament.

ELOIGNE. In Practice. (Fr. éloigner, to remove to a distance; to remove afar off.) A return to a writ of replevin, when the chattels have been removed out of the way of the sheriff.

ELONGATA. In Practice. The return made by the sheriff to a writ of replevin, when the goods have been removed to places unknown to him. See, for the form of this return, Wats. Sheriff, Appx. c. 18, s. 3, p. 454; 3 Bla. Com. 148.

On this return the plaintiff is entitled to a capias in withernam. See WITHERNAM; Wats. Sheriff 300, 301. The word éloigné is sometimes used as synonymous with elongata.

ELONGATUS. The sheriff's return to a writ de homine replegiando, q. v.

ELOPEMENT. The departure of a married woman from her husband and dwelling with an adulterer. Cowel; Blount; Tomlin.

To constitute elopement the wife must not only leave the husband, but go beyond his actual control. For if she abandon the husband, and go and live in adultery in a house belonging to him, it is said not to be an elopement; 3 N. H. 42; 1 Rolle, Abr. 680.

While the wife resides with her husband and cohabits with him, however exceptionable her conduct may be, yet he is bound to provide her with necessaries and to pay for them; but when she elopes, the husband is no longer liable for her support, and is not bound to pay debts of her contracting, when the separation is notorious; and whoever gives her credit does so, under these circumstances, at his peril; 3 Pick. 289; 6 Term 603; 11 Johns. 281; Bull. N. P. 135. It has been said that the word has no legal sense; 2 W. Bla. 1080; but it is frequently used, as is here shown, with a precisely defined meaning. An action may be maintained by the husband, against a third person, for enticing away his wife, where nothing in the nature of criminal conversation is alleged. See Schoul. Hus. & W. 64; ENTICE.

ELSEWHERE. In another place.

Where one devises all his land in A, B, and C, three distinct towns, and elsewhere, and had lands of much greater value than those in A, B, and C, in another county, the lands in the other county were decreed to pass by the word "elsewhere"; and by Lord Chancellor King, assisted by Raymond, C. J., and other judges, the word "elsewhere" was adjudged to be the same as if the testator had said he devised all his lands in the three towns particularly mentioned, or in any other place whatever. 3 P. Wms. 56. See, also, Chanc. Prec. 202; 1 Vern. 4, n.; Cowp. 360, 808; 5 Bro. P. C. 496; 1 East 456.

As to the effect of the word "elsewhere" in the case of lands not purchased at the time of making the will, see 3 Atk. 254; 2 Vent. 351. As to the construction of the words "or elsewhere" in shipping articles, see 2 Gall. 477.

ELUVIONES. Spring-tides.

EMANCIPATION. An act by which a person who was once in the power or under the control of another is rendered free.

This is of importance mainly in relation to the emancipation of minors from the parental control. See 3 Term 355; 8 id. 479; 11 Vt. 258, 477; 2 Ind. App. 264; 37 W. Va. 242. See Cooper, Justin. 441, 480; 2 Dall. 57, 58; Ferrière, Dict. de Jurisp. Emancipation; MANUMISSION.

An infant husband is entitled to his own wages, so far as necessary for the support of himself and family, even though he married without his father's consent; 157 Mass. 73. Where children contract for, collect, and use their own earnings, emancipation is to be inferred; 29 Wkly. Law Bul. 389; and so when they become of age, no other facts being shown; 28 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 633.

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION. See BONDAGE.

EMBARGO. A proclamation or order of state, usually issued in time of war or threatened hostilities, prohibiting the departure of ships or goods from some or all the ports of such state, until further order. 2 Wheat. 148.

A civil embargo is the act of a state detaining the ships of its own citizens in port, which amounts to an interdiction of commerce, accompanied, as it usually is, by a closing of its ports to foreign vessels. Such an embargo is enumerated under the head of reprisals. A hostile embargo is a seizure, as before mentioned, of foreign vessels and property which may be in the ports of the wronged state. This may also be a prelude to war. Snow, Int. Law 78.

The detention of ships by an embargo is such an injury to the owner as to entitle him to recover on a policy of insurance against "arrests or detentions." And whether the embargo be legally or illegally laid, the injury to the owner is the same, and the insurer is equally liable for the loss occasioned by it. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 12, s. 5; 1 Kent 60; 1 Bell, Dict. 517.

An embargo detaining a vessel at the port of departure, or in the course of the voyage, does not of itself work a dissolution of a charter-party, or of the contract with the seamen. It is only a temporary restraint imposed by authority for legitimate political purposes, which suspends for a time the performance of such contracts, and leaves the rights of parties untouched; 1 Bell, Dict. 517; 8 Term 259; 5 Johns. 308; 7 Mass. 325; 3 B. & P. 405; 4 East 546; Twiss' Law of Nations, part ii. s. 12.

EMBASSAGE or EMBASSY. The message or commission given by a sovereign or state to a minister called an "ambassador," empowered to treat or communicate with another sovereign or state; also the establishment of an ambassador. Black, L. Dict.

EMBEZZLEMENT. In Criminal Law. The fraudulent appropriation to one's own use of the money or goods entrusted to one's care by another. 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 41.

The fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted or to whose hands it has lawfully come; it is distinguished from larceny in the fact that the original taking of the property was lawful or with the consent of the owner, while in larceny the felonious attempt must have existed at the time of the taking. 160 U. S. 268.

The principles of the common law not being found adequate to protect general owners against the fraudulent conversion of property by persons standing in certain fiduciary relations to those who were the subject of their peculations, certain statutes have been enacted, as well in England as in this country, creating new criminal offences and annexing to them their proper punishments. The general object of these statutes doubtless was to define and embrace, as criminal offences punishable by law, certain cases where, although the moral guilt was quite as great as in larceny, yet the technical objection arising from the fact of a possession lawfully acquired by the party screened him from punishment. 2 Metc. Mass. 345; 9 id. 142. See 34 La. Ann. 1153.

In order to constitute embezzlement, it must distinctly appear that the party acted with felonious intent, and made an intentionally wrong disposal, indicating a design to cheat and deceive the owner. A mere failure to pay over money intrusted to such party as agent for investment is not sufficient, if this intent is not plainly apparent; 62 Mich. 276. The money appropriated need not have been intrusted to the accused by the owner; it is sufficient if it were intrusted to the employer of the accused and appropriated by the latter; 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 811; and that the money was taken without any attempt at concealment is no defence to the charge of embezzlement; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 42.

Embezzlement being a statutory offence, reference must be had to the statutes of the jurisdiction for the classes of persons and property affected by them. It has been held that there may be embezzlement of bank bills; 63 Mass. 284; municipal or city bonds; 91 N. Y. 5; 66 Wis. 343; grain; 38 Ia. 331; an animal; 72 Ala. 272; commercial securities; 24 Ia. 102; [1891] 1 Q. B. 112; and of a mortgage; 5 Allen 502; and by public officers, placed in a fiduciary relation as such; 10 Gray 173; 10 Mich. 54. See 11 Allen 439; 31 Cal. 108; 15 Wend. 581; 86 Pa. 416; 22 Minn. 67; 6 How. Pr. 59; 81 Ia. 587; 111 Mo. 413. Where one withdraws from the money drawer of a cash register money that he had deposited a moment before without registering the sale of the article for which it had been received, he is guilty of embezzlement; 155 Mass. 523. Where an attorney collects money for his client, he acts as agent and attorney, and in either case, if he appropriate the money collected to his own use with the intention of depriving the owner of the same, he is guilty of embezzlement; 74 Mich. 478. In a prosecution for the embezzlement of money held by defendant as bailee, it is immaterial that it was deposited in a bank for a time, so that the money actually converted was not the identical bills delivered to the bailee; 160 Mass. 319.

A taking is requisite to constitute a larceny, and embezzlement is in substance and essentially a larceny, aggravated rather than palliated by the violation of a trust or contract, instead of being, like larceny, a trespass. The administration of the common law has been not a little embarrassed in discriminating between the two offences. But they are so far distinct in their character that, under an indictment charging merely a larceny, evidence of embezzlement is not sufficient to authorize a conviction; and in cases of embezzlement the proper mode is to allege sufficient matter in the indictment to apprise the defendant that the charge is for embezzlement. And it is often no less difficult to distinguish this crime from a mere breach of trust. Although the statutes declare that a party shall be deemed to have committed the crime of simple larceny, yet it is a larceny of a peculiar character, and must be set forth in its distinctive character; 8 Metc. 247; 9 id. 138; 9 Cush. 284; 82 Ill. 425; 26 Ohio St. 265. See 81 Ill. 599; 13 Ark. 168; Bish. Cr. L. § 328.

When money is embezzled, the owner has a right to settle as for an implied contract, and such settlement is no bar to a criminal prosecution; 66 N. Y. 526; 111 Mo. 473.

A partner is not guilty of embezzlement in appropriating the funds of the firm to his own use; 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1086. See 3 Tex. App. 522; 12 Cox, C. C. 96.

When an embezzlement of a part of the cargo takes place on board of a ship, either from the fault, fraud, connivance, or negligence of any of the crew, they are bound to contribute to the reparation of the loss, in proportion to their wages. So too the embezzlement of property saved is a bar to salvage. When the embezzlement is fixed on any individual, he is solely responsible; when it is made by the crew, or some of the crew, but the particular offender is unknown, and, from the circumstances of the case, strong presumptions of guilt apply to the whole crew, all must contribute. The presumption of innocence is always in favor of the crew; and the guilt of the parties must be established beyond all reasonable doubt before they can be required to contribute; 1 Mas. 104; 4 B. & P. 347; 3 Johns. 17; Dane, Abr. Index; Wesk. Ins. 194; 3 Kent 151; See Pars. Sh. & Adm.

Stringent provisions are made by several acts of congress against the embezzlement of arms, munitions, and habiliments of war, property stored in public storehouses, letters, precious metals, and coins from the mint.

EMBLEMENTS (Fr. emblem, or emblem, to sow with corn. The profits of the land sown). The right of a tenant to take and carry away, after his tenancy has ended, such annual products of the land as have resulted from his own care and labor. The term is also applied to the crops themselves. Co. Litt. 55 b; 4 H. & J. 180; 3 B. & Ald. 118; 64 Pa. 134.

It is a privilege allowed to tenants for life, at will, or from year to year, because of the uncertainty of their estates and to encourage husbandry. If, however, the tenancy is for years, and its duration depends upon no contingency, a tenant when he sows a crop must know whether his term will continue long enough for him to reap it, and is not permitted to re-enter and cut it after his term has ended; 4 Bingh. 202; 10 Johns. 361; 5 Halst. 128; 48 Mo. App. 430. Whenever a tenancy, other than at sufferance, is from the first of uncertain duration and is unexpectedly terminated without fault of the tenant, he is entitled to emblements; 86 Ala. 508.

This privilege extends to cases where a lease has been unexpectedly terminated by the act of God or the law; that is, by some unforeseen event which happens without the tenant's agency; as, if a lease is made to husband and wife so long as they continue in that relation, and they are afterwards divorced by a legal sentence, the husband will be entitled to emblements; Oland's case, 5 Co. 116 b; or where the lessee of a tenant for life has growing crops unharvested at the time of the latter's death, he is entitled to them; 56 Conn. 374. A similar result will follow if the landlord, having the power, terminates the tenancy by notice to quit; Cro. Eliz. 460; but not where, under the terms of the lease, the landlord re-enters, and takes possession because the tenant fails to pay rent; 69 Hun 588. See other cases of uncertain duration, 9 Johns. 112; 8 Viner, Abr. 364; 3 Pa. 496. But it is otherwise if the tenancy is determined by an act of the tenant which works a forfeiture; as if, being a woman, she has a lease for a term of years provided she remains so long single, and she terminates it by marrying; for this is her own act; 2 B. & Ald. 470; 1 Price 53; 8 Wend. 584. A landlord who re-enters for a forfeiture takes the emblements; 7 Bingh. 154. Where a tenant wrongfully retains possession of land after his term has expired, crops planted by him so long as they remain unsevered, belong to the landlord; 45 Mo. App. 505. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

All such crops as in the ordinary course of things return the labor and expense bestowed upon them within the current year become the subject of emblements,—consisting of grain, peas, beans, hemp, flax, and annual roots, such as parsnips, carrots, turnips, and potatoes, as well as the artificial grasses, which are usually renewed like other crops. But such things as are of spontaneous growth, as roots and trees not annual, and the fruit on such trees, although ripe, and grass growing, even if ready to cut, or a second crop of clover, although the first crop taken before the end of the term did not repay the expense of cultivation, do not fall within the description of emblements; Cro. Car. 515; Cro. Eliz. 463; 10 Johns. 361; Co. Litt. 55 b; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 534; Woodf. Landl. & T. 750.

But although a tenant for years may not be entitled to emblements as such, yet by the custom of the country, in particular districts, he may be allowed to enter and reap a crop which he has sown, after his lease has expired; Dougl. 201; 16 East 71; 7 Bingh. 465. The parties to a lease may, of course, regulate all such matters by an express stipulation; but in the absence of such stipulation it is to be understood that every demise is open to explanation by the general usage of the country where the land lies, in respect to all matters about which the lease is silent; and every person is supposed to be cognizant of this custom and to contract in reference to it; 2 Pet. 138; 5 Binn. 285. The rights of tenants, therefore, with regard to the away-going crop, will differ in different sections of the country; thus, in Pennsylvania and New Jersey a tenant is held to be entitled to the grain sown in the autumn before the expiration of his lease, and coming to maturity in the following summer; Mitch. R. P. 24; 54 Pa. 142; 2 South. 460; 13 Conn. 59; 24 N. J. L. 89; while in Delaware the same custom is said to prevail with respect to wheat, but not as to oats; 1 Harr. Del.

522; and trespass will lie against one who interferes with the land to the injury of the outgoing tenant; 6 Houst. 584.

Of a similar nature would be the tenant's right to remove the manure made upon the farm during the last year of the tenancy. Good husbandry requires that it should either be used by the tenant on the farm, or left by him for the use of his successor; and such is the general rule on the subject in England as well as in this country; 15 Wend. 169; 2 Hill, N. Y. 142; 2 N. Chipm. 115; 1 Pick. 371. A different rule has been laid down in North Carolina; 2 Ired. 326; but it is clearly at variance with the whole current of American authorities upon this point. See MANURE. Straw, however, is incidental to the crop to which it belongs, and may be removed in all cases where the crop may be; 22 Barb. 568; 1 W. & S. 509.

There are sometimes, also, mutual privileges, in the nature of emblements, which are founded on the common usage of the neighborhood where there is no express agreement to the contrary, applicable to both outgoing and incoming tenants. Thus, the outgoing tenant may by custom be entitled to the privilege of retaining possession of the land on which his away-going crops are sown, with the use of the barns and stables for housing and carrying them away; while the incoming tenant has the privilege of entering during the continuance of the old tenancy for the purposes of ploughing and manuring the land. But, independently of any custom, every tenant who is entitled to emblements has a right of ingress, egress, and regress to cut and carry them away, and the same privilege will belong to his vendee,—neither of them, however, having any exclusive right of possession. See 46 Barb. 278; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 543; Woodf. Landl. & T. 754. LANDLORD AND TENANT; WAY-GOING CROP.

EMBRACEOR. In Criminal Law. He who, when a matter is on trial between party and party, comes to the bar with one of the parties, and, having received some reward so to do, speaks in the case or privily labors the jury, or stands there to survey or overlook them, thereby to put them in fear and doubt of the matter. But persons learned in the law may speak in a cause for their clients. Co. Litt. 369; Termes de la Ley.

EMBRACERY. In Criminal Law. An attempt to corrupt or influence a jury, or any way incline them to be more favorable to one side than to the other, by money, promises, threats, or persuasions, whether the juror on whom such attempt is made give any verdict or not, or whether the verdict be true or false. Haw. Pl. Cr. 259; Bacon, Abr. Juries, M 3; Co. Litt. 157 b, 369 a; Noy 102; 11 Mod. 111, 118; 5 Cow. 503; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 389; 2 Nev. 268; 5 Day 260. 8 Vt. 57; 20 id. 9.

Such an attempt is a misdemeanor at common law; Cl. Cr. L. 326.

EMENDA (Lat.). Amends. That which is given in reparation or satisfaction for a trespass committed; or, among the Saxons, a compensation for a crime. Spelman, Gloss.
VOL. I.—42

EMENDALS. In English Law. This ancient word is said to be used in the accounts of the inner temple, where so much in emendals at the foot of an account signifies so much in bank, in stock, for the supply of emergencies. Cunningham, Law Dict. But Spelman says it is what is contributed for the reparation of losses. Cowel.

EMENDATIO PANIS ET CERVISIÆ. The power of supervising and correcting the weights and measures of bread and ale. Cowel.

EMIGRANT. One who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and who takes his family and property, if he has any, with him. Vattel, b. 1, c. 19, § 224. See 2 Cra. 302.

EMIGRATION. The act of removing from one place to another.

It is sometimes used in the same sense as expatriation; but there is some difference in the signification. Expatriation is the act of abandoning one's country; while emigration is, perhaps not strictly, applied to the act of removing from one part of the country to another. See 2 Kent 34, 44; EXPATRIATION.

EMINENCE. A title of honor given to cardinals.

EMINENT DOMAIN. The superior right of property subsisting in a sovereignty, by which private property may in certain cases be taken or its use controlled for the public benefit, without regard to the wishes of the owner.

The power to take private property for public use. 6 How. 536.

The right of every government to appropriate otherwise than by taxation and its police authority (which are distinct powers), private property for public use. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 584.

Different theories are advanced as to the precise nature of the power, and it has been defined to be the right retained by the people or government over the estate of individuals, to reclaim the same for public use,—a kind of reserved right or estate remaining in the sovereign as paramount to the individual title. This conception of the right was at one time very generally accepted. The result of this view is to consider the right, theoretically at least, as so much of the original proprietorship retained by the sovereign power in granting lands or franchises to individuals or corporations, wherever the common-law theory of original proprietorship prevails. An argument by analogy in support of this view is derived from the able examination and explanation of the origin of the jus publicum in 7 Cush. 90. See, also, remarks of Daniell, J.; 6 How. 533. Perhaps no better statement of this doctrine is to be found than this: "The highest and most exact idea of property remaining in the government, or in the aggregate body of the people in their sovereign capacity, giving a right to resume the possession of the property in the manner directed by the constitution and the laws of the state whenever the public good requires it." 3 Paige, Ch. 73; or, "The true theory and principle of the matter is, that the legislature resume dominion over the property, and having resumed it, instead of using it by their agents, to effect the intended public good, and to avoid entanglement in the common business of life, they re-vest it in other individuals or corporations to be used by them in such manner as to effect, directly or indirectly, or incidentally, as the case may be, the public good intended." 34 Conn. 78; see also 3 Yerg. 41; 8 Barb. 486; 113 N. Y. 275; 23 Mo. 597.

But this theory of resumption of original proprietorship is disapproved by the most authoritative writers, and with reason; the weight of authority and of argument are both against it. In this country the right is exercised by two governments, each sovereign, operating on the same property; the federal power can, upon no hypothesis, be based upon original grant in the older states, nor perhaps the state power, in the new states; a new sovereignty by acquiring territorial rights succeeds to this right over property, of which the original grant was from the prior one; property may be appropriated a second time after the power has been already exercised and, upon the theory under consideration, necessarily exhausted; personal property is subject to the right, although the doctrine of reserved right cannot apply to it, while the reversion of the state will supply no argument, as it applies equally to personal property in which the state never had any title; and any paramount or reserved right could be granted, but this right never can; 118 Ill. 427; 36 Conn. 196. All these considerations are inconsistent with the theory suggested and seem to leave no alternative but to recognize the right as an attribute of sovereignty and in no sense an interest or estate. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 3; Rand. Em. Dom. § 3; 32 Ia. 66; 2 Dev. & B. L. 451; 18 Wend. 9, 57; 2 Redf. Railw. 229.

This right is distinguished from public domain, which is property owned absolutely by the state in the same manner as an individual holds his property; 37 Am. Jur. 121; 2 Kent, Com. 339; 3 Yerg. 389; 6 How. 540; termed by Cooley "the ordinary domain of the state"; Const. Lim. 642.

The right of eminent domain is not to be confounded with cases in which there exists a sovereign right to take or destroy private property without making compensation. The familiar case of taxation is readily distinguished. An owner is not entitled to compensation for damage or loss to property taken or destroyed during war. As to the distinction between the war power and eminent domain see 13 Am. L. Reg. 265, 337, 401; Mills, Em. Dom. § 3. So property may be taken under a controlling necessity, or to prevent the spread of a fire; 12 Co. 63; 23 N. J. L. 605; 50 Tex. 614; 7 Metc. 462; 13 Minn. 38; 18 Wend. 126; or, under the police power, to abate a nuisance (q. v.); 7 Cush. 53 (in which Shaw, C. J., draws the distinction between the police power and eminent domain); 126 Mass. 438; or by restraining the owner of land from making a noxious use of it; 105 Ill. 388; or by removing sand, etc., from beaches; 11 Metc. 55; compelling railroads to erect cattle guards; 27 Vt. 140; or holding them responsible for damages by fire (q. v.) from locomotives; 41 Ia. 297; compelling riparian owners to keep up a levee; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 455; or changing the course of a river; 47 Cal. 536; or as a forfeiture for violation of law; 3 R. I. 64; 3 Mich. 330; 26 Pa. 287; 12 La. Ann. 432.

History and nature of the power. The phrase "eminent domain" appears to have originated with Grotius, who carefully describes its nature; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 3, n.; Mills, Em. Dom. § 5; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 945. The power is a universal one and as old as political society, and the American constitutions do not change its scope or nature but simply embody it, as described by Grotius, in positive, fundamental law.

The language of Grotius is: "We have elsewhere said, that the property of subjects is under the eminent domain of the state; so that the state, or he who acts for it, may use, and even alienate and destroy such property; not only in case of extreme necessity, in which even private persons have a right over the property of others; but for ends of public utility, to which ends those who founded civil society must be supposed to have intended that private ends should give way. But it is to be added, that when this is done, the state is bound to make good the loss to those who lose their property; and to this public purpose, among others, he who has suffered the loss must, if need be, contribute." Grotius, Bel. et Pac. lib. iii. c. 20. In the last clause quoted there seems to be an expression thus early of the doctrine which commonly forms a part of later legislation in the exercise of the right of eminent domain of the assessment of benefits on the person whose property is taken.

The term used by Grotius has been objected to by other writers, as, for example Bynkershoek, who prefers the terms imperium eminentis rather than dominium eminentis, considering the former as more accurately expressing the idea of supreme power. At the same time that he advocates the use of a terminology to give more emphatic expression to the sovereign nature and character of the power, this writer discusses the question whether it may be exercised only for necessity as he conceives Puffendorf to urge, or also on the ground of convenience or, to use the exact phrase of Grotius, utility. Bynkershoek considers either ground sufficient, but he also lays down the principle of requiring compensation not merely for a taking, but for "every loss which private persons bear for the common necessity or utility," thus anticipating the doctrine not recognized by writers of his time, but accepted by modern constitution makers, under the name of consequential damages for injury to, as well the direct loss occasioned by, the taking private property. Quest. Jur. Pub. lib. ii. c. 15. Puffendorf also criticises the term employed by Grotius. He divides the term control (potestas) into dominium as used in respect to what is one's own, and imperium, with respect to what belongs to others. Accordingly he would consider that imperium eminentis is more accurate than dominium eminentis; De Jure Naturæ et Gentium, lib. i. c. 1. s. 19. So Heinneccius says: "We confess that this use of the word is not quite apt, for the conception of dominium and that of imperium are different things; it is the latter and not the former which belongs to rulers," but he adds, that as there is no doubt about the absolute right, it is useless to condemn the word when once it has been accepted; Elem. Jur. Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. c. 8, s. 168.

All these writers agree that the power is exercised as an attribute of sovereignty, and in this conclusion there is a general concurrence. Vattel says: "In political society everything must give way to the common good; and if even the person of the citizens is subject to this rule, their property cannot be excepted. The state cannot live, or continue to administer public affairs in the most advantageous manner, if it have not the power, on occasion, to dispose of every kind of property under its control. It should be presumed that when the nation takes possession of a country, property in specific things is given up to individuals only upon this reservation." So it was said by the U. S. Supreme Court: "The power to take private property for public use, generally termed the right of eminent domain, belongs to every independent government. It is an incident of sovereignty, and as said in Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S., requires no constitutional recognition;" Field, J., 109 U. S. 513, 518.

Blackstone rests the doctrine upon necessity, and considers the recognized right to compensation as evidence of the great regard of the law for private property; while the good of the individual must yield to that of the community, the legislature alone may interpose to compel the individual to acquiesce, but such interposition is not arbitrary but only upon full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The nature of the transaction he states thus: "All that the legislature does, is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power which the legislature indulges with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform." 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 139, n. 19.

This statement by Blackstone of English law is to be borne in mind here after in considering the nature and origin of the right to compensation. Here we have the right defined with the same limitation which, as will be seen, is sometimes claimed to rest solely on express provisions of written constitutions. And the force of this statement is strengthened not weakened, by the observation of Buller, J., that there were many cases in which an injury is suffered by individuals for which there is no right of action, as in a case of the destruction of private property in time of war for the public defence; id.; 4 Term 54; 3 Wils. 461; 6 Taunt. 29.

Notwithstanding this recognition of the nature of the power the subject of eminent domain as understood in the United States is practically eliminated from English law and the title itself is usually not to be found in digests or text books of that country. "That there is no eminent domain in English jurisprudence," says a recent writer on the subject, "is because the power is included, and the obligation to compensate lost, in the absolutism of parliament." "The only technical term approximating to eminent domain, is compulsory power, as used in acts enabling municipal and other corporations to take property for their use. The multiplication of such acts led to the enactment of several general laws, notably the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (q. v.), which is a complete code. This act or one of the others of a similar class, as the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, is incorporated by reference in the various special acts;" Rand. Em. Dom. § 7.

It follows of necessity that English decisions do not apply to the vast number of constitutional questions constantly arising in this country, though the adherence of English legislation to the same great principle of compensation necessarily results in producing a body of law in England covering most of the questions which are adjudicated in our own country respecting the construction and application of statutes under which the power is exercised.

The right of compensation. Though not included in the definitions of the power as usually given, the necessity for compensation is recognized by the most authoritative writers as an incident to the right, an original element of its existence, and not a superimposed limitation.

Accordingly eminent domain is said with more precision to be the right of the nation or the state, or of those to whom the power has been lawfully delegated, to condemn private property to public use, and to appropriate the ownership and possession of such property for such use, upon paying to the owner a due compensation, to be ascertained according to law; Black, Const. L. 350.

Nearly if not all of the American constitutions provide for compensation. Professor Thayer states that "now (1895) only three constitutions, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Virginia are without a clause expressly requiring compensation." The provisions of the several constitutions are given in Randolph, Em. Dom. 401 to 416, and Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 14 to 52 (the latter including the prior as well as the last state constitutions). With respect to compensation, Kent says: "This principle, in American constitutional jurisprudence, is founded in natural equity, and is laid down by jurists as an acknowledged principle of universal law;" 2 Com. 339.

It would seem to be the most satisfactory conclusion both upon reason and authority that neither the right of the state to take nor the right of the individual to compensation required a constitutional assertion. The right to take private property for public use does not depend on constitutional provisions, but is an attribute of sovereignty;

2 Harr. N. J. 129; 2 Dev. & Bat. 451; it (the right) exists, and the only limitation upon its exercise is that imposed by the state or federal constitution; 5 Del. Ch. 524.

So also the right to compensation is an incident to the exercise of the power, inseparably connected with it; 17 N. J. L. 129; "this is an affirmation of a great doctrine established by the common law for the protection of private property;" 2 Story, Const. § 1790; "the obligation attaches to the exercise of the power, though it is not provided for by the state constitution, or that of the United States had not enjoined it;" Bald. C. C. 220. "If by the assertion that this right existed at common law independent of the declaration of rights, is meant that compensation in such case is required by a plain dictate of natural justice, it must be conceded. The bill of rights declares a great principle; the particular law prescribes a practical rule by which the remedy for the violation of right is to be sought and afforded;" Shaw, C. J., in 12 Cush. 475. In New Hampshire, although the constitution did not contain an express provision requiring compensation, "yet it has been construed by the courts, in view of the spirit and tenor of the whole instrument, as prohibiting such taking without compensation; and it is understood to be the settled law of the state, that the legislature cannot constitutionally authorize such taking without compensation;" 51 N. H. 504. It is a condition precedent to its exercise under a statute that it make reasonable provision for compensation to the owner of the property taken; 159 U. S. 380; 2 Johns. Ch. 162.

There are dicta which countenance the opinion that compensation is not of the essence of eminent domain, that the usual constitutional clause is restrictive, not declaratory, so that, were it omitted, the state could properly take property without paying for it; Rand. Em. Dom. § 226, citing 98 U. S. 403; 109 id. 513; 21 Conn. 313; 5 Del. Ch. 524; 17 Wend. 649; 54 N. H. 590, 647. In one of these cases the language used is "the provision found in the federal and state constitutions for just compensation for property taken is no part of the power itself, but merely a limitation upon the use of it, a condition upon which it may be exercised;" 109 U. S. 513.

One of the leading text writers on the subject takes this view; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 10; and argues it with great earnestness, treating it as the same question discussed by Sedgwick and Cooley and referred to supra under the title Constitutional (q. v.), whether there are limitations of legislative power other than those contained in the constitutions, federal and state. The real question involved in the relation of compensation to eminent domain is a different one. It is not whether the sovereign powers of government exercised by American state legislatures are subject to undefined limitations not embodied in the written constitution, but what is the sovereign power which we term eminent domain, as recognized and exercised by governments long before written constitutions were known. It is true that some courts in discussing this subject have fallen into the same confusion of ideas, but the distinction none the less exists and should be borne in mind. Is it the right to take private property arbitrarily, or only to take it on making compensation? Lewis thinks "the question has lost most of its practical interest from the fact that all states except one (North Carolina), now have an express limitation in their organic law touching the exercise of this power." It is submitted, however, that the precise definition and true limitation of so automatic a governmental power can never become a matter of indifference. So long as one state constitution is silent on the subject of compensation it remains a practical question in American constitutional law and the existence of a reserved power to amend or abolish any existing constitution, coupled with the prevalent tendency to attack and impair the right to private property, must necessarily keep it such, independently of the theoretical interest in maintaining correct definitions of the inherent rights of sovereignty.

Suggestions in the line of the cases cited by Randolph and the views expressed by Lewis, led to practical results in but few cases:—In South Carolina land was taken for roads without compensation; 2 Bay 39; 3 Hill 100; but in New York, taking wild land without compensation was held unconstitutional; 19 Barb. 118. In New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the subject rested on a statutory rather than a constitutional basis, because the grants by the proprietors included an extra allowance for roads; 42 N. J. L. 619; 30 Pa. 362; and this was held compensation; 100 Pa. 362. See 132 id. 636. Under the New Jersey constitution, land might be taken for highways without compensation until otherwise directed by the legislature. In Louisiana land on the Mississippi River can be taken without compensation for the construction of a public levee under the old French law, and this applies to the land of a citizen of another state, provided he receive the same measure of right as citizens of Louisiana in regard to their property similarly situated; 160 U. S. 452.

In Thayer's Cases on Constitutional Law the editor discusses this subject in a very interesting note and reaches the somewhat metaphysical conclusion that the right to compensation is not a component part of the right to take, though it arises at the same time and the latter cannot exist without it, the two being compared to shadow and substance.

He argues that the right of the state springs from the necessity of government, while the obligation to reimburse stands upon the natural rights of the individual. "These two, therefore, have not the same origin; they do not come, for instance, from any implied contract between the state and the individual, that the former shall have the property, if it will make compensation; the right is no mere right of pre-emption, and it has no condition of compensation annexed to it, either precedent or subsequent. But there is a right to take, and attached to it, as an incident, an obligation to make compensation; this latter, morally speaking, follows the other, indeed, like a shadow, but it is yet distinct from it, and flows from another source." From this he argues that for the taking the citizen cannot complain; if recompense is not made, the duty of the sovereign is violated and the individual "has an eternal claim against the state, which can never be blotted out except only by satisfaction; but this claim is for compensation, and not for his former property," and, "in the absence of constitutional provisions," the loss "must be regarded as damnum absque injuria." 1 Cas. Const. L. 953, note.

The distinction between this theory and the doctrine that the right to compensation is an inherent attribute rather than a subsequent limitation of the original right would seem to be rather ingenious than practical. The citations in the same note from the civilians show clearly that, in their view, compensation was essential, and even in the states whose organic law was, at the time of the decision, either silent or contained merely a general declaration as to private rights the necessity of compensation has been recognized; Rand. Em. Dom. § 227, citing 3 N. H. 524; 35 id. 134; 1 Md. Ch. 248; Baldw. C. C. 205; 17 N. J. L. 129; 70 N. C. 550; 111 id. 278; 13 Ark. 198; see also Monongahela Navigation Case, 148 U. S. 312; 12 Cush. 475. The mistaken idea that the fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States, applied to the states, seems to have contributed to this opinion in some cases; 2 Johns. Ch. 162; 1 N. J. Eq. 694. "The true doctrine is, in the writer's opinion," says the author last cited, "that which requires the payment of compensation whether it be expressly enjoined or not. The modern concept of a constitutional state as realized in the United States has no room for spoliation of the individual." The same view is supported by Mills, Em. Dom. § 1.

Whatever view may be taken of the general doctrine of the law on this subject the necessity of compensation is firmly imbedded in American constitutional law.

It may be considered settled that the exercise of the right is not justifiable, where the statute fails to provide compensation; and the courts will, in general, substantially declare such an act unconstitutional; 2 Kent 339, n.; dicta in 4 Term 794; 1 Rice 383; 3 Leigh 337; 44 N. H. 143; 47 Me. 345; 18 Tex. 585; 21 Ohio St. 667; 26 Ill. 436; 89 Ga. 205; 44 La. Ann. 173; 116 Mo. 114; 148 U. S. 312; 133 id. 553. See contra, 3 Hill, S. C. 100; 54 Fed. Rep. 559. This compensation must be in money; 2 Mass. 125; 2 Dall. 304; 44 Cal. 51; 66 Ill. 329; 39 N. J. L. 665.

In constitutional construction the words "just," "ample," "full," "adequate," "due," etc., prefixed to the word "compensation," has been said to lend no appreciable additional weight; Rand. Em. Dom. § 223; but much stress has often been put upon it by courts. The word "just" in the fifth amendment excludes the taking into account as an element in the compensation any supposed benefit that the owner may receive in common with all from the public uses to which his private property is appropriated and leaves it to stand as a declaration that no private property shall be appropriated to public uses unless a full and exact equivalent for it be returned to the owner; 148 U. S. 326. The word "just" is not used as an antithesis of unjust, but "evidently to intensify the meaning of the word compensation;" 8 Nev. 165; it means recompense "all circumstances considered;" 5 Blackf. 384, "to save the owner from suffering in his property or estate . . . as far as compensation in money can go;" 60 Me. 290; "making the owner good by an equivalent in money;" 27 Wis. 478.

The federal power. All lands held by private owners everywhere within the geographical limits of the United States are subject to the authority of the general government to take them for such objects as are germane to the execution of the powers granted to it; 135 U. S. 641.

The right of eminent domain is one of the powers of the federal government essential to its independent existence and perpetuity. Among the purposes for which it is exercised are the acquisition of lands for forts, armories, arsenals, navy yards, light-houses, custom-houses, post-offices, court-houses, and other public uses. The right may be exercised within the states without application to them for permission to exercise it; 91 U. S. 367; the fact that the power has not been exercised adversely does not disprove its existence, nor does the fact that in some instances the states have condemned lands for the use of the general government; id. It is a right belonging to a sovereignty to take private property for its own public uses but not for those of another; hence the power of the United States must be complete in itself, it can neither be enlarged nor diminished, nor can the manner of its exercise be regulated by the state whose consent is not a condition precedent to its enjoyment; id.

This right exists in the District of Columbia, the territories, and lands within the United States acquired through cession; 4 Cra. C. C. 75; 147 U. S. 282.

The power of eminent domain in the general government as exercised for local purposes in the District of Columbia is the same as that exercised by a state within its own territory; 147 U. S. 282; there and in the territories it exists in all cases in which a similar power could be exercised by the states; 101 U. S. 129. It is among the powers derived by the territorial governments immediately from the United States; 2 Mich. 427; 26 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 376; 1 Chand. Wis. 71.

Within the states the United States has the right of eminent domain for federal purposes; 91 U. S. 367; 135 id. 641. This power has been exercised to condemn land for military posts; 7 How. 185; fortification; 18 Cal. 229; navigation work; 59 Fed. Rep. 9; light-house and coast survey purposes; 10 Cal. 229; 54 N. H. 590; 160 U. S. 499; the construction of interstate railroads; 127 U. S. 1; water supply; 14 Md. 444; post-office; 91 U. S. 367; 106 Mass. 356; a national cemetery at Gettysburg; 160 U. S. 668. The weight of authority is in favor of the exercise of the right by the United States directly when property is required for federal purposes and not through the right of eminent domain of the state; 14 Md. 444; 96 N. Y. 227; though the latter method is upheld in some cases; 1 Barb. 24; 106 Mass. 356; 54 N. H. 590; but it is held that the United States may delegate to a tribunal created under the laws of the state the power to fix and determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the federal government for private property taken by it in the exercise of the right of eminent domain; 109 U. S. 513. The United States circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings instituted by the United States to appropriate land for a postoffice; 91 U. S. 367. In this case there was no act of congress relating to the subject except the appropriation of money, and a direction to the secretary of the treasury to purchase a site, and the jurisdiction was objected to. The supreme court held that the proceedings were a suit at law and cognizable under the general provisions of the judiciary act. As to the federal right, see 14 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 30; 15 Am. L. Reg. 193; 91 U. S. 367. The state cannot condemn for the United States and bind the latter as to compensation; 23 Mich. 471, in which the whole subject of the exercise of this right by state and federal governments was considered by Cooley, J. Proceedings may be in the United States courts, or in state courts, in the name of the United States, and state practice should be followed; 96 N. Y. 227; 48 Wis. 385; 109 U. S. 513; or may by act of congress be made to follow some state statute; 82 Pa. 382.

Public uses of the federal government have been held to be public uses of the state; 14 Md. 444.

Proceedings under state laws for condemnation of lands, involving the ascertainment by judicial proceedings of the value of property to be paid as compensation, may be removed to the United States court; 124 U. S. 197; 75 Fed. Rep. 34; if they take the form of a proceeding before the courts; 98 U. S. 403; the preliminary proceedings are in the nature of an inquest and not a "suit," but when transferred into the state court by appeal it becomes one; id.; 115 id. 1, 18. As to removal of such proceedings, see 25 Am. L. Reg. 183.

An interesting question referred to but not decided by the supreme court is whether a state can exercise this right as to lands of the United States not held for actual public uses, without the consent of congress or of an officer having power of disposal of public lands. It has been decided in the affirmative; 6 Porter, Ala. 472; and it was also held that an abandoned military reservation is part of the public lands and that the state may use them to construct public roads or bridges, by the right of eminent domain; 6 McLean 517; but a municipal corporation has no right to open streets through property of the United States, adjacent to the city, although the ground had been laid out in lots and streets by the government; 7 How. 185. In the latter case it was said that such power would exist as to land "purchased by the United States as a mere proprietor, and not reserved or appropriated to any special purpose;" but in a later case this and other like expressions were characterized as dicta, and it was said that the view could hardly be reconciled with special railroad and general legislation of congress, and that "when that question shall be brought into judgment here, it will require and receive the careful consideration of the court;" 117 U. S. 151.

Exercise of the power through agents. The right of eminent domain is also an attribute or part of the sovereignty of the states, and is by them exercised for a great and constantly increasing variety of purposes, some of which are for governmental uses either of the state at large or of local municipal bodies, or by private persons or corporations authorized to exercise some function of such public character, technically known as a public use. When this is conferred upon private persons or corporations the right is termed by some writers the delegated power of eminent domain; 4 Thomp. Corp. ch. cxxii.; and such person or corporation is the agent of the state for its exercise. Strictly speaking it is not accurate to say that the state delegates a right of sovereignty, of which it cannot divest itself, hence it is more exact to speak of it as exercising the power through an agent. While corporations are usually selected for such agency, it may be and sometimes is conferred upon individuals; 5 Ohio 485; 50 N. H. 591; 4 Wend. 667; 79 Cal. 159; and where incorporation and a franchise were granted to an individual "and associates" it was held that he need not associate any one with him; 8 Me. 365. It has also been held that an individual as purchaser of a railroad and franchises at the foreclosure sale acquired the right to condemn lands; 93 U. S. 217; 39 La. Ann. 417. In one case it is said that a statute neither did nor could confer this right "upon private persons, but only corporations organized for public purposes can be clothed with such privileges;" 80 Pa. 59; but this expression, so far as it concerns the power of the legislature, was obiter; and a case often cited with this only decides that under a general act, then under construction, the power could not be exercised by individuals, because there was no provision of law for its exercise by individuals; 10 Ohio St. 372.

The exercise of the power by such agencies is governed in the main by the same principles and limitations as when it is directly exerted by the federal or state government, and the exceptions to this rule readily disclose themselves in the consideration of the natural divisions of the subject. When its exercise by a private corporation is authorized it has been termed not a franchise but a means to the enjoyment of corporate franchises; 10 Ohio St. 372; but the contrary view was expressed by Bradley, J., in 127 U. S. 1, and it is remarked by a recent writer that "a power conferred upon certain corporations, which is not possessed by the citizens generally, and which is in derogation of their rights, so nearly resembles a franchise as to justify its treatment" under that title; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5587. The use of the term franchise is not defined, by those who most use it, with sufficient precision to be conclusive against either view. It is as much a franchise, if one at all, if exercised by an individual as a corporation, though the writer quoted seems to overlook the possibility of this. It is, however, a grant of power or privilege from the sovereign to the citizen or subject, to do what would but for the grant be unlawful, and it undoubtedly does come within the usually accepted definition of the word franchise (q. v.). As is true with respect to franchises generally, the grant of the power is never presumed unless the intent to part with it is clearly expressed; id. § 5538; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 240; 93 Pa. 150; 74 Ga. 570; 42 Mo. 225; 41 N. J. Eq. 43; and its exercise by the state may determine a preceding contract made by the state without impairing the obligation of such contract, the right itself being always reserved by implication, if not expressly; 84 Va. 271.

It is no objection to a grant of the power to a corporation that the latter is seeking to effect its own private gain; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5589; for that is said to be merely compensation for the risk assumed for the benefit of the public; 17 N. H. 47. When unrestrained by constitutional provision, the discretion of the legislature in selecting agents through whom the power is to be exercised is absolute. In a state whose constitution prohibits its exercise by foreign corporations they cannot of course act unless domesticated in the state; 52 Fed. Rep. 627; but otherwise they may do so; 39 N. Y. 171; 143 N. Y. 411; 33 Pa. 175; 145 Mass. 450; 57 Ia. 560; 81 Mo. 126; 69 Hun 615; but a constitutional incapacity cannot be avoided by acting through a domestic corporation; 27 Neb. 699 (see 22 Neb. 628; 59 Ia. 563); though by consolidating with a domestic corporation it may exercise the power; 47 Mich. 456; 36 Minn. 85; as thereby the consolidated company becomes a corporation of the state; 33 Neb. 171.

How the question of public use is determined. It is well settled that the power exists only in cases where the public exigency demands its exercise. See remarks of Woodbury, J., and cases cited by him in 6 How. 545. But the practice of all the states and of the federal government, since this decision, in condemning land for purposes of public convenience but not necessity, has been so frequent that the legislative control over the necessity and the particular location is almost universally conceded. Mills, Em. Dom. § 11. In a proceeding to condemn land, the term "necessary" does not mean that it is indispensable or imperative, but only that it is convenient and useful; and if an improvement is useful, and a convenience and benefit to the public sufficient to warrant the expense in making it, then it is necessary; 91 Mich. 149; but it is no ground for a right to take land that its resources could be utilized at a much less expense than the land already owned; 64 Cal. 123. In 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5593, in concluding a discussion of the various theories as to what uses are public uses, the author says: "But it is a sound conclusion that the use must be a public use in the sense that it is open to such members of the public as may choose to use it upon the performance of reasonable or proper conditions; or in the sense of satisfying a great public want or exigency. On the other hand, where the public use is not compulsory, but is optional with the private corporation seeking the condemnation, it is not a public use." In U. S. v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Co., 160 U. S. 668, it was said: "The constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation. These words are a limitation, the same in effect as 'You shall not exercise this power except for public use.'"

The legislature cannot so determine that the use is public as to make its determination conclusive on the courts, and the existence of a public use in any class of cases is a question for the courts; Mills, Em. Dom. § 10; 44 Vt. 648; 59 Wis. 364; 21 W. Va. 534; 42 Ohio St. 202; 37 Md. 537; 51 Cal. 269; 34 Ala. 311.

The Missouri constitution provides, as do those of Colorado, Mississippi, and Washington, that it shall be a judicial question whether the use contemplated is public, and that question will be determined without the aid of a jury; 91 Mo. 54.

The presumption is in favor of the public character of a use declared so by the legislature; 79 Pa. 257; 21 W. Va. 534; and unless it is clear that it is not possible for the use to be public, the courts cannot interfere; Mills, Em. Dom. § 10.

In an early case it was said that in general the question whether a particular structure, as a bridge, or a lock, canal, or road, is for the public use, is a question for the legislature, and it may be presumed to have been decided by them; 12 Cush. 475; citing 4 Pick. 463; but in a later case when this position was broadly urged, it was held to be obviously untenable, and that, where the power was exercised, it necessarily involved an inquiry into the rightful authority of the legislature under the organic law, and that the legislature had no power to determine finally upon the extent of its authority over private rights. 16 Gray 417. In this case what is probably the true doctrine was stated, that it is the duty of the courts to make all reasonable presumptions in favor of the validity of the legislative act. But this is simply the application to this particular subject of the general presumption of the constitutionality of legislative acts.

This right of the courts to determine the question of public use was maintained in 103 N. Y. 375; but if the court determine the matter in question to be a public use, their power is exhausted and the extent to which property shall be taken for it is wholly in the legislative discretion; 147 U. S. 232. Whether the necessity exists for taking the property is a legislative question; 37 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 437.

The grant of the right is a determination on the part of the legislature that the object is necessary; 31 N. J. Eq. 475; and of this it is the judge; 80 Ky. 259; 98 N. Y. 109; 25 Mo. 540; and parties cannot be heard on the question of necessity; 127 Mass. 408. If it is a public use there is no restraint on legislative discretion and the judicial function is gone; Mills, Em. Dom. § 11. If the use is certainly public courts will not interfere; only when there is an attempt to evade the law and procure condemnation for private uses will courts declare it void; Mills, Em. Dom. § 11; 17 W. Va. 812. The fact that a railroad has located its line across certain land, is prima facie proof that it is necessary for it to take that land for the use of its road; 139 Ill. 151. Whether the land is reasonably required is a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff; 92 Cal. 528.

It has been held that when under the constitution a federal question arises, the supreme court will determine the law without reference to state decisions; 16 How. 432. See 16 Wall. 678; 53 N. Y. 128. But in determining what is a taking of property, the federal courts will accept the definition of the word property by the state court, where it is clearly settled; 13 Wall. 163; 147 U. S. 248; 94 id. 324; 10 Wall. 497; even following reversals by the latter; 2 Black 599; 6 Pet. 291; 16 Wall. 678.

What is a public use. Property taken for public use need not be taken by the public as a body into its direct possession, but for public usefulness, utility, or advantage, or purposes productive of general benefit or great advantage to the community; 33 Conn. 532. It is not necessary that the entire community, or any considerable portion of it, should participate in an improvement to constitute a public use; 16 Gray 417; 58 Mo. 175; it may be limited to the inhabitants of a small locality; but the benefit must be in common, not to particular persons or estates; 18 Cal. 229. See Mills, Em. Dom. § 12. If a considerable number will be benefited the use is public; 75 Me. 91; 97 Ind. 79; as a school available for use by a portion of the community taxed to pay for the property taken; 33 Vt. 271.

The legislature determines the number of people to be benefited to make the use public; 2 Stew. & P. 199; but the incidental benefit of additional facilities for business, etc., will not make use public; 97 N. Y. 42.

It has been judicially decided that the following are public uses:—an almshouse; 7 N. Y. 314; a public bath; 101 N. Y. 132; a schoolhouse; 117 Mass. 384; 33 Vt. 271; 7 R. I. 545; 48 Mo. 243; 68 Pa. 170; a market; 28 Hun 515; 49 Mich. 249; telegraph and telephone lines; 103 Ill. 401; 53 N. J. L. 341; 43 id. 381; 136 Mass. 75; 53 Ala. 211; 92 Cal. 528; water-works for a town; 4 Gray 500; 126 Mass. 416; 67 Col. 659; water supply for a town; 27 Ala. 104; 139 Mass. 183; 55 N. J. L. 235; the improvement of the navigation of a river; 12 Cush. 475; and the creation of a wholly artificial system of navigation by canals; id.; 3 Cra. C. C. 599; 20 Johns. 733; 41 Ind. 364; 39 N. Y. 171; the drainage of marshes; 2 Pet. 245; 119 Mass. 583; 98 Ind. 587; sewers; 11 Gray 345; wharves; 83 Ky. 628; 110 N. Y. 569; 135 id. 253; ferries; 8 Me. 365; 1 N. & McC. 387; irrigation; 22 Ore. 389; 69 Cal. 255; 164 U. S. 112, 160; turnpikes; 35 N. H. 134; 27 Conn. 641; bridges; 5 Ohio 485; 91 Pa. 216; 3 Ga. 31; 36 N. H. 404; Wright, Ohio 364; the criterion being, whether the public may use by right, or only by permission, and not to whom the tolls are paid; 1 Duv. Ky. 372; cemeteries; 46 Vt. 218; 103 Mass. 106; 20 Conn. 466; even if the price of the lots therein differ; 53 id. 551; but not if used exclusively for members of a private corporation; 66 N. Y. 569; a restaurant at a summer resort; 91 N. Y. 552; parks; 127 Mass. 408; 45 N. Y. 234; 99 id. 569; 75 Me. 91; 55 Wis. 328; 61 Ill. 115; 117 U. S. 379; 147 id. 282; even if paid for by a county, though beneficial only or mainly to a neighboring city; 58 Mo. 175; the erection of a memorial hall or monumental statues, arches, and the like, the publication of town histories, decorations on public buildings, parks designed to provide for fresh air or recreation, educate the public taste, or inspire patriotism; 153 Mass. 255. A highway is a public use; 11 Ind. 420; 103 Mass. 120; but it must connect with another highway; 108 N. Y. 375; 64 Wis. 538; 84 Pa. 90; though at one end only; 56 Wis. 429; 39 Conn. 231; 24 N. Y. 559. It may, however, terminate on private property; 39 N. J. L. 226; 87 Ill. 189; 43 Conn. 437; or at a river; 53 N. H. 530; 125 Ind. 562; or at a church; 63 Pa. 471. So the improvement of a harbor is a public use, (but not the extension of harbor lines to prevent the placing of buildings on either side of a bridge); 60 Conn. 278; and the reclamation of flat land ; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 1025, n. citing cases. Gas works ; 63 Barb. 437 ; 123 Pa. 374 ; 2 R. I. 15 ; a state military encampment ; 54 N. J. L. 268 ; a public urinal ; 130 Mass. 170, are public uses.

Other instrumentalities of commerce held to be public uses are, pipe lines for the transportation of oil or natural gas ; 5 W. Va. 332 ; dams for booms used in logging ; 3 Dill. 465 ; 56 Me. 443 ; 57 N. H. 110 ; see also 98 U. S. 403 ; 28 Minn. 534 ; 65 Pa. 242 ; a flume for the transportation of lumber ; 16 Ore. 67. As to the condemnation of land to facilitate mining operations there is a conflict of decisions. In some of the states the courts have refused to permit it ; 51 Cal. 269 ; 73 id. 482 ; 84 Pa. 90 ; 18 Fed. Rep. 753 ; while in others they have considered it justifiable on the ground of public utility ; 59 Ga. 419 ; 15 Nev. 147 ; and the owner of a mine may have land condemned for a railroad for the transportation of the products of his mine to the nearest thoroughfare by rail or water, provided such a railway shall be free to all who wish to use it ; 32 Pa. 169 ; 47 N. J. L. 518 ; 37 Md. 537 ; 41 Fed. Rep. 294 ; and this latter provision will be implied from the statute authorizing the condemnation ; 63 Ia. 28 ; but it has been held that a mine-owner cannot condemn land solely for the transportation of his own products ; 56 Pa. 413 ; 70 id. 210 ; 118 Ill. 427 ; 40 Ohio St. 504 ; or to take water to the mines ; 63 Cal. 73.

The right to condemn land for mill sites has been frequently granted ; 8 Blackf. 266 ; 3 Yerg. 41 ; 12 Pick. 467 ; 12 Cush. 475 ; 12 Metc. 183 ; 44 Vt. 648 ; 1 N. J. Eq. 694 ; 33 Conn. 532. In the last case it was urged that it was against public policy to allow such great agencies as streams capable of propelling machinery to go to waste, and that to utilize such power, even for the erection of private mills, promotes the wealth of the state and is of incidental benefit to the people. But although courts have recognized this right to a certain extent, 15 Wall. 500, it has been with reluctance and it will not now probably be sustained ; Mills, Em. Dom. § 15 ; it has been doubted ; 12 Wis. 213 ; and by some denied ; 40 Me. 317 ; 3 Barb. 42 ; 34 Ala. 311 ; 35 Mich. 333, in which, after reviewing the authorities, Judge Cooley holds the question not one of necessity but of comparative cost. A general statute, delegating to individuals the power to condemn land and locate mills, was held unconstitutional ; 42 Ga. 500.

A railroad is a public use ; 135 U. S. 641 ; 20 Fla. 579 ; 9 N. Y. 588 ; 2 Harring. 514 ; 3 Paige 45 ; 2 Mich. 427 ; 43 N. Y. 137 ; 143 id. 67 ; even where used for freight only ; 47 N. J. L. 43 ; so also are all appurtenances essential to the reasonable, convenient, and proper construction, maintenance, and operation of the road, such as yard-room ; 46 N. Y. 137 ; 34 Vt. 484 ; and terminals ; 66 Me. 26 ; turnouts, engine-houses, depots, shops, turntables ; 17 Ill. 123 ; 4 Ohio St. 308 ; and repair shops, stock-yards ; 139 U. S. 128 ; 49 Mo. 165 ; paint-shop, lumber, and timber sheds ; 18 Ill. 324 ; wharves ; 77 N. Y. 248 ; a place of deposit for waste earth ; 8 Phila. 145 ; but not shops for manufacturing new rolling stock ; 46 N. Y. 546 ; 6 How. 507 ; 34 Vt. 484 ; or tenement houses for employes ; id. ; 43 N. Y. 137 ; 23 N. J. L. 510 ; as to an ordinary warehouse, it was doubted ; 4 Coldw. 419 ; 59 Pa. 23 ; but a building for handling freight was not a mere warehouse ; 77 N. Y. 248 ; so land for a track to an elevator could be taken ; 47 N. Y. 150 ; but not for a railroad constructed solely to convey passengers to see the Niagara River and whirlpool for revenue to a private person ; 108 N. Y. 375. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 170 ; Rand. Em. Dom. § 45.

It is not a public use to provide for fencing a large tract of land subject to floods which carried off the fences ; 12 Bush 312 ; or to acquire swamp land and build docks, warehouses, factories, etc. ; 96 N. Y. 42 ; or to settle private controversies concerning title by transferring the land of one to another ; 2 Dall. 304 ; 1 S. & R. 54. The latter cases arose under legislation to settle titles and adjust controversies in Pennsylvania under the Connecticut grant.

It is settled that the legislature cannot authorize the taking of property for a private use, but the decisions conflict as to the case of private ways, or roads laid out under statutes existing in many states. By many courts they are held unconstitutional as being a private use ; 4 Hill 140 ; 25 Ia. 540 ; 82 id. 358 ; 43 Ind. 455 ; 27 Mo. 373 ; 40 Ill. 175 ; but in others such roads are held to be a public use, and the word private is construed as a word of classification and not technical or describing the use ; 32 Cal. 241 ; 83 id. 507 ; 4 Harring. 580 ; 11 Vt. 600 ; 34 Ala. 311 ; 4 Ohio St. 494 ; 108 Mass. 202 ; 84 Pa. 90 ; 77 id. 39 ; 22 N. J. L. 356.

The latest case in the United States Supreme Court thus expresses the general principle :—"The taking by a state of the private property of one person without the owner's consent for the private use of another is not due process of law and is a violation of the Fourteenth Article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States." An act authorizing a board of transportation to require a railroad corporation to grant to private persons a location on the right of way of a railroad for the purpose of erecting a third elevator is invalid ; 164 U. S. 403. The prohibition is against taking without due process of law. So at the same term the court say :—"There is no specific prohibition of the Federal Constitution which acts upon the states with regard to their taking private property for any but a public use ;" 164 U. S. 112.

What is a public use, for which private property may be taken by due process of law, depends upon the particular facts and circumstances connected with the particular subject-matter ; id. 112. See notes on this subject in which the cases are collected ; 91 Am. Dec. 585 ; 3 Am. St. Rep. 503.

What may be taken. Every kind of property may be taken under this power. It "is attribute of sovereignty, and whatever exists in any form, whether tangible or intangible, may be subjected to the exercise of its power, and may be seized and appropriated to public uses when necessity demands it." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 262; 87 Ill. 317, 324; 39 Ala. 307; 36 Conn. 196; 41 Ind. 364; 111 Mass. 125. The general rule to be gathered from all the authorities, considered together, is, that a legislative grant of power to condemn property, expressed in general terms, confers on the grantee power to take all kinds of property except property already devoted to public use and necessary for the exercise of such use; 27 Cent. L. J. 207; it makes no difference whether corporeal property, as land, or incorporeal, as a franchise, is to be affected; 14 Wend. 51; 1 Baldw. C. C. 205; 160 U. S. 168; see 1 Rice 383; 11 N. H. 19; 17 Conn. 454; 11 Pet. 420; 8 N. H. 393; 3 Hill, S. C. 109; 8 Dana 289; 5 W. & S. 171; 2 Miss. 21; 130 N. Y. 249; 154 Mass. 579; 68 Miss. 806; 92 Cal. 528. The power has been held to exist, to build a railroad over basins maintained by a water power company for public purposes, and its franchise is not thereby destroyed; 23 Pick. 360; to take for a public road the property, easement, and franchise of a bridge company; 6 How. 507; to build a railroad over the land of a gas company not then in use but likely to become necessary; 63 N. Y. 326; over the lands and right of way of a canal company; 11 Leigh 42; 14 Ill. 314; over lands of a state asylum for deaf and dumb; 3 Ind. 421; over a turnpike which would not be materially injured; 21 Vt. 290; but not over lands, not necessary for the railway, owned and used by the state for an institution for the blind; 43 Ill. 303. In a proceeding by a railroad company to condemn for terminal warehouses the land of a steamboat company, the test whether the defendant held its land for such use as to exempt it from condemnation was said to be not what the defendant "does or may choose to do, but what under the law it must do, and whether a public trust is impressed upon it. It does not so hold its property impressed with a trust for the public use unless its charter puts that character upon it and so that it cannot be shaken off;" 99 N. Y. 12. Any property belonging to a railway not in actual use or necessary to the proper exercise of the franchise thereof may be taken for the purpose of another railroad under a general power; 17 W. Va. 812; 112 Ill. 589; 63 Barb. 151; 138 Mass. 277; 146 Pa. 297; but not where the loss of the property to be taken is necessary to the exercise of the franchise of its owner; 81 Ill. 523; 3 Ore. 164. The same general principles are applied to cases where a municipal corporation attempts to condemn railroad property; if the property is not necessary to the new use and the latter is destructive of the old one it is not permitted to be taken; 23 A. & E. R. R. Cas. 36; s. c. 103 Ind. 496; 56 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 1077; otherwise, if it will leave the franchise unimpaired; 39 N. J. L. 28. A market house has been condemned for a railway terminal station, reached by an elevated railroad, and its approaches; 142 Pa. 580; but one corporation cannot take the franchise of another which is in use unless expressly authorized by the legislature, and then only by regular condemnation, and cannot take it at all, if this will materially affect its use; 53 Fed. Rep. 687. So a street may be taken; 2 L. R. A. 59; 12 N. J. L. 133; a bridge; 39 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 36; or land in custody of the law; 14 Am. L. Rev. 131.

Where the power in a charter to condemn lands is limited so as to exclude land or property of any other corporation existing under the law of the state, this restriction was not confined to lands of corporations existing at the passage of the act, but applies to those thereafter incorporated; and another corporation which acquired lands after the first corporation had filed a survey thereof according to the requirements of the laws, but before any petition for the appointment of commissioners had been presented, could claim exemption from condemnation under the limitations; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 74.

Claims of citizens against a foreign power may be taken by the national government for the purpose of adjusting its relations with such power; 2 Ct. of Cl. 224; and a claim for damages to land by reason of an unlawful entry may be taken and adjusted in a proceeding to take the land itself; 24 Barb. 658.

It has been held that money cannot be taken; Field, J., 12 Cal. 76; contra, 151 Mass. 364; only as to money taken by the state in time of war; 4 Const. 419; 13 How. 115; 44 Mo. 484; and without any such limitation; Sharswood, J., in 65 Pa. 152, who says that "the public necessity which gives rise to it prevents its being restrained by any limitations as to either subject or occasion." "Such," the opinion continues, "would be the case of a pressing and immediate necessity, as in the event of invasion by a public enemy, or some great public calamity, as famine or pestilence, contribution could be levied on banks, corporations, or individuals."

Buildings on land condemned are parts of the realty and pass with the land, and the owner must be paid for them in full, and being so paid cannot recover from the company damages for the removal of them; 23 Neb. 465; 28 Kan. 816; nor can the owner remove them; 99 Pa. 640. See, generally, as to structures, 3 Am. R. R. & Corp. Cas. 181.

An act for the extinguishment of irredeemable ground rents was held not to be an exercise of the right of eminent domain and therefore unconstitutional; 67 Pa. 479. Generally a city may not condemn property beyond its territorial limits; 13 Peters 519; 36 N. H. 404; or a corporation in a different state from that of its incorporation; 58 Fed. Rep. 133; but there are exceptions to the rule as in case of a city which may condemn property beyond its borders where the necessity exists, as for a park; 44 Mich. 602; 58 Mo. 175; a sewer; 36 Mich. 474; 140 Ill. 216; or waterworks; 31 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 238; 54 N. J. L. 62; but in such case the property must be sufficiently near to the municipality to be serviceable for the purpose for which it is condemned; 99 N. Y. 569.

Indirect or consequential damages. The principle that a right of compensation exists wherever private property is taken for public use does not extend to the case of one whose property is indirectly damaged by the lawful use of property already belonging to the public. For example, it was held that an adjoining or abutting owner was not entitled to compensation for damages resulting from the change of a grade of a street; 4 Term 794; 158 Mass. 564; 82 Me. 1; 136 N. Y. 528. Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418, was the leading American case, and gave rise to a statute to remedy the wrong suggested by it. In Pennsylvania the doctrine of these cases was followed in a case in which Gibson, C. J., expressed regret that such injustice was remediless; 18 Pa. 187 (a case referred to by the same court as of a class intended to be remedied by the constitution of 1874; 150 Pa. 539). These and the other authorities were reviewed by the United States Supreme Court, and the same conclusion reached as being "well settled both in England and in this country;" 20 How. 135. Of the law at this period, it was said that the limitation of the term "taking" to an actual physical appropriation or divesting of title was "far too narrow to answer the purpose of justice;" Sedg. Const. L. (2d ed.) 456. See 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 1053, 1055; 2 Am. R. & Corp. Cas. 435. The law on this specific subject of change of grades became firmly settled, except as changed by constitutional or statutory enactments, but on the general subject of what constitutes a "taking" of property, it has since undergone very great changes, and the narrow rule of physical appropriation has ceased to afford a criterion of decision. An illustration of the tendency to treat this question liberally, rather than technically, is a decision that it is a "taking" of property to prohibit an owner of land on a boulevard from building, beyond a certain limit, on the front part of the lot; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 861; 97 Pa. 242; 118 id. 593. See also 73 Mich. 522; 18 L. R. A. 166. The older cases rested upon a narrow, the later ones upon a liberal, meaning of the word "property" in the constitutions. Of the latter, Eaton v. Boston, etc., Railroad, 51 N. H. 504, is the leading case on the subject of the right to compensation where property is injured and not physically taken. Plaintiff's land was overflowed during a freshet as the result of the construction of the defendant's railroad. Damages for the land actually taken for the railroad had been paid as the result of condemnation proceedings. It was held that the right to use the land undisturbed really constituted the property in it, rather than the physical possession of the land itself, and that even if the land itself were the "property," a physical interference with it which abridged the right to use it was in fact a taking of the owner's property to that extent. The opinion of Smith, J., in this case is said to have contributed more than any other towards the change in the law extending the effect of the word taking; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 58. See also 54 N. H. 545; 77 Wis. 288; 28 Minn. 534; 14 Ch. Div. 58; 99 U. S. 635; Earl, J., dissenting in 90 N. Y. 122. It is now quite settled that the flowing of lands, against the owner's consent and without compensation, is a taking; 51 N. H. 504; 30 Mich. 321. See also 41 Ill. 502; 25 Wis. 223; 13 Wall. 166. In the latter case, Miller, J., after referring to the decisions that there is no remedy for a consequential injury from the improvements of roads, streets, rivers, etc., said: "But we are of opinion that the decisions referred to have gone to the uttermost limit of sound judicial construction in favor of this principle, and, in some cases, beyond it, and that it remains true that where real estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed on it, so as to effectually destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a taking, within the meaning of the constitution, and that this proposition is not in conflict with the weight of judicial authority in this country, and certainly not with sound principle. Beyond this we do not go, and this case calls us to go no further." This was afterwards said by the court to be a case of "physical invasion of the real estate of the private owner, a practical ouster of his possession"; 98 U. S. 403.

The interference with the rights of abutting owners by building an elevated railroad on a street was held a taking of private property for public use without compensation, to restrain which the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction; 90 N. Y. 122. This case was decided by four judges against three dissenting, whose views were expressed by Earl, J., in an opinion much referred to, contending that it was a use of the street properly incident to its purpose as a public highway. An effort to secure a re-examination of the doctrine of this case resulted in its affirmance; 104 N. Y. 268. In a subsequent case the New York court of appeals stated the law of that state to be that, although the abutting owner might have an injunction, and in the same proceeding recover full compensation for the permanent injury, he could not, in an action at law, recover permanent damages measured by the diminution in value of the property, but only such temporary damages as he had sustained at the time of commencing the action; 135 N. Y. 432; 112 id. 190. See also 118 id. 618; 137 id. 302.

In a leading case the construction of an ordinary commercial railroad along a street in front of a lot without impairing ingress and egress, but resulting in the usual injuries to the lot from steam, smoke, dust, smells, interference with light and air, jarring the ground, etc., was held to be an appropriation of the street for what was not a proper street use, for which damages were recoverable, but limited to the injury resulting from the operation of the road in front of the lot, and not including any accruing from operating it on other parts of the street: 39 Minn. 286.

The Maryland court of appeals, in reviewing the decisions on the subject, and particularly the New York cases, mentions as the only other cases holding that opinion, 7 Ohio St. 460; 39 Minn. 286; 66 Miss. 279, and considers that its own decision in 59 Md. 148 and 74 id. 363 should be adhered to as being in accord with the decided weight of judicial opinion. The conclusion is thus stated: "The New York doctrine involves this inextricable dilemma, viz., if the grading of a street by a municipal corporation cuts off all access to a person's house, albeit his property is thereby destroyed and rendered valueless, it is not taken in the constitutional sense; but if a railroad company in lawfully constructing its road does precisely the same thing that the city did in grading a street, then the abutter's property is taken, though not physically entered upon at all. The structure is therefore a lawful one. But it does not destroy the street as a street, though it may cause the plaintiff greater inconvenience in gaining access to his lots than he encountered before it was built. But this and other injuries complained of are purely incidental and consequential, though the appellant, under the statutes of Maryland, is not without a remedy therefor; 79 Md. 277: s. c. 29 Atl. Rep. 830.

The question what constitutes a taking, under the older constitutional provisions, was much considered with respect to the use of streets and highways by many other modern appliances, such as gas and water pipes, steam and electric railroads, and poles for telegraph, telephone, and electric light wires. In this class of cases, of which the elevated railroad cases have been used as an illustration, the question has turned on the consideration whether the proposed use was a legitimate incidental use of the street as such, and the tendency of the cases is in favor of a very liberal construction of the rights of the public, at least in streets of cities. In some states a distinction is made between city streets and country roads, and the public easement in the latter is much more restricted, and the rights of abutting owners to damages consequently more extended; 62 N. Y. 386; 111 Pa. 35; 167 id. 62; 124 Ind. 577.

In a general view of the subject nothing more is practicable than a mere indication or illustration of the tendency of the decisions which must be resorted to and examined for application to a special case. City streets are legitimately used, from necessity, for sewers and drains; 28 Conn. 363; 102 Ind. 372; 29 N. J. Eq. 206; 27 Miss. 357; water pipes; 29 Hun 245; gas pipes, as a practical necessity in cities, are not questioned but indirectly sanctioned; 90 N. Y. 161; 32 Vt. 371; 2 Hun 146. See 13 Allen 146, 160. As to steam railroads, from a great conflict of decisions (difficult if not impossible to reconcile), it would seem to be the best opinion that it is not a legitimate use of the street; see Rand. Em. Dom. § 405; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 111, with notes citing the cases at large; a horse railway is almost universally held to be a proper use of streets; Rand. Em. Dom. § 402; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 124; the only substantial dissent being in New York; 39 N. Y. 404; unless the fee is in the public; 50 id. 206. See 14 Ohio St. 523; 27 Wis. 194. With respect to electric railways in cities, now a current subject of litigation, the doctrine of "the right of the public to use the streets by means of street cars," was said to be "now so thoroughly settled as to be no longer open to debate," and it was extended to the poles and wires of the new system; 47 N. J. Eq. 380; and see 85 Mich. 634; 75 Md. 222; 61 Conn. 127; 147 Pa. 579; but not along a country road; 167 id. 62. See Rand. Em. Dom. § 403. Electric light poles are usually treated as proper, on the same basis as the older lamp posts; 54 Hun 469; but not telegraph and telephone poles, according to the weight of authority; 49 Fed. Rep. 113; 86 Va. 696; 16 R. I. 668; 148 U. S. 92; though in some cases it is held otherwise, and of these the leading case considered the subject within the principle of Callender v. Marsh; the opinion of the court and the dissenting one of two judges present the two views of the question very fully; 136 Mass. 75. See also 88 Mo. 258.

In the cases relating to the use of streets and highways a great diversity of decision is occasioned by the distinctions drawn between the rights of an abutting owner who has the fee and one owning merely an easement of access over a street of which the soil belongs to the public. The question is further complicated by the varied application of the doctrine that an owner whose land was taken for a street or highway is presumed to anticipate the future uses to which it may be put both over and under the surface. The confusion of the decisions is well stated by a writer on the subject: "Laying aside constitutional and statutory declarations of liability for consequential injuries we find the following anticipations imputed to one whose land is affected by a street easement. In every state except Ohio he anticipates that he may be obliged to enter his house by a second-story window when the grade is raised, or by a ladder when the grade is lowered. In New York he does not foresee any improved method of transportation from the horse-car to the electric motor; but in Pennsylvania he anticipates all methods. The Massachusetts man seems to be the only one who has clearly anticipated the telegraph and telephone. Judged by results there is no working rule of general application deducible from a presumed anticipation of future use." Rand. Em. Dom. § 414.

In some states there are constitutional provisions covering this subject, sixteen of them requiring compensation when property is damaged by such proceedings generally, and three others when the delegated power of eminent domain is exercised by corporations. Under these provisions compensation is required for property "damaged" as well as "taken," and the former word is held to include all actual damages resulting from the exercise of the right of eminent domain which diminish the market value of private property; 25 Neb. 489; 66 Cal. 492; 67 Ga. 386; 106 Ill. 511; 45 Ark. 429; s. c. 136 U. S. 121.

The treatment by the courts of the subject of consequential damages is illustrated by the course of decisions under two constitutions of Illinois, by the supreme court of that state, which is very elaborately reviewed in a judgment of the supreme court of the United States. The constitution of 1848 prohibited the taking or application to public use of property without just compensation; and the rule adopted by the courts was that any physical injury to private property, by the erection, etc., of a public improvement, in or along a public highway, whereby its use was materially interrupted, was to be regarded as a taking, within the meaning of the constitution. The constitution of 1870 provided that private property should not be taken or damaged without just compensation, and upon this it was held that the property owner was protected against any substantial damage, though consequential, and that it did not require a trespass or actual physical invasion; 102 Ill. 64, 379; 125 U. S. 161. In the judgment last cited Harlan, J., said: "We concur in that construction" and "we regard that case (102 Ill. 64) as conclusive of this question." This constitution of Illinois was the first in which the word "damaged" was inserted, but in 1894 the supreme court of Colorado enumerated fourteen other states which had then adopted the word; 36 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 789.

See, generally, as to land injured; 2 Am. R. & C. Cas. 94; 5 id. 201; property damaged; 25 Am. L. Rev. 924; taken or damaged; 27 Am. L. Reg. 391; 21 Cent. L. J. 130.

What estate is acquired. Where the constitution contains no restriction, a fee or any less estate may be taken, in the discretion of the legislature; 100 Mass. 544; 89 Ind. 501; 34 Ohio St. 541; 3 Dill. 465; 79 N. Y. 293; 80 Va. 616; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 277; Rand. Em. Dom. § 205; Cooley, Const. Lim. 688; and if a fee is taken under the statute, the land may afterwards be devoted to other uses; id.; Rand. Em. Dom. § 209. If the state condemn, a fee is presumed; 50 Pa. 425; 53 id. 477; but when a private corporation does so, never; Rand. Em. Dom. § 206; when the act authorized a railroad company to take the fee for a right of way it was a qualified estate which would revert; 50 Mo. 496; s. c. 62 id. 429; but a railroad may be authorized to take a fee; 2 Dev. & B. 451. The purpose is sometimes said to indicate the estate taken; 127 Mass. 408; 45 N. Y. 234; but this is an unsafe criterion of the interest, and the better opinion is that it merely defines the use. See 31 La. Ann. 430; 32 id. 471; 90 Mich. 385; 53 N. J. L. 1. Under a provision that the title should vest, a city took a fee for sewers; 144 Mass. 303; but a turnpike company only an easement; 36 Barb. 136. An absolute power of alienation, the earmark of untrammelled and unconditional ownership, has been supported in land held by a municipal corporation for a park; 45 N. Y. 234; 137 id. 241; or an almshouse; 7 N. Y. 314; 2 Blatchf. 95; when a street which had been taken for a canal was abandoned, the right of the public and the abutters revived in the street; 88 Ind. 563; and land taken for a canal was afterwards used for a street; 42 Hun 202; 34 Ohio St. 541. It is said that a municipal corporation can condemn the fee-simple title of land for streets, but only so as to acquire the absolute control for that purpose and not a proprietary right to sell or devote it to a private use; 46 Minn. 540. When the fee is taken and the use ceases, the state may authorize a sale for other uses, but when only an easement, the land reverts; Lewis, Em. Dom. 596, citing cases; and so if there is an abandonment; id. 597.

See, generally, 3 Am. R. R. & Corp. Cas. 368; 32 Am. L. Reg. 563; 10 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 11; 32 Cent. L. J. 80.

The time when payment must be made varies according to the exact terms of the constitutional provision under which proceedings are taken. In the majority of states where there is no express provision it is held that compensation need not be concurrent in time with the taking, it is sufficient if an adequate and certain remedy is provided by which the owner may compel payment of damages; 18 Wend. 9; 26 id. 585; 6 Hill 359; 11 N. Y. 308; 96 id. 227; and this means reasonable legal certainty; id.; 54 N. Y. 132, 146; 89 id. 189; or if there is a definite provision or security for the payment of the compensation; 34 Ala. 461; 31 Ark. 494; 20 Fla. 597; 137 Mass. 71; 54 N. H. 590 (but 50 id. 591 seems contra); 19 Conn. 142; 5 Ohio St. 109; 17 Pa. 524 (contra, as to private roads; 31 id. 12); 11 Leigh 42; 57 Vt. 128; 88 N. C. 686; 57 Wis. 364; 25 Fed. Rep. 521. The same rule was formerly followed, in some states in which later constitutions provided for prior payment, or required compensation where none was provided for before, as Maryland; 3 Bland, Ch. 386; 19 Ga. 427; 3 Mich. 496; 52 Ind. 16; other states require that the owner shall receive compensation before entry; 45 Cal. 640 (see 31 id. 538, which reviewed the cases, established a different rule, and was overruled); 53 id. 208; 37 Tex. 447; 1 Md. Ch. 248; 57 Ill. 307; 120 id. 86; but in Maine, while title does not pass, possession may be taken before payment, and a reasonable time—three years being so held—allowed therefor; 34 Me. 247; 75 id. 91. It has been held that the state when acting directly may provide that title shall pass when the amount is ascertained, it being presumed that payment will be made by the state; 78 N. Y. 335; but any such declaration in a statute is controlled by the constitution, and it was held in a New York case that payment must be prior to or concurrent with the taking; 21 Wall. 196. In many state constitutions there is a distinction between the direct exercise of the power by the government and the delegated power conferred on private corporations.

Under such a provision it was said that in both cases the sovereign power is coupled with the correlative duty; 52 N. J. L. 132; but municipal corporations must settle first when exercising delegated power; id.; 38 id. 151; 39 id. 291. And it is said by a writer of authority, "the almost invariable, and certainly the just, course being to require payment to precede or accompany the act of appropriation;" 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 615. Generally, however, when the compensation is to be paid by the state or is a charge upon the funds of a municipality that is held sufficient; 103 Mass. 120; 88 N. C. 636; 1 Pa. 309; 99 N. Y. 569; 40 Ind. 33; 40 Wis. 674; 68 Pa. 168, 170; 2 Am. Ry. & Corp. Cas. (Wis.) 424; but if the available resources are shown to be insufficient an entry may be enjoined; 26 id. 46.

The fact that there is a limitation of the amount to be expended does not invalidate the law for taking property; 91 U. S. 367; 160 id. 663.

When the title passes. It naturally follows that no title can be acquired under the proceedings until the compensation is paid or so secured as to be treated in law as the equivalent of payment. Accordingly when the title is permitted to vest before payment, it is said to be subject to a claim for compensation in the nature of a vendor's lien enforceable in equity; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 620, and note citing cases. And a sale or mortgage of the property could only be made subject to such prior right of the landowner, which is maintained by some courts on the theory of a lien, and by others on that of title remaining in the owner; id. § 621. In Pennsylvania, however, an extreme doctrine prevails; the appropriation is valid and effectual where compensation is paid or secured; 8 W. & S. 459; 66 Pa. 404; 75 id. 464; and title passes when the bond is approved by the court under the statute; 85 id. 73; and remains vested even if the bond is found to be valueless; 138 id. 163; and there is no lien for compensation; 118 id. 512. By the act of location the corporation acquires a conditional title as against the land-owner, which becomes absolute upon making or securing compensation; 141 id. 407; as against third parties there is a valid location after entry made, lines run, map prepared, and a report made to the directors and adopted by them; 159 id. 331; but running a line, making a map, and a report to the directors, not acted on, did not confer title to the location to justify an injunction to restrain another company from taking the land for a railway, though the land was owned by the plaintiff company; 141 id. 407.

If a land-owner, knowing that a railroad company has entered upon his land, and is engaged in constructing its road without having complied with a statute requiring either payment by agreement or proceedings to condemn, remains inactive and permits it to go on and expend large sums in the work, he cannot maintain either trespass or ejectment, and will be restricted to a suit for damages; 158 U. S. 1.

The actual cash market value, at the time, of property actually taken must be allowed; 117 Mass. 302; 58 Mo. 491; 51 Kan. 408; 110 Ill. 414; 98 U. S. 403. It has been said that the true criterion of market value is the sum which the property would bring if sold at auction, conducted in the fairest possible way; 63 N. H. 557; but this is not the result of the best considered cases. "Market value means the fair value of the property as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell an article; not what could be obtained for it under peculiar circumstances; not its speculative value; not a value obtained from the necessity of another. Nor is it to be limited to that price which the property would bring when forced off at auction under the hammer;" 119 Mass. 126; it is measured by the difference between what it would have sold for before the injury, and what it would have sold for as affected by it; 7 S. & R. 441; 112 Pa. 56; what would be accepted by one desiring but not obliged to sell and paid by one under no necessity of buying; 115 id. 325; 49 Ark. 381; it is not to be measured by the interest or necessity of the particular owner; 95 Pa. 426; nor, on the other hand, by those of the appropriator; 110 Pa. 54; 88 Cal. 50; 22 N. J. L. 195; 53 Ga. 178; 59 Ia. 243; when these principles are fairly applied due consideration may be given to auction value; 115 Pa. 325; but its availability for other special purposes to which it is particularly adapted by reason of "its natural advantages, or its artificial improvements, or its intrinsic character," may be considered as an element of value; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 479, and cases cited; as, for railroad approaches to a large city; 116 Me. 114; 58 id. 491; or for a bridge site; 17 Ga. 30; 49 Ark. 381; or a mill site; 64 Miss. 404; so also its situation and surroundings for railroad purposes; 52 N. J. L. 391; 34 Kan. 158; 111 Ill. 413; or market-gardening; 110 Ill. 414; or subdivision into village lots; 57 Wis. 332; 91 Ill. 49; 30 Ohio St. 108; 30 Minn. 227; or in case of a pond, for ice or milling, there being no other one near; 5 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 217; or for warehouse purposes; 33 Minn. 210. When the water of a stream running through a farm was taken by a village for its waterworks, the owner was entitled to damages, not only for being deprived of the water for farm purposes, but also for being deprived of the opportunity to sell water rights to prospective purchasers of village lots plotted out for sale in a part of the farm; 67 Vt. 653. So its adaptability for the particular purpose for which the condemnation is sought may be shown, as islands well situated for boom purposes; 98 U. S. 403; or the bed of an old canal desired for a railroad; 27 Hun 116. But mere speculative opinions and considerations will be excluded from consideration; 127 Mass. 358; 9 G. & J. 479; 116 Ill. 163; 107 Pa. 461; 57 Wis. 332; 17 N. J. L. 25; 18 Mo. App. 632.

Assessment of benefits on the remainder of a tract of which part is taken is prohibited by the constitution in some states, either generally, as in Iowa and Ohio, in favor of any corporation, as in Arkansas, Kansas, and South Carolina, or any other than municipal, as in California, North Dakota, and Washington. In the other states there is a diversity of decisions which have been thus classified, as: 1. Not considered. 2. Special benefit is set off against damages to the remainder but not against the value of the part taken. 3. General or special, as in the last class. 4. Special, against both damages to remainder and value of part taken. 5. General and special, as in the last class. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 465.

In the first class the benefit is excluded because compensation is held to be money, and this view appears to be confined to one state; 34 Miss. 227, 241; 62 id. 807.

The second rule which obtains has been justly criticised as illogical; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 467; but it rests upon the theory that for the part taken compensation in money is required, while for incidental damage the legislature may prescribe the rule of compensation. This was the doctrine laid down in Tennessee which, with several other states, adheres to it; 2 Swan. Tenn. 422; 6 Wis. 636; 59 id. 364; 34 Md. 336; 9 Leigh 313; 21 Gratt. 164; 24 W. Va. 662; 11 Neb. 585; 25 id. 542.

The third class rests upon the same idea of requiring compensation in money for the part taken, but treating the claim for damage to the remainder as consequential and properly subject to the set-off of all advantages; and in Kentucky, from which comes the leading case, a judgment was reversed for an instruction excluding general benefits; 17 B. Monr. 173; 5 Dana 28; 50 Ga. 612 (but see 17 Ga. 30, in which a different doctrine was applied, which was passed without mention in 30 id. 43, which laid down the rule afterwards adhered to); 26 Tex. 588; 33 id. 112; 37 id. 447; 60 Tex. 215; but see 60 id. 76; 31 La. Ann. 430; 36 id. 344.

The fourth rule allows special benefits against both the value of the part taken and damage to the remainder, because just compensation is construed to mean recompense for the net resulting injury, and excludes a share of the general advantage, because to allow it would be to distribute it unequally, charging those whose land is taken for that which the rest of the community enjoy without cost; 60 Maine 290; 55 N. H. 413; 4 Cush. 291; 125 Mass. 226, 557; 57 Vt. 240; 32 Conn. 452; 55 N. J. L. 88; 95 Pa. 426; 112 id. 56 (which lays down the rule with great clearness not only on this point but in confining the consideration of inconvenience and advantage to the effect of both upon the market value); 4 Jones, N. C. 89; 74 N. C. 220; 70 Mo. 629; 91 id. 26; 11 Minn. 515; 28 id. 61, 503; 59 Wis. 364; 18 Ore. 283 (but see 6 id. 328). See L. R. 2 C. P. 638.

The last class permits all benefits to be set off against all damages of either kind, placing the rule on natural equity, and in a leading case (17 Ga. 30, afterwards apparently overruled as stated supra), it is argued that the term compensation comes from the civil law which so construes it. This rule is accepted by many courts which, among other reasons, hold that compensation does not mean money but includes any means of recompense; 46 Cal. 85; 2 Harring. 514; 5 Ohio St. 140; 43 id. 228 (before the constitution of 1851); 97 Ind. 79; 130 id. 219; 5 Rich. 428; 6 Rich. 47. See 60 Tex. 76. In New York this rule applies to cases where land is taken by the state and municipal corporations; 99 N. Y. 296; 120 id. 309; but in the case of private corporations the third rule seems to apply; 68 id. 591; 118 id. 618; 129 id. 576. See 50 id. 302. In Illinois the cases prior to 1870 were under the fifth rule; 14 Ill. 190; and since the constitution of that year and a subsequent statute it has been held that benefits were prohibited as against the value of land taken; 77 Ill. 250; that general benefits cannot be set off against either value or damage; 79 id. 290; and that special damage may be charged against the damage to the residue; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 470, where the cases are collected and analyzed.

The last rule enumerated seems to be approved by the federal courts; 3 Cra. C. 599; 103 U. S. 599; and upon candid consideration it must be admitted that if benefits are to be allowed at all it is the only logical doctrine. This seems also to be the conclusion of the writer whose classification of the decisions is here given, and to whose discussion of the whole subject reference may profitably be made; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 471.

Damage to property injured but not physically taken. A question of great importance which yet remains to be settled arises either under the later constitutional provisions for compensation for injury as well as actual taking, or under the extension of the meaning of the word taking to include consequential damages so called, when the injury to property is so great and permanent as practically to deprive the owner of all use and enjoyment of it.

In such cases the only remedy of the property owner, in the absence of legislation, is a common-law action, and for permanent or continuing injury trespass is totally inadequate, as is evidenced by the fact that to restrain it when continuous is a recognized ground of equitable interference. In many cases it is held that prospective damages cannot be recovered, and the property owner is thus put to the necessity of resorting to repeated actions, but when the trespass is the result of the exercise of a public use authorized by statute this remedy is not only unsatisfactory but illogical. Accordingly it is held in many cases that such damage being of a permanent nature there should be but one recovery for all damages past, present, and future; and it has been held that they may be allowed. An action on the case is the proper remedy in such cases, but the measure of damages applied is not uniform, though when the liberal rule referred to is adopted the payment vests in the defendant a right to maintain its works and operates as a bar to further suits. In some cases such an action has also been held to have the effect of statutory proceedings for the assessment of compensation: 118 Ill. 203; 141 id. 35. This subject is, however, involved in great confusion, which should undoubtedly be removed by legislative enactments providing for the acquisition of the right to cause, and the assessment of compensation for, permanent injury to property whenever consequential damages are provided for by constitution or statute, or recognized by the courts. As to this subject, see discussions with copious citations of cases in Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 624, 625; Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 308-311; 26 Am. L. Reg. 281, 345.

Who are proper and necessary parties. The compensation must be paid to the true owner as on that the title depends; 82 N. Y. 436; 112 Ill. 379; 133 U. S. 553; and if paid to the wrong person, it may be recovered from him by one having an interest; 92 N. Y. 262; 109 Ind. 411; but if title is doubtful, it may be paid into court; 41 Fed. Rep. 70; 73 N. Y. 560; and if afterwards paid out wrongly the person who paid it in is not liable; 146 U. S. 338.

The general principle is that the necessary parties to a proceeding, independent of statutory requirements, are all persons having an interest in the property taken, as proprietors, or such as is recognized by the law of the state as property; Lewis, Fin. Dom. § 317. When the ownership is divided, each is entitled to his share, as life-tenant and remainderman; 112 N. C. 759; 86 Mo. 473; dower after admeasurement; 117 Pa. 174; but not before the dower is assigned; 43 Ill. 401; and only as against the award when it is inchoate; 27 N. J. Eq. 534. The interest of a tenant must be compensated; 4 Whart. 86; if the lease has actual value to him; 144 Ill. 537; sometimes separately; 127 Ill. 144; and sometimes by apportionment of the entire amount; 108 Mass. 535.

When part of land under lease is taken, the lease is not terminated or the tenant discharged; 134 Ill. 37; but both he and the lessor are entitled to compensation for their respective losses; 20 Pick. 159; 11 Ohio 408; 30 Pa. 362; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 968. See Rand. Em. Dom. § 304; 21 L. R. A. 212, with note on rights of tenants, reversioners, life-tenants, remaindermen, etc., in such cases; 5 Am. R. R. & Corp. Cas. 208, as to grantor and grantee, and 29 Am. St. Rep. 304, as to leased premises. See also 29 Am. L. Rev. 351, as to the abatement of rent when leased premises are appropriated.

As to mortgagees the decisions lack both uniformity and consistency, and this result is largely due to the differing views taken of the position of a mortgagee before the law. As between the parties to the mortgage the award takes the place of the land and the lien attaches to it; 2 Paige 68; 59 Ind. 453; 102 Mo. 560; 123 Ill. 95; as to all rights and interests; 112 N. Y. 610. The damages should be apportioned by the jury between owner, lessee, mortgagee, etc.; 48 Mich. 547. In some cases the remainder of the land must be exhausted before the mortgagee can resort to the fund; 44 N. Y. 192; or to the condemned land; 20 Neb. 281; and the mortgagee, if not a party to the proceedings, may appropriate the fund; 56 Ia. 422; 32 N. J. Eq. 370; but when the land has been sold and bought in by the mortgagee he loses all claim to the fund and new proceedings must be taken to condemn his interest; 35 N. J. Eq. 379. As affecting the title of the appropriator who has been said to take no better title than an innocent purchaser for value; 38 Ia. 463; and must protect himself against the claim of the mortgagee; 57 Wis. 311; the more reasonable opinion would seem to be that the mortgagee is a necessary party; if in possession he certainly is; 36 N. H. 84; 5 Gray 468; or after condition broken; 57 Vt. 248; in other cases to be bound he must have notice; 24 Minn. 25; 29 N. J. Eq. 128; 12 R. I. 144; 55 Vt. 207; 57 Wis. 311; 109 Ind. 411; 40 Mich. 383; 67 Me. 358; L. R. 1 Eq. 145; contra; 11 N. H. 293; 13 W. Va. 476; 45 Conn. 303; 126 Mass. 1, 427; 56 Cal. 508; 44 N. Y. 192. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 324; 18 L. R. A. 113. It was held that the appropriator must see to the discharge of the mortgage and may pay it off or keep the money until it is due; 19 Wend. 659; and he may require or provide for its satisfaction; 131 N. Y. 127. It has even been held that a mortgagee cannot move for consequential damages to mortgaged property when the mortgagor has without fraud settled with the company; 121 Pa. 467.

Judgment liens may be divested by the proceedings, and the creditor need not be made a party; 47 N. Y. 157, 162. This is the leading case and well states the reasons on which this settled principle is based. See also 59 Ind. 446; 7 Phila. 650; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 325; Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 302, 340.

Notice and procedure. It is a general rule that notice of proceedings must be given to the owner of property to be taken; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 363; Rand. Em. Dom. § 333; though a few cases hold contrary to the otherwise uniform course of decisions; 5 Del. Ch. 524; 40 Md. 425, 437; 25 Miss. 479; 35 id. 17; 23 Ill. 202. In the Delaware case there was actual notice, though it was held that the act need not require it; in the Mississippi cases the proceeding is considered as in rem, which is treated as actual notice, and the Illinois case is in effect though not expressly overruled in 59 id. 276 and 78 id. 96. These cases have been termed "sporadic decisions," by which the current of authority is not disturbed; Rand. Em. Dom. § 333. See also Lewis, Em. Dom. § 364; where the cases are cited, and, for other cases cited in support of the view that notice need not be required in the act; 21 N. Y. 595; 2 Dana 227; 2 Mich. 441; 5

Ohio St. 140; 3 Paige 75. The questions whether the property shall be taken and what compensation shall be paid need not be tried by a jury; 2 Dev. & Bat. 451; 2 Harring. 514; the constitution does not describe the mode or means by which compensation shall be ascertained; these therefore can only be prescribed by the legislature; 5 Del. Ch. 524; under the constitution of the United States, a jury is not necessary; 46 Fed. Rep. 176; and it cannot be demanded as a matter of right; 100 N. C. 497; 11 N. H. 19; 54 N. J. L. 268.

It was recently held that due process of law is furnished and equal protection of the law given in such proceedings when the course pursued for the assessment and collection of taxes is that customarily provided in the state, for then the party charged has an opportunity to be heard; 164 U. S. 112; and where by state law a burden is imposed upon property for the public use, "whether it be for the whole state or some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections;" id.

As to procedure generally, see Rand. Em. Dom. ch. xi.; Lewis, Em. Dom. ch. xvii.-xix.; Mills, Em. Dom. ch. xi.; 3 L. R. A. 83; 14 A. & E. R. R. Cas. 378, 384, 392; and for some cases as to the necessity of notice and a hearing, to constitute due process of law, see 2 L. R. A. (Ind.) 655, note; 3 id. (Mont.) 194, note; 11 id. 224.

The power need not be exhausted in the first instance; 36 Conn. 196; 87 Ala. 50; and a railroad may subsequently take land for laying additional tracks when necessary; 57 Ark. 359; 4 Montg. Co. Rep. Pa. 103; or a canal company for a new supply of water; 23 Pick. 36; or a company may take more than at present required, having view to future and other needs, and use of part is not an abandonment; 152 Pa. 488.

EMISSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The act by which any matter whatever is thrown from the body: thus, it is usual to say, emission of urine, emission of semen, etc.

Emission is not necessary in the commission of a rape to complete the offence; 1 Hale, P. C. 628; 4 C. & P. 249; 5 id. 297; 6 id. 251; 9 id. 31; 1 Const. 354; 30 Tex. App. 510; 30 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 851; 106 Mo. 463; [1891] 2 Q. B. 149. It is, however, essential in sodomy; 12 Co. 36; 94 Mich. 27. But see 1 Va. Cas. 307.

EMIT. To put out; to send forth.

The tenth section of the first article of the constitution contains various prohibitions, among which is the following: "No state shall emit bills of credit." To emit bills of credit is to issue paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes, as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. 4 Pet. 410, 432; 11 id. 257; 28 Ark. 369; 1 Scam. 87; Story, Const. § 1358. See BILLS OF CREDIT.

EMMENAGOGUES. In Medical Jurisprudence. The name of a class of medicines which are believed to have the power of favoring the discharge of the menses. These are "savine (see Juniperus Sabina), black hellebore, aloes, gamboge, rue, madder, stinking goosefoot (chenopodium olidum), gin, parsley (and its active principle, apiol), permanganate of potassium, cantharides, and borax, and for the most part substances which, in large doses, act as drastic purgatives or stimulating diuretics." They are sometimes used for the criminal purpose of producing abortion (q. v.). They always endanger the life of the woman. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316; Dunglison, Med. Dict.; Parr, Med. Dict.; 3 Par. & F. Med. Jur. 88; Taylor's Med. Jur. 184.

EMOLUMENT. The profit arising from office or employment; that which is received as a compensation for services, or which is annexed to the possession of office as salary, fees, and perquisites; advantage; gain, public or private. Webster. It imports any perquisite, advantage, profit or gain arising from the possession of an office. 105 Pa. 303. See 113 id. 108.

EMPEROR. This word is synonymous with the Latin imperator: they are both derived from the verb imperare. Literally, it signifies he who commands.

EMPHYTEUSIS. In Civil Law. The name of a contract, in the nature of a perpetual lease, by which the owner of an uncultivated piece of land granted it to another, either in perpetuity or for a long time, on condition that he should improve it, by building on, planting, or cultivating it, and should pay for it an annual rent, with a right to the grantee to alienate it, or transmit it by descent to his heirs, and under a condition that the grantor should never re-enter as long as the rent should be paid to him by the grantee or his assigns. Inst. 3, 25, 3; 18 Toullier, n. 144.

EMPHYTEUTA. The grantee under a contract of emphyteusis or emphyteosis. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Hallam, c. ii. p. 1.

EMPLAZAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. The citation given to a person by order of the judge, and ordering him to appear before his tribunal on a given day and hour.

EMPLOYE or EMPLOYEE. From the French. A term of rather broad signification for one who is employed, whether his duties are within or without the walls of the building in which the chief officer usually transacts his business. 3 Ct. Cl.

257, 260. It is not usually applied to higher officers of corporations or to domestic servants, but to clerks, workmen, and laborers, collectively.

Strictly and etymologically, it means "a person employed," but in practice, in the French language, it ordinarily is used to signify a person in some official employment, and as generally used with us, though perhaps not confined to any official employment, it is understood to mean some permanent employment or position. It may be any one who renders service to another; 30 N. J. Eq. 588; and has been extended so far as to embrace attorney and counsel; 58 N. Y. 358. The servant of a contractor for carrying mail is an employe of the department of the post-office; Brock. 280; also one who received five per cent. of the cost for superintending the erection of a warehouse was held an employe; 14 Md. 558. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

EMPLOYED. The act of doing a thing, and the being under contract or orders to do it. 14 Pet. 464, 475; 2 Paine 731, 745.

Where persons were employed "in and about the works," it was held that although their work as miners was at the bottom of a mine, the term covered them as employes until they arrived safely at the top, even although they discharged themselves; 2 C. P. Div. 397.

EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN ACT. The English statute of 38 and 39 Vict. c. 90, regulating the jurisdiction of certain courts over disputes between masters and employes. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT. The English statute of 43 and 44 Vict. c. 42, regulating the liability of employers in actions for negligence by their workmen and greatly limiting and modifying the common-law doctrine of common employment. The act is said to be "on the face of it an experimental and empirical compromise between conflicting interests." Poll. Torts 127. It was enacted for a limited time only, and has been since renewed from time to time. The effect is to put a "workman," "as against his employer, in approximately the same position as an outsider, as regards the safe and fit condition of the material instruments, fixed or movable, of the master's business," and to hold the latter responsible for the conduct of those in delegated authority under him; id.

Similar statutes have been enacted in many of the states. See Reno, Emp. Liab. Acts; MASTER AND SERVANT; FACTORY ACT.

EMPRESTITO. In Spanish Law. A loan. Something lent to the borrower at his request. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 18, l. 70.

EMPTIO, EMPTOR (Lat. emere, to buy). Emptio, a buying. Emptor, a buyer. Emptio et venditio, buying and selling.

In Roman Law. The name of a contract of sale. Du Cange; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

VOL. I.—43

EN AUTRE DROIT (Fr.). In the right of another.

EN DECLARATION DE SIMULATION. A form of action used in Louisiana. It is one of revendication (q. v.), and has for its object to have the contract declared judicially a simulation and a nullity; 5 La. Ann. 1; 20 id. 169.

EN DEMEURE (Fr.). In default. Used in Louisiana. 3 Mart. La. N. S. 574.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS. In English Law. Beginning with the stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77, parliament has passed a series of acts for improving the condition of, and extending the system of education in, the endowed schools. Moz. & W.

EN OWEL MAIN (L. Fr.). In equal hand. The word owel occurs also in the phrase owelty of partition. See 1 Washb. R. P. 427.

EN VENTRE SA MERE (Fr.). In its mother's womb. For certain purposes, indeed for all beneficial purposes, a child en ventre sa mère is to be considered as born; 5 T. R. 49; 1 P. Wms. 329. Its civil rights are equally respected at every period of gestation; it is capable of taking under a will, by descent, or under a marriage settlement, may be appointed executor, may have a guardian assigned to it, may obtain an injunction to stay waste; 3 Johns. Cas. 18; 5 S. & R. 38; Bing. Inf. ch. vii; 1 Ves. 81; 2 Atk. 117; Bacon, Abr. Infancy (B); 2 H. Bla. 399; 2 Vern. 710; 4 Ves. Jr. 227. In a recent English case it was held that such a child is to be considered as living so as to vest in the parent on the death of the life tenant a devise made by a testator to A for life, and on her death to the parent of the child, "for her absolute use and benefit in case she has issue living at the death" of A, "but in case she has no issue then living," then over, when the parent was en-ciente at the time of A's death; [1895] 2 Ch. 497. The right of an unborn infant to take property by descent or otherwise has been said by a learned commentator to be an inchoate right, which will not be completed by a premature birth; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 130, n.; but as the word premature is used in the authorities, the rule accurately stated is that it must be born alive or after such period of foetal existence that it might reasonably be expected to survive; 4 Sm. & M. 99; 5 S. & R. 38; 4 Kent 248; 2 Paige 35. See Tyler, Inf. & Cov. ch. xiv., POSTHUMOUS CHILD; FETUS; NEGLIGENCE.

ENABLING POWERS. A term used in equity. When the donor of a power, who is the owner of the estate, confers upon persons not seised of the fee the right of creating interests to take effect out of it, which could not be done by the donee of the power unless by such authority, this is called an enabling power.

ENABLING STATUTE. The act of 32 Henry VIII. c. 28, by which tenants in tail, husbands seised in right of their wives, and others, were empowered to make leases for their lives or for twenty-one years, which they could not do before. 2 Bla. Com. 319; Co. Litt. 44a. The phrase is also applied to any statute enabling persons or corporations to do what before they could not.

ENACT. To establish by law; to perform or effect; to decree. The usual formula in making laws is, Be it enacted.

ENAJENACION. In Spanish Law. The act by which one person transfers to another a property, either gratuitously, as in the case of a donation, or by an owner's title, as in the case of a sale or an exchange.

In Mexican Law. This word is used in conveyancing to convey the fee, and not a mere servitude upon the land. 26 Cal. 88.

ENCEINTE (Fr.). Pregnant. See PREGNANCY.

ENCLOSURE. An artificial fence around one's estate. 39 Vt. 34, 326; 36 Wis. 42. See CLOSE.

ENCOMIENDA. A charge or mandate conferring certain important privileges on the four military orders of Spain, to wit, those of Santiago, Calatrava, Alcantara, and Montesa. In the legislation of the Indias, it signified the concession of a certain number of Indians for the purpose of instructing them in the Christian religion and defending their persons and property.

ENCOURAGE. To intimate, to incite to anything, to give courage to, to inspirit, to embolden, to raise confidence, to make confident. 7 Q. B. Div. 258.

ENCROACH. To gain unlawfully upon the lands, property, or authority of another: as if one man presseth upon the grounds of another too far, or if a tenant owe two shillings rent-service and the lord exact three. So, too, the Spencers were said to encroach the king's authority. Blount; Plowd. 94a. Quite a memorable instance of punishment for encroaching (accroaching) royal power took place in 21 Edw. III. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 80. Taking fees by clerks of the courts has been held encroaching; 1 Leon. 5.

ENCUMBRANCE. See INCUMBRANCE.

ENDOWMENT. Now generally used of a permanent provision for any public object, as a school or hospital, but more technically, of the assigning dower to a woman, or the severing of a sufficient portion for a vicar towards his perpetual maintenance. 1 Bla. Com. 387; 2 id. 135; 3 Steph. Com. 99; 27 Me. 381; 32 N. J. L. 360; 4 Har. & M. 429.

ENDORSE. See INDORSE.

ENEMY. A nation which is at war with another. A citizen or a subject of such a nation. Any of the subjects or citizens of a state in amity with another state who have commenced or have made preparations for commencing hostilities against the latter state, and also the citizens or subjects of a state in amity with another state who are in the service of a state at war with it. See Salk. 635; Bacon, Abr. Treason, G; 43 Pa. 491.

By the term enemy is also understood a person who is desirous of doing injury to another. The Latins had two terms to signify these two classes of persons: the first, or the public enemy, they called hostis, and the latter, or the private enemy, inimicus.

An enemy cannot, as a general rule, enter into any contract which can be enforced in the courts of law; but the rule is not without exceptions: as, for example, when a state permits expressly its own citizens to trade with the enemy; and perhaps a contract for necessities, or for money to enable the individual to get home, might be enforced; 7 Pet. 586. See also 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 81; 4 Sawy. 457; 24 Ark. 337; 4 Dall. 37.

ENFEOFF. To make a gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. See FEOFFMENT.

ENFRANCHISE. To make free; to incorporate a man in a society or body politic. Cun. Dict.

ENFRANCHISEMENT. Giving freedom to a person. Admitting a person to the freedom of a city. A denizen of England, or a citizen of London, is said to be enfranchised. So, too, a villein is enfranchised when he obtains his freedom from his lord. Termes de la Ley; 11 Co. 91; Jacob, Law Dict.

The word is now used principally either of the manumission of slaves (q. v.), of giving to a borough or other constituency a right to return a member or members to parliament, or of the conversion of copyhold into freehold. Moz. & W. L. Dict.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF COPYHOLD. The change of the tenure by which lands are held from copyhold to freehold, as by a conveyance to the copyholder or by a release of the seignorial rights. 1 Watk. Copy. 362; 1 Steph. Com. 632; 2 id. 51.

ENGAGEMENT. In French Law. A contract. The obligations arising from a quasi contract.

The terms obligation and engagement are said to be synonymous; 17 Toullier, n. 1; but the Code seems specially to apply the term engagement to those obligations which the law imposes on a man without the intervention of any contract, either on the part of the obligor or the obligee; art. 1370. An engagement to do or omit to do something amounts to a promise; 21 N. J. L. 369.

Promises or debts of a married woman, not expressly charged on her separate estate, are termed her general engagements, not binding it unless made with reference to and upon the credit of it. L. R. 4 C. P. 593; L. R. 2 Eq. 182; 3 DeG. F. & J. 513.

ENGLAND. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

ENGLESHIRE. A law was made by Canute, for the preservation of his Danes, that, when a man was killed, the hundred or town should be liable to be amerced, unless it could be proved that the person killed was an Englishman. This proof was called Engleshire. It consisted, generally, of the testimony of two males on the part of the father of him who had been killed, and two females on the part of his mother. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 447; 4 Bla. Com. 195; Spelman, Gloss.

ENGLISH MARRIAGE. This phrase may refer to the place where the marriage was solemnized, or it may refer to the nationality and domicile of the parties between whom it was solemnized, the place where the union so created was to have been enjoyed. 6 Prob. Div. 51.

ENGROSS (Fr. gros). To copy the rude draught of an instrument in a fair, large hand. To write out, in a large, fair hand, on parchment. The term is applied to statutes, which, after being read and acted on a sufficient number of times, are ordered to be engrossed. Anciently, also, used of the process of making the indenture of a fine. 5 Co. 39 b.

In Criminal Law. To buy up such large quantities of an article as to obtain a monopoly of it for the purpose of selling at an unreasonable price. The tendency of modern law is very decidedly to restrict the application of the law against engrossing; and is very doubtful if it applies at all except to obtaining a monopoly of provisions; 1 East 143. And now the common-law offence of the total engrossing of any commodity is abolished by stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24. Merely buying for the purpose of selling again is not necessarily engrossing. 14 East 406; 15 id. 511. See TRUSTS; COMBINATIONS.

ENGROSSER. One who engrosses or writes on parchment in a large, fair hand.

One who purchases large quantities of any commodity in order to have the command of the market and to sell them again at high prices.

ENGROSSING. The offence committed by an engrosser.

ENHANCED. Taken in an unqualified sense, it is equivalent to "increased," and comprehends any increase in value however caused or arising. 32 Fed. Rep. 812.

ENTIA PARS (L. Lat.). The part of the eldest. Co. Litt. 166; Bacon, Abr. Coparceners (C).

When partition is voluntarily made among coparceners in England, the eldest has the first choice, or primer election (q. v.); and the part which she takes is called entia pars. This right is purely personal, and descends: it is also said that even her assignee shall enjoy it; but this has been doubted. The word entia is said to be derived from the old French eisme, the eldest; Bac. Abr. Coparceners (C); Keilw. 1 a, 49 a; Cro. Eliz. 18.

ENJOIN. To command; to require: as, private individuals are not only permitted, but enjoined, by law, to arrest an offender when present at the time a felony is committed or a dangerous wound given, on pain of fine and imprisonment if the wrong-doer escape through their negligence. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 587; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 298; Ry. & M. 93.

To command or order a defendant in equity to do or not to do a particular thing by writ of injunction. See 55 Ch. Div. 418; INJUNCTION.

ENLARGE. To extend: as, to enlarge a rule to plead is to extend the time during which a defendant may plead. To enlarge means, also, to set at liberty: as, the prisoner was enlarged on giving bail.

ENLARGING. Extending, or making more comprehensive: as, an enlarging statute, which is one extending the common law. Enlarging an estate is the increasing an estate in land, as where A. has an estate for life with remainder to B. and his heirs, and B. releases his estate to A. 2 Bla. Com. 324. See RELEASE.

ENLISTMENT. The act of making a contract to serve the government in a subordinate capacity, either in the army or navy. The contract so made is also called an enlistment. See, as to the power of infants to enlist, 4 Bing. 487; 5 id. 423; 6 id. 255; 1 S. & R. 87; 11 id. 93. A drafted man is said to be "enlisted" as well as a volunteer, but the term does not apply to one entering the army under a commission; 107 Mass. 282; 48 N. H. 280. See 8 Allen 480; 2 Sprague 103; 40 Conn. 286. The contract of enlistment involves a change in the status of the recruit, which he cannot throw off at will, though he may violate his contract; 137 U. S. 147. See MILITIA; MILITARY LAW.

ENORMIA (Lat.). Wrongs. It occurs in the old Latin forms of pleading, where, after a specific allegation of the wrongs done by the defendant, the plaintiff alleges generally that the defendant did alia enormia (other wrongs), to the damage, etc. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 278; 1 Chit. Pl. 379. See ALIA ENORMIA.

ENQUETE or ENQUEST. In Canon Law. An examination of witnesses in the presence of a judge authorized to sit for this purpose, taken in writing, to be used as evidence in the trial of a cause. The day of hearing must be specified in a notice to the opposite party; 9 Low. C. 392. It may be opened, in some cases, before the trial; 10 Low. C. 19.

ENROLL. To register; to enter on the rolls of chancery, or other courts; to make a record.

ENROLMENT. In English Law. The registering or entering on the rolls of chancery, king's bench, common pleas, or exchequer, or by the clerk of the peace in the records of the quarter sessions, of any lawful act: as, a recognizance, a deed of bargain and sale, and the like. Jacob, Law Dict. For the terms "enrolment" and "registration" as used in the United States merchant shipping laws, see R. S. tit. 50; 21 Stat. L. 271; 18 id. 30; 3 Wall. 566; VESSEL.

ENS LEGIS. A being of the law. Used of corporations.

ENTAIL. A fee abridged or limited to the issue, or certain classes of issue, instead of descending to all the heirs. 1 Washb. R. P. 66; Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 112, n.; Wms. R. P. 61.

To restrict the inheritance of lands to a particular class of issue. 1 Washb. R. P. 66; 2 Bla. Com. 113. See FEE-TAIL.

ENTENCION. In Old English Law. The plaintiff's declaration.

ENTER. To go upon lands for the purpose of taking possession; to take possession. In a strict use of terms, entry and taking possession would seem to be distinct parts of the same act; but, practically, entry is now merged in taking possession. 1 Washb. R. P. 10, 32; Stearn, Real Act. 2.

To cause to be put down upon the record. An attorney is said to enter his appearance, or the party himself may enter an appearance. See ENTRY.

ENTERTAINMENT. Something connected with the enjoyment of refreshment rooms, tables, and the like. It is something beyond refreshments; it is the accommodation provided whether that includes musical or other amusements or not. L. R. 10 Q. B. 595. It is synonymous with board; 2 Miles 323; but it may include refreshment, without seating accommodation; 1 Ex. Div. 385.

ENTICE. To solicit, persuade, or procure. 12 Abb. Pr. U. S. 187. The enticing desertions from the army or navy or arsenals of the United States is punishable with fine and imprisonment. R. S. §§ 1553, 1668, 5455, 5525.

A husband may recover compensation for enticing his wife away: 36 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 609; 153 Mass. 148; 26 Vt. 273. It is no defence to show that they had not lived happily together, though it may go in mitigation of damages; 121 Mass. 236; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 341. Stronger evidence is required where a parent harbors his daughter; it ought to appear that there were improper motives; 5 Johns. 196; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 64; 89 Tenn. 478; 47 Mich. 172. So of a wife's action against her husband's parents for enticing him away from her; 6 Ind. App. 317; and probably of a brother's harboring his sister; 89 Tenn. 479. It has been held that neither at common law nor under statutes giving a wife the right to sue has she a right of action for enticing away her husband; 76 Wis. 374; 82 Me. 503; 88 Tenn. 270; but the weight of authority is that the action will lie at common law; 133 Ind. 386; 45 Fed. Rep. 315; 43 Neb. 269; 116 N. Y. 584; 9 H. L. Cas. 577. See 89 Mich. 123, with citations.

A parent has a right of action against one who improperly entices his minor child away from him; 71 Ind. 451; 50 Barb. 351; L. R. 2 C. P. 615; in tort or assumpsit; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 284. The action is on the theory of loss of services, and the relation of master and servant, either actual or constructive, must be proven; id.; 27 N. J. L. 86.

A master has a right of action for knowingly enticing his servant; 2 El. & Bl. 216; 56 N. H. 456; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 475 and note; 43 Ga. 331; 33 S. C. 238; even though the contract of employment was one which the servant could terminate at will; 70 N. C. 60; L. R. 2 C. P. 615; but not where it had expired by its own limitations; 4 Pick. 425. The doctrine extends to all kinds of employees; 107 Mass. 555; though it has been held to apply, at common law, only to domestic servants and apprentices; 15 S. C. 82.

Where one after notice continues to employ another's servant the latter has a right of action, though at the time he hired him the second master did not know that he was hiring another man's servant; Schoul. Dom. Rel. § 487; but in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, which was an action for damages caused by the enticement of Wagner, a celebrated singer, from one theatre to another, the majority of the court thought the action would lie.

Enticement in some states renders one liable to criminal prosecution; 44 Ga. 328; 50 Ala. 160; 89 N. C. 553. See, generally, 26 Fla. 206 and cases cited.

ENTIRE. That which is not divided; that which is whole.

When a contract is entire, it must, in general, be fully performed before the party can claim the compensation which was to have been paid to him: for example, when a man hires to serve another for one year, he will not be entitled to leave him at any time before the end of the year, and claim compensation for the time unless it be done by the consent or default of the party hiring; 6 Vt. 35; 2 Pick. 267; 4 McCord 26, 246; 4 Me. 454; 2 Pa. 454; 15 Johns. 224; 6 H. & J. 38. See 27 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 501. A contract is entire if the consideration be single and entire, notwithstanding the subject of the contract consist of several distinct items; 2 Pars. Cont. 517. See DIVISIBLE.

An entire day is an undivided day, from midnight to midnight; 43 Ala. 325; 7 Tex. App. 30, 192. The words "entire use, benefit," etc., in a trust deed for the benefit of a married woman, have been construed as equivalent to "sole and separate use;" 3 Ired. Eq. 414. Entire tenancy "is contrary to several tenancy, signifying a sole possession in one man, whereas the other signifieth joint or common in more." Cowel.

ENTIRETY. This word denotes the whole, in contradistinction to moiety, which denotes the half part. A husband and wife, when jointly seized of land, are seized by entireties per tout and not per my et per tout, as joint tenants are. Jacob, Law

Diet.; 2 Kent 132. See 156 Pa. 628; PER TOUT ET NON PER MY.

The same words of conveyance that would make two other persons joint tenants will make the husband and wife tenants of the entirety; 38 S. C. 34; 69 Miss. 795; 23 Or. 4; 92 Tenn. 707. Where a wife pays for land and consents that the title may be taken in the name of herself and husband, they hold as tenants in entirety, and a conveyance by the husband passes the rights to the possession of the land during their joint lives, and to the fee in case the husband survive; 67 Hun 229; 159 Mass. 415.

ENTREGA. In Spanish Law. Delivery.

ENTREPOT. A warehouse. A magazine where goods are deposited which are to be again removed.

ENTRY. In Common Law. The act of setting down the particulars of a sale, or other transaction, in a merchant's or tradesman's account-books: such entries are, in general, prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery, and of work done; but unless the entry be the original one, it is not evidence. See SHORT ENTRY; SINGLE ENTRY.

In Revenue Law. The submitting to the inspection of officers appointed by law, to collect customs, goods imported into the United States, together with a statement or description of such goods, and the original invoices of the same, for the purpose of estimating the duties to be paid thereon.

The act of March 2, 1799, s. 36, 1 Story, U. S. Laws 606, and the act of March 1, 1823, 3 Story, U. S. Laws 1881, and of March 3, 1863, regulate the manner of making entries of goods. Under the last mentioned act, goods entered by means of any false paper, etc., or their value, shall be forfeited, and the word "entry" in that act means the entire transaction by which the goods become a part of the merchandise of the country; 5 Ben. 25.

The term "entry" in the acts of congress is used in two senses. In many of the acts it refers to the bill of entry,—the paper or declaration which the merchant or importer in the first instance hands to the entry clerk. In other statutes it is used to denote, not a document, but a transaction; a series of acts which are necessary to the end to be accomplished, viz. the entering of the goods; 3 Sawy. 46.

In Criminal Law. The act of entering a dwelling-house, or other building, in order to commit a crime.

In cases of burglary, the least entry with the whole or any part of the body, hand, or foot, or with any instrument or weapon, introduced for the purpose of committing a felony, is sufficient to complete the offence; Co. 3d Inst. 64.

It is an entry if a person descend a chimney but is arrested before he can get low enough to enter any room; it is an entry to open a window entirely, but not to push it up or down when partly opened; putting a finger or a pistol over a threshold is an entry, but not a centre-bit or crowbar, these instruments being intended for breaking, and not for committing a felony. Sir M. Hale suggests a "quare," however, with a "seeming" to the contrary, as to an entry by a bullet fired into a house; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 555. It is submitted, says Wilmot (Dig. Law of Burglary 58), that the only possible way in which the discharging a loaded gun or pistol into a dwelling-house from the outside could be held burglary would be by laying the intent to commit felony by killing or wounding, or generally to commit felony; and quare, whether the breaking and entry requisite to complete the burglary would be satisfied by such discharge? It is not necessary in all cases to show an actual entry by all the prisoners; there may be a constructive entry as well as a constructive breaking. A, B, and C come in the night by consent to break and enter the house of D to commit a felony. A only actually breaks and enters the house; B stands near the door, but does not actually enter; C stands at the lane's end, or orchard-gate, or field-gate, or the like, to watch that no help come to aid the owner, or to give notice to the others if help comes: this is burglary in all, and all are principals; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 555. See BURGLARY.

Upon Real Estate. The act of going upon the lands of another, or lands claimed as one's own, with intent to take possession. See 8 Humph. 306.

In general, any person who has a right of possession may assert it by a peaceable entry, without the formality of a legal action, and, being so in possession, may retain it, and plead that it is his soil and freehold; 3 Term 295. A notorious act of ownership of this kind was always equivalent to a feudal investiture by the lord, and is now allowed in all cases where the original entry of a wrong-doer was unlawful. But, in all cases where the first entry was lawful and an apparent right of possession was thereby gained, the owner of the estate cannot thus enter, but is driven to his action at law; 3 Bla. Com. 175. See RE-ENTRY; FORCIBLE ENTRY.

At common law, no person could make a valid sale of land unless he had lawfully entered, and could make livery of seisin,—that is, could make an actual delivery of possession to the purchaser. This provision was early incorporated into the English statutes, to guard against the many evils produced by selling pretended titles to land. A pretended title within the purview of the law is where one person claims land of which another is in possession holding adversely to the claim; 1 Plowd. 88 a; Littleton § 347; 9 Wend. 511. And now in most of the states, every grant of land, except as a release, is void as an act of maintenance, if, at the time it is made, the lands are in the actual possession of another person claiming under a title adverse to that of the grantor; 4 Kent 446; 5 Johns. 489; 6 Mass. 418; 87 Hun 50; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 20; contra, 5 N. H. 181; 6 Binn. 420; 2 App. Cas. D. C. 349. See CHAMPERTY.

In a more limited sense, an entry signifies the simply going upon another person's premises for some particular purpose. The right to land is exclusive, and every unwarranted entry thereon without the owner's leave, whether it be enclosed or not, or unless the person entering have an authority given him by law, is a trespass; 12 Johns. 408; 19 id. 385; 2 Mass. 127. But the owner's license will sometimes be presumed, and then will continue in force until it is actually revoked by the owner; 10 Johns. 246; Willes 195; Tayl. L. & T. 766.

Authority to enter upon lands is given by law in many cases. See ARREST.

The proprietor of chattels may under some circumstances enter the land of another upon which they are placed, and remove them, provided they are there without his default: as, where his tree has blown down into the adjoining close by the wind, or his fruit has fallen from a branch which overhung it; 20 Vin. Abr. 418; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 627.

A landlord also may enter, to distrain or to demand rent, to see whether waste has been committed, or repairs made, and may go into the house for either purpose, provided the outer door be open; Cro. Eliz. 876; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 627. So, if he is bound to repair, he has a right of entry given him by law for that purpose; Moore 889. Or if trees are excepted out of a demise, the lessee has a right of entering to prune or fell them; 11 Co. 53; Tayl. L. & T. § 767. A tenant becomes a trespasser after the expiration of his term, though his holding is in good faith under color of a reasonable claim of right; and the landlord may forcibly enter thereon and eject him without legal process; 16 R. I. 524; 17 id. 731.

Every traveller also has, by law, the privilege of entering a common inn, at all reasonable times, provided the host has sufficient accommodation, which, if he has not, it is for him to declare. Wand. Inns 46.

So any man may throw down a public nuisance; and a private one may be thrown down by the party grieved, and this before any prejudice happens, but only from the probability that it may happen; Webb, Poll. Torts 513; 5 Co. 102. And see 1 Brownl. 212; 12 Mod. 510; W. Jones 221; 1 Stra. 683; 53 Wis. 404. To this end, the abator has authority to enter the close in which it stands. See NUISANCE.

In Practice. The placing on record the various proceedings in an action, in technical language and order. The extreme strictness of the old practice is somewhat relaxed, but the term entry is still used in this connection. "Books of Entries" were formerly much relied on, containing forms or precedents of the proceedings in various actions as they appear on record.

In the law books the words entry and entered are frequently used as synonymous with recorded; 130 N. Y. 504. See 100 Ill. 484; 54 Cal. 519; 74 Ind. 59.

For entry of public lands, see PRE-EMPTION RIGHT. For the terms entry of judgment, entry of appearance, entry for copyright, see JUDGMENT; APPEARANCE; COPYRIGHT.

ENTRY AD COMMUNEM LEGEM. In English Law. A writ which lay in favor of the reversioner, when the tenant for term of life, tenant for term of another's life, tenant by the curtesy, or tenant in dower had aliened and died. Tomlin, Law Dict. Long obsolete, and abolished in 1833.

ENTRY, WRIT OF. In Old Practice. A real action brought to recover the possession of lands from one who wrongfully withholds possession thereof.

Such writs were said to be in the Quibus, where the suit was brought against the party who committed the wrong; in the Per, where the tenant against whom the action was brought was either heir or grantee of the original wrong-doer; in the Per and Cui, where there had been two descents, two alienations, or descent and an alienation; in the Post, where the wrong was removed beyond the degrees mentioned.

The above designations are derived from significant Latin words in the respective forms adapted to the cases given. A descent or alienation on the part of the disseisor constituted a degree (see Co. Litt. 239 a); and at common law the writ could be brought only within the degrees (two), the demandant after that being driven to his writ of right. By the statute of Marlbridge (g. v.), 52 Hen. III. c. 30 (A. d. 1267), however, a writ of entry, after (post) those degrees had been passed in the alienation of the estate, was allowed. Where there had been no descent and the demandant himself had been dispossessed, the writ ran, Præcipe A quod reddat B sex acras terræ, etc. de quibus idem A, etc. (command A to restore to B six acres of land, etc., of which the said A, etc.); if there had been a descent after the description came, the clause, in quod idem A non habet ingressum nisi per C qui illud ei demisit (into which the said A, the tenant, has no entry but through C, who demised it to him); where there were two descents, nisi per D cui C illud demisit (but by D, to whom C demised it); where it was beyond the degrees, nisi post disseisinam quam C (but after the disseisin which C, the original disseisor, did, etc.).

The writ was of many varieties, also, according to the character of the title of the claimant and the circumstances of the deprivation of possession. Booth enumerates and discusses twelve of these, of which some are sur disseisin, sur intrusion, ad communem legem, ad terminum qui preterit, cui in vita, cui ante divortium, etc. Either of these might, of course, be brought in any of the four degrees, as the circumstances of the case required. The use of writs of entry has been long since abolished in England; but they are still in use in a modified form in some of the United States, as the common means of recovering possession of realty against a wrongful occupant; 2 Pick. 473; 10 id. 359; 5 N. H. 450; 68 Me. 21, 71; 85 id. 90; 124 Mass. 307, 468; 139 id. 244; 157 id. 24. See Stearn, Real Act.; Booth, R. A.; Co. Litt. 238 b.

To maintain a writ of entry, the demandant who declares on his own seisin, and alleges a disseisin, is required to prove only that he has a right of entry and need not prove an actual wrongful dispossession or an adverse possession by the tenants; 161 Mass. 91.

ENURE. To take or have effect. To serve to the use, benefit, or advantage of a person. The word is often written inure. A release to the tenant for life enures to him in reversion; that is, it has the same effect for him as for the tenant for life. A discharge of the principal enures to the benefit of the surety.

ENVOY. In International Law. A diplomatic agent sent by one state to another. Wharton.

A minister of the second rank, on whom his sovereign or government has conferred a degree of dignity and respectability which, without being on a level with an ambassador, immediately follows, and, among ministers, yields the pre-eminence to him alone.

Envoys are either ordinary or extraordinary; by custom the latter is held in greater consideration. Vatt. liv. 4, c. 6, § 72.

EO INSTANTI. At that instant; at the very or same instant; immediately. 1 Bla. Com. 196, 249; 1 Co. 138; Black, L. Dict.

EOBLE (Sax.). An earl. Blount; 1 Bla. Com. 398.

EPILEPSY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A disease of the brain, which occurs in paroxysms with uncertain intervals between them.

These paroxysms are characterized by the loss of sensation, and convulsive motions of the muscles. When long continued and violent, this disease is very apt to end in dementia. It gradually destroys the memory and impairs the intellect, and is one of the causes of an unsound mind.

EPIQUEYA. In Spanish Law. The benignant and prudent interpretation of the law according to the circumstances of the time, place, and person. This word is derived from the Greek, and is synonymous with the word equity. See Murillo, nn. 67, 68.

EPISCOPACY. In Ecclesiastical Law. A form of government by diocesan bishops; the office or condition of a bishop.

EPISCOPALIA (L. Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. Synodals, or payments due the bishop.

EPISCOPUS (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. A superintendent; an inspector. Those in each municipality who had the charge and oversight of the bread and other provisions which served the citizens for their daily food were so called. Vicat; Du Cange.

A bishop. These bishops, or episcopi, were held to be the successors of the apostles, and have various titles at different times in history and according to their different duties. It was applied generally to those who had authority or were of peculiar sanctity. After the fall of the Roman empire they came to have very considerable judicial powers. Du Cange; Vicat; Calvinus, Lex.

EPISTOLÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rescripts; opinions given by the emperors in cases submitted to them for decision.

Answers of the emperors to petitions.

The answers of counsellors (juris-consulta), as Ulpian and others, to questions of law proposed to them, were also called epistolæ.

Opinions written out. The term originally signified the same as literæ. Vicat.

EQUALITY. Likeness in possessing the same rights and being liable to the same duties. See 1 Toullier, nn. 170, 193.

Persons are all equal before the law, whatever adventitious advantages some may possess over others. All persons are protected by the law, and obedience to it is required from all.

Judges in court, while exercising their functions, are all upon an equality, it being a rule that inter pares non est potestas: a judge cannot, therefore, punish another judge of the same court for using any expression in court, although the words used might have been a contempt in any other person. Bacon, Abr., Of the Court of Sessions, Of Justices of the Peace.

In contracts, the law presumes that the parties act upon a perfect equality: when, therefore, one party uses any fraud or deceit to destroy this equality, the party grieved may avoid the contract. In case of a grant to two or more persons jointly, without designating what each takes, they are presumed to take in equal proportions; 4 Day 395; 6 Ired. Eq. 437; 83 Pa. 59.

It is a maxim that when the equity of the parties is equal, the law must prevail; 3 Call 259; and that as between different creditors, equality is equity; 2 Bouvier, Inst., 2d ed. n. 3729; 1 Paige, Ch. 181. See Kames, Eq. 75.

EQUINOX. The name given to two periods of the year when the days and nights are equal; that is, when the space of time between the rising and setting of the sun is one-half of a natural day. The vernal equinox occurs about March 21, the autumnal about September 23.

EQUITABLE ASSETS. Such assets as are chargeable with the payment of debts or legacies in equity, and which do not fall under the description of legal assets.

Those portions of the property which by the ordinary rules of law are exempt from debts, but which the testator has voluntarily charged as assets, or which, being non-existent at law, have been created in equity. Ad. Eq. 254.

They are so called because they can be reached only by the aid and instrumentality of a court of equity, and because their distribution is governed by a different rule from that which governs the distribution of legal assets. 2 Fonb. Eq. b. 4, pt. 2, c. 2, § 1, and notes; 2 Vern. 763; Willes 523; 3 Woodd. Lect. 486; Story, Eq. Jur. § 552.

The doctrine of equitable assets has been much restricted in the United States generally, and has lost its importance in England since the act of 1870, providing that simple contract and specialty creditors are, in future, payable pari passu out of both legal and equitable assets; Bisph. Eq. § 531; 4 Johns. Ch. 651; 5 Pet. 160; 2 Brock. 325; 3 Dana 18; 8 B. Monr. 499; 3 Ired. Eq. 259.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT. An assignment of a chose in action, a thing not in esse, as a mortgage of personal property to be acquired in the future, and a mere contingency which, though not good at law, equity will recognize. Bisph. Eq. § 164; 10 H. L. Cas. 209; 19 Wall. 544; 38 Ill. App. 66; 33 N. J. Eq. 614; 91 Pa. 96. In making such an assignment, no particular form of words is necessary; 35 Me. 41; 56 Barb. 362; 33 Vt. 431; 59 N. H. 383; 30 N. J. Eq. 171; but the property must be specifically pointed out; 56 Me. 465; Benj. Sales 62; and there must be an appropriation or separation, and the mere intent to appropriate is not sufficient; 54 Fed. Rep. 577; 37 N. J. Eq. 123. See 14 Wall. 69. A valid assignment may be made of a portion of the contract price of a building contracted to be erected by the assignor, but not yet erected, and such assignment need not be written nor accompanied by any transfer of the contract itself; 50 N. J. Eq. 201. The assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to existing equities in favor of third persons, as well as to those between the original parties; 50 N. Y. 67; 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. 372, n.; Beach, Eq. Jur. 342. Equity will not recognize the assignment of certain kinds of property as against the policy of the law, such as, mere litigious rights, pensions, salaries of judges, commissions of officers in the army or navy, claims against the United States, and the like; 1 E. L. & Eq. 153; 67 Pa. 369; L. R. 7 Ch. 109; 8 id. 76; 6 Ct. Cl. 123; 4 id. 569; 112 U. S. 733. The assignment of secured notes carries with it an equitable assignment of the security; 44 Ill. App. 516. See ASSIGNMENT; EXPECTANCY.

EQUITABLE CONVERSION. See CONVERSION.

EQUITABLE DEFENCE. A defence to an action on grounds which, prior to the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 125), would have been cognizable only in a court of equity. Moz. & W. The codes of procedure and the practice in some of the states likewise permit both a legal and equitable defence to the same action.

EQUITABLE ESTATE. A right or interest in land, which, not having the properties of a legal estate, but being merely a right of which courts of equity will take notice, requires the aid of such court to make it available.

These estates consist of uses, trusts, and powers. They possess in some respects the qualities of legal estates in modern law; 1 Pet. 508; 13 Pick. 154; 5 Watts 113; 82 Pa. 86; 1 Johns. Ch. N. Y. 508; 2 Vern. 536; 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 499; Wms. R. P. 134-138; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 501; 1 Washb. R. P. 130, 161.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE. A lien upon real estate of such a character that it is recognized in equity as a security for the payment of money and is treated as a mortgage. A mortgage of a merely equitable estate or interest is also so called.

Such a mortgage may exist by a deposit with the lender of money of the title-deeds to an estate; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; Bisph. Eq. 161; 1 Bro. Ch. C. 269, note; 17 Ves.

230; 2 Myl. & K. 417; 5 Wheat. 277; 2 Dick. 759; 2 Drew 41; 20 Beav. 607. They must have been deposited as a present, bona fide security; 1 Washb. R. P. 503; and the mortgagee must show notice to affect a subsequent mortgagee of record; 24 Me. 311; 3 Hare 416; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020. Such mortgages are recognized in some states; 24 Me. 311; 18 Miss. 418; 16 Ga. 469; 2 Hill, S. C. 166; 2 Sandf. 9; 4 R. I. 512; but under the usual system of the registration of deeds are of infrequent occurrence.

Such a mortgage has been said to exist in favor of the vendor of real estate as security for purchase-money due from the purchaser; in which case a lien is recognized in some jurisdictions; 15 Ves. 339; 1 Bro. Ch. C. 420, 424, n. It is occasionally spoken of as an equitable mortgage; 1 Bland 491; 2 Rob. Va. 447, though it is doubtful if it is to be so considered. It is properly termed vendor's lien, which see. See also LIEN.

EQUITABLE WASTE. See WASTE.

EQUITATURA. In Old English Law. Needful equipments for riding or travelling.

EQUITY. A branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

In the broad sense in which this term is sometimes used, it signifies natural justice.

In a more limited application, it denotes equal justice between contending parties. This is its moral signification, in reference to the rights of parties having conflicting claims; but applied to courts and their jurisdiction and proceedings, it has a more restrained and limited signification.

One division of courts is into courts of law and courts of equity. And equity, in this relation and application, is a branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

The difference between the remedial justice of the courts of common law and that of the courts of equity is marked and material. That administered by the courts of law is limited by the principles of the common law (which are to a great extent positive and inflexible), and especially by the nature and character of the process and pleadings, and of the judgments which those courts can render; because the pleadings cannot fully present all the matters in controversy, nor can the judgments be adapted to the special exigencies which may exist in particular cases. It is not uncommon, also, for cases to fail in those courts, from the fact that too few or too many persons have been joined as parties, or because the pleadings have not been framed with sufficient technical precision.

The remedial process of the courts of equity, on the other hand, admits, and, generally, requires, that all persons having an interest shall be made parties, and makes a large allowance for amendments by summoning and discharging parties after the commencement of the suit. The pleadings are usually framed so as to present to the consideration of the court the whole case, with its possible legal rights, and all its equities,—that is, all the grounds upon which the suitor is or is not entitled to relief upon the principles of equity. And its final remedial process may be so varied as to meet the requirements of these equities, in cases where the jurisdiction of the courts of equity exists, by "commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." In other words, its final process is varied so as to enable the courts to do that equitable justice between the parties which the case demands, either by commanding what is to be done, or prohibiting what is threatened to be done.

The principles upon which, and the modes and forms by and through which, justice is administered in the United States, are derived to a great extent from those which were in existence in England at the time of the settlement of this country; and it is therefore important to a correct understanding of the nature and character of our own jurisprudence, not only to trace it back to its introduction here on the early settlement of the colonies, but also to trace the English jurisprudence from its earliest inception as the administration of law, founded on principles, down to that period. It is in this way that we are enabled to explain many things in our own practice which would otherwise be entirely obscure. This is particularly true of the principles which regulate the jurisdiction and practice of the courts of equity, and of the principles of equity as they are now applied and administered in the courts of law which at the present day have equitable jurisdiction conferred upon them by statutes passed for that purpose. And for the purpose of a competent understanding of the course of decisions in the courts of equity in England, it is necessary to refer to the origin of the equitable jurisdiction there, and to trace its history, inquiring upon what principles it was originally founded, and how it has been enlarged and sustained.

The study of equity jurisprudence, therefore, comprises an inquiry into the origin and history of the courts of equity; the distinctive principles upon which jurisdiction in equity is founded; the nature, character, and extent of the jurisdiction itself; its peculiar remedies; the rules and maxims which regulate its administration; its remedial process and proceedings and modes of defence; and its rules of evidence and practice.

"The meaning of the word 'equity,' as used in its technical sense in English jurisprudence, comes back to this: that it is simply a term descriptive of a certain field of jurisdiction exercised in the English system, by certain courts, and of which the extent and boundaries are not marked by lines founded upon principle so much as by the features of the original constitution of the English scheme of remedial law, and the accidents of its development." Bisph. Eq. § 11.

ORIGIN AND HISTORY. The courts of equity may be said to have their origin as far back as the Aula or Curia Regis, the great court in which the king administered justice in person, assisted by his counselors. Of the officers of this court, the chancellor was one of great trust and confidence, next to the king himself; but his duties do not distinctly appear at the present day. On the dissolution of that court, he exercised separate duties.

On the introduction of seals, he had the keeping of the king's seal, which he affixed to charters and deeds; and he had some authority in relation to the king's grants,—perhaps annulling those which were alleged to have been procured by misrepresentation or to have been issued unadvisedly.

As writs came into use, it was made his duty to frame and issue them from his court, which, as early as the reign of Henry II., was known as the chancery. And it is said that he exercised at this period a sort of equitable jurisdiction by which he mitigated the rigor of the common law,—to what extent it is impossible to determine. He is spoken of as one who "annuls unjust laws, and executes the rightful commands of the pious prince, and puts an end to what is injurious to the people or to morals,"—which would form a very ample jurisdiction; but it seems probable that this was according to the authority or direction of the king, given from time to time in relation to particular cases. He was a principal member of the king's council, after the conquest, in which, among other things, all applications for the special exercise of the prerogative in regard to matters of judicial cognizance were discussed and decided upon. In connection with the council, he exercised a separate authority in cases in which the council directed the suitors to proceed in chancery. The court of chancery is said to have sprung from this council. But it may be said that it had its origin in the prerogative of the king, by which he undertook to administer justice, on petitions to himself, without regard to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, which he did through orders to his chancellor. The great council, or parliament, also sent matters relating to the king's grants, etc., to the chancery; and it seems that the chancellor, although an ecclesiastic, was the principal actor as regards the judicial business which the select or king's council, as well as the great council, had to advise upon or transact. In the reign of Edward I. the power and authority of the chancellor were extended by the statute of Westminster 2d.

In the time of Edward III. proceedings in chancery were commenced by petition or bill, the adverse party was summoned, the parties were examined, and chancery appears as a distinct court for giving relief in cases which required extraordinary remedies, the king having, "by a writ, referred all such matters as were of grace to be dispatched by the chancellor or by the keeper of the privy seal."

It may be considered to have been fully established as a separate and permanent jurisdiction, from the 17th of Richard II.

In the time of Edward IV. the chancery had come to be regarded as one of the four principal courts of the kingdom. From this time its jurisdiction and the progress of its jurisdiction become of more importance to us.

It is the tendency of any system of legal principles, when reduced to a practical application, to fail of effecting such justice between party and party as the special circumstances of a case may require, by reason of the minuteness and inflexibility of its rules and the inability of the judges to adapt its remedies to the necessities of the controversy under consideration. This was the case with the Roman law; and, to remedy this, edicts were issued from time to time, which enabled the consuls and prætors to correct "the scrupulosity and mischievous subtlety of the law;" and from these edicts a code of equitable jurisprudence was compiled.

So the principles and rules of the common law, as they were reduced to practice, became in their application the means of injustice in cases where special equitable circumstances existed, of which the judge could not take cognizance because of the precise nature of its titles and rights, the inflexible character of its principles, and the technicality of its pleadings and practice. And in a manner somewhat analogous to the Roman mode of modification, in order to remedy such hardships, the prerogative of the king or the authority of the great council was exercised in ancient times to procure a more equitable measure of justice in the particular case, which was accomplished through the court of chancery.

This was followed by the "invention" of the writ of subpoena by means of which the chancery assumed, upon a complaint made directly to that court, to require the attendance of the adverse party, to answer to such matters as should be objected against him. Notwithstanding the complaints of the commons, from time to time, that the course of proceeding in chancery "was not according to the course of the common law, but the practice of the holy church," the king sustained the authority of the chancellor, the right to issue the writ was recognized and regulated by statute, and other statutes were passed conferring jurisdiction where it had not been taken before. In this way, without any compilation of a code, a system of equitable jurisprudence was established in the court of chancery, enlarging from time to time; the decisions of the court furnishing an exposition of its principles and of their application. It is said that the jurisdiction was greatly enlarged under the administration of Cardinal Wolsey, in the time of Henry VIII. The courts of equity also began to act in personam and to enjoin plaintiffs in common-law courts from prosecuting inequitable suits. A controversy took place between Lord Chancellor Ellesmere and Lord Coke, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in the time of James I., respecting the right of the chancellor to interfere with any of the proceedings and judgments of the courts of law. The king sustained the chancellor; and from that time the jurisdiction then claimed has been maintained. See 1 Ch. Rep. 1; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 504; Bisph. Eq. § 407; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 172; CANCELLARIUS.

It is from the study of these decisions and the commentaries upon them that we are enabled to determine, with a greater or less degree of certainty, the time when and the grounds upon which jurisdiction was granted or was taken in particular classes of cases, and the principles upon which it was administered. And it is occasionally of importance to attend to this; because we shall see that, chancery having once obtained jurisdiction, that jurisdiction continues until expressly taken away, notwithstanding the intervention of such changes in common-law practice and rules as, if they had been made earlier, would have rendered the exercise of jurisdiction in equity incompatible with the principles upon which it is founded.

A brief sketch of some of the principal points in the origin and history of the court of chancery may serve to show that much of its jurisdiction exists independently of any statute, and is founded upon an assumption of a power to do equity, having its first inception in the prerogative of the king, and his commands to do justice in individual cases, extending itself through the action of the chancellor, to the issue of a writ of summons to appear in his court without any special authority for that purpose, and, upon the return of the subpoena, to the reception of a complaint, to a requirement upon the party summoned to make answer to that complaint, and then to a hearing and decree, or judgment, upon the merits of the matters in controversy, according to the rules of equity and good conscience.

It appears as a noticeable fact that the jurisdiction of the chancery proceeded originally from and was sustained by successive kings of England against the repeated remonstrances of the commons, who were for adhering to the common law; though not, perhaps, approving of all its rigors, as equity had been to some extent acknowledged as a rule of decision in the common-law courts.

This opposition of the commons may have been owing in part to the fact that the chancellor was in those days usually an ecclesiastic, and to the existing antipathy among the masses of the people to almost everything Roman.

The master of the rolls, who for a long period was a judicial officer of the court of chancery, second only to the chancellor, was originally a clerk or keeper of the rolls or records, but seems to have acquired his judicial authority from being at times directed by the king to take cognizance of and determine matters submitted to him.

DISTINCTIVE PRINCIPLES. It is quite apparent that some principles other than those of the common law must regulate the exercise of such a jurisdiction. That law could not mitigate its rigor upon its own principles. And as, down to the time of Edward III., and, with few exceptions, to the 21st of Henry VIII., the chancellors were ecclesiastics, much more familiar with the principles of the Roman law than with those of the common law, it was but a matter of course that there should be a larger adoption of the principles of that law; and the study of it is of some importance in this connection. Still, that law cannot be said to be of authority even in equity proceedings. The commons were jealous of its introduction. "In the reign of Richard II. the barons protested that they would never suffer the kingdom to be governed by the Roman law, and the judges prohibited it from being any longer cited in the common-law tribunals."

This opposition of the barons and of the common-law judges furnished very sufficient reasons why the chancellors should not profess to adopt that law as the rule of decision. In addition to this, it was not fitted, in many respects, to the state of things existing in England; and so the chancellors were of necessity compelled to act upon equitable principles as expounded by themselves. In later times the common-law judges in that country have resorted to the Roman law for principles of decision to a much greater extent than they have given credit to it.

Since the time of Henry VIII. the chancery bench has been occupied by some of the ablest lawyers which England has produced, and they have given to the proceedings and practice in equity definite rules and forms, which leave little to the personal discretion of the chancellor in determining what equity and good conscience require. The discretion of the chancellor is a judicial discretion, to be exercised according to the principles and practice of the court. See DISCRETION.

The avowed principle upon which the jurisdiction was at first exercised was the administration of justice according to honesty, equity, and conscience,—which last, it is said, was unknown to the common law as a principle of decision.

In the 15th of Richard II. two petitions, addressed to the king and the lords of parliament, were sent to the chancery to be heard, with the direction, "Let there be done, by the authority of parliament, that which right and reason and good faith and good conscience demand in the case."

These may be said to be the general principles upon which equity is administered at the present day.

The distinctive principles of the courts of equity are shown, also, by the classes of cases in which they exercise jurisdiction and give relief,—allowing it to be sought and administered through process and proceedings of less formality and technicality than are required in proceedings at law. This, however, has its limitations, some of its rules of pleading in defence being quite technical. And it is another peculiar feature that the relief is administered by a decree or process adapted to the exigencies of the particular case.

JURISDICTION. It is difficult to reduce a jurisdiction so extensive and of such diverse component parts to a rigid and precise classification. But an approach to it may be made. The general nature of the jurisdiction has already been indicated. It exists—

First, for the purpose of compelling a discovery from the defendant, respecting the truth of the matters alleged against him, by an appeal to his conscience to speak the truth. The discovery is enforced by requiring an answer to the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint, in order that the plaintiff may use the matters disclosed in the answer, as admissions of the defendant, and, thus, evidence is secured for the plaintiff, either in connection with and in aid of other evidence offered by the plaintiff, or to supply the want of other evidence on his part; or it may be to avoid the expense to which the plaintiff must be put in procuring other evidence to sustain his case.

When the plaintiff's complaint, otherwise called a bill, prays for relief in the same suit, the statements of the defendant in his answer are considered by the court in forming a judgment upon the whole case.

To a certain extent, the statements of the defendant in answer to the bill are evidence for himself also.

The discovery which may be required is not only of facts within the knowledge of the defendant, but may, also, be of deeds and other writings in his possession.

The right to discovery is not, however, an unlimited one: as, for instance, the defendant is not bound to make a discovery which would subject him to punishment, nor, ordinarily, to discover the title upon which he relies in his defence; nor is the plaintiff entitled to require the production of all papers which he may desire to look into. The limits of the right deserve careful consideration. The discovery, when had, may be the foundation of equitable relief in the same suit, in which case it may be connected with all the classes of cases in which relief is sought; or it may be for the purpose of being used in some other court, in which case the jurisdiction is designated as an assistant jurisdiction. Since the new statutes on the admission of evidence of parties, bills of discovery have practically fallen into disuse. See DISCOVERY.

Second, where the courts of law do not, or did not, recognize any right, and therefore could give no remedy, but where the courts of equity recognize equitable rights and, of course, give equitable relief. This has been denominated the exclusive jurisdiction. In this class are trusts, charities, forfeited and imperfect mortgages, penalties and forfeitures, imperfect consideration.

Uses and trusts have been supposed to have had their origin in the restrictions laid by parliament upon conveyances in mortmain,—that is, to the church for charitable, or rather for ecclesiastical, purposes.

It may well be that the doctrine of equitable titles and estates, unknown to the common law but which could be enforced in chancery, had its origin in conveyances to individuals for the use of the church in order to avoid the operation of these restrictions,—the conscience of the feoffee being bound to permit the church to have the use according to the design and intent of the feoffment.

But conveyances in trust for the use of the church were not by any means the only cases in which it was desirable to convey the legal title to one for the use of another. In many instances, such a conveyance offered a convenient mode of making provision for those who, from any circumstances, were unable to manage property advantageously for themselves, or to whom it was not desirable to give the control of it; and the propriety in all such cases of some protection to the beneficiary is quite apparent. The court of chancery, by recognizing that he had an interest of an equitable character which could be protected and enforced against the holder of the legal title, exercised a jurisdiction to give relief in cases which the courts of common law could not reach, consistently with their principles and modes of procedure.

Mortgages, which were originally estates conveyed upon condition, redeemable if the condition were performed at the day, but absolute on non-performance, the right to redeem being thereby forfeited, owe their origin, in the modern conception of the term, to the court of chancery; which, acting at first, perhaps, in some cases where the non-performance was by mistake or accident, soon recognized an equitable right of redemption after the day, as a general rule, in order to relieve against the forfeiture. This became known as an equity of redemption,—a designation, in use at the present day, although there has long been a legal right of redemption in such cases.

Relief against penalties and forfeitures also was formerly obtained only through the aid of the court of chancery.

In most of the cases which fall under this head, courts of law now exercise a concurrent jurisdiction.

Third, where the courts of equity administer equitable relief for the infraction of legal rights, in cases in which the courts of law, recognizing the right, give a remedy according to their principles, modes, and forms, but the remedy is deemed by equity inadequate to the requirements of the case. This is sometimes called the concurrent jurisdiction. This class embraces fraud, mistake, accident, administration, legacies, contribution, and cases where justice and conscience require the cancellation, or reformation of instruments, or the rescission, or the specific performance of contracts.

The courts of law relieve against fraud, mistake, and accident where a remedy can be had according to their modes and forms; but there are many cases in which the legal remedy is inadequate for the purposes of justice.

The modes of investigation and the peculiar remedies of the courts of equity are often of the greatest importance in this class of cases.

Transfers to defeat or delay creditors, and purchases with notice of an outstanding title, come under the head of fraud.

It has been said that there is a less amount of evidence required to prove fraud, in equity, than there is at law; but the soundness of that position may well be doubted.

The court does not relieve in all cases of accident and mistake.

In many cases the circumstances are such as to require the cancellation or reformation of written instruments or the specific performance of contracts, instead of damages for the breach of them.

Fourth, where the court of equity administers a remedy because the relations of the parties are such that there are impediments to a legal remedy. Partnership furnishes a marked instance. Joint-tenancy and marshalling of assets may be included.

From the nature of a partnership, there are impediments to suits at law between the several partners and the partnership in relation to matters involved in the partnership; and impediments of a somewhat similar character exist in other cases.

Fifth, where the forms of proceeding in the courts of law are not deemed adequate to the due investigation of the particulars and details of the case. This class includes account, partition, dower, ascertainment of boundaries.

Sixth, where, from a relation of trust and confidence, or from consanguinity, the parties do not stand on equal ground in their dealings with each other: as, the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward, attorney and client, principal and agent, executor or administrator and legatees or distributees, trustee and cestui que trust, etc.

Seventh, where the court grant relief from considerations of public policy, because of the mischief which would result if the court did not interfere. Marriage-brokers agreements, contracts in restraint of trade, buying and selling public offices, agreements founded on corrupt considerations, usury, gaming, and contracts with expectant heirs, are of this class.

Many cases of this and the preceding class are sometimes considered under the head of constructive fraud.

Eighth, where a party from incapacity to take care of his rights is under the special care of the court of equity, as infants, idiots, and lunatics.

This is a branch of jurisdiction of very ancient date, and of a special character, said to be founded in the prerogative of the king.

In this country the court does not, in general, assume the guardianship, but exercises an extensive jurisdiction over guardians, and may hold a stranger interfering with the property of an infant accountable as if he were guardian.

Ninth, where the court recognizes an obligation on the part of a husband to make provision for the support of his wife, or to make a settlement upon her, out of the property which comes to her by inheritance or otherwise.

This jurisdiction is not founded upon either trust or fraud, but is derived originally from the maxim that he who asks equity should do equity.

Tenth, where the equitable relief appropriate to the case consists in restraining the commission or continuance of some act of the defendant, administered by means of a writ of injunction.

Eleventh, the court aids in the procuration or preservation of evidence of the rights of a party, to be used, if necessary, in some subsequent proceeding, the court administering no final relief.

See a full note as to equity jurisdiction in 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 563.

PECULIAR REMEDIES, AND THE MANNER OF ADMINISTERING THEM. Under this head are—specific performance of contracts; re-execution, reformation, rescission, and cancellation of contracts or instruments; restraint by injunction; bills quia timet; bills of peace; protection of a party liable at law, but who has no interest, by bill of interpleader; election between two inconsistent legal rights; conversion; priorities; tacking; marshalling of securities; application of purchase-money.

In recent periods, the principles of the court of chancery have in many instances been acted on and recognized by the courts of law (as, for instance, in relation to mortgages, contribution, etc.) so far as the rules of the courts of law admitted of their introduction.

In some states the entire jurisdiction has, by statute, been conferred upon the courts of law, who exercise it as a separate and distinct branch of their authority, upon the principles and according to the modes and forms previously adopted in chancery.

In a few, the jurisdictions of the courts of law and of equity have been amalgamated, and an entire system has been substituted, administered more according to the principles and modes and forms of equity than the principles and forms of the common law.

RULES AND MAXIMS. In the administration of the jurisdiction, there are certain rules and maxims which are of special significance.

First, Equity having once had jurisdiction of a subject-matter because there is no remedy at law, or because the remedy is inadequate, does not lose the jurisdiction merely because the courts of law afterwards give the same or a similar relief.

Second, Equity follows the law. This is true as a general maxim. Equity follows the law, except in relation to those matters which give a title to equitable relief because the rules of law would operate to sanction fraud or injustice in the particular case.

Third, Between equal equities, the law must prevail. The ground upon which the suitor comes into the court of equity is that he is entitled to relief there. But if his adversary has an equally equitable case, the complainant has no title to relief.

Fourth, Equality is equity: applied to cases of contribution, apportionment of moneys due among those liable or benefited by the payment, abatement of claims on account of deficiency of the means of payment, etc.

Fifth, He who seeks equity must do equity. A party cannot claim the interposition of the court for relief unless he will do what it is equitable should be done by him as a condition precedent to that relief.

Sixth, Equity considers that as done which ought to have been done. A maxim of much more limited application than might at first be supposed from the broad terms in which it is expressed. In favor of parties who would have had a benefit from something contracted to be done, and who have an equitable right to have the case considered as if it had been done, equity applies this maxim. Illustration: when there is an agreement for a sale of land, and the vendor dies, the land may be treated as money, and the proceeds of the sale, when completed, go to the distributees of personal estate, instead of to the heir. If the vendee die before the completion of the purchase, the purchase-money may be treated as land for the benefit of the heir.

REMEDIAL PROCESS, AND DEFENCE. A suit in equity is ordinarily instituted by a complaint, or petition, called a bill; and the defendant is served with a writ of summons, requiring him to appear and answer, called a subpoena.

In Pennsylvania the suit is begun by filing and serving a copy of the bill, the subpoena having been dispensed with by a rule of court.

The forms of proceedings in equity are such as to bring the rights of all persons interested before the court; and, as a general rule, all persons interested should be made parties to the bill, either as plaintiffs or defendants.

There may be amendments of the bill; or a supplemental bill,—which is sometimes necessary when the case is beyond the stage for amendment.

In case the suit fails by the death of the party, there is a bill of revivor, and after the cause is disposed of there may be a bill of review.

The defence is made by demurrer, plea, or answer. If the defendant has no interest, he may disclaim. Discovery may be obtained from the plaintiff, and further matter may be introduced, by means of a cross-bill, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, in order that it may be considered at the same time. Issue is joined by the plaintiff's filing a replication to the defendant's answer; Sto. Eq. Pl. § 878 n. The U. S. Equity rule 66 requires a replication to be filed on or before the next rule day; failing which the bill may be dismissed. In some states, as Delaware, the replication is entered as of course without filing; and special replications are now as a rule not used.

The final process is directed by the decree, which being a special judgment can provide relief according to the nature of the case. This is sometimes by a perpetual injunction.

There may be a bill to execute, or to impeach, a decree.

EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE. The rules of evidence, except as to the effect of the answer and the taking of the testimony, are, in general, similar to the rules of evidence in cases at law. But to this there are exceptions.

The answer, if made on oath, is evidence for the defendant, so far as it is responsive to the calls of the bill for discovery, and as such it prevails, unless it is overcome by something more than what is equivalent to the testimony of one witness. If without oath, it is a mere pleading, and the allegations stand over for proof.

If the answer is incomplete or improper, the plaintiff may except to it, and it must, if the exceptions are sustained, be so amended as to be made sufficient and proper.

The case may be heard on the bill and answer, if the plaintiff so elects, and sets the case down for a hearing thereon.

If the plaintiff desires to controvert any of the statements in the answer, he files a replication by which he denies the truth of the allegations in the answer, and testimony is taken.

The testimony, according to the former practice in chancery, is taken upon interrogatories filed in the clerk's office, and propounded by the examiner, without the presence of the parties. But this practice has been very extensively modified.

If any of the testimony is improper, there is a motion to suppress it.

The case may be referred to a master to state the accounts between the parties, or to make such other report as the case may require; and there may be an examination of the parties in the master's office. Exceptions may be taken to his report.

The hearing of the case is before the equity judge, who may make interlocutory orders or decrees, and who pronounces the final decree or judgment. There may be a rehearing, if sufficient cause is shown.

At the present day, wherever equity forms are used, the proceedings have become very much simplified.

The system of two distinct sets of tribunals administering different rules for the adjudication of causes has now been changed in England. By the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1876, the courts of law and equity were consolidated into one Supreme Court of Judicature, in which equitable claims and defences are recognized in all proceedings to the same effect as a court of chancery would have recognized them before the passing of the act. Equitable remedies are substantially applied.

In America, the federal courts have equity powers under the constitution, where an adequate remedy at law does not exist; R. S. §723; 140 U. S. 105; 141 id. 656; 138 id. 146. The adequate remedy at law, which is the test of the equitable jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, is that which existed when the judiciary act of 1789 was adopted, unless subsequently changed by congress; 121 U. S. 201. The equity jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts is the same that the high court of chancery in England possesses, is subject to neither limitation nor restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different states of the Union; 150 U. S. 202; 120 id. 130; 2 Sumn. 612.

Courts of chancery were constituted in some of the states after 1776: and in Pennsylvania, for a short time, as early as 1723, a court of chancery existed; see Rawle, Eq. in Penna.; and in most of the colonies before the revolution; Bisph. Eq. § 14, n.

At the present time, distinct courts of chancery exist in very few of the states. In the greater number chancery powers are exercised by judges of common-law courts according to the ordinary practice in chancery. In the remaining states, the distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity have been abolished, but certain equitable remedies are still administered under the statutory form of the civil action. See Bisph. Eq. § 15.

It has been claimed that Pennsylvania was the first state to administer equity through common-law forms; but in a recent report to the Texas State Bar Association it is said: "Of one fact there can be no doubt, viz., Texas was the first state in the Union, which was dominated by common-law people and lawyers, to reject the common-law form of pleading and practice when the issue was raised between that system and the civil-law system; and Texas was unquestionably the first state in the American Union controlled by common-law principles to abolish the distinction between law and equity in the enforcement of private rights and redress of private wrongs." Ann. Rep. 1896.

EQUITY EVIDENCE. See EQUITY; EVIDENCE.

EQUITY PLEADING. See EQUITY; PLEA.

EQUITY OF REDEMPTION. A right which the mortgagor of an estate has of redeeming it, after it has been forfeited at law by the non-payment at the time appointed of the money secured by the mortgage to be paid, by paying the amount of the debt, interest, and costs.

The phrase of equity of redemption is indiscriminately, though often incorrectly, applied to the right of the mortgagor to regain his estate, both before and after breach of condition. In North Carolina, by statute, the former is called a legal right of redemption, and the latter the equity of redemption, thereby keeping a just distinction between these estates; 1 N. C. Rev. Stat. 266; 4 M'Cord 340. The interest is recognized at law for many purposes: as a subsisting estate, although the mortgagor in order to enforce his right is obliged to resort to an equitable proceeding, administered generally in courts of equity, but in some states by courts of law; 11 S. & R. 223; or in some states may pay the debt and have an action at law; 18 Johns. 7, 110; 1 Halst. 466; 2 H. & M'H. 9.

This estate in the mortgagor is one which he may devise or grant; 2 Washb. R. P. 40; and which is governed by the same rules of devolution or descent as any other estate in lands; 10 Conn. 243; 2 S. & S. 323; 2 Hare 35. He may mortgage it; 1 Pick. 485; and it is liable for his debts; 3 Metc. 81; 21 Me. 104; 7 Watts 475; 15 Ohio 467; 1 Cai. Cas. 47; 4 B. Monr. 429; 31 Miss. 253; 20 Ill. 53; 7 Ark. 269; 1 Day 93; 4 M'Cord 336; but see 7 Paige, Ch. 437; 7 Dana 67; 14 Ala. N. S. 476; 23 Miss. 206; 2 Dougl. Mich. 176; 24 Mo. 249; 13 Pet. 294; and in many other cases, if the mortgagor still retains possession, he is held to be the owner; 5 Gray 470, note; 11 N. H. 293; 22 Conn. 587; 13 Ill. 469; 34 Me. 89; 23 Barb. 490.

Any person who is interested in the mortgaged estate, or any part of it, having a legal estate therein, or a legal or equitable lien thereon, provided he comes in as privy in estate with the mortgagor, may exercise the right; including heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, and assignees of the mortgagor; 2 Root 509; 2 Hayw. 22; 14 Vt.

Eq. 285; 133 Ind. 670; 45 Ill. 62; 140 id. 135; tenants for years; 8 Mete. 517; 7 N. Y. 44; a jointress; 1 Vern. 190; 2 Wh. & T. Lead. Cas. 752; dowress and tenant by curtesy; 14 Pick. 98; 84 Wis. 240; 64 Vt. 616; one having an easement; 22 Pick. 401; one having an interest as a partner; 159 Mass. 356.

A mortgagee for adequate value and in good faith may acquire the equity of redemption; 112 Mo. 315; and a second mortgagee who purchases such equity is entitled to any payments that may have been made on the first mortgage, but which were not credited thereon; 26 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 839.

Where the necessary amount has been tendered within the statutory period for redemption, it can be followed up by suit to redeem at any time before the right to bring suit is barred; 57 Ark. 193. A court of equity has the discretion governed by the equities of each case, to name terms on which it will let in a party to redeem; 112 Mo. 599.

Where a bill to redeem is filed before the debt is due, it must be dismissed, although the hearing is not had until after the debt is due; 160 Mass. 162. See MORTGAGE.

EQUIVALENT. Of the same value. Sometimes a condition must be literally accomplished in forma specifica; but some may be fulfilled by an equivalent, per æquipolens, when such appears to be the intention of the parties: as, if I promise to pay you one hundred dollars, and then die, my executor may fulfil my engagement; for it is equivalent to you whether the money be paid to you by me or by him. Rolle, Abr. 451. For its meaning in patent law, see 7 Wall. 327; PATENT.

EQUIVOCAL. Having a double sense. In the construction of contracts, it is a general rule that when an expression may be taken in two senses, that shall be preferred which gives it effect. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

EQUULEUS (Lat.). A kind of rack for extorting confessions. Encyc. Lond.

ERASURE. The obliteration of a writing. The effect of an erasure is not per se to destroy the writing in which it occurs, but is a question for the jury, and will render the writing void or not, under the same circumstances as an interlineation. See 5 Pet. 530; 11 Co. 88; 5 Bingh. 183; 11 Conn. 531; 3 La. 56; 57 Ala. 173; 62 Ind. 401; 39 Mo. 34; 44 N. H. 227; 43 Wis. 221; 69 Me. 429; 119 Mass. 269. See ALTERATION; INTERLINEATION.

ERCISCUNDUS (Lat. erciscere). For dividing. Familiæ erciscundæ actio. An action for dividing a way, goods, or any matter of inheritance. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

ERECTION. This term is generally used of a completed building. 45 N. Y. 153; 119 Mass. 254. The repairing, alteration, and enlarging, or the removal from one spot to another, of a building, is not erection within the meaning of a statute forbidding the erection of wooden buildings; 27 Conn. 332; 2 Rawle 262; 51 Ill. 422. The moving of a building is not an erection of a building; 121 Mass. 229; but the painting of a house has been held to be part of the erection; 51 Ill. 422. See LIEN.

EREGIMUS (Lat. we have erected). A word proper to be used in the creation of a new office by the sovereign. Bac. Abr. Offices, E.

EROSION. This consists of the gradual eating away of the soil by the operation of currents or tides. 100 N. Y. 433.

EROTIC MANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. A name given to a morbid activity of the sexual propensity. It is a disease or morbid affection of the mind, which fills it with a crowd of voluptuous images, and hurries its victim to acts of the grossest licentiousness, in the absence of any lesion of the intellectual powers. See Krafft-Ebing, Psychopathia Sexualis, Chad-dock's ed.; MANIA.

ERRANT (Lat. errare, to wander). Wandering. Justices in eyre were formerly said to be errant (itinerant.) Cowel.

ERRONEOUS. Deviating from the law. 73 Ind. 338.

ERROR. A mistake in judgment or deviation from the truth in matters of fact, and from the law in matters of judgment.

Error of fact will excuse the party acting illegally but honestly, in many cases, will avoid a contract in some instances, and when mutual will furnish equity with a ground for interference; 15 Me. 45; 20 Wend. 174; 5 Conn. 71; 12 Mass. 36. See MISTAKE.

Error in law will not, in general, excuse a man for its violation. A contract made under an error in law is, in general, binding; for, were it not so, error would be urged in almost every case; Bisph. Eq. 187. 2 East 469. See 6 Johns. Ch. 166; 8 Cow. 195; 2 J. & W. 249; 1 Y. & C. 232; 6 B. & C. 671. But a foreign law will for this purpose be considered as a fact; 15 Me. 45; 9 Pick. 112; 2 Pothier, Obl. 369, etc.

ERROR, WRIT OF. See WRIT OF ERROR.

ESCAMBIO. In Old English Law. A writ granting power to an English merchant to draw a bill of exchange on another who is in a foreign country. Reg. Orig. 194. Abolished by Stats. 59 Geo. III. c. 49, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125.

ESCAMBIUM. Exchange, which see.

ESCAPE. The deliverance of a person who is lawfully imprisoned, out of prison, before such a person is entitled to such deliverance by law. 5 Mass. 310.

The voluntarily or negligently allowing any person lawfully in confinement to leave the place. 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 917.

Departure of a prisoner from custody before he is discharged by due process of law.

Escape takes place without force; prison-breach, with violence; rescue, through the intervention of third parties.

Actual escapes are those which take place when the prisoner in fact gets out of prison and unlawfully regains his liberty.

Constructive escapes take place when the prisoner obtains more liberty than the law allows, although he still remains in confinement. Bac. Abr. Escape (B); Plowd. 17; 5 Mass. 310; 2 Mas. 486.

Negligent escape takes place when the prisoner goes at large, unlawfully, either because the building or prison in which he is confined is too weak to hold him, or because the keeper by carelessness lets him go out of prison.

Voluntary escape takes place when the prisoner has given to him voluntarily any liberty not authorized by law. 5 Mass. 320; 2 D. Chip. 11.

When a man is imprisoned in a proper place under the process of a court having jurisdiction in the case, he is lawfully imprisoned, notwithstanding the proceedings may be irregular; 1 Crawf. & D. 203; see 133 Mass. 399; but if the court has not jurisdiction the imprisonment is unlawful, whether the process be regular or otherwise. Bacon, Abr. Escape in Civil Cases (A 1); 13 Johns. 378; 8 Cow. 192; 1 Root 233. See 7 Conn. 452.

Letting a prisoner, confined under final process, out of prison for any, even the shortest time, is an escape, although he afterwards return; 2 W. Bla. 1048; 40 N. J. L. 230; 57 How. Pr. 109; 38 Fed. Rep. 791; 11 Mass. 160; 40 N. J. L. 417; 85 N. Y. 445; and this may be (as in the case of imprisonment under a ca. sa.) although an officer may accompany him; 3 Co. 44 a; Plowd. 37; Hob. 202; 1 B. & P. 24. Where an insolvent debtor whose discharge has been refused by the court, surrenders himself to the keeper of a prison, who will not receive him because he has no writ or record showing that he is an insolvent debtor and is not in charge of an officer, the surrender is not sufficient to make the keeper liable for the debt in case of the debtor's escape; 140 Pa. 102.

In criminal cases, the prisoner is indictable for a misdemeanor, whether the escape be negligent or voluntary; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 189; Cro. Car. 209; 7 Conn. 384; 82 N. C. 585; and the officer is also indictable; 32 Ark. 124; 80 N. C. 390; 107 id. 857. If the offence of the prisoner was a felony, a voluntary escape is a felony on the part of the officer; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. c. 19, § 25; if negligent, it is a misdemeanor only in any case; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 925; Cl. Cr. L. 327. See 78 Ind. 166. It is the duty of the officer to rearrest after an escape; 6 Hill 344; 111 Ill. 90; 1 Russ. Cr. 572.

In civil cases, a prisoner may be arrested who escapes from custody on mesne process, and the officer will not be liable if he rearrest him; Cro. Jac. 419; but if the escape be voluntary from imprisonment on mesne process, and in any case if the escape be from final process, the officer is liable in damages to the plaintiff, and is not excused by retaking the prisoner; 2 B. & A. 56; 88 Mass. 260. Nothing but an act of God or the enemies of the country will excuse an escape; 24 Wend. 381; 2 Murph. 386; 1 Brev. 146; 51 Miss. 575. See 5 Ired. 702; 5 W. & S. 455.

Attempts to escape by one accused of crime are presumptive of guilt, and the conduct of a defendant in arrest, either before or after being accused of the crime, may be competent evidence against him, as indicating a guilty mind; 30 La. Ann. Part II. 1266; 58 Ala. 335; 6 Tex. App. 207, 347; 14 Bush 340; 47 Cal. 113; 33 N. H. 216. Where a prisoner being in the corridor of a jail unlocks a door between the corridor and a cell, and thence escapes, he commits prison breach; 53 N. J. L. 488. An unsuccessful attempt at prison breach is indictable; 12 Johns. 339. See Whart. Cr. L. § 1667; 26 Am. L. Reg. 345; FLIGHT.

ESCAPE WARRANT. A warrant addressed to all sheriffs throughout England, to retake an escaped prisoner for debt, and commit him to gaol till the debt is satisfied.

ESCHEAT (Fr. escheoir, to happen). An accidental reverting of lands to the original lord.

An obstruction of the course of descent, and a consequent determination of the tenure, by some unforeseen contingency; in which case the land naturally results back, by a kind of reversion, to the original grantor or lord of the fee; 2 Bla. Com. 244.

The estate itself which so reverted was called an escheat. Spelman. The term included also other property which fell to the lord; as, trees which fell down, etc. Cowel.

All escheats under the English laws are declared to be strictly feudal and to import the extinction of tenure. Wr. Ten. 115; 1 W. Bla. 123.

That if the ownership of a property become vacant, the right must necessarily subside into the whole community in which, when society first assumed the elements of order and subordination, it was originally vested, is a principle which lies at the foundation of property; 4 Kent 425; and this seems to be the universal rule of civilized society. Domat, Droit Pub. lib. 1, t. 6, s. 3, n. 1. See 10 Viner, Abr. 139; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 250; 5 Binn. 375; 27 Barb. 376; 5 Cal. 373; 47 Md. 103; 86 Pa. 284; Mitch. R. P. 313. It was recognized by Justinian, and by the civil law an officer was appointed, called the escheator, whose duty it was to assert the right of the emperor to the hereditas jacens or caduca when the owner left no heirs or legatee to take it. Code 10, 10, 1. By the earlier English usages the estate of the vassal escheated to his lord when there were no representatives in the seventh degree, and this custom was later extended to include male descendants ad infinitum; Lib. Feud. I. 1, s. 4.

In case of escheat by failure of heirs, by corruption of blood, or by conviction of certain crimes, the feud fell back into the lord's hands by a termination of the tenure. 1 Washb. R. P. 24. At the present day, in England, escheat can only arise from the failure of heirs. By the Felony Act, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 23, no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of or for any treason or felony, or felo de se, shall cause any forfeiture or escheat; 3 Steph. Com. 660; Moz. & W.; Brown. An action of ejectment, commenced by writ of summons, has taken the place of an ancient writ of escheat, against the person in possession on the death of the tenant without heirs.

The early English law is thus well stated: "By the law of England, before the Declaration of Independence, the lands of a man dying intestate and without lawful heirs reverted by escheat to the king as the sovereign lord; but the king's title was not complete without an actual entry upon the land, or judicial proceedings to ascertain the want of heirs and devisees; 8 App. Cas. 767, 772; 2 Bla. Com. 245. The usual form of proceeding for this purpose was by an inquisition or inquest of office before a jury, which was had upon a commission out of the court of chancery, but was really a proceeding at common law; and, if it resulted in favor of the king, then, by virtue of ancient statutes, any one claiming title in the lands might, by leave of that court, file a traverse in the nature of a plea or defense to the king's claim, and not in the nature of an original suit: Lord Somers in 14 How. St. Tr. 1, 83; 6 Ves. 809; 4 Madd. 281; L. R. 2 Eq. 95; 3 Johns. 1; 11 Allen 157, 172. The inquest of office was a proceeding in rem; when there was proper office found for the king, that was notice to all persons who had claims to come in and assert them; and, until so traversed, it was conclusive in the king's favor; Bayley, J., in 12 East 96, 103; 16 Vin. Abr. 86, pl. 1; Hamilton v. Brown, 161 U. S. 256.

In this country, however, the state steps in, in the place of the feudal lord, by virtue of its sovereignty, as the original and ultimate proprietor of all the lands within its jurisdiction; 4 Kent 424. See 10 Gill & J. 450; 3 Dane, Abr. 140. And it escheats to the state as part of its common ownership, either by mere operation of law, or upon an inquest of office according to the law of the particular state; 161 U. S. 256; 3 Washb. R. P., 4th ed. 47, 48. It is, perhaps, questionable how far this incident exists at common law in the United States generally. In Maryland the lord proprietor was originally the owner of the land, as the crown was in England. In most of the states the right to an escheat is secured by statute; 4 Kent 424; 1 Washb. R. P. 24, 27; 2 id. 443. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

In Indiana and Missouri it was held that at common law, if a bastard died intestate, his property escheated; 6 Blackf. 533; 30 Mo. 269; but this is now otherwise by statute in those states and in most of the others. See BASTARD. So at common law there was an escheat if the purchaser or heirs of the decedent were aliens; 7 N. H. 475; Co. Litt. 2 b; but it is usually otherwise by the statutes of the several states. See ALIEN.

In Massachusetts unclaimed moneys or dividends of any insolvent bank or insurance company, after 10 years' custody by the clerk of court, are turned over to the state treasurer, and if not claimed within two years thereafter, escheat to the state; acts of Mass. p. 210; and such a provision is constitutional; 1 Cald. 202.

Hereditaments which, although they may be held in fee-simple, are not strictly subjects of tenure, such as fairs, markets, commons in gross, rents charge, rents seck, and the like, do not escheat, but become extinct upon a failure of heirs of the tenant; Challis, R. P. 30.

The method of proceeding, and subject-matter. To determine the question of escheat a proceeding must be brought in the nature of an inquest of office or office found; 7 Wend. 367; 5 Cal. 373; 28 Ga.

227; 14 Ia. 474; and to give the inquisition the effect of a lien the same must be filed, as the record of it is the only competent evidence by which title by escheat can be established; 21 Mich. 24; 3 Johns. 1; and such action must also be taken to recover escheated lands held in adverse possession; after which an entry must be made to give the state a right of possession; 7 Wend. 367; 6 Leigh 588; 74 Ind. 252; and the facts which support the escheat must be stated; 2 Head 553; 2 Watts 228; a bill of information must be filed and a scire facias issued against all alleged to have, hold, claim, or possess such estate; 117 Ill. 123; and the names of all persons in possession of the premises, and all who were known to claim an interest therein, must be set forth and the scire facias served on them personally; to all other persons constructive notice is sufficient; id. In Texas, no proceedings can be had, except under and according to an act of the legislature; 64 Tex. 133; 161 U. S. 256.

In many of the states, however, the doctrine in force is, that land cannot remain without an owner; it must vest somewhere, and on the death of an intestate without heirs it becomes eo instanti the property of the state; 6 Johns. Ch. 360; 2 Har. & J. 112; 5 Neb. 203; 7 N. H. 475; 7 Watts 455; 9 R. I. 26; 24 N. J. L. 566. In the case of Wallahan v. Ingersoll, 117 Ill. 123, it was held that on the death of an intestate without heirs, the title to his estate devolves immediately upon the state, but, in order to make that title available, it must be established in the manner prescribed by law by proceedings in the proper court, in the name of the people for the purpose of proving and establishing by judicial determination the title of the state. After a long lapse of time an inquest will be presumed; 27 Va. 291; 26 Ga. 582. A right of action for the recovery of lands is vested in the state at the death of the owner whose property escheats; 107 N. Y. 185. Persons claiming as heirs may come in under the statute and obtain an order for leave to make up an issue at law to have their rights determined; 13 Rich. L. 77. The legislature is under no constitutional obligation to leave the title to such property in abeyance, and a judicial proceeding for ascertaining an escheat on due notice, actual to known and constructive to all possible unknown claimants, is due process of law; and a statute, providing for such proceeding does not impair the obligation of any contract, contained in the grant under which the former owner held whether from the state or a private person; 161 U. S. 256, 275.

Not only do estates in possession escheat, but also those in remainder, if vested; 2 Hill 67; and equitable as well as legal estates; 1 Wall. 5; 5 Ired. Eq. 207; 3 Washb. R. P. 446; 10 Gill & J. 443; 4 Kent 424; (in many states this provision is statutory, but the rule in England is contrary; 1 Eden 177;) also those held in trust, when the trust expires; 88 Pa. 429.

Proceedings to traverse an inquest. An inquisition is traversable, the traverser being considered as a defendant, and being only required to show failure of title in the state and bare possession in himself; 3 Johns. 1; contra, in Pennsylvania, where such traverser is in the position of plaintiff in ejectment and must show a title superior to the commonwealth; proceedings may be brought by any one claiming an interest and including an administratrix in possession; 137 Pa. 138; it is a proceeding at law and not in equity; 19 Ore. 504; and the court of common pleas has jurisdiction over it; 137 Pa. 138; the traverser being allowed to begin and conclude the suit to the jury; 2 Ashm. 163. And if only one of those notified appear, he is entitled to a separate trial of his traverse; 21 S. C. 435; but such traverser has no precedence over others on the dockets of cases; Riley, S. C. 301.

When all the members of a partnership have died intestate and without heirs, the property escheats to the state, but the heirs or kindred of any one of the partners may traverse the inquisition; 57 Pa. 102.

The law favors the presumption of the existence of heirs, and there must be something shown by those claiming by virtue of escheat to rebut that presumption; 2 Watts 228; 41 Tex. 249; but see contra, 36 Tex. 283; 4 Md. 138; 90 N. C. 385, overruling as to this point, 1 Hayw. 373. Proceedings for an escheat for want of heirs or devisees, like ordinary provisions for the administration of his estate, presuppose that he is dead; if he is still alive, the court is without jurisdiction and its proceedings are null and void, even in a collateral proceeding; 161 U. S. 256, 267; citing 8 Cr. 9, 23; 154 U. S. 34; 27 Tex. 217; id. 491, 497; 67 id.

Equity cannot enjoin proceedings to have an escheat declared, where every question presented could be decided on a traverse should such escheat be found; 88 Pa. 284; and an amicus curiæ cannot move to quash an inquisition, unless he has an interest himself or represents some one who has; 2 Cal. 284.

Disposition of escheated lands by the state. Where the state takes the title of escheated land, it is entitled to the rights of the last owner; therefore, such lands cannot be taken up by location as vacant land; 11 Tex. 10; or be regarded as ungranted land; but it must be sold pursuant to the statute; 2 Brev. 321; 27 Pa. 36; and a grant of such lands by the state before office found is valid; 7 Watts 456; 24 N. J. L. 566; 27 Barb. 376; as is also a grant of land to escheat in futuro; 9 Rich. Eq. 440; but no authority is vested in officers of the land office to issue warrants for the taking up of escheated lands. After seven years from the inquisition they shall be sold at auction; 27 Pa. 36; and the power to order the sale of the property is vested in the district court; 41 Tex. 10. The disposition of funds secured by the sale of such property must be strictly in conformity with the state statute; and the legislature of a state can pass no act diverting the funds to another purpose; 5 Neb. 203; but where the constitution gives to the legislature the power to provide methods to enforce the forfeiture, there can be no proceedings until the legislature acts; 64 Tex. 133.

In selling escheated lands the grantee named in the statute must be a party to the proceedings, or the sale will be void; 2 Swan 46; 1 Cald. 381.

When land is held by a foreign corporation and a statute has been passed declaring that the land shall be held "indefeasibly as to any right of escheat" in the commonwealth, the penalty of escheat is removed, although the act imposing such penalty is not repealed in terms; 132 Pa. 591; 7 L. R. A. 634.

As to statutory disposition of escheated lands, see the statutes of the several states; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

See, generally, 12 L. R. A. 529; ALIEN; BASTARD; DISSOLUTION; FOREIGN CORPORATION.

ESCHEATOR. The name of an officer whose duties are generally to ascertain what escheats have taken place, and to prosecute the claim of the sovereign for the purpose of recovering the escheated property. 10 Vin. Abr. 158; Co. Litt. 13 b; Toml. L. D. His office was to be retained but one year; and no one person could hold the office more than once in three years.

This office has fallen into desuetude. There was formerly an escheator-general in Pennsylvania, but his duties have been transferred to the auditor-general, and in most of the states the duties of this office devolve upon the attorney-general.

ESCRIBANO. In Spanish Law. The public officer who is lawfully authorized to reduce to writing and verify by his signature all judicial acts and proceedings as well as all acts and contracts entered into between private individuals.

ESCROW. A deed delivered to a stranger, to be by him delivered to the grantee upon the happening of certain conditions, upon which last delivery the transmission of title is complete.

The delivery must be to a stranger; 8 Mass. 230. See 9 Co. 137 b; T. Moore 642; 5 Blackf. 18; 23 Wend. 43; 2 Dev. & B. L. 530; 4 Watts 180; 22 Me. 569; for when delivered directly to the grantee it cannot be treated as an escrow; 52 Ark. 493; 114 Ill. 19; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 238; 84 Me. 340; nor to the agent or attorney of the grantee; 85 Me. 242; but see 1 S. D. 497; 84 Ala. 327. The second delivery must be conditioned, and not merely postponed; 8 Metc. 436; 2 B. & C. 82; Shepp. Touch. 58. Care should be taken to express the intent of the first delivery clearly; 10 Wend. 310; 8 Mass. 230; 22 Me. 569; 14 Conn. 271; 3 Green, Ch. 155. An escrow has no effect as a deed till the performance of the condition; 21 Wend. 267; 16 Or. 255; 56 Miss. 383; 10 Neb. 1; and takes effect from the second delivery; 1 Barb. 500. See 3 Metc. 412; 6 Wend. 666; 16 Vt. 563; 30 Me. 110; 10 Pa. 285; 91 Ala. 610. But where the parties announce their intention that the escrow shall, after the performance of the condition, take effect from the date of the deed, such intention will control; Devl. Deeds 329; 34 Ill. 13.

A deed delivered in escrow cannot be revoked; 77 Cal. 279.

ESCUAGE. In Old English Law. Service of the shield. Tenants who hold their land by escuage hold by knight's service. 1 Thomas. Co. Litt. 272; Littleton § 95, 86 b. Abolished by Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24. SCUTAGE.

ESKETORES. Robbers or destroyers of other men's lands and fortunes. Cowel.

ESKIPPAMENTUM. Tackle or furniture; outfit. Certain towns in England were bound to furnish certain ships at their own expense and with double skippage or tackle. The modern word outfit would seem to render the passage quite as satisfactorily; though the conjecture of Cowel has the advantage of antiquity.

ESKIPPER, ESKIPPARE. To ship. Kelh. Norm. L. D.; Rast. 409.

ESKIPPESON. Shippage, or passage by sea. Spelled, also, skippeson. Cowel.

ESNECY. Eldership. In the English law, this word signifies the right which the eldest coparcener of lands has to choose first one of the parts of the estate after it has been divided.

ESPERA. The period fixed by a competent judge within which a party is to do certain acts, as, e. g., to effect certain payments, present documents, etc.; and more especially the privilege granted by law to debtors, allowing them certain time for the payment of their indebtedness.

ESPLEES. The products which the land or ground yields; as, the hay of the meadows, the herbage of the pasture, corn or other produce of the arable, rents, and services. See 11 S. & R. 275; Dane, Abr. Index; 9 Barb. 293.

ESPOUSALS. A mutual promise between a man and a woman to marry each other at some other time: it differs from a marriage, because then the contract is completed. Wood, Inst. 57. See BETROTHMENT.

ESQUIRE (Lat. Armiger; Fr. Esquier). A title applied by courtesy to officers of almost every description, to members of the bar, and others. No one is entitled to it by law; and therefore it confers no distinction in law.

In England, it is a title next above that of a gentleman and below that of a knight. Camden reckons up four kinds of esquires particularly regarded by the heralds: the eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons in perpetual succession; the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in like perpetual succession; esquires created by the king's letters patent, or other investiture, and their eldest sons; esquires by virtue of their office, as justices of the peace, and others who bear any office of trust under the crown. 2 Steph. Com. 615. A miller or a farmer may be an esquire; 1 R. 2 Eq. 235.

ESSE. See IN ESSE.

ESSENDI QUIETAM DE THEOLONIA (Lat. of being quit of toll). A writ which lay anciently for the citizens or burgesses of a town which was entitled to exemption from toll, in case toll was demanded of them. Fitzh. N. B. 226, i.

ESSOIN, ESSOIGN. In Old English Law. An excuse for not appearing in court at the return of the process. Presentation of such excuse. Spelman, Gloss.; 1 Sell. Pr. 4; Comyns, Dig. Exoine, B 1. Essoin is not now allowed at all in personal actions. 2 Term 16; 16 East 7 (a); 3 Bla. Com. 278, n.

ESSOIN DAY. Formerly, the first day in the term was essoin day; now practically abolished. Dowl. 448; 3 Bla. Com. 278, n.

ESSOIN ROLL. The roll containing the essoins and the day of adjournment. Rosc. R. Act. 162 et seq.

ESTABLISH. This word occurs frequently in the constitution of the United States, and it is there used in different meanings. 1. To settle firmly, to fix unalterably: as, to establish justice, which is the avowed object of the constitution. 2. To make or form: as, to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies,—which evidently does not mean that these laws shall be unalterably established as justice. 3. To found, to create, to regulate: as, Congress shall have power to establish post-roads and post-offices. 4. To found, recognize, confirm, or admit: as, Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. 5. To create, to ratify, or confirm: as, We, the people, etc., do ordain and establish this constitution. 1 Story, Const. § 454.

For judicial decisions upon the scope and meaning of the word, see 14 N. Y. 356; 28 Barb. 65; 33 Pa. 202; 11 Gray 306; 49 N. H. 230; 18 La. Ann. 49; 10 S. C. 389.

ESTABLISHMENT, ESTABLISHMENT. An ordinance or statute. Especially used of those ordinances or statutes passed in the reign of Edw. I. Co. 2d Inst. 156; Britt. c. 21. That which is instituted or established for public or private use, as the trading establishments of a government.

Etablissement is also used to denote the settlement of dower by the husband upon his wife. Britt. c. 102.

ESTADAL. In Spanish Law. In Spanish America this was a measure of land of sixteen square varas, or yards. 2 White, Rec. 139.

ESTADIA. In Spanish Law. Called, also, Sobrestadia. The time for which the party who has chartered a vessel, or is bound to receive the cargo, has to pay demurrage on account of his delay in the execution of the contract.

ESTATE (Lat. status, the condition or circumstances in which the owner stands with reference to his property). The degree, quantity, nature, and extent of interest which a person has in real property.

It signifies the quantity of interest which a person has, from absolute ownership down to naked possession. 9 Cow. 81.

This word has several meanings. 1. In its most extensive sense, it is applied to signify everything of which riches or fortune may consist, and includes personal and real property: hence we say, personal estate, real estate; 8 Ves. 504; 16 Johns. 587; 4 Metc. 178; 3 Cra. 97; 55 Me. 284; 10 Mass. 323; 1 Pet. 585; 4 Harr. (Del.) 177; 32 Miss. 107; 4 McCord 60; 14 N. J. L. 53. 2. In its more limited sense, the word estate is applied to lands. It is so applied in two senses. The first describes or points out the land itself, without ascertaining the extent or nature of the interest therein: as, "my estate at A." 18 Pick. 537. The second, which is the proper and technical meaning of estate, is the degree, quantity, nature, and extent of interest which one has in real property: as, an estate in fee, whether the same be a fee-simple or fee-tail, or, an estate for life or for years, etc. Coke says, Estate signifies such inheritance, freehold, term of years, tenancy by statute merchant, staple, eligit, or the like, as any man hath in lands or tenements, etc. Co. Litt. §§ 345, 350 a. See Jones, Land Off. Titles in Penna. 165-170. Estate does not include rights in action; 12 Ired. L. 61; 35 Miss. 25; 18 Pa. 249. But as the word is commonly used in the settlement of estates, it does include the debts as well as the assets of a bankrupt or decedent, all his obligations and resources being regarded as one entirety. See 9 La. 135. Also the status or condition in life of a person; 15 Me. 122. See ESTATES OF THE REALM.

ESTATE AT SUFFERANCE. The interest of a tenant who has come rightfully into possession of lands by permission of the owner and continues to occupy the same after the period for which he is entitled to hold by such permission. 1 Washb. R. P. 392; 2 Bla. Com. 150; Co. Litt. 57 b; Sm. L. & T. 217; 25 Cal. 31; 86 Ind. 108; 39 Mo. 177; Mitch. R. P. 174. This estate is of infrequent occurrence, but is recognized as so far an estate that the landlord must enter before he can bring ejectment against the tenant; 3 Term 292; 1 M. & G. 614. If the tenant has personally left the house, the landlord may break in the doors; 1 Bingh. 58; 17 Pick. 263; and the modern rule seems to be that the landlord may use force to regain possession, subject only to indictment if any injury is committed against the public peace; 7 Term 431; 14 M. & W. 437; 1 W. & S. 90; 7 M. & G. 316; 13 Johns. 235; 121 Mass. 309; 59 Me. 568. See 32 Vt. 82; 26 Mo. 116; 68 Ill. 53; L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 174.

ESTATE AT WILL. An estate in lands which the tenant has, by entry made thereon under a demise, to hold during the joint wills of the parties to the same. Co. Litt. 55 a; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 10; 2 Bla. Com. 145; 4 Kent 110. Estates properly at will are of very infrequent occurrence, being generally turned into estates for years or from year to year by decisions of the courts or by statute; 4 Kent 115; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 14; 4 Rawle 123; 1 Term 159.

ESTATE BY ELEGIT. See ELEGIT.

ESTATE BY STATUTE MERCHANT. See STATUTE MERCHANT.

ESTATE BY THE CURTESY. That estate to which a husband is entitled upon the death of his wife in the lands or tenements of which she was seised in possession, in fee-simple, or in fee-tail during their coverture; provided they have had lawful issue born alive and possibly capable of inheriting her estate. 1 Washb. R. P. 128; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1074; Co. Litt. 30 a; 2 Bla. Com. 126; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 153; 4 Kent 29, note; 21 Hun 381; 8 Baxt. 361; 3 Lea 710; 6 Mo. App. 416, 549; [1892] 2 Ch. 336. See CURTESY.

Curtesy is abolished or modified in many states. In Pennsylvania, birth of issue is no longer necessary, and in some states actual seisin is not required; 152 Pa. 313; 4 Day 298; 2 Ohio 308; 38 Me. 356; 24 Miss. 261.

ESTATE FOR LIFE. A freehold estate, not of inheritance, but which is held by the tenant for his own life or the life or lives of one or more other persons, or for an indefinite period, which may endure for the life or lives of persons in being, and not beyond the period of a life. 1 Washb. R. P. 88; Co. Litt. 42 a; Bract. lib. 4, c. 28, § 207; 4 Den. 414; 7 Pick. 169; Chal. R. P. 89. When the measure of duration is the tenant's own life, it is called simply an estate "for life;" when the measure of duration is the life of another person, it is called an estate "per (or pur) autre vie;" 2 Bla. Com. 120; Co. Litt. 41 b; 4 Kent 23, 24.

Estates for life may be created by act of law or by act of the parties: in the former case they are called legal, in the latter conventional. The legal life estates are estates-tail after possibility of issue extinct, estates by dower, estates by curtesy, jointures; Mitch. R. P. 118, 133; 34 Me. 151; 5 Gratt. 499; 1 Cush. 95; 24 Pa. 162; 6 Ind. 489; 3 E. L. & Eq. R. 345; 5 Md. 219; 51 Vt. 37; 12 S. C. 422; 50 Ia. 302; 89 Ill. 246; 31 N. J. Eq. 234. A life estate may be created by implication; 35 S. C. 333.

The chief incidents of life estates are a right to take reasonable estovers, and freedom from injury by a sudden termination or disturbance of the estate; 40 N. H. 532. Under-tenants have the same privileges as the original tenant; and acts of the original tenant which would destroy his own claim to these privileges will not affect them; see 19 Pa. 323.

Their right, however, does not of course, as against the superior lord, extend beyond the life of the original tenant; 2 Bla. Com. 122; 1 Rolle, Abr. 727; Co. Litt. 41 b; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 102.

ESTATE FOR YEARS. An interest in lands by virtue of a contract for the possession of them for a definite and limited period of time. 2 Bla. Com. 140; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1267; Bac. Abr. Leases; Wms. R. P. 195. Such estates are frequently called terms. See TERM. The length of time for which the estate is to endure is of no importance in ascertaining its character, unless otherwise declared by statute; 15 Mass. 439; 1 N. H. 350; 13 S. & R. 60; 22 Ind. 122; 4 Kent 93.

ESTATE IN COMMON. An estate held in joint possession by two or more persons at the same time by several and distinct titles. 1 Washb. R. P. 415; 2 Bla. Com. 191; 1 Pres. Est. 139. This estate has the single unity of possession, and may be of real or personal property; 76 N. Y. 436; 82 N. C. 75, 82; 92 Ill. 129; 25 Minn. 222; 126 Mass. 480; 30 N. J. Eq. 110; 25 Mich. 53.

Where one dies intestate, the joint ownership of his property by his children is generally that of tenants in common; 94 Mich. 204.

ESTATE IN COPARCENARY. An estate which several persons hold as one heir, whether male or female. In the latter case, it arises at common law, when an estate descends to two or more females; in the former, when an estate descends to all the males in equal degree by particular custom. This estate has the three unities of time, title, and possession; but the interests of the coparceners may be unequal. 1 Washb. R. P. 414; 2 Bla. Com. 188; 4 Kent 336; 4 Mo. App. 360. See COPARCENARY, ESTATES IN.

ESTATE IN DOWER. See DOWER.

ESTATE IN EXPECTANCY. An estate giving a present or vested contingent right of future enjoyment. One in which the right to parcenary of the profits is postponed to some future period. Such are estates in remainder and reversion. 7 Paige 70, 76; 20 Barb. 455.

ESTATE IN FEE-SIMPLE. See FEE-SIMPLE.

ESTATE IN FEE-TAIL. See FEE-TAIL.

ESTATE IN POSSESSION. An estate where the tenant is in actual parcenary or receipt of the rents and other advantages arising therefrom. 2 Crabb, R. P. § 2322; 2 Bla. Com. 163. See 19 Mach. 116; 18 Mo. 486; EXPECTANCY.

ESTATE IN REMAINDER. See REMAINDER.

ESTATE IN REVERSION. See REVERSION.

ESTATE IN SEVERALTY. See SEVERALTY, ESTATE IN.

ESTATE IN VADIO. Pledge. See MORTGAGE.

ESTATE OF FREEHOLD or FRANK-TENEMENT. Any estate of inheritance, or for life, in either a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, existing in or arising from real property of free tenure. 2 Bla. Com. 104. It thus includes all estates but copyhold and leasehold, the former of which has never been known in this country. Freehold in deed is the real possession of land or tenements in fee, fee-tail, or for life. Freehold in law is the right to such tenements before entry. The term has also been applied to those offices which a man holds in fee or for life. Mozl. & W. Dict.; 1 Washb. R. P. 71, 637. See 100 Ill. 221; 75 N. C. 12; L. R. 11 Eq. 454; LIBERUM TENEMENTUM.

ESTATE OF INHERITANCE. An estate which may descend to heirs. 1 Washb. R. P. 51; 1 Steph. Com. 218.

All freehold estates are estates of inheritance, except estates for life. Crabb, R. P. § 945.

ESTATE OF JOINT TENANCY. The estate which subsists where several persons have any subject of property jointly between them in equal shares by purchase. 1 Washb. R. P. 406; 1 Bla. Com. 180. The right of survivorship is the distinguishing characteristic of this estate. Littleton § 280. In most of the United States the presumption is that all tenants holding jointly hold as tenants in common, unless a clear intention to the contrary be shown; 6 Gray 428; 5 Halst. 42; 20 Ala. N. S. 112; 1 Root 48; 10 Ohio 1; 11 S. & R. 191; 3 Vt. 543; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 547; 96 Mo. 591; 60 Pa. 511; 35 Ark. 17; 93 N. C. 214. In some states this is by statute.

In some, words that would have created a joint tenancy now create a tenancy in common.

ESTATE PUR AUTRE VIE. An estate for the life of another. It arises most frequently when a tenant for his own life conveys his estate to a third person. He can only convey what he has, and his grantee takes an estate during the life of the grantor. If the tenant died during the life of the grantor (who was called the cestui que vie), at common law the balance of the estate went to the first person who took it, termed a general occupant. If the original gift was to the tenant and his heirs, the heir took it as special occupant. By statute in England, if there is no special occupant, the estate goes to the executors as personally, if not disposed of by will. This rule has been adopted in most of the United States, except a few, where it still descends as personally; 1 Washb. R. P. 88; 2 Bla. Com. 120.

ESTATE TAIL. See FEE-TAIL.

ESTATE UPON CONDITION. See CONDITION.

ESTATES OF THE REALM. The lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons of Great Britain. 1 Bla. Com. 153; 3 Hallam, ch. 6, pl. 3. Sometimes called the three estates.

ESTER IN JUDGMENT. To appear before a tribunal either as plaintiff or defendant. Kelh. Norm. L. D.

ESTIMATE. A word used to express the mind or judgment of the speaker or writer on the particular subject under consideration. It implies a computation or calculation. 37 Hun 203.

ESTOPPEL. The preclusion of a person from asserting a fact, by previous conduct inconsistent therewith, on his own part or the part of those under whom he claims, or by an adjudication upon his rights which he cannot be allowed to call in question.

A preclusion, in law, which prevents a man from alleging or denying a fact, in consequence of his own previous act, allegation, or denial of a contrary tenor. Steph. Pl. 239.

A plea which neither admits nor denies the facts alleged by the plaintiff, but denies his right to allege them. Gould, Pl. c. 2, § 39.

A special plea in bar, which happens where a man has done some act or executed some deed which precludes him from averring anything to the contrary. 3 Bla. Com. 308.

Where a fact has been admitted or asserted for the purpose of influencing the conduct or deriving a benefit from another so that it cannot be denied without a breach of good faith, the law enforces the rule of good morals as a rule of policy, and precludes the party from repudiating his representations or denying the truth of his admissions; 5 Ohio 199; Rawle, Cov. 407.

This doctrine of law gives rise to a kind of pleading that is neither by way of traverse, nor confession and avoidance, viz.: a pleading that, waiving any question of fact, relies merely on the estoppel, and, after stating the previous act, allegation, or denial of the opposite party, prays judgment if he shall be received or admitted to aver contrary to what he before did or said. This pleading is called a pleading by way of estoppel. Steph. Pl. 240; 126 Mass. 21; 18 Hun 163; 57 Miss. 634; 31 La. Ann. 81, 108; 8 Baxt. 289; 90 Ill. 604; 6 Wash. 244. See 95 Cal. 541.

Formerly the questions of regarding estoppel arose almost entirely in relation to transfers of real property, and the rules in regard to one kind of estoppel were quite fully elaborated. In more modern time the principle has come to be applied to all cases where one by words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief or to alter his own previous position; 2 Exch. 653; 1 Zab. 403; 23 Me. 525; 9 N. Y. 121; 40 Me. 348. See, as to the reason and propriety of the doctrine, Co. Litt. 352 a; 11 Wend. 117; 1 Dev. & B. L. 464; 12 Vt. 44.

"The correct view of estoppel is that taken in a recent work (Bigelow, Est.). 'Certain admissions,' it is there said, 'are indisputable, and estoppel is the agency of the law by which evidence to controvert their truth is excluded.' In other words, when an act is done, or a statement made by a party the truth or efficacy of which it would be a fraud on his part to controvert or impair, the character of an estoppel will be given to what would otherwise be a mere matter of evidence. The law of estoppel, therefore, is a branch of the law of evidence, it has become a part of the jurisdiction of chancery, simply because in equity alone, or rather by equitable construction alone, has that full effect been given to this species of evidence which is necessary to the due administration of justice." Bisph. Eq. § 280. See Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 106.

Where there is an attempt to apply the doctrine of estoppel, one essential in such a case is that the party in whose favor it is invoked must himself act in good faith; 50 Kan. 773.

BY DEED. Such as arises from the provisions of a deed. It is a general rule that a party to a deed is estopped to deny any thing stated therein which has operated upon the other party: as, the inducement to accept and act under such deed; 7 Conn. 214; 13 Vt. 158; 3 Mo. 373; 5 Ohio 199; 10 Cush. 163; 107 Mo. 616; and see 135 N. C. 203; 3 M'Cord 411; 6 Ohio 366; including a deed made with covenant of warranty, which estops even as to a subsequently acquired title; 11 Johns. 91; 24 Pick. 324; 20 Me. 260; 3 Ohio 107; 12 Vt. 39; 145 U. S. 546; 130 id. 122; 157 Mass. 57; 89 Tenn. 411. But see 13 Pick. 116; 5 Gray 328; 4 Wend. 300; 11 Ohio 475; 14 Me. 351; 43 id. 432; 29 Fla. 223. See 101 U. S. 240; 21 Hun 145; 45 N. Y. Sup. A corporation accepting conveyance of a water works plant by deed describing certain mortgages thereon, and expressly declaring that the conveyance was made subject thereto, is thereby estopped from questioning the validity of the mortgages; 73 Fed. Rep. 956.

To create an estoppel, the deed must be good and valid in its form and execution; 2 Washb. R. P. 41; 39 Minn. 511; and must convey no title upon which the warranty can operate in case of a covenant; 3 McLean 56; 9 Cow. 271; 2 Pres. Abs. 216.

Estoppels affect only parties and privies in blood, law, or estate; 6 Bing. N. C. 79; 3 Johns. Ch. 103; 24 Pick. 324; 35 N. H. 99; 5 Ohio 190; 2 Dev. 177; 13 N. H. 389; 44 La. Ann. 584; 32 Fla. 264. See 125 Mass. 25; 47 Fed. Rep. 231. Estoppels, it is said, must be reciprocal; Co. Litt. 352 a; 17 Or. 204. But see 4 Litt. 272; 15 Mass. 499; 11 Ark. 82; 2 Sm. L. C. 664. And see 2 Washb. R. P. 458.

A grantor is not estopped by recitals in his deed of payment of consideration, from suing for the unpaid purchase money; 110 N. C. 400. A grantee cannot enter and hold under a deed and at the same time repudiate the title thereby conveyed; 75 Md. 376. See 156 Mass. 181; 145 Pa. 628; 112 N. C. 688; 94 Mich. 429; 46 Ill. App. 119; 79 Cal. 23.

BY MATTER OF RECORD. Such as arises from the adjudication of a competent court. Judgments of courts of record, and decrees and other final determinations of ecclesiastical, maritime, and military courts, work estoppels; 1 Munf. 466; 2 B. & Ald. 362; 16 Blatchf. 324; 69 Me. 445; 75 N. Y. 417; 25 Minn. 72; 101 U. S. 570; 124 Mass. 109, 347; 87 Ill. 367; 139 id. 274; 98 U. S. 433; 109 N. C. 406; 12 Colo. 434. See 44 La. Ann. 548; 112 N. C. 759. Admissions in pleadings, either express or implied, cannot afterwards be controverted in a suit between the same parties; Com. Dig. Estoppel A 1. It is of the essence of estoppel by judgment that it is certain that the precise fact was determined by the former judgment; 158 U. S. 216. Estoppels by deed and by record are common-law doctrines.

BY MATTER IN PAIS. Such as arises from the acts and declarations of a person by which he designedly induces another to alter his position injuriously to himself; 17 Conn. 345, 355; 5 Denio 154; 46 Ohio St. 255; 39 Minn. 419. See 97 N. C. 303; 43 Ill. App. 157; 116 Mo. 333; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 406; 66 Hun 628. Equitable estoppel, or estoppel by conduct, is said to have its foundation in fraud, considered in its most general sense; Bisph. Eq. § 282. It is said (Bigelow, Estop. 437) that the following elements must be present in order to constitute an estoppel by conduct: 1. There must have been a representation or concealment of material facts. 2. The representation must have been made with knowledge of the facts. 3. The party to whom it was made must have been ignorant of the truth of the matter. 4. It must have been made with the intention that the other party would act upon it. 5. The other party must have been induced to act upon it. See 69 Tex. 287; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 107. The rule of equitable estoppel is, that where one by his acts, declarations, or silence, where it is his duty to speak, has induced another person, in reliance on such acts or declarations, to enter into a transaction, he shall not, to the prejudice of the person so misled, impeach the transaction; per Bates, Ch., in 3 Del. Ch. 9.

In the leading case on this subject (Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469) a mortgagee of personalty was held to be estopped from asserting his title under the mortgage because he had passively acquiesced in a purchase of the same by the defendant under an execution against the mortgagor. Cases of estoppel by silence are numerous; 10 Wall. 289; 31 Pa. 334; 12 Gray 73, 265; 4 Wall. 572; 153 Mass. 97; but silence does not always amount to fraud; 65 Pa. 241; and there is no estoppel by silence where a party has had no opportunity to speak; 63 Pa. 417. See 94 Mich. 34; 2 Misc. Rep. 397.

The estoppel will be limited to the acts which were based upon the representations out of which the estoppel arose; thus, where a sheriff had a writ against A, but took B into custody, upon B's representations that she was A, but detained her after he was informed that she was not A, B was estopped to recover damages for the false arrest but not for the subsequent detention; 2 C. B. N. s. 495. See 50 Ga. 90; 27 Barb. 595; Bisph. Eq. § 292. The acts alleged as an estoppel must be executed and not merely executory; 83 Va. 397; as when a statement is not accepted and acted upon, it does not constitute an estoppel; 73 Ia. 268; 60 Vt. 231. Where an indorser gave notes in compromise of the claims of the indorsee, the acceptance of partial payments by the latter did not estop him from suing on the original notes upon which, under the agreement, the indorser was to be released from liability upon payment of the compromise notes at maturity; 75 Fed. Rep. 852.

It is said that the contract of a person under disability cannot be made good by estoppel; Bisph. Eq. § 293. See 2 Gray 161; 117 Mass. 241; 52 Pa. 400. It makes no difference that the person, if a married woman, falsely represented herself to be sole; 9 Ex. 422; 97 N. C. 106. But estoppel may operate to prevent such a person from enforcing a right. For instance, if a married woman were to induce A to buy property from B, knowing that the title was not in B, but in herself, she would be estopped from asserting her title against A; 3 Bush 702; 8 C. E. Green 477; 30 Ala. 382. The same principle would extend to similar acts on the part of an infant; 3 Hare 503; 9 Ga. 23; but not unless the conduct was intentional and fraudulent; 38 Fed. Rep. 482. An unexecuted contract void as against public policy cannot be validated by invoking the doctrine of estoppel; 71 Mich. 141.

The doctrine that estoppels bind not only parties, but privies of blood, law, and estate, is said to apply equally to this class of estoppels; Bigelow, Estop. 74, 449; but a ward cannot be estopped by an act of his guardian which the other party to the agreement knew to be unauthorized; 145 Ill. 658.

The maxim vigilantibus non dormientibus leges adjuvant specially applies to a claim of equitable estoppel, since in such cases the interposition of equity is extraordinary and restrictive of what but for the estoppel would be a clear legal right; 3 Del. Ch. 9.

The doctrine of estoppel is said to be the basis of another equitable doctrine, that of election; Bisph. Eq. § 294. See ELECTION.

This principle has been applied to cases of dedication of land to the public use; 6 Pet. 438; 19 Pick. 405; of the owner's standing by and seeing land improved upon; 50 N. Y. 222; 68 Pa. 164; 24 Mich. 134; 24 Neb. 702; 84 Ala. 570; 85 Tenn. 171; 30 W. Va. 687; 31 S. C. 153; or sold; 7 Watts 168; 11 N. H. 201; 2 Dana 13; 13 Cal. 359; 1 Woodb. & M. 213; 40 Me. 348; 115 Mo. 613; without making claim; 44 La. Ann. 917; 115 Mo. 613; 37 Fed. Rep. 508; 76 Cal. 260; 69 Tex. 38, 287; 41 Minn. 198; 85 Ky. 260.

ESTOVERS (estouviers, necessities; from estoffer, to furnish). The right or privilege which a tenant has to furnish himself with so much wood from the demised premises as may be sufficient or necessary for his fuel, fences, and other agricultural operations. 2 Bla. Com. 35; Woodf. L. & T. 232; 10 Wend. 639.

Any tenant may claim this right, whether he be a tenant for life, for years, or at will; and that without waiting for any special leave or assignment of the lessor, unless he is restrained by some provision contained in his lease; Shepp. Touchst. 3, n. 1; Chal. R. P. 311. Nor does it appear to be necessary that the wood should all be consumed upon the premises, provided it is taken in good faith for the use of the tenant and his servants, and in reasonable quantities, with the further qualification, also, that no substantial injury be done to the inheritance; 1 Paige, Ch. 573.

Where several tenants are granted the right of estovers from the same estate, it becomes a common of estovers; but no one of such tenants can, by underletting his land to two or more persons, apportion this right among them; for in this way he might surcharge the land, and the rights of his cotenants, as well as those of the landlord, would be thereby invaded. In case, therefore, of the division of a farm among several tenants, neither of the under-tenants can have estovers, and the right, consequently, becomes extinguished; 10 Wend. 650; 4 Co. 36; 8 id. 78. There is much learning in the old books relative to the creation, apportionment, suspension, and extinguishment of these rights, very little of which, however, is applicable to the condition of things in this country, except perhaps in the state of New York, where the entanglements produced by grants of the manor-lands have led to some litigation on the subject. Tayl. Landl. & T. § 220. See 4 Washb. R. P. 99; 7 Bing. 640; 7 Pick. 152; 17 id. 248; 14 Me. 221; 2 N. H. 130; 7 id. 341; 7 Fred. Eq. 197; 6 Yerg. 334; 5 Mas. 13.

The alimony allowed to a wife was called at common law, estovers. See DE ESTOVERIIS HABENDIS.

ESTRAY. Cattle whose owner is unknown. Spelman, Gloss.; 29 Ia. 437; 27 Wis. 422; 4 Oreg. 206; 18 Pick. 426; but see 69 Mo. 205; 14 Tex. 431. Any beast, not wild, found within any lordship, and not owned by any man. Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 297; 2 id. 14. These belonged to the lord of the soil. Britt. c. 17.

Statutes directing unlicensed dogs at large to be killed and animals running at large to be seized and upon notice by a justice, etc., sold at auction, are not unconstitutional; 39 Mich. 451; 82 N. C. 175; 69 Mo. 205; 16 Or. 62.

An animal turned on a range by its owner is not an estray, although its immediate whereabouts is unknown to the owner, unless it wanders from the range and becomes lost; 16 Or. 62.

ESTREAT. A true copy or note of some original writing or record, and especially of fines and amercements imposed by a court, extracted from the record, and certified to a proper officer or officers authorized and required to collect them. Fitzh. N. B. 57, 76. A forfeited recognizance taken out from among the other records for the purpose of being sent up to the exchequer, that the parties might be sued thereon, was said to be estreated. 4 Bla. Com. 253.

ESTREPEMENT. A common-law writ for the prevention of waste.

The same object being attainable by a motion for an injunction in chancery, the writ became obsolete in England, and was explicitly abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

The writ lay at common law to prevent a party in possession from committing waste on an estate the title to which was disputed, after judgment obtained in any real action and before possession was delivered by the sheriff.

But, as waste might be committed in some cases pending the suit, the statute of Gloucester gave another writ of estrepement pendente placito, commanding the sheriff firmly to inhibit the tenant "ne faciat vastum vel strepementum pendente placito dicto indiscusso." By virtue of either of these writs, the sheriff may resist those who commit waste or offer to do so; and he might use sufficient force for the purpose; 3 Bla. Com. 225, 226.

The writ is sometimes directed to the sheriff and the party in possession of the lands, in order to make him amenable to the court as for a contempt in case of his disobedience to the injunction of the writ. At common law the process proper to bring the tenant into court is a venire facias, and thereon an attachment. Upon the defendant's coming in, the plaintiff declares against him. The defendant usually pleads "that he has done no waste contrary to the prohibition of the writ." The issue on this plea is tried by a jury, and in case they find against the defendant they assess damages which the plaintiff recovers. But, as this verdict convicts the defendant of a contempt, the court proceed against him for that cause as in other cases; Co. 2d Inst. 329; Rast. 317; 1 B. & P. 121; 2 Lilly, Reg. Estrepement; 5 Co. 119; Reg. Brev. 76.

In Pennsylvania, by legislative enactment, the remedy by estrepement is extended for the benefit of any owner of lands leased for years or at will, at any time during the continuance or after the expiration of such demise, and due notice given to the tenant to leave the same, agreeably to law; or for any purchaser at sheriff or coroner's sale of lands, etc., after he has been declared the highest bidder by the sheriff or coroner; or for any mortgagee or judgment-creditor, after the lands bound by such judgment or mortgage shall have been condemned by inquisition, or which may be subject to be sold by a writ of venditioni exponas or levari facias. See 10 Viner, Abr. 497; Woodf. Landl. & T. 447; Arch. Civ. Pl. 17; 7 Com. Dig. 659; 24 Pa. 162; 37 id. 260.

ET ADJOURNATUR. And it is adjourned. A phrase used in the old reports, where the argument of a cause was adjourned to another day, or where a second argument was had. 1 Keb. 692, 754; Black, L. Dict.

ET ALIUS (Lat.). And another. The abbreviation et al., sometimes in the plural written et als., is affixed to the name of the first plaintiff or defendant, in entitling a cause, where there are several joined as plaintiffs or defendants.

On an appeal from a judgment in favor of two or more parties, a bond payable to one of the appellees et al. will be good; 3 La. Ann. 313; 12 id. 282. But where a summons should state the parties to the action, the name of one followed by the words et al. is not sufficient; 44 Cal. 630.

ET CÆTERA (Lat.). And others; and other things. See 39 Hun 576; 4 Daly 62.

The addition of the abbreviation etc. to some minor provisions of an agreement for a lease does not introduce such uncertainty as to prevent a decree for specific performance where the material points are clear; Chelmsford, Ld. Ch., in 2 De G. & J. 559; but such an agreement "for letting and taking coals, etc.," was too indefinite a statement of the subject-matter of the agreement to admit of such a decree; 1 De G. M. & G. 80; but an agreement "to do all the painting, papering, repairing, decorating, etc., during the term of the lease" was not so uncertain as to prevent a specific performance; 21 L. J. Rep. 185.

Under a bequest of "all her household furniture and effects, plate, linen, china, glass, books, wearing apparel, etc.," it was claimed that the testatrix had disposed of the general residue of her estate, but she was held by Romilly, M. R., to be intestate "except as to the articles specified in the will and those which are ejusdem generis;" 26 Beav. 220; and the same judge held the words good-will, etc., in a contract, to include "such other things as are necessarily connected with and belong to the good-will, . . . for instance, the use of trade-marks," and a covenant not to engage in similar business in Great Britain for a reasonable time to be limited in the conveyance having regard to the nature of such undertakings. "All these things would be included in the words et cætera;" 28 L. J. Ch. 212; "all my furniture, etc.," passed only property ejusdem generis and not shares of a water-works company; L. R. 11 Eq. 363; "all my money, cattle, farming implements, etc., the paying" certain sums named to testator's two brothers, was, upon looking at the whole will, sufficient to make the widow universal residuary legatee of real and personal estate, the latter being insufficient to pay debts; Jessel, M. R., L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 800.

The abbreviation etc. was formerly much used in pleading to avoid the inconveniences attendant upon making full and half defence. See DEFENCE. It is not generally to be used in solemn instruments; see 6 S. & R. 427; when used in pleadings to avoid repetition, it usually refers to things unnecessary to be stated; 27 Ark. 564.

Where the sense of the abbreviation may be gathered from the preceding words there is sufficient certainty; but where the abbreviation cannot be understood and affects a vital part of the contract or instrument the uncertainty will be fatal.

ET DE HOC PONT SE SUPER PATRIAM (Lat.). And of this he puts himself upon the country. The Latin form of concluding a traverse. See 3 Bla. Com. 313.

ET HOC PARATUS EST VERIFICARE (Lat.). And this he is prepared to verify. The Latin form of concluding a plea in confession and avoidance; that is, where the defendant has confessed all that the plaintiff has set forth, and has pleaded new matter in avoidance. 1 Salk. 2.

ET HOC PETIT QUOD INQUIRATUR PER PATRIAM (Lat.). And this he prays may be inquired of by the country. The conclusion of a plea tendering an issue to the country. 1 Salk. 3.

ET INDE PRODUCIT SECTAM (Lat.). And thereupon he brings suit. The Latin conclusion of a declaration, except against attorneys and other officers of the court. 3 Bla. Com. 295.

ET MODO AD HUNC DIEM (Lat.). And now at this day. The Latin form of the commencement of the record on appearance of the parties.

ET NON (Lat.). And not. These words are sometimes employed in pleading to convey a pointed denial. They have the same effect as "without this," absque hoc. 2 Bouvier, Inst., 2d ed. n. 2985, note.

ET SIC AD PATRIAM (Lat.). And so to the country. A phrase used in the year books, to record an issue to the country.

ET UXOR (Lat. and wife). Used to show that the wife of the grantor is a party to the deed. The abbreviation is et ux.

ETHICS, LEGAL. That branch of moral science which treats of the duties which a member of the legal profession owes to the public, to the court, to his professional brethren, and to his client.

Perhaps the most comprehensive and satisfactory treatment of the subject is the essay of Judge Sharswood, originally embodied in a series of lectures to the law school of the University of Pennsylvania, in 1854. The recent republication of the fifth edition, forty-two years after the issue of the first, attests the interest of the profession in the work, and from it the following is mainly extracted:

The relation of the profession to the public is so intimate and far-reaching, that it "can hardly be over-estimated." This arises from its influence both on legislation and jurisprudence; the latter of which it controls entirely and "the former almost entirely." Accordingly there is involved the study of the true ends of society and government and the conservation of life, liberty, and property, and as means to these ends it is the office of the Bar to diffuse sound principles among the people, to aid in forming correct public opinion, "to maintain the ancient landmarks, to respect authority, and to guard the integrity of the law as a science."

The responsibilities, legal and moral, of the lawyer, arising from his relations to the court, to his professional brethren, and to his client, are thus treated: "Fidelity to the court, fidelity to the client, fidelity to the claims of truth and honor: these are the matters comprised in the oath of office."

"Fidelity to the court requires outward respect in words and actions. The oath, as it has been said, undoubtedly looks to nothing like allegiance to the person of the judge; unless in those cases where his person is so inseparable from his office, that an insult to the one is an indignity to the other. In matters collateral to official duty, the judge is on a level with the members of the Bar, as he is with his fellow-citizens; his title to distinction and respect resting on no other foundation than his virtues and qualities as a man." Per Gibson, C. J., in 5 Rawle 204.

"There are occasions, no doubt, when duty to the interests confided to the charge of the advocate demands firm and decided opposition to the views expressed or the course pursued by the court, nay, even manly and open remonstrance; but this duty may be faithfully performed, and yet that outward respect be preserved, which is here inculcated. Counsel should ever remember how necessary it is for the dignified and honorable administration of justice, upon which the dignity and honor of their profession entirely depend, that the courts and the members of the courts should be regarded with respect by the suitors and people; that on all occasions of difficulty or danger to that department of government, they should have the good opinion and confidence of the public on their side."

"Indeed it is highly important that the temper of an advocate should be always equal. He should most carefully aim to repress everything like excitability or irritability. When passion is allowed to prevail, the judgment is dethroned. Words are spoken, or things done, which the parties afterwards wish could be unsaid or undone. Equanimity and self-possession are qualities of unspeakable value."

"Another plain duty of counsel is to present everything in the cause to the court openly in the course of the public discharge of its duties. It is not often, indeed, that gentlemen of the Bar so far forget themselves as to attempt to exert privately an influence upon the judge, to seek private interviews, or take occasional opportunities of accidental or social meetings to make ex parte statements, or to endeavor to impress their views. . . . They know that such conduct is wrong in itself, and has a tendency to impair confidence in the administration of justice, which ought not only to be pure but unsuspected. A judge will do right to avoid social intercourse with those who obtrude such unwelcome matters upon his moments of relaxation."

"There is one thing, however, of which gentlemen of the Bar are not sufficiently careful,—to discourage and prohibit their clients from pursuing a similar course. The position of the judge in relation to a cause, under such circumstances, is very embarrassing, especially, as is often the case, if he hears a good deal about the matter before he discovers the nature of the business and object of the call upon him."

"Counsel should set their faces against all undue influences of the sort; they are unfaithful to the court if they allow any improper means of the kind to be resorted to. Judicem nec de obtinendo jure orari oportet nec de injuria exorari. It may be in place to remark here that the counsel in a cause ought to avoid all unnecessary communication with the jurors before or during any trial in which he may be concerned. He should enforce the same duty upon his client."

"There is another duty to the court, and that is, to support and maintain it in its proper province wherever it comes in conflict with the co-ordinate tribunal—the jury."

"It need hardly be added that a practitioner ought to be particularly cautious, in all his dealings with the court, to use no deceit, imposition, or evasion—to make no statements of facts which he does not know or believe to be true—to distinguish carefully what lies in his own knowledge from what he has merely derived from his instructions—to present no paper-books intentionally garbled. 'Sir Matthew Hale abhorred,' says his biographer, 'those too common faults of misreciting witnesses, quoting precedents or books falsely, or asserting anything confidently; by which ignorant juries and weak judges are too often wrought upon.'"

"The topic of fidelity to the client involves the most difficult questions in the consideration of the duty of a lawyer."

"He is legally responsible to his client only for the want of ordinary care and ordinary skill. That constitutes gross negligence. It is extremely difficult to fix upon any rule which shall define what is negligence in a given case. The habits and practice of men are widely different in this regard. It has been laid down that if the ordinary and average degree of diligence and skill could be determined, it would furnish the true rule. Though such be the extent of legal liability, that of moral responsibility is wider. Entire devotion to the interest of the client, warm zeal in the maintenance and defence of his rights, and the exertion of his utmost learning and ability,—these are the higher points which can only satisfy the truly conscientious practitioner."

"But what are the limits of his duty when the legal demands or interests of his client conflict with his own sense of what is just and right? This is a problem by no means of easy solution. That lawyers are as often the ministers of injustice as of justice, is the common accusation in the mouth of gain-sayers against the profession. It is said there must be a right and a wrong side to every lawsuit. In the majority of cases it must be apparent to the advocate on which side is the justice of the cause; yet he will maintain, and often with the appearance of warmth and earnestness, that side which he must know to be unjust, and the success of which will be a wrong to the opposite party. Is he not then a participator in the injustice? It may be answered in general: Every case is to be decided, by the tribunal before which it is brought for adjudication, upon the evidence, and upon the principles of law applicable to the facts as they appear upon the evidence."

"Now the lawyer is not merely the agent of the party; he is an officer of the court. The party has a right to have his case decided upon the law and the evidence, and to have every view presented to the minds of the judges which can legitimately bear upon the question. This is the office which the advocate performs. He is not morally responsible for the act of the party in maintaining an unjust cause, nor for the error of the court, if they fall into error, in deciding it in his favor. The court or jury ought certainly to hear and weigh both sides; and the office of the counsel is to assist them by doing that which the client in person, from want of learning, experience, and address, is unable to do in a proper manner. The lawyer who refuses his professional assistance because in his judgment the case is unjust and indefensible, usurps the functions of both judge and jury."

"As an answer to any sweeping objection made to the profession in general, the view thus presented may be quite satisfactory. It by no means follows, however, as a principle of private action for the advocate, that all causes are to be taken by him indiscriminately, and conducted with a view to one single end, success. It is much to be feared, however, that the prevailing tone of professional ethics leads practically to this result. He has an undoubted right to refuse a retainer, and decline to be concerned in any cause, at his discretion. It is a discretion to be wisely and justly exercised. When he has once embarked in a case, he cannot retire from it without the consent of his client or the approbation of the court."

"Lord Brougham, in his justly celebrated defence of the Queen, went to very extravagant lengths upon this subject; no doubt he was led by the excitement of so great an occasion to say what cool reflection and sober reason certainly never can approve. 'An advocate,' said he, 'in the discharge of his duty knows but one person in all the world, and that person is his client. To save that client by all means and expedients, and at all hazards and costs to other persons, and among them to himself, is his first and only duty; and in performing this duty he must not regard the alarm, the torments, the destruction he may bring upon others. Separating the duty of a patriot from that of an advocate, he must go on, reckless of consequences; though it should be his unhappy lot to involve his country in confusion.'"

"On the other hand, and as illustrative of the practical difficulty which this question presented to a man with as nice a perception of moral duty as perhaps ever lived, it is said by Bishop Burnet of Sir Matthew Hale: 'If he saw a cause was unjust, he for a great while would not meddle further in it, but to give his advice that it was so; if the parties after that would go on, they were to seek another counsellor, for he would assist none in acts of injustice; if he found the cause doubtful or weak in point of law, he always advised his clients to agree their business. Yet afterwards he abated much of the scrupulosity he had about causes that appeared at first unjust, upon this occasion: there were two causes brought him which, by the ignorance of the party or their attorney, were so ill-represented to him that they seemed to be very bad; but he inquiring more narrowly into them, found they were really very good and just; so after this he slackened much of his former strictness of refusing to meddle in causes upon the ill circumstances that appeared in them at first.'"

"There is a distinction to be made between the case of prosecution and defence for crimes; between appearing for a plaintiff in pursuit of an unjust claim, and for a defendant in resisting what appears to be a just one. Every man, accused of an offence, has a constitutional right to a trial according to law; even if guilty, he ought not to be convicted and undergo punishment unless upon legal evidence; and with all the forms which have been devised for the security of life and liberty. These are the panoply of innocence, when unjustly arraigned; and guilt cannot be deprived of it, without removing it from innocence. He is entitled, therefore, to the benefit of counsel to conduct his defence, to cross-examine the witnesses for the State, to scan, with legal knowledge, the forms of the proceeding against him, to present his defence in an intelligible shape, to suggest all those reasonable doubts which may arise from the evidence as to his guilt, and to see that if he is convicted, it is according to law."

On the subject of contingent fees Judge Sharswood says:

"Regard should be had to the general usage of the profession, especially as to the rates of commission to be charged for the collection of undefended claims. Except in this class of cases, agreements between counsel and client that the compensation of the former shall depend upon final success in the lawsuit—in other words, contingent fees—however common such agreements may be, are of a very dangerous tendency, and to be declined in all ordinary cases. In making his charge, after the business committed to him has been completed, an attorney may well take into consideration the general ability of his client to pay, so he may also consider the pecuniary benefit which may have been derived from his services. For a poor man, who is unable to pay at all, there may be a general understanding that the attorney is to be liberally compensated in case of success. What is objected to is an agreement to receive a certain part or proportion of the sum or subject-matter, in the event of a recovery, and nothing otherwise."

He considers that the practice should be discouraged not necessarily on the consideration of unlawfulness but of morality and its effect on the lawyer.

"It is to be observed, then, that such a contract changes entirely the relation of counsel to the cause. It reduces him from his high position of an officer of the court and a minister of justice, to that of a party litigating his own claim. Having now a deep personal interest in the event of the controversy, he will cease to consider himself subject to the ordinary rules of professional conduct. He is tempted to make success, at all hazards and by all means, the sole end of his exertions. He becomes blind to the merits of the case, and would find it difficult to persuade himself no matter what state of facts might be developed in the progress of the proceedings, as to the true character of the transaction, that it was his duty to retire from it."

"He has now an interest, which gives him a right to speak as principal, not merely to advise as to the law, and abide by instructions. It is either unfair to him or unfair to the client. If he thinks the result doubtful, he throws all his time, learning, and skill away upon what, in his estimation, is an uncertain chance. He cannot work with the proper spirit in such a case. If he believes that the result will be success, he secures in this way a higher compensation than he is justly entitled to receive."

"It is an undue encouragement to litigation. Men, who would not think of entering on a lawsuit, if they knew that they must compensate their lawyers whether they win or lose, are ready upon such a contingent agreement to try their chances with any kind of a claim. It makes the law more of a lottery than it is."

"The worst consequence is yet to be told,—its effect upon professional character. It turns lawyers into higglers with their clients. Of course it is not meant that these are always its actual results; but they are its inevitable tendencies, in many instances its practical working. To drive a favorable bargain with the suitor in the first place, the difficulties of the case are magnified and multiplied, and advantage taken of that very confidence which led him to intrust his interests to the protection of the advocate. The parties are necessarily not on an equal footing in making such a bargain. A high sense of honor may prevent counsel from abusing his position and knowledge; but all have not such high and nice sense of honor. If our example goes towards making the practice of agreements for contingent fees general, we assist in placing such temptations in the way of our professional brethren of all degrees—the young, the inexperienced, and the unwary, as well as those whose age and experience have taught them that a lawyer's honor is his brightest jewel, and to be guarded from being sullied, even by the breath of suspicion, with the most sedulous care."

On the same subject Mr. Eli K. Price, in an essay on Limitations and Liens, thus expresses his opinion: "And further permit me to advise and earnestly to admonish you, for the preservation of professional honor and integrity, to avoid the temptation for bargaining for fees or shares of any estate or other claim, contingent upon a successful recovery. The practice directly leads to a disturbance of the peace of society, and to an infidelity to the professional obligation promised to the court, in which is implied an absence of desire or effort of one in the ministry of the temple of justice, to obtain a success that is not just as well as lawful. It is true, as a just equivalent for many cases honorably advocated and incompetently paid by the poor, a compensation may and will be received, the more liberal because of the ability produced by success; but let it be the result of no bargain, exacted as a price before the service is rendered, but rather the grateful return for benefits already conferred. If rigid in your terms, in protection of the right of the profession to a just and honorable compensation, let it rather be in the amount of the required retainer, when it will have its proper influence in the discouragement of litigation." See CHAMPERTY.

In an address of Joseph B. Warner before the American Bar Association on "The Responsibilities of the Lawyer," will be found, probably, the latest discussion of this subject. It is said upon the much-discussed question of how an honorable man can advocate what he knows to be a bad cause, that it is important to look at the profession from the non-professional standpoint, and that the familiar argument that every man has the right to have the law fairly applied to his case is a solution, less satisfactory in theory than in practice, of the problem as it confronts the individual lawyer. This assumes the presentation of a cause by an official spokesman before a competent and impartial tribunal. The theory might fit a mere intermediary in the public function of the administration of justice, but does not answer when, as in modern practice, it concerns the intimate and confidential adviser of the client who is thoroughly identified with the client at the inception and during the preparation for the progress of the trial at every stage. "Such being the lawyer's immersion in his client's cause, it is out of the question to consider him merely as a perfunctory representative. His responsibility for litigation in its inception, its progress, and its results, must be, to some extent at least, commensurate with his identification with the cause. If he wholly adopts the client he must acknowledge the relationship. This leaves the lawyer's responsibility where he chooses to put it. He may limit it by limiting his relations to those external services which are guardedly professional; he may, on the other hand, enter so far into the case as to become as answerable for it as the client is, or even more. This is, I think, the position which the lawyer must accept. He cannot make a case his own, and push it as if he were a party, and yet disclaim responsibility for it on the ground that his connection with it is wholly official. He must openly accept the consequences of whatever he does, and expect no shelter from any theory of the professional relation which does not squarely recognize all the facts."

Nor does Mr. Warner consider that the unavoidable influence of powerful counsel on courts is to be disregarded as a disturbing factor in the cause of justice. While the danger may be slight as to courts, with juries it is by no means so, and "in proportion as the lawyer purposely carries a jury against the facts, or beyond the facts, so far the verdict is his act. To that responsibility he must be held." The shadowy impression of an obligation to undertake any cause is dismissed as untenable and inconsistent with present conditions. The counsel is in a measure responsible for the cause he has chosen to take. It is true he is not required to settle all doubts against his client, and due regard is to be had for the uncertainty of the law and the unquestioned fact that the lawyer must administer it as it is, and not in each case sit in judgment upon its wisdom or policy. The law, therefore, he does not control, but as to facts there is grave responsibility. No special rule can be formulated to distinguish between true and false advocacy, and allowance is to be made for the avowedly partisan attitude of the counsel, but "from a piece of false evidence, or a false statement in argument, every decent lawyer starts back. . . . Certainly nothing could be worse than to give any sanction whatever to a theory which, though never avowed, may sometimes be tacitly assumed, that the practice of the law is a game, or a species of warfare, in which there may be a few rules agreed on, but in the main there is but one thing to consider, and that is victory. As in the strange, unethical ethics of war you may not use poisoned bullets, but may use explosive shells, and may not poison the well in the besieged city, but may destroy the provision train on its way thither, so in a court of law, on this monstrous theory, though you may not actually suborn witnesses, you may take advantage of every piece of falsehood which in any other way can pass in, undetected, in evidence or argument. But if law is a game, it is a game in which the stakes are human happiness and character; if it is war, it is not a war for plunder, but one for principles, which cannot be set up with glory in the end if they have been first defiled and trampled under foot by the victors." The subject is thus fairly summed up: "At last the moralities of the practice of the law must rest on the individual lawyer, and perhaps little more can be said by way of particular rules for professional conduct than that the lawyer is under all the obligations which the highest standard, rightly understood, imposes on any man. From these he neither gets, nor claims, an exemption by reason of any convention which would permit falsehood, nor by reason of working within a system which, to some extent, settles conduct by general rules of law without regard to the moral aspect of particular cases."

Our system is not devised primarily to discover truth, nor is the lawyer chiefly a searcher after truth. If he were, his methods would seem strange, indeed. Our administration of law is made, or rather has grown, by forces which are virtually the great forces of nature, to meet human needs, to control the elemental passions of men, to regulate the affairs of life. . . . It has the imperfections and the contradictions of all human things. It does not always conform to rules, however unquestionable and right. It touches all of life and takes on both good and evil by the contact. In its critical moments, when it is centred in a trial in court, it is the modern phase of all ancient strife, the visible struggle, old as the world, of all the passions of anger, hate, greed, and avarice, less wild than of old, but still full of their inherited spirit, and now forced into an arena which, excepting war itself, is left as the only battlefield for the irrepressible fighting instincts of the race.

That these contests should not always proceed in irreproachable methods and infallibly end in right results, is not to be wondered at: that the men who engage in them as trained contestants sometimes fight with indefensible tactics must be laid to traits which yet survive in the human animal. The vigorous participation in affairs, with a purpose to do right, is the most wholesome moral tonic that our nature can have. This way lies open in the practice of the law. It cannot be said to be free from perplexities. The practitioner will not find himself in a plain way in which the fool cannot err. But he will find himself in the midst of abundant opportunities for service to mankind, will see before him ideals among the highest which our minds can reach, and will have the encouragement of examples which are not behind the farthest mark that human nature has touched in its approach to justice.

EUNDO MORANDO ET REDEUNDO (Lat.). This Latin phrase signifies going, remaining, and returning. It is employed in cases where a person is privileged from arrest, in order to give him the freedom necessary to the performance of his respective obligations, to signify that he is protected from arrest eundo, morando et redeundo.

EUNOMY. Equal laws and a well-adjusted constitution of government.

EUNUCH (Lat. eunuchus from the Gr. ευνουχος, one who had charge of the sleeping apartments). A man whose organs of generation have been so far removed or disorganized that he is rendered incapable of reproducing his species. Domat, liv. prel. tit. 2, s. 1, n. 10.

EVASION (Lat. evadere, to avoid). A subtle device to set aside the truth or escape the punishment of the law: as, if a man should tempt another to strike him first, in order that he might have an opportunity of returning the blow with impunity. He is, nevertheless, punishable, because he becomes himself the aggressor in such a case. Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 31, §§ 24, 25; Bac. Abr. Fraud, A.

EVENT. The consequences of anything, the issue, conclusion, end; that in which an action, operation, or series of operations, terminates. 11 Barb. 473.

EVICTION. Deprivation of the possession of lands or tenements.

Originally and technically, the dispossession must be by judgment of law; if otherwise, it was an ouster; 2 Wend. 563, note; 7 id. 285; but the necessity of legal process was long ago abandoned in England; 4 Term 617; and in this country also it is settled that there need not be legal process; 4 Hill 645; 3 Dev. 200; 54 Miss. 450. The word is difficult to define with technical accuracy; 17 C. B. 30; but it may be fairly stated that any actual entry and dispossession, adversely and lawfully made under paramount title, will be an eviction; Rawle, Cov. § 133.

Total eviction takes place when the possessor is wholly deprived of his rights in the premises. Partial eviction takes place when the possessor is deprived of only a portion of them; as, if a third person comes in and ejects him from the possession of half his land, or establishes a right to some easement over it, by a title which is prior to that under which he holds.

With respect to the demised premises, an eviction consists in taking from a tenant some part of the premises of which he was in possession, not in refusing to put him in possession of something which by the agreement with his landlord he should have enjoyed; 12 Wend. 529. And in order to effect a suspension of rent there must be something equivalent to an expulsion from the premises, and not a mere trespass, or disturbance in the enjoyment of them; 4 Wend. 505; 5 Sandf. 542; T. Jones 148; 1 Yerg. 379; 120 Mass. 284. The entry of a landlord upon demised premises for the purpose of rebuilding does not operate as an eviction, where it was with the tenant's assent and not to his entire seclusion; 151 Pa. 101.

It is not necessary, however, in order to produce the eviction of a tenant, that there should be an actual physical expulsion; for a landlord may do many acts tending to diminish the enjoyment of the premises, short of an expulsion, which will amount to an eviction in law: as, if he erect a nuisance so near the demised premises as to deprive the tenant of the use of them, or if he otherwise intentionally disturb the tenant's enjoyment to such an extent as to injure his business or destroy the comfort of himself and family, it will amount to an eviction; 8 Cow. 727; 2 Ired. 350; Woodf. Landl. & T. 1096; 52 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 583; 16 N. Y. Sup. 163; 44 Mo. App. 279; 91 Pa. 322; 106 Mass. 201; 49 Vt. 109.

In New York it is said that eviction from the whole premises leased relieves the tenant from the payment of rent; but when the eviction is from a part only, the rent will be apportioned; 46 N. Y. 370. When the landlord's wrongful act interferes more or less with the beneficial enjoyment of the premises, but leaves them intact, the act is merely a trespass, though the tenant suffer injury by it; ibid.

Where the landlord, instead of resorting to the means provided by law, takes upon himself without authority to remove the property of his tenant and turn him out, he will be liable in damages, though it were effected without personal violence in the tenant's absence; 44 La. Ann. 514.

Constructive eviction may arise from any wrongful act of the lessor which deprives the tenant of the full enjoyment of the leased premises: as, by forbidding an under-tenant to pay rent to the tenant; 25 Ill. 587; building a fence in front of the premises to cut off the tenant's access thereto; 9 Allen 421; erecting a permanent structure which renders unfit for use two rooms; 106 Mass. 201; refusal to do an act indispensably necessary to enable the tenant to carry on the business for which the premises were leased: as, when premises were let for a grog-shop, the landlord refused to sign the necessary documents required by statute to enable the tenant to obtain a license; 42 Md. 236; also where lessor tears down an adjoining building, making it evident that lessee's building would fall; 142 N. Y. 263. And when a landlord, who owned another building adjoining that occupied by a tenant, the two being constructed together, tore the former down, rendering the latter unsafe for occupancy, and then procured its condemnation and destruction by the city authorities, these acts constituted an eviction, for which the tenant might recover damages; and the landlord could not avail himself of the action of the city authorities as a defence; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 406.

But a mere failure of the landlord to make repairs, although such act may cause the place to be untenable, will not amount to an eviction; 23 La. Ann. 59; 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 412; 72 Pa. 285. See 49 Vt. 109. But the doctrine of constructive eviction amounts only to a right to abandon the premises; it is not a defence against an action for rent when the tenant waives the eviction and remains in possession; 20 N. Y. 281.

The remedy for an eviction depends chiefly upon the covenants in the deed under which the party held. When the grantee suffers a total eviction, if he has a covenant of seisin or for quiet enjoyment, he recovers from the grantor the consideration-money which he paid for the land, with interest, and not the enhanced value of the premises, whether such value has been created by the expenditure of money in improvements thereon, or by any other more general cause; 14 Wend. 38; 2 Mass. 432. And this seems to be the general rule in the United States; 13 Johns. 50; 4 Dall. 441; Cooke 447; 1 Hen. & M. 202; 4 Halst. 139; 2 Bibb 272.

With respect to a lessee, however, who pays no purchase-money, the rule of damages upon an eviction is different; for he recovers nothing, except such expenses as he has been put to in defending his possession; and as to any improvements he may have made upon the premises, he stands upon the same general footing with a purchaser. The rents reserved in a lease, where no other consideration is paid, are regarded as a just equivalent for the use of the demised premises. Upon an eviction the rent ceases, and the lessee is thereby relieved from a burden which must be deemed equal to the benefit he would have derived from the continued enjoyment of the property; 2 Hill 105; 1 App. D. C. 447; 44 Mo. 164; 49 Vt. 109; 59 Pa. 420; 25 Ill. 587. And see 1 Duer, N. Y. 343; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 317; 147 Ill. 634; 3 Ind. App. 54. It is no defence, however, to an action for rent which was due at the time of the eviction; 8 Misc. Rep. 307.

When the eviction is only partial, the damages to be recovered under the covenant of seisin are a ratable part of the original price, and they are to bear the same ratio to the whole consideration that the value of the land to which the title has failed bears to the value of the whole tract. The contract is not rescinded, so as to entitle the vendee to the whole consideration-money, but only to the amount of the relative value of the part lost; 5 Johns. 19; 12 id. 126; 4 Kent 462. See 6 Bac. Abr. 44; 1 Saund. 204, 322 a; 117 Mass. 262; 22 Gratt. 109; 43 N. J. L. 480. 71 Fed. Rep. 226. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

EVIDENCE. That which tends to prove or disprove any matter in question, or to influence the belief respecting it. Belief is produced by the consideration of something presented to the mind. The matter thus presented, in whatever shape it may come, and through whatever material organ it is derived, is evidence. Prof. Parker, Lectures on Medical Jurisprudence, in Dartmouth College.

The word evidence, in legal acceptance, includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved. 1 Greenl. Ev. c. I. § 1; Will, Cir. Ev. 1. Testimony is not synonymous with evidence; 17 Ind. 272; the latter is the more comprehensive term; Whart. Cr. L. § 783; and includes all that may be submitted to the jury whether it be the statement of witnesses, or the contents of papers, documents, or records, or the inspection of whatever the jury may be permitted to examine and consider during the trial; Will, Cir. Ev. 2; 48 Ill. App. 230.

The means sanctioned by law of ascertaining in a judicial proceeding the truth respecting a question of fact. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1823. And the law of evidence is declared to be a collection of general rules established by law:

1. For declaring what is to be taken as true without proof.
2. For declaring the presumptions of law, both disputable and conclusive.
3. For the production of legal evidence.

4. For the exclusion of what is not legal.

5. For determining in certain cases the value and effect of evidence. Id. § 1825.

"The rules of evidence," says a late discriminating writer, "are the maxims which the sagacity and experience of ages have established, as the best means of discriminating truth from error, and of contracting as far as possible the dangerous power of judicial discretion." Will, Cir. Ev. 2.

That which is legally submitted to a jury, to enable them to decide upon the questions in dispute, or issue, as pointed out by the pleadings, and distinguished from all comment and argument, is termed evidence. 1 Stark. Ev. pt. 1, § 3.

Evidence may be considered with reference to its instruments, its nature, its legal character, its effect, its object, and the modes of its introduction.

The instruments of evidence, in the legal acceptance of the term, are:—

1. Judicial notice or recognition. There are divers things of which courts take judicial notice, without the introduction of proof by the parties: such as the territorial extent of their jurisdiction, local divisions of their own countries, seats of courts, all public matters directly concerning the general government, the ordinary course of nature, divisions of time, the meanings of words, and, generally, of whatever ought to be generally known in the jurisdiction. If the judge needs information on subjects, he will seek it from such sources as he deems authentic. See 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 2; Steph. Ev. art. 58; Tayl. Ev. 3; JUDICIAL NOTICE.

2. Public records; the registers of official transactions made by officers appointed for the purpose; as, the public statutes, the judgments and proceedings of courts, etc.

3. Judicial writings: such as inquisitions, depositions, etc.

4. Public documents having a semi-official character: as, the statute-books published under the authority of the government, documents printed by the authority of congress, etc.

5. Private writings: as, deeds, contracts, wills.

6. Testimony of witnesses.

7. Personal inspection, by the jury or tribunal whose duty it is to determine the matter in controversy: as, a view of the locality by the jury, to enable them to determine the disputed fact, or the better to understand the testimony, or inspection of any machine or weapon which is produced in the cause.

Real evidence is evidence of the thing or object which is produced in court. When, for instance, the condition or appearance of any thing or object is material to the issue, and the thing or object itself is produced in court for the inspection of the tribunal, with proper testimony as to its identity, and, if necessary, to show that it has existed since the time at which the issue in question arose, this object or thing becomes itself "real evidence" of its condition or appearance at the time in question. 1 Greenl.

Ev. § 13 a, note. For a full discussion of this species of evidence, see 50 N. J. L. 491.

There are rules prescribing the limits and regulating the use of these different instruments of evidence, appropriate to each class.

In its nature, evidence is direct, or presumptive, or circumstantial.

Direct evidence is that means of proof which tends to show the existence of a fact in question, without the intervention of the proof of any other fact.

It is that evidence which, if believed, establishes the truth of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. Evidence is direct and positive when the very facts in dispute are sworn to by those who have the actual knowledge of them by means of their senses. 1 Phill. Ev. 116; 1 Stark. Ev. 19; Tayl. Ev. 84. In one sense, there is but little direct or positive proof, or such proof as is acquired by means of one's own sense; all other evidence is presumptive; but, in common acceptance, direct and positive evidence is that which is communicated by one who has actual knowledge of the fact.

Presumptive evidence is that which shows the existence of one fact, by proof of the existence of another or others, from which the first may be inferred; because the fact or facts shown have a legitimate tendency to lead the mind to the conclusion that the fact exists which is sought to be proved.

Presumptive evidence has been divided into presumptions of law and presumptions of fact.

Presumptions of law, adopted from motives of public policy, are those which arise in certain cases by force of the rules of law, directing an inference to be drawn from proof of the existence of a particular fact or facts. They may be conclusive or inconclusive.

Conclusive presumptions are those which admit of no averment or proof to the contrary. Thus, the records of a court, except in some proceeding to amend them, are conclusive evidence of the matter there recorded, being presumed to be rightly made up.

Inconclusive or disputable presumptions of law are those where a fact is presumed to exist, either from the general experience of mankind, or from policy, or from proof of the existence of certain other facts, until something is offered to show the contrary. Thus, the law presumes a man to be sane until the contrary appears, and to be innocent of the commission of a crime until he is proved to be guilty. So, the existence of a person, or of a particular state of things, being shown, the law presumes the person or state of things to continue until something is offered to conflict with the presumption. See Best, Presumption, ch. ii.

But the presumption of life may be rebutted by another presumption. Where a party has been absent from his place of residence for the term of seven years, without having been heard of, this raises a presumption of his death, until it is encountered by some evidence showing that he is actually alive, or was so within that period.

Presumptions of fact are not the subject of fixed rules, but are merely natural presumptions, such as appear, from common experience, to arise from the particular circumstances of any case. Some of these are "founded upon a knowledge of the human character, and of the motives, passions, and feelings by which the mind is usually influenced." 1 Stark. Ev. 27.

They may be said to be the conclusions drawn by the mind from the natural connection of the circumstances disclosed in each case, or, in other words, from circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is sometimes used as synonymous with presumptive evidence, but not with strict accuracy; for presumptive evidence is not necessarily and in all cases what is usually understood by circumstantial evidence. The latter is that evidence which tends to prove a disputed fact by proof of other facts which have a legitimate tendency, from the laws of nature, the usual connection of things, and the ordinary transactions of business, etc., to lead the mind to a conclusion that the fact exists which is sought to be established. See 1 Stark. Ev. 478; Whart. Ev. 1, 2, 15.

The latest writer on this subject thus states the distinction: the word presumption, ex vi termini, imports an inference from facts known, based upon previous experience of the ordinary connection between the two, and, the word itself implies a certain relation between fact and inference. Circumstances, however, generally but not necessarily lead to particular inferences; for the facts may be indisputable, and yet their relation to the principal fact may be only apparent, not real; and even where the connection is real, the deduction may be erroneous. Circumstantial and presumptive evidence differ therefore as genus and species. Will, Cir. Ev. 17.

Presumptive evidence may sometimes be the result, to some extent, of any arbitrary rule—as in the case of the presumption of death after an absence of seven years without being heard of—derived by analogy from certain statutes.

The judge and the jury draw conclusions from circumstantial evidence, and find one fact from the existence of other facts shown to them,—some of the presumptions being so clear and certain that they have become fixed as rules of law, and others having greater or less weight according to the circumstances of the case, leaving the matter of fact inquired about in doubt until the proper tribunal to determine the question draws the conclusion.

In its legal character, evidence is primary or secondary, and prima facie or conclusive.

Primary evidence is the best evidence, or that proof which most certainly exhibits the true state of facts to which it relates. The law requires this, and rejects secondary or inferior evidence when it is attempted to be substituted for evidence of a higher or superior nature. For example, when a written contract has been entered into, and the object is to prove what it was, it is requisite to produce the original writing, if it is to be attained; and in that case no copy or other inferior evidence will be received.

This is a rule of policy, grounded upon a reasonable suspicion that the substitution of inferior for better evidence arises from sinister motives, and an apprehension that the best evidence, if produced, would alter the case to the prejudice of the party. This rule relates not to the measure and quantity of evidence, but to its quality when compared with some other evidence of superior degree.

To this general rule there are several exceptions. 1. As it refers to the quality rather than to the quantity of evidence, it is evident that the fullest proof that every case admits of is not requisite: if, therefore, there are several eye-witnesses to a fact, it may be sufficiently proved by one only. 2. It is not always requisite, when the matter to be proved has been reduced to writing, that the writing should be produced: as, if the narrative of a fact to be proved has been committed to writing, it may yet be proved by parol evidence. A receipt for the payment of money, for example, will not exclude parol evidence of payment; 4 Esp. 213. And see 3 B. & Ald. 566; 3 Cra. 51; 1 Dak. 372; 78 N. Y. 82; 41 Minn. 169. The evidence of a father and mother, cognizant of their child's birth, is primary evidence of its date or the age of the child, although there is a written record thereof in the family Bible; 49 Kan. 237; 34 S. C. 118. 1 McCord 164; 73 Wis. 248. A stenographer's notes of the testimony of a witness are not the best evidence of such testimony, so as to prevent any other person who was present from testifying in relation thereto; 35 S. C. 537; 17 Misc. Rep. 157. Documentary evidence is not the best evidence of marriage; 72 Mich. 184. Oral admissions of a party against himself as to the contents of a writing are primary evidence; 62 Conn. 542.

Secondary evidence is that species of proof which is admissible when the primary evidence cannot be produced, and which becomes by that event the best evidence that can be adduced. 3 Yeates 530.

But before such evidence can be allowed it must be clearly made to appear that the superior evidence is not to be had; 87 Ga. 727; 91 Mich. 229. The person who possesses it must be applied to, whether he be a stranger or the opposite party: in the case of a stranger, a subpoena and attachment, when proper, must be taken out and served; and in the case of a party, notice to produce such primary evidence must be proved before the secondary evidence will be admitted; 7 S. & R. 116; 3 B. & Ald. 296; 61 Pa. 328; 149 id. 25; 72 Mich. 599; 7 Exch. 639; 94 Ala. 602. See 45 Mo. App. 497; 83 Ala. 401; 25 Neb. 57. Secondary evidence of the contents of a written contract is inadmissible in the absence of proper diligence to secure the original; 70 Tex. 745;

84 Ala. 592. After proof of the due execution of the original, the contents should be proved by a counterpart, if there be one, for this is the next best evidence; and it seems that no evidence of a copy is admissible until proof has been given that the counterpart cannot be produced; 6 Term 236. If there be no counterpart, a copy may be proved in evidence by any witness who knows that it is a copy, from having compared it with the original; Bull. N. P. 254; 6 Binn. 234; 8 Mass. 273. If regularly recorded, an office copy may be given in evidence. If there be no copy, the party may produce an abstract, or even give parol evidence of the contents of a deed; 10 Mod. 8; 6 Term 556. A transcribed telegraphic message which is actually delivered is primary evidence, and if lost or destroyed its contents may be proved by parol; 50 Minn. 424. See 118 Ind. 98; 127 Ill. 652. Letter-press copies of writings are secondary evidence; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 454.

If books or papers necessary as evidence in the courts of one state be in the possession of a person living in another state, secondary evidence without further showing may be given to prove the contents of such papers, and notice to produce them is unnecessary; 20 Wall. 125. See 52 Minn. 174. Where the attesting witness to a deed lives out of the state, secondary evidence of its execution is admissible; 157 Mass. 272.

It has been decided in England that there are no degrees in secondary evidence; and when a party has laid the foundation for such evidence, he may prove the contents of a deed by parol, although it appear that an attested copy is in existence; 6 C. & P. 206; 8 id. 389; 7 M. & W. 102. It is urged on the one hand that the rule requiring the best evidence has reference to its nature, not to its strength, and the argument ab inconvenienti is invoked against the extension of the rule recognizing degrees. On the other hand it is contended that such an extension is an equitable one and rests on the same principle which forbids the introduction of any secondary evidence while the primary is available. English cases cited in favor of the recognition of degrees are said to be not so much decisions of the point as dicta, as they refer to it as a rule existing but not involved in the case; 10 Mod. 8; 2 Atk. 71; 1 Nev. & Per. 8. But in the latter case the rule is doubted, and in 6 C. & P. 359 impliedly denied by Patteson, J., as it is also by Parke, J.; 6 C. & P. 81; id. 206. See 8 Dowl. 389; 3 Scott, N. R. 577. The question is not settled in the United States; Greenl. Ev. § 84, note; and the United States Supreme Court, after saying they do not adopt the English rule, observe that the rule of exclusion or admission must be so applied as to promote the ends of justice, and guard against fraud, surprise, and imposition; 20 Wall. 226. See 3 Wash. St. 166; 68 Fed. Rep. 864. The American doctrine seems to be "that if from the nature of the case itself it is manifest that a more satisfactory kind of secondary evidence exists, the party will be required to produce it; but that when the nature of the case does not of itself disclose the existence of such better evidence, the objector must not only prove its existence, but also must prove that it was known to the other party in time to have been produced at the trial;" 1 Gr. Ev. § 84, note; 7 Tex. 315; 2 Cold. 321; 28 Ala. 250; 56 Ga. 258; 75 Ill. 315; 62 Me. 480; 20 Wall. 226; 9 Pet. 663. In an action against a stockholder for an assessment, without deciding whether the law recognizes degrees of secondary evidence, oral testimony of the contents of the notice of the call was admitted, when the existence of a copy did not appear; 53 Minn. 381. In an action for work and labor where the time-book had been burned but there was proof that plaintiff had made a copy of the entries against the defendant, the copy was held best evidence and parol proof was excluded in the absence of proof of the loss of the copy; 98 Mich. 168.

Prima facie evidence is that which appears to be sufficient proof respecting the matter in question, until something appears to controvert it, but which may be contradicted or controlled.

Conclusive evidence is that which establishes the fact: as in the instance of conclusive presumptions.

Evidence may be conclusive for some purposes but not for others.

Admissibility of evidence. In considering the legal character of evidence, we are naturally led to the rules which regulate its competency and admissibility, although it is not precisely accurate to say that evidence is in its legal character competent or incompetent; because what is incompetent for the consideration of the tribunal which is to pronounce the decision is not, strictly speaking, evidence.

But the terms incompetent evidence and inadmissible evidence are often used to designate what is not to be heard as evidence: as, witnesses are spoken of as competent or incompetent.

As the common law excludes certain classes of persons from giving testimony in particular cases, because it deems their exclusion conducive, in general, to the discovery of the truth, so it excludes certain materials and statements from being introduced as testimony in a cause, for a similar reason. Thus, as a general rule, it requires witnesses to speak to facts within their own knowledge, and excludes hearsay evidence.

Hearsay is the evidence, not of what the witness knows himself, but of what he has heard from others.

Such mere recitals or assertions cannot be received in evidence for many reasons, but principally for the following:—first, that the party making such declarations is not on oath; and, secondly, because the party against whom it operates has no opportunity of cross-examination; 1 Phil. Ev. 185. See, for other reasons, 1 Stark. Ev. pt. 1, p. 44; Tayl. Ev. 508. The general rule excluding hearsay evidence does not apply to those declarations to which the party is privy, or to admissions which he himself has made.

Many facts, from their very nature, either absolutely or usually exclude direct evidence to prove them, being such as are either necessarily or usually imperceptible by the senses, and therefore incapable of the ordinary means of proof. These are questions of pedigree or relationship, character, prescription, custom, boundary, and the like; as also questions which depend upon the exercise of particular skill and judgment. Such facts, some from their nature, and others from their antiquity, do not admit of the ordinary and direct means of proof by living witnesses: and, consequently, resort must be had to the best means of proof which the nature of the case affords. The rule permitting a resort to hearsay evidence, however, in cases of pedigree extends only to the admission of declarations by deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person in question, and not to declarations by servants, friends, or neighbors; 75 Fed. Rep. 217. And "general reputation in the family," which is admissible in matters of pedigree, or to establish the facts of birth, marriage, or death, is confined to declarations of deceased members of the family, and family history and traditions handed down by declarations of deceased members, in either case made ante litem motam, and originating with persons presumed to have competent knowledge of the facts stated; and evidence of the opinion or belief of living members of a family as to the death of another member, or of general reputation among a person's living friends and acquaintances as to his death, is not within the rule, and is inadmissible; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 77. See BOUNDARY; CUSTOM; PEDIGREE; PRESCRIPTION.

Admissions are the declarations which a party by himself, or those who act under his authority, make of the existence of certain facts. But where an admission is made the foundation of a claim, the whole statement must be taken together; 82 Va. 59. See 62 Conn. 542; 85 Ala. 569; ADMISSIONS.

A statement of all the distinctions between what is to be regarded as hearsay and what is to be deemed original evidence would extend this article too far. The general principle is that the mere declaration, oral or written, of a third person, as to a fact, standing alone, is inadmissible.

Res gestæ. But where evidence of an act done by a party is admissible, his declarations made at the time, having a tendency to elucidate or give a character to the act, and which may derive a degree of credit from the act itself, are also admissible, as part of the res gestæ; 9 N. H. 271; 93 U. S. 465; 116 Ind. 278; 79 Ga. 631; 112 Mo. 374; 128 Ill. 545; 95 Mich. 412; 82 Tex. 516; 18 Fed. Rep. 156; 148 Pa. 566; 21 How. St. Tr. 514; Steph. Dig. Ev. §§ 2, 7.

So, declarations of third persons, in the presence and hearing of a person, which tend to affect his interest, may be shown in order to introduce his answer or to show an admission by his silence, but this species of evidence must be received with great caution; 1 Greenl. Ev. 236.

Confessions of guilt in criminal cases come within the class of admissions, provided they have been voluntarily made and have not been obtained by the hope of favor or by the fear of punishment. And if made under such inducements as to exclude them, a subsequent declaration to the same effect, made after the inducement has ceased to operate, and having no connection with the hopes or fears which have existed, is admissible as evidence; 17 N. H. 171. Actions as well as verbal declarations may constitute a confession, and the same rule as to admissibility applies to both; 98 N. C. 595. There is, however, a growing unwillingness to rest convictions on confessions unless supported by corroborating circumstances, and in all cases there must be at least proof of the corpus delicti, independently of the confession; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 683; Cooley, Const. Lim. 385; Tayl. Ev. 744. See ADMISSIONS; CONFESSION; RES GESTÆ.

Dying declarations are an exception to the rule excluding hearsay evidence, and are admitted, under certain limitations in cases of homicide, so far as the circumstances attending the death and its cause are the subject of them. See DECLARATION; DYING DECLARATIONS.

Opinions of persons of skill and experience, called experts, are also admissible in certain cases, when, in order to the better understanding of the evidence or to the solution of the question, a certain skill and experience are required which are not ordinarily possessed by jurors. See EXPERT; OPINION.

In several instances proof of facts is excluded from public policy; as professional communications between lawyer and client, and physician and patient; secrets of state, proceedings of grand juror, and communications between husband and wife. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

The effect of evidence. As a general rule, a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction directly upon a point in issue is a bar between the same parties; 1 Phill. Ev. 242; and privies in blood, as an heir; 3 Mod. 141; or privies in estate; 1 Ld. Raym. 730; Bull. N. P. 232, stand in the same situation as those they represent: the verdict and judgment may be used for or against them, and is conclusive. See RES JUDICATA; JUDGMENT.

The constitution of the United States, art. 4, s. 1, declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. And congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." See 3 Wheat. 234; 17 Mass. 546; 3 Bibb 369; 2 Marsh. 293; 5 Day 563; 159

U. S. 113, 235; 2 Black, Judg. § 857; FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

Foreign laws must be proved as facts in the courts of this country, and mere citations to English statutes and authorities cannot be accepted as showing the English law; 50 Fed. Rep. 73. See FOREIGN LAW. For the force and effect of foreign judgments, see FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

The object of evidence is next to be considered. It is to ascertain the truth between the parties. It has been discovered by experience that this is done most certainly by the adoption of the following rules, which are now binding as law:— 1. The evidence must be confined to the point in issue. 2. The substance of the issue must be proved; but only the substance is required to be proved. 3. The affirmative of the issue must be proved.

It is a general rule, both in civil and criminal cases, that the evidence shall be confined to the point in issue. Justice and convenience require the observance of this rule, particularly in criminal cases; for when a prisoner is charged with an offence it is of the utmost importance to him that the facts laid before the jury should consist exclusively of the transaction which forms the subject of the indictment, and which alone he has come prepared to answer; 2 Russ. Cr. 694; 1 Phill. Ev. 166.

To this general rule there are several exceptions, and a variety of cases which do not fall within the rule. In general, evidence of collateral facts is not admissible; but when such a fact is material to the issue joined between the parties, it may be given in evidence: as, for example, in order to prove that the acceptor of a bill knew the payee to be a fictitious person, or that the drawer had general authority from him to fill up bills with the name of a fictitious payee, evidence may be given to show that he had accepted similar bills before they could, from their date, have arrived from the place of date; 2 H. Bla. 288.

When special damage sustained by the plaintiff is not stated in the declaration, it is not one of the points in issue, and, therefore, evidence of it cannot be received; yet a damage which is a necessary result of the defendant's breach of contract may be proved notwithstanding it is not in the declaration; 11 Price 19.

In general, evidence of the character of either party to a suit is inadmissible; yet in some cases such evidence may be given. See CHARACTER.

When evidence incidentally applies to another person or thing not included in the transaction in question, and with regard to whom or to which it is inadmissible, yet if it bear upon the point in issue it will be received; 8 Bing. 376. And see 4 B. & P. 92; 9 Conn. 47; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 649.

The acts of others, as in the case of conspirators, may be given in evidence against the prisoner, when referable to the issue; but confessions made by one of several conspirators after the offence has been completed, and when the conspirators no longer act in concert, cannot be received. See 3 Pick. 33; 2 Pet. 364; 2 Va. Cas. 269; 1 Rawle 362, 458; 2 Leigh 745; 2 Day 205; 2 B. & Ald. 573, 574; 25 Tex. App. 533; CONFESION.

In criminal cases, when the offence is a cumulative one, consisting itself in the commission of a number of acts, evidence of those acts is not only admissible, but essential to support the charge. On an indictment against a defendant for a conspiracy to cause himself to be believed a man of large property, for the purpose of defrauding tradesmen after proof of a representation to one tradesman, evidence may thereupon be given of a representation to another tradesman at a different time; 1 Campb. 399; 2 Day 205; 1 Johns. 99.

To prove the guilty knowledge of a prisoner with regard to the transaction in question, evidence of other offences of the same kind committed by the prisoner, though not charged in the indictment, is admissible against him; as, in the case where a prisoner had passed a counterfeit dollar, evidence that he had other counterfeit dollars in his possession is evidence to prove the guilty knowledge; 2 Const. 758, 776; 1 Bail. 300; 2 Leigh 745; 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 415; Russ. & R. 132; 5 Rand. 701.

The substance of the issue joined between the parties must be proved; 1 Phill. Ev. 190; Tayl. Ev. 233. Under this rule will be considered the quantity of evidence required to support particular averments in the declaration or indictment.

And, first, of civil cases. 1. It is a fatal variance in a contract if it appear that a party who ought to have been joined as plaintiff has been omitted; 1 Saund. 291 h, n.; 2 Term 282; and so where a bill for specific performance alleges the execution of a contract in a certain year, and the proof shows that it was made in another; 85 Ala. 286. But it is no variance to omit a person who might have been joined as defendant; because the non-joinder ought to have been pleaded in abatement; 1 Saund. 291 d, n. 2. The consideration of the contract must be proved; but it is not necessary for the plaintiff to set out in his declaration, or prove on the trial, the several parts of a contract consisting of distinct and collateral provisions: it is sufficient to state so much of the contract as contains the entire consideration of the act, and the entire act to be done in virtue of such consideration, including the time, manner, and other circumstances of its performance; 6 East 568; 4 B. & Ald. 387.

Second. In criminal cases, it may be laid down that it is, in general, sufficient to prove what constitutes the offence. 1. It is enough to prove so much of the indictment as shows that the defendant has committed a substantive crime therein specified; 2 Campb. 585; 1 H. & J. 427. See 78 Ga. 98; 62 Mich. 297. If a man be indicted for robbery, he may be found guilty of larceny and not guilty of the robbery; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 302. The offence of which the party is convicted must, however, be of the same class with that of which he is charged ; 1 Leach 14 ; 2 Stra. 1133.

2. When the intent of the prisoner furnishes one of the ingredients in the offence, and several intents are laid in the indictment, each of which, together with the act done, constitutes an offence, it is sufficient to prove one intent only ; 3 Stark. 35.

3. When a person or thing necessary to be mentioned in an indictment is described with circumstances of greater particularity than is requisite, yet those circumstances must be proved ; 3 Rog. 77 ; 3 Day 283 ; 26 Tex. App. 486. For example, if a party be charged with stealing a black horse, the evidence must correspond with the averment, although it was unnecessary to make it ; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 77 ; 4 Ohio 350 ; 83 Ga. 381 ; but see 73 Cal. 7, where an indictment charging a murder with a "bludgeon" is supported by proof that death was produced by a blow with a bolt or club ; 23 Neb. 33. See 103 N. C. 364 ; 26 Tex. App. 109.

4. The name of the prosecutor or party injured must be proved as laid ; and the rule is the same with reference to the name of a third person introduced into the indictment, as descriptive of some person or thing. See 35 Fed. Rep. 407 ; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 973 ; 40 Minn. 55.

The affirmative of the issue must be proved. The general rule with regard to the burden of proving the issue requires that the party who asserts the affirmative should prove it. But this rule ceases to operate the moment the presumption of law is thrown into the other scale. When the issue is on the legitimacy of a child, therefore, it is incumbent on the party asserting the illegitimacy to prove it ; 2 Selw. N. P. 709. Or where an answer admits all the averments of the complaint, and sets up a counter-claim as a defence, the affirmative of all the issues raised by the pleadings is on the defendant ; 61 Hun 624. See ONUS PROBANDI ; PRESUMPTION ; 2 Gall. 485 ; 1 McCord 573 ; 2 So. L. Rev. (N. S.) 126 ; 44 La. Ann. 1043.

Modes of proof. Records are to be proved by an exemplification, duly authenticated according to law, in all cases where the issue is nul tiel record. In other cases, an examined copy, duly proved, will, in general, be evidence ; 2 Woods 680. Foreign laws are proved in the mode pointed out under the article FOREIGN LAW. See supra.

Private writings are proved by producing the attesting witness ; or in case of his death, absence, or other legal inability to testify, as if after attesting the paper he becomes infamous, his handwriting may be proved. When there is no witness to the instrument, it may be proved by the evidence of the handwriting of the party, by a person who has seen him write, or who in a course of correspondence or business relations has become acquainted with his hand. See 3 Wash. C. C. 31 ; 1 Rawle 223 ; 4 Am. L. Rev. 625 ; 49 Minn. 420. As to the question whether the genuineness of a signature may be proved or disproved by comparison, or the signature to documents not a part of the case be proven for the purpose of using them as standards of comparison with the signature to the instrument sued on, see HANDWRITING.

Books of original entry, when duly proved, are prima facie evidence of goods sold and delivered, and of work and labor done. See ORIGINAL ENTRY.

A recent decision laid down some general rules in relation to the use of the ballots as evidence in an election contest, which present the law in that regard in a very terse and lucid form. It holds (1) that one who has received a certificate of election to office is not estopped in case of contest from going behind the returns from ballot boxes which were counted without objection by either party, and which formed the basis of the certificate ; (2) that in an election contest, the ballots of a certain box, which had been opened before a legislative committee after the election, are admissible when it appears that the opportunity for the ballots to have been tampered with was a mere possibility ; and (3) that the fact that a discrepancy exists between the returns of the votes counted from that ballot box and a recount made by the court in an election contest does not indicate that there was any alteration in the ballots after being voted, nor tend to cast suspicion thereon, when the evidence shows that, when the count was concluded by the election officers, there were discrepancies between the tally sheets of the different clerks of the election, which it was attempted to reconcile by guessing at the result, and making changes accordingly ; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 992. See ELECTION.

Proof by witnesses. The testimony of witnesses is called oral evidence, or that which is given viva voce, as contradistinguished from that which is written or documentary. It is a general rule that oral evidence shall in no case be received as equivalent to, or as a substitute for, a written instrument, where the latter is required by law ; or to give effect to a written instrument which is defective in any particular which by law is essential to its validity ; or to contradict, alter, or vary a written instrument, either appointed by law, or by the contract of the parties, to be the appropriate and authentic memorial of the particular facts it recites ; for by doing so, oral testimony would be admitted to usurp the place of evidence decidedly superior in degree ; 1 S. & R. 27, 464 ; 3 Marsh. 333 ; 1 Bibb 271 ; 11 Mas. 30 ; 3 Conn. 9 ; 12 Johns. 77 ; 1 Maule & S. 21 ; 45 La. Ann. 580 ; 67 Hun 315 ; 142 N. Y. 207 ; 150 Mass. 496 ; but this rule does not apply in suits between persons not parties to the writing ; 8 Misc. Rep. 314 ; 50 Ohio St. 528 ; 77 N. Y. 613 ; 142 Mass. 76 ; 60 Me. 465 ; 1 Gr. Ev. § 279.

But parol evidence is admissible to defeat a written instrument, on the ground of fraud, mistake, etc., or to apply it to its proper subject-manner, or, in some instances, as ancillary to such application, to explain the meaning of doubtful terms, or to rebut presumptions arising extrinsically. In these cases, the parol evidence does not usurp the place, or arrogate the authority of written evidence, but either shows that the instrument ought not to be allowed to operate at all, or is essential in order to give to the instrument its legal effect; 1 Murph. 423; 1 Des. 465; 1 Bay 247; 1 Bibb 271; 11 Mass. 30. See 1 Pct. C. C. 85; 3 S. & R. 340; Pothier, Obl. pl. 4, c. 2; 15 R. I. 41; 1 Okl. 232; 65 Vt. 231; 62 Conn. 459; 6 Harv. L. Rev. 325, 417; 2 Misc. Rep. 219; 148 U. S. 581; 154 Pa. 149. Where the facts do not appear on the face of the judgment, oral evidence is admissible to show how credits thereon come to be allowed, and what they were allowed for; 75 Fed. Rep. 852. And parol evidence has been admitted to establish a contemporaneous oral agreement which induced the execution of the written contract though the effect be to alter or reform the latter; 114 Pa. 170; 116 id. 270; so when the contract was a letter "confirming our verbal contract," proof of the latter was permitted although inconsistent with the letter; 120 id. 439.

See, generally, the treatises on Evidence, of Gilbert, Philipps, Starkie, Roscoe, Swift, Bentham, Macnally, Peake, Greenleaf, Wharton, Stephen, Rice; Best on Presumption; Browne, Parol Ev.; Will, Circ. Ev.

EVIDENCE, CIRCUMSTANTIAL.

The proof of facts which usually attend other facts sought to be proved; that which is not direct evidence. For example, when a witness testifies that a man was stabbed with a knife, and that a piece of the blade was found in the wound, and it is found to fit exactly with another part of the blade found in the possession of the prisoner, the facts are directly attested, but they only prove circumstances; and hence this is called circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is of two kinds, namely, certain and uncertain. It is certain when the conclusion in question necessarily follows: as, where a man had received a mortal wound, and it was found that the impression of a bloody left hand had been made on the left arm of the deceased, it was certain some other person than the deceased must have made such mark; 14 How. St. Tr. 1334. But it is uncertain whether the death was caused by suicide or by murder, and whether the mark of the bloody hand was made by the assassin, or by a friendly hand that came too late to the relief of the deceased. It has been contended that, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt from circumstantial evidence, the existence of the inculpatory facts must be absolutely incompatible with the innocence of the accused; Wills, Cir. Ev. 300; Stark. Ev. 160; 1 Crim. L. Mag. 234; 9 Houst. 564; 85 Pa. 127; 19 Ia. 230; 58 Ind. 530; but other writers have held that the distinction between this species of evidence and that which is direct is merely one of logic, and of no practical significance; that all evidence is more or less circumstantial; all statements of witnesses, all conclusions of juries, are the results of inference; or as it was expressed by Gibson, C. J., "the difference being only in degree;" 4 Pa. 269. See 2 Sumn. 27; 4 Pa. 269; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 10; Tayl. Ev. 86. Even in its strictest sense, circumstantial evidence is legal evidence, and when it is satisfactory beyond reasonable doubt, a jury is bound to act upon it as if it were the most direct; 1 Cent. L. J. 219; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13; 3 Rice, Ev. 544. See CIRCUMSTANCES; EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, CONCLUSIVE. That which, while uncontradicted, satisfies the judge and jury; it is also that which cannot be contradicted.

The record of a court of common-law jurisdiction is conclusive as to the facts therein stated; 2 Wash. Va. 64; 2 Hen. & M. 55; 6 Conn. 508. But the judgment and record of a prize-court is not conclusive evidence in the state courts, unless it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter; and whether it had or not, the state courts may decide; 1 Conn. 429. See, as to the conclusiveness of the judgments of foreign courts of admiralty, 3 Cra. 458; 4 id. 421, 434; Gilm. 16; 1 Const. 381; 1 Nott & M'C. 537. See EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, DIRECT. That which applies immediately to the factum probandum, without any intervening process: as, if A testifies he saw B inflict a mortal wound on C, of which he instantly died. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13. See EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, EXTRINSIC. External evidence, or that which is not contained in the body of an agreement, contract, and the like.

It is a general rule that extrinsic evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, explain, vary, or change the terms of a contract or of a will, except in a latent ambiguity, or to rebut a resulting trust; 14 Johns. 1; 1 Day 8. Excepting where evidence is admissible to vary a written contract on the ground that it does not represent the actual contract between the parties. See Wigram, Extrinsic Evidence; 14 L. R. A. 459; EVIDENCE.

EVOCATION. In French Law. The act by which a judge is deprived of the cognizance of a suit over which he had jurisdiction, for the purpose of conferring on other judges the power of deciding it. It is like the process by writ of certiorari.

EWAGE. A toll paid for water-passage. Cowel. The same as aquagium.

EWBRICE. Adultery; spouse-breach; marriage-breach. Cowel; Tomlin, Law Dict.

EX ÆQUO ET BONO (Lat.). In justice and good dealing. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 965.

EX CONTRACTU (Lat.). From contract. A division of actions is made in the common and civil law into those arising ex contractu (from contract) and ex delicto

(from wrong or tort). 3 Bla. Com. 117; 1 Chit. Pl. 2; 1 Mackelvey, Civ. Law § 195.

EX DEBITO JUSTITIÆ (Lat.). As a debt of justice. As a matter of legal right. 3 Bla. Com. 48.

EX DELICTO (Lat.). Actions which arise in consequence of a crime, misdemeanor, or tort are said to arise ex delicto: such are actions of case, replevin, trespass, trover. 1 Chit. Pl. 2; See EX CONTRACTU; ACTIONS.

EX DOLO MALO (Lat.). Out of fraud or deceit. When a cause of action arises from fraud or deceit, it cannot be supported; ex dolo malo non oritur actio. See MAXIMS.

EX EMPTO. Out of purchase; founded on purchase. A term of the civil law, adopted by Bracton. Inst. 4, 6, 28; Brac. fol. 102; Black, L. Dict.

EX GRATIA (Lat.). Of favor. Of grace. Words used formerly at the beginning of royal grants, to indicate that they were not made in consequence of any claim of legal right.

EX INDUSTRIA (Lat.). Intentionally. From fixed purpose.

EX MALEFICIO (Lat.). On account of misconduct. By virtue of or out of an illegal act. Used in the civil law generally, and sometimes in the common law. Browne, Stat. Frauds 110, n.; Broom, Leg. Max. 351.

EX MERO MOTU (Lat.). Of mere motion. The term is derived from the king's letters patent and charters, where it signifies that he grants them of his own mere motion, without petition. To prevent injustice, the courts will, ex mero motu, make rules and orders which the parties would not strictly be entitled to ask for. See EX GRATIA; EX PROPRIO MOTU.

EX MORA (Lat.). From the delay; from the default. All persons are bound to make amends for damages which arise from their own default.

EX MORE (Lat.). According to custom.

EX NECESSITATE LEGIS (Lat.). From the necessity of law.

EX NECESSITATE REI (Lat.). From the necessity of the thing. Many acts may be done ex necessitate rei which would not be justifiable without it; and sometimes property is protected ex necessitate rei which under other circumstances would not be so, or a way of necessity will be allowed; 126 Mass. 445. Property put upon the land of another from necessity cannot be distrained for rent. See DISTRESS.

EX OFFICIO (Lat.). By virtue of his office.

Many powers are granted and exercised by public officers which are not expressly delegated. A judge, for example, may be ex officio a conservator of the peace and a justice of the peace.

EX OFFICIO INFORMATION. In English Law. A criminal information filed by the attorney-general ex officio on behalf of the crown, in the court of queen's bench, for offences more immediately affecting the government, and to be distinguished from informations in which the crown is the nominal prosecutor. Moz. & W. L. Dict.; 4 Steph. Com. 372.

EX PARTE (Lat.). Of the one part. Many things may be done ex parte, when the opposite party has had notice. An affidavit or deposition is said to be taken ex parte when only one of the parties attends to taking the same. An injunction is granted ex parte when but one side has had a hearing. "Ex parte," in the heading of a reported case, signifies that the name following is that of the party upon whose application the case is heard. The term ex parte implies an examination in the presence of one of the parties and the absence of the other. 2 Scam. 62.

EX PARTE MATERNA (Lat.). On the mother's side. The words ex parte materna and ex parte paterna have a well-known signification in the law. They are found constantly used in the books to denote the line, or blood of the mother or father, and have no such restricted or limited sense, as from the mother or father, exclusively; 24 N. J. L. 433; 2 Bla. Com. 224, and notes.

EX PARTE PATERNA (Lat.). On the father's side. See EX PARTE MATERNA; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

EX POST FACTO (Lat.). From or by an after act: by subsequent matter. The correlative term is ab initio. An estate granted may be made good or avoided by matter ex post facto, when an election is given to the party to accept or not to accept; 1 Coke 146. A remainderman or reversioner may confirm ex post facto a lease granted by a life-tenant to last beyond his own life.

EX POST FACTO LAW. A statute which would render an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. 6 Cra. 138; 1 Kent 408.

A law made to punish acts committed before the existence of such law, which had not been declared crimes by preceding laws. Mass. Declar. of Rights, pt. 1, s. 24; Md. Decl. of Rights, art. 15.

A law passed after the commission of the offence charged, which inflicts a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime at the time of commission, or which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage. 3 Wyo. 478.

A law which, in its operation, makes that criminal which was not so at the time the action was performed; or which increases the punishment, or, in short, which, in relation to the offence or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage. 2 Wash. 366; 107 U. S. 228; see 65 Miss. 542; 6 Cra. 87; 43 N. J. L. 203; 29 N. Y. 124; 4 Wall. 325.

Parliament, in virtue of its supreme power, may pass such laws, being sustained by discretion alone; 1 Bla. Com. 46, 160.

By the constitution of the United States, congress is forbidden to pass ex post facto laws. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 9. And by § 10 of the same instrument, as well as by the constitutions of most, if not all, of the states, a similar restriction is imposed upon the state legislatures. Such an act is void as to those cases in which, if given effect, it would be ex post facto; but so far only. In cases arising after it, it may have effect; for as a rule for the future, it is not ex post facto.

There is a distinction between ex post facto laws and retrospective or retroactive laws: every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective, but not every retrospective law is an ex post facto law; in general, ex post facto laws only are prohibited. Retrospective laws are prohibited by the constitutions of the states of New Hampshire and Ohio. See 15 Ohio 207; 27 id. 22; 50 id. 428; 107 U. S. 221; T. U. P. Charit. 94.

It is fully settled that the term ex post facto, as used in the constitution, is to be taken in a limited sense as referring to criminal or penal statutes alone, and that the policy, the reason, and the humanity of the prohibition against passing ex post facto laws do not extend to civil cases, to cases that merely affect the private property of citizens. But the prohibition cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to what is, in substance, criminal; 4 Wall. 277; id. 333; 97 U. S. 385; 39 N. Y. 418; 43 Ga. 480; Hare, Am. Const. L. 547. Divorce not being a punishment may be authorized for causes happening previous to the passage of the divorce act; 40 Miss. 349.

The constitution does not prohibit the states from passing retrospective laws generally. Some of the most necessary acts of legislation are, on the contrary, founded upon the principles that private rights must yield to public exigencies; 8 Wheat. 89; 17 How. 463; 8 Pet. 88; 11 id. 421; 9 Cra. 374; 1 Gall. 105; 2 Pet. 380, 523, 627; 7 Johns. 498; 6 Binn. 271; 69 Mo. 343; 59 How. Pr. 21; 93 Ill. 483; Cooley, Const. Lim. 265; 36 S. C. 454. See 73 Ia. 707; 74 id. 708.

Test oaths of past loyalty to the government have been held void as ex post facto; 4 Wall. 333; except as pre-requisites to the exercise of the elective franchise; 47 Mo. 119; 39 N. Y. 418. A law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors is not ex post facto, 5 R. I. 185; or a law imposing a retrospective tax; 31 N. J. L. 133; 20 Wall. 323; see 16 Pa. 63; s. c. 17 How. 856; 66 N. C. 361; or a law authorizing a divorce for past offences; 40 Miss. 349; 10 N. H. 380; compare 3 Murph. (N. C.) 327; or a law providing that the punishment of future crimes shall be increased by reason of past offences; 68 Me. 409. Corporations cannot pass ex post facto by-laws; 31 Mich. 458.

Laws under the following circumstances are to be considered ex post facto laws within the words and intent of the prohibition: 1. Every law that makes an act done before the passing of the law, which was innocent when done, criminal and punishes such action. 2. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. 3. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; though it would be otherwise of a law mitigating the punishment; 3 Story, Const. 212. 4. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender; 3 Dall. 390. This construction, it is said, "has been accepted and followed as correct by the courts ever since;" Cooley, Const. Lim. 325. See 93 Cal. 427; 155 Mass. 163.

This classification has been generally adopted as accurate and complete, but is not entirely so. Thus a law has been decided to be ex post facto which was intended to punish a criminal act, prosecution as to which was already barred by a statute of limitations; Moore v. State of N. J., 43 N. J. L. 203; s. c. 24 Alb. L. J. 308; but an act which reduces a punishment is not ex post facto as to crimes committed prior to its enactment; 140 N. Y. 484; 65 N. C. 311; 12 Allen 421; 20 Tex. App. 335. The statement under the fourth head also requires modification. Convictions under changes in the rules of evidence have been held not unconstitutional; 53 N. Y. 164; 9 Cush. 279; 14 Rich. L. 281; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 597; 84 Ky. 1; 84 Ind. 452; though it seems to be settled that a law requiring a less degree of evidence cannot be applied to a previous offence. But changes in the forms, in the manner of passing sentence, or the qualifications of jurors, do not fall within the prohibition; 11 Pick. 28; 2 Wash. St. 552; 3 Wyo. 478; 29 S. C. 355; nor will a provision reducing the number of peremptory challenges on a prosecution for a capital offence, though applied to cases where the offence was committed before the change was made; 31 Fla. 291; 86 Ala. 617; nor an amendment which confers jurisdiction in a criminal cause upon a division of the supreme court less in numbers and different in personnel from the court as organized when the crime was committed; 152 U. S. 377. A change of criminal procedure applied to the trial of crimes committed before it took effect is not ex post facto, unless it affects some substantial right to which the accused was entitled when the alleged offence was committed; 33 La. Ann. 1214; 107 U. S. 221. The supreme court of the United States has recently decided that a constitutional provision, requiring all grand and petit jurors to be qualified electors, able to read and write, and enjoining on the legislature to provide by law for listing and drawing persons so qualified, but declaring that, until otherwise provided by law, all crimes should be tried as though no change had been made (Const. Miss. 1890, §§ 264, 283), went into effect immediately on its adoption, so far as the qualifications of jurors were concerned; that one who committed a crime after the adoption of the constitution, but before the legislature passed a new jury law, could be tried, after the passage of such a law, by a jury selected under its provisions; and that, as the new law did not aggravate the crime previously committed, or inflict a greater punishment, or alter the rules of evidence, its application to the trial of the accused did not make it an ex post facto law; 162 U. S. 585.

For a review of the history of the ex post facto clause of the constitution in connection with its adoption, and with its subsequent construction by the federal and state courts, see 107 U. S. 221.

EX PROPRIO MOTU (Lat.). Of his own accord.

EX PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.). By its own force. 2 Kent 457.

EX REL. See EX RELATIONE.

EX RELATIONE (Lat.). At the information of; by the relation. A bill in equity, for example, may in many cases be brought for an injunction to restrain a public nuisance ex relatione (by information of) the parties immediately interested in or affected by the nuisance; 18 Ves. 217; 2 Johns. Ch. 382; 6 id. 439; 13 How. 518; 12 Pet. 91.

It is frequently abbreviated ex rel. See RELATOR.

EX TEMPORE (Lat.). From the time; without premeditation.

EX VI TERMINI (Lat.). By force of the term.

EX VISCERIBUS (Lat. from the bowels). From the vital part, the very essence of the thing. 10 Co. 24 b; 2 Metc. Mass. 213. Ex visceribus verborum (from the mere words and nothing else); 10 Johns. 494; 1 Story, Eq. § 980.

EX VISITATIONE DEI (Lat.). By or from the visitation of God. In the ancient law, upon a prisoner arraigned for treason or felony standing mute, a jury was impanelled to inquire whether he stood obstinately mute, or was dumb ex visitatione Dei; 4 Steph. Com. 391. This phrase is frequently employed in inquisitions by the coroner, where it signifies that the death of the deceased is a natural one.

EXACTION. A wilful wrong done by an officer, or by one who, under color of his office, takes more fee or pay for his services than the law allows.

Between extortion and exaction there is this difference: that in the former case the officer extorts more than his due, when something is due to him; in the latter, he exacts what is not his due, when there is nothing due to him. Co. Litt. 968.

EXACTOR. In Old English and Civil Law. A collector. Exactor regis (collector for the king). A collector of taxes or revenue. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Spelman, Gloss. The term exaction early came to mean the wrong done by an officer, or one pretending to have authority, in demanding or taking any reward or fee for that matter, cause, or thing which the law allows not. Termes de la Ley.

EXAMINATION. In Criminal Law. The investigation by an authorized magistrate of the circumstances which constitute the grounds for an accusation against a person arrested on a criminal charge, with a view to discharging the person so arrested, or to securing his appearance for trial by the proper court, and to preserving the evidence relating to the matter.

Practically, it is accomplished by bringing the person accused, together with witnesses, before a magistrate (generally a justice of the peace), who thereupon takes down in writing the evidence of the witnesses, and any statements which the prisoner may see fit to make. If no cause for detention appears, the party is discharged from arrest. If sufficient cause of suspicion appears to warrant putting him on trial, he is committed, or required to give bail or enter into a recognizance to appear at the proper time for trial. The witnesses are also frequently required to recognize for their appearance; though in ordinary cases only their own recognizance is required. The magistrate signs or certifies the minutes of the evidence which he has taken, and it is delivered to the court before whom the trial is to be had. The object of an examination is to enable the judge and jury to see whether the witnesses are consistent, and to ascertain whether the offence is bailable. 2 Leach 552. And see 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 296.

At common law, the prisoner could not be interrogated by the magistrate; but under the statutes 1 & 2 Phil. & M. c. 13, 2 & 3 Phil. & M. c. 10, the provisions of which have been substantially adopted in most of the United States, the magistrate is to examine the prisoner as well as the witnesses. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 224; 4 Bla. Com. 296; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 44; Ry. & M. 432.

The examination should be taken and completed as soon as the nature of the case will admit; Cro. Eliz. 829; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 585; 2 id. 120. The prisoner must not be put upon oath, but the witnesses must; 1 Phil. Ev. 106; Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 386. The prisoner formerly had no right to the assistance of an attorney; but the privilege was granted at the discretion of the magistrate; 2 Dowl. & R. 86; 1 B. & C. 37. Now, however, a prisoner is permitted to have counsel as a matter of course. The magistrate's return and certificate are conclusive evidence, and exclude parol evidence, of what the prisoner said on that occasion with reference to the charge; 2 C. & K. 223; 5 C. & P. 162; 1 Mood. & M. 403. See CONFESSION; RECOGNIZANCE.

In Practice. The interrogation of a witness, in order to ascertain his knowledge as to the facts in dispute between parties.

The examination in chief is that made by the party calling the witness; the cross-examination is that made by the other party. In the examination in chief the counsel cannot ask leading questions, except in particular cases. See CROSS-EXAMINATION; LEADING QUESTIONS.

The examination is to be made in open court, when practicable; but when, on account of age, sickness, absence from the jurisdiction, or other cause, the witness cannot be so examined, then in civil causes it may be made before authorized commissioners.

The interrogation of a person who is desirous of performing some act, or availing himself of some privilege of the law, in order to ascertain if all the requirements of the law have been complied with, conducted by and before an officer having authority for the purpose.

There are many acts which can be of validity and binding force only upon an examination. Thus, in many states, a married woman must be privately examined as to whether she has given her consent freely and without restraint to a deed which she appears to have executed; see ACKNOWLEDGMENT; an insolvent who wishes to take the benefit of the insolvent laws, one who is about to become bound for another in legal proceedings, a bankrupt, etc., must submit to an examination.

EXAMINED COPY. A phrase applied to designate a paper which is a copy of a record, public book, or register, and which has been compared with the original. 1 Campb. 469.

Such examined copy is admitted in evidence, because of the public inconvenience which would arise if such record, public book, or register were removed from place to place, and because any fraud or mistake made in the examined copy would be so easily detected; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 91; 1 Stark. Ev. 189. But in an answer in chancery on which the defendant was indicted for perjury, or where the original must be produced in order to identify the party by proof of handwriting, an examined copy would not be evidence; 1 Mood. & R. 189. See COPY.

EXAMINERS. Persons appointed to question students of law in order to ascertain their qualifications before they are admitted to practice.

Persons employed by the government of the United States in the Patent Office for the purpose of passing upon applications for letters patent. See SPECIAL EXAMINER.

EXAMINERS IN CHANCERY. Officers who examine, upon oath, witnesses produced on either side upon such interrogatories as the parties to any suit exhibit for that purpose. Cowel.

The examiner is to administer an oath to the party, and then repeat the interrogatories one at a time, writing down the answer himself; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1062. Anciently, the examiner was one of the judges of the court; hence an examination before the examiner is said to be an examination in court; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1053.

EXANNUAL ROLL. A roll containing the illeivable fines and desperate debts, which was read yearly to the sheriff (in the ancient way of delivering the sheriff's accounts), to see what might be gotten. Hale, Sheriffs 67; Cowel.

EXCAMB. In Scotch Law. To exchange. Excambion, exchange. The words are evidently derived from the Latin excambium. Bell, Dict. See EXCHANGE.

EXCAMBIATOR. An exchanger of lands; a broker. Obsolete.

EXCAMBIUM (Lat.). In English Law. Exchange; a recompense. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 442.

EXCEPTION (Lat. excipere: ex, out of, capere, to take).

In Contracts. A clause in a deed by which the lessor excepts something out of that which he before granted by the deed.

The exclusion of something from the effect or operation of the deed or contract which would otherwise be included.

An exception differs from a reservation (q. v.),—the former being always of part of the thing granted, the latter of a thing not in esse, but newly created or reserved; the exception is of the whole of the part excepted; the reservation may be of a right or interest in the particular part affected by the reservation. See 5 R. I. 419; 41 Me. 177; 42 id. 9; 51 id. 498; 19 Barb. 192; 2 B. & C. 197. The two words, however, are often used indiscriminately; 129 Mass. 231; 38 Conn. 541. An exception differs, also, from an explanation, which, by the use of a videlicet, proviso, etc., is allowed only to explain doubtful clauses precedent, or to separate and distribute generals into particulars; 3 Pick. 272.

To make a valid exception, these things must concur: first, the exception must be by apt words, as, "saving and excepting," etc.; see 30 Vt. 242; 5 R. I. 419; 41 Me. 177; 102 N. C. 14; second, it must be of part of the thing previously described, and not of some other thing; third, it must be of part of the thing only, and not of all, the greater part, or the effect of the thing granted; 11 Md. 339; 23 Vt. 395; 10 Mo. 426; see 146 Pa. 451; an exception, therefore, in a lease which extends to the whole thing demised is void; fourth, it must be of such thing as is severable from the demised premises, and not of an inseparable incident; 33 Pa. 251; 37 N. H. 167; fifth, it must be of such a thing as he that excepts may have, and which properly belongs to him; sixth, it must be of a particular thing out of a general, and not of a particular thing out of a particular thing; seventh, it must be particularly described and set forth; a lease of a tract of land except one acre would be void, because that acre was not particularly described; Co. Litt. 47 a; 12 Me. 337; Wright, Ohio 711; 3 Johns. 375; 8 Conn. 369; 6 Pick. 499; 6 N. H. 421; 4 Strobb. 208; 2 Tayl. 173; see 91 Cal. 74; 112 N. C. 58. Exceptions against common right and general rules are construed as strictly as possible; 1 Bart. Conv. 68; 5 Jones, N. C. 63. When a grantor makes a valid exception, the thing excepted remains the property of himself or his heirs; but if he has no valid title to it, neither he nor his heirs can recover; 97 N. C. 95.

In Equity Practice. The allegation of a party, in writing, that some pleading or proceeding in a cause is insufficient.

In Civil Law. A plea. Merlin, Répert. Declinatory exceptions are such dilatory exceptions as merely decline the jurisdiction of the judge before whom the action is brought. La. Code Proc.

Dilatory exceptions are such as do not tend to defeat the action, but only to retard its progress.

Declinatory exceptions have this effect, as well as the exception of discussion offered by a third possessor or by a surety in an hypothecary action, or the exception taken in order to call in the warrantor. 7 Mart. La. N. s. 282; 1 La. 38, 420.

Peremptory exceptions are those which tend to the dismissal of the action.

Some relate to forms, others arise from the law. Those which relate to forms tend to have the cause dismissed, owing to some nullities in the proceedings. These must be pleaded in limine litis. Peremptory exceptions founded on law are those which, without going into the merits of the cause, show that the plaintiff cannot maintain his action, either because it is prescribed, or because the cause of action has been destroyed or extinguished. These may be pleaded at any time previous to definitive judgment: Pothier. Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, ss. 1, 2, 3. These, in the French law, are called Fins de non recevoir.

In Practice. Objections made to the decisions of the court in the course of a trial. See BILL OF EXCEPTION.

EXCEPTION TO BAIL. An objection to the special bail put in by the defendant to an action at law made by the plaintiff on grounds of the insufficiency of the bail. 1 Tidd, Pr. 255.

EXCESS. When a defendant pleaded to an action of assault that the plaintiff trespassed on his land, and he would not depart when ordered, whereupon he mollior manus imposuit, gently laid hands on him, the replication of excess was to the effect that the defendant used more force than necessary. Wharton.

EXCESSIVE BAIL. Bail which is per se unreasonably great and clearly disproportionate to the offence involved, or which under the peculiar circumstances appearing is shown to be so in the particular case. 44 Cal. 558; 53 id. 410.

EXCHANGE. In Commercial Law. A negotiation by which one person transfers to another funds which he has in a certain place, either at a price agreed upon or which is fixed by commercial usage.

This transfer is made by means of an instrument which represents such funds and is well known by the name of a bill of exchange. The price above the par value of the funds so transferred is called the premium of exchange, and if under that value the difference is called the discount,—either being called the rate of exchange.

The par of exchange is the value of the money of one country in that of another, and is either real or nominal. The nominal par is that which has been fixed by law or usage, and, for the sake of uniformity, is not altered, the rate of exchange alone fluctuating. The real par is that based on the weight and fineness of the coins of the two countries, and fluctuates with changes in the coinage. The nominal par of exchange in this country on England, settled in 1799 by act of congress, was four dollars and forty-four cents for the pound sterling; but by successive changes in the coinage this value has been increased, the real mint par at present being a little over four dollars and eighty-seven cents. The course of exchange means the quotations for any given time.

The transfer of goods and chattels for other goods and chattels of equal value. This is more commonly called barter. Where a party deposits wheat with a mill company, expecting to receive a proportionate amount of flour, it constitutes an exchange and not a sale; 49 Mo. App. 23. One cannot, as having been defrauded thereby, rescind an exchange of property, without tendering a return of his property to the other, unless it is absolutely worthless; 97 Mich. 581.

The distinction between a sale and exchange of property is rather one of shadow than of substance. In both cases the title to property is absolutely transferred, and the same rules of law are applicable to the transaction, whether the consideration of the contract is money or by way of barter. It can make no essential difference in the rights and obligations of parties that goods and merchandise are transferred and paid for by other goods and merchandise instead of by money, which is but the representative of value or property; 14 Gray 372.

The profit which arises from a maritime loan, when such profit is a percentage on the money lent, considering it in the light of money lent in one place to be returned in another, with a difference in amount in the sum borrowed and that paid, arising from the difference of time and place. The term is commonly used in this sense by French writers. Hall, Mar. Loans 56, n.

The place where merchants, captains of vessels, exchange-agents, and brokers assemble to transact their business. Code de Comm. art. 71.

In Conveyancing. A mutual grant of equal interests in land, the one in consideration of the other. 2 Bla. Com. 323; Littleton 62; Shep. Touchst. 289; Watk. Conv; Digby, R. P. 368. It is said that exchange in the United States does not differ from bargain and sale. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2059.

There are five circumstances necessary to an exchange. That the estates given be equal. That the word excambium, or exchange, be used,—which cannot be supplied by any other word, or described by circumlocution. That there be an execution by entry or claim in the life of the parties. That if it be of things which lie in grant, it be by deed. That if the lands lie in several counties, or if the thing lie in grant, though they be in one county, it be by deed indented. In practice this mode of conveyancing is nearly obsolete.

EXCHEQUER (L. Lat. scaccarium, Nor. Fr. eschequier). In English Law. A department of the government which has the management of the collection of the king's revenue.

The name is said to be derived from the chequered cloth which covered the table on which some of the king's accounts were made up and the amounts indicated by counters.

It consisted of two divisions, one for the receipt of revenue, the other for administering justice. Co. 4th Inst. 103; 3 Bla. Com. 44, 45. See COURT OF EXCHEQUER; COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

EXCHEQUER BILLS Bills of credit issued by authority of parliament.

They constitute the medium of transaction of business between the bank of England and the government. The exchequer bills contain a guarantee from government which secures the holders against loss by fluctuation. Wharton; McCulloch, Comm. Dict.

EXCISE. An inland imposition, paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity, and frequently upon the retail sale. 1 Bla. Com. 318; Story, Const. § 950; Cooley. Tax. 4. See 11 Allen 268; INTERNAL REVENUE.

EXCLUSIVE (Lat. ex, out, claudere, to shut). Not including; debarring from participation. Shut out; not included.

An exclusive right or privilege, as a copyright or patent, is one which may be exercised and enjoyed only by the person authorized, while all others are forbidden to interfere.

EXCOMMUNICATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical sentence pronounced by a spiritual judge against a Christian man, by which he is excluded from the body of the church, and disabled to bring any action or sue any person in the common-law courts. Bac. Abr.; Co. Litt. 133, 134; 91 Tenn. 303.

In early times it was the most frequent and the most severe method of executing ecclesiastical censure, although proper to be used, said Justinian (Nov. 123), only upon grave occasions. The effect of it was to remove the excommunicated person not only from the sacred rites, but from the society of men. In a certain sense it interdicted the use of fire and water, like the punishment spoken of by Cæsar (lib. 6, de Bell. Gall.) as inflicted by the Druids. Innocent IV. called it the nerve of ecclesiastical discipline. On repentance, the excommunicated person was absolved and received again to communion. These are said to be the powers of binding and loosing,—the keys of the kingdom of heaven. This kind of punishment seems to have been adopted from the Roman usage of interdicting the use of fire and water. Fr. Duaren. De Sacris Eccles. Ministeriis, lib. 1, cap. 3. See Ridley, View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law 245.

EXCOMMUNICATO CAPIENDO (Lat. for taking an excommunicated person).

In Ecclesiastical Law. A writ issuing out of chancery, founded on a bishop's certificate that the defendant had been excommunicated, returnable to the king's bench. 4 Bla. Com. 415; Bac. Abr. Excommunication, E. See Cro. Eliz. 224, 680; Cro. Car. 421; Cro. Jac. 567; 1 Salk. 293.

EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE. In Criminal Law. The killing of a human being, when the party killing is not altogether free from blame, but the necessity which renders it excusable may be said to have been partly induced by his own act. 1 East, Pl. Cr. 220. See HOMICIDE.

EXCUSATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Excuse. A cause from exemption from a duty, such as absence, insufficient age, etc. Vicat, Voc. Jur., and reference there given.

EXCUSATOR (Lat.). In English Law. An excuser.

In Old German Law. A defendant; he who utterly denies the plaintiff's claim. Du Cange.

EXCUSE. A reason alleged for the doing or not doing a thing.

This word presents two ideas, differing essentially from each other. In one case an excuse may be made in order to show that the party accused is not guilty; in another, by showing that though guilty he is less so than he appears to be. Take, for example, the case of a sheriff who has an execution against an individual, and who, in performance of his duty, arrests him: in an action by the defendant against the sheriff, the latter may prove the facts, and this shall be a sufficient excuse for him; this is an excuse of the first kind, or a complete justification; the sheriff was guilty of no offence. But suppose, secondly, that the sheriff has an execution against Paul, and by mistake, and without any malicious design, he arrests Peter instead of Paul: the fact of his having the execution against Paul and the mistake being made will not justify the sheriff, but it will extenuate and excuse his conduct, and this will be an excuse of the second kind.

Persons are sometimes excused for the commission of acts which ordinarily are crimes, either because they had no intention of doing wrong, or because they had no power of judging, and therefore had no criminal will, or, having power of judging, they had no choice, and were compelled by necessity. Among the first class may be placed infants under the age of discretion, lunatics, and married women committing certain offences in the presence of their husbands. Among acts of the second kind may be classed the beating or killing another in self-defence, the destruction of property in order to prevent a more serious calamity, as the tearing down of a house on fire to prevent its spreading to the neighboring property, and the like. See Dalloz, Dict.

EXCUSSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Exhausting the principal debtor before proceeding against the surety. Discussion is used in the same sense in Scotch law. Vicat, Excussionis Beneficium.

EXECUTE. To complete; to make; to perform; to do; to follow out.

The term is frequently used in law; as, to execute a deed, which means to make a deed, including especially signing, sealing, and delivery. To execute a contract is to perform the contract. To execute a use is to merge or unite the equitable estate of the cestui que use in the legal estate, under the statute of uses. To execute a writ is to do the act commanded in the writ. To execute a criminal is to put him to death according to law, in pursuance of his sentence.

EXECUTED. Done; completed; effected; performed; fully disclosed; vested; giving present right of employment. The term is used of a variety of subjects.

EXECUTED CONSIDERATION.

See CONSIDERATION.

EXECUTED CONTRACT. One which has been fully performed. The statute of frauds does not apply to such contracts; 130 Ind. 108; 48 Kan. 418; 9 U. S. App. 537; 159 Pa. 121; 100 Ala. 430; 18 Colo. 456; 83 Tex. 158. See CONTRACTS.

EXECUTED ESTATE. An estate whereby a present interest passes to and resides in the tenant, not dependent upon any subsequent circumstance or contingency. They are more commonly called estates in possession. 2 Bla. Com. 162.

An estate where there is vested in the grantee a present and immediate right of present or future enjoyment. An estate which confers a present right of present enjoyment.

When the right of enjoyment in possession is to arise at a future period, only the estate is executed; that is, it is merely vested in point of interest; where the right of immediate enjoyment is annexed to the estate, then only is the estate vested in possession. 1 Prest. Est. 62; Fearnie, Cont. Rem. 392.

Executed is synonymous with vested. 1 Washb. R. P. 11.

EXECUTED REMAINDER. One giving a present interest, though the enjoyment may be future. Fearnie, Cont. Rem. 31; 2 Bla. Com. 168. See REMAINDER.

EXECUTED TRUST. A trust of which the scheme has in the outset been completely declared. Ad. Eq. 151. One in which the devise or trust is directly and wholly declared by the testator or settlor, so as to attach on the lands immediately under the deed or will itself. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 385; 1 Jac. & W. 570. "A trust in which the estates and interest in the subject-matter of the trust are completely limited and defined by the instrument creating the trust, and require no further instruments to complete them." Bisph. Eq. 31. The instrument creating such a trust must be construed according to the rules of law, although the intention may be defeated; id. 86. See 1 Hayes, Conv. 85; TRUST; EXECUTORY TRUST.

EXECUTED USE. A use with which the possession and legal title have been united by statute. 1 Steph. Com. 339; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 335, note; 7 Term 342; 12 Ves. Ch. 89; 4 Mod. 380; Comb. 312.

EXECUTED WRIT. A writ the command in which has been obeyed by the person to whom it was directed.

EXECUTION. The accomplishment of a thing; the completion of an act or instrument; the fulfilment of an undertaking. Thus, a contract is executed when the act to be done is performed; a deed is executed when it is signed, sealed, and delivered. See 12 Ired. 221. Where the party is present and directs another to sign for him, no written authority is necessary; 30 N. J. Eq. 193; 6 Neb. 368; 22 Cal. 563; 175 Pa. 393; Reed, St. of Fr. § 1063.

In Criminal Law. Putting a convict to death, agreeably to law, in pursuance of his sentence. This is to be performed by the sheriff or his deputy; (see 4 Bla. Com. 403;) or under the laws of the United States, by the marshal. See CRIMES; ELECTROCUTION; GARROTE; GUILLOTINE; HANGING.

In Practice. Putting the sentence of the law in force. 3 Bla. Com. 412. The act of carrying into effect the final judgment or decree of a court.

The writ which directs and authorizes the officer to carry into effect such judgment.

Final execution is one which authorizes the money due on a judgment to be made out of the property of the defendant.

Execution quousque is such as tends to an end, but is not absolutely final: as, for example, a capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken, to the intent that the plaintiff shall be satisfied of his debt, etc., the imprisonment not being absolute, but until he shall satisfy the same. 6 Co. 87.

Execution, in civil actions, is the mode of obtaining the debt or damages or other thing recovered by the judgment; and it is either for the plaintiff or defendant. For the plaintiff upon a judgment in debt, the execution is for the debt and damages; or in assumpsit, covenant, case, replevin, or trespass, for the damages and costs; or in detinue, for the goods, or their value, with damages and costs. For the defendant upon a judgment in replevin, the execution at common law is for a return of the goods, to which damages are superadded by the statutes 7 Hen. VIII. c. 4, § 3, and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19, § 3; and in other actions upon a judgment of non pros., non suit, or verdict, the execution is for the costs only; Tidd, Pr. 993.

After final judgment signed, and even before it is entered of record, the plaintiff may, in general, at any time within a year and a day, and whilst the parties to the judgment continue the same, take out execution; provided there be no writ of error depending or agreement to the contrary, or, where this is allowed, security entered for stay of execution. But after a year and a day from the time of signing judgment the plaintiff cannot regularly take out execution without reviving the judgment by scire facias, unless a fieri facias, or capias ad satisfaciendum, etc., was previously sued out, returned, and filed, or he was hindered from suing it out by a writ of error; and if a writ of error be brought, it is, generally speaking, a supersedeas of execution from the time of its allowance; provided bail, when necessary, be put in and perfected, in due time. See Tidd, Pr. 994; 3 Ala. 223.

Writs of execution are judicial writs issuing out of the court where the record is upon which they are grounded. Hence, when the record has been removed to a higher court by writ of error or certiorari, or on appeal, either the execution must issue out of that court, or else the record must be returned to the inferior court by a remittitur (q. v.) for the purpose of taking out execution in the court below. The former is the practice in England; the latter, in some of the United States.

The object of execution in personal actions is effected in one or more of the three following ways. 1. By the seizure and sale of personal property of the defendant. 2. By the seizure of his real property, and either selling it or detaining it until the issues and profits are sufficient to satisfy the judgment. 3. By seizing his person and holding him in custody until he pays the judgment or is judicially declared insolvent.

These proceedings, though taken at the instance and under the direction of the party for whom judgment is given, are considered the act of the law itself, and are in all cases performed by the authorized minister of the law. The party or his attorney obtains, from the office of the court where the record is, a writ, based upon and reciting the judgment, and directed to the sheriff (or, where he is interested or otherwise disqualified, to the coroner) of the county, commanding him, in the name of the sovereign or of the state, that of the goods and chattels or of the lands and tenements of the defendant in his bailiwick he cause to be made or levied the sum recovered, or that he seize the person of the defendant, as the case may be, and have the same before the court at the return day of the writ. This writ is delivered by the party to the officer to whom it is directed, who thenceforth becomes responsible for his performance of its mandate, and in case of omission, mistake, or misconduct is liable in damages to the person injured, whether he be the plaintiff, the defendant, or a stranger to the writ.

When property is sold under execution, the proceeds are applied to the satisfaction of the judgment and the costs and charges of the proceedings; and the surplus, if there be any, is paid to the defendant in execution.

Execution against personal property. When the property consists of goods and chattels, in which are included terms for years, the writ used is the feri facias (q. v.). If, after levying on the goods, etc., under a feri facias, they remain unsold for want of buyers, etc., a supplemental writ may issue, which is called the venditioni exponas. At common law, goods and chattels might also be taken in execution under a levari facias; though now perhaps the most frequent use of this writ is in executions against real property.

Where it is sought to reach an equitable interest a bill in equity is sometimes filed in aid of an execution; 73 Fed. Rep. 627.

When the property consisted of choses in action, whether debts due the defendant or any other sort of credit or interest belonging to him, it could not be taken in execution at common law; but now, under statutory provisions in many of the states, such property may be reached by a process in the nature of an attachment, called an attachment execution or execution attachment. See ATTACHMENT; CREDITORS' BILL.

Execution against real estate. Where lands are absolutely liable for the payment of debts, and can be sold in execution, the process is by feri facias and venditioni exponas. In Pennsylvania the land cannot be sold in execution unless the sheriff's jury, under the feri facias, find that the profits will not pay the debt in seven years. But, practically, lands are almost never extended. And, in general, under common-law practice, lands are not subject to sale under execution, until after a levy has been made under the feri facias, and they are appraised under an inquisition. They are then liable to be sold under a venditioni exponas.

There are in England writs of execution against land which are not in general use here. The extent (q. v.), or extendi facias, is the usual process for the king's debt. The levari facias (q. v.) is also used for the king's debt, and for the subject on a recognizance or statute staple or merchant (q. v.), and on a judgment in scire facias, in which latter case it is also generally employed in this country.

Execution against the person. This is effected by the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, under which the sheriff arrests the defendant and imprisons him till he satisfies the judgment or is discharged by process of law; Freem. Ex. 451. See INSOLVENCY. This execution is not final, the imprisonment not being absolute; whence it has been called an execution quousque; 6 Co. 87.

Besides the ordinary judgment for the payment of a sum certain, there are specific judgments, to do some particular thing. To this the execution must correspond: on a judgment for plaintiff in a real action, the writ is a habere facias seisinam; in ejectment it is a habere facias possessionem; for the defendant in replevin, as has already been mentioned, the writ is de retorno habendo.

Still another sort of judgment is that in rem, confined to a particular thing: such are judgments upon mechanics' liens and municipal claims, and, in the peculiar practice of Pennsylvania, on scire facias upon a mortgage. In such cases the execution is a writ of levari facias. A confession of judgment upon warrant of attorney, with a restriction of the lien to a particular tract, is an analogous instance; but in such case there is no peculiar form of execution; though if the plaintiff should, in violation of his agreement, attempt to levy on other land than that to which his judgment is confined, the court on motion would set aside the execution.

An execution issued in direct violation of an express agreement not to do so, except in a certain contingency which has not happened, will be set aside; 127 Pa. 238.

The lien of an execution from the judgment or decree of a court of record relates to its teste, and attaches to all personalty owned by the debtor between the teste and the levy so as to defeat the title of all intermediate purchasers; 85 Tenn. 720; not only in the county in which judgment was rendered, but everywhere in the state : 86 Tenn. 139. A sale under execution transmits only the debtor's estate, in the same plight and subject to all the equities under which he held it : 97 N. C. 241.

In Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Maine by common law and immemorial usage, under a judgment against a town, the property of any inhabitant may be taken in execution : 121 U. S. 121.

See, generally, Bingham ; Freeman ; Herman, and a long list of leading cases and annotations on special branches of the title in St. Louis Law Library catalogue, tit. Executions ; EXEMPTION ; FIERI FACIAS ; HOME-STEAD.

EXECUTION PAREE. In French Law. A right founded on an act passed before a notary, by which the creditor may immediately, without citation or summons, seize and cause to be sold the property of his debtor, out of the proceeds of which to receive his payment. It imports a confession of judgment, and is not unlike a warrant of attorney. La. Code of Proc. art. 732 : 6 Toullier, n. 208 ; 7 id. 99.

EXECUTIONER. The name given to him who puts criminals to death, according to their sentence ; a hangman.

In the United States there are no executioners by profession. It is the duty of the sheriff or marshal to perform this office, or to procure a deputy to do it for him.

EXECUTIVE. That power in the government which causes the laws to be executed and obeyed.

It is usually confided to the hands of the chief magistrate ; the president of the United States is invested with this authority under the national government ; and the governor of each state has the executive power of the state in his hands.

The officer in whom the executive power is vested.

The constitution of the United States directs that "the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America." Art. 2, s. 1. See Story, Const. b. 3, c. 36.

EXECUTIVE POWER. Authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the administration or execution of the laws as distinguished from the legislative and judicial functions.

" 'Executive power,' which the constitution declares shall be 'vested' in the president, includes power to carry into execution the national laws—and including such other powers, not legislative or judicial in their nature, as might from time to time be delegated to the president by congress—as the prosecution of war when declared—and to take care that the law be faithfully executed." 1 Curtis, Const. Hist. 578.

The separation of the three primary governmental powers as found in the constitution of the United States and of the separate states is the culmination of a revolution which had long been in progress in Europe. As is pointed out by a recent writer all governmental power was formerly united in the monarch of the middle ages. As the result of experience there was a separation of the state from the government, the former being termed the constitution-making power and the latter the instrumentalities by which administration was from time to time set in motion and carried on. Further advances in experience indicated the necessity of the distribution of powers by which there should be a deliberative body for the formulation of the rules and regulations under which the state should exist and its affairs be administered ; another which should be the medium by which these rules and regulations forming the body of municipal law should be carried into effect ; and a third to which should be committed the functions known in the science of government as judicial. The latter, under the government of the United States, has reached its highest development and exercises an authority in some instances over the other two departments of the government elsewhere unknown, even going so far as to define the limits of their authority and to declare void legislative acts. See CONSTITUTIONAL. This theory of the distribution of the powers of government among three distinct authorities, independent of each other, was first formulated by Montesquieu, Esprit des Loix, b. xi. c. vi. The absolute independence of the three branches of government which was advocated by Montesquieu has not been found entirely practicable in practice, and, although the threefold division of powers is the basis of the American constitution, there are many cases in which the duties of one department are to a certain extent devolved upon and shared by another. This is illustrated in the United States and in many of the states by the veto power which vests in the executive a part of the legislative authority, and on the other hand by the requirement of the confirmation by one branch of the legislature of executive appointments. The practical difficulty in the way of an exact division of powers is thus well expressed : "Although the executive, legislative, and supreme judicial powers of the government ought to be forever separate and distinct, it is also true that the science of government is a practical one ; therefore, while each should firmly maintain the essential powers belonging to it, it cannot be forgotten that the three co-ordinate parts constitute one brotherhood whose common trust requires a mutual toleration of the occupancy of what seems to be a 'common because of vicinage' bordering on the domains of each ;" 70 N. C. 93, 102. In England, there is in parliament a practical union of all the governmental powers, that body having absolute power of selecting the agents through whom, in fact, is exercised the executive power theoretically vested in the crown, and the final judicial authority on appeal remaining in the House of Lords. There is, notwithstanding, a complete recognition of the threefold nature of governmental power which is not lost nor destroyed by the unity of the final depositary of it all.

While the science of government in modern times may be said to accept the general theory of the separation of powers, subject to limitations and exceptions suggested, the application of the theory has not been uniform. Great difficulty has been found in practice in determining the depositary of executive power and whether it should be vested in one man or a board of control, the latter being supposed to insure deliberation and possibly to prevent tyranny, and the other being more conducive to efficient administration. See 2 Sto. Const. §§ 1419-23 ; Montesq. Espr. de L. b. xi. ch. vi. ; De Lolme, Const. Eng. b. 2, ch. 2 ; Federalist No. 70 ; 1 Kent 271. The necessity for the latter has led to the almost universal adoption of the plan of having a single executive head, and the principal remaining difficulty has been the extent and character of the power to be entrusted to it. This is in part the result of the effort to apply too rigidly the theory of the absolute separation of powers already shown to be impracticable. Another difficulty has been said to arise from the failure to recognize that executive power really comprises two functions, the political or governmental and the administrative. The former concerns the relations of the chief executive authority with the great powers of government, the latter relates to the practical management of the public service. It has been said that the executive authority, as understood in the American states, is mainly a political chief, that in France and to a less extent in England its position as an administrator is more important, while in the federal government in this country it is both, as it is also in Germany ; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 51.

The proper treatment of this subject involves the consideration of the systems of executive administration developed in the principal countries of the world which have adopted the principle of the distribution of powers. Only the briefest summary, however, is here practicable.

The general theory of the distribution of powers in Great Britain is very much like that in the princely governments of Germany. The residuum of governmental powers is in the crown, and the crown may exercise all authority not expressly otherwise delegated, but it rests with parliament to decide ultimately what powers shall be exercised by the crown and how it shall exercise them; herein it differs from the German system. From the comprehensive Norman idea of royalty which combined all the sovereign powers of the Saxon and Dane with those of the feudal theory of monarchy exemplified at the time in France, there developed at first hereditary and despotic power which was gradually limited by the necessity of the concurrent action of parliament for the imposition of taxes and the enactment of laws affecting the ordinary relations of individuals. Later it was considered that a law once enacted could not be changed without the consent of parliament, and finally the latter body assumed the right to initiate as well as approve laws, and the crown lost its original power of veto which has certainly become obsolete, though it has been said to be merely dormant and susceptible of being revived; 2 Todd, Parl. Govt. in Eng. 390. See 1 Stubbs, Const. Hist. of Eng. 338. The result of this development is that parliament has assumed most of the legislative power, though many matters not regulated by it are controlled by the crown which exercises a large ordinance power both independent and supplementary. The crown has lost both the taxing power and the judicial power, but retains in large part its old executive powers, and its action is controlled very largely by a body whose power has gradually developed, viz., the privy council. The crown may do anything which it is not forbidden to do and possesses the administrative as well as the political power. It may create offices as well as fill them, and both remove and direct the incumbents. The crown is, therefore, the chief both of the administrative and political departments of the executive power, its position being modified by the principle that its advisers, without whom it cannot act, must possess the confidence of the majority in the house of commons. The principle of parliamentary responsibility puts the crown in the position of reigning but not governing; but so long as it possesses the confidence of the house of commons it has very extensive executive powers, and in council may declare war and make treaties, which in other countries can be done only with the consent of the legislature. The crown is in theory irresponsible, but when its ministers are in a minority in the house of commons it chooses new ministers who will have the confidence of parliament, or dissolves parliament in the hope that the new body will have confidence in the existing ministers, but the theory is that in all cases the crown and not parliament administers. See Pom. Const. Law § 176; 1 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. ch. vi.

In France the executive power is vested in a president elected by the legislature. His position is said by a recent writer, probably on account of the monarchical traditions in France, to be more important from the administrative point of view and less from a political point of view than that of the President of the United States, he having no veto power. He has quite an unlimited power of appointment and also a very extensive power of removal, not only of officers appointed by himself, but of local administrative officers; as mayors of communes; Law, Apr. 5, 1884; and he may dissolve local and municipal legislative bodies in the departments and communes; LL, Aug. 10, 1871, and Apr. 5, 1884. In addition to his power of executing laws, he has in many cases authority to supplement the law without any delegation of legislative power by what are known as decrees. This supplemental power is accorded to him under a constitutional provision that he shall watch over and secure the execution of the laws, and the difference between the interpretation put upon this and the similar provision in the United States constitution is accredited to the monarchical traditions of the country, and the resulting idea that the residuary governmental power is vested in the executive and not, as in this country, in congress. The president is also held to a greater responsibility for his action than in the American system. 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. ch. iv.

In Germany the conception of executive power is much broader than in the United States, and it is more important from the administrative point of view. There are important constitutional limitations on the action of the Prince, or executive head of the subdivisions of the empire; but in the absence of such limitations he is recognized as having the governmental power, being as in France the possessor of the residuum of the governmental power. The limitations upon his action by the constitution are found in the requirement of legislative consent for the validity of legislative acts affecting freedom of person and property and the financial affairs of the government, judicial power administered by courts independent of the control of the executive, and the necessity that each of his official acts must be countersigned by a minister who is responsible for it either to the legislature or to the criminal courts. The administrative powers are very extensive, including that of appointment and removal, and a very wide power of direction, together with the authority to make decrees or ordinances as to all matters not regulated in detail by legislation.

In the imperial government, the Emperor occupies, from the administrative point of view, about the same position as the President of the United States. He has a general power of appointment and of administrative direction, which latter is, however, exercised under the responsibility of the chancellor, who must countersign all acts by which it is exercised; but just what the responsibility of the latter officer is seems to be undefined other than that he may be called upon to defend his policy before the federal council. The Emperor does not have any ordinance power except such as is expressly mentioned in the constitution or delegated by the legislature, and in the exercise of it he often requires the consent of the federal council. He is entirely irresponsible. id. ch. v. A leading German commentator regards the governmental form of the empire as a republic; 1 Zorn, Das Reichsstaatsrecht, 162.

In the United States, the federal executive power is vested in the president. In all the states the chief executive is the governor. With respect to the power of the latter the differences in the state constitutions make it necessary, for brief statements of the executive officers and their duties, to refer to the titles under the names of the several states, and for more detailed information to the constitutions of the states, while comparative views of the provisions on particular points may be found in Stimson, Am. Stat. Law. Many features are common to most of the states and, making due allowance for differences of detail, the character of the officer is substantially the same. In general, it may be noted that he is commander of the state militia, subject to the paramount federal constitutional control when it is in the actual service of the United States: he has in most cases a pardoning power (except in some states for treason), as to which, however, there is a growing tendency to limit it by requiring the recommendation of a board of pardons, either such in name or effect, usually composed of several executive officers, virtute officii; he has usually a veto power which compels the reconsideration of legislation by a two-thirds vote in most cases, but in some, three-fifths, and in others a mere majority; in most of the states he has power to summon the legislature in extra session, and to adjourn its sessions when the two houses disagree as to the time. As a rule, the governor's power of appointment is confined to minor state officials, and he has no power of removal except for cause and after a hearing. He is usually charged with the duty of sending messages to the legislature containing his views and recommendations upon public questions. The constitutional powers vested in the governor alone are addressed to and regulated by his own uncontrolled discretion; for example, where an officer assuming to act as governor, in his absence, had issued a proclamation convening the legislature in extraordinary session, the governor having returned previous to the time named for the meeting, and issued a second proclamation, revoking the first, it was held that, the power of convening the legislature being discretionary, the call might be recalled before the meeting took place; 3 Neb. 409; S. C. 19 Am. Rep. 634.

Under the United States constitution the governor of a state may call upon the president, when necessary, for aid in the enforcement of the laws.

His limited power of removal makes his power of direction and administration very slight. He is in effect a political rather than an administrative officer, his powers of the former class having increased while those of the latter class have been gradually curtailed. In this respect his relative position is quite the reverse of that of the president. For a discriminating review of this subject, see 1 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. ch. iii.; and see titles on the several states.

The executive power possessed by the president must be considered historically in order to reach an adequate view, both of its present scope and limitations and its growth since the adoption of the constitution. It is to be observed primarily that in the United States there is the fundamental condition that the executive power, whether of president or governor, is expressly granted, and the residuum of sovereignty is in the legislature, either federal or state as the case may be, and not, as in France and Germany, actually so, or, as in England, theoretically so. This remark is equally true as to its general results, notwithstanding decisions, that the express grant of executive power carries with it certain implied powers. These were still powers of executing the laws, and not, as in the countries named, of supplementing or adding to them.

Though it is often said that the framers of the United States constitution, in creating the office of president, had in view, as a model, the English king; Pom. Const. Law § 176, a more recent and probably correct view is that the office was rather modelled upon the colonial governor; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 52, and 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 36. An examination of the powers of the executive in each of the three colonies of New York, Massachusetts, and Virginia leads Professor Goodnow to the conclusion that the American constitutional executive power was that which has been called the political or governmental power, and which had usually been exercised by the colonial governor, to which was added the carrying on of foreign relations, which, in the colonial period, were under the control of the mother country, and afterwards of the continental congress. The fact that the constitution, in vesting in the president the executive power, used the term as one whose meaning would be readily understood, undoubtedly leads to the conclusion that the general powers so characterized were such as people of the states were accustomed to have exercised by the governors, first of the colonies and then of the states. But see Stevens, Sources Const. U. S. ch. vi.

The specific powers conferred by the constitution in addition to the general provision vesting the executive power in him, are that he shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy and the militia of the states when in service; that he may require the opinions of the officers of the executive departments; grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment; make treaties with the advice and consent of the senate, two-thirds thereof concurring, and, the senate consenting, appoint ambassadors, judges, and other officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for by law; give information to congress; convene both houses, or either, and adjourn them, when they disagree with respect to the time of adjournment, to such time as he shall think proper; receive ambassadors and other public ministers; take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and commission all officers; Const. art. ii. §§ 1, 2, 3.

This grant is said to have conferred upon the president the political power of an executive and one administrative power, viz., the power of appointment, beyond which he had no control over the administration; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 63; Pom. Const. L. § 633.

These original powers of the president have been increased by acts of congress conferring specific powers upon him and by decisions that his power is not limited by the express terms of legislative acts but includes certain "rights, duties, and obligations growing out of the constitution itself, our international relations, and all the protection implied by the nature of the government under the constitution;" 135 U. S. 1, 64. Under this implied power it was held that the president could take measures to protect a United States judge or a mail-carrier in the discharge of his duty without an act of congress authorizing him to do so; id. 67; or, in the same manner, to place guards upon the public lands to protect the property of the government. As an illustration of the exercise of this power the supreme court cites the executive action which resulted in the release of Koszta from a foreign prison where he was confined in derogation of his rights as a person who had declared his intention to become an American citizen; id. 64. He may remove obstructions to interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails; and enforce the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights under the constitution; in re Debs, 158 U. S. 568.

Another increase of the administrative power of the president was due to his power of removal, which was not expressed in the constitution, but it was held by a majority vote in the first congress to be a part of the executive power; 1 Lloyd's Debates 351, 366, 450, 480-600; 2 id. 1-12; 5 Marsh. Life of Washington, ch. 3, 196; and this construction of the constitution was judicially approved; Deady 204; and was undoubtedly the recognized practice of the government until the passage of the Tenure of Office Acts of 1867-9; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§

1767 to 1769 ; which were repealed in 1887. See 2 Sto. Const. §§ 1537-43 ; Paper of W. A. Dunning on the Impeachment and Trial of President Johnson ; 4 Papers Am. Hist. Assoc. 491 ; 1 Kent 310 ; Pom. Const. L. §§ 647-657. To the power of removal thus recognized has been attributed the evolution of " the president's power of direction and supervision over the entire national administration " and " the recognition of the possession by the president of the administrative power ; " 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 66. Whatever theories may be formed of the conception of the office in the minds of the framers of the constitution, and however the result may have been brought about, it cannot be doubted that the executive head of the federal government is now in fact the depository of the complete executive power, as it is understood to comprehend both political and administrative power. He is authorized to appoint certain officers in the executive departments, the discharge of whose duties is under his direction ; 1 Cra. 165 ; 12 Pet. 524 ; 5 Cra. C. C. 163. This is considered by the writer last cited to be a great enlargement of the American conception ; and this view seems to be well supported by the considerations already suggested. It is true that at the time of the adoption of the constitution the powers conferred upon the president were considered by many to be so great as to endanger the stability of the Union, and it is considered by one of the ablest authorities on constitutional law that no one of the three great departments " has been more shorn of its just powers, or crippled in the exercise of them, than the presidency ; " Miller, Const. U. S. 20, 95. But the context shows that this has reference solely to the encroachments on the appointing power by the extra-legal participation of members of congress therein—an evil much mitigated by the extension of the civil service system to the greater number of offices which were formerly not subject to its operation.

The administrative power of the president includes not only the control of the personnel of the public service but also the vast number of powers brought into action in the course of the administration of the government growing out of powers vested in the president by his duty under the constitution to see that the laws are faithfully executed. These duties, aside from this specific enumeration in the constitution as already stated, are those imposed upon the president by act of congress, and may be either of a special or general character, as the promulgation of regulations for the control of particular branches of the public service, such as consular regulations and the civil service rules ; but in most cases such executive regulations proceed from the heads of departments and not from the president directly, although they are in law presumed to proceed from him ; 13 Peters 498, 513 ; 16 id. 291 ; 20 Wall. 92, 109 ; 99 U. S. 10, 19 ; 101 id. 755. Executive acts, as to the manner of doing which there is no provision of law, may be done through the head of the proper department whose acts are the acts of the president in contemplation of law ; 137 U. S. 202, 217. The president may act in special cases by directions to his subordinate officers, either directly or through the head of a department, or by his decision on appeal from either of them, though, as a rule, he is not considered to be authorized to entertain such appeals except as to the jurisdiction of the officer appealed from ; 15 Op. Atty. Gen. 94, 100, reviewing opinions on this question. In other cases the appeal does not go beyond the head of the department ; 4 id. 515 ; 9 id. 462 ; 10 id. 526.

Congress may impose on any executive officer any duty which is not repugnant to any right which is secured and protected by the constitution ; 1 Cra. 137 ; 12 Pet. 524. With respect to certain executive functions which spring from the legislation of congress, after the occasion is created by the passage of a law, the authority of the legislature is ended, and the uncontrolled discretion of the executive attaches and is exercised independently of the other departments of the government. In the exercise of such powers the discretion of the subordinate officer, within his sphere, is the discretion of the president. Of this character are the control of the military resources of the government ; the pardoning power and the power of appointment, all of which are dormant until legislation has been enacted for creating an army and navy, or defining crimes and punishments and the creation of offices. As to another class of executive powers which depend entirely upon the legislation of congress both for their existence and their scope, the president merely executes the law. Within this class necessarily fall the greater number of executive functions, and they differ from the other classes in that, with respect to them, the president may be deprived of all discretion.

The executive powers which are derived directly from the constitution would still remain if all the legislative acts of congress were repealed. As to these the president is clothed with unrestrained discretion, and his acts in pursuance of them are purely political. He cannot be controlled nor can his powers be enlarged or diminished by legislation, though through the medium of proper laws he may be aided in the performance of the duties thus imposed upon him. For example, an attempt to limit the pardoning power or control its effect has been held unconstitutional, where the supreme court having declared that the power of the president dispensed with the necessity of proof of loyalty in cases authorizing claims for the value of property seized as captured or abandoned during the war ; congress subsequently enacted that such proof should be required irrespective of any executive pardon or amnesty. This the court held unconstitutional, saying :—" Now it is clear that the legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end." 13 Wall. 128, 148. But when a claim was made against the government for payment for supplies furnished before the war, it was held that the prohibitory legislation of congress prevented a recovery, because the disability of the claimant to receive a debt from the United States did not arise as a consequence of any offence but out of a state of war, and ended with the close of the war, and not by reason of the pardon, which operated only to relieve him from punishment for his acts and gave him no new rights: 118 U. S. 62.

As to his express powers the president is equally independent of the courts and can be held for maladministration of them only by impeachment; 1 Cra. 165; 12 Pet. 524; 5 Cra. C. C. 163; Hempst. 306.

The command of the army and navy is essentially an executive power; 2 Sto. Const. § 1491; 2 Kent 282; though it did not pass without criticism: 2 Elliot, Deb. 365; 3 id. 103, 103; the power to call out the militia is discretionary and his judgment of the necessity is final; 12 Wheat. 29; and he may delegate the command of it; Rawle, Const. 193; 2 Sto. Const., 5th ed. § 1492, n. 2. See 5 Mass. 548.

The power to require opinions from the heads of departments has been termed a mere redundancy; Federalist, No. 74; but it is said to be not without its use and frequently acted upon; 2 Sto. Const. § 1493; especially in two notable instances, by President Washington, 1793, relative to the condition of affairs between France and Great Britain, and by President Grant in 1873 in reference to the subject of expatriation; Miller, Const. U. S. 185.

The pardoning power of the president extends to any case in which it might have been exercised under the English law; 7 Pet. 150; 18 How. 307; and includes the power to grant a conditional pardon; id.; 4 Wall. 333; to relieve against forfeiture of property under a confiscation act; 6 Wall. 766; or release from fines, penalties, and forfeiture which accrue from the offence; 91 U. S. 474; or contempt of court; 24 La. Ann. 119; s. c. 13 Am. Rep. 115; it includes amnesty; 13 Wall. 128; and a general amnesty proclamation includes domiciled aliens; 16 Wall. 14, 148. The power of the president to issue a proclamation of general amnesty has been much drawn into question, and it was denied in a report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate made Feb. 17, 1869, that he could do it without the authority or assent of congress. It was the subject of legislation, an express power being granted to the president by sec. 13 of the act of June 17, 1862, which was repealed by act of Jan. 19, 1867. It was, however, generally considered that the subject was within the power of the executive, and it was exercised by Presidents Washington, Adams, Madison, Lincoln, and Johnson, and independently of congressional action. See an extended discussion of the subject in 8 Am. Law Reg. n. s. 513, 577. The president may act on pardons immediately, or first refer them to the executive departments; 14 Op. Att. Gen. 20.

The power to make treaties "embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war; for commerce or territory; for alliances or succors; for indemnity for injuries or payment of debt; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other." 2 Sto. Const. sec. 1508. This power is plenary; 14 Pet. 540; 93 U. S. 188; it includes removing the disabilities of aliens to inherit; 5 Cal. 381; or enabling them to purchase and hold lands in the United States; 2 Wheat. 259.

An important question has frequently arisen as to the effect of this power where legislation was required to give effect to a treaty. "In regard to this, any serious difficulty has been averted by the wisdom and forbearance of the house of representatives;" Miller, Const. U. S. 168. See also id. 181, and authorities cited; Pom. Const. L. §§ 676-681; 1 Kent 286; TREATIES.

The power of appointment includes nomination and appointment, and the power to commission is distinct, but when the commission is signed and sealed, the legal right of the officer is vested and delivery of the commission is not essential; 1 Cra. 137; 19 How. 74. The nomination is a recommendation in writing; 1 Cra. 137; 7 Op. Att. Gen. 186; and the senate can only affirm or reject; 3 Op. Att. Gen. 188; congress cannot by law designate the person to fill an office; 13 How. 40. The president cannot make a temporary appointment in a recess, if the senate was in session when or since the vacancy occurred; 16 Am. L. Reg. 786.

Whether a newly created office, not before filled, is a vacancy, within the constitutional power of the president to make temporary appointments, is a question upon which courts and attorneys-general have differed. The most reasonable conclusion and that best supported by authority seems to be that it is not; Cooley, Const. Law 104, n. 5; Ordronaux, Const. Leg. 107; and it is said that if the senate is in session when offices are created by law and no appointment is made, no vacancy exists in such sense that the president can appoint during the recess; id.; 2 Sto. Const. § 1559; 7 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 786; 3 Fed. Reg. 112.

Strictly speaking, an appointment to office is an executive act; 3 J. J. Marsh. 404; 2 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. 22; but in many cases it has been held that it may be exercised by the legislative power, and this in the absence of negative constitutional limitation is held valid; id.; Cooley, Const. Lim. 115, n.; 15 Md. 376; 13 Mich. 481; 24 id. 44; 6 W. Va. 562; contra, 118 Ind. 449; id. 426; 7 Ohio St. 546; 29 id. 102.

See, generally, as to the president's power of appointment and removal, 2 Sto. Const. §§ 1545-1553; Rawle, Const. 166; Sergeant, Const. ch. 29; Miller, Const. U. S. 156; Pom. Const. L. §§ 642-651.

Among the executive powers of first importance vested in the president is the management of foreign affairs, including the treaty power, to be exercised with the consent of the senate, and the power to appoint and receive foreign ministers, both of which are expressed in the constitution.

A question recently much discussed, is whether the recognition of a foreign revolutionary government is a matter entrusted, under the constitution, to the discretion of the president acting alone, or whether it is vested in congress, or requires the joint action of both of the political departments of the government. It has been contended on the one hand that this power "rests exclusively with the executive," and that, "a resolution on the subject by the senate or by the house, by both bodies or by one, whether concurrent or joint, is inoperative as legislation, and is important only as advice of great weight voluntarily tendered to the executive regarding the manner in which he shall exercise his constitutional functions."

Such is the view said to have been expressed by Secretary Olney in a public statement, which, although not an official document, was generally accepted as a fit expression of the opinion of those who take the extreme view of the prerogative of the executive on this subject. The occasion of this utterance was a unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate, recommending the passage of a joint resolution, "That the independence of the Republic of Cuba be, and the same is, hereby acknowledged by the United States of America."

The opposite opinion is based upon the idea that, because the constitution vests in congress the power to declare war (which is liable to be a consequence of the recognition of a new government) not only is the action of that body necessary, but it is the proper department of the government to act in such case. At least it is contended that congress has the power to act even if its power is not exclusive.

The argument in favor of the absolute and exclusive control of the subject by congress is substantially this:—The recognition of the independence of a people is from its very nature the creation of obligations arising from international law, and therefore must belong to the law-making power; it is also a supreme act of sovereignty and must be done by that department of the government in which the national sovereignty resides. Under the constitution, congress is invested with almost all the prerogatives of sovereignty, the only one granted to the president being the pardoning power, and even that is denied in cases of impeachment. The power in question is not directly granted to the president; therefore, is not one of his functions unless necessary to the full and proper exercise of some power directly granted to him or inherent in the office. His general inherent function is to execute the laws, to which this power of recognition has no relation, unless it be exercised in pursuance of law. The only expressed power from which it is sought to imply this far-reaching authority is that of receiving ambassadors and ministers, and that, it is urged, is simply a ceremonial duty, imposed upon him as the medium through which the government communicates with foreign governments. As the power of receiving ambassadors and ministers can be exercised pursuant to the direction of congress in doubtful cases, the power to determine the existence or independence of a nation is not necessarily involved in the constitutional grant of power to receive ambassadors, etc. If this power is vested in the executive, it is unlimited and involves the authority, so far as this government is concerned, to alter the map of the world, change the relation of this government to other governments, and involve the country in war. That such uncontrolled executive power over foreign relations was intended, cannot be reconciled with the fact that the president cannot declare war, or make a treaty, or appoint an ambassador or consul without the consent of the senate.

The argument from this point of view is very forcibly stated in a speech by Senator Bacon, Jan. 13, 1897, in the United States senate, made expressly to take issue with the position taken by Secretary Olney, supra.

A third view is that, under the constitution and according to precedent,

"the recognition of the independence of a new foreign power is an act of the executive (president alone, or president and senate), and not of the legislative branch of the government, although the executive branch may properly first consult the legislative. While the legislative branch of the government cannot directly exercise the power of recognizing a foreign government, because that is a power executive or judicial in nature (and one which the judiciary, by refusing independently to examine the question, cast entirely upon the executive), nevertheless, if a recognition of such independence is liable to become a casus belli with some other foreign power, it is most advisable as well as proper for the executive first to consult the legislative branch as to its wishes and postpone its own action if not assured of legislative approval."

The basis of the argument in favor of legislative participation in such action is mainly the power to declare war and, as particularly urged by Mr. Clay, the power to regulate commerce. The argument in favor of exclusive executive power is found in the general control of foreign relations, as to which the only expressed powers are to "make treaties" and to "receive ambassadors and other ministers." The argument of greater force in favor of executive control is, however, not that the power in question is included in the specific powers named but that it is a part of the general grant of executive power; that all duties in connection with foreign relations, not otherwise specified, are placed upon the executive, and that the two powers enumerated are merely illustrative and not exclusive. This third view is thus stated in a memorandum submitted to the United States senate by Senator Hale in connection with resolutions pending for the recognition of Cuba, and printed as Ex. Doc. No. 56, 2d Sess. 54th Cong.

"It is in the light of this conception of the executive character of foreign negotiations and acts concerning foreign relations that our constitution gave the president power to send and receive ministers and agents to or from any country he sees fit, and when he sees fit, and not to send or receive any, as he may think best. Also, the power to make treaties; that is, to negotiate with or without agents, as he may prefer, when he may prefer, or not at all, if he prefer; to draw up such articles as may suit him; and to ratify the acts of his plenipotentiaries, instructed by him, the only qualification of his power being the advice and consent of the states in the senate to the treaty he makes. These grants confirm the executive character of the proceedings, and indicate an intent to give all the power to the president, which the federal government itself was to possess—the general control of foreign relations."

The extent of executive control of foreign relations was the subject of an extended debate in congress in 1796, upon a resolution calling upon the president for details of the negotiations leading up to the Jay treaty with England, the exact question, however, being the effect of a treaty when negotiated. See TREATY.

With respect to the express power of the executive to make treaties, that is shared with the senate and there is no precedent for the primary act of recognition of a new foreign state, by the joint action of president and senate under the treaty-making power. As to the power to "receive ambassadors and other ministers," though it was much debated as giving the president too much power, the only comments on it in the Federalist are the following:

"This, though it has been a rich theme of declamation, is more a matter of dignity than of authority. It is a circumstance which will be without consequence in the administration of the Government; and it was far more convenient that it should be arranged in this manner, than that there should be necessity for convening the legislature, or one of its branches, upon every arrival of a foreign minister; though it were merely to take the place of a departed predecessor." Federalist, No. 69, p. 326.

"Except some cavils about the power of . . . receiving ambassadors, no objection has been made to this class of authorities; nor could they possibly admit of any. . . . As to the reception of ambassadors, what I have said in a former paper will furnish a sufficient answer." id. No. 77, p. 362.

The executive can alone appoint a diplomatic representative to a new government, but to do this there is required congressional action to provide for the payment of his salary, and it might be an inference from the practice of the government that the creation of an office, either directly or by provision for compensation to its incumbent, is a prerequisite to the appointment of a person to exercise any public functions. It has been argued, on the other hand, that such an officer, appointed by the president and senate, and his position as an officer having been established, might serve gratuitously or be paid out of the contingent fund. It would seem, however, that it might be urged with more force that merely from an appointment authorized by the constitution, there would arise an obligation to provide compensation, of the same character as those created in many cases without the direct action of congress, notably under the power to make a treaty (q. v.).

In 1798 a discussion arose as to this power, in which was considered the possible clashing between the appointing power of the president and the appropriating financial power of congress. In the course of debate Mr. Otis concluded his remarks with some observations not less pertinent to the present question than to that to which they were addressed: "It was owing to the apparent contradictions arising from a theoretical view of constitutions like ours that they were pronounced to be impracticable by some of the best writers of antiquity. And these abstract questions and extreme cases were not calculated to reconcile the minds of our citizens to our excellent form of government. It is a plain and conclusive reply, by which all such objections are obviated, that the constitution is not predicated upon a presumed abuse of power by any department, but on the more reasonable confidence that each will perform its duty within its own sphere with sincerity, that division of sentiment will yield to reason and explanation, and that extreme cases are not likely to happen."

And Attorney-General Cushing objected to an act in which it was provided that the president "shall" appoint a consul at Port au Prince, that it involved the diplomatic recognition of the Haytian empire, which rested entirely within the discretion of the president. 7 Op. Attys. Gen. 242.

Turning to the precedents, the right to recognize a foreign power was first discussed in 1818 with reference to the South American republics. The matter first came up on an appropriation to pay a minister, which was defeated, after a debate, in which Mr. Clay maintained that recognition might be either by the president in receiving or sending a minister, or by congress under the commerce clause; and the relation of the two powers of government to the subject was much considered; Ann. of Cong. (1818), pp. 1468-1608-1655. The subject was at this time much discussed both in congress and between the president and individual members, so much so that Mr. Adams, the secretary of state, in his memoirs, mentions jocular remarks made in the cabinet in that connection about the power of impeachment; 4 Memoirs, J. Q. Adams 204-206. Subsequently the subject was revived in the house and various resolutions were considered, with the result of a request for information from the president, which was responded to by the message of March 8, 1822, in which he said it was his duty to invite the attention of congress to a very important subject, and to communicate the sentiments of the executive on it; that, should congress entertain other sentiments, then there might be such co-operation between the two departments of the government as their respective rights and duties might require. And after stating that in his judgment the time had come to recognize the republics, he said: "Should congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect." The house then resolved that it "concur in the opinion expressed by the president in his message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the late American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations," and directed an appropriation "to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition." The Hale memorandum concludes a review of this matter with a protest against the conclusion which has been drawn that President Monroe, after all the discussion, had admitted the power of recognition in congress, but concedes that he did acknowledge "the importance of consulting the legislative branch when a step was about to be taken whose expediency might be doubted, and which would necessarily result in a request for appropriations."

In June, 1836, in reporting a resolution declaring that the independence of Texas ought to be recognized, the committee on foreign affairs of the senate made a report in which it was said: "The recognition of Texas as an independent power may be made by the United States in various ways: First, by treaty; second, by the passage of a law regulating commercial intercourse between the two powers; third, by sending a diplomatic agent to Texas with the usual credentials; or, lastly, by the executive receiving and accrediting a diplomatic representative from Texas, which would be a recognition as far as the executive only is competent to make it. . . . The President of the United States, by the constitution, has the charge of their foreign intercourse. Regularly he ought to take the initiative in the acknowledgment of the independence of any new power, but in this case he has not yet done it, for reasons which he, without doubt, deems sufficient. If in any instance the president should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of congress, as was done in relation to the republics formed out of Spanish America." Quoted in Senate Report, No. 1160, 54th Cong. 2d Sess.

President Jackson, in his message of Dec. 21, 1836, after referring to the resolution, said that there had never been any deliberate inquiry as to where belonged the power of recognizing a new state,—a power in some instances equivalent to a declaration of war, and nowhere expressly given, but only as it is implied from some of the great powers given to congress or in that given to the president to make treaties and receive and appoint ministers. Then he continues: "In the preamble to the resolution of the house of representatives it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur, and do not, therefore, consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the executive and the legislature in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the constitution and most safe that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to congress, which represents in one of its branches the states of this Union, and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country and a perfect guaranty to all other nations of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted."

As to this message the Hale memorandum, which, it is to be remembered, is an argument for the absolute and unqualified power of the executive (but modified only by what might be termed a moral duty to consult congress in extreme cases) remarks:

"President Jackson plainly was of the opinion that, in a doubtful case, when international complications might be involved, the president should not recognize a revolutionary government without the assent of congress. His language is so carefully guarded that no inference can be made with entire confidence as to the proper course if the executive were strongly of the opinion that facts justifying the recognition of independence did not exist."

With respect to other expressions on this subject from the executive department of the government, Secretary Seward wrote to Minister Dayton, April 7, 1834: "The question of recognition of foreign revolutionary or reactionary governments is one exclusively for the executive, and cannot be determined internationally by congressional action." This had reference to the action of the house of representatives, which had unanimously adopted a resolution protesting against the establishment of an empire in Mexico under Maximilian. The senate did not act on it. The French government asked an explanation, and the secretary of state, using the expression quoted, said that a vote of the house or the senate could neither coerce the executive to modify its policy nor deprive it of its freedom of action. In Dec., 1854, the house by a large majority affirmed their right to advise on questions of foreign policy; but, as was remarked by an intelligent foreign writer, this declaration does not appear to have had any influence on the course of the administration. Chambrun, Exec. Pow. in the U. S. 101.

On the other hand, Secretary Clayton, writing to Mr. Mann, a special agent to investigate the Hungarian insurrection, says: "Should the new government prove to be, in your opinion, firm and stable, the president will cheerfully recommend to congress, at their next session, the recognition of Hungary; and you might intimate, if you should see fit, that the president would in that event be gratified to receive a diplomatic agent from Hungary in the United States by or before the next meeting of congress, and that he entertains no doubt whatever that in case her new government should prove to be firm and stable, her independence would be speedily recognized by that enlightened body." In his Digest of International Law, from which the foregoing is quoted, Dr. Wharton concludes his statement of precedents on this subject as follows: "As to this it is to be remarked that while Mr. Webster, who shortly afterwards, on the death of President Taylor, became secretary of state, sustained the sending of Mr. Mann as an agent of inquiry, he was silent as to this paragraph, and suggests, at the utmost, only a probable congressional recognition in case the new government should prove to be firm and stable. In making congress the arbiter, President Taylor followed the precedent of President Jackson, who, on March 3, 1837, signed a resolution of congress for the recognition of the independence of Texas. The recognition, however, by the United States, of the independence of Belgium, of the powers who threw off Napoleon's yoke, and of the South American states who have from time to time declared themselves independent of prior governments, has been primarily by the executive, and such also has been the case in respect to the recognition of the successive revolutionary governments of France."

The courts have frequently had occasion to determine whether the independence of a foreign country should be recognized as existing for the purpose of the pending case, but not to pass upon the question of power as between the executive and legislative departments. In an early case Marshall, C. J., said that before a nation

"could be considered independent by the judiciary of foreign nations, it was necessary that its independence should be recognized by the executive authority of those nations. That as our executive had never recognized the independence of Buenos Ayres, it was not competent to the court to pronounce its independence." 2 Wh. Cr. Cas. 543.

A little later, on certificate of division, the supreme court had before it the direct question of the rights of a revolting colony, or portion of a nation which has declared its independence. The case was the trial for piracy of one of the revolutionary subjects.

Marshall, C. J., speaking for the court, said:

"Those questions which respect the rights of a part of a foreign empire, which asserts and is contending for its independence, and the conduct which must be observed by the courts of the Union towards the subjects of such section of an empire who may be brought before the tribunals of this country, are equally delicate and difficult. . . . Such questions are generally rather political than legal in their character. They belong more properly to those who can declare what the law shall be who can place the nation in such a position with respect to foreign powers as to their own judgment shall appear wise; to whom are entrusted all its foreign relations, than to that tribunal whose power as well as duty is confined to the application of the rule which the legislature may prescribe for it." The certificate of opinion was " . . . The court is further of opinion that when a civil war rages in a foreign nation, a part of which separates itself from the old established government, and erects itself into a distinct government, the courts of the Union must view such newly constituted government as it is viewed by the legislative and executive departments of the government of the United States." 3 Wheat. 610.

In a case involving the question of the right of citizens of the United States to the use of the seal fisheries at the Falkland Islands belonging to Buenos Ayres, 3 Sumn. 270, 273. Mr. Justice Story said,

"It is very clear that it belongs exclusively to the executive department of our government to recognize from time to time any new governments which may arise in the political revolutions of the world; and until such new governments are so recognized they cannot be admitted by our courts of justice to have or to exercise the common rights and prerogatives of sovereignty."

He adds that "this doctrine was fully recognized by the supreme court" in Gelston v. Hoyt; which was one of those cases cited infra in which the court had referred to the recognition of independence, by the "government." On appeal from Judge Story's decision the supreme court held that the action, of the executive department of the government, on the question to whom the sovereignty of the islands belonged was binding and conclusive on the courts, and it was enough that in the exercise of his constitutional functions the president had decided that question; 13 Pet. 417, 420. In several cases the court has said that the question of the recognition of belligerency or independence is one for the government of the United States: 4 Wheat. 52; 5 id. 338; 6 id. 193; 3 id. 324; 4 Cra. 241, 272; and again congress and the president are referred to as "those departments" having the control of such matters; 11 Wall. 632, 638. On a bill to enforce an agreement the validity of which turned on the question whether at its date Texas was, or was not, independent, Taney, C. J., said that "was a question for that part of our government which is charged with our foreign relations," and it was held that the court could not inquire whether it had not in fact become an independent sovereign state before its recognition as such by the treaty-making power; 14 How. 38, 51.

In the Prize Cases, much later than any of those above cited (relating not to foreign but to domestic relations, and therefore not strictly applicable), this language is used:

"As in the case of an insurrection, the President must, in the absence of congressional action, determine what degree of force the crisis demands, and as in political matters the courts must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department to which this power is entrusted, the proclamation of blockade by the president is of itself conclusive evidence that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized recourse to such a measure." 2 Black 635.

In this case, the court terms the executive the political department of the government, and in a later case it so designates congress; 1 Wall. 412. More recently in a case in which the president was authorized, by act of congress, to declare that a guano island belonged to the United States, the court said:

"Who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory is not a judicial, but a political, question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges as well as all other officers, citizens, and subjects of that government;" 137 U. S. 202.

With reference to the status of the revolutionary party of Chile, the circuit court of appeals said that it was to be regarded by the courts as determined by the executive department of the United States; 56 Fed. Rep. 505; aff'd 48 id. 99.

The earliest reference to this subject by a text-writer is by Rawle, who says:

"The power of receiving foreign ambassadors carries with it, among other things, the right of judging in the case of a revolution in a foreign country, whether the new ruler ought to be recognized. The legislature, indeed, possesses a superior power, and may declare its dissent from the executive recognition or refusal, but until their sense is declared, the act of the executive is binding. The judicial power can take no notice of a new government, until one or the other of those two departments has acted on it. Circumstances may render the decision of great importance to the interests and peace of the country. A precipitate acknowledgment of the independence of part of a foreign nation, separating itself from its former head, may provoke the resentment of the latter; a refusal to do so may disgust the former, and prevent the attainment of amity and commerce with them if they succeed. The principle on which the separation takes place must also be taken into consideration, and if they are conformable to those which led to our own independence, and appear likely to be preserved, a strong impulse will arise in favor of recognition. . . . The power of congress on this subject cannot be controlled; they may, if they think proper, acknowledge a small and helpless community, though with a certainty of drawing war upon our country; but greater circumspection is required from the president, who, not having the constitutional power to declare war, ought ever to abstain from a measure likely to produce it." Rawle, Const. 195.

A little later Story wrote:

"The exercise of this prerogative of acknowledging new nations or ministers is, therefore, under such circumstances, an executive function of great delicacy, which requires the utmost caution and deliberation. . . . If such recognition is made, it is conclusive upon the nation, unless indeed, it can be reversed by an act of congress repudiating it. If, on the other hand, such recognition has been refused by the executive, it is said that congress may, notwithstanding, solemnly acknowledge the sovereignty of the nation or party (citing Rawle). These, however, are propositions which have hitherto remained as abstract statements under the constitution, and therefore can be propounded, not as absolutely true, but as still open to discussion if they should ever arise in the course of our foreign diplomacy. The constitution has expressly invested the executive with power to receive ambassadors and other ministers. It has not expressly invested congress with the power either to repudiate or acknowledge them." 2 Sto. Const. § 1566.

In connection with this treatment of the subject is to be considered the judicial utterance of Judge Story, before cited from 3 Sumn. 270. Pomeroy is also cited in Senator Hale's memorandum as an authority in favor of the exclusive executive control, which he does assert strongly with reference to foreign relations, and the treaty-making power in general, but he does not discuss the particular question under consideration; while he enforces with great earnestness the necessity of harmonious action of congress and the executive, and of their co-operation in giving due effect to the powers confided to each; Pom. Const. Law § 675.

Dr. Wharton, in his Digest of International Law, in discussing the subject of the recognition of various revolutionary governments, entitles section vii. of chap. iii., vol. 1, thus: "Such recognition determinable by executive," thus implying the opinion that the right rests with the executive alone. The author states the proposition embodied in his caption more fully thus:

"In political matters the courts follow the department of the government to which those matters may be committed, and will not recognize the existence of a new government until it has been recognized by the executive." Most of the cases, however, which are cited by him under this caption are among the authorities upon the proposition already noted, that it is not a matter for the judicial department of the government, but that the courts will not take cognizance of the existence of a new government until it has been recognized by the political department of the government, without discriminating between the executive and legislative branches of the government.

From an examination of all the decisions touching this question by the judicial department, no precise principle can be deduced unless it be that the references to it rest upon an assumption of entire harmony of action between the executive and legislative departments. And the fact that the direct issue arising from the claim of exclusive control by one of those two departments has not heretofore been made, will readily account for the absence of direct judicial authority or authoritative expression of opinion by text-writers. The duties and powers of what the supreme court frequently terms the political departments are so closely interwoven that it is unlikely that such an issue will be sharply drawn. Every approach to it hitherto has resulted, after discussion, in the recognition by congress of the right of the executive to full control of foreign relations and to the initiative in the practical recognition of a new foreign power, and, on the other hand, by a prudent disposition on the part of the executive not to act in a doubtful case or one likely to create a casus belli without ascertaining the disposition of congress. This has been simply the application to this particular subject of the principle of mutual recognition of the distribution of powers and interdependence of the executive and congress which, with the prudent reserve of the judiciary in keeping closely within the limits of its own sphere, has enabled the government to avoid the dangers of mere theoretical construction alluded to by Mr. Otis in the quotation made from his remarks upon the subject. The undoubted constitutional powers of both departments bearing upon the question make harmony of action as necessary in dealing with this subject as with most, if not all, of the ordinary details of the government. While the president may undoubtedly recognize a foreign government, as has frequently been done, such action, if it involved war, would still require the action of congress to make it effective, and doubtless the precedents established by Presidents Jackson and Monroe, neither of whom was indifferent to the respect due to his office, will always have very great, if not controlling, weight. Again, the question recently raised of the right of congress by independent action and against the views of the president, to recognize the independence of a new nation, is more likely to be met hereafter, as heretofore, in the spirit of co-operation and full recognition of the executive control of foreign relations than to be asserted, to the extent of making a direct issue, as it would need to be by a majority of two-thirds of each house.

Executive officers, including the president, are required to execute the laws as enacted by the legislature or congress, and can in no case nullify them by refusing to execute them so long as their unconstitutionality or invalidity has not been judicially established, for, until this is done, the constitutionality is presumed, and in the judicial power alone resides the power to decide as to the validity of a statute; Pom. Const. L. secs. 148, 662-668; 2 Dall. 304; 1 Wheat. 304; 6 id. 264; 21 How. 506.

The question whether an executive officer has, under any circumstances, the right to question the constitutionality of an act of congress, and to make this decision the basis of acting upon claims to be passed upon by him, was the subject of consideration and extended discussion in the sugar bounty case lately pending before the comptroller of the treasury. It was contended on the one hand that every law must be considered valid until declared otherwise by the supreme court, and that although the comptroller is an independent officer, and not a mere subordinate of the secretary of the treasury or the president, such an exercise of jurisdiction would be a dangerous usurpation by an executive officer of judicial authority, which is confided by the constitution exclusively to the courts. On the other hand, it was urged that the constitution is the supreme law, and that an executive officer is responsible for a wrongful act under an unconstitutional statute. It was replied that his responsibility is political. The claim was disallowed by the comptroller upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional and the case sent to the court of claims under the authority of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1065. The act in question had been held unconstitutional, but not by the court of last resort; 23 Wash. Law Rep. 33. Subsequently the act was held to be constitutional by the supreme court, but the question of the power of the comptroller was not determined; 163 U. S. 427. This decision of the comptroller and the questions involved have been elaborately discussed by Mr. Black, the writer on constitutional law, who, after an examination of the authorities, reaches the conclusion that the power of an executive officer to judge of the constitutionality of a statute (in advance of a determination by the courts) is confined to cases in which it is necessary for the regulation of his own conduct, and that where the rights of others are involved he must enforce the law; 29 Am. L. Rev. 801. See also 11 Op. Atty. Gen. 214; 114 U. S. 270; 96 id. 567; 104 id. 728; 135 id. 100; 120 id. 102.

The same principle is applied in the state governments. In a recent case in Louisiana it was held that the executive officers of the state government have no authority to decline the performance of purely ministerial duties imposed upon them by a statute, on the ground that it is unconstitutional. An executive officer cannot nullify a law by neglecting or refusing to act under it; 18 S. Rep. (La.) 746.

The so-called war powers of the executive, so much discussed during the late war, do not now present a practical subject for discussion, and may be passed, with this quotation from a judicious writer on the subject:

"During our Civil War, many powers were claimed and exercised by the president under a stringency of circumstances for which no provision had been made in the constitution. Secession being the outgrowth of the doctrine of states governed by compact and not by law, it became necessary, in the complication growing out of the war, whether in the form of military occupancy and blockade, legislative reconstruction, or judicial protection of persons and property in the seceded states, to find by implication, in the executive department, certain war powers not hitherto contemplated and never before invoked. While the general results of their exercise doubtless contributed to the restoration of the Union, and the re-establishment of the government of the United States over all its territory, these powers were so far anomalous in their assumption as to afford no justifiable precedents for the government of the executive, in the ordinary circumstances of our federal administration. A formal discussion of their scope and application has accordingly been omitted, because they present exceptions in the body of our constitutional legislation that are never again likely to be repeated." Ordonaux, Const. Leg. 109. See Whiting, War Powers under the Constitution; Campbell, Collection of Pamphlets on Habeas Corpus; Martial Law, etc.

The president is not responsible to the courts, civil or criminal; 4 Blatchf. 451; nor are his acts reviewable by them to the extent of bringing them into conflict with him; 4 Wall. 475; except that they may declare void an order or regulation in excess of his powers; 1 Gall. 137; 9 Am. Law Reg. 524; but with respect to all of his political functions growing out of the foreign relations, the control of military officers, and his relations with congress, it is settled that the courts have no control whatever; 5 Peters 1, 20; 7 How. 1; 4 Wall. 475; 1 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. 34, 73; Pom. Const. L. § 633. See also 1 Ves. 467; 1 Ves. Jr. 375; 2 id. 56.

All the acts of the president by which his political powers are exercised are considered equally political, and are only brought within the scope of judicial examination where the act of some inferior ministerial officer, who is the direct instrument for exercising the executive function, is submitted to the scrutiny of the courts. This usually occurs where the constitutionality of a law is questioned by the judicial examination of the act of some officer who has attempted to carry the law into execution. In such a case there is not a direct judicial examination of the president's acts, or those of his subordinates, but merely the determination of the question whether there is a valid law; id. 419; 1 Cranch 137; 4 Wall. 475; Pom. Const. L. § 633.

So, as a necessary incident of the power to perform his executive duties, must be included freedom from any obstruction or impediments; accordingly, the president cannot be liable to arrest, imprisonment, or detention, while he is in the discharge of the duties of his office; and for this purpose his person must be deemed, in civil cases at least, to possess an official inviolability; 2 Sto. Const. § 1569.

Whether in any case a court may issue a mandamus to the governor of a state is a question on which the decisions are not uniform. In some states it is held that, although conceding the independence of the executive from the control of the judiciary with respect to political duties and powers, as to ministerial duties imposed upon the executive, which might have been committed to another officer, the writ may be resorted to; 7 Jones, L. 545; 5 Ohio St. 528; 39 Cal. 189; 25 Md. 173; 43 id. 572; 17 Colo. 156; 36 Ala. 371; 31 Neb. 82; 2 Mont. 242; 38 Kan. 641. But the weight of authority would seem to be in favor of the contrary opinion; 32 Me. 508; 8 R. I. 192; 19 Ill. 229; 100 id. 472; 120 Mo. 428; 127 Ind. 588; 25 N. J. L. 331; 8 Ga. 360; 39 Mo. 388; 120 id. 428; 1 Ark. 571; 29 Mich. 320; 17 Fla. 67; 23 La. Ann. 1; 19 Minn. 103; 61 Miss. 102.

As to other executive officers, such as secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, and the like, though some conflict exists, the better-considered doctrine, and that supported by the great weight of authority, is properly said to be that courts will apply the general principle of law and issue the writ in the case of purely ministerial acts; High, Ext. Leg. Rem. § 124a-126, where the cases are collected.

The same principle is applied to determine how far the courts will interfere in like manner with the heads of executive departments, or bureaus thereof, of the federal government. If the act is purely ministerial the writ will issue; 12 Pet. 524; 16 D. C. 428; but it must be an act not growing out of the inherent powers of the officer; 6 How. 92; 17 id. 284; and in no case where the act involves the exercise of discretion will the court interfere; 4 Wall. 522; 9 id. 298; 116 U. S. 423; 128 id. 40; 137 id. 637; 139 id. 306; 155 id. 303.

EXECUTOR. One to whom another man commits by his last will the execution of that will and testament. 2 Bla. Com. 503.

A person to whom a testator by his will commits the execution, or putting in force, of that instrument and its codicils. Fonbl. Rights and Wrongs 307. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY; HÆRES.

Lord Hardwicke, in 3 Atk. 801, says, "The proper term in the civil law, as to goods, is haeres testamentarius; and executor is a barbarous term, unknown to that law." And again, "What we call executor and residuary legatee is, in the civil law, universal heir." Id. 800.

The word executor, taken in its broadest sense, has three acceptations. 1. Executor a lege constitutus. He is the ordinary of the diocese. 2. Executor ab episcopo constitutus or executor dativus; and that is he who is called an administrator to an intestate. 3. Executor a testator constitutus, or executor testamentarius; and that is he who is usually meant when the term executor is used. 1 Wms. Ex. 185.

A general executor is one who is appointed to administer the whole estate, without any limit of time or place, or of the subject-matter.

A rightful executor is one lawfully appointed by the testator, by his will. Deriving his authority from the will, he may do most acts before he obtains letters testamentary; but he must be possessed of them before he can declare in an action brought by him as such; 1 P. Wms. 763; Wms. Ex. 173.

An instituted executor is one who is appointed by the testator without any condition, and who has the first right of acting when there are substituted executors.

A substituted executor is a person appointed executor if another person who has been appointed refuses to act.

An example will show the difference between an instituted and a substituted executor. Suppose a man makes his son his executor, but if he will not act he appoints his brother, and if neither will act, his cousin: here the son is the instituted executor in the first degree, the brother is said to be substituted in the second degree, the cousin in the third degree, and so on. See Swinb. Wills, pt. 4, s. 19, pl. 1.

An executor de son tort is one who, without lawful authority, undertakes to act as executor of a person deceased. See EXECUTOR DE SON TORT.

A special executor is one who is appointed or constituted to administer either a part of the estate, or the whole for a limited time, or only in a particular place.

An executor to the tenor is a person who is not directly appointed by the will an executor, but who is charged with the duties which appertain to one: as, "I appoint A B to discharge all lawful demands against my will;" 3 Phill. Eccl. 116; 1 Eccl. 374; Swinb. Wills 247; Wentw. Ex. pt. 4, s. 4, p. 230; [1892] Prob. 227, 380; 66 Law T. N. s. 382.

Qualification. Generally speaking, all persons who are capable of making wills, and many others besides, may be executors; 2 Bla. Com. 503. The king may be an executor. So may a corporation sole. So may a corporation aggregate; Toller, Exec. 30; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. 32. So may an alien, if he be not an alien enemy residing abroad or unlawfully continuing in the country. See 3 Abb. App. Dec. 86. So may married women and infants; and even infants unborn, or en ventre sa mère, may be executors; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 29 a 2, § 3; 5 S. & R. 40. But in England an infant cannot act solely as executor until his full age of twenty-one years. Meanwhile, his guardian or some other person acts for him as administrator cum test. ann. See 25 Miss. 162; Schoul. Dom. Rel. § 416; ADMINISTRATION. A married woman cannot be executrix without her husband's consent; 56 Me. 300; 34 Ala. 40; 2 Ark. 212. But a man by marrying an executrix becomes executor in her right, and is liable to account as such; 2 Atk. 212; 1 Des. 150.

Persons attainted, outlaws, insolvents, and persons of bad moral character may be qualified as executors, because they act en autre droit and it was the choice of the testator to appoint them; 6 Q. B. 57; 12 B. Monr. 191; 7 W. & S. 244; 3 Salk. 162. It is the duty of the court, when a will has been proven, to grant letters testamentary to the person named in it upon application, if he is not disqualified by statute; 16 Or. 147. Poverty or insolvency is no ground for refusing to qualify an executor; but an insolvent executor may be compelled to give security; 2 Halst. Ch. 9; 2 Barb. Ch. 351; 148 Pa. 564. In some states a bond is required from executors, similar to or identical with that required from administrators. The testator may, by express direction, exempt from the obligation of giving a bond with sureties any trustees whom he appoints or directs to be appointed, but not his executor, unless permitted to do so by state statute; because the creditors of the estate must look to the funds in the executor's hands.

Idiots and lunatics cannot be executors; and an executor who becomes non compos may be removed; 1 Salk. 36; 2 Robertson 128. In Massachusetts, when any executor shall become insane, or otherwise incapable of discharging his trust, or evidently unsuitable therefor, the judge of probate may remove him; 11 Metc. 104. A drunkard may perform the office of executor; 12 B. Monr. 191; 7 W. & S. 244; but in some states, as Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, there are statutes providing for his removal. A court will not reject an executor on the ground that he is lacking in honesty, integrity, and business experience; 61 Conn. 420. As to who may be, see 30 Cent. L. J. 222.

Appointment. Executors can be appointed only by will or codicil; but the word "executor" need not be used. He may be appointed and designated, by committing to his charge those duties which it is the province of an executor to perform; 3 Phill. Eccl. 118; 10 B. Monr. 394; 2 Bradf. Surr. 32; 2 Spears 97; 7 Watts 51; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. 36. Even a direction to keep accounts will, in the absence of any thing to the contrary, constitute the person addressed an executor. A testator may project his power of appointment into the future and exercise it after death through an agent pointed out by name or by his office; 56 Conn. 268.

The appointment of an executor may be absolute, qualified, or conditional. It is absolute when he is constituted certainly, immediately, and without any restriction in regard to the testator's effects or limitation in point of time; Toller, Ex. 36. It may be qualified as to the time or place wherein, or the subject-matters whereon, the office is to be exercised; 1 Will. Ex. 204. Thus, a man may be appointed executor, and his term made to begin or end with the marriage of testator's daughter; or his authority may be limited to the state; or to one class of property, as if A be made executor of goods and chattels in possession, and B of choses in action; Swinb. Wills, pt. 4, s. 17, pl. 4; Off. Exec. 29; 3 Phill. Eccl. 424. Still, as to creditors, three limited executors all act as one executor, and may be sued as one; Cro. Car. 293. Finally, an executor may be appointed conditionally, and the condition may be precedent or subsequent. Such is the case when A is appointed in case B shall resign. Godolphin, Orph. Leg. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1. As to appointment, see 24 L. R. A. 684; 39 Sol. J. 228, 244.

Removal. An executor who fails to keep proper accounts or to render any account for a long period, who retains the trust funds mixed with his own and who makes improper investments, should be dismissed; 155 Pa. 215; but the mere delay of an executor to convert real estate into personalty when the same has increased in value, is not such misconduct as to warrant his removal; 65 Hun 621. He may be removed, however, where he has any conflicting personal interest; 148 Mass. 247.

Assignment. An executor cannot assign his office. In England, if he dies having proved the will, his own executor becomes also the original testator's executor. But if he dies intestate, an administrator de bonis non of the first testator succeeds to the executorship. And an administrator de bonis non succeeds to the executorship in both these events, in the United States generally, wherever a trust is annexed to the office of executor; 4 Munf. 231; 7 Gill 81; 8 Ired. Eq. 52; 17 Me. 204; 1 Barb. Ch. 565; 4 Fla. 144.

Acceptance. The appointee may accept or refuse the office of executor; 3 Phill. Eccl. 577; 4 Pick. 33; 34 Me. 37; 65 N. H. 102. But his acceptance may be implied by acts of authority over the property which evince a purpose of accepting, and by any acts which would make him an executor de son tort, which see. So his refusal may be inferred from his keeping aloof from all management of the estate; 5 Johns. Ch. 383; 16 Conn. 291; 2 Murph. Eq. 85; 9 Ala. 181; 62 Pa. 166; 158 id. 645. But he cannot be compelled to accept and qualify or renounce in some formal manner; 76 Ia. 163. See Wms. Exrs. 274. If one of two or more appointees accepts, and the other declines or dies, or becomes insane, he becomes sole executor; 6 Watts 373. An administrator de bonis non cannot be joined with an executor.

Acts before probate. The will itself is the sole source of an executor's title. Probate is the evidence of that title. See 97 Ala. 375; 10 Pick. 463; 34 N. H. 407. Before probate, an executor may do nearly all the acts which he can do after. He can receive payments, discharge debts, collect and recover assets, sell bank-stock, give or receive notice of dishonor, initiate or maintain proceedings in bankruptcy, sell or give away goods and chattels, and pay legacies. And when he has acted before probate he may be sued before probate; 6 Term 295; 4 Metc. 421. He may commence, but he cannot maintain, suits before probate, except such suits as are founded on his actual possession; 3 C. & P. 123; 7 Ark. 404; 3 Me. 174; 3 N. H. 517; 2 Atk. 285; 5 Exch. Cas. 14. So in some states he cannot sell land without letters testamentary; 7 Cra. 115; 9 Wheat. 565; or transfer a mortgage; 1 Pick. 81; or remain in his own state and sue by attorney elsewhere; 12 Metc. 423; or indorse a note so as to be sued, in some states; 5 Me. 261; 2 N. H. 291. And see 2 Pet. 239; 7 Johns. 45; Byles, Bills 40; Story, Pr. Notes 304; Story, Bills 250; 87 Ga. 448.

Powers of executors. An executor may do, in general, whatever an administrator can. See ADMINISTRATOR. His authority dates from the moment of his testator's death; Com. Dig. Administration (B 10); 5 B. & Ald. 745; 2 W. Bla. 692; 10 Ad. & El. 212. When once probate is granted, his acts are good until formally reversed by the court; 3 Term 125; 15 S. & R. 39. In some states he has power over both real and personal estate; 3 Mass. 514; 1 Pick. 157. In the majority, he has power over the real estate only when expressly empowered by the will, or when the personal estate is insufficient; 9 S. & R. 431; 2 Root 438; 25 Wend. 224; 3 M'Cord 371; 9 Ga. 55; 27 N. J. Eq. 445; 57 Ind. 42. The will may direct him to sell lands to pay debts, but the money resulting is usually held to be equitable assets only; 9 B. & C. 489; 3 Brev. 242; 8 B. Monr. 499; 82 Ill. 392; 50 N. J. L. 636; but the title and right of possession to the land remain in the heirs until the sale, and they are the proper parties to maintain ejectment; 68 Miss. 510; but see 112 N. C. 791; and to collect the rents; 168 Pa. 431. In equity, the testator's intention will be regarded as to whether the surplus fund, after a sale of the real estate and payment of debts, shall go to the heir; 1 Wms. Ex. 555, Am. note. An executor's power is that of a mere trustee, who must apply the goods for such purposes as are sanctioned by law; 4 Term 645; 9 Co. 88; Co. 2d Inst. 236; 13 Bush 77; 16 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 12. The personal representative has the legal title to the choses in action of the deceased, and may transfer, discharge, or compound them as if he were the absolute owner; 83 Ala. 225; 35 N. J. Eq. 461.

Chattels real go to the executor; but he has no interest in freehold terms or leases, unless by local statute, as in South Carolina. But the wife's chattels real, unless taken into possession by her husband during his lifetime, do not pass to his executors; 1 Wms. Ex. 579, n; 5 Whart. 138; 4 Ala. N. S. 350; 7 How. Miss. 425. The husband's act of possession must effect a complete alteration in the nature of the joint interest of husband and wife in her chattels real, or they will survive to her.

Redf. 450; 35 N. J. Eq. 461; 67 Ind. 596; 18 Conn. 610. Such are emblems; Brooke, Abr. Emblems; 4 H. & J. 139; 98 N. C. 383; but see 96 Ala. 536. Heirlooms and fixtures go to the heir; and as to what are fixtures, see FIXTURES, and 1 Wms. Ex. 615; 2 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 1450; Crosw. Ex. & Ad. 352. The widow's separate property and paraphernalia go to her. For elaborate collections of cases on the effect of nuptial contracts about property upon the executor's right, see 1 Wms. Ex. *660, Am. note 2; 2 id. 636, note 1; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 65. Donations mortis causa go to the donee at once, and not to the executor; 1 Nott & M'C. 237; 23 Pa. 59; 16 Gray 403; 56 Me. 327.

Suits. 1. By. In general, a right of action founded on a tort or malfeasance dies with the person. But personal actions founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or other duty to be performed, survive, and the executor may maintain them; Cowp. 375; 1 Wms. Saund. 216, n. See 76 Ind. 573; 5 B. & Ad. 78. By statutes in England and the United States this common-law right is much extended. An executor may now have trespass, trover, etc., for injuries done to the intestate during his lifetime. Except for slander, for libels, and for injuries inflicted on the person, executors may bring personal actions, and are liable in the same manner as the deceased would have been; 2 Brod. & B. 102; 2 Johns. Cas. 17; 1 Md. 102; 15 Ala. n. s. 253; 5 Blackf. 232; 6 T. B. Monr. 40; 3 Ohio 211; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 151. See 28 Cal. 567; 17 Vt. 176; 98 Mass. 85. Should his death have been caused by the negligence of any one, they may bring an action for the benefit of the family. Executors may also sue for stocks and annuities, as being personal property. A right of action for the breach of a parol contract for the sale of land survives to the executors; 6 S. & R. 208. So they may sue for an insurance policy. And for all these purposes they may take legal proceedings by action, suit, or summons.

The supreme court of New Jersey has lately held that the courts of New Jersey will enforce the Pennsylvania statute giving a right of action to the widow of one who dies of injuries inflicted by the wrongful act of another, that statute not being repugnant to the policy of the former state; but such an action cannot be brought in New Jersey by the personal representative of the deceased, as required by the laws of that state in similar cases; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 945.

2. Against. An action of trespass quare clausum fregit survives against the executor; 9 Phila. 240. So also in causes of action wholly occurring after the testator's death, the executor is liable individually; 80 N. C. 219. The actions of trespass and trover do not survive against the executors of deceased defendants. But the action of replevin does. The general rule is that causes of action ex contractu survive, while those ex delicto do not. "Executors and administrators are the representatives of the personal property of the deceased and not of his wrongs except so far as the tortious act complained of was beneficial to his estate;" 2 Kent 416.

Wife's choses. In general, choses in action given to the wife either before or after marriage survive to her, provided her husband have not reduced them to possession before his death. A promissory note given to the wife during coverture comes under this rule in England; 12 M. & W. 355; 7 Q. B. 864; but not so in this country generally; 4 Dana 333; 15 Conn. 587; 17 Me. 301; 17 Pick. 391. Mere intention to reduce choses into possession is not a reduction, nor is a mere appropriation of the fund; 5 Ves. 515; 11 S. & R. 377; 5 Whart. 138; 2 Hill, Ch. 644; 4 Ala. n. s. 350; 14 Ohio 100.

Other suits. For actions accruing after the testator's death, the executor may sue either in his own name or as executor. This is true of actions for tort, as trespass or trover, actions on contract and on negotiable paper; 3 Nev. & M. 391; 4 Hill 57; 19 Pick. 432; 4 Jones, N. C. 159. So he may bring replevin in his own name; 6 Fla. 314; and so, in short, wherever the money, when recovered, will be assets, the executor may sue as executor; 20 Wend. 668; 6 Blackf. 120; 1 Pet. 686. See 22 Ark. 535; 56 Pa. 166. An executor cannot recover in ejectment without producing the will; 56 Ga. 527; 87 id. 448.

As to federal jurisdiction over the administration of estates, it is held that by virtue of their chancery powers these courts have jurisdiction over such cases when the requisite citizenship and other conditions exist. The jurisdiction does not extend to the appointment of administrators, confirmation of executors, or the probate of wills; nor will it be exercised when the state courts of concurrent jurisdiction have taken possession of the subject-matter of the controversy. The possession of the state court which will exclude the exercise of power by the federal court, and vice versa, must be the possession of some thing, corporeal or incorporeal, which has been taken under the dominion of the court. A controversy or inquiry is not such a thing, and the pendency of a suit or proceeding in one court, involving a question, controversy, or inquiry, is no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction in the determination of the same question, etc., in the other; 41 Fed. Rep. 486.

Other powers. An executor may sell terms for years, and may even make a good title against a specific legatee, unless the sale be fraudulent. So he may underlet a term. He may indorse a promissory note or a bill payable to the testator or his order; 10 Miss. 687. The rule that executors have no power to confess judgment is not applicable to offers of judgments to firm creditors, by a firm composed of a surviving member and the executor of a deceased member, conducting the interests of the deceased therein; 61 Hun 557; but they may compromise claims; 15 Pick. 79; 26

Me. 531; 59 Tenn. 311; or submit matters in dispute to arbitration; 70 Vt. 340; 41 Ala. 198; 74 N. Y. 38. Without the sanction of the probate court, he has no power to bind the estate by contract, even for the necessities of infant devisees; 91 Mich. 270.

Co-executors. Co-executors are regarded in law as one individual; and hence, in general, the acts of one are the acts of all; Com. Dig. Administration (B 12); 9 Cow. 34; 8 S. C. 244; 83 Tex. 635; 129 N. Y. 190. Hence the assent of one executor to a legacy is sufficient, and the sale or gift of one is the sale or gift of all. So a payment by or to one is a payment by or to all; 8 Blackf. 170; 10 Ired. 263; 74 N. Y. 539; a release by one binds all; 26 Pa. 502. But each is liable only for the assets which have come into his own hands; 11 Johns. 21. So he alone who is guilty of tort or negligence is answerable for it, unless his co-executor has connived at the act or helped him commit it; 74 Cal. 199. An executor is not liable for a devastavit of his co-executor; 9 S. C. 460; 74 N. Y. 539. A power to sell land, conferred by will upon several executors, must be executed by all who proved the will; 2 Dev. & B. 262. But if only one executor consents to act, his sale under a power in the will would be good, and such refusal of the others may be in pais; Cro. Eliz. 80; 3 Dana 195; 92 Mich. 440. If the will gives no direction to the executors to sell, but leaves the sale to the discretion of the executors, all must join. But see less strict rules in 8 Pa. 417; 2 Sandf. 512; 1 N. Y. 341. Where all the executors must unite to make a valid conveyance, no valid contract to convey can be made by a part of them; 72 Wis. 539. One executor cannot bind his co-executors by a confession of judgment without their consent; 2 Pittsb. Pa. 54. On the death of one or more of several joint executors, their rights and powers survive to the survivor; Bac. Abr. Executor (D); Shepp. Touchst. 484. As to acts of co-executor, see 8 Cent. L. J. 63, 82; and as to liability of joint-executors, see 24 id. 147.

Duties. The following is a brief summary of an executor's duties:—

First. He must bury the deceased in a manner suitable to the estate; 2 Bla. Com. 508. But no unreasonable expenses will be allowed, nor any unnecessary expenses if there is any danger of the estate proving insolvent; 2 C. & P. 207; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 447; 24 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 296; 28 La. Ann. 149; 59 N. Y. 582.

Second. Within a convenient time after the testator's death, he should collect the goods of the deceased, if he can do so, peaceably; if resisted, he must apply to the law for redress.

Third. He must prove the will, and take out administration. In England, there are two ways of proving a will,—in common form, and in form of law, or solemn form. In the former, the executor propounds the will,—i. e. presents it to the registrar, in the absence of all other interested parties. In the latter, all parties interested are summoned to show cause why probate should not be granted.

Fourth. Ordinarily, he must make an inventory of personal property at least, and, in some states, of real estate also; 5 N. H. 492; 11 Mass. 190; 58 Me. 499; 14 N. J. Eq. 514; 71 Pa. 75. This duty rests on the executors and not on the adult legatees; 65 Hun 619.

Fifth. He must next collect the goods and chattels, and the claims inventoried, with reasonable diligence. And he is liable for a loss by the insolvency of a debtor, if it results from his gross delay; 6 Watts 46; 15 Ala. N. s. 328.

Sixth. He must give notice of his appointment in the statute form, and should advertise for debts and credits; 2 Ohio St. 156; but the giving or not giving it does not affect the statute of limitations, nor does the failure to publish, affect a creditor who did not present his claim; 94 Cal. 357.

Seventh. The personal effects he must deal with as the will directs, and the surplus must be turned into money and divided as if there were no will. The safest method of sale is a public auction.

Eighth. He must keep the money of the estate safely, but not mixed with his own, or he may be charged interest on it. He is also charged when he has misemployed funds or let them lie idle, provided a want of ordinary prudence is proved against him; 4 Mass. 205; 2 Bland, Ch. 306; 1 Sumn. 14; 2 Rand. 409; 4 Harr. N. J. 109; 3 Des. 241; 33 Pa. 258; 131 N. Y. 409. When a debtor is appointed executor of the creditor's will, equity will presume that the debt has been paid, and will treat it as an asset in the executor's hands; 90 Mich. 247. And generally, interest is to be charged on all money received by an executor and not applied to the use of the estate; 1 Bailey, Eq. 98; 1 Dev. Eq. 369; 6 J. J. Marsh. 94; 82 Pa. 143. See 150 id. 301. But an executor cannot be charged with interest on money allowed him for commission; 10 Pa. 408; 2 Jones, N. C. 347; he is not chargeable with compound interest; 24 Pa. 180. Where investments have been made contrary to the requirements of the will, on personal security, they are at the executor's risk, and he must answer personally for any loss; 48 N. J. Eq. 559. See INTEREST; INVESTMENTS.

Ninth. He must be at all times ready to account to the proper authorities, and must actually file an account at the end of the year generally prescribed by statute. The burden of proving items of a discharge in an accounting is upon the accountant; 48 N. J. Eq. 559.

Tenth. He must pay the debts and legacies in the order required by law. Funeral expenses are preferred debts, and so are debts to the United States, under certain limitations respecting insolvency, by act of congress; 2 Kent 418. Otherwise there is no one order of payment universal in the United States. A valid claim against an estate cannot be defeated on the ground that the estate had been settled before the claim was filed; 85 Ia. 698. See ADMINISTRATION.

Compensation. Commissions are not allowed on a legacy given in trust to an executor; 1 Bradf. Surr. 198, 321. Reasonable expenses are always allowed an executor; 5 Gray 26; 28 Vt. 765; 3 Cal. 287; 4 Abb. N. Cas. 317; 29 Miss. 72. When one of two co-executors has done nothing, he should get no commission; 20 Barb. 91. In England, executors cannot charge for personal trouble or loss of time, and can only be paid for reasonable expenses. An executor cannot pay himself. His compensation must be ordered by the court; 58 Ind. 374. Faithful service by an executor is a condition to the right of commissions. Misappropriation of funds may forfeit the right; 84 Pa. 51.

In England the jurisdiction of probate formerly belonged to the ecclesiastical courts. It was then exercised in the Court of Probate, which held its sittings in Westminster Hall. There was a principal registry of wills, situated in Doctors Commons, and forty district registries, scattered throughout England and Wales, each presided over by a district registrar, by whom probate was granted where the application was unopposed. This Court of Probate is now consolidated into the Supreme Court of Judicature, and its jurisdiction is exercised by the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of that court. Mozl. & W. Dict. In the United States the jurisdiction is vested in surrogates, judges of probate, registers of wills, county courts, etc.

See Schouler; Williams; Crosswell, Exrs. and Admrs.; Woerner, Law of Adm.; 3 Field, Lawy. Br. 387-416; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 42; 2 Lawson, Rights & Rem. 889-1008; ADMINISTRATION; ADMINISTRATOR.

EXECUTOR DE SON TORT. One who attempts to act as executor without lawful authority.

If a stranger takes upon him to act as executor without any just authority (as, by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased, and many other transactions), he is called in law an executor of his own wrong, de son tort; 2 Bla. Com. 507; 4 M'Cord 286; 12 Conn. 213; 48 Miss. 38; 14 E. L. & Eq. 510; 3 Litt. 163; 3 Pa. 129; 58 Ala. 310; 38 Ga. 264. If a man kill the cattle of the testator, or take his goods to satisfy a debt, or collect money due him, or pay out such money, or carry on his business, or take possession of his house, etc., he becomes an executor de son tort. Where a person with whom a will had been left filed it, but took out no letters with the will annexed, or any other legal authority to administer on the estate, he became an executor de son tort; 77 Ga. 114.

But a stranger may perform many acts in relation to a testator's estate without becoming liable as executor de son tort. Such are locking up his goods for preservation, burying the deceased in a manner suitable to his fortune, paying for the funeral expenses and those of the last sickness, making an inventory of his property to prevent loss or fraud solely, feeding his cattle, milking his cows, repairing his houses, etc. Such acts are held to be offices of kindness and charity; 19 Mo. 196; 28 N. H. 473. Nor does paying the debts of the deceased with one's own money make one an executor de son tort; 8 Rich. 29; 59 Conn. 247. Nor does one become executor de son tort by obtaining payment of a debt from an executor de son tort; 65 L. T. N. s. 709. The fact that a widow has taken possession of community property is not sufficient to authorize suit against her on a note of her deceased husband; 75 Tex. 595. As to what acts will render a person so liable, see Godolphin, Orph. Leg. 91; 1 Wms. Exec. 299; 1 Dane, Abr. 561; Bull. N. P. 48; Com. Dig. Administration (C 3); 8 Johns. 426; 15 S. & R. 39; 26 Me. 361; 6 Blackf. 367.

An executor de son tort is liable only for such assets as come into his hands, and is not liable for not reducing assets to possession; 2 Rich. Eq. 247; 82 Pa. 193. And it has been held that he is only liable to the rightful administrator; 3 Barb. Ch. 477; 58 Ala. 319. But see 9 Leigh 79; 2 M'Cord 423; 19 Mo. App. 488; which imply that he is also liable to the heir at law. He cannot be sued except for fraud, and he must be sued as executor; 1 Brayt. 116; 11 Ired. 215; 10 S. & R. 144; 5 J. J. Marsh. 170. But in general he is liable to all the trouble of an executorship, with none of its profits. And the law on this head seems to have been borrowed from the civil-law doctrine of pro hærede gestio. See Heineccius, Antiq. Syntagma, lib. 2, tit. 17, § 16, p. 468.

An executor de son tort is an executor only for the purpose of being sued, and not for the purpose of suing; 11 Ired. 215. He is sued as if rightful executor. But if he defends as such he becomes thereby also an executor de son tort; Lawes, Pl. 190, note; 4 B. Monr. 136; 1 M'Cord, Ch. 318; 21 Miss. 688; 2 H. & J. 435. When an executor de son tort takes out letters of administration, his acts are legalized, and are to be viewed in the same light as if he had been rightful administrator when the goods came into his hands; 19 Mo. 196; 15 Mass. 325; 4 Harr. Del. 108; 8 Johns. 126. But see, contra, 2 N. H. 475. A voluntary sale by an executor de son tort confers only the same title on the purchaser that he himself had; 6 Exch. 164; 20 E. L. & Eq. 145; 20 Ala. N. s. 587; 10 Watts 287.

It is held that in regard to land no man can be an executor de son tort; 1 Root 183; 7 S. & R. 192; 10 id. 144. In Arkansas it is said that there is no such thing as a technical executor de son tort; 17 Ark. 122, 129; and so in Missouri; 103 Mo. 339. See, on this subject, 35 Me. 287; 15 N. H. 137; 17 Mo. 91; 23 Miss. 544; 13 Ga. 478; 23 Ala. N. s. 548; 25 id. 353; Busb. 399; 12 La. Ann. 245, 344; 1 Rawle 149; Schoul. Exrs. & Admrs. § 184.

EXECUTORY. Performing official duties; contingent; also, personal estate of a deceased; whatever may be executed,—as, an executory sentence or judgment.

EXECUTORY CONSIDERATION.

Something which is to be done after the promise is made, for which it is the legal equivalent. See CONSIDERATION.

EXECUTORY CONTRACT.

One in which some future act is to be done: as, where an agreement is made to build a house in six months, or to do any act at a future day. See CONTRACT.

An agreement to sell and convey land, which is not a conveyance, operating as a present transfer of legal estate and seisin, is wholly executory, though it contains the words "grant, bargain and sell;" and produces no effect upon the estates and titles of the parties; and creates no lien or charge on the land itself; 32 Pa. 287; 37 id. 201; 35 W. Va. 463.

EXECUTORY DEVISE. Such a limitation of a future estate in lands or chattels as the law admits in case of a will, though contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at common law.

It is a limitation by will of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels. 38 Pa. 294.

By the executory devise no estate vests at the death of the deviser or testator, but only on the future contingency. It is only an indulgence to the last will and testament which is supposed to be made by one inoppositum. When the limitation by devise is such that the future interest falls within the rules of contingent remainders, it is a contingent remainder, and not an executory devise. 4 Kent 257; 3 Term 763.

If a particular estate of freehold be first devised, capable in its own nature of supporting a remainder, followed by a limitation which is not immediately connected with, or does not immediately commence from, the expiration of the particular estate of freehold, the latter limitation cannot take effect as a remainder, but may operate as an executory devise: e. g., if land be devised to A for life, and after his decease to B in fee, B takes a (vested) remainder, because his estate is immediately connected with, and commences on, the limitation of A's estate. If land be limited to A for life, and one year after his decease to B in fee, the limitation to B is not such a one as will be a remainder, but may operate as an executory devise. Fearn, Cont. Rem. 399. If land be limited to A for life, and after his decease to B and his heirs, with a proviso that if B survive A and die, without issue of his body living at his decease; then to C and his heirs, the limitation to B, etc., prevents an immediate connection of the estate limited to C with the life estate of A, and prevents its commencement on the death of A. It must operate, if at all, as an executory devise; Butler's note (c) to Fearn, Cont. Rem. 397. If a chattel interest be bequeathed for life, with remainder over, this latter disposition cannot take effect as a remainder, but may as an executory devise, or more properly bequest; id. 407.

An executory devise differs from a remainder in three very material respects:—

First. It needs no particular estate to support it. Second. By it a fee-simple or other less estate may be limited on a fee-simple. Third. By it a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest after a particular estate for life created in the same.

The first is a case of freehold commencing in futuro. A makes a devise of a future estate on a certain contingency, and till the contingency happens does not dispose of the fee-simple, but leaves it to descend to his heirs at law. 1 T. Raym. 82; 1 Salk. 226; 1 Lutw. 708.

The second case is a fee upon a fee. A devises to A and his heirs forever, which is a fee-simple, and then, in case A dies, before he is twenty-one years of age, to B and his heirs. Cro. Jac. 590; 10 Mod. 420.

The third case: a limitation in a term of years after a life estate. A grants a term of one thousand years to B for life, remainder to C. The common law regards the term for years as swallowed up in the grant for life, which, being a freehold, is a greater estate, and the grantee of such a term for life could alien the whole. A similar limitation in a will may take effect, however, as an executory bequest; 2 S. & R. 59; 1 Desaus. 271; 4 id. 330.

It is not a mere possibility, but a substantial interest, and in respect to its transmissibility stands on the same footing with a contingent remainder; 81 Va. 268.

In order to prevent perpetuities, the rule has been adopted that executory interests must be so limited that from the time of their limitation they will necessarily vest in right (not necessarily in possession) at a period not exceeding that occupied by the life or lives of a person or persons then living, or in ventre matris, and the minority of any person or persons born or in ventre matris prior to the decease of such first named person or persons, or at a period not exceeding that occupied by the life or lives of such first named person or persons, and an absolute term of twenty-one years afterwards, or within, or at the expiration of an absolute term of twenty-one years without reference to any life. For example, lands are devised to such unborn son of a feme covert as shall first reach the age of twenty-one years. The utmost length of time that can happen before the estate can vest is the life of the mother and the subsequent infancy of her son. Such an executory devise is therefore good. If, however, such limitation had been to the first unborn son who shall attain the age of twenty-five years, the rule against perpetuities would be infringed and the limitations bad; Smith, Ex. Int. 391; 2 Bla. Com. 174.

An executory devise limited after an indefinite failure of issue is bad as leading to a perpetuity; 4 Kent 273; and so of an executory bequest, but the courts are in the latter case much less apt to construe limitations as contemplating a definite failure of issue; 4 Kent 281; 1 P. Wms. 663; Gray, Perpet. 212.

An executory devise is generally indestructible by any alteration in the estate out of or after which it is limited. But if it is limited on an estate tail the tenant in tail can bar it, as well as the entail, by common recovery or by deed enrolled, etc., where such deed is by statute given the force and effect of a common recovery; Butler's note to Fearn, Cont. Rem. 562; Wms. R. P. 319.

EXECUTORY ESTATES. Interests which depend for their enjoyment upon some subsequent event or contingency. Such estate may be an executory devise, or an executory remainder, which is the same as a contingent remainder, because no present interest passes.

EXECUTORY PROCESS (Via Executoria). In Louisiana. A process which can be resorted to in two cases, namely: 1. When the right of the creditor arises from an act importing confession of judgment, and which contains a privilege or mortgage in his favor. 2. When the creditor demands the execution of a judgment which has been rendered by a tribunal different from that within whose jurisdiction the execution is sought. Code of Practice, art. 732.

EXECUTORY TRUSTS. A trust is called executory when some further act is requisite to be done by the author of the trust to give it its full effect. See Bisph. Eq. 31; Lewin, Tr. 144.

The distinction between executed and executory trusts is well settled; 7 Pa. 177; 1 Desaus. 441; though once doubted in England; 1 Ves. 142; but see 2 Ves. 323. The test is said to be: Has the testator been what is called, and very properly called, his own conveyancer? Has he left it to the court to make out from general expressions what his intention is? or has he so defined that intention that you have nothing to do but to take the limitations he has given to you, and to convert them into legal estates? per Lord St. Leonards, Ld. Ch., in 4 H. L. Cas. 210; see 7 R. I. 383; Bisph. Eq. 86.

In the case of articles made in contemplation of marriage, and which are, therefore, preparatory to a settlement, so in the case of a will directory of a future conveyance to be made or executed by the trustees named therein, it is evident that something remains to be done. The trusts are said to be executory, because they require an ulterior act to raise and perfect them: i. e. the actual settlement is to be made or the conveyance to be executed. They are instructions, rather than complete instruments, in themselves.

The court of chancery will, in promotion of the supposed views of the parties or the testator and to support their manifest intention, give to the words a more enlarged and liberal construction than in the case of legal limitations or trusts executed; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1; 1 Sanders, Uses and T. 237; White, Lead. Cas. 18. Where a voluntary trust is executory and not executed, if it could not be enforced at law because it is a defective conveyance, it is not helped in favor of a volunteer in a court of equity; 4 Johns. Ch. 498, 500; 4 Paige, Ch. 305; 1 Dev. Eq. 93. But where the trust, though voluntary, has been executed in part, it will be sustained or enforced in equity; 1 Johns. Ch. 329; 7 Pa. 175, 178; White, Lead. Cas. 176; 6 Ves. 656; 18 id. 140; 1 Keen 551; 3 Beav. 238.

EXECUTORY USES. Springing uses which confer a legal title corresponding to an executory devise.

Thus, when a limitation to the use of A in fee is defeasible by a limitation to the use of B to arise at a future period, contingency, or event, these contingent or springing uses differ herein from an executory devise: there must be a person seized to such uses at the time the contingency happens, else they can never be executed by the statute. Therefore, if the estate of the feoffee to such use be destroyed by alienation or otherwise, before the contingency arises, the use is destroyed forever; 1 Co. 134, 138; Cro. Eliz. 439; whereas by an executory devise the freehold itself is transferred to the future devisee. In both cases, a fee may be limited after a fee; 10 Mod. 423.

EXECUTRIX. A woman who has been appointed by will to execute such will or testament. See EXECUTOR.

EXECUTRY. In Scotch Law. The movable estate of a person dying, which goes to his nearest of kin. So called as falling under the distribution of an executor. Bell, Dict.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

EXEMPLIFICATION. A perfect copy of a record or office-book lawfully kept, so far as relates to the matter in question. See, generally, 1 Stark. Ev. 151; 1 Phill. Ev. 307; 7 Cra. 481; 9 id. 122; 3 Wheat. 234; 10 id. 469; 2 Yeates 532; 1 Hayw. 359; 1 Johns. Cas. 238; 6 Ct. Cls. 230; 92 Ind. 246; 56 Me. 107; 52 Ga. 438. As to the mode of authenticating records of other states, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

EXEMPLUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A copy. A written authorized copy. Used also in the modern sense of example; ad exemplum constituti singulares non trahi (exceptional things must not be taken for examples). Calv. Lex. Exempli gratia, for the sake of example. Abb. e. g.

EXEMPTION. The right given by law to a debtor to retain a portion of his property without its being liable to execution at the suit of a creditor, or to a distress for rent.

In general, the sheriff may seize and sell all the property of a defendant which he can find, except such as is exempted by the common law or by statute. The common law was very niggardly of these exceptions: it allowed only the necessary wearing apparel; and it was once holden that if a defendant had two gowns the sheriff might sell one of them; Comb. 356. But in modern times, with perhaps a prodigal liberality, a considerable amount of property, both real and personal, is exempted from execution by the statutes of the several states; 19 Am. L. Reg. 1; 4 So. L. Rev. n. s. 1; 3 Hughes 609; 82 N. C. 212, 241; 62 Ga. 568; 31 La. Ann. 374; 8 Bax. 33; 69 Mo. 41; 38 Mich. 669; 77 Cal. 194; 99 id. 202; 6 Wash. 327; 54 Minn. 366; 157 Pa. 133; and there is now hardly a state or nation which has not by statute made certain exemptions designed as a protection for the family; 18 John. 403; and such statutes are to be liberally construed; 104 Ind. 259; 33 Wis. 510; 61 Ill. 449; 46 Vt. 346; 38 Tex. 199; 40 Conn. 106. Some of the exemptions are the following: household furniture; 33 N. H. 345; 18 Wis. 163; 30 Vt. 224; 15 Cal. 266; 56 Tex. 308; tools of trade; 19 Conn. 513; 44 id. 93; 28 La. Ann. 695; 52 Wis. 315; the interest of a legatee in lands, until the court has held it to be a charge on such, although the legacy is given with a view that it shall be such a charge; 63 Hun 624; curtesy initiate; 109 N. C. 202; property held in trust; 33 Neb. 770; the bridge of a public corporation; 33 Neb. 857; blackberries while growing; 49 Minn. 412; trademark, apart from the articles it has served to identify; 20 N. Y. S. 462; a vendor's lien reserved for the purchase price of lands conveyed; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 509; the interest of a cestui que trust under a trust for maintenance and support; 8 C. C. App. 370; the interest of the grantor in property transferred in fraud of creditors; 141 N. Y. 1. State exemption laws are inapplicable to debts due from a citizen to the United States; 9 Fed. Rep. 674. See 106 U. S. 280.

See, generally, DISTRESS; EXECUTION; HOMESTEAD; FAMILY; TOOLS.

EXEMPTS. Persons who are not bound by law, but excused from the performance of duties imposed upon others.

By act of congress Feb. 24, 1864, it was enacted that such persons as were rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of the draft, and all persons who had served in the military or naval service two years during the then war and been honorably discharged therefrom, and no others, were exempt from enrolment and draft under said act, and act of congress, March 3, 1863.

EXEQUATUR (Lat.). In French Law. A Latin word which was, in the ancient practice, placed at the bottom of a judgment emanating from another tribunal, and was a permission and authority to the officer to execute it within the jurisdiction of the judge who put it below the judgment.

We have something of the same kind in our practice. When a warrant for the arrest of a criminal is issued by a justice of the peace of one county, and he flies into another, a justice of the latter county may indorse the warrant, and then the ministerial officer may execute it in such county. This is called backing a warrant.

In International Law. An official recognition of a consul or commercial agent, made by the foreign department of the state to which he is accredited, authorizing him to exercise his power. He cannot act without it, and it may be refused or revoked at the pleasure of the same government. 3 Chit. Com. Law 56; 3 M. & S. 290; 5 Pardessus, n. 1445; Twiss, Law of Nations; 1 Halleck, Int. Law 351.

EXERCITOR MARIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who fits out and equips a vessel, whether he be the absolute or qualified owner, or even a mere agent. Emerigon, Mar. Loans, c. 1, s. 1. We call him exercitor to whom all the returns come. Dig. 14. 1. 1. 15; 14. 1. 7; 3 Kent 161; Molloy, de Jur. Mar. 243.

The managing owner, or ship's husband. These are the terms in use in English and American laws, to denote the same as exercitor maris. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

EXERCITORIA ACTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An action against a managing owner (exercitor maris), founded on acts of the master. 3 Kent 161; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

EXFESTUCARE (Lat.). To abdicate; to resign by passing over a staff. Du Cange. To deprive one's self of the possession of lands, honors, or dignities, which was formerly accomplished by the delivery of a staff or rod. Said to be the origin of the custom of surrender as practised in England formerly in courts baron. Spelman, Gloss. See also, Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

EXHÆREDATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A disinheriting. The act by which a forced heir is deprived of his legitimate or legal portion. In common law, a disinheritance. Occurring in the phrase, in Latin pleadings, ad exhæredationem (to the disinheritance), in case of abatement.

EXHÆRES (Lat.). In Civil Law. One disinherited. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Du Cange.

EXHIBERE (Lat.). To present a thing corporeally, so that it may be handled. Vicat, Voc. Jur. To appear personally to conduct the defence of an action at law.

EXHIBIT. To produce a thing publicly, so that it may be taken possession of and seized. Dig. 10. 4. 2.

To file of record. Thus, it is the practice in England in personal actions, when an officer or prisoner of the king's bench is defendant, to proceed against such defendant in the court in which he is an officer, by exhibiting, that is, filing, a bill against him. Steph. Pl. 52, n. (i); 2 Sellon, Pr. 74; 2 Conn. 38.

A paper or writing proved on motion or other occasion.

A supplemental paper referred to in the principal instrument, identified in some particular manner, as by capital letter, and generally attached to the principal instrument. 1 Stra. 674; 2 P. Wms. 410; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 98.

A paper referred to in, and filed with the bill, answer, or petition in a suit in equity, or with a deposition. 16 Ga. 68.

In the absence of a positive statutory provision, exhibits properly identified need not be attached to the deposition in connection with which they are offered in evidence; 98 Cal. 490. It has been held that the exhibits filed with a petition form no part thereof, and cannot be considered in determining its sufficiency on demurrer; 113 Mo. 440; and if the exhibit is not the foundation for the cause of action or of the defence, it will not be considered; 129 Ind. 568.

EXHIBITANT. A complainant in articles of the peace. 12 Ad. & E. 599.

EXHIBITION. In Scotch Law. An action for compelling the production of writings. See DISCOVERY.

EXIGENDARY. In English Law. An officer who makes out exigents.

EXIGENT, EXIGI FACIAS. In Practice. A writ issued in the course of proceedings to outlawry, deriving its name and application from the mandatory words found therein, signifying, "that you cause to be exacted or required;" and it is that proceeding in an outlawry which, with the writ of proclamation, issued at the same time, immediately precedes the writ of capias utlagatum. 2 Va. Cas. 244.

EXIGENT LIST. A phrase used to indicate a list of cases set down for hearing upon various incidental and ancillary motions and rules.

EXIGENTER. An officer who made out exigents and proclamations. Cowel. The office is now abolished. Holthouse.

EXIGIBLE. Demandable; that which may be exacted.

EXILE. Banishment. A person banished.

EXILIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. Exile. Setting free or wrongly ejecting bond-tenants. Waste is called exilium when bondmen (servi) are set free or driven wrongfully from their tenements. Co. Litt. 536. Destruction; waste. Du Cange. Any species of waste which drove away the inhabitants, into exile, or had a tendency to do so. Bac. Abr. Waste (a); 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 386.

EXISTIMATIO (Lat.). The reputation of a Roman citizen. The decision of arbiters. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 1 Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 123.

EXISTING. The force of this word is not necessarily confined to the present. Thus a law for regulating "all existing railroad corporations" extends to such as are incorporated after as well as before its passage, unless exception is provided in their charters; 63 Ill. 117; 5 Ind. 525; 38 Ia. 215.

EXIT WOUND. The wound made in coming out by a weapon which has passed through the body or any part of it. 2 Beck. Med. Jur. 119.

EXITUS (Lat.). An export duty. Issue, child, or offspring. Rent or profits of land.

In Pleading. The issue or the end, termination or conclusion, of the pleadings; so called because an issue brings the pleadings to a close. 3 Bla. Com. 314.

EXLEX (Lat.). An outlaw. Spelman, Gloss.

EXOINE. In French Law. An act or instrument in writing which contains the reasons why a party in a civil suit, or a person accused, who has been summoned, agreeably to the requisitions of a decree, does not appear. Pothier, Procéd. Crim., s. 3, art. 3. See ESSOIGN.

EXONERATION. The taking off a burden or duty. The main use of the word is in the rule in the distribution of an intestate's estate that the debts which he himself contracted and for which he mortgaged his land as security, shall be paid out of the personal estate in exoneration of the real.

But when the real estate is charged with the payment of a mortgage at the time the intestate buys it, and the purchase is made subject to it, the personal is not in that case to be applied in exoneration of the real estate; 2 Pow. Mortg. 780; 5 Hayw. 57; 3 Johns. Ch. 229; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. n. *646; 92 Pa. 491.

But the rule for exonerating the real estate out of the personal does not apply against specific or pecuniary legatees, nor the widow's right to paraphernalia, and, with reason, not against the interest of creditors; 2 Ves. 64; 1 P. Wms. 693; 3 id. 367. See 26 Beav. 522; 35 Pa. 54; 21 Conn. 550.

Like the right of contribution between those equally liable for the same debt, the right of exoneration exists between debtors successively liable. A surety who discharges an obligation is entitled to look to the principal for reimbursement, and to invoke the aid of a court of equity for this purpose, and a subsequent surety, who, by the terms of the contract, is responsible only in the case of the default of the principal and a prior surety, may claim exoneration at the hands of either; Bisph. Eq. § 331; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1416.

As to exoneration of simple contract debts, see 1 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 614.

EXONERETUR (Lat.). In Practice. A short note entered on a bail-piece, that the bail is exonerated or discharged in consequence of having fulfilled the condition of his obligation, made by order of the court or of a judge upon a proper cause being shown. See RECOGNIZANCE.

EXPATRIATION. The voluntary act of abandoning one's country and becoming the citizen or subject of another.

The right of a citizen to do this has been much discussed. The question has been settled in the United States by the act of July 27, 1868, which declares the right of expatriation to be the inherent right of all people, disavows the claim made by foreign states that naturalized American citizens are still the subjects of such states, and extends to such naturalized citizens, while in foreign countries, the same protection accorded to native-born citizens. Rev. Stat. §§ 1999, 2000. This declaration comprehends our own citizens as well as those of other countries; 14 Op. Atty. Gen. 295. Since the passage of this act, the United States has entered into treaties with nearly all the nations of Europe by which the contracting powers mutually concede to subjects and citizens the right of expatriation on conditions and under qualification. And in case of conflict between the above act of congress and any treaty, it would seem the treaty must be held paramount; Morse, Citizenship § 179. To be legal, the expatriation must be for a purpose which is not unlawful nor in fraud of the duties of the emigrant at home. But a woman who is a citizen of the United States does not expatriate herself merely by marriage with an alien, and in any event actual removal from the country and the acquisition of a domicile elsewhere are conditions precedent to such expatriation; 56 Fed. Rep. 556. There is no implied expatriation, and it will not occur unless in some manner assented to by congress, and the purpose to effect it must be manifested by some unequivocal act on the part of the citizen as to whom the question is raised; id.

A citizen may acquire in a foreign country commercial privileges attached to his domicile, and be exempted from the operation of commercial acts embracing only persons resident in the United States or under its protection. See DOMICIL; NATURALIZATION. See also Miller, Const. U. S. 285, 297; 2 Cra. 120; 2 Kent 36; Grotius, b. 2, c. 5, s. 24; Puffendorff, b. 8, c. 11, ss. 2, 3; Vattel, b. 1, c. 19, ss. 218, 223, 224, 225; Wyckford, tom. i. 117, 119; 3 Dall. 133; 7 Wheat. 342; 1 Pet. For the doctrine of the English courts on this subject, see 1 Barton, Conv. 31, note; Vaugh. 227, 281; 7 Co. 16; Dy. 2, 224, 298 b, 300 b; 2 P. Wms. 124; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 68; 1 Wood, Conv. 382; Westl. Priv. Int. Law; Story, Confl. Laws; Cockburn, Nationality.

EXPECTANCY. Contingency as to possession. That which is expected or hoped for. Frequently used to imply an estate in expectancy.

Estates are said to be in possession when the person having the estate is in actual enjoyment of that in which his estate subsists, or in expectancy, when the enjoyment is postponed, although the estate or interest has a present legal existence.

A bargain in relation to an expectancy is, in general, considered invalid, unless the proof of good faith is strong; 2 Ves. 157; 1 Bro. Ch. 10; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 397; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 406.

But it is well settled in equity that a deed which purports to convey property, which is in expectancy or to be subsequently acquired, or which is not the subject of grant at law, though inoperative as a grant or conveyance, will be upheld as an executory agreement, and enforced according to its intent, if supported by a valid consideration, whenever the grantor is in a condition to give it effect; per Strong, J., in 40 Pa. 37, 43; 11 Paige 290; 2 S. & R. 507; 12 R. I. 560, 568; 10 H. L. Cas. 189, 211; 91 Pa. 96; id. 296. So it is said that an estate in expectancy, though contingent, is a fair subject of contract, and an agreement by an expectant heir in respect thereto, fairly made upon valuable considerations, will be enforced in equity; 45 Ill. 232; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 382; 5 Jones, Eq. 211; so also the interest which a person may take under the will of another living person; 2 Pa. 325; 9 Beav. 252; but a mere agreement to appropriate the money when received from a legacy will not operate as an assignment of it; 92 Pa. 196. An executory agreement between the husbands of two expectant legatees to divide equally what should be left to either of them has been enforced; 2 P. Wms. 182; 2 Sim. 183. In a few instances the contrary is held; 7 Ohio St. 432; 125 Ind. 139; Cal. Civ. Code 700, 1045; and a conveyance to a wife upon consideration only of natural love and affection was held invalid, in equity, as against creditors at the time of the deed or the death of the ancestor; 87 Tenn. 759; so an agreement by a wife, as a collateral security for an old debt of the husband, will not be enforced; 40 Pa. 37.

The general doctrine is undoubtedly to treat such an assignment as a contract enforceable in equity, but Pomeroy considers it inadequate; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1287, n. 2; and prefers the theory that it is an actual transfer of the ownership of an equitable property right which ripens into an absolute title; id. § 1271.

Such an agreement or assignment will be enforced against creditors of the grantor and attaches to the estate, in equity, at the death of the ancestor; 46 Barb. 84.

Equity will, in general, relieve a party from unequal contracts for the sale or pledge of expectancies, as they are in fraud of the ancestor. See 2 P. Wms. 182; 2 Sim. 183, 192; 5 id. 524; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 342. But relief will be granted only on equitable terms; for he who seeks equity must do equity; id.; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 13, note p.

In dealing with such cases, the rule applied by courts of equity is, as laid down in Chesterfield v. Janssen, to scrutinize them carefully according to the circumstances of each; 2 Ves. Sr. 125; and, if upon inadequate consideration, or otherwise fraudulent, they will be relieved against and wholly or partially set aside; id.; 1 L. Cas. in Eq. 773; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 953, and note, where the cases are collected.

In a leading modern English case the principle is thus stated: "The court will relieve 'expectant heirs' against bargains relating to their reversionary or expectant interest in cases of undervalue, of weakness due to age or poverty, and of the absence of independent advice. But all these circumstances must co-exist in order to entitle them to relief;" L. R. 8 Ch. 484. In that case it was held that the repeal of the usury laws in England has not altered the doctrine by which the court of chancery affords relief against improvident and extravagant bargains. In the opinion Lord Selborne directed attention to the fact that concealment was usually a feature of these cases, but agreed with Lord St. Leonards that it was not an indispensable condition of equitable relief; Sugd. Vend. & Pur., 11th ed. 316; differing, as to this point, with Lord Brougham; 2 Myl. & K. 456. The independent advice of a father seems to rebut the presumption of fraud; 2 App. Cas. 814; but old age or youth increases it; 2 Giff. 157; 4 D. J. & S. 388; or poverty and ignorance; L. R. 10 Ch. 389; 40 Ch. D. 812. In the first of these two cases, Jessel, M. R., thus defined the term "expectant heir": "The phrase is used not in its literal meaning, but as including every one who has either a vested remainder, or a contingent remainder in a family property, including a remainder in a portion, as well as a remainder in an estate, and every one who has the hope of succession to the property of an ancestor, either by reason of his being the heir-apparent or presumptive, or by reason, merely, of the expectation of a devise or bequest on account of the supposed or presumed affection of his ancestor or relation. More than this, the doctrine as to expectant heirs has been extended to all reversioners and remaindermen. So that the doctrine not only included the class mentioned, who in some popular sense might be called 'expectant heirs,' but also all remaindermen and reversioners."

The principle has been held to include younger sons of peers; 15 Ch. D. 679. As to what is a reversionary interest for this purpose, see 11 Eq. 265, 276; L. R. 2 Ch. 542; and as to what is independent advice, see 10 Eq. 641, in which the borrower, though accompanied by a friend who was a solicitor but did not act as such, or know the terms of the contract, was held not to have independent advice.

Undervaluation is not alone a sufficient ground for setting aside a contract, conveyance, or mortgage of a reversion, otherwise fair; stat. 31 Vict. c. 4; 2 Ch. Cas. 136; 35 Beav. 570; 32 L. J. Ch. 201.

By the civil law, such contracts are held contra bonos mores, and they are forbidden in general terms; Code 2, 3, de pactis 30; and in the French code it is forbidden to sell the succession of a living person, even with his consent; art. 1600; the same is the rule of the Italian code; art. 1460; and of that of Austria; § 879.

EXPECTANT. Contingent as to enjoyment.

EXPEDITATION. A cutting off the claws or ball of the fore-feet of mastiffs, to prevent their running after deer; a practice for the preservation of the royal forests. Cart. de For. c. 17; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel. See COURT OF REGARD.

EXPENDITORS. Paymasters. Those who expend or disburse certain taxes. Especially the sworn officer who supervised the repairs of the banks of the canals in Romney Marsh. Cowell.

EXPENSÆ LITIS (Lat.). Expenses of the suit; the costs, which are generally allowed to the successful party.

EXPERTS (Lat. experti, instructed, proved by experience). Persons selected by the court or parties in a cause, on account of their knowledge or skill, to examine, estimate, and ascertain things and make a report of their opinions. Merlin, Répert. Witnesses who are admitted to testify from a peculiar knowledge of some art or science, a knowledge of which is requisite or of value in settling the point at issue.

Persons professionally acquainted with the science or practice in question. Strickl. Ev. 408. Persons conversant with the subject-matter on questions of science, skill, trade, and others of like kind. Best, Ev. § 346. The qualification of a witness as an expert is largely within the discretion of the trial judge; 61 Fed. Rep. 752; 132 Mass. 218; 63 Pa. 156; 126 id. 141; 108 N. Y. 61; 107 Ind. 84. Such a witness may be asked whether the examination made by him was superficial or otherwise; 158 U. S. 271; he need not be engaged in his profession, it is sufficient that he has studied it; 12 Ala. N. S. 648. Experts alone can give an opinion based on facts shown by others, assuming them to be true; 100 N. C. 457.

"It is not sufficient to warrant the introduction of expert testimony that the witness may know more of the subject of inquiry and may better understand and appreciate it than the jury; but to warrant its introduction, the subject of the inquiry must be one relating to some trade, profession, science, or art in which persons instructed therein by study and experience may be supposed to have more skill and knowledge than jurors of average intelligence may generally be presumed to have;" 97 N. Y. 511; and not only may they testify to facts but they may give their opinions on them as experts; 118 N. Y. 429. The practical result of the rule admitting such testimony is far from satisfactory; its principal defect being that such witnesses are usually called because their known theories are understood to support the fact which the party calling them wishes to prove; 40 Cal. 405. "They come," says Lord Campbell, speaking of scientific witnesses, "with a bias on their minds to support the cause in which they are embarked, and hardly any weight should be given to their evidence;" 10 Cl. & F. 154. In another case it was said that it was generally safer to take the judgments of unskilled jurors than the hired and biassed opinions of experts; 97 N. Y. 511; and such testimony is frequently characterized by the courts as of little value; 4 Dill. 488; 3 Bann. & A. 42; 6 Fish. 336; L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 415, n. See 32 Am. L. Reg. 529.

On the other hand, the necessity of such testimony in certain classes of cases, particularly those involving patent law, is thus set forth in 3 Rob. Pat. § 1012:—

"Notwithstanding the strictures passed upon expert testimony by many jurists on each side of the Atlantic, and the truth of the assertions by which these censures have been justified, it is still certain that in most patent cases expert evidence is, and must always be, indispensable. That the expert is consulted before he is summoned as a witness; that when his opinion is unfavorable to the party who consults him he is not produced in court, at least on that side of the case; that when called as a witness his testimony is expected to support, and generally does support, the claims of the litigant on whose behalf he is presented,—are no doubt true; but this is only what occurs in every other trial where counsel have properly prepared their case. The error lies with those who ascribe judicial functions to the patent-expert, and demand of him such freedom from partisanship as the exercise of judicial powers requires. That there are experts in other departments of affairs upon whose opinion the court is forced to rely as the foundation of its own judgments, because incapable of forming an opinion for itself, and that such experts consequently fill the places of judges and should be beyond the influence and control of parties, must be conceded. But such is not the case with patent-experts, whose opinion is received in evidence only in connection with the reasons on which it is based, and is to be accepted or rejected by the jury according to their own view of its fallacy or truth. The patent-expert, considered in his real character, is an explorer, gifted with unusual powers of discernment and apprehension; a chronicler, trained to preserve the recollection of the essential attributes of things; an expositor, fitted to embody those essential attributes in accurate and intelligible language; a monitor, able to suggest the conclusions which follow from the premises he has described. His relation to the jury is not unlike that which counsel sustain to the court, as guides to a correct decision of the issues severally confided to their judgments,—the one pointing out facts and applying them in support of the claims advanced by his employer, as the other produces his authorities and applies them to the maintenance of his claims of law.

Such assistance, it is properly suggested, it would not be wise in any tribunal to undervalue or reject; 3 Rob. Pat. § 1012.

The fact that the opinions of experts in patent cases are often diametrically opposite does not necessarily discredit their testimony but merely emphasizes the fact that their opinions are to be regarded as opinions, merely, and a decision rendered between them; Hall, J., in 4 Fish. 12. A patent expert is in effect an "auxiliary counsel" who argues upon the law and the facts; 28 Fed. Rep. 618. While expert evidence is not conclusive on the jury; 1 Fish. 17; and is to be judged by the same standards as ordinary evidence; 27 Fed. Rep. 691; 4 Fish. 404; 1 Sawyer 512; 1 Fish. 293; and to be accorded by the jury such weight as they see fit; 1 Fish. 351; 6 McLean 303; 3 id. 433; it is nevertheless of great value in patent cases, 2 Fish. 465; 1 id. 133, 198, 461; 1 Bond 254; 5 McLean 44; 3 Story 742; 2 Robb 288; 3 McLean 432.

The value of such testimony depends on the skill, not the number; 4 McLean 70; and is to be measured by their reasons; 3 Blatchf. 184; 4 Fish. 29, 232, 468.

There are two classes of patent experts, as is clearly shown by an able writer, scientific and mechanical, each having a distinct sphere. The scientific expert is one familiarized by his studies and experiments with the principles of a science and qualified to understand, distinguish, and explain the subject-matter and application thereto of such science. His services are invoked to determine the character and scope of an invention with reference to the condition of the art at the date of its production. His testimony is directed to the question whether the alleged invention is the result of an inventive act; whether it embraces or excludes a different invention or is substantially the same in principle, function, or effect with any other. The mechanical expert represents the skilled workman in his art, who by practical training in it could comprehend and apply to it various instruments and methods. His evidence will bear upon the defence of want of novelty, prior patent, inutility of the invention, or ambiguity of the description in the specification of the patent. One person may appear in both capacities. 3 Rob. Pat. § 1013. See Curt. Pat. § 479.

Expert testimony is admissible upon questions for the court as well as upon those for the jury, where it can be properly applied to the subject-matter of the question as the construction of the patent and whether a prior patent covers the same invention; 3 Rob. Pat. § 1014. In dealing with such questions the court is at liberty to admit expert evidence, but cannot be compelled to do so, and it is not error to refuse it; id.; 1 Fish. 487; 21 How. 88.

It has been a matter of grave discussion whether an expert is bound to testify on matters of opinion without extra compensation, the weight of decisions being that he is not bound to do so; 1 C. & K. 25; Sprague 276; 5 So. L. Rev. 793; 59 Ind. 15; 60 Ark. 508; contra, 6 Cent. L. J. 11; 21 D. C. 491; 59 Ind. 1, 15; 6 So. Law Rev. 706. It was recently held that, in the absence of statutory authority, one who testifies for the state in a criminal case as an expert cannot demand extra compensation as such, at least when not compelled to make any preliminary examination or preparation, or to attend and listen to the testimony; 60 Ark. 204. When no demand is made in advance for special compensation, an expert witness can recover only the statutory witness fees; 3 Colo. App. 177.

EXPIATION. In Civil Law. The crime of abstracting the goods of a succession.

This is said not to be a theft, because the property no longer belongs to the deceased, nor to the heir before he has taken possession. In the common law, the grant of letters testamentary, or letters of administration, relates back to the time of the death of the testator or intestate: so that the property of the estate is vested in the executor or administrator from that period.

EXPIRATION. Cessation; end: as, the expiration of a lease, of a contract or statute.

In general, the expiration of a contract puts an end to all the engagements of the parties, except to those which arise from the non-fulfilment of obligations created during its existence. See PARTNERSHIP; CONTRACT.

The term is specially used to denote the day upon which the risk of an insurance policy terminates. When before the expiration of policies the companies agreed to "hold" the policies for renewal, and after the expiration the agent of the insured told them to continue to hold them until the form could be arranged, the policies were held to be in force; 162 Mass. 358. Temporary insurance from one day "until" a certain other date, includes all of the day of expiration; 4 Dist. Rep. Pa. 382. See INSURANCE.

When a statute is limited as to time, it expires by mere lapse of time, and then it has no force whatever; and, if such a statute repealed or supplied a former statute, the first statute is, ipso facto, revived by the expiration of the repealing statute; 6 Whart. 294; 1 Bland, Ch. 664; unless it appear that such was not the intention of the legislature; 3 East 212; Bacon, Abr. Statute (D).

EXPIRY OF THE LEGAL. In Scotch Law. The expiration of the term within which the subject of an adjudication may be redeemed on payment of the debt adjudged for. Bell, Dict.; 3 Jurid. Styles, 3d ed. 1107.

EXPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fourth pleading: equivalent to the sur-rejoinder of the common law. Calvinus, Lex.

EXPLOSION. A sudden and rapid combustion, causing violent expansion of the air, and accompanied by a report. 22 Ohio St. 348.

There is no difference in ordinary use between "explode" and "burst." The ordinary idea is that the explosion is the cause, while the rupture is the effect; 44 N. Y. 151.

EXPORTATION. In Common Law. The act of sending goods and merchandise from one country to another. 2 M. & G. 155; 3 id. 959.

In order to preserve equality among the states in their commercial relations, the constitution provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Art. 1, s. 9. And, to prevent a pernicious interference with the commerce of the nation, the tenth section of the first article of the constitution contains the following prohibition: "No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the congress." See 12 Wheat. 419; IMPORTATION.

EXPOSE. A French word, sometimes applied to a written document containing the reasons or motives for doing a thing. The word occurs in diplomacy.

To cast out to chance, to place abroad, or in a situation unprotected; 5 Mich. 90.

EXPOSITION DE PART. In French Law. The abandonment of a child, unable to take care of itself, either in a public or private place.

If the child thus exposed should be killed in consequence of such exposure, as, if it should be devoured by animals, the person so exposing it would be guilty of murder. Rosc. Cr. Ev. 591.

EXPOSURE OF PERSON. In Criminal Law. Such an intentional exposure, in a public place, of the naked body, as is calculated to shock the feelings of chastity or to corrupt the morals.

This offence is indictable on the ground that every public show and exhibition which outrages decency, shocks humanity, or is contrary to good morals, is punishable at common law. 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 1125; 32 Mo. 560. An indecent exposure, though in a place of public resort, if visible by only one person, is not indictable as a common nuisance. An omnibus is a public place sufficient to support the indictment; Clark, Cr. L. 306, n.; 1 Den. 338; Templ. & M. 23; 2 C. & K. 933; 2 Cox, Cr. Cas. 376; 3 id.

183; Dears. 207. But see 1 Dev. & B. 208; 68 N. C. 259. An ordinance making it an offence to expose the person indecently without reference to the intent which accompanies the act, is a valid exercise of police power; 93 Mich. 135.

EXPRESS. Stated or declared, as opposed to implied. That which is made known and not left to implication. It is a rule that when a matter or thing is expressed it ceases to be implied by law; expressum facit cessare tacitum. Co. Litt. 183.

EXPRESS ABROGATION. A direct repeal in terms by a subsequent law referring to that which is abrogated.

EXPRESS ASSUMPSIT. A direct undertaking. See ASSUMPSIT; ACTION.

EXPRESS COMPANIES. Companies organized to carry small and valuable packages expeditiously in such manner as not to subject them to the danger of loss and damage which to a greater or less degree attends the transportation of heavy or bulky articles of commerce. 10 Fed. Rep. 213.

An express company may be defined to be a common carrier that carries at regular and stated times, over fixed and regular routes, money and other valuable packages, which cannot be conveniently or safely carried as common freight; and also other articles and packages of any description which the shipper desires or the nature of the article requires should have safe and rapid transit and quick delivery, transporting the same in the immediate charge of its own messenger on passenger steamers and express and passenger railway trains, which it does not own or operate, but with the owners of which it contracts for the carriage of its messengers and freights; and within cities and towns or other defined limits, it collects from the consignors and delivers to the consignees at other places of business the goods which it carries. 44 Fed. Rep. 310. Their rights to use the facilities afforded by a railroad depends entirely on contract; 118 U. S. 3.

They are common carriers; 44 Ala. 468; 28 Ohio St. 144; 36 Ga. 669; notwithstanding a declaration in their bill of lading that they are not to be so considered; 93 U. S. 174; 15 Minn. 270. See COMMON CARRIERS.

Like all other common carriers they must receive all goods offered for transportation, on being paid or tendered the proper charge; 6 Hun 344; 5 Cush. 69; and if they cannot transport them within a reasonable time, must refuse them or be responsible for loss caused by the delay; 54 N. Y. 500; 76 id. 305; 64 Ill. 128. They may also refuse to receive dangerous articles for transportation; 15 Wall. 524; 107 Mass. 568.

An express company insures the safe delivery of the goods received at the destination if on its own route; if not, safe delivery at the end of its own route to the next carrier; and will be relieved only by the act of God or of the public enemy; 33 N. J. L. 543; 58 Ill. 44; 49 Miss. 480; 49 N. Y. 491; 69 Pa. 394; 101 Mass. 420; 52 Vt. 335.

An express company may by special contract limit its liability for the value of goods lost; 69 Ill. 62; 62 N. Y. 35; 74 id. 125; 28 Ohio St. 144; 89 Ind. 475; except for losses due to its own negligence or misconduct; 93 U. S. 174; 93 Ill. 523; 74 Mo. 538; 87 N. Y. 413. A contract between an express company and its messenger exempting it from liability for injury to him by the negligence of the carrier, is valid and may extend so far as to authorize the express company to contract with the carrier against liability to the messenger; but such contract will not enure to the benefit of the carrier having no knowledge of it or not having availed itself of it by contracting with the express company; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 796.

The express business is an "industrial pursuit" within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1889, and may therefore be carried on in Washington territory by a corporation formed there under a general law, or by a corporation otherwise duly formed or incorporated elsewhere; id.; 10 Sawy. 441; 43 Fed. Rep. 467.

By various statutes of New York, an express company organized as a joint-stock company has all the powers of a corporation, except that it has no right to adopt and use a common seal; 3 Abb. N. S. 163.

A statement filed by an express company showing that the business was managed, and its property and effects owned, by five trustees, the names of four of whom, and their respective places of residence, were given; that there was one vacancy, and that "the persons interested as cestui que trust are the stockholders of said company, who change from day to day, and of whom it is impossible to make an accurate statement, owing to the frequency of such changes," was a substantial compliance with the requirement of an act requiring that the statement so filed shall show the full name of every member of such company and his proper place of residence; 32 Ind. 19.

See an epitome of the law on this subject at that date by Judge Redfield in 5 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 1; and three articles on express companies as common carriers; id. 449, 513, 648. See also as to limiting liability, 21 id. 570; discrimination; 1 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 390; and as to carriers by express generally; 20 Am. L. Reg. 602; 5 Myers, Fed. Dec. 647; 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 601; 13 id. 425; 16 id. 93; 23 id. 572.

EXPRESS CONSIDERATION. A consideration expressed or stated by the terms of the contract.

EXPRESS CONTRACT. One in which the terms are openly uttered and avowed at the time of making. 2 Bla. Com. 443; 1 Pars. Contr. 4. One made in express words. 2 Kent 450. See CONTRACTS.

EXPRESS COVENANTS. Those stated in words more or less distinctly expressing the intent to covenant; 88 Ga. 675.

EXPRESS TRUST. One declared in express terms. See TRUSTS.

EXPRESS WARRANTY. One expressed by particular words. 2 Bla. Com. 300. The statements in an application for insurance are usually construed to constitute an express warranty. 1 Phil. Ins. 346. See WARRANTY.

EXPROMISSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The species of novation by which a creditor accepts a new debtor, who becomes bound instead of the old, the latter being released. See NOVATION.

EXPROMISSOR. In Civil Law. The person who alone becomes bound for the debt of another, whether the latter were obligated or not. He differs from a surety, who is bound together with his principal. Dig. 12. 4. 4; 16. 1. 13; 24. 3. 64. 4; 38. 1. 37. 8.

EXPULSION (Lat. expellere, to drive out). The act of depriving a member of a body politic or corporate, or of a society, of his right of membership therein, by the vote of such body or society, for some violation of his duties as such, or for some offence which renders him unworthy of longer remaining a member of the same.

By the constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, § 2, each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. In the case of John Smith, a senator from Ohio, who was expelled from the senate in 1807, the committee made a report which embraces the following points:

First. That the senate may expel a member for a high misdemeanor, such as a conspiracy to commit treason. Its authority is not confined to an act done in its presence.

Second. That a previous conviction is not requisite in order to authorize the senate to expel a member from their body for a high offence against the United States.

Third. That although a bill of indictment against a party for treason and misdemeanor has been abandoned, because a previous indictment against the principal party had terminated in an acquittal, owing to the inadmissibility of the evidence upon that indictment, yet the senate may examine the evidence for themselves, and if it be sufficient to satisfy their minds that the party is guilty of a high misdemeanor it is sufficient ground of expulsion.

Fourth. That the fifth and sixth articles of the amendments of the constitution of the United States, containing the general rights and privileges of the citizens as to criminal prosecutions, refer only to prosecutions at law, and do not affect the jurisdiction of the senate as to expulsion.

Fifth. That before a committee of the senate, appointed to report an opinion relative to the honor and privileges of the senate, and the facts respecting the conduct of the member implicated, such member is not entitled to be heard in his defence by counsel, to have compulsory process for witnesses, or to be confronted with his accusers. It is before the senate that the member charged is entitled to be heard.

Sixth. In determining on expulsion, the senate is not bound by the forms of judicial proceedings or the rules of judicial evidence; nor, it seems, is the same degree of proof essential which is required to convict of a crime. The power of expulsion must, in its nature, be discretionary, and its exercise of a more summary character. 1 Hall. Law Journ. 459, 465; 6 Wheat. 204; Cooley, Const. Lim. 162.

Corporations have the right of expulsion in certain cases, as such power is necessary to the good order and government of corporate bodies; and the cases in which the inherent power may be exercised are classified by Lord Mansfield as follows: 1. When an offence is committed which has no immediate relation to a member's corporate duty, but is of so infamous a nature as to render him unfit for the society of honest men; such as the offences of perjury, forgery, and the like. But before an expulsion is made for a cause of this kind it is necessary that there should be a previous conviction by a jury according to the law of the land. 2. When the offence is against his duty as a corporator, in which case he may be expelled on trial and conviction before the corporation. 3. The third is of a mixed nature, against the member's duty as a corporator, and also indictable by the law of the land; 1 Burr. 517; 75 Pa. 291; 50 id. 107; 15 Am. Rep. 27; Field, Corp. 78; 47 Wis. 670; 1 Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 523. See 1 Thomp. Corp. 806-930, where the subject is fully treated; AMOTION; DISFRANCHISEMENT.

EXTENSION. In Common Law. This term is applied among merchants to signify an agreement made between a debtor and his creditors, by which the latter, in order to enable the former, embarrassed in his circumstances, to retrieve his standing, agree to wait for a definite length of time after their several claims become due and payable, before they will demand payment. It is often done by the issue of notes of various maturities.

Among the French, a similar agreement is known by the name of attermolement. Merlin, Répert. mot Attermolement.

EXTENSION OF PATENT (sometimes termed Renewal of Patent). In Patent Law. An ordinary patent was formerly granted for the term of fourteen years. But the law made provision that when any patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, had failed to obtain a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same and the introduction thereof into use, he might obtain an extension of such patent for the term of seven years longer. A fee of forty dollars was required from the applicant, and a public notice of sixty days was to be given of the application. No extension could be granted after the patent had once expired.

The extension of a patent was intended for the sole benefit of the inventor; and where it was made to appear that he would receive no benefit therefrom, it would not be granted. The assignee, grantee, or licensee of an interest in the original patent retained no right in the extension, unless by reason of some stipulation to that effect. But where any person had a right to use a specific machine under the original patent he still retained that right after the extension. See act of 1836, § 18, and act of 1848, § 1; PATENTS. By act of congress of March 2, 1861, c. 88, § 16, 12 Stat. L. 249, it was provided that patents should be granted for the term of seventeen years, and further extension was forbidden. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4924, provided for the granting of extensions only on patents issued prior to March 2, 1861.

EXTENT. A writ, issuing from the exchequer, by which the body, goods, and lands of the debtor may all be taken at once to satisfy the judgment.

It is so called because the sheriff is to cause the lands to be appraised at their full extended value before he delivers them to the plaintiff. Fitzh. N. B. 131. The writ originally lay to enforce judgments in case of recognizances or debts acknowledged on statutes merchant or staple; see stat. 13 Edw. I. de Mercatoribus; 27 Edw. III. c. 9; and by 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, was extended to debts due the crown. The term is sometimes used in the various states of the United States to denote writs which give the creditor possession of the debtor's lands for a limited time till the debt be paid. 16 Mass. 186.

Extent in aid is an extent issued at the suit or instance of a crown-debtor against a person indebted to himself. This writ was much abused, owing to some peculiar privileges possessed by crown-debtors, and its use was regulated by stat. 57 Geo. III. c. 117. See 3 Bla. Com. 419.

Extent in chief is an extent issued to take a debtor's lands into the possession of the crown. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 86, § 8.

Manorial extent. A survey of a manor made by a jury of tenants, often of unfree men sworn to sit for the particulars of each tenancy, and containing the smallest details as to the nature of the service due.

These manorial extents "were made in the interest of the lords, who were anxious that all due services should be done; but they imply that other and greater services are not due, that the customary tenants, even though they be unfree men, owe these services for their tenements, no less and no more. Statements that the tenants are not bound to do services of a particular kind are not very uncommon;" 1 Poll. & Maitl. 343. "Many admissions against their own (the lords) interests the extent of their manors may contain; they suffer it to be recorded that a 'day's work' ends at noon, that in return for some works they must provide food, even that the work is not worth the food that has to be provided; but they do not admit that for certain causes, and for certain causes only, may they take their tenements into their own hands. As a matter of fact it is seldom of an actual ejectment that the peasant has to complain;" id. 359. Many examples of the manorial extents have been preserved in the monastic cartularies and elsewhere. "Among the most accessible are the Bolden Book (printed at the end of the Domesday); the Black Book of Peterborough, the Domesday of St. Paul's, the Worcester Register, the Battle Cartulary, all published by the Camden Society; the Ramsey, Gloucester, and Malmesbury Cartularies or registers published in the Rolls series; the Burton Cartulary of the Salt Society and the Yorkshire Inquisitions of the Yorkshire Record Society;" id. 189.

EXTENUATION. That which renders a crime or tort less heinous than it would be without it. It is opposed to aggravation.

In general, extenuating circumstances go in mitigation of punishment in criminal cases, or of damages in those of a civil nature.

EXTERRITORIALITY (Fr.). This term (exterritorialité) is used by French jurists to signify the immunity of certain persons, who, although in the state, are not amenable to its laws: foreign sovereigns, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, and ministers from a foreign power, are of this class. Fœlix, Droit Intern. Privé, liv. 2, tit. 2, c. 2, s. 4; Westl. Priv. Int. L. 211. See Davis, Int. L. 59, 150; AMBASSADOR; CONFLICT OF LAWS; PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST.

EXTINGUISHMENT. The destruction of a right or contract. The act by which a contract is made void. The annihilation of a collateral thing or subject in the subject itself out of which it is derived. Prest. Merg. 9. For the distinction between an extinguishment and passing a right, see 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 325.

An extinguishment may be by matter of fact and by matter of law. It is by matter of fact either express, as when one receives satisfaction and full payment of a debt and the creditor releases the debtor; 11 Johns. 513; or implied, as when a person hath a yearly rent out of lands and becomes owner, either by descent or purchase, of the estate subject to the payment of the rent, and the latter is extinguished; 3 Stew. 60; but the person must have as high an estate in the land as in the rent, or the rent will not be extinct; Co. Litt. 147 b.

There are numerous cases where the claim is extinguished by operation of law: for example where two persons are jointly but not severally liable for a simple contract-debt, a judgment obtained against one is at common law an extinguishment of the claim on the other debtor; 1 Pet. C. C. 391; 2 Johns. 213.

A conveyance of mortgaged land by the mortgagor to the mortgagee extinguishes the mortgage; 114 Ill. 388. Taking a note for the amount due does not deprive a claimant of his right to a lien, but merely suspends its enforcement until the note is payable; 7 Misc. Rep. 79.

See, generally, Co. Litt. 147 b; 5 Whart. 541; 3 Conn. 62; 1 Ohio 187; 11 Johns. 513; 1 Halst. 190; 4 N. H. 251; 31 Pa. 475; 154 Mass. 314; 84 Me. 33; 54 Fed. Rep. 568; 37 Neb. 677; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1487.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COMMON. Loss of the right to have common. This may happen from various causes; by the owner of the common right becoming owner of the fee; by severance from the land; by release; by approvement; 2 Hill, R. P. 75; 2 Steph. Com. 41; 1 Crabb, R. P. § 341; Co. Litt. 280; 1 Bacon, Abr. 628; Cro. Eliz. 594.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COPYHOLD. This takes place by a union of the copyhold and freehold estates in the same person; also by an act of the tenant showing an intention not to hold any longer of his lord; Hutt. 81; Cro. Eliz. 21; Wms. R. P. 287; Watk. Copyh.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF A DEBT. Destruction of a debt. This may be by the creditor's accepting a higher security; 1 Salk. 304; 1 Md. 492; 24 Ala. n. s. 439. A judgment recovered extinguishes the original debt; 1 Pick. 118; Hill & D. 392. A trust deed given to secure the payment of a bond is not affected by the rendition of a judgment on the bond, since the original debt is not thereby merged, but only the form of the evidence of the debt charged; 89 Va. 524. A debt evidenced by a note may be extinguished by a surrender of the note; 10 Cush. 169; 29 Pa. 50; 3 Ind. 337. As to the effect of payment in extinguishing a debt, see PAYMENT.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF RENT. A destruction of the rent by a union of the title to the lands and the rent in the same person. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 325, note.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF WAYS. Destruction of a right of way, effected usually by a purchase of the close over which it lies by the owner of the right of way. 2 Washb. R. P.

EXTORSIVELY. A technical word used in indictments for extortion.

When a person is charged with extorsively taking, the very import of the word shows that he is not acquiring possession of his own; 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 387. In North Carolina the crime may be charged without using this word; 1 Hayw. 406.

EXTORTION. The unlawful taking by any officer, by color of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due. 4 Bla. Com. 141; 152 Pa. 554; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 68, s. 1; 1 *Russ. Cr. 144; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 390; 14 Fed. Rep. 595.

At common law, any oppression by color of right; but technically the taking of money by an officer, by reason of his office, where none at all was due, or when it was not yet due. The obtaining of money by force or fear is not extortion; 61 Hun 571; Whart. Cr. L. 833.

In a large sense the term includes any oppression under color of right; but it is generally and constantly used in the more limited technical sense above given.

The incumbent of an office, which it was attempted to create by an unconstitutional statute, cannot be guilty of extortion, as he is neither a de jure nor a de facto officer; 31 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 213.

To constitute extortion, there must be the receipt of money or something of value; the taking a promissory note which is void is not sufficient to make an extortion; 2 Mass. 523; 16 id. 93. See Bacon, Abr.; Co. Litt. 168. It is extortion and oppression for an officer to take money for the performance of his duty, even though it be in the exercise of a discretionary power; 2 Burr. 927. See 6 Cow. 661; 1 Cai. 130; 3 Pa. 183; 152 id. 554; 1 South. 324; 7 Pick. 279; 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 387. See 27 Tex. App. 513; 133 N. Y. 649.

EXTRA-DOTAL PROPERTY. In Louisiana this term is used to designate that property which forms no part of the dowry of a woman, and which is also called paraphernal property. La. Civ. Code, art. 2315.

EXTRA-JUDICIUM. Extra-judicial; out of the proper cause. Judgments rendered or acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction of the subject, or where it has no jurisdiction, are said to be extra-judicial.

EXTRA QUATUOR MARIA (Lat. beyond four seas). Out of the realm. 1 Bla. Com. 157. See BEYOND SEA.

EXTRA SERVICES. When used with reference to officers it should be construed to embrace all services rendered by such for which no compensation is given by law. 21 Ind. 32.

EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY. That quality of laws which makes them operate beyond the territory of the power enacting them, upon certain persons or certain rights. See Wheat. Int. Law 121; 19 Law M. & R., 4th series 147.

EXTRA VIAM. Out of the way. When, in an action of trespass, the defendant pleads a right of way, the defendant may reply extra viam, that the trespass was committed beyond the way, or make a new assignment. 16 East 343, 349.

EXTRACT. A part of a writing. In general, an extract is not evidence, because the whole of the writing may explain the part extracted, so as to give it a different sense; but sometimes extracts from public books are evidence, as extracts from the registers of births, marriages, and burials, kept according to law, when the whole of the matter has been extracted which relates to the cause or matter in issue.

EXTRACTOR OF THE COURT OF SESSION. In Scotland. A salaried officer of the High Court of Justice.

EXTRADITION (Lat. ex, from, traditio, handing over). The surrender by one sovereign state to another, on its demand, of persons charged with the commission of crime within its jurisdiction, that they may be dealt with according to its laws.

The surrender of persons by one sovereign state or political community to another, on its demand, pursuant to treaty stipulations between them.

The surrender of persons by one federal state to another, on its demand, pursuant to their federal constitution and laws.

Without treaty stipulations. Public jurists are not agreed as to whether extradition, independent of treaty stipulations, is a matter of imperative duty or of discretion merely. Some have maintained the doctrine that the obligation to surrender fugitive criminals was perfect, and the duty of fulfilling it, therefore, imperative, especially where the crimes of which they were accused affected the peace and safety of the state; but others regard the obligation as imperfect in its nature, and a refusal to surrender such fugitives as affording no ground of offence. Of the former opinion are Grotius, Heineccius, Burlamaqui, Vattel, Rutherford, Schmelzing, and Kent; the latter is maintained by Puffendorf, Voet, Martens, Klüber, Leyser, Kluit, Saalfeld, Schmaltz, Mittermeyer, Heffter, and Wheaton.

Except under the provisions of treaties, the delivery by one country to another of fugitives from justice is a matter of comity, not of obligation; 119 U. S. 407.

Foreign extradition belongs solely to the national government; 14 How. 103; 10 S. & R. 125; 119 U. S. 407. A state cannot regulate the surrender of fugitives from justice to foreign countries; 50 N. Y. 321.

Many nations have practised extradition without treaty engagements to that effect, as the result of mutual comity and convenience; others have refused. The United States has always declined to surrender criminals unless bound by treaty to do so; 1 Kent 39, n.; 1 Opin. Attys. Gen. 511; 6 id. 85, 431; 50 N. Y. 321; 14 Pet. 540; 12 Vt. 631; 1 Dall. 120. The existence of an extradition treaty does not prohibit the surrender by either country of a person charged with a crime not enumerated in the treaty; 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 669. No state has an absolute right to demand of another the delivery of a fugitive criminal, though it has what is called an imperfect right, but a refusal to deliver the criminal is no just cause of war. Per Tilghman, C. J., in 10 S. & R. 125.

Under treaty stipulations. The sovereignty of the United States, as it respects foreign states, being vested by the constitution in the federal government, it appertains to it exclusively to perform the duties of extradition which, by treaties, it may assume; 14 Pet. 540; 119 U. S. 407; and, to enable the executive to discharge such duties, congress passed the act of Aug. 12, 1848, 11 Stat. L. 302. The general government alone has the power to enact laws for the extradition of foreign criminals. It possesses that power under the treaty power in the constitution; 14 Pet. 540; 50 N. Y. 321; 12 Blatch. 391. See 14 How. 103.

Treaties have been made between the United States and many foreign powers for the mutual surrender of persons charged with certain crimes. These treaties may be found in full in the United States Statutes at Large, in 2 Moore on Extradition 1072; Haswell, Treaties & Conventions, U. S. See also 17 Am. L. J. 44.

Two Sicilies. Same as Italy. See ante.

Venezuela. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, forgery, counterfeiting, arson, robbery, intimidation, forcible entry of an inhabited house, piracy, embezzling by public officers or by private persons.

Wurtemberg. Same as Prussia. See ante.

Most of the foregoing treaties contain provisions relating to the evidence required to authorize an order of extradition; but as to this, see FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

The United States has made treaties for the mutual surrender of deserting seamen with the following foreign states: Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, German Empire, Greece, Hawaiian Islands, Hayti, Italy, Madagascar, Netherlands, Peru, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden and Norway, Tonga.

It has also made treaties with numerous Indian tribes as nations or distinct political communities, in many of which the Indians have stipulated to surrender to the federal authorities persons accused of crime against the laws of the United States; and in some tripartite treaties they have stipulated for mutual extradition of criminals to one another. 11 Stat. L. 612, 703.

Between the several states, by art. iv. sec. ii. of the constitution of the United States, it is provided that "a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having the jurisdiction of the crime."

The act of congress of Feb. 12, 1793, U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5278-9 prescribed the mode of procedure in such cases, and imposed a like duty upon the territories northwest or south of the river Ohio. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

As to trial for a different offence. If surrendered by a foreign government, an extradited criminal can be tried only for the offence for which he was extradited; 14 Fed. Rep. 130; 26 id. 421; 32 id. 911; 13 Bush 697; 39 Ohio St. 273; 10 Tex. App. 627; 119 U. S. 407; contra, 8 Blatchf. 131; 13 id. 295; 6 Crim. L. Mag. 511; 9 Misc. Rep. 600; 81 Hun 336. See 39 Fed. Rep. 204; 28 Am. L. Rev. 568; 32 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 557; Spear, Extrad. 150; 14 Alb. L. J. 91; 28 Cent. L.

J. 241; 25 id. 267; 19 id. 22; 19 L. R. A. 206.

Extradition treaties of the United States do not guarantee a fugitive an asylum in any foreign country. So far as they regulate the right of asylum at all, they limit it; 119 U. S. 436; and the laws of the United States do not recognize any right of asylum, on the part of a fugitive from justice, in any state to which he has fled; 127 U. S. 900.

Under the extradition treaty with England and Rev. Stat. §§ 5272, 5275, a person brought to this country by extradition proceedings can only be tried for the offence with which he is charged in such proceedings; if not tried, or if acquitted after trial, he shall have reasonable time to leave the country before he is arrested for any other crime previously committed; 119 U. S. 407.

As between the states of the Union, fugitives from justice have no right of asylum, in the international sense; and a fugitive who has been returned by interstate rendition may be tried for other offences than that for which his return was demanded, without violating any rights secured by the constitution or laws of the United States; 127 U. S. 700; 148 id. 537, aff. 90 Ga. 347; 112 N. C. 896; 135 N. Y. 536; 158 Mass. 149; 116 Mo. 505; 119 id. 467; 116 Ind. 51; 89 Ia. 94; 158 Mass. 149; 104 Ala. 4; 60 Wis. 587; 4 Tex. App. 645; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 263; 1 Colo. App. 191; 2 Ohio N. P. 230; 3 Wash. Ty. 131; contra, 41 Fed. Rep. 472; 45 id. 471; 40 Kan. 338; 56 id. 690; 47 Mich. 481. In some states the courts have overruled former decisions, bringing themselves in accord with the United States supreme court; 66 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 208, rev. 29 Neb. 135; 2 Ohio N. P. 230, rev. 48 Ohio St. 588.

As to trial for other offences, see 19 Cent. L. J. 22; 25 id. 267; 28 id. 241; 28 Am. L. Rev. 568; 26 Am. L. Reg. 241; 32 id. 568; 19 L. R. A. 206.

A prisoner, regularly committed for trial on criminal process of the state which is in itself regular and valid, cannot be discharged because he was brought back from another state on extradition warrants procured by false affidavits; and on that ground alone the federal courts will not release him on habeas corpus; 75 Fed. Rep. 821; nor is a fugitive, who has been kidnapped and brought back into the state where his offence was committed, entitled to release on habeas corpus; 9 B. & C. 446; 119 U. S. 436; 18 Fed. Rep. 167, aff. 110 Ill. 627; 127 U. S. 700, aff. 34 Fed. Rep. 525; 21 Iowa 467; 18 Pa. 37; 1 Bailey 283; 7 Vt. 118; contra, State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 262. A prisoner cannot set up as a ground for discharge that he has been enticed into the state by fraudulent representations; 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 576; nor that the extradition proceedings in the other state were irregular; 45 Fed. Rep. 352; 52 Vt. 609.

The constitutional provision for interstate rendition warrants a surrender after conviction; 7 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 406; but after serving his sentence the convict cannot be surrendered under a requisition from another state until he has had reasonable time to return to the state from which he was extradited: id.

Extradition proceedings may be made the basis of a suit for malicious prosecution; 16 Fed. Rep. 93.

EXTRA - JUDICIAL. That which does not belong to the judge or his jurisdiction, notwithstanding which he takes cognizance of it. Extra-judicial judgments and acts are absolutely void. See CORAM NON JUDICE; Merlin, Répert. Excès de Pouvoir.

EXTRANEUS. In Old English Law. One foreign born; a foreigner. 7 Rep. 16.

In Roman Law. An heir not born in the family of the testator. Those of a foreign state. The same as alienus. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Du Cange.

EXTRAORDINARY. Beyond or out of the common order or rule; not usual, regular, or of a customary kind; not ordinary; remarkable; uncommon; rare. 29 Abb. N. C. 154. 19 Fed. Rep. 103.

EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY. The extra-territorial operation of laws; i. e., their operation upon persons, rights, or statutes existing beyond the limits of the state, but which are still amenable to its laws.

EXTRA - TERRITORIUM. Beyond

or outside of the territorial limits of a state. 6 Binn. 353.

EXTRAVAGANTES. In Canon Law. The name given to the constitutions of the popes posterior to the Clementines.

They are thus called, quasi vagantes extra corpus juris, to express that they were out of the canonical law, which at first contained only the decrees of Gratian: afterwards the Decretals of Gregory IX., the Sexte of Boniface VIII., the Clementines, and at last the Extravagantes, were added to it. There are the Extravagantes of John XXII., and the common Extravagantes. The first contain twenty epistles, decretals, or constitutions of that pope, divided under fifteen titles, without any subdivision into books. The others are epistles, decretals, or constitutions of the popes who occupied the holy see either before or after John XXII. They are divided into books, like the decretals.

EXTREMIS (Lat.). When a person is sick beyond the hope of recovery, and near death, he is said to be in extremis.

A will made in this condition, if made without undue influence, by a person of sound mind, is valid. As to the effect of declarations of persons in extremis, see DYING DECLARATIONS; DECLARATIONS.

EY. A watery place; water. Co. Litt. 6.

EYE-WITNESS. One who saw the act or fact to which he testifies. When an eye-witness testifies, and is a man of intelligence and integrity, much reliance must be placed on his testimony; for he has the means of making known the truth.

EYOTT. A small island arising in a river. Fleta, l. 3, c. 2, s. b; Bracton, l. 2, c. 2. See ISLAND.

EYRE. A journey; a court of itinerant justices. In old English law applied to the judges who travelled in circuit to hold courts in the different counties. See JUSTICES IN EYRE.

EYRER. To go about. See EYRE.

F.

F. The sixth letter of the alphabet. A fighter or maker of frays, if he had no ears, and a felon on being admitted to clergy, was to be branded in the cheek with this letter. Cowel; Jacob. Those who had been guilty of falsity were to be so marked. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 392.

F. O. B. Free on board. A term frequently inserted, in England, in contracts for the sale of goods to be conveyed by ship, signifying that the buyer will be responsible for the cost of shipment. In London, when goods are so sold, the buyer is considered as the shipper and the goods are shipped at his risk; 5 Moo. P. C. 165; 3 Hurlst. & N. 484; 4 id. 822; 20 L. J. C. P. 213; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 147.

FABRIC LANDS. In English Law. Lands given for the repair, rebuilding, or maintenance of cathedrals or other churches.

It was the custom, says Cowel, for almost every one to give by will more or less to the fabric of the cathedral or parish church where he lived. These lands so given were called fabric lands, because given ad fabricam ecclesiæ reparandam (for repairing the fabric of the church). Called by the Saxons timber-lands. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

FABRICARE (Lat.). To make. Used of an unlawful making, as counterfeiting coin; 1 Salk. 342, and also lawful coining.

FABRICATE. To invent; to devise falsely. Invent is sometimes used in a bad sense, but fabricate never in any other. To fabricate a story implies that it is so contrary to probability as to require the skill of a workman to induce belief in it. Crabbe, Syn.

The word implies fraud or falsehood; a false or fraudulent concoction, knowing it to be wrong. L. R. 10 Q. B. 162.

FABULA. In old European law, a contract or covenant. Also in the laws of the Lombards and Visigoths, a nuptial contract; a will. Burrill.

FACE. The outward appearance or aspect of a thing.

The words of a written paper in their apparent or obvious meaning, as, the face of a note, bill, bond, check, draft, judgment, record, or contract, which titles see. The face of a judgment is the sum for which it was rendered, exclusive of interest. 32 Ia. 265.

FACIAS (Lat. facere, to make, to do). That you cause. Occurring in the phrases scire facias (that you cause to know), feri facias (that you cause to be made), etc. Used also in the phrases Do ut facias (I give that you may do), Facio ut facias (I do that you may do), two of the four divisions of considerations made by Blackstone, 2 Com. 444.

FACILITIES. A name formerly given to certain notes of some of the banks in the state of Connecticut, which were made payable in two years after the close of the war of 1812. 14 Mass. 322.

This word has been the subject of much discussion in connection with the English Traffic Act and the act of congress creating the interstate commerce commission. It has been held to include all works necessary for the accommodation of traffic and safety of passengers; 3 Nev. & Mac. 48; designation of the hour and speed of connecting trains; 2 El. & Bl. 530; accommodation for receiving and delivering freight where there was no station before, if within the power of the company, and if demanded by the public convenience; id. 306; or even to provide a new station; id. 331.

The statutory obligation to afford due and reasonable facilities is not limited by the convenience of the company; 3 Nev. & Mac. 37; or the question of remuneration to the company; 7 id. 72, 83; nor is it to be interfered with by disputes between different companies; 3 id. 540. It cannot be avoided because the company, by its own act, has rendered the performance of such obligation more difficult; [1891] 1 Q. B. 440. Facilities must be of a more or less public character, and not designed to remedy a mere private grievance; 1 Nev. & Mac. 38, 56, 58, 61.

In a very leading case the word was held to include structural alterations; per Lord Selborne, L. C. (with whom concurred Coleridge, C. J., Brett, L. J., dissenting) in 6 Q. B. D. 506 (reversing 5 Q. B. D. 220, in which the decision was by Cockburn, C. J., and Manisty, L. J., dissenting).

Land owned by a railroad company may be rented for storage of coal without liability for undue preference, storage not being included in the facilities required by the English act; L. R. 5 C. P. 622; s. c. 1 Nev. & Mac. 166.

By the second clause of the third section of the act of congress creating the Interstate Commerce Commission all railroad companies are required "to afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines.—This (it was held by the Circuit Court for Kentucky, per Mr. Justice Jackson) leaves the carriers where it finds them and imposes no duty upon the railroad companies, either to the public or to other lines, to make new stations, yards or depots, even though such would be convenient for the public or other carriers; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; and when a new railroad makes a physical connection with an old one, at a point other than the regular yard or depot, the old company is not compelled to provide the same or equal facilities at the point of contact which it had originally provided at its regular yards and depots; id.; the provision was not enacted for the benefit of carriers but of the commerce transported; id. In this case the Interstate Commerce Commission made an order requiring the connection; 2 Int. Com. Rep.—; but on application to the circuit court to enforce the order the court considered it was not warranted by the act and refused to enforce it.

Under this clause, railroad companies are not required to furnish competing connecting carriers with equal facilities, for the interchange of traffic, when this involves the use of its tracks by such carriers; it may permit such use by one carrier to the exclusion of others; 59 Fed. Rep. 400; nor is the clause violated by receiving and forwarding without prepayment of freight or car mileage, cars of other companies, containing goods coming from one locality and under like circumstances, refusing goods from a different locality; 61 Fed. Rep. 158, affg. 51 id. 465.

A state constitution prohibiting discrimination in charges and facilities does not require a company to make provision for joint business with a new line crossing it, similar to those already made with a rival line at another near point; 110 U. S. 667; but railroad companies may be required to furnish facilities at, and prevented from abandoning stations already established; 37 Conn. 153; 42 id. 56; 104 U. S. 1; 63 Me. 269; 103 Mass. 254; 19 Neb. 476. The mere failure of a common carrier to provide facilities for the shipment of freight does not constitute a legal ground for the recovery of damages; 61 Ark. 560; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 626; 2 Mo. App. Rep. 941. See COMMON CARRIER.

The power of the commission to regulate the accessorial facilities is held by the circuit court of appeals to be confined to mere regulation, and cannot be used to invade rights of property by entering the domain of deprivation, construction, and reconstruction of properties to carry out the proposed regulation: 74 Fed. Rep. 803.

See, generally, as to the construction of the word in the English Traffic Act, Darlington, Ry. Rates, Ch. III. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE: RATES.

FACILITY. In Scotch Law. A degree of mental weakness short of idiocy but justifying legal intervention.

In order to support the reduction of the deed of a facile person, there must be evidence of circumvention and of imposition in the transaction, as well as facility in the party and lesion. But where lesion in the deed and facility in the grantor concur, the most slender circumstances of fraud or circumvention are sufficient to set it aside; Bell, Dict.

FACIO UT DES (Lat. I do that you may give). An expression applied in the civil law to the consideration of that species of contract by which a person agrees to perform anything for a price either specifically mentioned or left to the determination of the law to set a value on it; as, when a servant hires himself to his master for certain wages or an agreed sum of money; 2 Bla. Com. 445. See CONSIDERATION.

FACIO UT FACIAS (Lat. I do that you may do). An expression used in the civil law to denote the consideration of that species of contract by which I agree with a man to do his work for him if he will do mine for me; or if two persons agree to marry together, or to do any other positive acts on both sides; or it may be to forbear on one side in consideration of something done on the other. 2 Bla. Com. 444. See CONSIDERATION.

FACSIMILE. An exact copy or accurate imitation of an original instrument.

In England, where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the original paper, the court will order the probate to pass in facsimile as it may possibly help to show the meaning of the testator; 1 Wms. Ex., 7th ed. 331, 386, 566, See PROBATE.

FACT (Lat. factum). An action; a thing done. A circumstance.

Fact is much used in modern times in distinction from law. Thus, in every case to be tried there are facts to be shown to exist to which the law is to be applied. If law is, as it is said to be, a rule of action, the fact is the action shown to have been done, and which should have been done in accordance with the rule. Fact, in this sense, means a thing done or existing. It has been a frequent subject of debate whether certain words and phrases imply questions of fact, or of law, or both, or are conclusions of law. A useful collection of decisions will be found in Ram on Facts, 8d Am. ed. 21.

Material facts are those which are essential to the right of action or defence. See 30 Mo. 68; 40 N. H. 338.

Immaterial facts are those which are not essential to the right of action or defence. Material facts must be shown to exist; immaterial facts need not. As to what are questions of law for the court and of fact for the jury, see QUESTIONS OF LAW AND

FACT; IGNORANCE; Wells, Law and Fact. As to pleading material facts, see Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 28.

Facts constituting a cause of action are those facts which the evidence upon the trial will prove, and not the evidence which will be required to prove the existence of such facts. 1 Dak. 403.

FACTA ARMORUM. Feats of arms; jousts; tournaments, etc. Cowel.

FACTIO TESTAMENTI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The power of making a will, including right and capacity. Also, the power of receiving under a will. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FACTOR. An agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him, by or for his principal, for a compensation, commonly called factorage or commission. Pal. Ag. 13; Sto. Ag. § 33; Com. Dig. Merchant, B; Malynes, Lex Merc. 81; Beawes, Lex Merc. 44; 3 Chit. Com. L. 193; 2 Kent 622; 1 Bell, Comm. 385, § 408; 2 B. & Ald. 143.

An agent for the sale of goods in his possession or consigned to him. Lawson, R. & Rem. § 227.

When the agent accompanies the ship, taking a cargo aboard, and it is consigned to him for sale, and he is to purchase a return cargo out of the proceeds, such agent is properly called a factor; he is, however, usually known by the name of a supercargo (q. v.). Beawes, Lex Merc. 44; Livermore, Ag. 69; 1 Domat, b. 1, t. 16, § 3, art. 2.

A factor differs from a broker in some important particulars: namely, he may buy and sell for his principal in his own name, as well as in the name of his principal; on the contrary, a broker acting as such should buy and sell in the name of his principal; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 193, 210, 541; 2 B. & Ald. 143; 3 Kent 622; 23 Wall. 321; 11 Mart. La. 331. Again, a factor is intrusted with possession, management, disposal, and control of the goods to be bought and sold, and has a special property and a lien on them; the broker, on the contrary, has usually no such possession, management, control, or disposal of the goods, nor any such special property or lien; Paley, Ag. 13; 1 Bell, Com. 385. The business of factors in the United States is usually done by commission merchants, who are known by that name, and the term factor is but little used; 1 Pars. Contr. 78. The term factor, however, is largely used in the Southern States in the cotton business, and in a different sense from commission merchant; 16 Fed. Rep. 516. He not only sells cotton, but makes advances to the merchant or planter, in cash or goods, to be repaid when the crop comes in. He thus has a lien upon the crop before it is shipped to him. In Alabama the term "commission merchant" as used in the revenue laws is synonymous with "factor"; 50 Ala. 154.

A domestic factor is one who resides in the same country with his principal.

By the usages of trade, or intention of law, when domestic factors are employed in the ordinary business of buying and selling goods, it is presumed that a reciprocal credit among the principal and the agent and third persons has been given. When a purchase has been made by such a factor, he, as well as his principal, is deemed liable for the debt; and in case of a sale the buyer is responsible both to the factor and principal for the purchase-money; but this presumption may be rebutted by proof of exclusive credit; Story, Ag. § 267, 291, 293; Paley, Ag. 243, 271; 9 B. & C. 78; 15 East 62.

A foreign factor is one who resides in a different country from his principal. 1 Term 112; 4 Maule & S. 576.

Foreign factors are held personally liable upon all contracts made by them for their employers, whether they describe themselves in the contract as agents or not. In such cases the presumption is that the credit is given exclusively to the factor. But this presumption may be rebutted by proof of a contrary agreement; Story, Ag. § 268; Mech. Ag. 1051; Bull. N. P. 130; 1 B. & P. 398; 9 B. & C. 78.

His duties. He is required to use reasonable skill and ordinary diligence in his vocation; 1 Ventr. 121; 66 Hun 633; 104 Ala. 662. If for any reason not tortious, he delays selling the goods consigned to him, he is not liable for a subsequent loss occurring through an act of God; 44 Ill. App. 527. He is bound to obey his instructions; 3 N. Y. 62; 77 Ga. 64; 5 C. B. 895; but when he has none he may and ought to act according to the general usages of trade; 14 Pet. 479; 7 Taunt. 164; 5 Day 556; 3 Caines 226; 1 Story. 43; to sell for cash when that is usual, or to give credit on sales when that is customary; 51 N. H. 56. He is bound to render a just account to his principal, and to pay him the moneys he may receive for him. The mere fact that one sells products as a factor, does not impose upon him the burden of proving due diligence in the sale; 111 N. C. 458.

His rights. He has the right to sell the goods in his own name; and, when untrammelled by instructions, he may sell them at such times and for such prices as, in the exercise of a just discretion, he may think best for his employer; 3 C. B. 380; 63 N. C. 542; but he must obey instructions if given; 5 Dill. 438; 31 N. Y. 676; but when the instructions are to wait until a certain law has produced its effect on the market, a certain discretion as to time may be exercised; 21 id. 386. He may sell on credit when such is the usage of the market; 1 Sto. 43; but if he sell on change he is held to a high degree of diligence to ascertain the solvency of the purchaser; 75 Ill. 464. In the absence of instructions he may give a warranty; 1 Wall. 359; and he may insure the goods of the principal in his own name; 120 Mass. 449. He is, for many purposes, between himself and third persons, to be considered as the owner of the goods. He may, therefore, recover the price of goods sold by him in his own name, and, consequently, he may receive payment and give receipts, and discharge the debtor, unless, indeed, notice has been given by the principal to the debtor not to pay. But the title to goods consigned to a factor to be sold remains in the principal until sold, and may not be sold on execution to pay debts of the factor; 38 W. Va. 158. He has a lien on the goods for advances made by him, and for his commissions; but he is not to be considered as the owner, beyond the extent of his lien; id.; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 720; 23 Wall. 35. He has no right to barter the goods of his principal; 65 Mo. 89; 44 Wis. 265; nor to pledge them for the purpose of raising money for himself, nor to secure a debt he may owe; 13 Mass. 178; 59 Ill. App. 149; 1 McCord 1; 1 Mas. 440; 5 Johns. Ch. 429; 73 Pa. 85; L. R. 10 C. P. 354. See 3 Den. 472; 13 E. L. & Eq. 261; FACTOR'S

ACTS. But he may pledge them for advances made to his principal, or for the purpose of raising money for him, or in order to reimburse himself to the amount of his own lien; 2 Kent 625; 4 Johns. 103; 7 East 5; Story, Bailm. § 325; Edw. Bailm. 194; 10 Wall. 141. Another exception to the general rule that a factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal is, that he may raise money by pledging the goods for the payment of duties or any other charge or purpose allowed or justified by the usages of the trade; 2 Gall. 13; 6 S. & R. 386; 3 Esp. 182. He has a lien upon the goods of his principal in his possession, to protect himself against unpaid drafts drawn and accepted in the course of the agency; 25 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 346; and such lien is personal to the factor; 38 W. Va. 158. Where a factor disobeys instructions in selling grain which he has bought for his principal, he thereby loses his lien on money deposited with him as security; 40 Ill. 313; 114 id. 96.

It may be laid down as a general rule that when the property remitted by the principal, or acquired for him by his order, is found distinguishable in the hands of the factor, capable of being traced by a clear and connected chain of identity, in no one link of it degenerating from a specific trust into a general debt, the creditors of the factor who has become bankrupt have no right to the specific property; 2 Stra. 1182; 3 Maule & S. 562; even where it is money in the factor's hands; 2 Burr. 1369; 14 N. H. 38; 2 Dall. 60; 2 Pick. 86; 5 id. 7; 63 Conn. 198. He may sell them to reimburse advances; 14 Pet. 479; unless restrained by an agreement with his principal, but if he has agreed to hold them for a given time he is bound to do so; 16 Fed. Rep. 516. And where the factor dies insolvent, before remitting to the shipper, the latter is entitled to satisfaction out of the proceeds of the sale or deposit in bank, as against the claim of the bank on an unmatured note; 70 Hun 90. And see 1 B. & P. 539, 648, for the rule as to promissory notes. Stock ordered of a broker on margin contracts belongs not to the broker, but to the customers, and may be redeemed by them from an assignee of the broker for benefit of creditors; 63 Conn. 198.

But the rights of third persons dealing bona fide with the factor as a principal, where the name of the principal is sunk entirely, are to be protected; 7 Term 360; 3 Bingh. 139; 6 Maule & S. 14.

See, generally, 58 Am. Dec. 156, note; Lawson, Rights & Rem. § 227-230; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 289; 2 Sm. L. Cas. 118; 1 Am. L. Cas. 788; 16 Fed. Rep. 516, note; LIEN; AGENT; BROKER.

FACTOR'S ACTS. A name given to legislative enactments in England and the United States designed to mitigate the hardships of the common-law rule governing dealings with factors, and especially with respect to pledges made by them of the goods of the principal. The object of the English legislation known under this general designation is the protection of persons dealing with those having possession of goods or documents representing the title thereto. The first acts were 4 Geo. IV. c. 84 and 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, and these were confined to persons entrusted with documents of title, not with the goods themselves. This defect was remedied by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, of which the Ontario act is merely a copy; R. S. Ont. c. 121. The subject was again dealt with in 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, under which many of the decisions under the former acts were practically set aside. As to the provisions of the English acts and decisions thereunder, see 5 Can. L. T. 145.

In the United States the rule of the common law that a factor cannot pledge the property of his principal has been largely altered by statute in many of the states, founded generally it is said upon the statutes of 6 Geo. IV. c. 94; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 300. It is necessary to have reference to the legislation or absence of it in any particular state, to ascertain the law applicable to a particular case and to compare it with the English acts in order to determine the applicability of English decisions. See, as to legislation in this country, 58 Am. Dec. 165, note. See also FACTOR.

FACTORAGE. The wages or allowances paid to a factor for his services; it is more usual to call this commissions.

FACTORIZING PROCESS. A process for attaching effects of the debtor in the hands of a third party. It is substantially the same process known as the garnishee process, trustee process, process by foreign attachment; Drake, Attach. § 451.

FACTORY. A building or group of buildings appropriated to the manufacture of goods, including the machinery necessary to produce the goods, and the engine or other power by which the machinery is propelled; the place where workers are employed in fabricating goods, wares, or utensils. Cent. Dict.

All buildings and premises wherein or within the close or curtilage of which steam, water, or any mechanical power is used to move or work any machinery employed in preparing, manufacturing, or finishing cotton, etc. 7 Vict. c. 15, sect. 73. By subsequent acts, this definition has been extended to various other manufacturing places; Moz. & W. L. Dict. The term includes the fixed machinery when used in a policy of insurance; 8 Ind. 479.

In Scotch Law.—A contract which partakes of a mandate and locatio ad operandum, and which is in the English and American law books discussed under the title of Principal and Agent. Bell, Comm. 259.

FACTORY ACTS. Laws enacted for the purpose of regulating the hours of work, and the sanitary condition, and preserving the health and morals, of the employes, and promoting the education of young persons employed at such labor.

The statute of 1802 (42 Geo. III. c. 73) was the first to be passed, and was followed by those of 1833, and others following at brief intervals up to 1883. For a detailed account of the English acts, see International Cyclopaedia, h. t.

In this country statutes have been passed from time to time in most if not all the states, having in view the same reformatory purpose or kindred ones, as the English Factory Act of 1833 and the others of like character which followed it. The right of the states to pass such acts is sustained under the police power and the principles by which the validity of any such legislation is to be tested is thus stated by the most recent writer on the subject of labor law: "Such statutes are doubtless constitutional in any case where the reason of the regulation is based upon consideration of the public health, safety, and comfort, or the health and morals of the operatives, and is apparent on the face of the statute, but it will not do, under the guise of police regulation, to pass statutes of which the real purpose is different, even though they be in the interest of any particular trade, or otherwise desirable. Such regulations or reformatory acts can only be attained by combination among the workmen themselves to see that they are complied with." Stimson, Lab. L. of U. S. § 45.

The most important subjects covered by this legislation are summarized by the same author: "The preservation of the health of employes in factories by the removal of excessive dust, or for securing pure air, or requiring fans or other special devices to remove noxious dust or vapors peculiar to the trade; statutes requiring guards to be placed about dangerous machinery, belting, elevators, wells, airshafts, etc.; statutes providing for fire-escapes, adequate staircases with rails, rubber treads, etc.; doors opening outwardly, etc.; statutes providing against injury to the operatives by the machinery used, such as laws prohibiting the machinery to be cleaned while in motion, or from being cleaned by any woman or minor; laws requiring mechanical belt-shifters, etc., or connection by bells, tubes, etc., between any room where machinery is used and the engine-room; laws aimed at overcrowding in factories, and at the general comfort of the operatives; and many special laws in railways, mines, and other special occupations, such as the laws requiring warning guards to be placed before bridges upon railroads, requiring the frogs and switches or other appliances of the track to be in good condition and properly protected by timber or otherwise, providing automatic couplings to both freight and passenger trains, and, in building trades, providing for railings upon scaffolds and for suitable scaffolds generally." Id.

There are in many of the states restrictions upon the employment of women and children by limiting the number of hours of labor permitted and providing for oversight of their treatment. For details of such legislation in various states, see id. § 13. It is held constitutional as to minors without doubt, resting on the theory that the state is parens patriae, and as such entitled to the control of those who are unable to contract for themselves. The effort is made to rest it on the same ground as to women; 120 Mass. 383 (in which state there is an unusual and extensive constitutional power of legislation "for the good and welfare" of the people); but elsewhere the constitutionality of such acts has been lately denied on the ground that it was class legislation; 155 Ill. 98. It is now earnestly contended that under the modern view of women under the law, as equally capable with men of contracting, and often of voting and holding office, any effort to restrict the freedom of women to contract cannot be sustained; Stimson, Lab. L. § 13. But while we may admit the full force of the argument against this class of legislation based upon the changed legal relations of women, it may nevertheless be doubted whether it does not to some extent, at least, miss the real underlying principle of such legislation. It is intended for the protection of women and the amelioration of their condition, and is more or less a recognition of the different physical constitution of woman and her peculiar and important relation to the community. Such considerations rest upon conditions which are not changed by any increase of her property rights or political privileges, and, so far as they may have been the basis of these restrictive regulations, they exist and operate with undiminished force. They are apparently overlooked by courts and text writers, including the author quoted, but must undoubtedly be reckoned with in any attempt to deal properly either with the validity or the policy of the acts in question. It is at least fairly to be considered whether they are not quite sufficient to bring the subject of the protection, not the restriction, of women fairly within the scope of the police power as determined by the criterion above quoted, viz.: considerations of public health, safety, and comfort, or the health and morals of the operatives. Every one of these things would remain to be affected by regulations for promoting the welfare of women, even if they were absolutely unshackled by the law as to other classes of rights. The underlying principle or motif of such legislation is restraint of the employer rather than of the employé.

FACTORY PRICES. The prices at which goods may be bought at factories, as distinguished from the prices of those bought in the market, after they have passed into the hands of third parties or shopkeepers. 2 Mas. 90.

FACTUM. A deed; a man's own act and deed. A culpable or criminal act; an act not founded in law. A deed; a written instrument under seal: called, also, charta. Spelman, Gloss.; 2 Bla. Com. 295.

The difference between factum and charta originally would seem to have been that factum denoted the thing done, and charta the evidence thereof; Co. Litt. 9 b. When a man denies by his plea that he made a deed on which he is sued, he pleads non est factum (it is not his deed).

In wills, factum seems to retain an active signification and to denote a making. See 11 How. 358.

A fact. Factum probandum (the fact to be proved). 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

A portion of land granted to a farmer; otherwise called a hide, bovata, etc. Spelm.

In French Law. A memoir which contains concisely set down the fact on which a contest has happened, the means on which a party founds his pretensions, with the refutation of the means of the adverse party. See Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FACULTY. In Canon Law. A license; an authority. For example, the ordinary, having the disposal of all seats in the nave of a church, may grant this power, which when it is delegated is called a faculty, to another.

Faculties are of two kinds: first, when the grant is to a man and his heirs in gross; second, when it is to a person and his heirs as appurtenant to a house which he holds in the parish; 1 Term 429, 432; 12 Co. 196.

In Scotch Law. Ability or power. The term faculty is more properly applied to a power founded on the consent of the party from whom it springs, and not founded on property; Kames, Eq. 504.

FACULTY OF A COLLEGE. The body of instructors or professors whose duties are to attend to the educational business, course of studies, and discipline of the college, as distinguished from the trustees in whom are vested the title to the property and management of the financial concerns of the institution.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES. See ADVOCATES.

FAESTING-MEN. Approved men who were strong-armed. Subsequently the word seems to have been used in the sense of rich, and hence it probably passed into its later and common meaning of pledges or bondsmen, which, by Saxon custom, were bound to answer for each other's good behavior. Cowel; Du Cange.

FAGGOT. A badge, worn in medieval times by persons who had recanted their heretical opinions, designed to show what they considered they had merited but had escaped. Cowel.

FAGGOT VOTE. A term applied to votes manufactured by nominally transferring land to persons otherwise disqualified from voting for members of parliament.

FAIDA. In Saxon Law. Great and open hostility which arose on account of some murder committed. The term was applied only to that deadly enmity in deference to which, among the Germans and other northern nations, if murder was committed, punishment might be demanded from any one of kin to the murderer by any one of the kin of the murdered man. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FAIL. To leave unperformed; to omit; to neglect, as distinguished from refuse, which latter involves an act of the will, while the former may be an act of inevitable necessity; 9 Wheat. 344.

FAILLITE (Fr.). In French Law. Bankruptcy; failure. The condition of a merchant who ceases to pay his debts. 3 Massé, Droit Comm. 171; Guyot, Répert.

FAILURE. In legal parlance, the neglect of any duty may be a failure, and the commission of any fault a delinquency. When applied to a mercantile concern, it means an inability to meet its debts from insolvency. It is synonymous with insolvency. 1 Rice 126.

FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

FAILURE OF EVIDENCE. A failure to offer proof, either positive or inferential, to establish one or more of the many facts, the establishment of all of which is indispensable to the finding of the issue for the plaintiff. 7 Gill. & J. 28.

FAILURE OF ISSUE. A want of issue to take an estate limited over by an executory devise.

Failure of issue is definite or indefinite. When the precise time for the failure of issue is fixed by the will, as in the case of a devise to Peter, but, if he dies without issue living at the time of his death, then to another, this is a failure of issue definite. An indefinite failure of issue is a general failure whenever it may happen, without fixing any time, or a certain and definite period, within which it must happen. 4 Kent 275. An executory devise in fee, with remainder over, to take effect on an indefinite failure of issue is void for remoteness, and hence courts are astute to devise some construction which shall restrain the failure of issue to the term of limitation allowed; id. 276, n. See 40 Pa. 18; 2 Redf. Wills 276, n.; Beach, Wills 374; DYING WITHOUT ISSUE; EN VENTRE SA MERE; SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN.

FAILURE OF JUSTICE. An expression used to denote the deprivation of a right or the loss of reparation for an injury as the result of the lack or inadequacy of a legal remedy. It is also colloquially applied to the miscarriage of justice which occurs when the result of a trial is so palpably wrong as to shock the moral sense of the community.

FAILURE OF RECORD. The neglect to produce the record after having pleaded it. When a defendant pleads a matter and offers to prove it by the record, and the plaintiff pleads nul tiel record, a day is given to the defendant to bring in the record; if he fails to do so, he is said to fail of his record, and, there being a failure of record the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Termes de la Ley. See the form of entering it; 1 Wms. Saund. 92, n. 3.

FAILURE OF TITLE. The entire or partial loss of title suffered by a grantee or one who has contracted to purchase property, resulting from failure or inability of the grantor or vendor to pass a satisfactory title.

FAILURE OF TRUST. The lapse or inability to execute a trust, whether from the legal insufficiency or defective execution of the instrument creating it, the uncertainty of the object, or the lack of a person to take as cestui que trust. It is a doctrine of equity that a trust shall not fail for want of a trustee. See TRUST.

FAINT PLEADER. A false, fraudulent, or collusive manner of pleading, to the deception of a third person.

FAIR. A public mart or place of buying or selling. 1 Bla. Com. 274. A greater species of market, recurring at more distant intervals.

Though etymologically signifying a market for buying and selling exhibited articles, it includes a place for the exhibition of agricultural and mechanical products. 48 Ohio St. 509.

A fair is usually attended by a greater concourse of people than a market, for the amusement of whom various exhibitions are gotten up. McCulloch, Comm. Dict.; Wharton, Dict.

A solemn or greater sort of market, granted to any town by privilege, for the more speedy and commodious provision of such things as the subject needeth, or the utterance of such things as we abound in above our own uses and occasions. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict. A privileged market.

A fair is a franchise which is obtained by a grant from the crown. 2d Inst. 220; 3 Mod. 123; 1 Ld. Raym. 341; 2 Saund. 172; 1 Rolle, Abr. 106; Tomlin; Cunningham, Law Dict.

In some of the United States fairs are recognized and regulated by statute.

FAIR ABRIDGMENT. See COPY-RIGHT.

FAIR CRITICISM. See CRITICISM.

FAIR KNOWLEDGE or SKILL.

A reasonable degree of knowledge or measure of skill. 95 Ind. 382.

FAIR-PLAY MEN. A local irregular tribunal which at one time existed in Pennsylvania.

About the year 1769 there was a tract of country in Pennsylvania, situate between Lycoming creek and Pine creek, in which the Proprietaries prohibited the making of surveys, as it was doubtful whether it had or had not been ceded by the Indians. Although settlements were forbidden, yet adventurers settled themselves there. Being without the pale of ordinary authorities, the inhabitants annually elected a tribunal, in rotation, of three of their number, whom they denominated fair-play men, who had authority to decide all disputes as to boundaries. Their decisions were final, and enforced by the whole community en masse. Their decisions are said to have been just and equitable. 2 Smith, Pa. Laws 195; Sergeant, Land Laws 77.

FAIR PLEADER. The name of a writ given by the statute of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. III. c. 11. See BEAU PLEADER.

FAIR PREPONDERANCE. Of evidence, a preponderance which is apparent upon fair consideration. 29 Minn. 225; 63 Ia. 466; 54 Conn. 274; 86 Pa. 286.

FAIR SALE. A sale conducted with fairness as respects the rights of all parties affected. 24 Minn. 419. A sale at a price sufficient to warrant confirmation or approval when it is required. See SALE.

FAIR VALUE. In a contract by a city to purchase a waterworks plant at "fair and equitable value, the amount is to be determined not by capitalization of the earnings nor limited to the cost of reproducing the plant, but allowance should be made for the additional value created by connection with and supply of buildings, although the company did not own the connections. 10 C. C. A. 653; s. c. 62 Fed. Rep. 863.

FAIRLY. Reasonably; justly; equitably. It is not synonymous with "truly," and the latter should not be substituted for it in a commissioner's oath to take testimony fairly. Language may be "truly" yet unfairly reported, and it may be fairly reported, yet not in accordance with strict truth; 17 N. J. Eq. 234; but it may be deemed synonymous with "equitably"; 41 Ala. 40. "Fairly merchantable" conveys the idea of mediocrity in quality, or something just above it; 74 Me. 479.

FAIT. Anything done.
A deed lawfully executed. Comyns, Dig. Fait.

Femme de fait. A wife de facto.

FAIT JURIDIQUE. In French Law. A judicial fact. One of the factors or elements constitutive of an obligation.

FAITH. A term used in the law only in connection with the adjectives good and bad, as expressing the belief, intent, or purpose with which a transaction has been entered into or completed. See GOOD FAITH.

FAITH AND CREDIT. See FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

FAITHFUL. As respects temporal affairs, diligently, and without unnecessary delay; but it does not include the idea of impartiality. 16 N. J. L. 72.

FAITOURS. Idle persons; idle livers; vagabonds. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; Blount; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FAKIR. A term applied among the Mohammedans to a kind of religious ascetic or beggar, whose claim is that he "is in need of mercy, and poor in the sight of God, rather than in need of worldly assistance." Hughes, Dict. of Islam. Sometimes spelled Faqueer or Fakeer.

FALCARE (Lat.). To cut or mow down. Falcare prata, to cut or mow down grass in meadows hayed (laid in for hay), was a customary service for the lord by his inferior tenants. Kennett, Gloss.

Falcator. The tenant performing the service.

Falcatura. A day's mowing. Falcatura una. Once mowing the grass.

Falcatio. A mowing.

Falcata. That which was mowed. Kennett, Gloss.; Cowel; Jacobs.

FALCIDIA. In Spanish Law. The fourth portion of an inheritance, which legally belongs to the heir, and for the protection of which he has the right to reduce the legacies to three-fourth parts of the succession, in order to protect his interest.

FALCIDIAN LAW. In Roman Law. A statute or law restricting the right of disposing of property by will, enacted by the people during the reign of Augustus, on the proposition of Falcidius, who was a tribune, in the year of Rome 714.

Its principal provision gave power to fathers of families to bequeath three-fourths of their property, but deprived them of the power to give away the other fourth, which was to descend to the heir. Inst. 2. 22. This fourth was termed the Falcidian portion.

A similar principle exists in Louisiana, and formerly prevailed in England. See LEGITIME.

As to the early history of testamentary law, see Maine, Ancient Law.

In some of the states the statutes authorizing bequests and devises to charitable corporations limit the amount which a testator may give, to a certain fraction of his estate.

FALDA. In Spanish Law. The slope or skirts of a hill. 2 Wall. 673.

FALDÆ CURSUS. In Old English Law. A fold-course or sheep-walk. Spel.; 2 Vent. 139.

FALDAGE. The privilege which anciently several lords reserved to themselves of setting up folds for sheep in any fields within their manors, the better to manure them, and this not only with their own but their tenants' sheep. Called, variously, secta faldare, fold-course, free-fold, faldagii. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

FALDATA. In Old English Law. A flock or fold of sheep. Cowel.

FALDFEY. A compensation paid by some customary tenants that they might have liberty to fold their own sheep on their own land. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel.

FALDISDORY. In Ecclesiastical Law. The bishop's seat or throne within the chancel.

FALDSOCA. Liberty or privilege of foldage.

FALDSTOOL. A folding seat similar to a camp stool, made either of wood or metal, sometimes covered with silk or other material. It was used by a bishop when officiating in other than his own cathedral church. Encyc. Dic.

FALD WORTH. A person reckoned old enough to become a member of the decennary, and so subject to the law of frank-pledge. Spel.

FALERÆ. In Old English Law. The tackle and furniture of a cart or wain. Blount.

FALESIA. In Old English Law. A hill or down by the sea-side. Co. Litt. 5 b; Domesday.

FALK-LAND. See FOLC-LAND.

FALL. In Scotch Law. To loose. To fall from a right is to loose or forfeit it. 1 Kames, Eq. 228.

FALL OF LAND. In English Law. A quantity of land six ells square.

FALLO. In Spanish Law. The final decree or judgment given in a lawsuit.

FALLOW LAND. Land ploughed, but not sown, and left uncultivated for a time, after successive crops; land left untilled for a year or more.

FALLUM. In Old English Law. An unexplained term for some particular kind of land.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO. In Civil Law. False designation; erroneous description of a person or a thing in a written instrument. Inst 2, 20, 30.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO NON NOCET. See MAXIMS; DEMONSTRATIO.

FALSA MONITA. In the Civil Law. Counterfeit money. Cod. 9, 24.

FALSARE. In Old English Law. To counterfeit. Bract. fol. 276 b. Falcarious, a counterfeiter.

FALSE. Applied to the intentional act of a responsible being, it implies a purpose to deceive. 63 Vt. 201; 13 U. C. C. P. 19.

FALSE ACTION. See FEIGNED ACTION.

FALSE AND PRETENDED PROPECIES. When made with intent to disturb the public peace they are punishable under 33 Hen. VIII. c. 14, 3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 15, and 5 Eliz. c. 15. These statutes, although unrepealed, are not likely to be enforced.

FALSE CHARACTER. To personate the master or mistress of a servant or his or her representative and give a false character to the servant, is an offence punishable by fine, by 32 Geo. III. c. 56. See PERSONATE.

FALSE CLAIM. A claim made by a man for more than his due. An instance is given where the prior of Lancaster claimed a tenth part of the venison in corio as well as in carne, where he was entitled to that in carne only. Manw. For. Laws, cap. 25, num. 3.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT. Any unlawful restraint of a man's liberty, whether in a place made use of for imprisonment generally, or in one used only on the particular occasion, or by words and an array of force, without bolts or bars, in any locality whatever. 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 553; Webb's Poll. Torts 259; 8 N. H. 550; 7 Humph. 43; 12 Ark. 43; 7 Q. B. 742; 5 Vt. 588; 3 Blackf. 46; 9 Johns. 117; 1 A. K. Marsh 345; 36 Fed. Rep. 252; 92 Mich. 498; 78 Hun. 238. See 35 W. Va. 588.

The total, or substantially total, restraint of a man's freedom of locomotion, without authority of law, and against his will. Big. Torts 113. Any general restraint is sufficient; there need not be actual contact of the person. Any demonstration of physical violence, which apparently can be avoided only by submission, constitutes imprisonment. Submission, in such case, is not consent; id. 114; but the detention must be such as to cause escape in any direction to amount to a breach of the restraint.

Arresting the wrong person under a warrant constitutes false imprisonment; F. Moo. 457; so if there is a misnomer in the warrant, even though the person actually intended was arrested; 4 Wend. 455; and if the officer makes the arrest out of his bailiwick, or detains the person unduly; 4 B. & C. 596; an arrest under a void writ constitutes a false imprisonment; 5 Hill 242. A writ may be void because defective in language, because the court had no jurisdiction of the proceedings, or because the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ; Big. Torts 122; 34 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 431; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 989. The clerk of the court who issues a defective writ, or one not authorized by the court, is liable; and so is a judge who orders a writ which he had no right to issue, or where he had no jurisdiction. Both the attorney and his client may be liable if the former ordered the arrest, and even when the arrest has been ordered by a judge, i. e. in a case where they participate in making the arrest; Big. Torts 128; or where the writ was issued by the misconduct of the attorney; id. 129. If the writ be voidable it must be set aside before an action for false imprisonment will lie, but otherwise if it be void; id. 131.

Malice is not an element of false imprisonment; 66 Hun 230; 35 W. Va. 588; except so far as it affects the measure of damages; 35 Neb. 898.

In order to be restored to liberty, the remedy is, by writ of habeas corpus. An action of trespass vi et armis lies. To punish the wrong done to the public by the false imprisonment of an individual, the offender may be indicted; 4 Bla. Com. 218; 2 Burr. 993. See Bacon, Abr. Trespass (D, 3); 9 N. H. 491; 6 Ala. N. S. 778; 2 Harr. Del. 538; 3 Tex. 282; 10 Cush. 375.

One cannot maintain an action for false imprisonment where he is arrested by a proper officer, under a warrant lawful on its face, and issued by proper authority; 97 Ala. 626; 94 Mich. 1. Justification is not available as a defence unless pleaded; 2 Misc. Rep. 127.

FALSE JUDGMENT. The name of a writ which lies when a false judgment has been given in the county court, court baron, or other courts not of record. Fitzh. N. B. 17, 18.

FALSE LATIN. When legal proceedings were conducted in Latin, if a word were significant though not good Latin, yet an indictment, declaration, or fine should not be made void by it; but if the word were not Latin, nor allowed by the law, and it were in a material point, it made the whole vicious. 5 Coke 121; 2 Nels. 830. Wharton.

FALSE LIGHTS AND SIGNALS. Lights and signals falsely and maliciously displayed for the purpose of bringing a vessel into danger. Exhibiting false lights or signals, with intent to bring any ship into danger, is felony, punishable, in England, with penal servitude for life; stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, § 47; and in the United States by imprisonment. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5358. See COLLISION.

FALSE NEWS. Spreading false news, whereby discord may grow between the queen of England and her people, or the great men of the realm, or which may produce other mischiefs, still seems to be a misdemeanor under Stat. 3 Edw. I. c. 34; Steph. Cr. Dig. § 95.

FALSE OATH. See PERJURY.

FALSE PERSONATION. See PERSONATION.

FALSE PLEA. See SHAM PLEA.

FALSE PRETENCES. In Criminal Law. False representations and statements, made with a fraudulent design to obtain "money, goods, wares, and merchandise," with intent to cheat. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2308.

A representation of some fact or circumstance calculated to mislead, which is not true. 19 Pick. 184.

Such a fraudulent representation of fact by one who knows it not to be true as is adapted to induce the person to whom it is made to part with something of value. It may relate to quality, quantity, the nature or other incident of the article offered for sale, whereby the purchaser buying it, is defrauded; 126 Ill. 139.

The pretence must relate to past events. Any representation or assurance in relation to a future transaction may be a promise, or covenant, or warranty, but cannot amount to a statutory false pretence; 19 Pick. 185; 3 Term 98; but one will be guilty if there are false representations of a past or existing fact, although a promise be also a part of the inducement to the person defrauded to part with his property; 90 Ga. 437. It must be such as to impose upon a person of ordinary strength of mind; 3 Hawks 620; 4 Pick. 178; and this will doubtless be sufficient; 11 Wend. 557; Clark, Cr. L. 278. But, although it may be difficult to restrain false pretences to such as an ordinarily prudent man may avoid, yet it is not every absurd or irrational pretence which will be sufficient. See 14 Ill. 348; 17 Me. 211; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 592; Russ. & R. 127. It is not necessary that all the pretences should be false, if one of them, per se, is sufficient to constitute the offence; 14 Wend. 547. And although other circumstances may have induced the credit, or the delivery of the property, yet it will be sufficient if the false pretences had such an influence that without them the credit would not have been given or the property delivered; 11 Wend. 557; 14 id. 547. The false pretences must have been used before the contract was completed; 13 Wend. 311. Extra-judicial admissions and statements of the defendant alone as to the falsity of the statement are not sufficient to warrant a conviction, as the falsity is in the nature of a corpus delicti which requires other proof; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 440.

The question is modified in the different states by the wording of the statutes, which vary from each other somewhat. It may be laid down as the general rule of the interpretation of the words "by any false pretence," which are in the statutes, that wherever a person fraudulently represents as an existing fact that which is not an existing fact, and so gets money, etc., that is an offence within the acts. See 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 559; 3 C. & K. 98; 22 Pa. 253; 100 Cal. 352.

There must be an intent to cheat or defraud some person; Russ. & R. 317; 98 N. C. 733; 112 Mo. 585. This may be inferred from a false representation; 13 Wend. 87. The intent is all that is requisite: it is not necessary that the party defrauded should sustain any loss; 11 Wend. 18; 1 C. & M. 516, 537; 4 Pick. 177. The offence is not proven where the representations were not relied on; 98 Cal. 661. See, generally, 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 409; 19 Pick. 179; 24 Me. 77; 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 131; 16 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 321; 126 Ill. 139; 133 Ind. 297; 137 N. Y. 530; DECEIT; FRAUD.

FALSE REPRESENTATION. A representation which is untrue, wilfully made to deceive another to his injury. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION; FRAUD.

FALSE RETURN. A return made by the sheriff, or other ministerial officer, to a writ, in which is stated a fact contrary to the truth, and injurious to one of the parties or some one having an interest in it.

In this case the officer is liable for damages to the party injured; 2 Esp. 475. When the sheriff has levied on property sufficient to satisfy an execution, and yet return it unsatisfied, he is prima facie liable to the plaintiff for the full amount of the judgment, and he must show such facts as will exonerate or excuse him; 74 N. Y. 395. In some states, every return of process, untrue in fact, is held to expose the sheriff to all the penalties of a false return; 74 N. C. 473; 81 id. 368. But when the actual damage is the result of the negligence of the party complaining, the sheriff will only be liable for nominal damages; 98 Mass. 211; 103 id. 507; 6 Nev. 83; 10 Hun 531. See RETURN OF WRITS.

FALSE SWEARING. In English Law. The misdemeanor committed by a person who swears falsely before any person authorized to administer an oath upon a matter of public concern, under such circumstances that the false swearing would have amounted to perjury if committed in a judicial proceeding; as where a person makes a false affidavit under the Bills of Sale Acts. Steph. Cr. Dig. 84.

FALSE TOKEN. A false document or sign of the existence of a fact,—in general used for the purpose of fraud. See 3 Term 98; 2 Starkie, Ev. 563; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 585; 13 Wend. 311; 14 id. 570; 9 id. 182.

FALSE VERDICT. One obviously opposed to the principles of right and justice.

The false verdict of jurors, whether occasioned by embracery or not, was anciently considered as criminal, and, therefore, exemplarily punished by attain, but by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50 the writ of attain was wholly abolished and superseded by the practice of setting aside the first verdict and granting new trials; 3 Bla. Com. 402.

FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. Weights and measures which do not conform to those established by law.

In the laws of King Edgar, nearly a century before the Conquest, we find an injunction that one measure kept at Winchester should be observed throughout the realm. In England the prerogative of fixing the standard anciently vested in the crown; in Normandy in the duke. "The regulation of weights and measures cannot, however, with propriety be referred to the king's prerogative; for from Magna Charta to the present time there are about twenty acts of parliament to fix and establish the standard and uniformity of weights and measures." 1 Bla. Com. 274. n. In a case before the Court of King's Bench it was held that although it was the custom of the town to sell eighteen ounces in a pound of butter, yet the jury of the court-leet were not justified in seizing the butter of a person who sold pounds less than that, but more than sixteen ounces each, the statutable weight; 3 T. R. 271; and it has been determined that no practice or usage could countervail the statutes 22 Car. II. c. 8 and 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 12, which enact that if any person shall either buy or sell salt or grain by any other measure than the Winchester bushel, he shall forfeit forty shillings and also the value of the grain or salt so sold or bought; one-half to the poor, the other to the informer; 4 T. R. 750; 5 id. 353. In this country the power to fix the standard of weights and measures is in congress; Const. U. S. art 1, s. 8. See WEIGHTS; MEASURES.

FALSEDAD. In Spanish Law. Falseness; deviation from the truth. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 26, l. 1.

FALSEHOOD. Any untrue assertion or proposition. A wilful act or declaration contrary to the truth. See 51 N. H. 207.

It has been said that the use of the term falsehood does not always and necessarily imply a lie or wilful untruth, but is generally used in the second sense here given. It is committed either by the wilful act of the party, or by dissimulation, or by words. It is wilful, for example, when the owner of a thing sells it twice, by different contracts, to different individuals, unknown to them; for in this the seller must wilfully declare the thing is his own when he knows that it is not so. It is committed by dissimulation when a creditor, having an understanding with his former debtor, sells the land of the latter, although he has been paid the debt which was due to him. Falsehood by word is committed when a witness swears to what he knows not to be true.

Crabbe thus distinguishes between falsehood and untruth: "The latter is an untrue saying, and may be unintentional, in which case it reflects no disgrace on the agent. A falsehood and a lie are intentional false sayings, differing only in degree of the guilt of the offender; falsehood being not always for the express purpose of deceiving, but a lie always for the worst of purposes." See Rosc. Cr. Ev. 362; DECEIT; FRAUD; MISREPRESENTATION.

FALSELY. Under a statute making it a misdemeanor "wilfully to make a false answer," an indictment charging that one "falsely and fraudulently answered," is bad for omitting "wilfully;" 1 Den. C. C. 157.

In an indictment for forgery the averment that defendant swore falsely was held insufficient, without the additional words "corruptly and wilfully;" Cro. Eliz. 201; and "falsely and corruptly" were held insufficient without "wilfully;" id. 143; and falsely and maliciously were held insufficient without "wilfully and corruptly," with a quere whether one of the last two words would suffice without the other; 7 D. & R. 665; but in Cox's case, Leach 69, it was held that wilfully was not required at common law but was necessary under stat. 5 Eliz. c. 9. An indictment for perjury was held good without the averment that the defendant did falsely, corruptly, and wilfully swear, etc., and the court said: "The words falsely, corruptly, and wilfully . . . are mere expletives to swell the sentence, in the language of Lord Hardwicke, 1 Atk. 50;" 3 Yeates 407, 413. In obtaining money under false pretences it is not enough to charge that the defendant falsely pretended by certain pretences set forth, without specially averring the falsity of the pretences; 2 M. & S. 379.

The use of the word falsely in a statute (against counterfeiting) implies that there must be a fraudulent or criminal intent in the act; 5 McLean 208, 211. See also 4 B. & C. 329; 6 Com. Dig. 58; Stark. Cr. Pl. 86.

In an action for libel, "wrongfully and falsely published" will, it seems, amount to maliciously published, but it is better to add falsely and maliciously; 1 Chit. Pl. 421 and note (x); the word falsely must have great stress laid on it in an action for slander; 2 Wils. 300, 301. Case will lie for falsely and maliciously suing out a commission in bankruptcy; 2 Wils. 145; or for falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause procuring a search warrant; 1 D. & R. 97. In an action on the case for conspiracy or for malicious prosecution the allegation that the prosecution was false and malicious is not sufficient without adding probable cause; 2 Munf. 10; contra as to conspiracy; 1 Binn. 172.

FALSI CRIMEN. A fraudulent subornation or concealment of truth.

FALSIFICATION. In Equity Practice. The showing an item in the debit of an account to be either wholly false or in part erroneous. 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 525.

FALSIFY. In Chancery Practice. To prove that an item in an account before the court as complete, which is inserted to the debit of the person falsifying, should have been omitted.

When a bill to open an account has been filed, the plaintiff is sometimes allowed to surcharge and falsify such account; and if anything has been inserted that is a wrong charge, he is at liberty to show it; and that is a falsification. 2 Ves. 565; 11 Wheat. 237. See SURCHARGE.

In Criminal Law. To alter or make false.

The alteration or making false of a record is punishable at common law or by statute in the states, and, if of records of the United States courts, by act of congress of April 30, 1790; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5394.

In Practice. To prove a thing to be false. Co. Litt. 104 b.

FALSIFYING A RECORD. A crime against public justice punishable in England by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, and by statute in the several states and District of Columbia.

FALSIFYING JUDGMENTS. A term sometimes used for reversing judgments. See 4 Steph. Com. 553.

FALSING. In Scotch Law. Making or proving false. Bell, Dict.

FALSING OF DOOMS. In Scotch Law. Protesting against a sentence and taking an appeal to a higher tribunal. Bell, Dict.

An action to set aside a decree. Skene.

FALSO RETORNO BREVIUM (L. Lat.). In Old English Law. The name of a writ which might have been sued out against a sheriff for falsely returning writs. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FALSONARIUS. A person guilty of forgery; a counterfeiter.

FALSUS. Deceiving; fraudulent; erroneous. In the first two senses it is applied to persons in respect to their acts and conduct, as well as to things; and in the third sense it is applied to persons on the question of personal identity.

FAMA. Rumor; report; fame.

FAMACIDE. A killer of reputation; a slanderer. Black, L. Dict.

FAMILIA (Lat.). In Roman Law. A family.

This word had four different acceptations in the Roman law. In the first and most restricted sense it designated the pater-familias,—his wife, his children, and other descendants subject to his paternal power. In the second and more enlarged sense it comprehended all the agnates,—that is to say, all the different families who would all be subject to the paternal authority of a common chief if he were still living. Here it has the same meaning as agnatio. In a third acceptation it comprises the slaves and those who are in mancipio of the chief,—although considered only as things, and without any tie of relationship. And, lastly, it signifies the whole fortune or patrimony of the chief. See PATER-FAMILIAS; 1 Ortolan 28.

In Old English Law. A household. All the servants belonging to one master. Du Cange; Cowel. A sufficient quantity of land to maintain one family. The same quantity of land is called sometimes mansa (a manse), familia, carucata. Du Cange; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel; Creasy, Church Hist.

FAMILIÆ EMPTOR. In the Roman Law. An intermediate person who purchased the aggregate inheritance when sold per æs et libram, in the progress of making a will under the twelve tables. The purchaser was merely a man of straw, transmitting the inheritance to the hæres proper. Brown.

FAMILIÆ ERCISCUNDÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. An action which lay for any of the co-heirs for the division of what fell to them by inheritance. Stair, Inst. l. 1, tit. 7, § 15.

of the six clerks of chancery in England. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 249, 251.

FAMILY. Father, mother, and children. All the individuals who live under the authority of another, including the servants of the family. 2 Fed. Rep. 432. All the relations who descend from a common ancestor or who spring from a common root. La. Code, art. 3522, no. 16; 9 Ves. 323. The primary meaning of a testator's "family" in a will is children; 3 Ch. Div. 672.

In common parlance it consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater familias; those who form his fire-side. But when they branch out and became the heads of new establishments, they cease to be part of the father's family; 4 Term 797; 154 Mass. 299.

While usually importing a household, including parents, children, and servants, it is not necessary, to sustain the family relation between parents and children, that they should reside together; 21 Or. 230.

The term as used in connection with homestead and exemption laws is important. See a full discussion of the cases in Thomps. Homest. & Ex. It is said to mean, in the Texas constitution, "every collective body of persons living together within the same curtilage, subsisting in common, directing their attention to a common object—the promotion of their mutual interests and social happiness." 31 Tex. 680. "A family is the collective body of persons who live in one house, under one head or manager." 52 Ia. 431; 53 id. 706; S. C. 36 Am. Rep. 248 (and note).

The meaning of the term is usually a matter of statutory or constitutional interpretation. A widower with whom lived his son and son's wife and a household servant is the head of a family; 52 Ia. 431; but a widower keeping house with a female relative whom he is not bound to support has no family; 48 Tex. 517. An unmarried woman keeping house and taking care of two children of a deceased sister is the head of a family; 53 Ia. 706. A widower without children, who takes his mother to live with him, is the head of a family; 11 Ia. 104. A widower and grown-up daughter constitute a family; 14 How. Pr. 521; or merely a widower; 95 Cal. 397. An unmarried man who succeeds his father in taking care of his minor sisters may be deemed the head of a family; 27 Ark. 658. So of an unmarried man supporting his widowed sister and her small children; 20 Mo. 75; and of an unmarried man whose widowed sister lived with him and kept his house; per Dillon, J.; 16 N. B. R. 382; S. C. Fed. Cas. No. 733. So of an unmarried woman with her illegitimate child; 47 Cal. 73. But not of a man who has no family; 9 Ala. 981; 10 Allen 425. A single person in the actual occupancy of a homestead, although not the head of a family, is entitled to a homestead exemption as a family; 60 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 159. A husband and wife are a family, as to exempt property; 14 How. Pr. 519; so as to homestead; 21 Ill. 45. But having a wife and keeping house is not marrying and having a family; 11 Pa. 159. See Thomp. Homest. & Ex. §§ 44-68.

In the construction of wills, the word family, when applied to personal property, is synonymous with kindred or relations. It may, nevertheless, be confined to particular relations by the context of the will, or may be enlarged by it, so that the expression may in some cases mean children, or next of kin, and in others may even include relations by marriage; Schoul. Wills 537. The primary meaning of the word family is children, and it must be so construed in all cases unless the context shows that it was used in a different sense; 85 Va. 509. It has been more commonly held that parents are not included in the term; 8 Ves. 604; 2 Redf. Wills 73; 1 Rep. Leg. 115; 2 Ves. 110; 5 Maule & S. 126; 11 Paige 159; it may include a wife as well as children; 8 Allen 339. A statute providing that real estate shall not go "out of the family" restricts the descent to the issue of the ancestor; 3 N. J. L. 481. See HEAD OF A FAMILY.

FAMILY ARRANGEMENT. An agreement made between a father and his son, or children, or between brothers, to dispose of property in a different manner to that which would otherwise take place.

In these cases, frequently, the mere relation of the parties will give effect to bargains otherwise without adequate consideration. 1 Chitty, Pr. 67; 1 Turn. & R. 13; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 72; 50 Mo. App. 1.

Such an arrangement may be upheld, although there were no rights in dispute at the time of making it, and the court will not be disposed to scan with much nicety the quantum of the consideration; L. R. 2 Ch. 294. A family arrangement is not by itself a valuable consideration; Brett, L. C. in Mod. Eq. 294. Wherever doubts and disputes have arisen with regard to the rights of different members of a family (especially when relating to legitimacy) and fair compromises have been entered into to preserve harmony, those arrangements have been sustained, albeit, perhaps, resting upon grounds which would not have been considered satisfactory if the transaction had occurred between mere strangers; Sugden, L. C., in 2 Dr. & War. 503. The impossibility of estimating money considerations in family arrangements has led to their exemption from the rules which affect other arrangements; 7 Cl. & F. 280.

In ordinary cases a father's dealings with his child who has just come of age are open to suspicion, and so are dealings with a reversioner, but if these are in the nature of a family arrangement, the court will regard them, not with suspicion, but with favor; 2 Giff. 232. It is not essential that the son should have independent advice, nor will inquiry be made as to how far the father's influence was exerted. At the same time any unusual benefit secured to the father will be scrutinized and perhaps expunged; 41 Ch. D. 200; and only the usual provisions should be inserted. It seems that resettlements under a family arrangement will justify the execution of a power under which the donee retains some benefit, which would otherwise be a fraud on the power. See 1 Swans. 129. An agreement between the children of a testator that the shares of the children shall be considered as vesting at the death of the testator divested of the survivorship clause contained in the will, will be upheld in equity; 172 Pa. 104.

Evidence of circumstances to show a family arrangement at the execution of deeds is admissible, and a deed otherwise invalid would be good evidence if it formed a component part of such arrangement; 9 S. & R. 268. See FAMILY MEETING.

FAMILY BIBLE. A Bible containing a record of the births, marriages, and deaths of the members of a family.

An entry by a father, made in a Bible, stating that Peter, his eldest son, was born in lawful wedlock, of Maria, his wife, at a time specified, is evidence to prove the legitimacy of Peter; 4 Campb. 401. But the entry in order to be evidence must be an original entry; and, when it is not so, the loss of the original must be proved before the copy can be received; 6 S. & R. 135. See 10 Watts 82.

A family Bible, containing entries of family incidents, where the parties who made the entries are dead, will be received in evidence; Whart. Ev. § 219; Tayl. Ev. 572; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 104; L. R. 1 Ex. 255; 30 Ia. 301; 53 Ga. 535. See 11 Cl. & F. 85; 39 Conn. 563. In order to make an entry evidence as to the birth or death of a child, it must be shown that the entry is in the handwriting of a parent; 30 Ia. 301. Entries in a family Bible or Testament are admissible in evidence even without proof that they have been made by a parent or relative; 52 Md. 709.

FAMILY MEETING (called, also, family council).

In Louisiana. Meetings of at least five relations of minors or other persons on whose interest they are called upon to deliberate, or, in default of relations, then of the friends of such minors or other persons. See 45 La. Ann. 857.

The appointment of the members of the family meeting is made by the judge. The relations or friends must be selected from among those domiciliated in the parish in which the meeting is held: the relations are selected according to their proximity, beginning with the nearest. The relation is preferred to the connection in the same degree; and among relations of the same degree the eldest is preferred. The undertutor must also be present. 6 Mart. La. N. s. 455.

The family meeting is held before a justice of the peace, or notary public, appointed by the judge for the purpose. It is called for a fixed day and hour, by citations delivered at least three days before the day appointed for that purpose.

The members of the family meeting, before commencing their deliberations, take an oath before the officer before whom the meeting is held, to give their advice according to the best of their knowledge touching the interests of the person respecting whom they are called upon to deliberate. The officer before whom the family meeting is held must make a particular procès-verbal of the deliberations, cause the members of the family meeting to sign it, if they know how to sign, and must sign it himself, and deliver a copy to the parties that they may have it homologated.

The sale of minor's property without the advice of a family meeting is null and void as against the purchaser; 45 La. Ann. 857.

FAMILY PHYSICIAN. A physician who regularly attends and is consulted by the members of the family as their medical adviser; but he need not attend in all cases or be consulted by all the members of the family. 17 Minn. 519; 58 Mo. 424.

FAMILY USE. That use ordinarily made by and suitable for the members of a household whether as individuals or collectively. 52 Cal. 120. The supply of water in a municipal corporation for family use includes the supply of gaols, hospitals, almshouses, schools, and other municipal institutions; id. See FAMILY; GROCERIES.

FAMOSUS (Lat.). Defamatory; slanderous; scandalous. Used in civil and old English law to express that which affected injuriously the character or reputation.

FAMOSUS LIBELLUS (Lat.). Among the civilians these words signified that species of injuria which corresponds nearly to libel or slander.

FANAL. In French Law. A small lighthouse. A lamp or apparatus in such lighthouse. A lantern placed high up on the stern of a vessel.

FANATIC. A religious enthusiast; a bigot; a person entertaining wild and extravagant notions, or affected by zeal or enthusiasm, especially upon religious subjects.

The word was formerly defined in English law as a person pretending to be inspired, and was said to be a term applied to "Quakers, Anabaptists, and all other sectaries, and factious dissenters from the church of England." Jac. L. Dict. See Stat. 13 Car. II. c. 6.

FANEGA. In Spanish Law. A measure of land, which is not the same in every province. Diccionario de la Acad.; 2 White, Recop. 49. In Spanish America, the fanega consisted of six thousand four hundred square varas, or yards. 2 White, Recop. 138.

FARANDMAN. In Scotch Law. A traveller; a merchant-stranger. Skene.

FARDEL. The fourth part of a yard-land. Spelman, Gloss. According to others, the eighth part. Noy, Complete Lawyer 57; Cowel. See Cunningham, Law Dict.

FARDELLA. In Old English Law. A bundle; a pack; a fardel. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 22, § 10.

FARDING-DEAL. The fourth part of an acre of land. Spelm. Gloss.

FARE. A voyage or passage. The money paid for a voyage or passage. The latter is the modern signification. See 26 N. Y. 526; TICKET.

In case of a water company it means the tax or compensation which the company may charge for furnishing a supply of water. 111 N. C. 615. See RATES.

FARINAGIUM. A mill. Spelm. A toll of the grist of meal or flour. Jac. L. Dict.

FARLEY or FARLEU. Money paid in lieu of a heriot (q. v.). Applied also to the best chattel as distinguished from heriot,—the best beast. Cowel.

FARLINGARII. Whoremongers; adulterers.

FARM. A certain amount of provision reserved as the rent of a messuage. Spelman, Gloss.

Rent generally which is reserved on a lease; when it was to be paid in money, it was called blanche firme. Spelman, Gloss.; 2 Bla. Com. 42.

A term. A lease of lands; a leasehold interest. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 17; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 301, n.; 2 Chit. Pl. 879, n. e. The land itself, let to farm or rent. 2 Bla. Com. 368.

A portion of land used for agricultural purposes, either wholly or in part. 18 Pick. 553; 2 Binn. 238.

A body of land, usually under one ownership, devoted to agriculture; either to the raising of crops, or pasturage, or both. It is not understood to have any necessary relation to, or to be circumscribed by, political subdivisions. A farm may consist of any number of acres, of one quarter section or less, or many quarter sections; of one field, or many fields; may lie in one township and county, or in more than one; 32 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 693. See 47 How. Pr. 446.

It is usually the chief messuage in a village or town whereto belongs a great demesne of all sorts. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Termes de la Ley.

A large tract or portion of land taken by a lease under a yearly rent payable by the tenant. Tomlin, Law Dict.

From this latter sense is derived its common modern signification of a large tract used for cultivation or other purposes, as raising stock, whether hired or owned by the occupant, including a messuage with out-buildings, gardens, orchard, yard, etc. Plowd. 195; Touchst. 93.

In American law, the word has almost exclusively this latter meaning of a portion of land used for agricultural purposes, either wholly or in part. 2 Binn. 238; 18 Pick. 553; 6 Metc. 529; 2 Hill. R. P. 338.

By the conveyance of a farm will pass a messuage, arable land, meadow, pasture, wood, etc., belonging to or used with it. Co. Litt. 5a; Shepp. Touchst. 93; 4 Cruise, Dig. 321; Plowd. 167.

In a will, the word farm may pass a freehold, if it appear that such was the intention of the testator: 6 Term 345; 9 East 448. See 6 East 604, n.; 8 id. 339.

FARM LET. Technical words in a lease creating a term for years. Co. Litt. 45 b; 2 Mod. 250; 1 Washb. R. Pr. Index, Lease.

FARM OUT. To rent for a certain term. The collection of the revenue among the Romans was farmed out to persons called publicani. The same system existed in France before the revolution of 1789; and in England the excise taxes were farmed out, and thereby their evils were greatly aggravated. The farming of the excise was abolished in Scotland by the union, having been before that time abandoned in England. In all these cases the custom gave rise to great abuse and oppression of the people, and in France most of the farmers-general, as they were called, perished on the scaffold. See Int. Cyc. titles Farmers-general, Excise, Publicani.

FARMER. The lessee of a farm. It is said that every lessee for life or years, although it be but of a small house and land, is called farmer. This word implies no mystery, except it be that of husbandman. Cunn. Law Dict; Cowel; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 318.

In common parlance, and as a term of description in a deed, farmer means one who cultivates a farm, whether he owns it or not. There may also be a farmer of the revenue or of other personal property as well as lands. Plowd. 195; Cunn. Law Dict.

FARMER GENERAL. See FARM OUT.

FARO. A gambling game of cards in which checks, commonly known as "chips," are used to represent money, which is staked upon the order in which the cards turn up as dealt. The players all play against the dealer, who is termed the banker. See GAMING.

FARRAGO LIBELLI (Lat.). An ill-composed book containing a collection of miscellaneous subjects not properly associated or scientifically arranged. Whart.

FARRIER. One who takes upon himself the public employment of shoeing horses.

Like an innkeeper, a common carrier, and other persons who assume a public employment, a farrier is bound to serve the public as far as his employment goes, and an action lies against him for refusing, when a horse is brought to him at a reasonable time for such purpose, if he refuses; Oliph. Horses 131; and he is liable for the unskillfulness of himself or servant in performing such work; 1 Bla. Com. 431; but not for the malicious act of the servant in purposely driving a nail into the foot of the horse with the intention of laming him; 2 Salk. 440; Hanover, Horses 215.

FARTHING. In English Law. The one-fourth part of a penny (q. v.).

FARTHING OF GOLD. An ancient coin of the value of one-fourth part of a noble. 9 Hen V. c. 7.

FARTHING OF LAND. Sometimes written farumdel or farthingdell. See FARDING-DEAL.

FARVAND. Standing by itself, this word signifies "passage by sea or water." In charter-parties, it means voyage or passage by water. 18 C. B. 880.

FARYNDON INN. The ancient designation of Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, London. See INNS OF COURT.

FAS (Lat.). Right; justice. Calvinus, Lex.; 3 Bla. Com. 2. See PER FAS ET NEFAS.

FASHIONS. See PERISHABLE GOODS.

FASIUS. A faggot of wood.

FAST BILL OF EXCEPTIONS. One which may be taken in Georgia in injunction cases and the like, in time and manner to secure speedy hearing. It is certified within twenty days after the decision. 66 Ga. 353.

FAST-DAY. A day of penitential observance and religious abstinence. As to counting it in legal proceedings, see 1 Chit. Archb. Pr., 12th ed. 160; HOLIDAY.

FAST ESTATE. Real property. A term sometimes used in wills. 6 Johns. 185; 9 N. Y. 502.

FASTERMANNES. Securities. Bondsmen. Spelman, Gloss. Men fast bound as sureties of the peace for each other under the Saxon law. Encyc. Lond.

FASTI. See DIES FASTI.

FAT CATTLE. See PERISHABLE GOODS; PROVISIONS.

FATHER. He by whom a child is begotten.

In England, by 43 Eliz. c. 2, the father and mother, grandfather and grandmother of poor, old, blind, and impotent persons are obliged to furnish them with necessities, if of sufficient ability. Statutes of the same tenor have been enacted in some states. The English statute may be considered as a part of the common law of the United States. In some states the failure to support, or the abandonment of, a minor child is a penal offence. Except under this statute, there appears to be no civil obligation on a parent to support his minor child; 11 C. B. 452; L. R. 3 Q. B. 559; or to pay his debts; 6 M. & W. 482. To the same effect in the United States; 110 Ind. 74; 38 N. J. L. 383; 13 Barb. 502; but the contrary view is held in many cases; 79 Ia. 151; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 233, and cases cited; see 2 Kent 190. Where a parent, though able, neglects to provide the necessities of life and necessary medical attendance for a minor child, and thereby causes its death, he is guilty of manslaughter, and, if wilfully done, of murder; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 232; Clark, Cr. L. 177. A widow is likewise bound to maintain her minor children; 56 N. Y. 435; 10 Mo. App. 344; contra, 76 Ala. 534; 64 Ill. 383. A child is not bound at common law to maintain his parents; 70 Ind. 239; 45 N. H. 358; 32 Conn. 142; but in many states a liability to support indigent parents is imposed by statute, and in such case a third person may recover from the child for necessities furnished to such parent; 88 Mich. 91; 64 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 1123. A parent is not liable for his child's torts, unless committed by the child as his agent; 63 Ill. 312; 45 Kan. 423; 3 Fed. Rep. 862; nor is he criminally liable for his child's acts; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 241. See also 66 Cal. 368; 60 Wis. 511.

If the father be without means to maintain and educate his children according to their future expectations in life, courts of equity will make an allowance for these purposes out of the income of their estates, and, in an urgent case, will even break into the principal; 19 Ala. N. S. 650; 1 P. Wms. 493; 4 Johns. Ch. 100; 2 Ired. 354; 2 Ashm. 332; 5 R. I. 269; 1 Coop. Eq. 52. The father is not bound, without some agreement, to pay another for maintaining his children; 9 C. & P. 497; nor is he bound by their contracts, even for necessities, unless an actual authority be proved, or a clear omission of his duty to furnish such necessities; 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 281; 10 Barb. 483; 15 Ark. 137; 3 N. H. 270; 2 Bradf. Surr. 287; 18 Ga. 457; Ewell, Lead. Cas. 61, n.; 45 Ill. App. 447; 8 Misc. Rep. 646; or unless he suffers them to remain away with their mother, or forces them from home by hard usage; 3 Day 37; but, especially in America, very slight evidence may sometimes warrant the confidence that a contract for the infant's necessities is sanctioned by the father; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 233; thus he is held bound where he knows the circumstances and does not object; 26 Vt. 9; 12 Met. 343; 29 Tex. 135. See PARENT; MOTHER. Where the court takes away from the father the care and custody of the children, chancery directs maintenance out of their own fortunes, whatever may be their father's circumstances; 2 Russ. 1; Macphers. Inf. 224. And if their custody be given to the mother by a decree of divorce it has been held that the duty of supporting them devolves on her; 136 Mass. 187; 26 Barb. 184; but the father still remains liable; 45 Ohio St. 452. The obligation of the father to maintain the child extends only to providing necessary support, and ceases as soon as the child is able to provide for itself, or it becomes of age, however wealthy the father may be; 2 Kent 190; unless the child becomes chargeable to the public as a pauper; 1 Ld. Raym. 699; or be physically or mentally incapable of self-support; 12 Pa. C. C. R. 447. The obligation also ceases during the minority of the child, if the child voluntarily aban-dons the home of his father, either for the purpose of seeking his fortune in the world or to avoid parental discipline and restraint; 16 Mass. 28; 4 Ill. 179; 14 Ala. 435. There is no legal obligation to educate the child, although some dicta and statements by text-writers are to the contrary; 1 Bla. Com. 150; 2 Kent 189; but the duty is said by a recent writer to be only a moral one, and he adds that there is no case which enforces such an obligation; Tiff. Dom. Rel. 238; 44 Mo. App. 308. Where the child's fortune warrants a greater expenditure than the father's means will permit, or where the father is unable to support the child, an allowance to the father may be made by a court of equity out of the child's property for his maintenance and education; Coop. t. Eld. 52; 4 Sandf. Ch. 617; 63 N. H. 14; 2 Kent, Com. 191; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 236.

During the lifetime of the father, he is guardian by nature or nurture of his children. As such, however, he has charge only of the person of the ward, and no right to the control or possession either of his real or personal estate; 7 Johns. Ch. 3; 3 Pick. 213; 14 Ala. 388; 29 W. Va. 251. As to the father's right to the custody of his children, see 4 Ad. & E. 624; 2 Cox, C. C. 242; [1892] App. Cases 425; 25 Kan. 308; 26 id. 650; Reed, J., in Col. App. 525; 141 Mass. 203; CUSTODY. The rights of the father, while his children remain in his custody, are to have authority over them, to enforce all his lawful commands, and to correct them with moderation for disobedience; 2 Humphr. 283; and these rights, the better to accomplish the purposes of their education, he may delegate to a tutor or instructor; 2 Kent 205. See ASSAULT; CORRECTION. As to criminal liability of the father, see 95 N. C. 588. He may maintain an action for the seduction of his daughter, or for any injury to the person of his child, so long as he has a right to its services; 2 M. & W. 539; 13 Gratt. 726; 6 Ind. 262; 24 Wend. 429; 7 Watts 62; 48 Ill. App. 371; and may even be justified in committing a homicide in protecting his child; 1 Bla. Com. 450; and the fact that a child by her father as next friend has recovered damages for a personal injury does not bar a subsequent action by him for loss of service occasioned by the same injury; 125 Mass. 130; 66 Tex. 225. The authorities are not uniform as to whether the right of the father to recover for a tort committed against the child is to be limited to the theory of loss of service, and therefore based entirely upon the doctrine of an implied relation of master and servant. Such would seem to be the English rule, which gives no remedy, even for expenses, when the child is of such tender age as to be incapable of service; 8 Scott N. R. 741; 7 D. & R. 133. Some American cases follow the same principle; 26 Mo. App. 75; 60 N. H. 20; but the trend of the authorities is otherwise, and as was said by the Circuit Court of Appeals, in a case of injury to a child of five years of age, "they approve a more reasonable doctrine, and, basing the right of action on the parental relation instead of that of master and servant, allow the father to recover his consequential loss, irrespective of the age of the minor;" 8 C. C. A. 169; s. c. 59 Fed. Rep. 417; 2 Cush. 347; 109 N. Y. 95; 49 Cal. 236; 32 Ohio St. 300; 7 Ala. 169; 50 Ark. 477; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 274; and see SEDUCTION; ENTICE. Generally, the father is entitled to the services or earnings of his children during their minority, so long as they remain members of his family; 4 Mas. 380; 2 Gray 257; 17 Ala. N. S. 14; 1 Bla. Com. 453; 60 Mich. 635; but he may relinquish this right in favor of his children; Field, Inf. 68; 2 Mete. Mass. 39; 7 Cow. 92; 14 Ala. N. S. 753; 11 Humphr. 104; 29 Vt. 514; 21 Pa. 222; 2 Ind. App. 264; and he will be presumed to have thus relinquished this right if he abandoned or neglects to support and educate his children; Ware 462; 3 Barb. 115; 6 Ala. N. S. 501; 15 Mass. 272; 65 N. H. 644; 92 Cal. 195; but where a father verbally agrees that his daughter shall reside in a stranger's house as a servant, he does not thereby surrender his parental control, so as to bar his right to recover for her seduction; 86 Pa. 358. An infant husband is entitled to his own wages, so far as necessary for the support of himself and family, although he married without his father's consent; 157 Mass. 73.

The emancipation of a minor may be proved by the act of the father in allowing him to draw his own wages, as well as by other acts, and no proof of a formal contract is necessary; 2 Ind. App. 264.

As to his right to earnings and emancipation, see also 2 Mass. 113; 50 N. H. 501; 1 Ware, 1st ed. 462; 39 Conn. 270; s. c. 2 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 715, with note by Redfield; 24 Me. 531; 63 N. H. 415. The father, as such, has no claim to any property acquired by the child other than earnings; 14 Allen 497.

An agreement of the father, by which his minor child is put out to service, ceases to be binding upon the child after the father's death, unless made by indentures of apprenticeship; 34 N. H. 49; 45 Mo. App. 415; 29 W. Va. 751. The power of the father ceases on the arrival of his children at the age of twenty-one; though if after that age they continue to live in the father's family, they will not be allowed to recover for their services to him upon an implied promise of payment; 3 Pa. 473; 33 N. H. 581; 22 Mo. 439; 6 Ind. 60; 10 Ill. 296; the presumption being that such services are gratuitous, but this may be rebutted; 109 N. C. 710; but see 50 Fed. Rep. 881; 145 Pa. 582. See also 34 Vt. 429; 44 N. H. 293.

FATHER-IN-LAW. The father of one's spouse.

FATHOM. A measure of length, equal to six feet. Used as a nautical measure.

The word is probably derived from the Teutonic word fad, which signifies the thread or yarn drawn out in spinning to the length of the arm, before it is run upon the spindle. Webster; Minsheu.

FATUA MULIER. A whore. Du Fresne.

FATUM. In Civil Law. Fate. An overruling power. An event which can neither be anticipated nor prevented. See DAMNUM FATALE.

FATUOUS PERSON. In Scotch Law. One entirely destitute of reason; is qui omnino desipit. Erskine, Inst. b. 1, tit. 7, s. 48. An idiot. Jacob. One who is incapable of managing his affairs, by reason of a total defect of reason. He is described as having uniform stupidity and inattention of manner and childishness of speech. Bell's Law. Dict.

FATUUS. An idiot or fool. Bract. f. 420 b. Silly; ill-considered; foolish; indiscreet.

FATUUM JUDICIUM. A foolish judgment or verdict. As applied to the latter it is one rather false by reason of folly than criminally so as amounting to perjury. Bract. f. 289.

FAUBOURG. A district or part of a town adjoining the principal city; as a faubourg of New Orleans. 18 La. 286.

FAUCES TERRÆ (Lat. jaws of the land). Projecting headlands or promontories, including arms of the sea. Such arms of the sea are said to be inclosed within the fauces terræ, in contradistinction to the open sea; 1 Kent 367. See ARM OF THE SEA.

FAULT. An improper act or omission, which arises from ignorance, carelessness, or negligence. The act or omission must not have been meditated, and must have caused some injury to another. Leç. Elém. § 783.

In legal literature it is the equivalent of "negligence." An error or defect of judgment or conduct; any deviation from prudence, rectitude, or duty; any shortcoming or neglect of care or performance resulting from inattention, incapacity, or perversity; a wrong tendency, course, or act; 2 Ind. App. 427.

Gross fault or neglect consists in not observing that care towards others which a man the least attentive usually takes of his own affairs. Such fault may, in some cases, afford a presumption of fraud, and in very gross cases it approaches so near as to be almost undistinguishable from it, especially when the facts seem hardly consistent with an honest intention. But there may be a gross fault without fraud; 2 Stra. 1099; Story, Bailm. § 18; Toullier, l. 3, t. 3, § 231.

Ordinary fault consists in the omission of that care which mankind generally pay to their own concerns ; that is, the want of ordinary diligence.

A slight fault consists in the want of that care which very attentive persons take of their own affairs. This fault assimilates itself to, and in some cases is scarcely distinguishable from, mere accident or want of foresight.

This division has been adopted by common lawyers from the civil law. Although the civilians generally agree in this division, yet they are not without a difference of opinion. See Pothier, Observation générale sur le précédent Traité et sur les suivants, printed at the end of his Traité des Obligations, where he cites Accussus, Alciat, Cujas, Duaren, D'Avezan, Vinnius, and Heineccius, in support of this division. On the other side the reader is referred to Thomasius, tom. 2, Dissertationem, page 1006 ; Le Brun, cited by Jones, Bailm. 27 ; and Toullier, Droit Civil Français, liv. 3, tit. 3, § 231.

These principles established, different rules have been made as to the responsibilities of parties for their faults in relation to their contracts. They have been reduced to three. See BAILMENT ; DOLUS ; NEGLIGENCE.

FAUTOR. In Spanish Law. Accomplice ; the person who aids or assists another in the commission of a crime.

FAUX. In French Law. A falsification or fraudulent alteration or suppression of a thing by words, by writings, or by acts without either. Biret, Vocabulaire des Six Codes.

Toullier says (tom. 9, n. 188), "Faux may be understood in three ways : in its most extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, with or without intention ; it is nearly synonymous with lying ; in a less extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, accompanied with fraud, mutatio veritatis cum dolo facta ; and lastly, in a narrow, or rather the legal, sense of the word, when it is a question to know if the faux be a crime, it is the fraudulent alteration of the truth in those cases ascertained and punished by the law." See CRIMEN FALSI.

FAVOR. Bias ; partiality ; lenity ; prejudice.

The grand jury are sworn to inquire into all offences which have been committed and into all violations of law, without fear, favor, or affection. See GRAND JURY. When a juror is influenced by bias or prejudice, so that there is not sufficient ground for a principal challenge, he may nevertheless be challenged for favor. See CHALLENGE ; Bac. Abr. Juries, E ; 7 Pet. 160.

FEAL. Truthful ; true. The tenants by knight's service used to swear to their lords to be feal and leal. Feal homager, faithful subject.

FEAL AND DIVOT. A right in Scotland, similar to the right of turbary in England for fuel, etc. Wharton.

It is a predial servitude peculiar to the law of Scotland, in virtue of which the proprietor of the dominant tenement possesses the right of turning up and carrying off turf from the servient tenement for the purpose of building fences, roofing houses, and the like. This, as well as the servitude of fuel, implies the right of using the nearest ground of the servient tenement on which to lay and dry the turf peats or fuel. These servitudes do not extend beyond the ordinary uses of the actual occupants of the dominant tenements, and cannot be taken advantage of for such a purpose as to burn limestone for sale. They are not included in the servitude of pasturage, but must be constituted either by express grant, or by possession following on the usual clause of parts and pertinents ; Ersk. ii. tit. ix. s. 17. The etymology of these words has been much disputed. Feal or fail is said to come from the Suio-Gothic wall, any grassy part of the surface of the ground ; and Jamieson derives divot from delve (Sax. delfan or delfan), or, as another alternative, says that it may have been formed by the monkish writers of old charters from defodere, to dig the earth. The former is the more probable conjecture. Int. Cyc.

FEALTY. That fidelity which every man who holds lands of another owes to him of whom he holds.

Under the feudal system, every owner of lands held them of some superior lord, from whom or from whose ancestors the tenant had received them. By this connection the lord became bound to protect the tenant in the enjoyment of the land granted to him ; and, on the other hand, the tenant was bound to be faithful to his lord and to defend him against all his enemies. This obligation was called fidelitas or fealty ; 1 Bla. Com. 263 ; 2 id. 86 ; Co. Litt. 67 b.

This fealty was of two sorts : that which is general, and is due from every subject to his prince ; the other special, and required of such only as in respect of their fee are tied by this oath to their landlords ; 1 Bla. Com. 367 ; Cowel.

The oath or obligation of fealty was one of the essential requisites of the feudal relation ; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 45, 86 ; Littleton §§ 117, 131 ; Wright, Ten. 35 ; Termes de la Ley ; 1 Washb. R. P. 19 ; see 1 Poll. & Maitl. 277-287, and was as follows : " Hear this ye good people that I (such a one by name) faith will bear to our lord King Edward from this day forward of life and limb, of body and chattels and earthly honor, and the services which belong to him for the fees and tenements which I hold of him will lawfully perform to him as they become due to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints." Stubbs, Const. Hist. § 462 n. Fealty was due alike from freeholders and tenants for years as an incident to their estates to be paid to the reversioner ; Co. Litt. 67 b. Chal. R. P. 13. Tenants at will did not have fealty ; 2 Burton, R. P. 395, n. ; 1 Washb. R. P. 371. It has now fallen into disuse, and is no longer exacted ; 3 Kent 510 ; Wright, Ten. 35, 55 ; Cowel.

FEAR. In Criminal Law. Dread ; consciousness of approaching danger.

Fear in the person robbed is one of the ingredients required to constitute a robbery from the person ; and without this the felonious taking of the property is a larceny. It is not necessary that the owner of the property should be in fear of his own person ; but fear of violence to the person of his child ; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 718 ; or to his property ; id. 731 ; 2 Russ. Cr. 72 ; is sufficient ; 2 Russ. Cr. 71. See 35 Ind. 460 ; 53 Mo. 581 ; PUTTING IN FEAR.

FEASANCE. A doing ; a performing or performance. Feasant, doing or making, —as damage feasant (q. v.). Feasor, doer, maker, —as feasors del estatute, makers of the statute ; Dyer 3 b.

FEASTS. Certain established periods in the Christian church. Formerly the days of the feasts of saints were used to indicate the dates of instruments and memorable events, 8 Toullier, n. 81. The feasts of the English church were formerly used to divide the terms of the legal year, but this division was abolished by the judicature act. See TERM.

FECIAL LAW. A branch of Roman jurisprudence concerned with embassies, declarations of war, and treaties of peace : so called from feciales (q. v.), who were charged with its administration. It more nearly resembles the international law of modern times than any other department of the Roman law.

FECIALES. Amongst the ancient Romans, that order of priests who discharged the duties of ambassadors. Subsequently their duties appear to have related more particularly to the declaring war and peace. Calvinus, Lex.

FEDERAL. A term commonly used to express a league or compact between two or more states.

In the United States the central government of the Union is federal. The constitution was adopted "to form a more perfect union" among the states, for the purpose of self-protection and for the promotion of their mutual happiness. Freeman's Hist. Fed. Govt.; Austin, Jurispr. Lect. 6; see 92 U. S. 542.

FEDERAL COURTS. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT. A union or confederation of sovereign states, created either by treaty, or by the mutual adoption of a federal constitution, for the purpose of presenting to the world the appearance of a single state, while retaining the rights and power of internal regulation and administration, or at least of local self-government.

The more extended the renunciation of individual sovereignty, the more powerful does the new government become and the more nearly does it approach to a substantial union. No real diminution of sovereignty is necessarily involved except the relinquishment of the power of conducting independent relations with foreign powers.

"There are two different modes of organizing a federal union. The federal authorities may represent the governments solely, and their acts may be obligatory only on the governments as such, or they may have the power of enacting laws and issuing orders which are binding directly on individual citizens. The former is the plan of the (old) German so-called confederation, and of the Swiss constitution previous to 1847. It was tried in America for a few years immediately following the war of independence. The other principle is that of the existing constitution of the United States, and has been adopted within the last dozen years by the Swiss confederacy. The federal congress of the American union is a substantive part of the government of every individual state. Within the limits of its attributions, it makes laws which are obeyed by every citizen individually, executes them through its own officers, and enforces them by its own tribunals. This is the only principle which has been found, or which is even likely to produce an effective federal government. A union between the governments only is a mere alliance, and subject to all contingencies which render alliances precarious." Mills, Representative Government 361.

A primary difficulty, it has been said, in framing a federal government and a source of danger to its permanence, is liability to disagreements between the constituent governments or between one or more of the local governments and the federal government as to the limits of their respective powers. The scheme adopted in the American system as a provision for such cases has been thus described: "Under the more perfect mode of federation, where every citizen of each particular state owes obedience to two governments—that of his own state, and that of the federation—it is evidently necessary not only that the constitutional limits of the authority of each should be precisely and clearly defined, but that the power to decide between them in any case of dispute should not reside in either of the governments, or in any functionary subject to it, but in any umpire independent of both. There must be a supreme court of justice, and a system of subordinate courts in every state of the union, before whom such questions shall be carried, and whose judgment on them, in the last stage of appeal, shall be final. Every state of the union, and the federal government itself, as well as every functionary of each, must be liable to be sued in those courts for exceeding their powers, or for non-performance of their federal duties, and must in general be obliged to employ those courts as the instruments for enforcing their federal rights. This involves the remarkable consequence, actually realized in the United States, that a court of justice, the highest federal tribunal, is supreme over the various governments, both state and federal, having the right to declare that any new law made, or act done by them, exceeds the powers assigned to them by the federal constitution, and in consequence has no legal validity." "The tribunals which act as umpires between the federal and state governments naturally also decide all disputes between two states, or between a citizen of one state and the government of another. The usual remedies between nations, war and diplomacy, being precluded by the federal union, it is necessary that a judicial remedy should supply the place. The supreme court of the federation dispenses international law, and is the first great example of what is now one of the most prominent wants of civilized society, a real international tribunal." Id. 305. See Freeman, Fed. Govt.

The American union is the most striking illustration of federal government in existence, and its permanent character was settled by the civil war which finally determined its indestructibility by action of individual states. In Europe, the empire of Germany and the republic of Switzerland are instances of the operation of successful federal governments, as are most of the South American States; while in the British Empire the Dominion of Canada and the pending Australian federation now nearly completed, as also the Greater Republic of Central America, are indications of a tendency in that direction which existing conditions are likely to increase very rapidly. See these several titles, and also UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; GOVERNMENT.

FEDERAL QUESTION. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

FEE. A reward or wages given to one for the execution of his office, or for professional services, as those of a counsellor or physician. Cowel.

Fees differ from costs in this, that the former are, as above mentioned, a recompense to the officer for his services; and the latter, an indemnification to the party for money laid out and expended in his suit; 11 S. & R. 248; 9 Wheat. 262. See 4 Binn. 267. Fees are synonymous with charges; 66 Me. 124.

See CHAMPERTY; ETHICS, LEGAL.

That which is held of some superior on condition of rendering him services.

A fee is defined by Spelman (Feuds, c. 1) as the right which the tenant or vassal has to the use of lands while the absolute property remains in a superior. But this early and strict meaning of the word speedily passed into its modern signification of an estate of inheritance; 2 Bla. Com. 106; Cowel; Termes de la Ley; 1 Washb. R. P. 51; Co. Litt. 1 b; 1 Prest. Est. 420; 3 Kent 514. The term may be used of other property as well as lands; Old Nat. Brev. 41.

The term is generally used to denote as well the land itself so held, as the estate in the land, which seems to be its stricter meaning. Wright, Ten. 19, 49; Cowel. The word fee is explained to signify that the land or other subject of property belongs to its owner, and is transmissible, in the case of an individual, to those whom the law appoints to succeed him, under the appellation of heirs; and, in the case of corporate bodies, to those who are to take on themselves the corporate function, and, from the manner in which the body is to be continued, are denominated successors; 1 Co. Litt. 271 b; Wright, Ten. 147, 150; 2 Bla. Com. 104, 106.

The compass or circuit of a manor or lordship. Cowel.

A fee-simple is an estate limited to a man and his heirs absolutely. See FEE-SIMPLE.

A fee-tail is one limited to particular classes of heirs. See FEE-TAIL.

A determinable fee is one which is liable to be determined, but which may continue forever. See DETERMINABLE FEE.

A qualified fee is an interest given to a man and certain of his heirs at the time of its limitation. See QUALIFIED FEE; 75 Md. 397.

A conditional fee includes one that is either to commence or determine on some condition; 10 Co. 95 b; Prest. Est. 476; Fearn, Cont. Rem. 9. See CONDITIONS; SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN.

FEE AND LIFE-RENT. In Scotch Law. Two estates in land—the first of which is the full right of proprietorship, the second the limited right of usufruct during life—may be held together, or may co-exist in different persons at the same time. The settling of the limits of the rights which in the latter case they respectively confer is of very great practical importance, and, from the loose way in which both expressions have been used by conveyancers, by no means free from difficulty. “In common language, they are quite distinct; life-rent importing a life-interest merely,—fee a full right of property in reversion after a life-rent. But the proper meaning of the word life-rent has sometimes been confounded by a combination with the word fee, so as in some degree to lose its appropriate sense, and occasionally to import a fee. This seems to have begun chiefly in destinations ‘to husband and wife, in conjunct fee and life-rent and children in fee;’ where the true meaning is, that each spouse has a joint life-rent while both live, but each has a possible fee, as it is uncertain which is to survive. The same confusion of terms came to be extended to the case of a destination to parent and child—‘to A. B. in life-rent, and the heirs of the marriage in fee’—where the word life-rent was held to confer a fee on the parent. It came gradually to be held as the technical meaning of the word life-rent to a parent, with fee to his children nascituri, that the word life-rent meant a fee in the father. Finally the expression came to be held as strictly limited in its proper meaning by the accompanying word allennary, or some similar expression of restriction; or where the fee was given to children nati and nominatim, there being in that case no necessity to divert the word life-rent from its proper meaning, or, on a similar principle, where the settlement was by means of a trust created to make up the fee.” Bell, Prin. s. 1712. See also Ersk. Prin. 420; FIAR.

FEE-BILL. A schedule of the fees to be charged by clerks of courts, sheriffs, or other officers, for each particular service in the line of their duties.

FEE EXPECTANT. A name sometimes applied to an estate created where lands are given to a man and his wife and the heirs of their bodies. See also FRANK MARRIAGE.

FEE-FARM. Land held of another in fee,—that is, in perpetuity by the tenant and his heirs at a yearly rent, without fealty, homage, or other services than such as are specially comprised in the feoffment. Cowel. Fealty, however, was incident to a holding in fee-farm, according to some authors. Spelman, Gloss.; Termes de la Ley.

Land held at a perpetual rent. 2 Bla. Com. 43.

FEE-FARM RENT. The rent reserved on granting a fee-farm. It might be one-fourth the value of the land, according to Cowel, one-third, according to other authors. Spelman, Gloss.; Termes de la Ley.

FEE-SIMPLE. An estate of inheritance. Co. Litt. 1 b; 2 Bla. Com. 106. The word simple adds no meaning to the word fee standing by itself. But it excludes all qualification or restriction as to the persons who may inherit it as heirs, thus distinguishing it from a fee-tail, as well as from an estate which, though inheritable, is subject to conditions or collateral determination. 1 Washb. R. P. 51; Wright, Ten. 146; 1 Prest. Est. 420; Littleton § 1.

It is the largest possible estate which a man can have, being an absolute estate. It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limitation put to the estate. Plowd. 557; 2 Bla. Com. 106; Chal. R. P. 191. See 54 Me. 426; 42 Vt. 686.

Where the granting clause of a deed conveys an estate in fee-simple, a subsequent proviso that the grantee shall not convey without the consent of the grantor is void as a restriction or alienation, general as to time and person, and therefore repugnant to the estate created; 64 Cal. 363.

In modern estates the terms fee, fee-simple, and fee-simple absolute are substantially synonymous; 45 Mo. 170.

The word “heirs” is necessary, in a conveyance, to the creation of a fee-simple, and no expression of intention, in substituted terms, will have an equivalent effect; 36 N. J. L. 434; 92 Ill. 377; 48 Md. 344; but see 54 N. H. 290; 2 Head 389; but it is otherwise in a will; 74 Pa. 173; 7 R. I. 188.

In the absence of statute, a conveyance of property to a trustee, with power to sell and convey the fee, vests in such trustee an estate in fee-simple, without the use of the word “heirs;” 113 Mo. 188. The common-law rule that a fee-simple cannot be conveyed without the word “heirs” does not apply to an exception, or an easement appurtenant to other land of the grantor or of the right to take profit in the soil; 85 Me. 448.

FEE-TAIL (Fr. tailler, to dock, to shorten). An inheritable estate which can descend to certain classes of heirs only. It is necessary that they should be heirs “of the body” of the ancestor, and these are proper words of limitation. It corresponds with the feudum talliatum of the feudal law. The estate itself is said to have been derived from the Roman system of restricting estates. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. R. P. 66; 2 Bla. Com. 113, n. See, also, Co. 2d Inst. 333; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 607; 4 Kent 14; Chal. R. P. 259; and it is said to exist by virtue of the statute de donis: Crabb, R. P. § 971. See, generally, 1 Gray 286; 35 N. H. 176; 113 Mo. 175; 88 Ga. 251; 155 Mass. 323; 146 Pa. 242.

An estate-tail may be general, i.e. limited to the heirs of the body merely: or special, i.e. limited to a special class of such heirs, e.g. heirs male or heirs female, or those begotten of a certain wife named; 1 H. & J. (Md.) 111. In the last case specified, if the wife died without issue, the husband was called tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct.

The restrictions against alienation could be evaded at common law by levying a fine, suffering a recovery. In this country, an entail can generally be barred by deed.

FEED. This word is used in its ordinary sense with reference to cattle and hogs which are said to be made marketable by feeding. 66 Ill. 102.

It is also used in the sense of lending additional strength or subsequent support, as "the estate which becomes vested feeds the estoppel;" 5 Man. & Ry. 202, 207; so a subsequent title acquired by the mortgagor is said "to feed the mortgage." See GRAFT.

It is also used in the phrase feeding of a cow by and on the land to signify from the land while there is food on it, and with hay by the owner of the land while at other times; 2 Q. B. Div. 49.

FEGANGL. An escaping thief caught with stolen goods in his possession. Spel. Glos.

FEHMGERICHTE. An irregular tribunal which existed and flourished in Westphalia during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

From the close of the fourteenth century its importance rapidly diminished: and it was finally suppressed by Jerome Bonaparte in 1811. See Bork, Geschichte der Westphalischen Fehmgerichte; Paul Wigand, Das Fehmgericht Westphaleus.

FEIGNED ACTION. In Practice. An action brought on a pretended right, when the plaintiff has no true cause of action, for some illegal purpose. In a feigned action the words of the writ are true; it differs from false action, in which case the words of the writ are false. Co. Litt. 361, § 689.

FEIGNED DISEASES. Simulated maladies. Diseases are generally feigned from one of three causes—fear, shame, or the hope of gain. Thus a man engaged in the military or naval service may pretend to be afflicted with various maladies, in order to escape the performance of military duty; the mendicant, to avoid labor and to impose on public or private beneficence;

the criminal, to prevent the infliction of punishment. The spirit of revenge, and the hope of receiving exorbitant damages, have also induced some to magnify slight ailments into alarming illness. On this subject, Fodere (vol. ii. 452) observes, at the time when the conscription was in full force in France, "that it is at present brought to such perfection as to render it as difficult to detect a feigned disease as to cure a real one." Zacchias has given five rules for detecting feigned diseases. (1) Inquiry should be made of the relatives and friends of the suspected individual as to his physical and moral habits, and as to the state of his affairs and what may possibly be the motive for feigning disease, particularly whether he is not in immediate danger of some punishment, from which this sickness may excuse him. (2) Compare the disease under examination with the causes capable of producing it; such as the age, temperament, and mode of life of the patient. (3) The aversion of persons feigning disease to take proper remedies. This indeed will occur in real sickness; but it rarely happens when severe pain is present. (4) Particular attention should be paid to the symptoms present, and whether they necessarily belong to the disease. (5) Follow the course of the complaint, and attend to the circumstances which successively occur. Wharton.

FEIGNED ISSUE. In Practice. An issue brought by consent of the parties, or by the direction of a court of equity, or of such courts as possess equitable powers, to determine before a jury some disputed matter of fact which the court has not the power or is unwilling to decide. A series of pleadings was arranged between the parties, as if an action had been commenced at common law upon a bet involving the fact in dispute. 3 Bla. Com. 452. This is still the practice in most of the states retaining the distinction between the procedure in law and in equity. Under the reformed codes of some states issues may be framed in certain exceptional cases. In England, the practice has been disused since the passing of the stat. 8 and 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 19, permitting any court to refer any question of fact to a jury in a direct form. The act 21 and 22 Vict. c. 27, provided for trial by jury in the court of chancery.

FELAGUS (Lat.). One bound for another by oath; a sworn brother. Du Cange. A friend bound in the decennary for the good behavior of another. One who took the place of the deceased. Thus, if a person was murdered, the recompense due from the murderer went to the father or mother of the deceased; if he had none, to the lord; if he had none, to his felagus, or sworn brother. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel; Du Cange.

FELD (obs. for field). As used in compound words it is said to signify wild. Blount.

FELE. See FEAL.

FELLOW. A co-worker. A partaker or sharer of. A companion; associate; comrade. One united in a legal relation. An incorporated member of a college or collegiate foundation (whether in a university or otherwise).

FELLOW-HEIR. A co-heir.

FELLOW-SERVANTS. Those engaged in the same common pursuit, under the same general control. Cooley, Torts 541.

All who serve the same master, work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same common source, are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it, are fellow-servants who take the risk of each other's negligence. Thomp. Negl. 1026. As to the rights and liabilities growing out of this relation, see MASTER AND SERVANT.

FELON DE SE (Lat.). In Criminal Law. A felon of himself; a self-murderer. See SUICIDE.

FELON. One convicted and sentenced for a felony.

A felon is infamous, and cannot fill any office or become a witness in any case unless pardoned, except in cases of absolute necessity for his own preservation and defence: as, for example, an affidavit in relation to the irregularity of a judgment in a cause in which he is a party; 2 Stra. 1148; 1 Mart. La. 25; Stark. Ev. pt. 2, tit. Infamy. A conviction in one state where the witness is offered in another does not affect his competency; see 17 Mass. 515; 2 H. & M'H. 120, 378; 1 Harr. & J. 572.

A person who has committed a felony, been convicted, served his sentence, and been discharged, has been held to be no longer a felon; 3 Exch. Div. 352; where it was held that such person can recover against one who has called him a felon.

FELONIA (Lat.). Felony. The act or offence by which a vassal forfeited his fee. Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex. Per feloniam, with a criminal intention. Co. Litt. 391.

Felonice was formerly used also in the sense of feloniously. Cunningham, Law Dict. See next title.

FELONICE. Feloniously. Cun. Dict. Anciently it was said that this word must be used in all indictments for felony; 4 Bla. Com. 407; and Lord Coke includes it among the voces artis,—words of art, which cannot be dispensed with by any periphrasis or circumlocution. 4 Coke 39; Co. Litt. 391 a. See FELONIOUSLY.

FELONIOUS. Having the quality of a felony; malignant; malicious; villainous; perfidious. In a legal sense, done with intent to commit a crime, of the nature of a felony; done with deliberate purpose to commit a crime; in a felonious manner, with deliberate intention to commit a crime; 47 Kan. 201.

FELONIOUS HOMICIDE. The killing of a human creature, of any age or sex, without justification or excuse. It may include killing oneself as well as any other person; 4 Bla. Com. 188. The mere intention to commit homicide was anciently held to be equally guilty with the commission of the act; Foster, Cr. L. 193; 1 Russ. Cr. 46, note; but a recent work states that in ancient law the mere attempt to commit a crime was not punishable; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 507. See HOMICIDE; ATTEMPT.

FELONIOUSLY. In Pleading. This is a technical word which at common law was essential to every indictment for a felony, charging the offence to have been committed feloniously: no other word nor any circumlocution could supply its place; Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172, 184; 1 Ben. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 154. It is still necessary in describing a common-law felony, or where its use is prescribed by statute; Whart. Cr. Pl. § 260; 41 Miss. 570; 18 Tex. 387; 25 Mo. 324; 68 N. C. 211; 17 Ind. 307; 34 N. H. 510.

In an indictment it is equivalent to purposely or unlawfully; 47 Kan. 201.

An indictment for burglary which does not allege that the breaking and entering was "feloniously and burglariously" done is bad, and the defect is not cured by verdict; 35 W. Va. 280.

FELONY. An offence which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both, at common law, to which capital or other punishment may be superadded, according to the degree of guilt. 4 Bla. Com. 94; 1 Russ. Cr. 78; Co. Litt. 391; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 37; 5 Wheat. 153. The essential distinction between felony and misdemeanor (q. v.) is lost in England since the Felony Act of 1870, though such other differences as existed before that act still exist. Moz. & W. Law Dict. At the present day in this country it simply denotes the degree or class of crime committed; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 616.

Blackstone derives it from the Saxon feo or peoh, fee or feud, and the German lon, price, as being a crime punishable with the loss of the feud or benefice. 4 Com. 95. But it is observed that this Saxon word originally signified money or goods, and only in a translated sense feud or inheritance; Lye, Sax. Dict.; and another commentator remarks, "as in petit larceny the lands are not liable to escheat, and petit larceny has always been ranked among felonies, a later writer seems inclined to derive it from palen in the sense of offending. 2 Wooddes, 510." Bac. Abr. Felony. Pothier defines felony as an atrocious wrong committed by a vassal towards his lord, by which the former forfeited his fief to the latter.

In American law the word has no clearly defined meaning at common law, but includes offences of a considerable gravity; 1 Park. Cr. Rep. 39; 4 Ohio St. 542. In general, what is felony under the English common law is such under ours; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 617; Clark, Cr. L. 33. A crime is not a felony unless so declared by statute, or it was such at the common law; 17 R. I. 698. If a statute creates a non-capital offence, not declaring it to be felony, the law will give it the lower grade of misdemeanor; 91 N. C. 561.

The United States Revised Statutes contain no definition of the word, and the meaning of § 4090, referring to "offences against the public peace amounting to felony under the laws of the United States," is not altogether clear. It is defined, however, by statute clearly and fully in many of the states, usually in effect, that all offences punishable either by death or imprisonment in the state prison shall be felonies. 137 N. Y. 29; 98 Mo. 668; 6 Dak. 46; 2 Flap. 551. Express words or necessary implication are required and doubtful words will not suffice; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 622. "When an act of congress makes punishable a crime which under the common law is felony, a fortiori when directly or by necessary implication, it declares a thing to be felony, it is felony; but where a national statute creates a non-capital offence, and is silent as to its grade, it is misdemeanor." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 671. See 9 Fed. Rep. 886, which holds that common-law felonies are not within the purview of the constitution unless congress so enacts.

Where a statute permits a milder punishment than imprisonment or death, this discretion does not prevent the offence being felony; 48 Me. 218; 20 Cal. 117; 117 Mo. 618. See 89 Va. 570; 38 W. Va. 58; 98 Mo. 663; contra in Illinois; 94 Ill. 501. It has also been held that common-law felonies, punishable less severely than the statutory standard, do not, therefore, cease to be felonies; 10 Mich. 169; 3 Hill, N. Y. 395; but see 5 id. 260; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 620.

Receiving stolen goods was a felony so as to justify arrest without a warrant; 5 Cush. 281; 6 Binn. 316; 2 Term 77; and held the following were not: adultery; 2 Bail. 149; 5 Rand. 627; 16 Vt. 551; assault with intent to murder; 13 Ired. 505; impeding an officer in the discharge of his duty; 25 Vt. 415; involuntary manslaughter by negligence; 15 Ga. 349; 7 S. & R. 423; mayhem; 5 Ga. 404; 7 Mass. 245; perjury; 1 R. M. Charl. 228; 5 Exch. 378; piracy; 1 Salk. 85; 10 Wheat. 495. In England none of the maritime crimes were felony; Story, Const. § 1162.

One may be guilty of misprision of felony, but not of a misdemeanor. In misdemeanor or treason one may commit the crime of a principal by procuring another to do the action in his absence; but in felony such person is only an accessory before the fact. A person against whose property a misdemeanor has been committed may sue the offender at once, but in case of felony he must by the better opinion first begin prosecution; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 609. Felonies cannot be prosecuted by information; 9 Fed. Rep. 893. See COMPOUNDING A FELONY.

FELONY ACT. The stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, abolishing forfeitures for felony, and sanctioning the appointment of interim curators and administrators of the property of felons. Moz. & W.; 4 Steph. Com. 10, 459.

FEMALE. The sex which bears the young.

It is a general rule that the young of female animals which belong to us are ours; nam factus ventrem sequitur. Inst. 2. 1. 19; Dig. 6. 1. 5. 2. The rule was, in general, the same with regard to slaves; but when a female slave came into a free state, even without the consent of her master, and was there delivered of a child, the latter was free.

FEME, FEMME. A woman.

FEME COVERT. A married woman. See MARRIED WOMAN; COVERTURE.

FEME SOLE. A single woman, including those who have been married, but whose marriage has been dissolved by death or divorce, and, for most purposes, those women who are judicially separated from their husbands. Moz. & W. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 250.

FEME SOLE TRADER. A married woman, who, by the custom of London, trades on her own account, independently of her husband; so called, because, with respect to her trading, she is the same as a feme sole. Jacob, Dict.; 1 Cro. 63; 3 Keb. 902; 2 Bish. M. W. § 528. The custom was recognized as common law in South Carolina, but did not extend beyond trading in merchandise; 1 Hill, S. C. 429; 2 Bay 164; under it a woman could not be a feme sole carrier; 1 McMullan 50. By statute in several states a similar custom is recognized; thus in Pennsylvania, by act of Feb. 22, 1718, the wives of mariners who had gone to sea were recognized as feme sole traders when engaged in any work for their livelihood, and by act of May 4, 1855, the benefits of this act are extended to all those wives whose husbands, from drunkenness, profligacy, or other cause, neglect or refuse to provide for them, or desert them; 2 P. & L. Dig. 2395. By the latter act she may make application to the court of common pleas and obtain a decree and certificate that she is authorized to do business under said act; id. It is not necessary that there should be a decree in order that a wife may have the benefit of the act; it is remedial, and to be construed benignly; 59 Pa. 13; 131 id. 241; mere non-support does not entitle her to the privileges of the act; there must be profligacy, drunkenness, or wilful absence or neglect; 110 Pa. 486; but if, deserted by her husband, she engages in business, she cannot be held liable as a feme sole trader unless she has been decreed such; 34 Leg. Int. 5. She may convey her real estate by deed in which her husband does not join; 95 Pa. 472; and the title passes free from any claim of the husband as tenant by the curtesy; 104 Pa. 298; in which the act was declared constitutional. The husband is liable for necessities, notwithstanding the wife has been declared a feme sole trader; 9 Phila.

236; and actual residence with her husband does not take away her privileges under the act; 101 Pa. 371; and so in South Carolina; 2 Bay 162; 2 Bish. M. W. § 528. As her powers are in some respects greater than those of a married woman under the act of June 8, 1893, there is no reason for regarding the early Pennsylvania acts as superseded by the later act; 2 P. & L. Dig. 2895, note.

In North Carolina the doctrine that a feme covert may be a sole trader was considered with deliberation, and it was held that it did not obtain in that state; 1 Jones, Eq. 1. In an appeal from the District of Columbia it was said by the supreme court that "the law seems to be settled that when a wife is left by her husband, without maintenance and support, has traded as a feme sole, and has obtained credit as such, she ought to be liable for her debts," whether the husband was banished for crime or abandoned her; but by Maryland law a deed of real estate acquired by her while a feme sole trader, abandoned by her husband, was held void; 1 Pet. 105. In California under a sole trader act, excluding from the benefits of the act a married woman carrying on business in her own name, but managed by her husband, it was held that she could not escape liability as sole trader on the ground that she permitted such management; 43 Cal. 105. See 24 Miss. 416.

A married woman by statute authorized to carry on trade and perform labor or services on her sole and separate account, is personally liable on a note given for property purchased for business purposes; in such a case the court said: "The power of a married woman to make contracts relating to her separate business is incident to the power to conduct it. . . . The power to engage in business would be a barren and useless one disconnected with the right to conduct it in the way and by the means usually employed." 53 N. Y. 422; id. 93; 106 id. 74.

See, generally, Husb. Married Women, c. xi.; 2 Bish. M. W. c. xlii.

FEMICIDE. The killing of a woman. One who kills a woman. See HOMICIDE.

FEMININE. Of or belonging to females.

When the feminine is used, it is generally confined to females; as, if a man bequeathed all his mares to his son, his horses would not pass. See 3 Brev. 9.

FENATIO, or FEONATIC. In Forest Law. The fawning of deer; the fawning season. Spel. Glos.

FENCE. A building or erection between two contiguous estates, so as to divide them, or on the same estate, so as to divide one part from another. It may be of any material presenting a sufficient obstruction; 77 Ill. 169; and has been held to include a gate; 63 Me. 308. See 19 Can. L. J. 204.

Fences are regulated by local laws. In general fences on boundaries are to be built on the line, and the cost, when made no more expensively than is required by law, is borne equally between the parties; 2 Miles 337, 395; 2 Me. 72; 11 Mass. 294; 3 Wend. 142; 15 Conn. 526; 50 Iowa 237. For modifications of the rule, see 32 Pa. 65; 28 Mo. 556. One adjoining land-owner can compel another to contribute to the expense of maintaining a partition fence only when the fence completes an inclosure which contains no other lands than those of the latter; 50 Ohio St. 722. A partition fence is presumed to be the common property of both owners of the land; 8 B. & C. 257, 259, note a; 20 Ill. 334; 24 Minn. 307. When built upon the land of one of them it is his; but if it were built equally upon the land of both, at their joint expense, each would be the owner in severalty of the part standing on his own land; 5 Taunt. 20; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 617. See 2 Washb. R. P. 79.

A class of cases has arisen, in this country, regarding the responsibility of steam railway companies for protecting their tracks by fences. In some cases they are required by statute to do so, but unless so required they are not under any obligation to do so, having no other duty than other land-owners; 3 Wood, R. R. 1843; 78 Fed. Rep. 94. A railroad company, when not required by law to fence its tracks, in doing so only exercises extraordinary diligence to prevent danger to cattle, and is not liable if it fails to maintain such fence; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ind. Ter.) 238. When the company is required by statute to fence its track, a failure to do so renders it liable to an employee for an injury caused thereby; 60 Fed. Rep. 370; and see 25 L. R. A. 320, note.

But in a very recent case (78 Fed. Rep. 94) the circuit court of appeals held that the Virginia fence act imposed a duty only to the owners of stock and not to the railroad's employees; and that the violation of the act is no ground of recovery for the death of an employee, killed by the derailling of his train by cattle which came upon the track at a place where the right of way was not fenced. The court distinguished the cases in 111 Mo. 173; 124 id. 140; 119 N. Y. 468, as arising under a special statute.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the performance of the statutory duty; 12 L. R. A. 180, note.

The power of the states to require such fencing by statute is fully sustained; 70 Tex. 298; s. c. 35 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 286; and the extent and manner of it are within the legislative discretion; 19 id. 545; s. c. 109 Ill. 402; and such statutes are valid under the police power; id. 402, 537; 140 id. 309; 35 Minn. 503; 16 Kan. 573; 66 Pa. 164; 26 Mo. 441; (a leading case collecting authorities and approving; 27 Vt. 141;) and are not unconstitutional as imposing expense on one for the sole benefit of another; 68 Mo. 56.

As a means of compelling railroads to fence their tracks statutes have been enacted in many states making them absolutely liable in damages for killing stock, by analogy to the similar statutes respecting damage by fires from locomotives (q. v.); but such statutes have generally been held unconstitutional where the question has been raised: 58 Ala. 594; 62 id. 71; 6 Utah 253; 8 Mont. 271, 279; 98 N. C. 778; 18 Colo. 600; 16 Kan. 573; 1 Wash. 206; 25 L. R. A. 320, note.

In some states the common law requiring the owner of cattle to keep them within a sufficient enclosure is held not to be in force, and in such case a railroad company, while not required to fence, and fully authorized to transact its lawful business on its track, must exercise reasonable care to avoid injuring cattle which have wandered on their premises, and it is liable for accidents which by ordinary care could have been prevented; 46 Miss. 575; 71 Ala. 545; 27 Conn. 393; 31 Fla. 669; 59 Md. 306; 24 Vt. 487; 89 Mo. 147; 3 Wood, R. R. 1846. Where it is the duty of the company, arising out of the contract, to fence its track, a failure to comply with the terms of such contract renders the company liable for all injuries to animals consequent thereon.

See, generally, as to fencing railroads; 3 Wood, R. R. §§ 417 and 421, where these cases are collected; 5 L. R. A. 737, note, and 8 id. 135, both citing statutes and decisions; 11 id. 427 (Missouri statutes and decisions); Whart. Negl. 892; 93 Mich. 607; 65 Hun 622; 43 Ill. App. 90; 119 N. Y. 463; 124 Mo. 140; 111 id. 173.

Barbed wire fences have given rise to much litigation in this country. It is held that one is not necessarily negligent in using a barbed wire fence, but it should be so used and cared for as not to endanger persons and property, and the use of such fences imposes upon those who use them care reasonably proportionate to their danger; 112 Ind. 504; and a railroad company using barbed fences must use due diligence in running its trains, not only to avoid killing stock, but to avoid precipitating them by fright against the fence to be mangled or bruised; 62 Ga. 680. On his own land one may maintain such a fence, and it is not illegal; 82 Tex. 26, affirming 70 id. 123; and expressly disapproving 2 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 254; s. c. 2 Tex. L. Rev. 338 (commented on, 29 Alb. L. J. 23); in which it was held that "such fences are dangerous unless constructed with planks in connection with the wire." But this case was also reviewed with all analogous cases in 8 Ont. H. B. Div. 583; where it was held that it was not negligence per se to maintain such fences and they were not a nuisance. The owner is bound to keep the wires properly stretched and not hanging loose; 79 Cal. 317; 112 Ind. 504. See 10 N. J. L. 43. One who has allowed the use of his land by the public before stretching a barbed wire fence across the way is bound to give notice, in order to escape liability for injury resulting from ignorance of the obstruction; 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 559. If it was negligence to maintain such a fence near a private road, it would be negligence in a person riding a horse difficult to control, to approach it; 82 Tex. 26. See, generally, 16 N. J. L. 105.

In Scotch Law. To hedge in or protect by certain forms. To fence a court, to open in due form. Pitcairn, Cr. Law, pt. 1, p. 75.

FENCE-MONTH. A month in which it is forbidden to hunt in the forest. It begins fifteen days before midsummer and ends fifteen days after. Manv. For. Laws, c. 23. There were also fence-months for fish. Called, also, defence-month, because the deer are then defended from "scare or harm." Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FENERATION. The action or practice of lending on interest; usury. In some modern dictionaries, applied to interest on money lent. Feneration at the rate of an eightieth part by the month; Colebrook, Dig. Hindu Law, I. 7.

FENGELD (Sax.). A tribute exacted for repelling enemies. Spelman, Gloss.

FENIAN. A member of a secret political association of Irish or Irish-Americans founded in New York about 1857, and having for its object to secure the independence of Ireland. As to its organization and its operation, see Enc. tit. Fenian Society.

According to some authorities this word is also defined a champion, hero, giant; or in the plural, invaders or foreign spoilers.

A very late authority designates the word as "one of the names of the ancient population of Ireland confused in modern times with fiann, the name of a body of warriors who are said to have been the defenders of Ireland in the time of Finn and other legendary Irish kings." Murray, New Eng. Dict. This is in allusion to the popular tradition attributing the name to a race of heroes in Irish legendary history. See Cent. Dict.; Enc. Dict.; Enc. Brit. ix. 75.

FEOD. Said to be compounded of the two Saxon words feoh (stipend) and odh (property); by others, to be composed of feoh (stipend) and hod (condition). 2 Bla. Com. 45; Spelman, Gloss. See FEE; FEUD.

FEODAL. Belonging to a fee or feud; feudal. More commonly used by the old writers than feudal.

FEODAL ACTIONS. Real actions. 3 Bla. Com. 117.

FEODAL LAW. Feodal system. See FEUDAL LAW.

FEODALITY. Fidelity or fealty. Cowell. See FEALTY.

FEODARUM, or FEUDARAM CONSUETUDINES. See FEUDAL LAWS.

FEODARY. An officer in the court of wards, appointed by the master of that court, by virtue of the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46, to be present with the escheator at the finding offices and to give in evidence for the king as to value and tenure. He was also to survey and receive rents of the ward-lands and assign dower to the king's widows. The office was abolished by stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24; Kennett, Gloss.; Cowel.

FEODATORY, or FEUDATORY. The grantee of a feud or fee. The tenant or vassal who held an estate by feudal service. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bla. 46.

FEODI FIRMA (L. Lat.). Fee-farm, which see.

FEODUM. The form in use by the old English law-writers instead of feudum, and having the same meaning. Feudum is used generally by the more modern writers and by the feudal law-writers. Littleton § 1; Spelman, Gloss. There were various classes of feoda. See FEUDUM.

FEOFFAMENTUM. A feoffment. 2 Bla. Com. 310.

FEOFFARE. To bestow a fee. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 91.

FEOFFATOR. A feoffor; he who gives or grants a fee, or who makes a feoffment. Bract. fols. 12 b, 81.

FEOFFATUS. A feoffee; one to whom a fee is given or a feoffment made. Bract. fols. 17 b, 44 b.

FEOFFEE. He to whom a fee is conveyed. Littleton § 1; 2 Bla. Com. 20.

FEOFFEE TO USES. A person to whom land was conveyed for the use of a third party. One holding the same position with reference to a use that a trustee does to a trust. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 333. He answers to the hæres fiduciarius of the Roman law.

FEOFFMENT. A gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. It operates by transmutation of possession; and it is essential to its completion that the seisin be passed. Watk. Conv. 183.

The conveyance of a corporeal hereditament either by investiture or by livery of seisin. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 143; 1 Washb. R. P. 33; Chal. R. P. 363.

The instrument or deed by which such hereditament is conveyed.

This was one of the earliest modes of conveyance used in the common law. It signified originally the grant of a fee or feud; but it came in time to signify the grant of a free inheritance in fee, respect being had rather to the perpetuity of the estate granted, than to the feudal tenure; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 90. The feoffment was likewise accompanied by livery of seisin; 1 Washb. R. P. 33. The conveyance by feoffment with livery of seisin has become infrequent, if not obsolete, in England, and in this country has not been used in practice; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 4, § 3; Shepp. Touchst. c. 9; 2 Bla. Com. 20; Co. Litt. 9; 4 Kent 467; Perkins, c. 3; Com. Dig.; 12 Viner, Abr. 167; Bacon, Abr.; Dane, Abr. c. 104; 1 Sullivan, Lect. 143; Stearn, Real Act. 2; 8 Cra. 229.

FEOFFMENT TO USE. A feoffment of lands made to one person for the benefit or to the use of another. In such case the feoffee was bound in conscience to hold the lands according to the use, and could himself derive no benefit. Sometimes such feoffments were made to the use of the feoffor. The effect of such conveyance was entirely changed by the statute of uses. See Wms. R. P., 6th ed. 155; USE. Since the statute a feoffment directed to operate to the use of any other person than the feoffee, though it be a common-law conveyance, so far as it conveys the land to the feoffee, derives its effect from the statute of uses, so far as the use is limited by it to the person or persons in whose favor it is declared. Thus, if A be desirous to convey to B in fee, he may do so by enfeoffing a third person, C, to hold to him and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, the effect of which will be to convey the legal estate in fee-simple to B. For since the statute of uses, the legal estate passes to the feoffee by means of the livery as it would have done before; but no sooner has this taken place than the limitation to uses begins to operate, and C thereby becomes seised to the use defined or limited, the consequence of which is that by force of the legislative enactment the legal estate is eo instanti taken out of him, and vests in B, for the like interest as was limited in the use, i. e. in fee-simple. B thus becomes the legal tenant as effectually as if the feoffment had been made to himself, and without the intervention of a trustee. This method is not much practised in consequence of the livery of seisin, which has become obsolete. See 2 Sand. Us. 13; Watk. Conv. 288; FEOFFMENT.

FEOFFOR. He who makes a feoffment. 2 Bla. Com. 20; Litt. § 1.

FEOH (Sax.). A reward; wages; a fee. The word was in common use in these senses. Spelman, Feuds.

FEOUME. A certain portion of the produce of the land due by the grantee to the lord according to the terms of the charter. Spel. Feuds c. 7.

FERÆ BESTIÆ. Wild beasts.

FERÆ NATURÆ (Lat. of a wild nature; untamed). A term used to designate animals not usually tamed, or not regarded as reclaimed so as to become the subject of property.

Such animals belong to the person who has captured them only while they are in his power; for if they regain their liberty his property in them instantly ceases, unless they have animus revertendi, which is to be known only by their habit of returning; 2 Bla. Com. 386; 3 Binn. 546; Brooke, Abr. Propertie 37; Com. Dig. Biens, F; 7 Co. 17 b; Inst. 2. 1. 15; [1896] 1 Q. B. 166.

Property in animals feræ naturæ is not acquired by hunting them and pursuing them; if, therefore, another person kills such animal in the sight of the pursuer, he has a right to appropriate it to his own use; 3 Cai. 175. But if the pursuer brings the animal within his own control, as by entrapping it or wounding it mortally, so as to render escape impossible, it then belongs to him; id.: though if he abandons it another person may afterwards acquire property in the animal: 20 Johns. 75. The owner of land has a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ when, in consequence of their inability and youth, they cannot go away. See Year B. 12 Hen. VIII. (9 B, 10 A); 2 Bla. Com. 394; Bacon, Abr. Game.

The supreme court of the United States recently held a Louisiana statute constitutional which prescribed that dogs are only to be regarded as personal property when recorded on assessment rolls. The court said: "The very fact that they are without protection of the criminal laws shows that property in dogs is an imperfect or qualified nature, and that they stand, as it were, between animals feræ naturæ, in which until subdued there is no property, and domestic animals, in which the right of property is complete." Sentell v. N. O. & C. R. R. Co., April 26, 1897. See DOGS; GAME; ANIMALS.

FERCOSTA (Ital.). In Scotch Law. A kind of small vessel or boat. Skene.

FERDELLA TERRÆ. A fardel land; ten acres; or perhaps a yard-land. Cowel.

FERDFARE (Sax.). A summons to serve in the army. An acquittance from going into the army. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, 23.

FERDINGUS. Apparently a freeman of the lowest class, being named after the cotseti. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FERDWITE. An acquittance of manslaughter committed in the army; also a fine imposed on persons for not going forth on a military expedition. Cowel.

FERIA (Lat.). In Old English Law. A week-day; a holiday; a day on which process may not be served; a fair; a ferry. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 17.

FERIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Holidays. Numerous festivals were called by this name in the early Roman empire. In the later Roman empire the single days occurring at intervals of a week apart, commencing with the seventh day of the ecclesiastical year, were so called. Du Cange.

All feriæ were dies nefasti. All feriæ were divided into two classes,—"feriæ publicæ" and "feriæ privatæ." The latter were only observed by single families or individuals in commemoration of some particular event which had been of importance to them or their ancestors. Smith, Dict. Antiq.

FERIAL DAYS. Originally and properly, days free from labor and pleading. In statute 27 Hen. VI. c. 5, working-days. Cowel.

FERITA. In European Law. A wound; stroke. Spel. Glos.

FERLING. In English Law. The fourth part of a penny; also, the quarter of a ward in a borough.

FERLINGATA. A fourth part of a yard-land.

FERLINGUS, or FERLINGUM. A furlong (q. v.). Co. Litt. 5 b.

FERM, or FEARM. A house or land, or both, let by lease. Cowel.

FERME (Sax.). A farm; a rent; a lease; a house or land, or both, taken by indenture or lease. Plowd. 195; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Cowel. See FARM.

FERMER, FERMOR. A lessee; a farmer. One who holds a term, whether of lands or an incorporeal right, such as customs or revenue.

FERMIER. In French Law. One who farms any public revenue.

FERMISONA. The winter season for killing deer.

FERMORY. In Old Records. A place in monasteries, where they received the poor (hospicio excipiebant), and gave them provisions (ferm, firma). Spel. Glos.

FERNIGO. In English Law. A waste ground or place where ferns grow. Cowel.

FERRATOR. A farrier (q. v.).

FERRI. In Civil Law. To be borne, i. e. on or about the person, in contradistinction from portari, to be carried on an animal.

FERRIAGE. The toll or price paid for the transportation of persons and property across a ferry. 35 Cal. 606.

FERRIFODINA. In Old English Law. An iron mine. Townsh. Pl. 273.

FERRUM (Lat. iron). In Old English Law. A horse-shoe.

FERRUERE. The shoeing of horses. Kelham.

FERRY. A liberty to have a boat upon a river for the transportation of men, horses, and carriages with their contents, for a reasonable toll. 42 Me. 9; 3 Zab. 206; Woolr. Ways 217. The term is also used to designate the place where such liberty is exercised; 4 Mart. La. N. s. 426. Ferry properly means a place of transit across a river or arm of the sea; but in law it is treated as a franchise, and defined as the exclusive right to carry passengers across a river, or arm of the sea, from one vill to another, or to connect a continuous line of road leading from one township or vill to another. It is not a servitude or easement. It is wholly unconnected with the ownership or occupation of land, so much so that the owner of the ferry need not have any property in the soil adjacent on either side. 13 C. B. N. s. 32.

An exclusive right of ferry exists where one acquires the sole and exclusive privilege of taking tolls for such service. The element of receiving payment is essential, as one may lawfully transport his own goods in a boat, where an exclusive right of ferry is held by another; 73 Mo. 655.

In England, ferries are established by royal grant or by prescription, which is an implied grant; in the United States, by legislative authority, exercised either directly or by a delegation of powers to courts, commissioners, or municipalities; 7 Pick. 344; 11 Pet. 420; 20 Conn. 218; 8 Me. 365; 18 Ark. 19. Without such authority no one, though he may be the owner of both banks of the river, has the right to keep a public ferry; 3 Mo. 470; 13 Ill. 27; 6 Ga. 130; 11 Pet. 420; Willes 508; though after twenty years' uninterrupted use such authority will be presumed to have been granted; 2 Dev. 402; 1 N. & M'C. 389; 4 Ill. 53; 7 Ga. 348; but see 10 Ky. L. Rep. 940. The franchise of a ferry will, in preference, be granted to the owner of the soil, but may be granted to another; and by virtue of the right of eminent domain the soil of another may be condemned to the use of the ferry, upon making just compensation; 6 B. & C. 703; 5 Yerg. 189; 7 Humph. 86; 2 Dev. 403; 9 Ga. 359; 6 Dana 242; 8 Me. 365; 2 Cal. 262. If the termini of the ferry be a highway, the owner of the fee will not be entitled to compensation; 3 Kent 421; 4 Zab. 718; 7 Gratt. 205; 1 T. B. Monr. 348; though in Pennsylvania and other states a different doctrine prevails; 9 S. & R. 31; 3 Watts 219; 20 Wend. 111; 4 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 520; 3 Yerg. 387. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

One state has the right to establish ferries over a navigable river separating it from another state or from a foreign territory, though its jurisdiction may extend only to the middle of such river; and the exercise of this right does not conflict with the provision in the constitution of the United States conferring upon congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states," nor with any law of congress upon that subject; 11 Wend. 586; 3 Yerg. 387; 3 Zab. 206; 2 Gilm. 197; 38 N. Y. 39; 74 Tex. 480. The granting of a temporary license to operate a ferry within the city limits, is valid; 108 Mo. 550. A state may at its pleasure erect a new ferry so near an older ferry as to impair or destroy the value of the latter by drawing away its custom, unless the older franchise be protected by the terms of its grant; 15 Pick. 243; 6 Dana 43; 9 Ga. 517; 6 How. 507; 16 id. 524; 7 Ill. 197; 1 La. Ann. 288; 10 Ala. N. S. 37; 25 Wend. 638. See 145 Pa. 404; 138 U. S. 287. But if an individual, without authority from the state, erect a new ferry so near an older ferry, lawfully established, as to draw away the custom of the latter, such individual will be liable to an action on the case for damages, or to a suit in equity for an injunction in favor of the owner of the latter; 6 M. & W. 234; 67 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 57; 3 Wend. 618; 17 Ala. N. S. 584; 16 B. Monr. 699; 4 Jones 277; 3 Murph. 57; but he may transport his own goods in his own boats where another has an exclusive right of ferry; 73 Mo. 655; 51 Mo. App. 228; 74 Tex. 480. The grant to a city by the legislature of the right of licensing ferries, does not empower the city to grant exclusive ferry privileges; 108 Mo. 550.

The franchise of a ferry is an incorporeal hereditament, and as such it descends to heirs, is subject to dower, may be leased, sold, and assigned; 5 Com. Dig. 291; 12 East 334; 2 McLean 376; 3 Mo. 470; 7 Ala. N. S. 55; 9 id. 529; 51 Mo. App. 228; 65 Miss. 351; and when created by act of the legislature can be conveyed only by deed; 138 Ill. 518; but, nevertheless, being a franchise in which the public have rights and interests, it is subject to legislative regulation for the enforcement and protection of such rights and interests; Cooley, Const. Lim. 732; 10 Barb. 223; 4 Zab. 718; 11 B. Monr. 361; 9 Mo. 560.

The owners of ferries are common carriers, and liable as such for the carriage of the goods and persons which they receive upon their boats. They are bound to have their ferries furnished with suitable boats, and to be in readiness at all proper times to transport all who apply for a passage; Ang. High. 487; 3 Humph. 245; 3 Pa. 342; 5 Mo. 36; 12 Ill. 344; 5 Cal. 360; 10 M. & W. 161; 34 Ark. 385; 100 Ala. 323. They must have their flats so made and so guarded with railings that all drivers with horses and carriages may safely enter thereon; and as soon as the carriage and horses are fairly on the drops or slips of the flat, and during their transportation, although driven by the owner or his servant, they are in the possession of the ferryman, and the owners of the ferry are answerable for the loss or injury of the same unless occasioned by the fault of the driver; 1 M'Cord 439; 16 E. L. & Eq. 437; 14 Tex. 290; 28 Miss. 792; 4 Ohio St. 722; 7 Cush. 154; they are not required to have railings at the end of their boats when not in actual use, so as to prevent runaway teams from entering and passing over the same to the river; 46 Minn. 388; see NEGLIGENCE; but it is also well settled that if the owner retains control of the property himself and does not surrender the charge to the ferryman, such strict liability does not attach, and he is only responsible for actual negligence; 26 Ark. 3; S. C. 7 Am. Rep. 595; 52 N. Y. 32; 10 M. & W. 546; 36 Am. Rep. 504, n. See 91 Ga. 422. If the ferry be rented, the tenant and not the owner is subject to these liabilities, because such tenant is pro hac vice the owner; 1 Ala. 366; 12 Ired. 1; 26 Barb. 618; 22 Vt. 170. See article in 4 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 517; 19 id. 148; Washb. Easements; Ang. Pat. Fed. Restr. s. t. Act. Water Courses.

See COMMERCE; TAXATION; RATES.

FERRYMAN. One employed in taking persons across a river or other stream, in boats or other contrivances, at a ferry. 3 Ala. 160; 8 Dana 158.

FESTAS IN CAPPIS. In Old English Law. Grand holidays, on which choirs were accustomed to wear caps. Jac. L. Dict.

FESTING-MAN. A bondsman; a surety; a pledge; a frank-pledge. It was one privilege of monasteries that they should be free from festing-men, which Cowel explains to mean not to be bound for any man's forthcoming who should transgress the law. Cowel.

FESTING-PENNY. Earnest (q. v.) given to servants when hired or retained. The same as arles-penny. Cowel.

FESTINUM REMEDIUM (Lat. a speedy remedy). A term applied to those cases where the remedy for the redress of an injury is given without any unnecessary delay. Bacon. Abr. Assise, A. The action of dower is festinum remedium, and so is that of assise.

FESTUCA. In Frankish Law. A rod or staff or (as described by other writers) a stick, on which imprecatory runs were cut, which was used as a gage or pledge of good faith by a party to a contract, or for symbolic delivery in the conveyance or quit-claim of land, before a court of law, anterior to the introduction of written documents by the Romans. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 86, 184, 190; Maitl. Domesday Book and Beyond 323.

FESTUM (Lat.). A feast, a holiday, a festival.

FETTERS. A sort of iron put on the limbs of a malefactor or a person accused of crime.

When a prisoner is brought into court to plead, he shall not be put in fetters; Co. 2d Inst. 315; Co. 3d Inst. 34; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 119; Kel. 10; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 417; 4 Bla. Com. 322.

In the first case in this country in which the old common-law doctrine was considered and enforced, the court held that to try a prisoner in shackles was to deprive him of his rights, and that a conviction, under such circumstances, would be reversed; 42 Cal. 165, followed in 64 Mo. 61 (affg. 1 Mo. App. 438). A single expression on this subject seems to be opposed to these cases. An English writer, commenting on the action of a barrister who withdrew and refused to proceed with a case because the judge ordered his client fettered during the trial, considers the removal of fetters to be a mere matter of courtesy, being designed to relieve the prisoner, so far as is practicable, from all that might enlist prejudice against him or disturb his self-possession, and that such removal cannot be considered a matter of right; 43 L. T. 390.

An officer having arrested a defendant on a civil suit, or a person accused of a crime, has no right to handcuff him unless it is necessary or he has attempted to make his escape; 4 B. & C. 596. It is not conclusive on a question of escape that the arresting officer did not handcuff the prisoner; 94 N. C. 829.

FEU. In Scotch Law. A holding or tenure where the vassal in place of military service makes his return in grain or money. Distinguished from wardholding, which is the military tenure of the country. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. lib. ii. tit. 3, § 7.

FEU ANNUALS. In Scotch Law. The reddendo, or annual return from the vassal to a superior in a feu holding. Wharton, Dict., 2d Lond. ed.

FEU ET LIEU (Fr.). In Old French Canadian Law. Hearth and home, meaning actual settlement by a tenant on the land.

FEU HOLDING. A holding by tenure of rendering grain or money in place of military service. Bell, Dict.

FEUAR. In Scotch Law. The tenant or vassal of a feu. Bell, Dict.

FEUD. Land held of a superior on condition of rendering him services. 2 Bla. Com. 106.

A hereditary right to use lands, rendering services therefor to the lord, while the property in the land itself remains in the lord. Spelman, Feuds c. 1.

The same as feod, fief, and fee. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 128; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 34; Dalrymple, Feud. Pr. 99; 1 Washb. R. P. 18; Mitch. R. P. 80.

In Scotland and the North of England, a combination of all the kin to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley; Whishaw. See FEUDUM.

FEUDA. Fees.

FEUDAL ACTIONS. See FEODAL ACTIONS.

FEUDAL LAW, FEODAL LAW.

A system of tenures of real property which prevailed in the countries of western Europe during the middle ages, arising from the peculiar political condition of those countries, and radically affecting the law of personal rights and of movable property.

Although the feudal system has never obtained in this country, and is long since extinct throughout the greater part of Europe, some understanding of the theory of the system is essential to an accurate knowledge of the English constitution, and of the doctrines of the common law in respect to real property. The feudal tenure was a right to lands on the condition of performing services and rendering allegiance to a superior lord. It had its origin in the military immigrations of the Northmen, who overran the falling Roman empire. Many writers have sought to trace the beginning of the system in earlier periods, and resemblances more or less distinct have been found in the tenures prevailing in the Roman republic and empire, in Turkey, in Hindustan, in ancient Tuscany, as well as in the system of Celtic clanship. Hallam, Mid. Ag. vol. 1; Stuart, Soc. in Europe; Robertson, Hist. of Charles V.; Pinkerton, Diss. on the Goths; Montesquieu, Esp. des Lois, livre xxx. c. 2; Meyer, Esprit, Origine et Progrès des Inst. judiciaires, tom. 1, p. 4.

But the origin of the feudal system is so obvious in the circumstances under which it arose, that perhaps there is no other connection between it and these earlier systems than that all are the outgrowth of political conditions somewhat similar. It has been said that the system is nothing more than the natural fruit of conquest; but the fact that the conquest was by immigrants, and that the conquerors made the acquired country their permanent abode, is an important element in the case, and in so far as other conquests have fallen short of this, the military tenures resulting have fallen short of the feudal system. The military chieftains of the northern nations allotted the lands of the countries they occupied among themselves and their followers, with a view at once to strengthen their own power and ascendancy and to provide for their followers.

Some lands were allotted to individuals as their own proper estates, and these were termed allodial; but, for the most part, those lands which were not retained by the chieftain he assigned to his comites, or knights, to be held by his permission, in return for which they assured him of their allegiance and undertook for him military service.

It resulted that there was a general dismemberment of the political power into many petty nations and petty sovereignties. The violence and disorders of the times rendered it necessary both for the strong to seek followers and for the weak to seek a protecting allegiance; and this operated on the one hand to lead the vassals to divide again among their immediate retainers the lands which they had received from the paramount lord, upon similar terms, and by this subinfeudation the number of fiefs was largely increased; and the same circumstances operated on the other hand to absorb the allodial estates by inducing allodial proprietors to surrender their lands to some neighboring chieftain and receive them again from him under feudal tenure. Every one who held lands upon a feudal tenure was bound, when called upon by his benefactor or immediate lord, to defend him, and such lord was, in turn, subordinate to his superior, and bound to defend him, and so on upwards to the paramount lord or king, who in theory of the law was the ultimate owner of all the lands of the realm. The services which the vassals were bound to render to their lords were chiefly military; but many other benefits were required, such as the power of the lord or the good will of the tenant would sanction.

This system came to its height upon the continent in the empire of Charlemagne and his successors. It was completely established in England in the time of William the Norman and William Rufus, his son; and the system thus established may be said to be the foundation of the English law of real property and the position of the landed aristocracy, and of the civil constitution of the realm. And when we reflect that in the middle ages real property had a relative importance far beyond that of movable property, it is not surprising that the system should have left its traces for a long time upon the law of personal relations and personal property. The feudal tenures were originally temporary, at the will of the lord, or from year to year; afterwards they came more commonly to be held for the life of the vassal; and gradually they acquired an inheritable quality, the lord recognizing the heir of the vassal as the vassal's successor in his service.

The chief incidents of the tenure by military service were—Aids,—a pecuniary tribute required by the lord in an emergency, e. g. a ransom for his person if taken prisoner, or money to make his son a knight or to marry his daughter. Reliefs,—the consideration which the lord demanded upon the death of a vassal for allowing the vassal's heir to succeed to the possession; and connected with this may be mentioned primer seisin, which was the compensation that the lord demanded for having entered upon the land and protected the possession until the heir appeared to claim it. Fines upon alienation,—a consideration exacted by the lord for giving his consent that the vassal should transfer the estate to another, who should stand in his place in respect to the services owed. Escheat.—Where on the death of the vassal there was no heir, the land reverted to the lord; also, where the vassal was guilty of treason; for the guilt of the vassal was deemed to taint the blood, and the lord would no longer recognize him or his heirs. Wardship and Marriage.—Where the heir was a minor, the lord, as a condition of permitting the estate to descend to one who could not render military service, assumed the guardianship of the heir, and, as such, exercised custody both of his person and of the property, without accounting for the profits, until the heir, if a male, was twenty-one and could undertake the military services, or, if a female, until she was of a marriageable age, when on her marriage her husband might render the services. The lord claimed, in virtue of his guardianship, to make a suitable match for his ward, and if wards refused to comply they were mulcted in damages.

Feudal tenures were abolished in England by the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24; but the principles of the system still remain at the foundation of the English and American law of real property. Although in many of the states of the United States all lands are held to be allodial, it is the theory of the law that the ultimate right of property is in the state; and in most of the states escheat is regulated by statute. "The principles of the feudal system are so interwoven with every part of our jurisprudence," says Ch. J. Tilghman, "that to attempt to eradicate them would be to destroy the whole." 3 S. & R. 447; 9 id. 333. "Though our property is allodial," says Ch. J. Gibson, "yet feudal tenures may be said to exist among us in their consequences and the qualities which they originally imparted to estates; as, for instance, in precluding every limitation founded on an abeyance of the fee." 3 Watts 71; 1 Whart. 337; 7 S. & R. 188; 13 Pa. 35.

Many of these incidents are rapidly disappearing, however, by legislative changes of the law.

The principles of the feudal law will be found in Littleton's Ten.; Wright's Tenures; 2 Bla. Com. c. 5; Dalrymple's Hist. of Feudal Property; Sullivan's Lectures; Book of Fiefs; Spelman's Treatise of Feuds and Tenures; Cruise's Digest; Le Grand Coutumier; the Salic Laws; the Capitularies; Les Etablissements de St. Louis; Assise de Jerusalem; Pothier, des Fiefs; Merlin, Rép. Feodalité; Dalloz, Dict. Feodalité; Guizot, Essais sur l'Histoire de France, Essai 5ème; Introduction to Robertson's Charles V.; Poll. & Maill. Hist. Eng. Law; Stubbs, Const. Hist.

The principal original collection of the feudal law of continental Europe is a digest compiled at Milan in the twelfth century, Feudorum Consuetudines, which is the foundation of many of the subsequent compilations. The American student will perhaps find no more convenient source of information than Blackstone's Commentaries, Sharswood's ed., vol. 2, 43, and Greenleaf's Cruise, Dig. Intro.

FEUDARY. A tenant who holds by feudal tenure. Held by feudal service. Relating to feuds or feudal tenures. See FEODARY.

FEUDBOTE. A recompense for engaging in a feud, and the damages consequent, it having been the custom in ancient times for all the kindred to engage in their kinsman's quarrel. Jac. L. Dict.

FEUDE, or DEADLY FEUD. A German word, signifying implacable hatred, not to be satisfied but with the death of the enemy. Such was that among the people in Scotland and in the northern part of England, which was a combination of all the kindred to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley.

FEUDIST. A writer on feuds, as Cujacius. Spel. Gloss.

FEUDORUM LIBRI. The Books of Feuds published during the reign of Henry III., about the year 1152. The particular customs of Lombardy as to feuds began about that time to be the standard of authority to other nations, by reason of the greater refinement with which that branch of learning had been there cultivated. This compilation was probably known in England, but does not appear to have had any other effect than to influence English lawyers to the more critical study of their own tenures, and to induce them to extend the learning of real property so as to embrace more curious matter of similar kind. "Thus, tenures in England continued a peculiar species of feuds, partaking of certain qualities in common with others; but when once established here, growing up with a strength and figure entirely their own. While most of the nations of Europe referred to the Books of Feuds as the grand code of law by which to correct and amend the imperfections in their own tenures, there is not in English law books any allusion that intimates the existence of such a body of constitutions." 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law 55.

FEUDO. In Spanish Law. Feud or fee. White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 2, c. 2.

FEUDUM. A feud, fief, or fee. A right of using and enjoying forever the lands of another, which the lord grants on condition that the tenant shall render fealty, military duty, and other services. Spelman, Gloss. It is not properly the land, but a right in the land. This form of the word is used by the feudal writers. The earlier English writers generally prefer the form feodum; but the meaning is the same.

Feudum antiquum. A fee descended from the tenant's ancestors. 2 Bla. Com. 212. One which has been possessed by the relations of the tenant for four generations. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum apertum. A fee which the lord might enter upon and resume either through failure of issue of the tenant or any crime or legal cause on his part. Spelman, Gloss. 2 Bla. Com. 245.

Feudum francum. A free feud. One which was noble and free from tallage and other subsidies to which the plebeia feuda (vulgar feuds) were subject. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum hauberticum. A fee held on the military service of appearing fully armed at the ban and arriere ban. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum improprium. A derivative fee.

Feudum individuum. A fee which could descend to the eldest son alone. 2 Bla. Com. 215.

Feudum laicum. A lay fee.

Feudum ligium. A liege fee. One where the tenant owed fealty to his lord against all other persons. Spelman, Gloss.; 1 Bla. Com. 367.

Feudum maternum. A fee descending from the mother's side. 2 Bla. Com. 212.

Feudum militare. A knight's fee, held by knight service and esteemed the most honorable species of tenure. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

Feudum nobile. A fee for which the tenant did guard and owed fealty and homage. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum novum. One which began with the person of the feudatory, and did not come to him by descent.

Feudum novum ut antiquum. A new fee held with the qualities and incidents of an ancient one. 2 Bla. Com. 212; Wms. R. P. 126.

Feudum paternum. A fee which the paternal ancestors had held for four generations. Calvinus, Lex.; Spelman, Gloss. One descendible to heirs on the paternal side only. 2 Bla. Com. 223. One which might be held by males only. Du Cange.

Feudum proprium. A genuine original feud or fee, of a military nature, in the hands of a military person. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 57.

Feudum talliatum. A restricted fee. One limited to descend to certain classes of heirs. 2 Bla. Com. 112, n.; 1 Washb. R. P. 66; Spelman, Gloss.

The distinction between feodum antiquum and feodum novum has had an important bearing upon the law of descent with respect to the admission of collaterals and the exclusion of ascendants. The theory of Blackstone, which is characterized by both Christian and Pollock & Maitland as "ingenious," will be found fully stated in 2 Com. 211, while for the latest criticism of it and other theories on the subject, see 2 Poll. & Maitl. 285.

FEW. An indefinite expression for a small or limited number. In cases where exact description is required, the use of the word will not answer; 53 Vt. 60; 2 Car. & P. 300; Black, L. Dict.

FIANCER. To pledge one's faith. Kellham.

FIANZA (Span.). Surety. The contract by which one person engages to pay the debt or fulfil the obligations of another if the latter should fail to do so.

FIAR. In Scotch Law. One whose property is charged with a life-rent. Where a right is taken to a husband and wife in conjunct fee and life-rent, the husband, as the persona dignior, is the only fiar. Ersk. Prin. 421.

FIARS PRICES. The value of grain in the different counties of Scotland, fixed yearly by the respective sheriffs, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. These regulate the prices of grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar's prices, or when no price has been stipulated. Ersk. 1, 4, 6.

FIAT. An order of a judge or of an officer whose authority, to be signified by his signature, is necessary to authenticate the particular acts. A short order or warrant of the judge, commanding that something shall be done. See 1 Tidd, Pr. 100, 108.

FIAT IN BANKRUPTCY. An order of the lord chancellor that a commission of bankruptcy shall issue. 1 Deac. Bank. 106. Fiats are abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 116.

FIAUNT. An order; command. See FIAT.

FICTION. The legal assumption that something which is or may be false is true.

The expedient of fictions is sometimes resorted to in law for the furtherance of justice. The law-making power has no need to resort to fictions: it may establish its rules with simple reference to the truth; but the courts, which are confined to the administration of existing rules, and which lack the power to change those rules, even in hard cases, have frequently avoided the injustice that their application to the actual facts might cause, by assuming, in behalf of justice, that the actual facts are different from what they really are.

Thus, in English law, where the administration of criminal justice is by prosecution at suit of the crown, the courts, rather than disregard the rules under which all other parties stand in respect to their neglect to appear and prosecute their suits, adopt the fiction that the king is legally ubiquitous and always in court, so that he can never be non-suited. The employment of fictions is a singular illustration of the justice of the common law, which did not hesitate to conceal or affect to conceal the fact, that a rule of law has undergone alteration, its letter remaining unchanged.

Fictio in the old Roman law was properly a term of pleading and signified a false averment on the part of the plaintiff which the defendant was not allowed to traverse: as that the plaintiff was a Roman citizen, when in truth he was a foreigner. The object of the fiction was to give the court jurisdiction; Maine, Anc. Law 25.

Fictions are to be distinguished on the one hand from presumptions of law, and on the other hand from estoppels. A presumption is a rule of law prescribed for the purpose of getting at a certain conclusion, though arbitrary, where the subject is intrinsically liable to doubt from the remoteness, discrepancy, or actual defect of proofs.

Thus, an infant under the age of seven years is conclusively presumed to be without discretion. Proof that he had discretion the court will not listen to. In the nature of the subject, there must be a limit, which it is better should be a general though arbitrary one than be fluctuating and uncertain in each case. An estoppel, on the other hand, is the rule by which a person is precluded from asserting a fact by previous conduct inconsistent therewith on his own part or the part of those under whom he claims, or by an adjudication upon his rights which he cannot be allowed to question.

This distinction is thus expressed by a Scotch writer:—"A fictio juris differs from a presumption. Things are presumed which are likely to be true; but a fiction of law assumes for truth what is either false, or at least is as probably false as true. Thus, an heir is feigned or considered in law as the same person with his ancestor; thus, also, writings against which certification is obtained in a reduction-improbation are judged to be false, fictione juris, though the most convincing proof shall be brought that they once existed and were genuine. Fictions of law must in all their effects be always limited to the special purpose of equity for which they were introduced. Ersk. Prin. 531.

The familiar fictions of the civil law and of the earlier common law were very numerous; but the more useful of them have either been superseded by authorized changes in the law or have gradually grown as it were into distinct principles, forming exceptions or modifications of those principles to evade which they were at first contrived. As there is no just reason for resorting to indirection to do that which might be done directly, fictions are rapidly disappearing before the increasing harmony of our jurisprudence. See 4 Benth. Ev. 300; 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans' ed. 43. But they have doubtless been of great utility in conducting to the gradual amelioration of the law; and, in this view, fiction, equity, and legislation have been named together as the three instrumentalities in the improvement of the law. They have been employed historically in the order here given. Sometimes two of them will be seen operating together, and there are legal systems which have escaped the influence of one or the other of them. But there is no instance in which the order of their appearance has been changed or inverted. Maine, Anc. Law 24.

Theoretical writers have classified fictions as of five sorts: abeyance, when the fee of land is supposed to exist for a time without any particular owner during an outstanding freehold estate; 2 Bla. Com. 107; 1 Cruise, Dig. 67; 1 Com. Dig. 175; 1 Viner, Abr. 104; the doctrine of remitter, by which a party who has been disseised of his freehold, and afterwards acquires a defective title, is remitted to his former good title; that one thing done to-day is considered as done at a preceding time by the doctrine of relation; that, because one thing is proved, another shall be presumed to be true, which is the case in all presumptions; that the heir, executor, or administrator stand by representation in place of the deceased. Again, they have been classified as of three kinds: positive, when a fact which does not exist is assumed; negative, when a fact which does exist is ignored; and fictions by relation, when the act of one person is taken as if it were the act of a different person,—e. g., that of a servant as the act of his master; when an act at one time or place is treated as if performed at a different time or place; and when an act in relation to a certain thing is treated as if it were done in relation to another thing which the former represents,—e. g., where delivery of a portion of goods sold is treated as giving possession of the whole; Best, Pres. 27.

Fictions being resorted to simply for the furtherance of justice; Co. Litt. 150; 10 Co. 42; 1 Cowp. 177; several maxims are fundamental to them. First, that that which is impossible shall not be feigned; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, tome iv. pp. 427, 447 c, Plaidoyer; 2 Rolle 502. Second, that no fiction shall be allowed to work an injury; 3 Bla. Com. 43; 17 Johns. 348. Third, a fiction is not to be carried further than the reasons which introduced it necessarily require; 1 Lilly, Abr. 610; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 320; Best, Pres. § 20.

Consult Dalloz, Dict.; Burg. Ins. 139; Ferguson, Moral Phil. pt. 5, c. 10, § 3; 1 Toullier 171, n. 203; 2 id. 217, n. 203; 11 id. 10, n. 2; Maine, Anc. Law; Benth. Jud. Ev.; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 469.

FICTITIOUS ACTION. A suit brought on pretence of a controversy when no such controversy in truth exists. Such actions have usually been brought on a pretended wager, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a point of law. Courts of justice were constituted for the purpose of deciding really existing questions of right between parties; and they are not bound to answer impertinent questions which persons think proper to ask them in the form of an action on a wager; 12 East 248. Such an attempt has been held to be a contempt of court; and Lord Hardwicke in such a case committed the parties and their attorneys; Rep. t. Hardw. 237. See, also, Comb. 425; 1 Co. 83; 6 Cra. 147; FEIGNED ACTIONS.

FICTITIOUS PARTY. Where a suit is brought in the name of one who is not in being, or of one who is ignorant of the suit and has not authorized it, it is said to be brought in the name of a fictitious plaintiff. To bring such a suit is deemed a contempt of court; 4 Bla. Com. 133.

FICTITIOUS PAYEE. When a contract, such as negotiable paper, is drawn in favor of a fictitious person, and has been indorsed in such name, it is deemed payable to bearer as against all parties who are privy to the transaction; and a holder in good faith may recover on it against them; Pars. Bills & N. 591, n.; 2 H. Bla.

178, 288; 19 Ves. 311; 30 Miss. 122; 54 Ill. 239; 11 Barb. 248; 2 Yeates 480. And see 10 B. & C. 468; 2 Sandf. 38; 3 Duer 121; 104 Mass. 336; 2 Neb. 29.

The maker of such a note, by negotiating it, transfers title to it without indorsement, and it is presumed that the note came into the possession of the holders with the names of all the indorsers on it, and prima facie he is created as a holder for value; 5 N. Y. Supp. 753; 6 Bosw. 202; 3 Hill 112; provided that the acceptor or indorser be ignorant of the fact that the payee is fictitious; 21 Ohio St. 483; 1 Camp. 130; and to entitle the holder of such a note to a recovery it must appear affirmatively that he was ignorant of the fact that the payee was a fictitious person; 4 E. D. Sm. 83. It was said by Lord Ellenborough that as between the original parties who put it into circulation with a knowledge of the fiction, it might be held void as an inoperative instrument, but if money from the holder actually gets into the hands of the acceptor it may be recovered back as money had and received; 1 Camp. 130; id. addenda, 180 b. 9. See also Peak. Add. Cas. 146; Sto. Prom. Notes 39. In the hands of a bona fide holder the note or bill is good against the maker; 79 N. Y. 536; 22 Ia. 404; 11 Ind. 103; 40 N. H. 21.

A bona fide holder for a valuable consideration of a bill drawn payable to a fictitious person and indorsed in that name by the drawer may recover the amount of it in an action against the acceptor for money paid or money had and received upon the idea that there was an appropriation of so much money to be paid to the person who should become the holder of the bill; 3 Term 174; and the mere fact of the acceptance of such a bill is evidence that the value has been received for it; id. 182; in this case three judges thought that the bill was to be considered as payable to bearer, and in the leading case of Minet v. Gibson that view was taken and it was held that a recovery from the acceptor may be had upon a count upon a bill payable to bearer, where such acceptor is aware that the payee is a fictitious person; 3 Term 481. This judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords, though with a dissent by Eyre, C. B., and Heath, J., judges, with whom Lord Thurlow coincided; 1 H. Bla. 569; s. c. 6 Bro. P. C. 235. The case has been termed "anomalous" by a text writer who quotes the dissenting opinion of Eyre, C. B., as one "whose reasoning, it is conceived, has never been refuted;" 2 Ames, Bills & Notes 864. But the same writer admits that "the doctrine of the case has been generally adopted;" id. In an action on such a bill, to show that the acceptor is aware that the payee is a fictitious person, evidence is admissible to show the circumstances under which he had received other bills payable to fictitious persons; 2 H. Bla. 187, 288. See also 18 C. B. n. s. 694; L. R. 1 C. P. 463.

When a note is made payable to the name of some person not having any interest, and not intended to become a party to the transaction, whether a person of such a name is or is not known to exist, the payee may be deemed fictitious; 2 N. H. 446.

A note payable to a company or firm having no existence legal or de facto, has been held to be such a note; 11 Ind. 101; 40 N. H. 21; 4 E. D. Smith 83. See 6 Wend. 627; Byles, Bills, Wood's ed. 383.

FIDE-JUBERE. In Civil Law. To become fide-jussor; to pledge one's self; to act as surety for another. Among the words designated as words of obligation or forms of stipulation. Fide-jubes? do you make yourself fide-jussor? Fide-jubeo, I do make myself fide-jussor. Inst. 3. 15. 1.

FIDE-JUSSIO. An act by which any one binds himself as an additional security for another. This giving security does not destroy the liability of the principal, but adds to the security of the surety. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Hallifax, Annals, b. 2, c. 16, n. 10.

FIDE-JUSSOR. In Civil Law. One who becomes security for the debt of another, promising to pay it in case the principal does not do so. 3 Bla. Com. 108, 291.

He differs from a co-obligor in this, that the latter is equally bound to a debtor with his principal, while the former is not liable till the principal has failed to fulfil his engagement; Dig. 12. 4. 4; 16. 1. 13; 24. 3. 64; 38. 1. 37; 50. 17. 110; 6. 14. 20; Hall, Pr. 33; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 300; Clerke, Prax. tit. 63.

The obligation of the fide-jussor was an accessory contract; for, if the principal obligation was not previously contracted, his engagement then took the name of mandate. Lec. Elém. § 872; Code Nap. 2012.

FIDE-PROMISSOR. See FIDE-JUSSOR.

FIDEI - COMMISSARIUS (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. One who has a beneficial interest in an estate which, for a time, is committed to the faith or trust of another. This term has nearly the same meaning as cestui que trust has in the common law. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966.

Fidei-commissary and fide-commissary, anglicized forms of this term, have been proposed to take place of the phrase cestui que trust, but do not seem to have met with any favor.

According to Du Cange, the term was sometimes used to denote the executor of a will.

FIDEI-COMMISSUM (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. A trust. A devise was made to some person (hæres fiduciarius), and a request annexed that he should give the property to some one who was incapable of taking directly under the will. Inst. 2. 23. 1; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; 15 How. 367, 407, 409. A gift which a man makes to another through the agency of a third person, who is requested to perform the will of the giver. The Louisiana civil code prohibits fidei-commissa; 3 La. Ann. 432;

thus abolishing express trusts, but not affecting implied trusts; 2 How. 619.

The rights of the beneficiary were merely rights in curtesy, to be obtained by entreaty or request. Under Augustus, however, a system was commenced, which was completed by Justinian, for enforcing such trusts. The trustee or executor was called hæres fiduciarius, and sometimes fidei-jussor. The beneficial heir was called hæres fidei-commissarius.

The uses of the common law are said to have been borrowed from the Roman fidei-commissa; 1 Greenl. Cruise 295; Bacon, Read. 19; see Bisph. Eq. 50; 1 Madd. 446; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966. The fidei-commissa are supposed to have been the origin of the common-law system of entails; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. R. P. 60. This has been doubted by others. See SUBSTITUTION.

FIDELIS. Faithful; trustworthy.

FIDELITAS. Fealty; fidelity.

FIDEM MENTIRI. When a tenant does not keep that fealty which he has sworn to the lord. Leg. Hen. I. c. 53.

FIDES. Faith; honesty; confidence. See GOOD FAITH.

FIDUCIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A contract by which we sell a thing to some one—that is, transmit to him the property of the thing, with the solemn forms of emancipation—on condition that he will sell it back to us. This species of contract took place in the emancipation of children, in testaments, and in pledges. Pothier, Pand.

FIDUCIARIUS TUTOR. See PUPIL; TUTOR.

FIDUCIARY. This term is borrowed from the civil law. The Roman laws called a fiduciary heir the person who was instituted heir, and who was charged to deliver the succession to a person designated by the testament. Merlin, Répert. But Pothier, Pand. vol. 22, says that fiduciarius hæres properly signifies the person to whom a testator has sold his inheritance under the condition that he should sell it to another. Fiduciary may be defined in trust, in confidence.

The law forbids one standing in such a position making any profit at the expense of the party whose interests he is bound to protect, without full disclosure; Bisph. Eq. § 238; 10 H. L. Cas. 26, 31, 45. What constitutes a fiduciary relation is often a subject of controversy. It has been held to apply to all persons who occupy a position of peculiar confidence towards others, such as a trustee, executor, or administrator, director of a corporation or society; 52 Barb. 581; 78 Pa. 392; agent; 1 Johns. Ch. 550; medical or religious adviser; 24 Pa. 232; article in 10 Jur. N. S. 91; husband and wife; 86 Pa. 512; or a son; 13 Ch. Div. 333. See L. R. 3 Eq. 461; Hill, Trustees 547. Many cases have arisen in New York under the laws allowing arrest for debts incurred in a fiduciary capacity. The term seems to refer rather to the good faith than the ability of the party; 8 How. Pr. 298. See 4 Sandf. 707; 6 How. Pr. 86; 2 Abb. Pr. 444; 24 How. Pr. 274; 5 Rob. (N. Y.) 502. Under the bankrupt laws of 1841, and March 2, 1867, § 33, providing that debts contracted in a fiduciary capacity should not be barred by a discharge, the following cases fall within the act; an agent who appropriates money put into his hands for a specific purpose of investment; 1 Edm. 203; collector of city taxes who retains money officially collected; 7 Metc. 152; one who receives a note or other security for collection; 5 Denio 269; commission merchant; 54 Ga. 125; and it does not alter the rule that the debt has been reduced to judgment before the discharge; 52 Iowa 158. This exception from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy relates to technical trusts, not merely such as the law implies from the contract, but those actually and expressly constituted; 87 N. Y. 307; 129 id. 23. In the following cases the debt has been held not a fiduciary one; a factor who retains the money of his principal; 2 How. 202, 208; 2 La. Ann. 1023; 104 Mass. 245; an agent under an agreement to account and pay over monthly; 5 Biss. 324; one with whom a general deposit of money is made; 72 N. C. 463; a debt created by a person acting as an attorney in fact; 127 Mass. 41. See, also, 82 N. C. 395; 57 Miss. 598; 90 Ill. 371; 31 La. An. 809; 46 Cal. 547.

FIDUCIARY CONTRACT. An agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another on the condition that he will restore it to him. The following formula was employed: Ut inter bonos agere oportet, ne propter te fidemque tuam fraudas. Cicero, de Offic. lib. 3, cap. 13; Lex. du Dr. Civ. Rom. § 237. See 2 How. 202; 6 W. & S. 18; 7 Watts 415.

FIEF. A fee, feod, or feud.

FIEF D'HAUBERK. A fee held on the military tenure of appearing fully armed on the ban and arriere-ban. Feudum hauberticum. Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange. A knight's fee. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

FIEF TENANT. The holder of a fief or fee.

FIEL. In Spanish Law. An officer who keeps possession of a thing deposited under authority of law. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 9, l. 1.

FIELD. A cultivated tract of land. 81 N. C. 585; 97 Mass. 412; but not a one-acre lot used for cultivating vegetables; 7 Heisk. 510.

FIELDAD. In Spanish Law. Sequestration. This is allowed in six cases by the Spanish law where the title to property is in dispute. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 3, l. 1.

FIELD-ALE, or FILKDALE. The drinking of ale by bailiffs and other officers in the field, at the expense of the hundred;

an old English custom long since prohibited. Toml.

FIERDING COURTS. Ancient Gothic courts "in the lowest instance;" so called because four were instituted within every superior district or hundred. Their jurisdiction was limited within forty shillings, or three marks; 3 Steph. Com. 393; 3 Bla. Com. 34; Stiernhook, De Jure Goth. i. 1, c. 2.

FIERI FACIAS (Lat. that you cause to be made). In Practice. A writ directing the sheriff to cause to be made of the goods and chattels of the judgment-debtor the sum or debt recovered.

It receives its name from the Latin words in the writ, used when legal proceedings were conducted in Latin (quod fieri facias de bonis et catallis, that you cause to be made of the goods and chattels). It is the form of execution in common use where the judgment-debtor has personal property.

The foundation of this writ is a judgment for debt or damages; and the party who has recovered such a judgment is generally entitled to it, unless he is delayed by the stay of execution which the law allows in certain cases after the rendition of the judgment, or by proceedings in error.

The execution, being founded on the judgment, must, of course, follow and be warranted by it; 2 Saund. 72 h, k; Bingh. Judg. 186; 2 Cow. 454. Hence, where there is more than one plaintiff or defendant, it must be in the name of all the plaintiffs against all the defendants; 6 Term 525. It is either for the plaintiff or the defendant. When it is against an executor or administrator for a liability of the testator or intestate, it is conformable to the judgment, and must be only against the goods of the deceased, unless the defendant has made himself personally liable by his false pleading, in which case the judgment is de bonis testatoris si, et si non, de bonis propriis; 1 S. & R. 453; 4 id. 394; 18 Johns. 502; 1 Hayw. 598; 2 id. 112.

At common law, the writ bound the goods of the defendant or party against whom it was issued, from the teste day; by which is to be understood that the writ bound the property against the party himself, and all claiming by assignment from or by representation under him; 4 East 538; so that a sale by the defendant of his goods to a bona fide purchaser did not protect them from a fieri facias tested before, although not issued or delivered to the sheriff till after the sale; Cro. Eliz. 174; Cro. Jac. 451; 1 Sid. 271; but by the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 16, it was enacted "that no writ of fieri facias, or other writ of execution, shall bind the property of the goods of the party against whom such writ of execution issued forth, but from the time that such writ shall be delivered to the sheriff," etc., who must "indorse upon the back thereof the day of the month and year whereon he or they received the same;" and the same or similar provisions have been enacted in most of the states; 2 S. & R. 157; 1 Whart. 377; 8 Johns. 446; 3 Harr. Del. 512; 32 Mo. 387; 14 Wis. 202. The property in the goods is not altered, but remains in the defendant until the actual execution of the writ; Wats. Sher. 176.

The execution of the writ is made by levying upon the goods and chattels of the defendant or party against whom it is issued; and, in general, seizing a part of the goods in the name of the whole on the premises is a good seizure of the whole; 1 Ld. Raym. 725; 4 Wash. C. C. 29; 1 Munf. 269; 3 Hill, N. Y. 666; 5 Ired. 192; 7 Ala. n. s. 619. But see 1 Whart. 377; 6 Halst. 218. It may be executed at any time before and on the return-day; 13 Tex. 507; but not on Sunday, where it is forbidden by statute (29 Car. II. c. 7, which has been substantially followed in the United States); Watson, Sher. 173; 5 Co. 92; Comyns, Dig. Execution, C 5. After the death of the plaintiff, the sheriff may execute a fi. fa. tested in his lifetime, and under it seize his goods in the hands of his executor or administrator; Wats. Sher. 173.

The sheriff cannot break the outer door of a house for the purpose of executing a fieri facias; 5 Co. 92; nor unlatch an outer door; 4 Hill, N. Y. 437; nor can a window be broken for this purpose; W. Jones 429. He may, however, enter the house, if it be open, and, being once lawfully entered, he may break open an inner door or chest to seize the goods of the defendant, even without any request to open them; 4 Taunt. 619; 3 B. & P. 223; Cowp. 1; Troub. & H. Pr. 1116. Although the sheriff is authorized to enter the house of the party to search for goods, he cannot enter that of a stranger for that purpose, without being guilty of a trespass, unless the defendant's goods are actually in the house; Comyns, Dig. Execution (C 5). The sheriff may break the outer door of a barn; 1 Sid. 186; 1 Kebl. 689; or of a store disconnected with the dwelling-house and forming no part of the curtilage; 16 Johns. 287. See 1 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 228, with note on the subject; BREAKING.

At common law a fi. fa. did not authorize a sheriff to seize bank-bills, checks, or promissory notes; but it is otherwise now, by stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, § 12, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; and this is now the law of many of the United States; 2 Va. Cas. 246; 1 Bail. 39; Hempst. 91; 4 N. H. 198; 29 Pa. 240. So money may be taken; 1 Bail. 39; 1 Cra. 117; 12 Johns. 220. The writ applies generally to goods and chattels, but the common-law rules as to what may be taken are very much extended; see as to the different species of property in England; Watson, Sheriff ch. x. sec. ii., and as to what interest may be taken; id. sec. iii.; as to railway property; 24 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 5; copyright and patent; 40 Am. Rep. 123; growing crops; 31 Am. L. Reg. 602; seat in the stock exchange; 28 Cent. L. J. 444; board of trade shares; 22 Am. L. Reg. 438; 3 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 171; 4 id. 65; property in custodia legis; 28 Am. Rep. 35; interest of heirs; 44 Am. Dec. 338; trust funds; 7 Cent. L. J. 483; equitable interest; 9 Can. L. T. 125, 145; 17 Can. L. J. 54; pension money;

21 Ir. L. T. 47. For the form of the writ, see 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. App. xxvii.; as to proceeding in equity in aid of executions at law, see CREDITORS' BILL. See, generally, Murfree, Freeman, Executions ch. X; Watson, Sheriff; EXECUTION; LEVY; SHERIFF.

FIERI FECI (L. Lat.). In Practice. The return which the sheriff or other proper officer makes to certain writs, signifying, "I have caused to be made."

When the officer has made this return, a rule may be obtained upon him after the return-day, to pay the money into court, and, if he withholds payment, an action of debt may be had on the return, or assumpsit for money had and received may be sustained against him; 3 Johns. 183.

FIFTEENTHS. An aid; aid granted from time to time to the crown by parliament, consisting of a fifteenth part of the personal property in every township, borough, and city in the kingdom. In the eighth year of Edward III. the valuation of the kingdom was fixed and a record made in the exchequer of the amount (twenty-nine thousand pounds). This valuation was not increased as the property in the kingdom increased in value; whence the name came in time to be a great misnomer. Co. 2d Inst. 77; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 604; 2 Bla. Com. 309; Cowel.

FIGHT. Does not necessarily imply that both parties should give and take blows. It is sufficient that they voluntarily put their bodies in position with that intent. 73 N. C. 155; 46 Ga. 148. See PRIZE-FIGHT.

FIGHTWITE (Sax.). A mulct or fine for making a quarrel to the disturbance of the peace. Called also by Cowel forisfactura pugnæ. The amount was one hundred and twenty shillings. Cowel.

FIGURES. Numerals. They are either Roman, made with letters of the alphabet: for example, MDCLXXVI; or they are Arabic, as follows: 1776.

Roman figures may be used in contracts and law proceedings, and they will be held valid; but Arabic figures, probably owing to the ease with which they may be counterfeited or altered, have been holden not to be sufficient to express the sum due on a contract; but it seems that if the amount payable and due on a promissory note be expressed in figures or ciphers, it will be valid. Story, Bills § 42, note; Story, Pr. Notes § 21.

Figures to express numbers are not allowable in indictments; but all numbers must be expressed in words at length, except in setting forth a copy of a written instrument. And complaints are governed by the same rule in cases over which magistrates have final jurisdiction. But the decisions on this point are not uniform. And in most of them the proper distinction between the use of figures in the caption and in the body of an indictment has not been observed. In America, perhaps the weight of authority is contrary to the law as above stated. But, at all events, a contrary practice is unclerical, uncertain, and liable to alteration; and the courts which have sustained such practice have uniformly cautioned against it. See 13 Viner, Abr. 210; 1 Chitty 319; 34 Conn. 280; 35 Me. 489.

Bills of exchange, promissory notes, checks, and agreements of every description are usually dated with Arabic figures: it is, however, better to date deeds and other formal instruments by writing the words at length. See 5 Toullier, n. 336; 4 Yeates 278; 2 Johns. 233; 2 Miss. 256; 6 Blackf. 533; 1 Vt. 336.

FILACER. An officer of the common pleas, king's bench, and exchequer, whose duty it was to file the writs on which he made process. There were fourteen of them; and it was their duty to make out all original process. Cowel; Blount. The office was abolished in 1837.

FILARE. In Old English Practice. To file. Townsh. Pl. 67.

FILE (Lat. Filum). A thread, string, or wire upon which writs and other exhibits in courts and offices are fastened or filed for the more safe-keeping and ready turning to the same. Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; Tomlin, Law Dict. Papers put together and tied in bundles. A paper is said also to be filed when it is delivered to the proper officer, and by him received to be kept on file. 13 Viner, Abr. 211; 1 Littleton 113; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 7, 207. See where filed by a wife as agent; 120 Mass. 130.

The origin of the term indicates very clearly that the filing of a paper can only be effected by bringing it to the notice of the officer, who anciently put it upon the string or wire; 38 Ala. 248.

Filing a paper, in modern usage, consists in placing it in the custody of the proper official by the party charged with the duty, and the making of the proper indorsement by the officer. 2 S. Dak. 525. In the sense of a statute requiring the filing of a paper or document, it is filed when delivered to and received by the proper officer to be kept on file. The word carries with it the idea of permanent preservation of the thing so delivered and received; that it may become a part of the public record. It is not synonymous with deposited; 67 Hun 560.

FILEINJAID (Brit.). A name given to villains in the laws of Hoel Dda. Barring. Obs. St. 302.

FILIATE. To declare whose child a bastard is. 2 W. Bla. 1017.

FILIATION. In Civil Law. The descent of son or daughter, with regard to his or her father, mother, and their ancestors.

Nature always points out the mother by evident signs, and, whether married or not, she is always certain: mater semper certa est, etiamsi vulgo conceperit. There is not the same certainty with regard to the father, and the relation may not know or may feign ignorance as to the paternity; the law has therefore established a legal presumption to serve as a foundation for paternity and filiation.

When the mother is or has been married, her husband is presumed to be the father of the children born during the coverture, or within a competent time afterwards, whether they were conceived during the coverture or not: pater is est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

This rule is founded on two presumptions: one on the cohabitation before the birth of the child; and the other that the mother has faithfully observed the vow she made to her husband.

This presumption may, however, be rebutted by showing either that there has been no cohabitation, or some physical or other impossibility that the husband could be the father. See ACCESS; BASTARD; GESTATION; NATURAL CHILDREN; PATERNITY; PUTATIVE FATHER.

FILICETUM. In English Law. A ferny or bracky ground; a place where fern grows. Co. Litt. 4 b; Shep. Touch. 95.

FILIOUS. In Old Records. A godson. Spel. Glos.

FILIUS (Lat.). A son. A child.

As distinguished from heir, filius is a term of nature, heres a term of law. 1 Powell, Dev. 311. In the civil law the term was used to denote a child generally. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Its use in the phrase nullius filius would seem to indicate a use in the sense of legitimate son, a bastard being the legitimate son of nobody; though the word is usually rendered a son, whether legitimate or illegitimate. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FILIUS FAMILIAS (Lat.). A son who is under the control and power of his father. Story, Confl. Laws § 61; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FILIUS MULIERATUS (Lat.). The first legitimate son born to a woman who has had a bastard son by her husband before her marriage. Called, also, mulier, mulier puisné. 2 Bla. Com. 248.

FILIUS NULLIUS (Lat. son of nobody). A bastard. Called, also, filius populi (son of the people). 1 Bla. Com. 459; 6 Co. 65 a.

FILIUS POPULI. A son of the people; a natural child.

FILL. To occupy the whole capacity or extent of, so as to leave no space vacant.

To possess and discharge the duties of an office. The election of a person to an office constitutes the essence of his appointment, but the office cannot be considered as actually filled until his acceptance, either expressed or implied; 2 N. H. 202.

In a subscription for shares in a corporation the word "fill" amounts to a promise to pay assessments; 10 Me. 478. As to the use of the word in connection with a doctor's prescription, see 61 Ga. 505; DRUGGIST.

FILLY. A young mare; a female colt. An indictment charging the theft of a "filly" is not sustained by proof of the larceny of a "mare;" 1 Tex. App. 448.

FILUM AQUÆ (Lat. a thread of water). This may mean either the middle line or the outer line. Altum filum denotes high-water mark. Blount. Filum is, however, used almost universally in connection with aquæ to denote the middle line of a stream. Medium filum is sometimes used with no additional meaning. The common-law rule was that conveyances of land bounded on streams, above tide water, extend usque ad filum aquæ. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE.

FILUM FORESTÆ (Lat.). The border of the forest. 2 Bla. Com. 419; 4 Inst. 303; Manw. Purlieu.

FILUM VIÆ (Lat.). The middle line of a road; a term used to indicate the middle line or thread of a street or road. 2 Sm. L. Cas. 98. See 121 Mass. 18; 119 id. 231; 88 Pa. 453; 57 Mo. 582; 87 Ill. 348. Where a description of land gives a street or road as a boundary, it is presumed that the title passes ad medium filum viæ; 33 Pa. 124. See BOUNDARY; HIGHWAY; STREET.

FIN. End; limit; period of limitation.

FIN DE NON RECEVOIR. In French Law. An exception or plea founded on law, which without entering into the merits of the action shows that the plaintiff has no right to bring it, either because the time during which it ought to have been brought has elapsed, which is called prescription, or that there has been a compromise, accord, and satisfaction, or any other cause which has destroyed the right of action which once subsisted. Pothier, Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, s. 2, art. 2; Story, Confl. Laws § 580.

FINAL. Last; conclusive; pertaining to the end. In law it is usually employed in contrast with interlocutory (q. v.) with respect to pendency of suits.

FINAL COSTS. Such costs as are to be paid at the end of the suit; costs, the liability for which depends upon the final result of the litigation.

FINAL DECISION. One from which no appeal or writ of error can be taken. 47 Ill. 167; 6 El. & Bl. 408.

FINAL DECREE. See DECREE.

FINAL DISPOSITION. Such a conclusive determination of the subject-matter embraced in a submission to arbitrators, that after the award is made nothing further remains to fix the rights and obligations of the parties, and no further controversy or litigation can arise thereon.

Such an award that the party against whom it is given may perform it without any further ascertainment of rights or obligation. See 50 Me. 401.

FINAL HEARING. The trial of an equity case upon the merits, as distinguished from the hearing of any preliminary questions arising in the cause, which are termed interlocutory. 24 Wis. 171.

FINAL JUDGMENT. See JUDGMENT.

FINAL PASSAGE. In Parliamentary Law. The vote on a passage of a bill or resolution in either house of the legislature after it has received the prescribed number of readings and has been subjected to such action as is required by the fundamental law governing the body or its own rule. See 54 Ala. 613.

FINAL PROCESS. Writs of execution. So called to distinguish them from mesne process, which includes all process issuing before judgment rendered. 3 Steph. Com. 489.

FINAL RECOVERY. The ultimate judgment of a court. 100 Mass. 91. It has also been construed as referring to the verdict, as distinguished from the judgment. 6 Allen 243.

FINAL SENTENCE. One which puts an end to a case. Distinguished from interlocutory. See SENTENCE.

FINAL SETTLEMENT. In Probate and Administration. The final account of an executor or administrator closing the business of the estate, with the order of the court thereon approving it and discharging the accountant. 13 N. E. Rep. () 131; 4 Wash. 632; 87 Ind. 114; 65 Ala. 442.

FINALIS CONCORDIA (Lat.). A decisive agreement. A fine. A final agreement.

A final agreement entered by the parties by permission of court in a suit actually brought for lands. Subsequently the bringing suit, entry of agreement, etc., became merely formal, but its entry upon record gave a firm title to the plaintiff; 1 Washb. R. P. 70; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 143; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 689.

Finis est amicabile compositio et finalis concordia ex consensu et concordia domini regis vel iusticiarum (a fine is an amicable settlement and decisive agreement by consent and agreement of our lord the king or his justices). Glanville, lib. 8, c. 1.

Talis concordia finalis dicitur eo quod finem imposuit negotio, adeo ut neutra pars litigantium ab eo de cetero poterit recidere (such concord is called final because it puts an end to the business, so that neither of the litigants can afterwards recede from it). Glanville, lib. 9, c. 3; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FINANCES. The public revenue or resources of a government or state. The income or means of an individual or corporation. It is somewhat like the fiscus of the Romans. The word is generally used in the plural.

Money resources generally. The state of the finances of an individual or corporation, being his condition in a monetary point of view. The cash he has on hand, and that which he expects to receive, as compared with the engagements he has made to pay.

FINANCIER. One who manages the finances or public revenue. Persons skilled in matters appertaining to the judicious management of money affairs.

FIND. The word find or finding does not always imply the same thing in legal proceedings. Where a cause is tried by the court, the finding means the fact which the court considers the evidence establishes, but find, as used in a statute in respect to the truth of a complaint for the revocation of a license, implies that the board is satisfied from the evidence, and the conclusion may be informally expressed. 74 Wis. 267.

FINDER. One who lawfully comes to the possession of another's personal property, which was then lost.

The finder of lost property at common law had a valid claim to the same against all the world except the true owner; 1 Stra. 504; 62 Me. 275; 1 E. D. Sm. 393; 11 R. I. 588; 28 Gratt. 601; 16 Ore. 269; and money or property found on the premises of another has been held, in the case of a servant in a hotel, as against the proprietor, to belong to the finder; 90 Pa. 377; so a stranger who finds money in a shop may retain it as against the shop-owner; 21 L. J. Q. B. 75; unless it has been simply laid aside and left by mistake; 10 Allen (Mass.) 548; 1 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 22; or a conductor who finds money on the cars may retain it as against the company; 56 N. Y. 175; or an employe in a mill, who finds bank-notes among old papers bought to be manufactured over; 62 Ind. 281. Drift-logs found on the banks of a river may be rightfully retained by the finder as against the riparian owner; 86 Tenn. 14; but an aerolite which buries itself in the ground belongs rather to the owner of the soil on which it falls than to one who observes it and digs it out; 86 Ia. 71. In a very recent English case, where a workman employed by a corporation to clear out a pool on its land found two rings in the mud at the bottom of the pool, the corporation was held entitled to recover the rings in an action of detinue; [1896] 2 Q. B. 44. In that case Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., put the decision on the ground that the possession of land carried with it everything attached to it, or under it, and he expressly distinguished the last English case above cited, which, he said, stood by itself on the special ground that the notes being dropped in the public part of the shop were never in the custody of the shopkeeper; accordingly he says: "It is somewhat strange that there is no more direct authority on the question; but the general principle seems to me to be that where a person has possession of house or land, with a manifest intention to exercise control over it and the things which may be upon or in it, then, if something is found on that land, whether by an employe of the owner or by a stranger, the presumption is that the possession of that thing is in the owner of the locus in quo."

A commentator upon these cases says: "This language applies to land with respect to which the public has no easement, which differentiates the case from findings in shops and other public places. The real distinction, however, is this, that those things belong to the owner of the premises in which they are found, which, either from their nature, or from the circumstances attending the loss, become practically part and parcel of the freehold, such as the rings, covered by the water and mud, which undoubtedly belonged to the owner of the land, and the aerolite which buried itself in the ground to the depth of three feet; or, to use the language of some of the cases, those things belong to the owner which may be regarded as accretions to his land, such as the aerolite, the rings, or drift-logs; though the latter may be pursued and taken by a former finder, from whom they have escaped." 36 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 588.

Where a man buys a chattel which unknown to himself and the vendor contains valuable property, he will, as to that, be considered merely as a finder. When a person purchased at a public auction a bureau, and appropriated to his own use a purse containing money, found in a secret drawer, the existence of which at the time of the sale was not known to any one, it was held that there was a delivery of the bureau but not of the purse and money, and it was a simple case of finding and subject to the law in such cases; 7 M. & W. 623. See Br. Leg. Max., 8th Am. ed. 807.

The finder is entitled to certain rights, and liable to duties which he is obliged to perform. This is a species of deposit, which, as it does not arise ex contractu, may be called a quasi deposit; and it is governed by the same general rules as common deposits. The finder is required to take the same reasonable care of the property found as any voluntary depositary ex contractu; Doctor & Stud. Dial. 2, c. 38; 2 Bulstr. 306, 312; 1 Rolle 125; 50 Vt. 688; 107 Mass. 251.

The finder is not bound to take the goods he finds; yet, when he does undertake the custody, he is required to exercise reasonable diligence in preserving the property; and he will be responsible for gross negligence. Some of the old authorities laid down that "if a man find butter, and by his negligent keeping it putrefy, or if a man find garments, and by his negligent keeping they be moth-eaten, no action lies." So it is if a man find goods and then lose them again. Bacon, Abr. Bailment, D; and in support of this position, Leon. 123, 223; Ow. 141; 2 Bulstr. 21, are cited. But these cases, if carefully examined, will not, perhaps, be found to decide the point as broadly as it is stated in Bacon. A finder would be held responsible for gross negligence, or fraud; Story, Bailm. § 85.

On the other hand, the finder of an article is entitled to recover all expenses which have necessarily occurred in preserving the thing found; Domat, l. 2, t. 9, s. 2, n. 2. But unlike salvors by water, he can claim nothing beyond this; 2 H. Bla. 254; 37 Conn. 96; 27 Ohio 435; Shoul. Bailm. 28.

And when the owner does not reclaim the goods lost, they belong to the finder; 1 Bla. Com. 296; 2 id. 9; 2 Kent 290; and should there be several finders, they share in common; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 1055. The acquisition of treasure by the finder is evidently founded on the rule that what belongs to none naturally becomes the property of the first occupant: res nullius naturaliter fit primo occupantis. Money or goods that are lost are the only kind that can be said to be found. It is property that the owner has involuntarily parted with, and not property that he has intentionally concealed in the earth for safekeeping; 16 Ore. 269. Money left on a desk in a bank, provided for the use of the depositors, is not lost so as to entitle the finder to the same, as against the bank; 1 Misc. Rep. 22. It seems that the title of the owner to property lying at the bottom of the sea is not divested, however long it may remain there, and no other person can acquire such title except by condemnation and sale in admiralty; 38 Fed. Rep. 503. One who finds property at sea is only a salvor. When a ship was almost becalmed in high seas a floating chest was found and with but little trouble taken on board. It contained 70 doubloons. It was held that the finders were not entitled to the whole property, though no claims or marks of ownership, but should be compensated by a moiety as for salvage services. The other moiety was directed to be paid into court; Fed. Cas. No. 6620.

As to the criminal responsibility of the finder, the result of the authorities is that if a man finds goods that have been actually lost, or are reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriates them, with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing when he takes them that the owner cannot be found, it is not larceny; but if he takes them with the like intent, though lost or reasonably supposed to be lost, but reasonably believing that the owner can be found, it is larceny; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 335, 387; 2 id. 8; Clark, Cr. L. 255; 29 Ohio St. 184; s. c. 23 Am. Rep. 731; 11 Cox, C. C. 103, 227, 353; 2 C. & K. 841; 53 Ind. 343. If a finder attempts to retain lost property as against the owner, or converts it to his own use, when he knows the owner, he will be guilty of larceny; 1 Humph. 228; 2 Sneed 285. See as to this rule and its qualification Broom, Com., 4th ed. 955; Mart. & Yerg. 226. There must be a felonious intent; 116 Mass. 42; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 138 and note. Though it is the duty of the finder to seek out the owner and restore the property with due diligence, yet the want of promptness on the part of the finder does not prove felonious intent in keeping the property; 22 Ill. App. 177. The question is, whether the finder, when he came into possession, believed the owner could be found; 2 Green, Cr. L. Rep. 35. In Regina v. Thurborn, Parke, B., observes that it cannot be doubted that if, at this day, the punishment of death was assigned to theft and usually carried into effect, the misappropriation of lost goods would never be held to constitute that offence. Whart. Cr. L. § 901. See TAKING.

See as to title by accession, accretion, and by finding, 35 Cent. Law J. 368.

FINDING. The result of the deliberations of a jury or a court. 1 Day 238; 2 id. 12; 16 Blatchf. 65.

If the court below neglect or refuse to make a finding one way or the other as to the existence of a material fact which has been established by uncontradicted evidence, or if it finds such a fact when not supported by any evidence whatever, and an exception be taken, the question may be brought up for review in that particular. Both of these are questions of law and proper subjects for review in an appellate court; 147 U. S. 72.

Where a case is tried by a court without a jury, its findings upon questions of fact are conclusive, in the United States supreme court; 121 U. S. 535; 120 id. 20. Error in the findings of fact by the court are not subject to revision if there is any evidence upon which such findings could be made; 134 U. S. 494.

FINE. In Conveyancing. An amicable composition or agreement of a suit, either actual or fictitious, by leave of the court, by which the lands in question become, or are acknowledged to be, the right of one of the parties. Co. Litt. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 349; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Recoveries. Fines were abolished in England by stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. Their use was not unknown in the United States, but has been either expressly abolished or become obsolete. See 1 Steph. Com. 514.

A fine is so called because it puts an end not only to the suit thus commenced, but also to all other suits and controversies concerning the same matter. Such concords, says Doddridge (Eng. Lawyer 84), have been in use in the civil law, and are called transactions, whereof they say thus: Transacciones sunt de eis quæ in controversia sunt, a lite futura aut pendente ad certam compositionem reducuntur, dando aliquid vel accipiendo. Or shorter, thus: Transactio est de re dubia et lite ancipite ne dum ad finem ducta, non gratuita pactio. It is commonly defined an assurance by matter of record, and is founded upon a supposed previously existing right, and upon a writ requiring the party to perform his covenant; although a fine may be levied upon any writ by which lands may be demanded, charged, or bound. It has also been defined an acknowledgment on record of a previous gift or feoffment, and prima facie carries a fee, although it may be limited to an estate for life or in fee-tail. Prest. Conv. 200, 202, 268, 269; 2 Bla. Com. 348.

The stat. 18 Edw. I., called modus levandi fines, declares and regulates the manner in which they should be levied and carried on; and that is as follows: The party to whom the land is conveyed or assured commences an action at law against the other, generally an action of covenant, by suing out a writ of præcipe, called a writ of covenant, that the one shall convey the lands to the other, on the breach of which agreement the action is brought. The suit being thus commenced, then follows the licentia concordandi, or leave to compromise the suit. The concord, or agreement itself, after leave obtained by the court: this is usually an acknowledgment from the deforciant that the lands in question are the lands of the complainants. The note of the fine, which is only an abstract of the writ of covenant and the concord; naming the parties, the parcels of land, and the agreement. The foot of the fine, or the conclusion of it, which includes the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. See Cruise, Fines; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Recoveries; Comyns, Dig. Fine.

In Corporation Law. A term applied to the charge made against a member of a building and loan association who fails to make his monthly payment when due. It has been lately held, that such fines are not by way of penalty, but are rather to be considered as liquidated damages, fixed by consent of the parties, for the loss sustained by the association by reason of the failure of the defaulting member to make prompt payment, and since such payments are essential to the success of the plan of the association, and for the interest of its members as a whole, the fines will be enforced, independently of statutory provisions, if reasonable in amount and equitable in their application; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1085. This case also holds that a fine of "ten cents per share, to be imposed for each and every month that payment is not made," is reasonable. It has also been held that where the by-law provides for a fine of twenty cents per month on each one hundred dollars borrowed, the fine for one month is not repeated and added to that of each succeeding month, but only twenty cents on each one hundred dollars can be imposed in any one month; and when the constitution of a building association prescribes the fines to be imposed on delinquent members, it thereby fixes the limit beyond which the association cannot go; but it may by by-law waive some part of the fines so authorized, and impose smaller ones, and in that case the by-law will govern; 25 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 537.

In Criminal Law. Pecuniary punishment imposed by a lawful tribunal upon a person convicted of crime or misdemeanor. See Shepp. Touchst. 2; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Amercements; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 940. It may include a forfeiture or penalty recoverable in a civil action; 11 Gray 373; 6 Neb. 37.

The amount of the fine is frequently left to the discretion of the court, who ought to proportion the fine to the offence. To prevent the abuse of excessive fines, the constitution of the United States directs that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Amendm. to the Constitution, art. 8; Cooley, Const. Lim. 377.

This applies to national and not to state legislation; 5 Wall. 480; 7 Pet. 243. The supreme court cannot, on habeas corpus, revise the sentence of an inferior court on the ground that the fine was excessive; 7 Pet. 568.

FINE AND RECOVERY ACT. The statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74. This act abolished fines and recoveries. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 364, n.; 1 Steph. Com. 514. See FINE.

FINE CAPIENDO PRO TERRIS. An obsolete writ which lay for a person who, upon conviction by jury, had his lands and goods taken, and his body imprisoned, to be remitted his imprisonment, and have his lands and goods redelivered to him, on obtaining favor of a sum of money, etc. Reg. Orig. 142.

FINE FOR ALIENATION. A sum of money which a tenant by knight's service, or a tenant in capite by socage tenure, paid to his lord for permission to alienate his right in the estate he held to another, and by that means to substitute a new tenant for himself. 2 Bla. Com. 71, 89; 6 N. Y. 467, 495. These fines are now abolished. In France, a similar demand from the tenant, made by the lord when the former alienated his estate, was called lods et vente. This imposition was abolished, with nearly every other feudal right, by the French revolution.

FINE FOR ENDOWMENT. A fine anciently payable to the lord by the widow of a tenant without which she could not be endowed of her husband's lands. Abolished under Henry I., and by Magna Charta. Moz. & W.

FINE NON CAPIENDO PRO PULCHRE PLACITANDO. An obsolete writ to prohibit officers of court from taking fines for fair pleading.

FINE PRO REDISSEISINA CAPIENDO. An old writ which lay for the release of one imprisoned for a redisseisin, on payment of a reasonable fine. Reg. Orig. 222.

FINE SUR COGNIZANCE DE DROIT COME CEO QUE IL AD DE SON DONE. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee as that which he hath of the gift of the cognizor. By this the deforciant acknowledges in court a former feoffment or gift in possession to have been made by him to the plaintiff. 2 Bla. Com. 352; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Shepp. Touchst. c. 2; Comyns, Dig. Fine.

FINE SUR COGNIZANCE DE DROIT TANTUM. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right merely. Generally used to pass a reversionary interest which is in the cognizor. 2 Bla. Com. 351; Jacob, Law Dict.; Comyns, Dig.

FINE SUR CONCESSIT. A fine granted where the cognizor, in order to make an end of disputes, though he acknowledges no precedent right, yet grants to the consignee an estate de novo, usually for life or years, by way of a supposed composition. 2 Bla. Com. 353; Shepp. Touchst. c. 2.

FINE SUR DONE, GRANT ET RENDER. A double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo and the fine sur concessit. It may be used to convey particular limitations of estates and to persons who are strangers or not named in the writ of covenant; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., conveys nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance, or at least freehold. Salk. 340. In this last species of fines the cognizee, after the right is acknowledged to be in him, grants back again or renders to the cognizor, or perhaps to a stranger, some other estate in the premises. 2 Bla. Com. 353; Viner, Abr. Fine; Comyns, Dig. Fine; 1 Washb. R. P. 33.

FINEM FACERE (Lat.). To make or pay a fine. Bracton 106; Skene.

FINES LE ROY. In Old English Law. A sum of money which any one is to pay the king for any contempt or offence; which fine any one that commits any trespass, or is convict that he falsely denies his own deed, or did anything in contempt of the law, shall pay to the king. Termes de la Ley; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FINIRE. In English Law. To fine, or pay a fine. Cowel. To end or finish a matter.

FINIS. End; conclusion; limit.

FINISHED.

The question whether a house has been "finished" is one of fact; and the owner's moving into it is not conclusive proof of the fact, where the owner accepted an order to be paid when the house is finished; 121 Mass. 584.

FINITIO. An ending; death as the end of life. Blount; Cowel.

FINIUM REGUNDORUM ACTIO. In Civil Law. An action for regulating boundaries. 1 Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 271.

FINORS. Those that purify gold and silver, and part them by fire and water from coarser metals; and therefore in the statute of Hen. VII. c. 2, they are also called "parters." Termes de la Ley.

FIRDFARE. In English Law. A summoning forth to a military expedition (indictio ad projectionem militarem). Spel. Gloss.

FIRDIRINGA (Sax.). A preparation to go into the army. Leg. Hen. I.

FIRDSOCNE (Sax.). Exemption from military service. Spelman, Gloss.

FIRDWITE (Sax.). A mulct or penalty imposed on military tenants for their default in not appearing in arms or coming to an expedition. Cowel. A penalty imposed for murder committed in the army. Cowel.

FIRE. The effect of combustion. Webster, Dict.

The legal sense of the word is the same as the popular. 1 Pars. Marit. Law 231.

Fire is not a peril of the sea. In Scotch law, however, fire is an inevitable accident. Bell, Dict.

Whether a fire arises purely by accident, or from any other cause, when it becomes uncontrollable and dangerous to the public, a man may, in general, justify the destruction of a house on fire for the protection of the neighborhood; for the maxim salus populi est suprema lex applies in such case; 11 Co. 13. See ACCIDENT; ACT OF GOD; EMINENT DOMAIN; 3 Wms. Saund. 422 a, note 2; 3 Co. Litt. 57 a, n. 1; 1 Cruise, Dig. 151, 152; 1 Rolle, Abr. 1; Bacon, Abr. Action on the Case, F; 2 Lois des Bâtim. 124; 1 Term 310; 6 id. 489; Ambl. 619.

When real estate is let, and the tenant covenants to pay the rent during the term, unless there are proper exceptions to such covenants, and the premises are afterwards destroyed by fire during the term, the rent must be paid although there be no enjoyment; for the common rule prevails, res perit domino. The tenant, by the accident, loses his term; the landlord, the residence; Story, Eq. Jur. § 102; Woodf. L. & T. 408.

The owner of property may kindle and have a fire on his own premises for any lawful purpose, such as burning waste in husbandry, without liability for injury to the property of another, if it is done with due care as to time, manner, and circumstances, and with respect to casual fires, also having due regard to the conditions of weather, wind, and proximity of inflammable material; Thomas, Negl. 640; Webb, Poll. Torts 616, and note. Even in the extreme case of one who had been warned of the danger that his haystack would take fire and endanger others, the contention that the question should have been put to the jury whether he had acted bona fide, to the best of his judgment, and that the standard of ordinary prudence was too uncertain as a criterion, was unsuccessfully pressed, and the care of a prudent man was held to be the proper measure of duty; 3 Bing. N. C. 468.

Very early in England, the duty of every man to safely keep his own fire was a stringent "custom of the realm," i. e. at common law; Y. B. 2 Hen. IV. 18, pl. 5; and this, it is said, may be founded on ancient German custom, when a man carries fire more than nine feet from his hearth, only at his peril; Ll. Langob. cc. 147, 148 (A. D. 643), Poll. Torts 616. The rule applied as well to out-door fires, and in "a case grounded upon the common custom of the realm for negligently keeping his fire"; 1 Ld. Raym. 264; s. c. 1 Salk. 13. Liability for domestic fires begun accidentally and without accident is removed in England by stats. of Anne and Geo. III.; 11 Q. B. 347. The rule of modern times is without doubt affected by the great increase of business uses to which fire is applied, such as for mills, railroads, and the like, and in England the leading case of Rylands v. Fletcher (which itself concerned a reservoir, but the application of which has passed far beyond the class of facts on which it was determined), laid down the rule "that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his lands, and collects and keeps there, anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape." This principle was expressly applied to railroads; L. R. 3 Q. B. 733; and to an engine brought on a highway; 5 Q. B. Div. 597. The case of Rylands v. Fletcher is itself one of those landmarks of judicial decision, the results and extent of which are difficult to estimate, and it is not easy to conceive of a subject-matter to which it can apply with greater force than to fire.

In the United States, as to Rylands v. Fletcher, judicial opinion is not uniform; it has been approved; 106 Mass. 194; 125 id. 232; 135 id. 508; and distinctly disapproved; 51 N. Y. 476. See Big. L. Cas. 497. But it may be safely asserted as a rule that "a man who negligently sets fire on his own land, and keeps it negligently, is liable to an action at common law for any injury done by the spreading or communication of the fire directly from his own land to the property of another, whether through the air or along the ground and whether he might or might not have reasonably anticipated the particular manner and direction in which it is actually communicated;" 107 Mass. 494; 70 N. Y. 112; 28 Minn. 139; 46 id. 147; 95 Mich. 303; 43 Cal. 437. One accidentally but not negligently firing his house is not liable for the spread of the fire by wind; 99 Ind. 16. The spreading of a fire does not raise a presumption of negligence; 81 Mo. 80; if there was none in starting it; 64 Miss. 661; 44 N. J. L. 280. As to setting fire and restraining it, the rule is that ordinary prudence, honest motives, in the one, and due diligence as to the other, exempt one from liability; 3 Ia. 80; and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff; 18 Me. 32. The same principles as a rule apply to fires generally as to those caused by locomotives when there is statutory authority for doing so.

Although it is well settled, both in this country and in England, that the right to operate a railroad includes the use of fire in locomotives; 93 Pa. 341; 140 N. Y. 308; and, if every reasonable precaution has been observed to prevent injury, the railroad company will not be liable; 114 N. Y. 11; 4 Md. 242; yet it must show the absence of negligence on its part, at least so far as concerns safety of construction and care in the operation of its locomotives, and the freedom of the track from combustibles (see infra); Webb, Poll. Torts 561, n.; 49 Fed. Rep. 807; 3 Houst. 447; 41 La. Ann. 96; 86 Mich. 615. In some states this burden is put upon the company by statute; 39 Md. 115; 50 Ia. 338; 63 Ill. 95; and in others by decisions adopting the rule; 58 Mo. 498; 44 N. J. L. 247; 90 N. C. 374; 4 Neb. 268; 14 Cal. 387; in other states the plaintiff must fix upon defendant both the origin of the fire, and negligence in one of the points referred to; 36 Ia. 121; 31 Ind. 143; 142 N. Y. 11; 91 U. S. 454. But the owner is, in the absence of statute, held to the duty of ordinary care, and his negligence will defeat recovery; 44 Mich. 169; 90 Ill. 586; or if the spreading of the fire was due to the negligence of the servants of the owner there is no liability; 69 Miss. 139. It has been held that the fact that fire has been communicated by a passing locomotive is prima facie evidence of negligence; 4 U. S. App. 427; 85 Mo. 178; 36 Neb. 189; 66 Hun 632; 62 Miss. 383; 42 Ill. App. 527; 22 Fed. Rep. 811. See 11 L. R. A. 506, note. The company must exercise as great a degree of care to protect the public from injury by fire as is required in favor of its patrons; 67 Hun 469; and the failure to provide the best appliances to prevent injury to property by fire is want of ordinary care; 44 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 423; contra, 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 280; but the rule is that the company is only bound to exercise due care with respect to providing the best appliances; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 846; 140 N. Y. 308; 142 id. 11; and compliance with a statute requiring a guard against the emission of sparks, except during certain months, does not exempt the company from the exercise of that care to which they are bound in law, to avoid injuring the property of their neighbor; 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 378.

A question, the settlement of which has caused much litigation, was whether a railroad company was liable for damage to property not adjoining the track, nor set on fire directly from the locomotive, but by the spreading of the fire from the property first ignited. The rule now firmly established is that the company is liable for such injury naturally and by the ordinary course of events resulting from the fire started by the locomotive; 38 N. H. 242; 62 Conn. 331; 42 Me. 579; 98 Mass. 414; 107 id. 494; even where the property was at a considerable distance from the track; C. P. 98; s. c. 6 id. 14; 30 Mich. 181; or if several owners intervene; 13 Metc. 99.

The stubborn resistance to the establishment of this rule and its extended discussion by the courts of so many jurisdictions would be surprising but that it is readily accounted for by the fact that early decisions in New York and Pennsylvania were made the basis of strong contention against it in every state when the question first arose. Ryan v. N. Y. C. R. Co., 35 N. Y. 210, and Pa. R. R. Co. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353, where the cases relied upon to sustain the position that where the fire communicated from the sparks to a house near the track, and thence extended to another at a distance, the company was not liable for the loss of the latter, notwithstanding its negligence in allowing the sparks to escape. In the New York case it was determined that the negligence was too remote, and the injury not the natural and probable result; but later in the same court, in an action against a railroad company for fire, resulting from the ignition of a tie by coal from a locomotive, an effort was made to distinguish the case, and it was held that the question of proximate cause was properly left to the jury; 49 N. Y. 420. It was further shaken (usually upon the idea of distinguishing it), in 56 id. 300; 99 id. 158; and its weight as authority practically ended by 115 id. 579; and 118 N. Y. 224.

The Pennsylvania case was also "distinguished" in a case in which the same court held that where sparks from an engine fired a railroad tie and it resulted in burning two fields and fences, the proximity of the cause is a question for the jury, who must determine whether the facts constituted a continuous succession of events so linked as to be a natural whole, or whether the chain is so broken as to become independent, and the final result cannot be said to be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence of the defendants, and that it might and ought to have been foreseen under the circumstances; 80 Pa. 373; but Pa. R. R. Co. v. Kerr was expressly approved and followed in a later case in which damage by a fire, spread by burning oil carried by a running stream, was held too remote, and the stream was considered to be an intervening agent; in this case the court said that the facts were ascertained and there was nothing to put to the jury, and on this theory it was distinguished from the case in 80 Pa. This case had what the chancellor of New Jersey termed substantially its counterpart in that state, in a claim for damages against a receiver operating a railroad, and strong disapproval of the Pennsylvania case and the earlier case in New York was expressed. The stream was considered similar to other material forces, and a natural link in the chain of causation, and the receiver was held liable, the rule as applied being thus stated: "When a fire originates in the negligence of a defendant, and is carried by a material force, whether it be the wind, the law of gravitation, combustible matter existing in a state of nature, or other means, to the plaintiff's property and destroys it, and it appears that no object intervened between the point where the fire started and the injury, which would have prevented the injury, if due care had been taken, the defendant is legally answerable for the loss;" 32 N. J. Eq. 647. The only point which suggested difficulty in applying to this class of cases the general doctrine of liability for the result of negligence is brought out with distinctness in the different views taken by the Pennsylvania and New Jersey courts of cases precisely similar as to the facts, and that difference may be considered as concerning rather the doctrine of proximate cause than as having special relation to fires from locomotives.

The cases in 35 N. Y. 214 and 62 Pa. 353 are said to "stand alone" and to be "in conflict with every English or American case as yet reported"; 59 Ill. 349; "much shaken" and "each qualified and explained in its own jurisdiction, by later decisions so as to take from its weight"; 62 Conn. 331; and finally the United States supreme court, speaking through a Pennsylvania justice says of the two cases: "Those cases have been the subject of much criticism since they were decided; and it may, perhaps, be doubted whether they have always been understood. If they were intended to assert the doctrine that when a building has been set on fire through the negligence of a party, and a second building has been fired from the first, it is a conclusion of law that the owner of the second has no recourse to the negligent wrong-doer, they have not been accepted as authority for such doctrine, even in the states where the decisions were made." Strong, J., in 94 U. S. 460, 474, citing 49 N. Y. 420 and 80 Pa. 373; and cases contra of other states.

The result is to settle the rule as stated that, whether the fire is traceable to its negligence directly or indirectly, the company is liable when the fire started by its locomotive was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, and this applies as well to the class of cases hereafter noted in this title. The application of the doctrine is illustrated by a very recent case which held that when the fire negligently set was carried by moderately high wind, though not unusual, the wind was not the proximate cause, and the company was liable; 2 Kan. App. 319. When the fire is communicated indirectly, the question as to what is the proximate cause of the injury is ordinarily not one of science or of legal knowledge, but of fact for the jury to determine, in view of the accompanying circumstances; 94 U. S. 469; 59 Ill. 349; 71 id. 572; 39 Md. 115; 40 N. J. L. 299; 50 Cal. 578; 53 Mo. 366; 16 Kan. 262; and, notwithstanding the earlier cases discussed supra; 143 N. Y. 182; and 90 Pa. 122.

A railroad company has the right to keep its right of way free from combustibles by burning off grass, etc., but in such case it is bound at its peril to keep such fire within bounds; 110 Ind. 538. See 11 L. R. A. 506, note. Indeed, though not an insurer, the railroad company must keep its track reasonably clear of such danger; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 365; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 421; 33 Fla. 406; 105 Mass. 199; 39 N. J. L. 209 (but see 34 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 953); and is liable for damages from fire, caused by its negligence with respect to a fire which spreads from the track; 115 N. C. 667; and the care exercised in constructing and operating the engine is no defence; 57 Ill. App. 69; 54 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 779; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 264; nor is the diligence of the company in attempting to quench the fire; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1129; it is for the jury to determine the question of negligence or care with respect to allowing weeds to grow on the right of way; 75 Va. 499; 58 Wis. 335; or the time and manner of setting and guarding the fire; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.)

647; the company must exercise ordinary care which is proportioned to, and measured by, the amount of danger, and is liable for the want of it; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1052; such fire if started for a lawful purpose is itself no evidence of negligence, which must be proved by the person complaining; 60 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 69; nor is unlawful speed of a train unless the fire would not otherwise have occurred; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 834.

It has been held that when a fire is caused by the sparks of a locomotive, communicating with dried grass which a railroad company has permitted to accumulate in the line of its track, and thence spreading to the property of an adjacent land-owner, it is a question for a jury whether the company was guilty of negligence, irrespective of any question as to negligence or omission of duty on the part of the land-owner; 26 Wisc. 223; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 69; 40 Cal. 14; s. c. 6 Am. Rep. 595; contra, 54 Ill. 504; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 155; 11 W. Va. 14; 12 So. Rep. (Miss.) 156. Direct evidence of the accumulation of such inflammable material was held sufficient evidence of defendant's liability; 29 Minn. 58; 74 N. C. 377; 92 Ill. 437; but allowing such accumulation is not negligence per se, unless such as a prudent man having regard to the same hazard would not permit; 30 Ia. 78; 87 Ind. 198; and there must be a connection between the negligence and the injury and no intervening cause (such as in this case a high wind carrying a burning brand over a ridge to a marsh adjoining plaintiff's); 79 Wis. 140.

Generally the accumulation of inflammable material near the track is contributory negligence; 42 Neb. 105; 63 Tex. 57; but it is not so to permit the natural growth of stubble and grass to remain; 87 Mo. 117; nor to deposit wood near the track under a contract with the company; 57 Ind. 150; erecting a wooden building near a railroad track is not negligence per se; 94 Ky. 71; but the owner assumes the risks incident thereto, and cannot recover if it is burned without fault on the part of the company; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 365. In Indiana a plaintiff must not only aver freedom from fault but absence on his part of contributory negligence; 96 Ind. 40, 62. And what is termed the Illinois negligence rule is: where fire is ignited on the right of way of a railroad, by reason of an accumulation of grass left there, and communicated to the adjoining field by the negligence of the owner in not keeping it free from combustible materials, the owner cannot recover for the injury thereby occasioned, unless the negligence of the company is greater than his own; 54 Ill. 504.

In many states statutes have been passed making railroad companies absolutely liable for damage caused by fires from locomotives, and such statutes have been almost uniformly held to be constitutional; 105 Mass. 199; 145 id. 129; 37 Me. 92; 85 id. 502; 54 Conn. 447. In two very recent cases the United States supreme court held that such a statute does not violate the constitution of the United States, as depriving the company of property without due process of law, or as denying it the equal protection of the laws, or as impairing the obligation of the contract made between the state and the company by its incorporation under general laws imposing no such liability; 165 U. S. 1; id. 27. Such statutes apply to property not adjoining the right of way, if set on fire by intervening property ignited by the locomotive; 62 id. 340; 41 S. C. 86; 2 Colo. App. 159; and are not void as interfering with the federal jurisdiction over interstate commerce; 63 N. H. 25; 16 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 429. In Iowa it was held that the company was prima facie liable; 50 Ia. 340. Under such a statute imposing absolute liability contributory negligence is not a defence; 25 L. R. A. (Mo.) 161; and the company is liable for the spreading of the fire even when the person whose property was first set on fire requested the railroad men to let it burn, as he wished to burn up the bogs; 52 Conn. 264. See 25 L. R. A. 161.

As to liability for damages from fires by reason of the failure to furnish water to extinguish them, see WATER.

FIRE AND SWORD. Letters of fire and sword were the ancient means for dispossessing a tenant who retained possession contrary to the order of the judge and diligence of the law. They were directed to the sheriff, and ordered him to call the assistance of the county to dispossess the tenant. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. lib. iv. tit. 3, § 17.

FIRE-ARM. An instrument used in the propulsion of shot, shell, or bullets by the action of gunpowder exploded within it.

In 1637 a royal charter was granted to the gun-makers of London empowering them to search for, prove, and mark hand guns, pistols, etc., and by the statutes of 1818 and 1835 the proving of all fire-arms was made compulsory. These statutes have been superseded by the gun-barrel proof act 31 and 32 Vict., which regulates the duties and powers of the London and Birmingham proof-houses, and which makes the forging or counterfeiting of proof-marks or stamps, and the selling, or having in possession for the purpose of sale, of fire-arms bearing such forged or counterfeited mark or stamp, a misdemeanor.

As to what constitutes a fire-arm, the decisions have been somewhat conflicting. A pistol so dilapidated that it could not be discharged by the trigger has been held to be a firearm and a deadly weapon; 53 Ala. 508; so where the mainspring was so disabled as not to allow it to be discharged in the regular way; 61 Ga. 417; but not so where the weapon could not be discharged by a cap on the tube; 46 Ala. 88. The separate parts of a pistol found on the offender's person was held a fire-arm; 62 id. 3. See ARMS; WEAPON.

FIRE-ESCAPE. An apparatus constructed to afford a safe and convenient method of escape from a burning building.

Regulations have been enacted in most of the states, often by municipal ordinances, providing that all factories, hotels, schools, buildings, theatres, hospitals, public buildings, and flat or tenement houses shall be equipped with safe and suitable means of escape in case of fire. Such regulations are of a highly penal character, and are to be strictly construed; 105 Pa. 222; 106 id. 321; 15 R. I. 112. They are not of such a character as to interfere with the use and enjoyment of private property; 10 Daly 377.

The original duty to provide fire-escapes rests with the owner or proprietor; 78 N. Y. 310; 58 Hun 376; and the fact that he has erected them in compliance with the statute will not exempt him from providing additional ones when ordered so to do; 10 Daly 377; but in some states it has been held that when the real owner has leased his premises the tenant in actual occupancy and possession, who places his operatives in a position of danger and enjoys the benefit of their services, becomes responsible under the law; 105 Pa. 222; 106 id. 321; 42 Ohio St. 438; (contra, 16 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 750.) But these cases seem to place the question of liability more on the ground of the relation of master and servant, it being held that as an absolute duty is laid upon the owner by statute, a servant sustaining an injury by breach of such duty may maintain an action on the case for such injury; 70 N. Y. 126; 11 R. I. 451. A building becomes a public nuisance if not supplied with such appliances as required by statute; 16 Abb. 195. And the mere relation of landlord and tenant will not bar the action; 78 N. Y. 310. It is not the duty of the tenant to search for defects and report them to the owner; id.; nor will the owner be permitted to wait until he is officially directed to provide fire-escapes; id.; 58 Hun 376; although no such obligation existed at common law; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 393; 131 N. Y. 90; 126 Mass. 84; 30 Am. Rep. 661.

They must be reasonably secure, although they need not be the best that can be devised; 131 N. Y. 90; and the number required depends on the size of the building, the number of employees, and the inflammable character of the materials there used; 61 Hun 254; having erected a reasonably safe fire-escape, the owner is not responsible if a fire cuts off access to it; 106 Pa. 321. See Thomas, Negl. 772; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 660; NEGLIGENCE.

FIRE INSURANCE. A contract to indemnify the insured for loss or damage, occasioned by fire, during a specified period. Flanders, Fire Ins. 17. See INSURANCE.

FIRE ORDEAL. See ORDEAL.

FIRE POLICY. See INSURANCE; POLICY.

FIRE-PROOF. Incombustible; not in danger from the action of fire.

A statement that a building is fire-proof necessarily excludes the idea that it is of wood, and necessarily implies that it is constructed of some substance fitted for the erection of fire-proof buildings. The characterization of one portion of a building as fire-proof suggests a comparison with other portions of the same building, and warrants the conclusion that the specified portion is different from the remainder; 102 N. Y. 459; 7 N. E. Rep. 321. In an insurance policy, a condition that books be kept in a fire-proof safe is complied with if the safe be of the kind commonly regarded as fire-proof; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 82. The insured does not by this clause warrant his safe to preserve the books; id. Such a clause, commonly called the iron-safe clause, is a warranty the breach of which avoids the policy; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 218; 31 id. 321; but not when the stipulation was inserted by fraud without knowledge of the insured; 84 Ga. 759. See INSURANCE.

FIRE RAISING. In Scotch Law. The wilfully setting on fire buildings, growing or stored cereals, growing wood, or coalheughs. Ersk. Pr. 577. See ARSON.

FIRE-WORKS. A contrivance of inflammable and explosive materials combined of various proportions for the purpose of producing in combustion beautiful or amusing scenic effects, or to be used as a night signal on land or sea, or for various purposes in war. Cent. Dict.

Percussion caps for signalling railway trains are held to be explosive preparations, although the court considered they were not "fireworks" as the latter term is known to commerce; 3 B. & S. 128. Under a clause in an insurance policy forbidding the keeping of gunpowder, fireworks are not prohibited; 66 Cal. 178. See INSURANCE; RISKS AND PERILS; CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR.

FIREBARE. A beacon or high tower by the seaside, wherein are continual lights, either to direct sailors in the night, or to give warning of the approach of an enemy. Cowell.

FIREBOTE. An allowance of wood or estovers to maintain competent firing for the tenant. A sufficient allowance of wood to burn in a house. 1 Washb. R. P. 99. Tenant for life or years is entitled to it; 2 Bla. Com. 35. Cutting more than is needed for present use is waste; 3 Dane, Abr. 238; 8 Pick. 312; Cro. Eliz. 593; 7 Bingham. 640. The rules in England and in this country are different in relation to the kind of trees which the tenant may cut; 7 Pick. 152; 7 Johns. 227; 6 Barb. 9; 2 Zab. 521; 2 Ohio St. 180; 13 Pa. 438; 3 Leon. 16.

FIRKIN. A measure of capacity, equal to nine gallons. The word firkin is also used to designate a weight, used for butter and cheese, of fifty-six pounds avoirdupois.

FIRLOT. A Scotch measure of capacity containing two gallons and a pint. Spelman.

FIRM. The persons composing a partnership, taken collectively.

The name or title under which the members of a partnership transact business.

The word is used as synonymous with partnership. The words "house," "concern," and "company" are also used in the same sense. This name is in point of law conventional, and applicable only to the persons who, on each particular occasion when the name is used, are members of the firm. A firm is usually described, in legal proceedings, as certain persons trading or carrying on business under and using the name, style, and firm of, etc. See 9 Q. B. 361; 9 M. & W. 347; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 49.

The firm name is part of the good will of a partnership, and where, on a dissolution, one of the partners transfers to the others all his interest in the firm business and assets, with the understanding that they are to succeed to the business, the retiring partner cannot use the firm name in a business of like kind carried on in the vicinity; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 88.

It may be that the names of all the members of the partnership appear in the name or style of the firm, or that the names of only a part appear, with the addition of "and company," or other words indicating a participation of others, as partners, in the business; 16 Pick. 428; or that the name of only one of the partners, without such addition, is the name of the firm. It sometimes happens that the name of neither of the partners appears in the style of the firm; 9 M. & W. 284. In New York, Georgia, and Louisiana, no partner is permitted to transact business in the name of a person not interested in the firm. A. & E. Encyc.

The proper style of the firm is frequently agreed upon in the partnership articles; and where this is the case, it becomes the duty of every partner, in signing papers for the firm, to employ the exact name agreed upon; Colly. Partn. § 215; Story, Partn. § 202. This may be necessary, not only to bind the firm itself; Story, Partn. § 102; but also to prevent the partner signing from incurring a personal liability both to third persons and to his copartners; Story, Partn. §§ 102, 202; 2 Jac. & W. 268; 11 Ad. & E. 339; Pothier, Partn. nn. 100, 101. Where persons associate themselves together and carry on business under a common name, and the association is not a corporation, they may be regarded as partners, whatever name they may have adopted; 4 Ind. App. 20.

So, the name which a partnership assume, recognize, and publicly use becomes the legitimate name and style of the firm, not less so than if it had been adopted by the articles of copartnership; 2 Pet. 186, 198; 21 Md. 538; and a partner has no implied authority to bind the firm by any other than the firm name thus acquired; 9 M. & W. 284; 35 S. C. 572; 48 Ga. 570; 51 Wis. 170. Wherefore, where a firm consisted of J B & C H, the partnership name being J B only, and C H accepted a bill in the name of "J B & Co.," it was held that J B was not bound thereby; 9 M. & W. 284. See Daves 325.

If the firm have no fixed name, a signing by one, in the name of himself and company, will bind the partnership; 2 Ohio 61; 57 Ga. 36; and a note in the name of one, and signed by him "For the firm, etc.," will bind the company; 5 Blackf. 99. Where the business of a firm is to be carried on in the name of B & D, a signature of a note by the names and surnames of the respective parties is a sufficient signature to charge the partnership; 3 C. B. 792. Where a written contract is made in the name of one, and another is a secret partner with him, both may be sued upon it; 2 Ala. 134; 5 Watts 454.

Where partners agree that their business shall be conducted in the name of one person, whether himself interested in the partnership business or not, that is the partnership name, and the partners are bound by it; 6 Hill 322; 1 Denio 405, 471, 481; 50 Ark. 62. By agreement among themselves, the individual names of partners, or of any one of them, may be used to bind the firm and create obligations good against the partnership; 73 Wis. 70. Where the name used is the name of one of the partners, and he does business also on his own private account, a contract signed by that name will not bind the firm, unless it appears to have been entered into for the firm; but, if there be no proof that the contract was made for the firm, the presumption will be that it was made by the partner on his own separate account, and the firm will not be responsible; Story, Partn. § 139; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. 76; 5 Pick. 11; 1 Du. N. Y. 405; 17 S. & R. 165; 5 Mass. 176; 5 Pet. 529. See PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

The name of the firm should be distinct from the names of all other firms. When there is confusion in this respect, the partners composing one firm may, in some cases, be made responsible for the debts of another. See Peake, Cas. 80; 7 East 210; 2 Bell, Comm. 670; 3 Mart. La. N. s. 39; Pars. Partn. 120. As to the right of a surviving partner to carry on the business in the name of the firm, see 7 Sim. 127; Story, Partn. § 100, n.; Colly. Partn. § 162, n.

Merchants and lawyers have different notions respecting the nature of a firm. Merchants are in the habit of looking upon a firm as a body distinct from the members composing it; Lindl. Partn. 213; 39 La. Ann. 362; 14 Fed. Rep. 615. See 64 Ga. 243; 77 Ind. 361; 64 Ia. 261. The law looks to the partners themselves; any change among them destroys the identity of the firm; what is called the property of the firm is their property, and what are called the debts and liabilities of the firm are their debts and their liabilities. In point of law, a partner may be the debtor or creditor of his copartners; but he cannot be either debtor or creditor of the firm of which he is himself a member; 4 Mylne & C. 171.

A firm can neither sue nor be sued, otherwise than in the name of the partners composing it; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. 76. Consequently, no action can be brought by the firm against one of its partners, nor by one of its partners against it; for in any such action one person at least would appear both as plaintiff and defendant, and it is considered absurd for any person to sue himself, even in form: 1 B. & Ald. 664; 4 Mylne & C. 171; 6 Taunt. 598; 6 Pick. 320; 5 Gilt & J. 487. For the same reason, one firm cannot bring an action against another if there be one or more persons partners in both firms; 6 Taunt. 597; 2 B. & P. 120; unless by statute: as in Pennsylvania, by the act of April 14, 1838.

An appeal or writ of error taken in the name of a firm and not giving the names of the individuals comprising it will be dismissed, and the defect cannot be amended: 11 Wall. 86; 21 How. 393; 22 id. 87.

Whenever a firm is spoken of by its name or style, the courts admit evidence to show what persons did in fact constitute the firm at the time in question; 6 Taunt. 15; 4 Maule & S. 13; 3 Keen 255. If persons trade or carry on business under a name, style, or firm, whatever may be done by them under that name is binding as much as if real names had been used; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 707; 2 C. & P. 296; 2 Campb. 548.

Any change in the persons composing a firm is productive of a new signification of the name. If, therefore, a legacy is left to a firm, it is a legacy to those who compose it at the time the legacy vests; see 2 Keen 255; 3 Mylne & C. 507; 7 De G. M. & G. 673; and if a legacy is left to the representatives of an old firm, it will be payable to the executors of the survivors of the partners constituting the firm alluded to, and not to its successors in business; 11 Ir. Eq. 451; 1 Lindl. Partn. 216. Where a creditor takes a note made by one partner in the firm name after its dissolution, whereby the time of payment of a firm debt is extended, the other party is discharged from liability; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 280. Again, an authority given to a firm of two partners cannot, it would seem, be exercised by them and a third person afterwards taken into partnership with them; 6 Bing. N. C. 201. See 4 Ad. & E. 832; 16 Sim. 121; 7 Hare 351; 4 Ves. 649.

A name may be a trade-mark; and, if it is, the use of it by others will be illegal, if they pass off themselves or their own goods for the firm or the goods of the firm whose name is made use of; 2 Keen 218; 4 K. & J. 747. Moreover, if this is done intentionally, the illegality will not be affected by the circumstance that the imitators of the trade-mark are themselves of the same name as those whose mark they imitate; 13 Beav. 209; 3 De G. M. & G. 896.

Where one partner acts for the firm in demanding illegal charges and detains goods until they are paid, every member of the firm is liable for damages; 130 N. Y. 340.

An action by a firm may be defeated by a defence founded on the conduct of one of the partners. If one member of a firm is guilty of a fraud in entering into a contract on behalf of the firm, his fraud may be relied on as a defence to an action on the contract brought by him and his co-partners; for their innocence does not purge his guilt. See Ry. & M. 178; 2 Beav. 128; 10 id. 523; 3 Drew. 3; 9 B. & C. 241. The above rule seems not to rest upon the ground that the act of the one partner is imputable to the firm; Pars. (Jas.) Part. 139; it governs when the circumstances are such as to exclude the doctrine of agency. Thus, if a partner pledges partnership property, and in so doing clearly acts beyond the limits of his authority, still, as he cannot dispute the validity of his own act, he and his copartners cannot recover the property so pledged by an action at law; 5 Exch. 489. So, although a partner has no right to pay his own separate debt by setting off against it a debt due from his creditor to the firm, yet if he actually agrees that such set-off shall be made, and it is made accordingly, he and his copartners cannot afterwards in an action recover the debt due to the firm; 7 M. & W. 204; 9 B. & C. 532; 1 Lindl. Partn. 169, 170; 1 Maule & S. 751. When a partner executing a firm note waives exemptions, and signs the firm name, the waiver is confined to the partner signing; 94 Ala. 626. An individual note given by a partner, and indorsed by him in the firm name without authority, in satisfaction of a debt which the creditor knows to be that of the individual, is not enforceable by the latter against the firm; 18 N. Y. Sup. 867.

If a person becomes surety to a firm, it is important to ascertain whether he clearly contemplated changes in the firm, and agreed to become surety to a fluctuating body, or not. If he did, his liability is not discharged by any change among the members constituting the partnership at the time he became surety; 10 B. & C. 122; 5 B. & Ald. 261; but if no such intention can be shown, then a contract of suretyship entered into with a firm will be deemed to be binding so long only as the firm remains unchanged, and consequently any change in it, whether by the death or the retirement of a partner; 7 Hare 50; 3 Q. B. 703; 10 Ad. & E. 30; or by the introduction of a new partner; 2 W. Bla. 934; immediately puts an end to the surety's liability so far as subsequent events are concerned. In all such cases the surety's position and risk are altered, and, whether he has in fact been damnified by the change or not, he has a right to say, non in hæc fœdera veni. Similar doctrines apply to cases where a person becomes surety for the conduct of a firm; 5 M. & W. 580. See 6 Q. B. 514; 4 B. & P. 34; 3 Cl. & F. 214; 1 Lindl. Partn. 172-174; De G. 300; 2 Rose 239, 328; 4 Dow. & C. 426.

FIRM NAME. The name or title of a firm in business. See FIRM.

FIRMA (L. Lat.). A farm or rent reserved on letting lands, anciently frequently reserved in provisions. Spelman, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.

A banquet; supper; provisions for the table. Du Cange.

A tribute or custom paid towards entertaining the king for one night. Domesday; Cowel.

A rent reserved to be paid in money, called then alba firma (white rents, money rents). Spelman, Gloss.

A lease. A letting. Ad firmam tradidi (I have farm let). Spelman, Gloss.

A messuage with the house, garden, or lands, etc., connected therewith. Co. Litt. 5 a; Shepp. Touchst. 93. See FARM.

FIRMA FEODI (L. Lat.). Fee-farm. See FEODI-FIRMA.

FIRMAN. A passport granted by the Great Mogul to captains of foreign vessels to trade within the territories over which he has jurisdiction; a permit.

FIRMARATIO. The right of a tenant to his lands and tenements. Cowel.

FIRMARIUM. A place in monasteries and elsewhere where the poor were received and supplied with food. Spelman.

FIRMARIUS (L. Lat.). A fermor. A lessee of a term. Firmarii comprehend all such as hold by lease for life or lives or for year, by deed or without deed. Co. 2d Inst. 144, 145; 1 Washb. R. P. 107; 8 Pick. 312; 7 Ad. & E. 637.

FIRMITAS. In English Law. An assurance of some privilege, by deed or charter.

FIRMLY. Where a statute requires an affidavit that an appellant from an award of a board of arbitrators "firmly believes injustice has been done," it is not sufficient to express belief, omitting the word firmly. The word is a strong expression intended to put the affiant on his guard. It cannot be dispensed with without substituting something equal to it in substance; as to what shall be so considered, there may be liberal construction. Verily is as strong a word as firmly, and is sufficient; 4 S. & R. 134.

FIRMURA. Liberty to scour and repair a mill-dam, and carry away the soil, etc. Blount.

FIRST. In a will the word "first" may not import precedence of one bequest over another. 59 Me. 330; 57 id. 523.

FIRST-CLASS. Occupying the highest standing in a particular classification. In a contract for "first-class" work, it is for the jury to decide as to whether the terms were substantially complied with; 67 Hun 632.

FIRST-CLASS MATTER. Matter received at the United States post-offices, in writing or sealed against inspection.

FIRST-CLASS MISDEMEANANT. Under the Prisons Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, s. 67) prisoners in the county, city, and borough prisons convicted of misdemeanor and not sentenced to hard labor, are divided into two classes, one of which is called the first division; and it is in the discretion of the court to order that such a prisoner be treated as a misdeemeanant of the first division, usually called "first-class misdeemeanant," and as such not to be deemed a criminal prisoner, i. e. a prisoner convicted of a crime.

FIRST FRUITS. The first year's whole profits of the spiritual preferments. There were three valuations (valor beneficii) at different times, according to which these first fruits were estimated, made in 1253, 1288, and 1318. A final valuation was made by the 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3.

They now form a perpetual fund, called Queen Anne's bounty, the income of which is used for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 284, and notes; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 260.

FIRST IMPRESSION (Lat. prima impressionis). First examination. First presentation to a court for examination or decision. A cause which presents a new question for the first time, and for which, consequently, there is no precedent applicable in all respects, is said to be a case of the first impression. Austin, Jur. sect. xxv. ad fin.

FIRST PURCHASER. In the English law of descent, the first purchaser was he who first acquired an estate in a family which still owns it. A purchase of this kind signifies any mode of acquiring an estate, except by descent. 2 Bla. Com. 220.

FISC. In Civil Law. The treasury of a prince; the public treasury. 1 Low. C. 361.

Hence, to confiscate a thing is to appropriate it to the fisc. Paillet, Droit Public, 21, n., says that fiscus, in the Roman law, signified the treasure of the prince, and ævarium the treasure of the state. But this distinction was not observed in France. See Law 10, ff. De jure Fisci.

FISCAL. Belonging to the fisc, or public treasury. A fiscal agent does not necessarily imply a depositary of the public funds, so as, by the simple use of it in a statute without any directions in this respect to make it the duty of the state treasurer to deposit with him any moneys in the treasury; 27 La. Ann. 29.

FISH. An animal which inhabits the water, breathes by means of gills, swims by the aid of fins, and is oviparous.

Fishes in rivers and in the sea are considered as animals feræ naturæ; consequently, no one has any property in them until they have been captured; and, like other wild animals, if, having been taken, they escape and regain their liberty, the captor loses his property in them.

FISH ROYAL. A whale, porpoise, or sturgeon thrown ashore on the coast of England belonged to the king as a branch of his prerogative. Hence these fish are termed royal fish. Hale, De Jure Mar. pt. 1, c. 7; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 290; Plowd. 305; Bracton, l. 3, c. 3.

FISHERY. A place prepared for catching fish with nets or hooks. This is commonly applied to the place of drawing a seine or net. 1 Whart. 131.

A common of fishery is not an exclusive right, but one enjoyed in common with certain other persons. 3 Kent 329.

A free fishery is said to be a franchise in the hands of a subject, existing by grant or prescription, distinct from an ownership in the soil. It is an exclusive right, and applies to a public navigable river, without any right in the soil. 3 Kent 329.

A several fishery is one by which the party claiming it has the right of fishing, independently of all other, so that no person can have a coextensive right with him in the object claimed; but a partial and independent right in another, or a limited liberty, does not derogate from the right of the owner. 5 Burr. 2814.

A distinction has been made between a common fishery (commune piscarium), which may mean for all mankind, as in the sea, and a common of fishery (communium piscarie), which is a right, in common with certain other persons, in a particular stream. 8 Taunt. 183. Angell seems to think that common of fishery and free fishery are convertible terms. Law of Watercourses, c. 6, ss. 3, 4.

Woolrych says that sometimes a free fishery is confounded with a several, sometimes it is said to be synonymous with common, and again it is treated as distinct from either. Law of Waters, etc., 97.

A several fishery, as its name imports, is an exclusive property; this, however, is not to be understood as depriving the territorial owner of his right to a several fishery when he grants to another person permission to fish; for he would continue to be the several proprietor, although he should suffer a stranger to hold a coextensive right with himself. Woolf. Wat. 96.

These distinctions in relation to several, free, and common of fishery are not strongly marked, and the lines are sometimes scarcely perceptible. "Instead of going into the black-letter books to learn what was a fishery, and a free fishery, and a several fishery," says Huston, J., "I am disposed to regard our own acts, even though differing from old feudal law." 1 Whart. 132.

The right of fishery is to be considered with reference to navigable waters and to waters not navigable; meaning, by the former, those in which the tide ebbs and flows; by the latter, those in which it does not. By the common law of England the fisheries in all the navigable waters of the realm belong to the crown by prerogative, in such way, nevertheless, as to be common to all the subjects: so that an individual claiming an exclusive fishery in such waters must show it strictly by grant or prescription. In that country navigable waters meant tide waters, but different conditions have resulted in the application of the rule cessat ratio cessat lex, and while the same principle is recognized that navigable waters belong to the state and non-navigable ones to the riparian proprietor, the recognition of tide-water as the test of navigability is abandoned. See NAVIGABLE WATERS.

In rivers not navigable the fisheries belong to the owners of the soil or to the riparian proprietors; 2 Bla. Com. 39; Gould, Wat. 42, 48; Hale, De Jure Mar. c. 4; 1 Mod. 105; 4 Burr. 2162; Dav. 155; 7 Co. 16 a; Plowd. 154 a. In such rivers the owner of the adjoining soil has an exclusive right of fishery in front of his land to the thread of the river, except so far as this right has been qualified by legislative regulation; but this right is limited to the taking of fish, and does not carry with it the right to prevent the passage of fish to lakes and ponds for breeding purpose; 5 Pick. 99. The common-law doctrine accepting the tide-water test of navigability has been declared to be the law in several of the United States; 17 Johns. 195; 20 id. 90; 3 N. H. 321; 1 Pick. 180; 5 id. 199; 5 Day 72; 1 Baldw. 60; 5 Mas. 191; 5 Harr. & J. 193; 2 Conn. 481; 103 Mass. 446, 447; 37 Me. 472. But in some states, as Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and South Carolina, the right of fishery in the great rivers of those states, though not tide-waters, is held to be vested in the state and open to all the world; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. & R. 71; 1 M'Cord 580; 3 Ired. 277; 34 Ohio 492. See 89 Pa. 346; 75 Hun 472. This modification of the common-law doctrine has been applied not to the abandonment of the distinction between the public and private rights of fisheries as affected by navigability, but to the establishment of a different test of navigability, made necessary by the difference of physical conditions in the two countries already alluded to. So in the leading Pennsylvania case the point of the decision was that neither the quality of fresh or salt water, nor the flux or reflux of the tide, would determine whether a river should be considered navigable or not; 2 Binn. 475. After changing the test of navigability, these cases applied the rule of the public character of streams actually navigable which had been in England determined by the mere test of tide water. See 7 Pet. 320; 60 Pa. 339.

In this country each state has the exclusive control of fisheries in the tide waters and beds of tide waters within its jurisdiction, subject to the paramount right of navigation; 139 U. S. 240; 94 id. 391. This right is said by Cooley to be "considered as pertaining to the state by virtue of an authority existing in every sovereign, and which is called the eminent domain. Some of these rights are complete without any action on the part of the state, as is the case with . . . the rights of fishery in public waters." Cooley, Const. Lim. 651, 524. The jurisdiction of a state is coextensive with its territory, coextensive with its legislative powers, and within what are generally recognized as the territorial limits of a state, by the law of nations, a state can define its boundaries on the sea and the boundaries of its counties; 3 Wheat. 386; within its limits a state has authority to regulate the time and manner of the taking of fish by the public in the waters therein; 1 Metc. 95; 20 Pick. 186; 24 Me. 482; 75 id. 597; and so far as public and common rights are concerned, the state has control over fisheries; 35 Me. 118.

The control of fisheries to the extent of at least a marine league from the shore belongs to the nation on whose coast the fisheries are prosecuted. Bays wholly within the territory of a nation, not exceeding two marine leagues in width at the mouth, are within its territorial jurisdiction; 139 U. S. 240.

The fact that congress has never assumed control over fisheries is persuasive evidence that the right to control them remains in the state; 139 U. S. 240. In England it was held that the ownership of the crown in the bed of navigable waters is for the benefit of the subject, and cannot be used in any such manner to derogate from or interfere with the right of navigation, which belongs by law to all subjects of the realm; and that consequently the grantees of a particular portion, who occupied it for a fishery, could not be lawfully authorized to charge and collect anchorage dues from vessels anchoring therein; 20 C. B. N. s. 1.

By the award of the arbitrators under the treaty with Great Britain (27 Stat. L. 948), it was settled that the United States had no exclusive jurisdiction in Behring Sea outside the ordinary three-mile limit, and no right of property in, or protection over, the fur seals frequenting the islands of the United States when found outside of such three-mile limit. Therefore the act of March 2, 1889, declaring that Rev. St. sec. 1956, which forbids the killing of fur-bearing animals in Alaska and the waters thereof, shall apply to "all the dominion of the United States in the waters of Behring Sea," must be construed to mean the waters within three miles of the shores of Alaska; 75 Fed. Rep. 513.

Private or several fisheries in navigable waters may be established by the legislatures, or may, perhaps, be acquired by prescription clearly proved; 16 Pet. 369; 6 Cow. 369; 5 Ired. 118; 4 Md. 262; 10 Cush. 369; 39 Mich. 626; and in some of the United States there are such private fisheries, established during the colonial period, which are still held and enjoyed as such; as, in the Delaware; 1 Whart. 145; 1 Baldw. 76. The right of private fishery may exist not only in the riparian proprietor, but also in another who has acquired it by grant or otherwise; Co. Litt. 122 a, n. 7; Schultes, Aq. Rights 40; Ang. Waterc. 184; Gould, Wat. 183; 33 N. J. L. 223. But see 2 Salk. 637. Such a right is held subject to the use of the waters as a highway; Ang. Tide-Wat. 80; 1 South. 61; 1 Jones, N. C. 299; 1 Campb. 516; 1 Whart. 133; and to the free passage of the fish; 7 East 195; 1 Rice 447; 5 Pick. 199; 10 Johns. 236; 2 Cush. 251; 15 Me. 303. See as to right of fishery; 9 L. R. A. 236, 807; as to prescription to such rights; 14 id. 386; on land of another; 13 Am. St. Rep. 416.

The free right of fishery in navigable waters extends to the taking of shell-fish between high and low water-mark; 2 B. & P. 472; 5 Day 22; 37 Me. 472; 15 How. 132; 103 Mass. 217.

Oysters which have been taken, and have thus become private property, may be planted in a new place flowed by tide-water, and where there are none naturally, and yet remain the private property of the person planting them; 14 Wend. 42; 34 Barb. 592; 2 R. I. 434; 47 Hun 366. A state may pass laws prohibiting the citizens of other states from taking oysters within its territorial limits; 4 Wash. C. C. 371; 12 R. I. 385; 94 U. S. 391; Angell, Tide-Wat. 156. See 40 Fed. Rep. 625. The exclusive right to take oysters in a navigable bay cannot be acquired by prescription; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 650.

The preservation of game and fish is within the proper domain of the police power of a state; 152 U. S. 133. See as to river and lake fisheries, 14 Law Mag. & Rev. 4th 220; France and Canada; 15 id. 301; United States and Canada; 13 id. 282; 21 Am. L. Rev. 369, 431; 1 Rev. Crit. 38.

See, generally, 2 Bla. Com. 39; 3 Kent 409; Bacon, Abr. Prerogative; Schultes, Aq. Rights; Ang. Waterc. §§ 61-89; Washburn, Easements; Woolrych, Waters; Ang. Tidew. ch. 7; 23 Am. St. Rep. 837; 18 Myer, Fed. Dec. 208; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 355.

FISH COMMISSIONER.

The Act of February 9, 1871, provides for the appointment of a commissioner of fish and fisheries, with all necessary powers looking to the preservation and increase of food fishes throughout the country. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4395.

FISHERIES COMMISSION.

The relation of the United States with the British provinces on the Atlantic has been the subject of important negotiations. By the treaty of 1818, the United States have the right to fish on certain specified coasts of British America without reference to the distance from shore, while as to all other coasts they are excluded from fishing within three marine miles of the shore. The treaty of Washington of 1871 removes the three-mile restriction. Art. XIX. yields a corresponding right to all British subjects as to the Atlantic coasts of the United States north of the 39th parallel, and concedes to each nation the right to import, free of duty, fish and fish oils into the ports of the other. The treaty was to continue in operation for ten years, and further until two years' notice from either party. In Art. XXII. it is stated that the British government asserts that these provisions of the treaty would work greatly to her disadvantage. Provision was accordingly made, by the same article, for the appointment of a commission, which is known as the Fisheries Commission, to determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the United States. The tribunal, consisting of three members, met at Halifax, N. S., June 15, 1877, and the business sessions lasted from July 28 to November 23, 1877. The award was five and one-half million dollars in gold to Great Britain. The United States commissioner did not sign the award, stating that, "in his opinion the advantages accruing to Great Britain under the treaty of Washington are greater than those conferred on the United States. . . . He deemed it his duty to state further, that it is questionable whether it is competent for the board to make an award under the treaty, except with the unanimous consent of its members." See U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2505, 2506; 12 Am. Law Rev. 380.

FISHGARTH. A dam or weir in a river for taking fish. Cowel.

FISHING BANKS. A fishing ground of comparative shoal water in the sea. 21 Ore. 523.

FISHING-BILL. A term used in equity for a bill that seeks a discovery upon general, loose, and vague allegations. Story, Eq. Pl. § 325; on that ground alone, such a bill will be at once dismissed; 32 Fed. Rep. 263.

FISK. In Scotch Law. The revenue of the crown. Generally used of the personal estate of a rebel which has been forfeited to the crown. Bell, Dict.

FISTUCA (Lat.; spelled, also, festuca; called, otherwise, baculum, virga, fustis). The rod which was transferred, in one of the ancient methods of feoffment, to denote a transfer of the property in land. Spelman, Gloss. See FESTUCA.

FIT. Suitable; appropriate; conformable to a duty. Fit for cultivation refers to that condition of soil which will enable a farmer with a reasonable amount of skill to raise regularly and annually, by tillage, grain or other staple crops; 34 Cal. 581; 13 Ired. L. 37; 29 Kan. 596.

FIVE MILE ACT. An act of parliament passed in 1665, 17 Chas. II. c. 2, forbidding nonconformists who refused to take the oath of non-resistance to come within five miles of any corporation in which they had preached since the passing of the act of oblivion in 1660. This act was nullified by the toleration act of 1689.

FIX. To determine; to settle; 52 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 673. A constitutional provision to the effect that the general assembly shall fix the compensation of officers, means that it shall prescribe or "fix" the rule by which such compensation is to be determined. 18 Ohio 9.

FIXING BAIL. In Practice. Rendering absolute the liability of special bail.

The bail are fixed upon the issue of a ca. sa. (capias ad satisfaciendum) against the defendant; 2 N. & M'C. 569; 16 Johns. 117; 3 Harr. N. J. 9; 11 Tex. 15; and a return of non est thereto by the sheriff; 4 Day 1; 2 Bail. 492; 3 Rich. S. C. 145; 1 Vt. 276; 7 Leigh 371; made on the return-day; 2 Metc. Mass. 590; 1 Rich. S. C. 421; unless the defendant be surrendered within the time allowed ex gratia by the practice of the court; 3 Conn. 316; 9 S. & R. 24; 2 Johns. 101; 1 Dev. N. C. 91; 11 Gill & J. 92; 8 Cal. 552; 17 Ga. 88.

In New Hampshire, 1 N. H. 472; Massachusetts, 2 Mass. 485; Missouri, 69 Mo. 359; Tennessee, 5 Yerg. 183; and Texas, 7 Tex. App. 279; bail are not fixed till judgment on a sci. fa. is obtained against them, except the death of the defendant after a return of non est to an execution against him.

The death of the defendant after a return of non est by the sheriff prevents a surrender, and fixes the bail inevitably; 5 Binn. 332; 4 Johns. 407; 3 M'Cord 49; 4 Pick. 120; 4 N. H. 29; 12 Wheat. 604. See 1 Ov. 224; 1 Ohio 35; 2 Ga. 331.

In Georgia and North Carolina, bail are not fixed till judgment is obtained against them; 3 Dev. 155; 61 Ga. 197, 492. See BAIL.

FIXTURES. Personal chattels affixed to real estate, which may be severed and removed by the party who has affixed them, or by his personal representative, against the will of the owner of the freehold. There is much dispute among the authorities as to what is a proper definition. Bro. Fixt. 1; Tyler's Fixt. 35; 6 Am. L. Rev. 412, where various definitions are reviewed.

Anything fixed or attached to a building, and used in connection with it, movable or immovable. Whenever the appendage is of such a nature that it is not part and parcel of the building, but may be removed without injury to the building, then it is a movable fixture and does not pass with a conveyance of the freehold. If, however, it be so connected with the building, that it cannot be severed from it without injury to the building, then it is part of the realty and passes with the conveyance of the soil; 95 Ala. 77.

Questions frequently arise as to whether given appendages to a house or land are to be considered part of the real estate, or whether they are to be treated as personal property: the latter are movable, the former not.

The annexation may be actual or constructive. 1st, By actual annexation is understood every mode by which a chattel can be joined or united to the freehold. The article must not be merely laid upon the ground; it must be fastened, fixed, or set into the land, or into some such erection as is unquestionably a part of the realty; otherwise it is in no sense a fixture; Bull. N. P. 34; 3 East 38; 9 id. 215; Pothier, Traité des Choses § 1; 20 Wend. 636; 3 Blackf. 111. Locks, iron stoves set in brickwork, posts, window-blinds, and a mirror firmly attached to the chimney breast by molding, afford examples of actual annexation; see 5 Hayw. 109; 20 Johns. 29; 1 Harr. & J. 289; 3 M'Cord 553; 9 Conn. 63; 1 Miss. 508, 620; 7 Mass. 432; 15 id. 159; 4 Ala. 314; 36 W. Va. 671; 43 Ill. App. 585; 2d, by constructive annexation. Some things have been held to be parcel of the realty, which are not annexed or fastened to it; for example, deeds or chattels which relate to the title of the inheritance and go to the heir; Shep. Touch. 469; 31 Barb. 632; 41 N. H. 503. Cars used in connection with a drier in a brickyard, and which are indispensable to the use of the drier, are part of the realty, and a mechanic's lien will attach thereto; 37 Ill. App. 69. So wires and insulators used in forming and completing the connection between an electric light and power plant and the places supplied with light and heat by such plant; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 69; 48 Kans. 182; gas burners, chandeliers, and the like; 31 N. J. L. 181; 4 Metc. Ky. 357; 18 L. T. N. S. 300. Tubs, vats, and casks placed in a brewery with a design of permanent use therein and which are too large to pass out of any existing opening are part of the realty; 47 Fed. Rep. 756. So deer in a park, fish in a pond, and doves in a dove-house, go to the heir, and not to the executor, being, like keys and heirlooms, constructively annexed to the inheritance; Shep. Touch. 90; Pothier, Traité des Choses § 1. But loose, movable machinery used in prosecuting any business to which the freehold is adapted cannot be considered part of the real estate nor in any way appurtenant to it; 12 N. H. 205; 6 Exch. 295; 14 Allen 136; 55 Fed. Rep. 229. See, however, 2 W. & S. 116, 390.

The criterion of an irremovable fixture is the united application of three requisites: (1) real or constructive annexation of the article in question to the freehold; (2) appropriation or adaptation to the use or purpose of that part of the realty with which it is connected; (3) the intention of the party making the annexation to make the article a permanent accession to the freehold; 117 Ind. 176; 42 Kan. 213.

The general rule is, that fixtures once annexed to the freehold become part of the realty. But to this rule there are exceptions: as, first, where there is a manifest intention to use the fixture in some employment distinct from that of the occupant of the real estate; second, where it has been annexed merely for the purpose of carrying on a trade; 3 East 88; 4 Watts 330; for the fact that it was put up for such a purpose indicates an intention that the thing should not become part of the freehold. See 1 H. Bla. 260. Buildings may, by agreement of parties, be erected upon land without becoming affixed thereto; 150 U. S. 493. But if there is a clear intention that the thing should be permanently annexed to the realty, its being used for purposes of trade would not, perhaps, bring the case within one of the exceptions; 1 H. Bla. 260. The tendency of modern authorities is to make the intention of the parties the general rule for deciding whether an article is realty or personalty; L. R. 7 C. P. 328; 12 N. Y. 170; 17 Am. Dec. 690; 96 Ala. 44. But the intention must be definitely expressed by words or acts; mere unexpressed mental intention is of no avail; 16 Ill. 480; 43 N. H. 390; 43 P. 308. See 42 Mich. 389, and note. This intention will prevail except as against innocent purchasers; 117 Ind. 176.

With respect to the different classes of persons who claim the right to remove a fixture, it has been held that where the question arises between an executor and the heir at law the rule is strict that whatever belongs to the estate to which the fixture appertains will go to the heir; but if the ancestor manifested an intention (which it is said may be inferred from circumstances) that the things affixed should be considered personalty, they will be so treated, and will go to the executor. See Bac. Abr. Executor, Administrator; 2 Stra. 1141; 1 P. Wms. 94; Bull. N. P. 34; 13 Cl. & F. 312; 36 Am. Rep. 446. As between a vendor and a vendee the same strictness applies as between an executor and an heir at law; for all fixtures which belong to the premises at the time of the sale, or which have been erected by the vendor, whether for purposes of trade or manufacture or not, as potash-kettles for manufacturing ashes, and the like, chandeliers and gas-brackets, pass to the vendee of the land, unless they have been expressly reserved by the terms of the contract; 6 Cow. 663; 20 Johns. 29; Ewell, Fixt. 271; Tyler, Fixt. 519; 26 Weekly

Law Bul. 149; (see also 1 Daly, N. Y. 487; 10 Rich. L. 135;) a faucet attached to a hot-water boiler and a rosebush in the yard pass by deed of the realty; 19 N. Y. Sup. 831; but a filter capable of delivering 105 gallons of water per minute, resting loosely on a factory floor, is a fixture; 62 Hun 618. The same rule applies as between mortgagor and mortgagee; 15 Mass. 159; 147 id. 500; 1 Atk. 477; 16 Vt. 124; 12 N. H. 205; Ewell, Fixt. 271. Wires for conducting an electrical current to lamps pass as fixtures under a mortgage of the electric light plant; 12 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 694; and the annunciator and all the wires of an electric-bell system are part of the realty of a hotel and pass as fixtures under a mortgage; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 257; in which case steam radiators and an office-desk attached to the building were held to be fixtures, while gas-burners and chandeliers were held not to pass as such to the mortgagee; contra, as to the last point; 24 N. Y. Supp. 70; and in 28 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 694, it was held that steam radiators and valves were not annexed to the realty, but being exactly analogous to gas fixtures were severable from the realty. The question whether ranges, hot-water boilers, sinks, and wash-tubs are fixtures under a mortgage depends on when and how they are attached to the house; 24 N. Y. Supp. 70; and as between a devisee and the executor, things permanently annexed to the realty at the time of the testator's death pass to the devisee,—his right to fixtures being similar to that of a vendee; 2 B. & C. 80; Ferard, Fixt. 246. Tapestry which has been cut and pieced so as to cover the walls of a room and the space left by the doors and mantelpiece, and was hung by being nailed to wooden buttons let into the plaster and nailed to the brick work, passed as a fixture under the devise of the mansion-house; [1896] 2 Ch. 497; see also 3 L. R. Eq. 382, where, under the provisions of a will, tapestry, pictures, and frames filled with satin and attached to the walls, and also statues, figures, vases, and stone garden seats purchased and set in place by the testator who was tenant for life, which were essentially part of the house or the architectural designs of the building or grounds, however fastened, were fixtures, and could not be removed, but glasses and pictures not in panels, not being part of the building, were not fixtures.

Where a husband, managing his wife's property as her agent, voluntarily, at his own expense, places thereon a boiler, engine, and connections for furnishing power, and subsequently joins his wife in executing a mortgage on the land, the boiler and engine are not trade fixtures, and the husband, as against the purchasers at sheriff's sale on proceeding, under the mortgage, has no right to remove them; 180 Pa. 283.

But as between a landlord and his tenant the strictness of the ancient rule has been much relaxed. The rule here is understood to be that a tenant, whether for life, for years, or at will, may sever at any time before the expiration of his tenancy, and carry away all such fixtures of a chattel nature as he has himself erected upon the demised premises for the purposes of ornament, domestic convenience, or to carry on trade: provided, always, that the removal can be effected without material injury to the freehold: 16 Day 323; 16 Mass. 449; 2 Dev. 376; 1 Bail. 541; 19 N. Y. 234; Ewell, Fixt. 76; 69 Tex. 146; 42 Kan. 23; 47 Ill. App. 33; and this is so whether it be made of wood or brick; 142 U. S. 396. There have been adjudications to this effect with respect to bakers' ovens; salt-pans; carding-machines; cider mills and furnaces; steam-engines; soap-boilers' vats and copper stills; mill-stones; Dutch barns standing on a foundation of brick-work set into the ground; a varnish-house built upon a similar foundation, with a chimney; and to a ball-room, erected by the lessee of an inn, resting upon stone posts slightly imbedded in the soil; and also in regard to things ornamental or for domestic convenience: as, furnaces; stoves; cupboards and shelves; bells and bell-pulls; gas-fixtures; portable hot-air furnace; 4 Gray 256; 127 Mass. 125, and note; 34 Am. Rep. 353; 89 Pa. 506; 92 Mich. 552; 55 Fed. Rep. 229; pier and chimney-glasses, although attached to the wall with screws; marble chimney-pieces; grates; window-blinds and curtains. The decisions, however, are adverse to the removal of hearth-stones, doors, windows, locks and keys; because such things are peculiarly adapted to the house in which they are affixed; also, to all such substantial additions to the premises as conservatories, greenhouses (except those of a professional gardener), stable, pig-styes and other out-houses, shrubbery and flowers planted in a garden. Nor has the privilege been extended to erections for agricultural purposes; though it is difficult to perceive why such fixtures should stand upon a less favored basis than trade fixtures, when the relative importance of the two arts is considered; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 544; 3 East 33; 13 Pa. 433. But some American authorities question the correctness of the doctrine in its application to the United States; 2 Pet. 137; 20 Johns. 29; Ferard, Fixt. 60. A railroad company, occupying land under an agreement, on the termination of such, may remove the rails which have been laid; 142 U. S. 396.

The time for exercising the right of removal is a matter of some importance. A tenant for years may remove them at any time during his term and afterwards, if he is in possession and holding over rightfully; 7 M. & W. 14; 14 Cal. 59; 40 Ind. 145; 55 Fed. Rep. 229. But tenants for life or at will, having uncertain interests in the land, have, after the determination of their estates not occasioned by their own fault, a reasonable time within which to remove their fixtures; 3 Atk. 13; 19 N. J. 238; 102 Mass. 193; but a tenant at will whose tenancy can only be terminated after reasonable notice, has not this privilege; 37 Minn. 459.

If a tenant quits possession of the land without removing such fixtures as he is entitled to, the property in them immediately vests in the landlord, and though they are subsequently severed, the tenant's right to them does not revive. If, therefore, a tenant desires to have any such things upon the premises at the expiration of his term, for the purpose of valuing them to an incoming tenant, or the like, he should take care to get the landlord's consent; otherwise he will lose his property in them entirely; 1 B. & Ad. 394; 2 M. & W. 450; Tyl. Fixt. 73; 32 W. Va. 66. The rights of parties with respect to particular articles are sometimes regulated by local customs, especially as between outgoing and incoming tenants; and in cases of this kind it becomes a proper criterion by which to determine the character of the article, and whether it is a fixture or not.

FLACO. A place covered with standing water.

FLAG. A symbol of nationality carried by soldiers, ships, etc., and used in many places where such a symbol is necessary or proper.

Nationality is determined by the flag when all other requisites are complied with; 5 East 398; 3 B. & P. 201; 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1; 1 Dods. Adm. 81, 131; 9 Cra. 388; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 114, 118, n. 129.

A ship navigating under the flag and pass of a foreign country is to be considered as bearing the national character of the country under whose flag she sails; Wheat. Int. L., 3d Eng. ed. § 340. In an unusual case during the French and German war a vessel really of Swiss (neutral) ownership bore the German flag because Swiss subjects were not permitted to fly the Swiss federal flag and France had refused to recognize any Swiss maritime flag. The French Conseil des Prises held, reversing the decision below, that she was not a German vessel and restored her to her owners; Dalloz, Jur. Gén. pt. iii. p. 94 (14 espèce).

A cargo documented as foreign property in the same manner as the ship by which it is carried, and covered by a foreign flag, is not, under the English rule, the subject of capture; 5 Rob. Rep. 2; id. 5, note. In that country, although the ship is held to be bound by the character imposed upon it by the authority of the government from which all the documents issue, yet goods which have no dependence upon the authority of the state may be differently considered; and if the goods be laden in time of peace, though sailing under a foreign flag, they are not subjects of capture; id.; but these licenses are construed with great liberality in the British courts of admiralty; Stew. Vice. Adm. 360.

The doctrine of the courts in this country has been very strict as to this point, and it has been frequently decided that sailing under the license and passport of protection of the enemy in furtherance of his views and interests was, without regard to the object of the voyage or the port of destination, such an act of illegality as subjected both ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war; 8 Cra. 181; id. 203; id. 444; 2 Wheat. 143; 4 id. 100. These decisions placed the objection to such licenses on the ground of pacific dealing with an enemy and as amounting to a contract that the party to whom the license is given should, for that voyage, withdraw himself from the war and enjoy the repose and blessings of peace. The illegality of such intercourse was strongly condemned; and it was held that, the moment a vessel sailed on a voyage with an enemy's license on board, the offence was irrevocably committed and consummated, and that the delictum was not done away even by the termination of the voyage, but the vessel and cargo might be seized after arrival in a port of the United States and condemned as lawful prize. See 1 Kent 85, 164; Wheat. Int. L. (3d Eng. ed.) 340.

By the rules of the United States Navy the use of a foreign flag to deceive an enemy is permissible, but it must be hauled down before a shot is fired, and under no circumstances will it be allowable to commence an action or to fight a battle without the display of the national flag; Snow, Int. L. 96.

Law of the Flag. An expression applied to the municipal law of the country to which a ship belongs of which the flag is the symbol, when that law is resorted to in preference to the lex loci contractus for the construction and effect of a contract or the determination of a liability affecting the ship or her cargo.

The law of the flag is "to regulate the liabilities and regulations which arise among the parties to the agreement, be it of affreightment or by hypothecation, upon this principle, that the ship-owner who sends his vessel into a foreign port gives a notice by his flag to all who enter into contracts with the shipmaster, that he intends the law of that flag to regulate those contracts, and that they must either submit to its operation or not contract with him or his agent at all;" Foote, Priv. Int. L. 408; and in England this rule is usually followed, the tendency being that, in the absence of indication of the intention of the parties the presumption is in favor of the law of the ship's flag; Scrutton, Chart. Part. 11; contra, 3 Moo. P. C. N. s. 272; 129 U. S. 397; 12 Q. B. D. 589; 10 id. 540; in which cases it was held that the lex loci contractus must prevail. In his treatise on merchant shipping (3d ed. 170) MacLachlin thus states the rule as to the effect of the law of the flag on the authority of the master. "The agency of the master is devolved upon him by the law of the flag. The same law that confers his authority, ascertains its limits, and the flag at the mast-head is notice to all the world of the extent of such power to bind the owners or freighters by his act. The foreigner who deals with this agent has notice of that law, and, if he be bound by it, there is no injustice. His notice is the national flag which is hoisted on every sea and under which the master sails into every port, and every circumstance that connects him with the vessel isolates that vessel in the eyes of the world, and demonstrates his relation to the owners and freighters as their agent for a specific purpose and with power well defined under the national maritime law; id.; this was suggested by the author quoted as a possible explanation of the apparently anomalous exception of bottomry bonds from the general rule that the lex loci contractus prevails.

This precise rule was followed in the leading English case of Lloyd v. Guibert, where the question was as to the master's authority to bind the ship-owner; L. R. 1 Q. B. 115; s. c. 6 B. & S. 100, and 33 L. J. Q. B. 245; s. c. in appeal 35 id. 74; 6 B. & S. 120.

In this case, in the Queen's Bench, Blackburn, J., in language almost exactly following that above quoted, applied the law of the flag (French), which did not recognize a personal liability of the owner in a bottomry bond, as against the lex loci contractus (Danish), or the laws of the place of performance (English), or that of the place when the cargo was loaded (Haytien). The court after noting the "singular absence of authority" said that two American cases had been cited; 1 La. 528 and 3 Sto. 465, adding that "neither of these decisions is binding on us, but we have derived very great assistance from them." As to the last of these cases there follows this comment: "The very learned judgment of Mr. Justice Story just referred to affords a complete answer to a plausible argument in which was suggested that the general maritime law clothed the master with power to bind his owners absolutely, and that the municipal law of the owner's country was analogous to secret restrictions in the ostensible authority of a partner or other agent clothed with general power." In the Exchequer Chamber, where the judgment was affirmed, Willes, J., said: "The general rule, that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce." The same doctrine was applied by the English Court of Appeal to the master's control over the cargo as well as the ship, by Brett, L. J., in L. R. 7 P. D. 137; by Dr. Lushington in Br. & L. 38, and in a later case by Sir J. Hannen, who sustained a sale of part of a damaged cargo, where it was shown by the result to have been unnecessary, such sale being authorized by the law of the flag; [1891] Prob. 328. But see 1 La. 249; id. 528, where the lex loci contractus was held to prevail.

In 3 Sto. 465, although the law of the flag was, in fact, enforced, the decision cannot be said to have followed the rule laid down by MacLachlin, as in that case the particular point decided was as to liability of the owner to the freighter, when the former was a citizen of a state the laws of which did not recognize such liabilities, while by the law of the state in which the freighter resided and also of the foreign port where the cargo was shipped, such a liability existed, and the lex domicilii of the ship-owners was held to govern the contract. See also 8 Pet. 538; BOTTOMRY.

As to the effect of the law of the flag upon the construction of a contract of affreightment, the decisions in this country as a rule are usually governed by the lex loci contractus. In the case of The Brantford City, Judge Brown thus stated this rule: "The 'law of the flag' . . . does not embody any rule of legal construction. Literally, it is but a concise phrase to express a simple fact, namely, the law of the country to which the ship belongs, and whose flag she bears, whether it accords with the general maritime law or not. In so far, however, as the law of the flag does not represent the general maritime law, it is but the municipal law of the ship's home. It has, therefore, no force abroad, except by comity. But foreign law is not adopted by comity, unless some good reason appear in the particular case why it should be preferred to the law of the former. The most frequent and controlling reasons are the actual or presumed intent of the parties or the evident justice of the case arising from its special circumstances."

On this ground, the law of the ship's home is applied by comity, to regulate the mutual relations of the ship, her owner, master, and crew, as among themselves; their liens for wages, and modes of discipline; 1 W. Rob. 35; 1 Low. 455; 3 Fed. Rep. 577; 29 id. 127. For the same reason it is also applied, by comity, to torts on the high seas, as between vessels of the same nation, or vessels of different nations subject to similar laws; though not if they are subject to different laws; 105 U. S. 24. Independently of the intent of the parties, the law of the flag has no application to cases of tort, as between ships or persons of different nationalities and conflicting laws; and Federal law, by which stipulations of a common carrier exempting him from the consequence of his own negligence are held to be against public policy and void, is controlling in suits brought here upon shipments made here on board foreign ships under bills of lading signed by foreign masters, though such stipulations be valid by the law of the ship's flag." 29 Fed. Rep. 373.

This case is expressly approved by the supreme court in a case upon the same point, which is the leading American case upon this branch of the subject; 129 U. S. 397, 461. See comments on this case by the circuit court of appeals; 67 Fed. Rep. 493. Precisely the contrary view, under almost identical circumstances, was held in the case of The Missouri and the doctrine of Lloyd v. Guibert was held to extend to this particular point; 41 Ch. Div. 321. Where both the law of the flag and the lex loci contractus were British, the law of England was held to govern the contract; 63 Fed. Rep. 268; 60 id. 627; affg. 56 id. 247. In a shipment of goods in England, in an English vessel, on an ordinary bill of lading, the liability of the vessel is to be determined according to the law of the place of shipment, as the law of the flag; 19 Fed. Rep. 101. So also where the bill of lading was made expressly subject to "a live stock contract," and there was an express provision in that contract that all questions relating to the bill of lading should be determined by British law; 24 Fed. Rep. 922. But the circuit court of appeals, in a similar case, where the bill of lading contained the "so-called flag clause" (that liability should be determined by the law of England, but there was no reference to this in the charter, made in this country), held it no evidence to modify the latter and that it was ineffective to substitute the law of the flag for the lex loci contractus with respect to the stipulation for exemption from liability for negligence; 66 Fed. Rep. 607; affg. 56 id. 126.

Generally it may be said that the doctrine of the Missouri is in conflict with the current of authority in England, it being usually held in that country that as to such stipulations in the bill of lading the lex loci contractus prevails; 9 Q. B. D. 118; 10 id. 521, 540; 12 id. 596; 3 Moo. P. C. N. s. 272; and to the same effect and under precisely similar circumstances is a judgment of the court of cassation in France, imperfectly stated in a note to the case last cited and fully reported in 75 Journal du Palais (1864) 225, and see 1 Dalloz 449. This question, it may be remarked, is as yet scarcely to be considered as settled by any hard-and-fast rule of law, and the only certain guide, says Bowen, L. J., "is to be found in applying sound ideas of business, convenience, and sense to the language of the contract itself with a view to discovering from it the true intention of the parties."

Flag of Truce. A white flag displayed by one of two belligerent parties to notify the other party that communication and a cessation of hostilities are desired.

Although each party has the right to send such a flag, there is no obligation on the commander of the enemy's forces to receive it; Snow, Int. L. 96; although it is usual to do so except in very exceptional cases; Davis, Int. L. 238; but if he receive the flag he may take all reasonable precautions to protect himself from any injury that may result from the presence of an enemy within his lines; he may detain the messenger at the outposts or may cause him to be blindfolded, but such messenger is entitled, if the bearer of a bona fide message, to complete inviolability of person; but during an engagement, firing is not necessarily to cease on the appearance of a flag of truce, unless it be made clear that it is exhibited as a token of submission; Snow, Int. L. 97. The rules of war justly forbid the sending of flags of truce for the purpose of obtaining information either directly or indirectly, and a messenger forfeits his inviolability of person and may be detained and subjected to punishment as a spy if he take advantage of his mission to abet an act of treachery. See Davis; Snow, Int. L.; and also article 45 of the Project of an International Declaration concerning the laws and customs of war proposed in the Brussels conference of 1874. This proposal, though not formally adopted because of a failure of unanimous assent, is of great value as a compact statement of the generally accepted views at that time of the great powers of Europe on the subjects covered by it. It may be found in Wheat. Int. L., 3d Eng. ed. § 411 l.

In naval operations the senior officer alone is authorized to dispatch or admit flags of truce. The firing of a gun from the senior officer's vessel is generally understood as a warning to approach no nearer. The flag of truce should be met at a suitable distance by a boat or vessel in charge of a commissioned officer having a white flag plainly displayed from the time of leaving until her return, and the same precautions must be observed in dispatching such a flag; Snow, Int. L. 97.

FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES.

By the act entitled "An act to establish the flag of the United States," passed April 4, 1818, 3 Story, U. S. Laws 1667, it is enacted—

§ 1. That from and after the fourth day of July next, the flag of the United States be thirteen horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be twenty stars, white in a blue field.

§ 2. That, on the admission of every new state into the Union, one star be added to the union of the flag; and that such addition shall take effect on the fourth day of July then next succeeding such admission. See Preble, Hist. of Amer. Flag.

It has been held in an unreported case in Illinois that a statute requiring the national flag to be floated over every school-house during school hours is unconstitutional, on the ground that, it transcended the police power of the state, Wright, J., contending that the legislature could not enact a statute with penal sanctions unless it had for its object "the maintenance of the police authority of the state, the morals of the state, or the health of the state. The question that arose in this case was whether, in a group of college buildings, each building was compelled to display a separate flag, and the decision that one flag floated from a flagstaff for the group of buildings, was not a compliance with the law is severely criticised in 30 Am. L. Rev. 746.

FLAGELLAT. Whipped; scourged. An entry on old Scotch records. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 7.

FLAGRANS (Lat.). Burning; raging; in actual perpetration. Flagrante bello, while war is actually in progress. Flagrant necessity, an urgent and immediate peril or emergency which will excuse an act under other circumstances unlawful.

FLAGRANS CRIMEN. In Roman Law. A term denoting that a crime is being or has just been committed: for example, when a crime has just been committed and the corpus delictum is publicly exposed, or if a mob take place, or if a house be feloniously burned, these are severally flagrans crimen.

The term used in France is flagrant delit. The Code of Criminal Instruction gives the following concise definition of it, art. 41: "Le délit qui se commet actuellement ou qui vient de se commettre, est un flagrant délit."

FLAGRANTE DELICTO (Lat.). In the very act of committing the crime. 4 Bla. Com. 307.

FLANGE WHEEL. A wheel contrived for an omnibus, with a disc capable of being lowered against the wheel into a groove in the rail of the tramway and drawn up when running on the pavement. has been held a flange wheel. 6 C. P. D. 79.

FLAT. When used as a description of anything respecting an arm of the sea means a level place over which the water stands or flows. 34 Conn. 424.

A floor or separate division of a floor, fitted for housekeeping and designed to be occupied by a single family. Cent. Dict.

A building, the various floors of which are fitted up as flats, either residential or business.

A flat is in law a house, though in fact only a part of one in the ordinary sense; L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 423; and the contract between the owner and the occupier is classed among "contracts for permissive use." Holland, Jur. 254.

The owner of a building who rents flats therein retains control of all portions not actually demised to tenants; [1893] Q. B. 177; 9 Allen 17; he is bound to keep such portions in a reasonable state of repair, and a failure so to do renders him liable in damages; 101 Mass. 251; 106 id. 94; 129 id. 33; 151 id. 162; 81 Me. 318; 67 id. 545; 31 Hun 30; 93 N. Y. 7; 98 id. 635; 127 id. 381; 130 id. 269; 4 C. B. N. s. 556; 3 C. P. 326; but the owner is not an insurer, and when he has constructed his roofs, pipes, or drains with the reasonable foresight commonly exercised by prudent men, he will not be responsible for a latent defect or an unusual stress of circumstances; 27 N. B. 499; L. R. 6 Ex. 217; 39 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 246; 5 Q. B. D. 602. Where the upper rooms only are leased, a covenant is implied on the part of the lessor to give such rooms the necessary support; 26 N. Y. 498; 28 Mo. App. 116; and he is under a negative duty to do nothing to lessen or decrease such support, or to render it insecure; 50 Hun 181; 46 id. 521.

It is the duty of the owner to keep the elevators in a reasonable state of repair, employ competent persons to work them, exercise due regard to the safety of the persons using them, keep the approaches to them properly lighted, and keep the entrance to them on each floor closed when the cage is not at that floor; 3 T. L. R. 500. See ELEVATOR.

As regards the furnishing of artificial light in halls and passage-ways, it has been held that in the absence of contractual obligation there is no legal duty on the part of the owner to furnish such light; 26 N. Y. Supp. 801; 131 N. Y. 674; contra, 154 Mass. 235.

The janitor, being appointed and removable by the owner, is, when engaged in the discharge of his general duties, the landlord's servant. Any particular tenant may sue the owner for damages, if the general services so contracted for are not rendered, but when a janitor is engaged by a tenant on some special service, such tenant becomes dominus pro tempore, and as such he incurs a liability similar to the landlord's; so when he attempts to interfere with or assume the direction of the janitor when the latter is discharging any general duty. See [1893] 1 Ch. 1. In either case his duties and liabilities are regulated by the general principles of the law of Master and Servant (q. v.).

The distinction between the tenants of flats and lodgers and guests at a hotel is, that while the latter may have the exclusive enjoyment of their lodgings or rooms, they have not, as have the tenants of flats, the exclusive possession; 30 L. J. M. C. 74.

See, generally, APARTMENT; LEASE; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

FLAVIANUM JUS (Lat.). A treatise on civil law, which takes its name from its author, Cneius Flavius. It contains forms of actions. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FLECTA. A feathered or fleet arrow. Cowell.

FLEDUTE. A discharge or freedom from amercements where one having been an outlawed fugitive cometh to the place of our lord of his own accord. Termes de la Ley.

The liberty to hold court and take up the amercements for beating and striking. Cowell.

The fine set on a fugitive as the price of obtaining the king's freedom. Spelman, Gloss.

FLEDWITE. A discharge from amercements where one having been a fugitive came to peace with the king of own accord or with license. Termes de la Ley; Cun. L. Dict. But some authorities add to this definition a quare whether it is not rather a fine set upon a fugitive to be allowed to return to the king's place. Cowell; Holt-house.

FLEE FROM JUSTICE. To leave one's home, residence, or known place of abode, or to conceal one's self therein, with intent in either case to avoid detection or punishment for some public offence. 48 Mo. 240; 3 Dill. 381.

FLEET. A place of running water where the tide or float comes up.

A famous prison in London, so called from a river or ditch which was formerly there, on the side of which it stood. It was used especially for debtors and bankrupts, and persons charged with contempt of the courts of chancery, exchequer, and common pleas. Abolished in 1842 and pulled down in 1845. Such persons as had been sent there were thereafter sent to the Marshalsea. Moz. & W.; Hayden's Dict. Dates.

FLEET BOOKS. The original records of the marriages celebrate in the Fleet Prison between 1686 and 1754. These books are not, it is said, admissible in evidence to prove a marriage, as they were not made under public authority, but on a question of pedigree they might, perhaps, be admitted to show the name under which a woman passed at the time of her marriage there. Tayl. Ev. § 1430. These books are now deposited in the office of the registrar-general.

FLEM. A fugitive bondman or villein. Spelman. The possession of the goods of such fugitives was called flemeswite. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 147.

FLESH. Includes live flesh and dead flesh. 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 487.

FLET. A house or home. Cowell.

FLETA. The title of an ancient law-book, supposed to have been written by a judge while confined in the Fleet Prison; written about 1290.

It is written in Latin, and is divided into six books. The author lived in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III. See lib. 2, cap. 66, § Item quod nullus; lib. 1, cap. 20, § que ceperunt; 10 Coke, pref. Edward II. was crowned A. D. 1306. Edward III. was crowned 1326, and reigned till A. D. 1377. During this period the English law was greatly improved, and the lawyers and judges were very learned. Hale, Hist. Comm. Law 162; 4 Bla. Com. 427, says of this work "that it was for the most part law until the alteration of tenures took place." The same remark he applies to Britton and Hengham.

But a late work speaks of it as "little better than an ill-arranged epitome." 1 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 188.

FLICHWITE. A fine on account of brawls or quarrels. Spel. Gloss.

FLIGHT. In Criminal Law. The evading the course of justice by a man's voluntarily withdrawing himself. Formerly, if the jury found that the party fled for it, whether he were found guilty or not of the principal charge, he forfeited his goods and chattels. 4 Bla. Com. 387. Evidence of the flight of an accused person has a tendency to establish guilt; 164 U. S. 492. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; EXTRADITION.

FLIGHTWITE. The same as FLED-WITE (q. v.).

FLOAT. A certificate authorizing the party possessing it to enter a certain amount of land. 20 How. 504. See 7 C. C. A. 293.

A Mexican grant of quantity, as of a certain number of leagues of land lying within a larger tract, whose boundaries are given, is a float, subject to location within the tract by the government before it can attach to any specific lands; 149 U. S. 652; 127 id. 428.

FLOATABLE. A stream capable of floating logs, etc., is said to be floatable. 2 Mich. 519.

FLOATING CAPITAL. Capital retained for the purpose of meeting current expenditure.

It includes raw materials destined for fabrication, such as wool and flax products in the warehouses of merchants or manufacturers; such as cloth or linen and money for wages and stores. De Laveleye, Pol. Ec.

FLOATING DEBT. That mass of lawful and valid claims against a corporation, for the payment of which there is no money in the corporate treasury specifically designed, nor any system of taxation or other means of providing money to pay, particularly provided. 71 N. Y. 374.

FLODEMARK. High-tide mark. Blount. The mark which the sea at flowing water and highest tides makes upon the shore. And. 189; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FLOGGING. Thrashing or beating with a whip or lash. This system of punishment was abolished in the army by act of Aug. 5, 1861; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1342; in the navy June 6, 1872; id. § 1642. See WHIPPING.

FLOOD. An inundation of water over land not usually covered by it. Such an accident is an Act of God. 4 Harr. Del. 449. See ACT OF GOD.

FLOODING LAND. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLOOR. The section of a building between horizontal planes. 145 Mass. 8. "Floor cloth canvas" has been held to be synonymous with "oil cloth foundations"; 1 Otto 362. In a lease the words "first floor" are equivalent to the "first story" of a building and include the walls unless other words control the meaning; 145 Mass. 8.

FLORENTINE PANDECTS. A copy of the Pandects, discovered accidentally at Amalphi, Italy, about 1137, and afterwards removed to Florence. Butl. Hor. Jur. 90.

FLORIDA. The name of one of the states of the United States of America, being the fourteenth admitted to the Union. It was discovered by Ponce de Leon in 1513; settled by Huguenots in 1562, and permanently settled by Spaniards at St. Augustine in 1565; and ceded to Great Britain in 1763, to Spain in 1783, and to United States in 1819. The Americans took possession in 1821.

It was admitted into the Union in 1845 by virtue of the act of congress entitled: "An act for the admission of the states of Iowa and Florida into the Union," approved March 3, 1845, and the present constitution was adopted Feb. 25, 1868.

The declaration of rights, in addition to the usual guarantees, provides as follows: That the paramount allegiance of every citizen is due to the federal government, and that no power exists with the people of the state to dissolve its connection therewith; and that the state shall ever remain a member of the American Union, and any attempt to dissolve said union shall be resisted with the whole power of the state.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in a senate and a house of representatives, two distinct branches, which, together, constitute and are entitled "the legislature of the state of Florida." Its sessions are biennial, commencing on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January. The senate consists of not less than one-fourth nor more than one-half as many members as the house, elected for the term of four years.

The house of representatives consists of not more than seventy members chosen for the term of two years. The members of both houses are elected by the qualified voters biennially on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November. Representatives must be qualified electors. There are the usual provisions for organization of the two houses, for compelling attendance of members, and exempting them from arrest, for punishment and expulsion of members, for securing freedom of debate, for preserving and publishing records of the proceedings, etc.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The governor is elected for four years by the qualified electors at the time of the election of the members of the legislature. He must have been a qualified elector for nine years, and a citizen of the state for three years next preceding his election. His powers are those usually incident to the office.

In case of a vacancy in the office of governor, the lieutenant-governor, and in case of his default, the president pro tem. of the senate acts in his place.

Administrative department. The governor is assisted by a cabinet of administrative officers, consisting of a secretary of state, attorney-general, comptroller, treasurer, superintendent of public instruction, adjutant-general, and commissioner of lands and immigration.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—This is vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, county courts, and justices of the peace. The legislature may also establish courts for municipal purposes only.

The judges of the supreme, circuit, and county courts are appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate; those of the supreme court hold office for life or good behavior; those of the circuit court for eight years; those of the county courts for four years.

The supreme court, except in cases otherwise directed in the constitution, has appellate jurisdiction only. The court, however, has power to issue writs of certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and such other writs as may be necessary and proper to the complete exercise of its jurisdiction.

The circuit court. The state is divided into seven circuits, and the circuit courts held within such circuits have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity, also in all cases at law in which the demand or the value of the property involved exceeds $100, and in all cases involving the legality of any tax, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, and of the action of forcible entry and unlawful detainer, and of actions involving the title or right of possession of real estate, and of all criminal cases, except such as may be cognizable by law by inferior courts. They have appellate jurisdiction of matters of probate and minors' estates, and final appellate jurisdiction of all civil cases before justices of the peace involving $25 and upwards, and of misdemeanors tried before such justices. They may issue such writs as may be necessary to the complete exercise of their jurisdiction.

There is a county court in each county, having the usual probate powers and the care of decedents' and minors' estates. The judges exercise the civil and criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace. They have jurisdiction in such cases of forcible entry and unlawful detainer of land as may be provided by law.

The governor may appoint as many justices of the peace as he may deem necessary. Their civil jurisdiction extends to cases at law involving not over $100. They hold office for four years, but may be removed by the governor for reasons satisfactory to him.

Cases may be tried before a practising attorney as referee, upon the application of the parties, subject to appeal.

FLORIN (called also Guilder). A coin, originally made at Florence.

The name formerly applied to coins, both of gold and silver, of different values in different countries. In many parts of Germany, the florin, which is still the integer or money-unit in those countries, was formerly a gold piece, value about two dollars and forty-two cents. It afterwards became a silver coin, variously rated at from forty to fifty-six cents, according to locality; but by the German conventions of 1837 and 1838 the rate of nine-tenths fine and one hundred and sixty-three and seven-tenths grains troy per piece was adopted, making the value forty-one cents. This standard is the only one now used in Germany; and the florin or guilder of the Netherlands is, also, coined at nearly the same standard (weight, one hundred and sixty-six grains; fineness, eight hundred and ninety-six thousandths), the value being the same. The florin of Tuscany is only twenty-seven cents in value.

FLOTAGES. Things which float by accident on the sea or great rivers. Blount.

The commissions of water-bailiffs. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FLOTSAM, FLOTSAN. A name for the goods which float upon the sea when cast overboard for the safety of the ship, or when a ship is sunk. Distinguished from Jetsam and Ligan. Bracton, lib. 2, c. 5; 5 Co. 106; Comyns, Dig. Wreck, A; Bacon, Abr. Court of Admiralty, B; 1 Bla. Com. 292. See JETTISON; LIGAN.

FLOU-MARKE. Flode-mark, which see.

FLOWAGE. The overflowing with water, the water which thus overflows. Webster.

The natural flowage of water from an upper estate to a lower one is a servitude which the owner of the latter must bear, though the flowage be not in a natural watercourse with well defined banks; 95 Mich. 586; 46 Cal. 346; 98 id. 157. Where one drains water from his land into the highway, causing another's crops to be damaged by flowage through a drain connected with the highway, he is liable; 44 Ill. App. 649. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLOWING LANDS. Raising and settling back water on another's land by a dam placed across a stream or watercourse which is the natural drain and outlet for the surplus water on such land, 2 Gray 235. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLUCTUS. Flood; flood tide. Bracton fol. 255.

FLUMEN (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which consists in the right of turning the rain-water, gathered in a spout, on another's land. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 9, n. 9; Vicat, Voc. Jur. See STILLICIDIUM.

FLUMINÆ VOLUCRES. Wild fowl; water fowl. 11 East 571.

FLUVIOUS. A public river; flood tide.

FLY FOR IT. Anciently, it was the custom in a criminal trial, to inquire after a verdict of not guilty, "Did he fly for it?" Abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28. Wharton.

FLYING SWITCH. This is made by uncoupling the cars from the locomotive while in motion, and throwing the cars on to the side track, by turning the switch, after the engine has passed it, upon the main track. 29 Iowa 39. See RAILROAD.

FLYMA. One escaped from justice; a fugitive. Anc. Inst. Flyman Frymth. was the offence of harboring a fugitive; id.

FOCAGE. Housebote; firebote. Cowel.

FOCALE (L. Lat.). In Old English Law. Firewood. The right of taking wood for the fire. Fire-bote. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FODERUM (L. Lat.). Food for horses or other cattle. Cowel.

In feudal law, fodder and supplies provided as a part of the king's prerogative for use in his wars or other expeditions. Cowel.

FODERTORIUM. Provisions to be paid by custom to the royal purveyors. Cowel.

FOEDUS (Lat.). A league; a compact.

FOEMINA VERO CO-OPERTA. A feme covert.

FOENERATION. See FENERATION.

FOENUS NAUTICUM (Lat.). The name given to marine interest.

The amount of such interest is not limited by law, because the lender runs so great a risk of losing his principal. Erskine, Inst. b. 4, t. 4, n. 76. See MARINE INTEREST.

FOESA. Herbage; grass. Cowel.

FOETICIDE. In Medical Jurisprudence. Of late years this term has been applied to designate the act by which criminal abortion is produced. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 288; Guy, Med. Jur. 133. See INFANTICIDE.

FOETURA (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. The produce of animals, and the fruit of other property, which are acquired to the owner of such animals and property by virtue of his right. Bowyer, Mod. C. L. c. 14, p. 81.

FOETUS (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. An unborn child. An infant in ventre sa mère.

An arbitrary distinction is made by some writers between fœtus and embryo, the latter term being used for the product of conception up to the fourth month of gestation and the former term after the fourth month.

Although it is often important to know the age of the fœtus, there is great difficulty in ascertaining the fact with the precision required in courts of law.

The great difference between children at birth, as regards their weight and size, is an indication of their condition while within the womb, and is a sufficient evidence of the difficulty as to the age of the fœtus by its weight and size at different periods of its existence.

Thousands of healthy infants have been weighed immediately after birth, and the extremes have been found to be two and eighteen pounds. It is very rare indeed to find any weighing as little as two pounds, but by no means uncommon to find them weighing four pounds. So it is with the length, which varies as much as that of the adult does from the average height of the race.

Neither can anything positive be learned from the progress of development; for although the condition of the bones, cartilages, and other parts will generally mark with tolerable accuracy the age of a healthy fœtus, yet an uncertainty will arise when it is found to be unhealthy. It has been clearly proved, by numerous dissections of new-born children, that the fœtus is subject to diseases which interfere with the proper formation of parts, exhibiting traces of previous departure from health, which had interfered with the proper formation of parts and arrested the process of development.

Interesting as the different periods of development may be to the philosophical inquirer, they cannot be of much value in legal inquiries from their extreme uncertainty in denoting precisely the age of the fœtus by unerring conditions.

FOG. Watery vapor precipitated in the lower part of the atmosphere, and disturbing its transparency. It differs from cloud only in being near the ground. Webster.

Every vessel must, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storm, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions; 137 U. S. 330. A speed of six miles per hour is excessive for a steamer in a dense fog, where she is emerging from New York harbor and is likely to meet vessels from many points of the compass; 153 U. S. 64.

The owner of a sailing vessel cannot substitute for the fog-horn which she is required by the sailing regulations to carry, an instrument blown by steam, and in their opinion more efficient than the fog-horn; 5 U. S. App. 314. See 153 U. S. 94. A vessel is not properly equipped at sea which has no spare mechanical fog-horn; 55 Fed. Rep. 117.

A steamer failing to slack its speed in a fog is at fault in case of collision; 5 U. S. App. 314; 1 id. 614; 54 Fed. Rep. 542; 52 id. 400; [1892] Prob. 105. See COLLISION.

FOGAGIUM (L. Lat.). Coarse, rank grass which has not been eaten off in the summer. Cowel.

FOI. In French Feudal Law. Faith; fealty. Guyot, Inst. Feod. c. 2.

FOINISUM. The fawning of deer. Spel. Gloss.

FOITERERS. Vagabonds. Blount.

FOLC-GEMOTE (spelled, also, folk-mote, folcmote, folkgemote; from folc, people, and gemote, an assembly).

A general assembly of the people in a town, burgh, or shire.

During the time at which the separate tribal nations of Britain were under the control or supremacy of the kingdoms of Northumbria, York, and West Saxony successively, the term was applied to the concilium of the freeholders of each village. Tacitus calls it the nation assembled in arms. Their meetings were held each fortnight, and the members bound themselves reciprocally to the peaceable behavior of themselves, their families, and their dependents; 2 Burke, Abr. Eng. Hist. ch. 7. They chose their rulers, the folc kings, at this tribal moot, settled matters of unjust trading, the common tillage and pasturage, and all things that concerned the common householder; 1 Soc. Eng. 125, 136. The conqueror so far as possible endeavored to preserve the customs of the people, but with the growth of the royal power the most important questions were referred to the councillors of the king, comprising the bishops, abbots, and eorldermen who succeeded the folc kings in the folcs or shires and designated the witenagemote or council of the wise men; this in turn dissolved into the curia regis; Inderwick, King's Peace. About this period the spelling of the word changes from folc-moot to folk-moot. The meeting of the folk-moot was then transferred to London, and was held thrice a year, and the principal duties that devolved upon it were to hear royal proclamations and statutes, to choose mayors and burgesses, and to pronounce upon offenders the sentence of outlawry; 1 Poll. and Maitl. 642. The folk-moot and the witenagemote are said to have been the foundation of the English Parliament. See Stubbs, Sel. Chars. 10-13; Inderwick, King's Peace; Bagehot, Physics and Politics; Manwood, For. Laws; Spelman, Gloss.; De Brady, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.; PARLIAMENT; WITTENAGEMOTE.

FOLCLAND (Sax.). Land of the people. Spelman, Gloss. Said by Blackstone to be land held by no assurance in writing, but to have been distributed amongst the common people at the pleasure of the lord, and resumable at his discretion. 2 Bla. Com. 90; Cowel.

It was, however, probably, land which belonged to the community, and which, being parcelled out for a term to people of all conditions, reverted again to the commons at the expiration of the term. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 8; Whart. Law Dict., 2d Lond. ed.

The subject of land-tenure among the Anglo-Saxons is very obscure. Doubtless all land was originally held in common by the tribe or kingdom, and out of this after a time portions of it were disposed of to individuals. Individual ownership was generally designated by the term alod, which comprised original allotments which had the name ethel, and those which were carved out of the common lands by grant or charter. The tenure of the latter was designated by the term bocland, which is described as "land which is held under a book, under a privilege, modelled on Roman precedents, expressed in Latin words, armed with ecclesiastical sanctions, and making for alienation and individualism." 8 Eng. Hist. Rev. 1-17. The folcland which was not granted as bocland could be let out for temporary occupation as laenland. A late theory maintained, in the review quoted, by Dr. Vinogradoff is that folcland indicated an estate, not belonging to the folk, but held by folk-right or customary law, and not subject to disposition of the holder. id.; Medley, Eng. Const. Hist. 16. On this theory the modern copy-holders are termed the historical successors of the owners of folcland; id. 36; Pollock, Land Laws 48. Nothing is certain except that the terms referred to were used, but their precise scope is the merest speculation, and successive writers invent new theories with the freedom which is invited by the lack of definite historical or documentary information. The subject affords ample scope for theorizing, as most of what is written upon the subject is of this character, and it is said that the word Folcland is only found technically used three times in Anglo-Saxon documents.

The theory of Vinogradoff above stated is earnestly supported by Professor Maitland, in his Domesday Book and Beyond (which appears while this article is still in press). He says, referring to the author cited: "His argument has convinced us; but as it is still new we will take leave to repeat it with some few additions of our own." The subject of book-land and folk-land is elaborately discussed and the three documents in which the latter word occurs, as above stated, are fully described. The conclusion is thus stated: "Land, it would seem, is either book-land or folk-land. Book-land is land held by book, by a royal and ecclesiastical privilegium. Folk-land is land held without book, by unwritten title, by the folk-law. 'Folk-land' is the term which modern historians have rejected in favour of the outlandish alod. The holder of folk-land is a free land owner, though at an early date the king discovers that over him and his land there exists an alienable superiority. Partly by alienations of this superiority, partly perhaps by gifts of land of which the king is himself the owner, book-land is created. Edward's law speaks as though it were dealing with two different kinds of land. But really it is dealing with two different kinds of title . . . the same land might be both book-land and folk-land, the book-land of the minster, the folk-land of the free men who were holding, not indeed 'of' but still 'under' the minster. They or their ancestors had held under the king, but the king had booked their land (which also in a certain sense was his land) to a church. . . . 'Bookland' is a briefer term than 'land held by book-right'; 'folk-land' is a briefer term than 'land held by folk-right.' The same piece of land may be held by book-right and by folk-right; it may be book-land and folk-land too."

FOLC-RIGHT. The common right of all the people. A law common to all the realm, mentioned by King Edward the elder. It is doubtless in the same sense that the phrase common law originated. 1 Bla. Com. 65, 67.

FOLD-COURSE. In English Law. Land used as a sheep-walk.

Land to which the sole right of folding the cattle of others is appurtenant; sometimes it means merely such right of folding. The right of folding on another's land, which is called common foldage. Co. Litt. 6 a, note 1; W. Jones 375; Cro. Car. 432; 2 Ventr. 139.

FOLD-SOKE. A feudal service which consisted in the obligation of the tenant not to have a fold of his own but to have his sheep lie in the lord's fold. He was said to be consuetus ad foldam, tied to his lord's fold. The basis of this service is thus expressed by a recent writer: "It is manure that the lord wants; the demand for manure has played a large part in the history of the human race." Maitland, Domesday Book 76. In East Anglia the peasants had sheep enough to make this an important social institution; id. 442.

FOLDAGE. A privilege possessed in some places by the lord of a manor, which consists in the right of having his tenants' sheep to feed on his fields, so as to manure the land. The name of foldage is also given in parts of Norfolk to the customary fee paid to the lord for exemption at certain times from this duty. Elton, Com. 45, 46. See FOLD-SOKE.

FOLGARI. Menial servants; followers. Bract.

FOLGERE. In Old English Law. A freeman who has no house or dwelling of his own, but is the follower or retainer of another (heorthfaest), for whom he performs certain predial services. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FOLGERS. Menial servants or followers. Cowel.

FOLGOTH. Official dignity.

FOLIO. A leaf. The references to the writings of the older law-authors are usually made by citing the folio, as it was the ancient custom to number the folio instead of the page, as is done in modern books.

A certain number of words specified by statute as a folio. Wharton. Originating, undoubtedly, in some estimate of the number of words which a folio ought to contain.

In Michigan it has been held that a legal folio is one hundred words; 38 Mich. 639; and that number is generally made a folio by statute; R. S. U. S. § 828.

FOLK-LAND. See FOLC-LAND.

FOLK-MOOT. See FOLC-GEMOTE; WIT-TENA-GEMOTE.

FOLLOWING BASIS. An agreement that an adjustment in general average shall be made on the "following basis," followed by a statement of the amount to be contributed for the valuation of the ship after collision, and the valuation of the freight and the cargo, does not mean that the freight shall be assessed on its gross valuation, but merely that the valuation shall be taken as the foundation upon which the adjustment shall be made according to law; and if the law applicable prescribes that the freight shall be assessed at one half its gross value, as in California, this will prevail. 58 Fed. Rep. 801.

FONDS PERDUS. In French Law. Capital is said to be invested a fonds perdu when it is stipulated that in consideration of the payment of an amount as interest, higher than the normal rate, the lender shall be repaid his capital in this manner. The borrower, after having paid the interest during the period determined, is free as regards the capital itself. Arg. Fr. Merc. Law 560.

FONSADERA. In Spanish Law. Any tribute or loan granted to the king for the purpose of enabling him to defray the expenses of a war.

FONTANA. A fountain of water. Bract. fol. 233.

FOOD. What is fed upon to support life by being received within and assimilated by the organism of an animal or plant; nutriment; aliment; provisions; victuals. Webster.

The exposure of unwholesome provisions for sale as food is not criminal, unless the person guilty thereof knew of their unwholesome character; 44 Mo. App. 429. Although a statute suppressing the manufacture of oleomargarine may be unnecessarily oppressive, redress can only be had through the legislature; 127 U. S. 678. See OLEOMARGARINE.

A dealer who sells food sealed in a can to a buyer who knows that the seller has not prepared nor inspected it, and is ignorant of its contents, except so far as results from the fact that he has purchased it from others, gives no implied warranty that it is wholesome and fit for use; 38 N. Y. Supp. 1052. See ADULTERATION; HEALTH.

FOOT. A measure of length, containing one-third of a yard, or twelve inches. See ELL. Figuratively it signifies the conclusion, the end; as, the foot of the fine, the foot of the account. See 10 Metc. 26; 5 McLean 306.

FOOT OF THE FINE. The fifth part or the conclusion of a fine. It includes the whole matter, reciting the names of the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. 2 Bla. Com. 351.

FOOTGELD. An amercement for not cutting out the ball or cutting off the claws of a dog's feet (expediating him). To be quit of footgeld is to have the privilege of keeping dogs in the forest unlawed without punishment or control. Manw. For. Laws, pt. 1, p. 86; Crompton, Jur. 197; Termes de la Ley; Cunningham, Law Dict.; EXPEDITATION.

FOOTPRINTS. Impressions made by the feet of persons, or their shoes, boots, or other covering for the feet, on the ground, snow, or other surface. In the same category are also impressions of shoe-nails, patches, abrasions, or other peculiarities therein. When found at or near the scene of a crime they often lead to the identification of guilty parties.

"The presumption founded on these circumstances has been appealed to by mankind in all ages, and in inquiries of every kind, and it is so obviously the dictate of reason, if not of instinct, that it would be superfluous to dwell upon its importance." Will, Circ. Ev. 194. It is said that evidence of footprints and their correspondence with defendant's feet may be proved even when his agency is disputed, not as alone convincing, or indeed, available, but as tending to establish a case; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 795; even where the defendant's proof tended to establish an alibi; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 629. Evidence of footprints alone has been held insufficient to convict; 1 F. & F. 354; 19 Ia. 230; 17 Fla. 669; and unless the measurement is careful and accurate, or there is some peculiarity shown, the probative force is slight; 31 Fla. 240; 3

N. Y. Crim. Rep. 406; 57 Ga. 482; 89 Mo. 168; but in many cases such peculiarities have been shown and evidence of the footprints admitted; 8 Tex. Cr. App. 30; 117 Ill. 271; 59 Ga. 738; 17 Kan. 458; 10 Crim. L. Mag. 890; but a conviction on such evidence will be reversed for refusal to admit proof for the defendant that he has never worn a shoe which would make such a print; 12 Tex. Crim. App. 219; the discovery and comparison should be prompt with relation to the crime; 53 Ga. 253; and the measurement should be accurate; 12 Tex. Crim. App. 219; 8 id. 332; though it need not be immediate, the question of time going to the weight of the evidence, not to its competency; 68 Cal. 576.

The identification of such tracks is a matter of common observation, which does not require expert testimony; 63 N. Y. 590; 68 Ala. 569; 84 N. C. 756; and only the peculiarity of the tracks and the facts of identification may be proved, but not the opinion of the witness whether they were made by the defendant; 7 Neb. 320; 88 Ala. 193; 98 id. 10; but a witness has been permitted to prove the measurement of the tracks and their exact correspondence with the shoe of the defendant; 30 Tex. App. 482; the examination and the comparison need not be made in the presence of the defendant; 84 N. C. 756; nor can he be compelled to put his foot in the track to make evidence against himself; 63 Ga. 667; but where he was compelled to do so the evidence was admitted; 74 N. C. 646; and tracks have been voluntarily made by the accused before the jury for comparison with those proved; 80 Ga. 269. Comparison of the shoes with the footmarks should be made before the former are put in the marks; 1 Lew. C. C. 116; and where this was not done the evidence on the subject was rejected; id.

Such evidence, even if established beyond doubt, is liable, as in all cases of circumstantial evidence, to be the subject of fabrication, or erroneous inference; see the case of Mayenc, Gabriel 403, where the shoes of another person were put on by one committing a crime; and the celebrated case of Thornton, fully reported in Will, Circ. Ev. 286, where an alibi was successfully proved after apparently conclusive circumstantial evidence, including foot prints.

Proof may be made by horse-tracks corresponding with those made by a horse of defendant; 32 Tex. Crim. App. 112; or that shoes taken from such horse fitted the tracks; 23 Ala. 44; and when the prisoner had reversed the shoes of his horse after reaching the house, to give the impression that two persons had been there, the artifice led to his detection by the discovery of recent nail-marks in the horse's hoof; Spooner's Case, 2 Chand. Am. Crim. Tr.; but horse-tracks alone are not sufficient to convict; 65 Ia. 614; and see 8 Tex. Cr. App. 332.

For a full discussion of the subject, see Will, Circ. Ev. 194-204, in which will be found most of the cases here cited and many others.

FOR. In place of or in front of. 37 Wis. 265. Because or on account of; by reason of; as agent for; in behalf of. 31 N. Y. 103; AGENT. Used in connection with a period it means "during," where publication is required for at least thirty days, one publication thirty days before the sale would not be a compliance. 18 Neb. 139. And see 16 Ohio 563; 12 Kan. 493. It may, if necessary, be inserted in a statute by judicial construction; 25 Minn. 523.

In a contract it implies a condition precedent; Hob. 41; 5 M. & S. 187. See also 12 Mod. 455.

In French Law. A tribunal. Le for interieure, the interior forum; the tribunal of conscience. Poth, Obl. pt. 1, c. 11, art. 3.

FOR ACCOUNT OF. A phrase used in an order, draft, or memorandum to designate the person against whom, or account against which, the thing or sum is to be charged.

FOR AT LEAST. As applied to a number of days required for notice this phrase includes either the first or last day, but not both. 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 578. See TIME.

FOR COLLECTION. See INDORSEMENT.

FOR DEPOSIT TO THE CREDIT OF. See INDORSEMENT.

FOR GOOD CAUSE. A statute authorizing a continuance "for good cause" in the absence of a party is satisfied by proof of the illness of plaintiff in another state, and the ignorance of his attorney of the names of the witnesses and the details of the case. 35 Cal. 636.

FOR THAT. In Pleading. Words used to introduced the allegations of a declaration. "For that" is a positive allegation; "For that whereas" is a recital. Hamm. N. P. 9.

FOR THAT WHEREAS. Introductory words in pleading. See Hamm. N. P. 9. These words are used in the introduction of the statement of the plaintiff's case as a recital in the declaration in all actions except trespass, in which there being no recital the expression was "For that." 1 Burr. Inst. Cler. 170.

FOR USE. Words used to describe a suit, judgment, or decree in which the nominal plaintiff sues for the benefit or advantage of another. This is necessary in some cases where an assignor is obliged to sue in the name of the assignor. The style of the suit is "for use, etc., vs. B."

Loans for use are distinguished from loans for consumption; the former being those in which the article bailed is to be used and returned and the latter those in which it may be consumed and returned in kind.

FOR WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

A general clause in a policy of insurance, intended to apply to all persons who have any insurable interest. 1 Phill. Ins. 152. This phrase, or some similar one, must be inserted, to give any one but the party named as the insured rights under the policy. See 1 Term 313, 464; 1 B. & P. 316, 345; 2 Maule & S. 485; 12 Mass. 80; 13 id. 589; 6 Pick. 198; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 29, 477; 13 East 274.

FORAGE. Hay and straw for horses, particularly in the army. Jac.

FORAGIUM. Straw when the corn is threshed out. Cowel.

FORANEUS. One from without; a foreigner; a stranger. Calv. Lex.

FORATHE. One who can take oath for another who is accused of one of the lesser crimes. Manw. For. Laws 3; Cowel.

FORBALCA. In Old Records. A forebalk; a balk (that is, an unplowed piece of ground) lying forward or next the highway. Cowel.

FORBANER. To deprive forever. To shut out. 9 Ric. II. cap. 2; 6 Hen. VI. cap. 4; Cowel.

FORBANNITUS. A pirate; an outlaw.

FORBARRE. To deprive one of a thing forever. Cowel.

FORBATUDUS. The aggressor slain in combat. Jac.

FORBEARANCE. A delay in enforcing rights. The act by which a creditor waits for the payment of a debt due him by the debtor after it has become due. It is sufficient consideration to support assumpsit.

An agreement to forbear bringing a suit for a debt due, although for an indefinite time, and even although it cannot be construed to be an agreement for a perpetual forbearance, if followed by actual forbearance for a reasonable time, is a good consideration for a promise; 133 Mass. 287; 123 id. 297; 110 id. 389.

See ASSUMPSIT; CONSIDERATION.

FORCE. Restraining power; validity; binding effect.

A law may be said to be in force when it is not repealed, or, more loosely, when it can be carried into practical effect. An agreement is in force when the parties to it may be compelled to act, or are acting, under its terms and stipulations.

Strength applied. Active power. Power put in motion.

Actual force is where strength is actually applied or the means of applying it are at hand. Thus, if one break open a gate by violence, it is lawful to oppose force to force. See 2 Salk. 641; 8 Term 78, 357. See BATTERY.

Implied force is that which is implied by law from the commission of an unlawful act. Every trespass quare clausum fregit is committed with implied force. Co. Litt. 57 b, 161 b, 162 a; 1 Saund. 81, 140, n. 4; 5 Term 361; 8 id. 78, 358; Bac. Abr. Trespass; 3 Wils. 18; Fitzh. N. B. 890; 5 B. & P. 365, 454.

Mere nonfeasance cannot be considered as force, generally; 2 Saund. 47; Co. Litt. 161.

If a person with force break a door or gate for an illegal purpose, it is lawful to oppose force to force; and if one enter the close of another vi et armis, he may be expelled immediately, without a previous request; for there is no time to make a request; 2 Salk. 641; 8 Term 78, 357. When it is necessary to rely upon actual force in pleading, as in the case of a forcible entry, the words "manu forti," or "with a strong hand," should be adopted; 8 Term 357; 4 Cush. 441. But in other cases the words "vi et armis," or "with force and arms," are sufficient.

Municipal officers seizing private property under an order condemning it for a street, are not guilty of forcible trespass if they use no more force than necessary, even though the owner be present forbidding them; 100 N. C. 497.

FORCE AND ARMS. A phrase used in declarations of trespass and in indictments, but now unnecessary in declarations, to denote that the act complained of was done with violence. 2 Chitty, Pl. 846, 850; 2 Steph. Com. 364. See FORCE.

FORCE AND FEAR, called also "vi metusque," means that any contract or act extorted under the pressure of force (vis) or under the influence of fear (metus) is voidable on that ground, provided, of course, that the force or the fear was such as influenced the party. Brown.

FORCE MAJEURE (Fr.). Superior or irresistible force. Emerig. Tr. des Ass. c. 12. See VIS MAJOR.

FORCED HEIRS. In Louisiana. Those persons whom the testator or donor cannot deprive of the portion of his estate reserved for them by law, except in cases where he has a just cause to disinherit them. La. Civ. Code, art. 1482. As to the portion of the estate they are entitled to, see LEGITIME. The causes for which forced heirs may be deprived of this right must be stated in the testament and also established by proof by the other heirs; id. Art. 1492.

FORCED OUT. Where a license to a corporation was to cease if the licensor was "forced out of the company," and one who had acquired all the stock, except that held by the licensor, procured from the company an assignment of all its property, and induced it to cease doing business, it was held that the licensor was "forced out of the company." 148 Ill. 115.

FORCED SALE. In Practice. A sale made at the time and in the manner prescribed by law, in virtue of execution issued on a judgment already rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction; a sale made under the process of the court, and in the mode prescribed by law. 6 Tex. 110.

A forced sale is a sale against the consent of the owner. The term should not be deemed to embrace a sale under power in a mortgage. 15 Fla. 336.

FORCES. The military and naval resources of a country.

FORCHEAPUM. Pre-emption. Blount.

FORCIBLE ENTRY OR DETAINER. A forcible entry or detainer consists in violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements, by means of threats, force, or arms, and without authority of law. Comyns, Dig.; Woodf. Landl. & Ten. 973; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 489.

Such an entry as is made with strong hand, with unusual weapons, and unusual number of servants or attendants, or with menace of life or limb; an entry which only amounts in law to a trespass is not within statutes relating thereto. 21 Or. 541.

To make an entry forcible, there must be such acts of violence, or such threats, menaces, or gestures, as may give reason to apprehend personal injury or danger in standing in defence of the possession. But the force made use of must be more than is implied in any mere trespass; 8 Term 357; 10 Mass. 409; 1 Add. Pa. 14; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 786.

Driving the tenant from the premises by deadly weapons and an array of numbers is a forcible entry; 100 N. C. 466. It is sufficient to support an action of forcible entry that it was made against the will of the individual when in peaceable possession, and there need have been no actual force; 46 Mo. App. 11; 48 id. 148; 52 id. 226.

Proceedings in case of a forcible entry or detainer are regulated by the statutes of the several states, and relate to a restitution of the property, if the individual who complains has been dispossessed, as well as to the punishment of the offender for a breach of the public peace. And the plea of ownership is no justification for the party complained of; for no man may enter even upon his own lands in any other than a peaceable manner. Nor will he be excused if he entered to make a distress or to enforce a lawful claim, nor if possession was ultimately obtained by entreaty; Woodf. L. & T. 741, n.; 3 Mass. 215; 1 Dev. & B. 324; 8 Litt. 184; 8 Term 361; but, contra, it has been held, that an intruder in quiet possession of land may be forcibly expelled by the owner; 21 Or. 541; 64 Cal. 5. If the owner is guilty of a breach and trespass on the person of the intruder in taking possession of his land, he is liable for that, but his possession is lawful, and an action of trespass quare clausum is not maintainable against him; 9 Allen 530; 1 W. & S. 90; 54 Pa. 86. This follows the English doctrine as expressed by Parke, B., that, where a breach of the peace has been committed by a freeholder who, in order to get possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it, although the freeholder may be responsible to the public for a forcible entry, he is not liable to the other party; and in an action brought against him, it is a sufficient justification that the tenant was in possession against the will of the owner; 14 M. & W. 437. See article in 4 Am. Law Rev. 429. A lessee never in possession cannot maintain unlawful detainer against the lessor, either at common law or statute; 48 Mo. App. 19. A change of possession pending a suit for forcible entry and detainer does not affect the right of recovery; 141 Ill. 395.

Upon an indictment for this offence at common law, the entry must appear to have been accompanied by a public breach of the peace; and, upon a conviction for either a forcible entry or detainer, the court will award restitution of the premises in the same manner as a judge in a civil court, under a statutory proceeding, is authorized to do upon a verdict rendered before him; 1 Ld. Raym. 512; 8 Term 360; Cro. Jac. 151; Al. 50; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 794.

Neither title nor right of possession is at issue, or can be made at issue, in an action of forcible entry and detainer; 8 Mont. 365.

FORDA. In Old Records. A ford or shallow, made by damming or penning up the water. Cowel.

FORDAL (Sax.). A butt or headband. A piece.

FORDANNO. A first assailant. Spel. Glos.

FORDIKA. In Old Records. Grass or herbage growing on the edge or bank of dykes or ditches. Cowel.

FORE (Sax.). Before. (Fr.) Out. Kelham.

FORECLOSE. To shut out; to bar. Used of the process of destroying an equity of redemption. 1 Washb. R. P. 589; Dan. Ch. Pr. 1204; Coote, Mortg. 511; 9 Cow. 382.

FORECLOSURE. In Practice. A proceeding in chancery by which the mortgagor's right of redemption of the mortgaged premises is barred or closed forever.

The modern significance of the term, as applied to mortgages, is that of a sale under a judgment of foreclosure, and not the judgment itself; 93 Cal. 600.

This takes place when the mortgagor has forfeited his estate by non-payment of the money due on the mortgage at the time appointed, but still retains the equity of redemption; in such case, the mortgagee may file a bill calling on the mortgagor, in a court of equity, to redeem his estate presently, or, in default thereof, to be forever closed or barred from any right of redemption.

In some cases, however, the mortgagee obtains a decree for a sale of the land under the direction of an officer of the court, in which case the proceeds are applied to the discharge of incumbrances, according to their priority. See 2 Johns. Ch. 100; 9 Cow. 346; 1 Sumn. 401; 7 Conn. 152; 5 N. H. 30; 1 Hayw. 482; 5 Ohio 554; 5 Yerg. 240; 2 Pick. 540; 2 Gall. 154; 4 Me. 495; 1 Washb. R. P. 589; Dan. Ch. Pr. 1204; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 735.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, there is no occasion for an entry for breach of condition; 60 Com. 24. Where, before beginning suit to foreclose for default in paying interest, the defaulted interest was paid and accepted, such acceptance is a waiver of any claim of forfeiture on account of the default; 85 Iowa 612.

As to the subject generally, and also as to Railway Foreclosure, see MORTGAGE.

FOREFAULT. In Scotch Law. To forfeit; to lose.

FOREGIFT. A premium paid by a lessee for his lease, separate and distinguished from the rent. A payment in advance.

FOREGOERS. Royal purveyors. 26 Edw. III. c. 5.

FOREHAND RENT. In English Law. A species of rent which is a premium given by the tenant at the time of taking the lease, as on the renewal of leases by ecclesiastical corporations, which is considered in the nature of an improved rent. 1 Term 486; 3 Atk. Ch. 473; Crabb, R. P. § 155.

FOREIGN. That which belongs to another country; that which is strange. 1 Pet. 343.

Every nation is foreign to all the rest; and the several states of the American Union are foreign to each other with respect to their municipal laws; 2 Wash. C. C. 282; 4 Conn. 517; 2 Wend. 411; 12 S. & R. 203; 2 Hill, S. C. 319; 7 T. B. Monr. 585; 5 Leigh 471; 3 Pick. 293; 10 Wall. 192; 99 Mass. 388.

But the reciprocal relations between the national government and the several states composing the United States are not considered as foreign, but domestic; 5 Pet. 398; 6 id. 317; 9 id. 607; 4 Cra. 384; 4 Gill & J. 1, 63.

FOREIGN ANSWER. An answer not triable in the county where it is made. Stat. 15 Hen. VI. c. 5; Blount.

FOREIGN APPOSER. An officer in the exchequer who examines the sheriff's estreats, comparing them with the records, and apposeth (interrogates) the sheriff what he says to each particular sum therein. Coke, 4th Inst. 107; Blount; Cowel, Foreigne. The word is written opposer, opposeth, by Lord Coke; and this signification corresponds very well to the meaning given by Blount, of examiner (interrogator) of the sheriff's accounts.

FOREIGN ASSIGNMENT. An assignment made in a foreign country or in another state. 2 Kent 405. See ASSIGNMENT.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT. A process by virtue of which the property of an absent and non-resident debtor is seized for the purpose of compelling an appearance, and, in default of that, to pay the claim of the plaintiff. See ATTACHMENT.

FOREIGN BILL OF EXCHANGE. A bill that is drawn in one country and made payable in another; and so if the parties to it reside in the same state, but the bill is drawn in one state and made payable in another state. Tiedeman, Com. Rep. § 3. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

FOREIGN BOUGHT AND SOLD. A custom in London, which, being found prejudicial to sellers of cattle in Smithfield, was abolished. Wharton.

FOREIGN CHARITY. One created or endowed to be administered in a state or country foreign to that of the domicile of the benefactor. A bequest by a testator whose will is probated in one state establishing a charitable use to be administered by a corporation to be created by and in another state; all the trustees (thirteen in number) except two being non-residents of the state of domicile of the testator, is a foreign charity. The court of chancery of New Jersey will not administer such a charity, but when it is valid by the law of that state and of the state where it is to be executed, and the trustees have the legal capacity to receive the fund and carry out the charity, the court will order its payment to them, leaving it to the courts of the other state to see to its due administration. 34 N. J. Eq. 101. Such is the general rule; Boyle on Char. 134; Perry, Tr. § 741; Tudor, Char. Tr. 259; Hill, Trust. 468; Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1184; 19 Beav. 597. See also 2 Swanst. *181; Amb. 236; 1 Russ. 112; 1 Phil. 185; 18 Beav. 552; Taml. 79. CHARITABLE USE.

FOREIGN COINS. Coins issued by the authority of a foreign government.

There were formerly several acts of Congress passed which rendered certain foreign gold and silver coins a legal tender in payment of debts upon certain prescribed conditions as to the fineness and weight, but by the third section of the act of Feb. 21, 1857, 11 Stat. L. 163, it was provided:—That all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold or silver coins, and declaring the same a legal tender in payment for debts, are repealed; but it shall be the duty of the director of the mint to cause assays to be made from time to time of such foreign coins as may be known to our commerce, to determine their average weight, fineness, and value, and to embrace in his annual report a statement of the results thereof.

The value of foreign coin as expressed in the money of account of the United States shall be that of the pure metal of such coin of standard value; and the values of the standard coins in circulation of the various nations of the world shall be estimated annually by the director of the mint, and be proclaimed by the secretary of the treasury; R. S. § 3564; 23 Wall. 246.

The value of foreign coins as ascertained by the estimate of the director of the mint and proclaimed by the secretary of the treasury is conclusive upon custom-house officers and importers; 115 U. S. 25.

FOREIGN COMMERCE. "Commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations, transactions which either immediately or at some stage of their progress must be extra-territorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal." . . . "Nor . . . because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, that the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce." 14 How. 568, 573.

FOREIGN CORPORATION. One created by or under the laws of any other state or government.

A corporation is a person in most senses and for most purposes of legal administration, and for the purposes of determining the jurisdiction of the federal courts it is a citizen, but it is not such in the sense that a natural person is one, and hence for most purposes corporations are "foreign" as between the states. It is settled that it is not a citizen within the meaning of the constitutional guarantees entitling "the citizens of each state to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" 13 Pet. 519; 10 Wall. 566; 125 U. S. 181; 136 id. 114; 48 Ill. 172; 47 Ind. 236; 23 N. J. L. 429. It is said that corporations are persons within the meaning of the clauses of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution concerning the deprivation of property, and concerning the equal protection of the laws; Miller, Const. U. S. 668; but another recent writer considers it "past all doubt that the framers of this provision had no idea in their minds that it would be turned into a means of protecting foreign corporations and guaranteeing to them the same privileges which are enjoyed by domestic corporations. Such a doctrine would sweep away all the previous constitutional doctrine on the question of the status of foreign corporations," giving them the privileges and immunities which they have been held not to possess, and practically preventing their taxation and regulation, or any discrimination in the privileges or terms of business accorded to them and to domestic corporations. "Down to the present time, such construction has not been arrived at, although, such is the steady tendency of the federal judiciary to enlarge the rights of corporations, that it cannot be predicted whether it will not be reached in the near future;" 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7877. The status of foreign corporations is settled by decisions of the United States Supreme Court from which certain general principles are readily deducible, and are very well stated in 6 Thompson, Corp. §§ 7875 and 7781. "A corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of the law, and where that law ceases to operate, and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty." Taney, C. J., in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519; 1 Black 286; 32 W. Va. 164. It may contract in other states within the scope of its own powers and subject to the laws of the lex loci contractus or the lex loci solutionis, as the case may be, as it was aptly said, natural persons may contract where they do not reside. "And what greater objection can there be to the capacity of an artificial person, by its agents, to make a contract within the scope of its limited powers, in a sovereignty in which it does not reside, provided such contracts are permissible by the law of the place?" 1 Pars. Sel. Cas. (Pa.) 180, 225. See 13 Pet. 383; 12 N. Y. 495; 18 Wis. 109; 10 Mo. 1059; 11 Paige 635. In the absence of proof, the validity of such contracts is presumed; 90 Ala. 207; 45 Ga. 34; 3 Duer 648.

In a very recent case it was said that a corporation organized under the laws of one state, which carries on its business in another state, carries with it into the latter state its corporate powers unless prohibited from exercising any of them by the laws or public policy of the state in which it so carries on business; 73 Fed. Rep. 956.

"Every power, however, which a corporation exercises in another state, depends for its validity upon the laws of the sovereignty in which it is exercised, and a corporation can make no valid contract without their sanction, express or implied;" Taney, C. J., in 13 Pet. 519, 588; any other exercise of power by it rests absolutely upon the doctrine of comity; id.; and is subject to the laws and regulations, process and remedial jurisdiction of the state of business or temporary domicile; 81 Me. 477; 2 Paine 501; 25 N. J. L. 381; 39 Fed. Rep. 290; 99 Mass. 148; 48 Barb. 478; and this comity stops short of permission to exercise any powers in excess either of the powers of domestic corporations of the same class; 38 Barb. 574; 128 N. Y. 205; 50 Fed. Rep. 338; 33 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 15, 16; or of the powers authorized by its own charter; 3 Head 337; 51 Mich. 145; 4 Johns. Ch. 370. So a telegraph company incorporated in Maryland, whose operations were by its charter limited to that state was refused, by the Delaware courts, a mandamus to compel a telephone company to furnish to it a telephone in aid of its business in Delaware; 31 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 714.

Foreign corporations are sometimes by the legislation of a state made domestic corporations for certain purposes, as for jurisdiction; 12 Wall. 65; 46 Fed. Rep. 47; 107 U. S. 581; 118 id. 161; and to determine when this is so is sometimes a matter of great difficulty; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7891; but where, by the concurrent action of two states, a railroad company is chartered or consolidated for police and jurisdictional purposes, it is as a whole treated as a domestic corporation of each state; id.; and cases cited in notes 2 and 3; 1 Black 286; 22 Fed. Rep. 561, 568; 12 Gratt. 655; 41 id.

551; 18 Md. 193; 5 R. I. 233; 12 Wall. 65; 25 Neb. 156, 164. See also as to the status of such corporations; 5 Railw. & Corp. L.J. 515.

The right of federal control of interstate commerce results in certain restraints upon the power of the states to regulate and tax foreign corporations so far as their business is held to be foreign or interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal constitution. The only limitation, however, on the powers of a state to exclude or exact conditions from a foreign corporation arises when the corporation is in the employ of the federal government or its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign; 125 U. S. 181; 119 id. 110. Such commerce receives the same protection when carried on by corporations or by individuals; 114 U. S. 196; and includes transportation; 15 Wall. 232; 125 U. S. 465; 135 id. 161; telegraph lines; 127 id. 640; which are also subject to federal regulation under acts of congress authorizing their location under certain conditions, on post roads; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1977; 96 U. S. 11; 105 id. 460; the sale of merchandise by a corporation of one state whether made without the state or by commercial travellers, to a resident of another; 92 Ala. 145; 57 Ark. 24; the sale of patented or copyrighted articles or books; 2 Biss. 309; 53 Ind. 454, the right to vend them anywhere within the United States being secured by the constitution and patent and copyright laws; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4884; but insurance is not commerce, and hence corporations engaged in that business may be regulated; 8 Wall. 168; 10 id. 566; 118 Pa. 322; 83 Wis. 667; 62 Ga. 379.

Subject to these constitutional limitations, the states may in their discretion, impose conditions upon foreign corporations, as essential to enable them to do business; 125 U. S. 181; 136 id. 114; 119 id. 110; they may discriminate between them and domestic corporations by a tax upon the privilege of doing business in the state, and, if it be considered good policy, make that discrimination so burdensome as to amount to exclusion; 48 Ill. 172; and the federal constitution does not secure to them against inequality of taxation either as to system or rates as compared with domestic corporations; 129 Pa. 463; 33 Fed. Rep. 121; but such tax was held contrary to the state constitution; 74 Cal. 113; though "it is clear that it violates no principle of the federal constitution as the supreme court of California seem to suppose;" 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7877, n. 3; and another state court has said that the state cannot impose upon foreign and domestic corporations taxes differing in principle; per Beasley, C. J., 31 N. J. L. 531; but this reasoning has been characterized as a dictum; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8090; as the corporation in question being engaged in interstate commerce was exempt from discrimination on that ground; And see 42 La. Ann. 428. In the United States circuit court in California it was held by Field and Sawyer, JJ., that the principle of taxation prescribed by the state constitution was in violation of the protection secured by the fourteenth amendment against unequal taxation; 13 Fed. Rep. 722; 18 id. 385. These decisions, though appealed from, are said not to have been determined by the supreme court; 33 id. 121; where it was held that a tax upon some special business carried on by individuals or corporations is not prohibited. And the supreme court, before any of these cases, had held that the provision of the Illinois constitution, requiring taxation to be uniform and equal, means by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates; 92 U. S. 575; in which the syllabus, thus stating the decision, is said to be evidently drawn by the justice writing the opinion (Miller, J.); 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8088. Again it was held that the amendment "does not prevent the classification of property for taxation"; 115 U. S. 321; nor "prohibit special legislation," as to lay a tax on the franchise or business of a corporation measured by its dividends; 134 id. 594; or gross receipts; 142 id. 339, affg. 44 Fed. Rep. 310. See also 134 U. S. 232. The provisions of state constitutions securing uniformity and equality of taxation have been held not violated by a specific tax upon a particular business; 60 Ga. 597; 33 Fed. Rep. 121; or on gross receipts of a foreign corporation on business within the state; 142 U. S. 339; or upon such corporations as a class; 85 Pa. 513, cited with approval in the last case.

The state power of taxation of such corporations is subject to certain restrictions in addition to those already stated, but as a general rule the property of the corporation owned or used within the state is alone the proper subject of taxation. The difficulty is to determine from the cases what this is. The power has been sustained as to franchises; 6 Wall. 594, 611; even of an interstate corporation acting under U. S. R. S. § 5263; 125 U. S. 530; 141 id. 40; as to tangible property within the state even if employed in interstate commerce; 18 Wall. 5, 206; 105 U. S. 460; 125 id. 530; 127 id. 117, 640; and with respect to the situs for this purpose, personal property may be separated from its owner; 141 id. 18, in which the principle was applied to rolling-stock (q. v.), of which as a general rule the situs is the domicile of the corporation; 50 Md. 417; 53 Mo. 18; but subject to exceptions growing out of its character and use; 39 Ia. 56; 62 Ill. 395. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8097, and note 3.

This power does not reach the capital of a company domiciled without the state, though a tax on a proportion of it has been sustained as a license; 47 Ind. 511; and so has a tax called an excise, on capital of a corporation having its domicile within and its business without the state; 99 Mass. 148; or a franchise tax assessed according to legislative discretion; 97 N. Y. 136; measured by the capital found to be employed within the state; 91 N. Y. 574; 104 id. 240; which is justified on the theory that part of the capital is employed within the state;

129 N. Y. 558. See TAXATION. Independently of the power of taxation foreign corporations may be excluded from doing business in other states or, if permitted to do it, are subject to such terms and conditions as the legislature may see fit to impose; 99 Mass. 148; 28 Ohio St. 521; 47 Ind. 236; 29 Mich. 238; 18 How. 404; 5 Sawy. 88; 8 Wall. 168; 10 id. 410. Such conditions may include: restrictions upon the right of eminent domain (q. v.); payment of license fees; 125 U. S. 181; provisions that any restriction imposed by the home state of the foreign corporation shall also be imposed upon corporations of that state in the domestic state; 92 N. Y. 311; 104 Ill. 653; such provisions when, as is usual, they are in the form of a license or tax are not objectionable on the ground of inequality; 115 Ind. 257, 596; 29 Kan. 672. So statutes are upheld requiring such corporations to file their charter, etc.; 130 U. S. 291; or their agents to file evidence of their authority; 101 Ind. 413; or to keep a known place of business, and a resident agent; or to appoint an attorney for service of process in suits against the company; 4 Colo. 369; in default of which contracts are voidable; 5 Sawy. 88; 6 Ore. 431; 91 Ala. 337; and all such statutes are self-enforcing; 91 id. 337.

When by constitution or statute such corporations are restricted from doing business within the state, in default of compliance with the provisions thereof, the decisions are not uniform as to what amounts to a violation of the prohibition. Such a statute does not prevent a foreign trust company, which has not complied therewith, from purchasing securities of a railroad company in the state, and taking a mortgage upon its property to secure them, since such isolated act is not doing business in the state; 47 Fed. Rep. 593; writing a policy of insurance by a foreign insurance company upon property situated in Wisconsin involves the doing of business in Wisconsin although the contract was in point of fact executed in another state; 76 Wis. 285. A foreign insurance company is not considered as doing business in Pennsylvania where no person in the state is authorized to accept application for insurance, receive or collect money thereon, or on any other account for the company, but all applications are sent direct to the foreign office; 172 Pa. 117. The same question arises when corporations "doing business" within a state are taxed, and these words are held to mean the transaction of a substantial part, not the whole, of its business; 105 N. Y. 76; the maintenance of a sale agency; 44 Fed. Rep. 324; or having part of its railroad in another state than that of its incorporation; 21 Wall. 492, affg. 66 Pa. 84; but not a mere license; 117 N. Y. 241; nor having an office in the state of its creation when its manufacturing business is carried on in another state; 46 N. J. Eq. 270.

The conclusion from an examination of the authorities is stated to be, that isolated transactions do not amount to such doing business as is prohibited, therefore the orordinary operations of commerce are not restricted nor the right to make contracts, which is secured by the construction of the commercial clause of the federal constitution, as already stated. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7936. In the work already cited are collected a great number of acts held valid in states where statutes of the class referred to are in operation. A familiar case is that of a policy of insurance written on property in a state whose laws have not been complied with by the company; a distinction has been taken between one procured by the company or a broker for it, and those solicited by citizens of the state and written in isolated instances, the situs of the contract in the latter case being the state of the insurance company; 31 Mich. 346; 37 N. J. L. 33. But this distinction is criticised and said not to be sound; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 7937, n. 2; and the weight of authority is said to be that where the foreign insurance company has an agency in another state, and has not complied with its restrictive statutes, a policy written out and returned from the home office, upon an application received and transmitted by the agent, is valid, although the agent has not complied with the statutes of the foreign state; 7 Biss. 315, 372.

Most of the statutes of this class prescribe penalties, either by quittam action or indictment, upon agents for violations of them, and it is held that such a state statute making it a misdemeanor for a person in the state to procure insurance for a resident there from an insurance company not incorporated under its laws, and which had not filed the bond required by the laws of the state relative to insurance, is not a regulation of commerce, and does not conflict with the constitution of the United States; 155 U. S. 648. Such an act in Pennsylvania was held not to apply to the owner of property who merely obtained insurance on his own property; 139 Pa. 605.

A foreign corporation which has not complied with a statute requiring all foreign corporations to file a statement in the office of the secretary of state showing the location of its agent, the names of its officers, etc., as a condition precedent to doing business in the state, cannot recover upon a bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duty of an agent appointed to conduct business in the state; 74 Fed. Rep. 597; 92 Pa. 352; 7 Biss. 30; contra, 21 N. Y. Supp. 876; 32 Ohio St. 388. The agent of a foreign corporation which has not filed its statement under this act, is presumed to know of his incapacity and becomes personally liable to one with whom he dealt on account of such corporation, and this responsibility is in addition to the statutory penalty for acting as the agent of a foreign corporation without complying with the provisions of the act; 145 Pa. 30.

When such restrictive statutes exist, contracts made in violation of them are treated in some states as voidable at the election of the other party; 3 N. Y. 266; 37 N. J. L. 33; 6 Gray 376; 42 N. H. 547; 45 Mich. 103; except as against a bona fide holder of negotiable paper for value and without notice; 8 Gray 206; or it is held that the remedy is suspended until the statute is complied with; 64 Ind. 1. 548; or that they are only void when the statute expressly so provides, as held in an able and learned opinion by Bartholomew, J., in 3 N. Dak. 138; s. c. 54 N. W. Rep. 544; 62 N. H. 622; 5 Biss. 381; 37 Fed. Rep. 242; 155 Mass. 259; or not void when the statute provides a penalty; 132 U. S. 282; 36 Ia. 546; 33 W. Va. 560; 83 Ala. 115 (but see 88 id. 275, 280, and 89 id. 198). In other states it is held that the contract cannot be enforced; 80 Pa. 15; 11 Wis. 394; 55 Ill. 85; 55 Vt. 526; but the corporation cannot set up its own non-compliance with a statute to avoid its own contract; 145 Pa. 30; 102 Mass. 221; 141 Ill. 85; 63 Ind. 347; 80 Ia. 56; 102 U. S. 415. Such contracts may be validated by the legislature, by subsequent act; 93 Ill. 483. The rule avoiding them as against public policy is not to be extended; L. R. 19 Eq. 465. Whether compliance with such statutes is presumed or must be averred and proved is a point on which the decisions differ; it is held that there is such presumption in 55 Ark. 163, 625; 36 Mich. 261; 73 Mo. 368; 106 Ind. 242; and an analogous case is 28 N. Y. 324. On the other hand, it has been frequently held that compliance must be averred and proved; 89 Ala. 198; 88 id. 275, 280; 55 Vt. 526; but this view is considered illogical and unsound by a recent writer; 31 Am. L. Rev. 19; and also by a leading authority who considers the best opinion to be that compliance need not be averred; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7965; citing as conclusive the analogous case in which failure of a liquor dealer to have a license is held to be a good defence to an action for liquor sold; 145 U. S. 421; although no one would think of averring and proving his license. With much reason, therefore, it was held that such averment is not necessary, and nothing short of a distinct averment of non-compliance will make proof to the contrary necessary; 55 Ark. 625.

The question of the power of a foreign corporation to take hold and transmit title to land is one of public policy, and no general rule can be formulated from the decisions and statutes which must (as in most matters affecting land titles) be referred to with reference to a particular state. Enabling statutes will be found in many states, either general, or where such legislation is permissible, for special cases. It can at least be suggested that in the absence of any such legislation, or of express decisions, serious doubt will arise as to the power. The conclusion is reached by Judge Thompson that in the absence of prohibitory local law, there is much authority that, if authorized to do so in the state of their creation, corporations may hold land in other states; 117 Ill. 237; 19 Fed. Rep. 73; 25 Vt. 433; 5 McLean 111; 25 Mich. 214; unless forbidden to do so either by the public policy of the state; 8 Biss. 234; 73 Ill. 142; or its statute law; 132 Pa. 591, where the subject is considered at length by Paxson, J., with respect to general enabling laws and proceedings by the state in such cases; 14 Pet. 123; 32 Fed. Rep. 22. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7914.

It is sometimes held that the power exists for business purposes, as an office; 13 Pa. 13; 67 Ill. 568; 117 id. 237; and it has been held that a Connecticut company having no business there could operate as a land company in New Hampshire; 19 Fed. Rep. 73; contra, 67 Ill. 567; but the tendency of American legislation is to permit the holding of land by foreign corporations, for business but not for speculation; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7917. The right of such corporation to take and hold title to real estate cannot be questioned in ejectment by it against a former managing director; 153 U. S. 523. See ALIEN.

The power of acquiring land has been held to exist until forbidden; 101 U. S. 352; and as against every one except the state, proceeding for a forfeiture; 14 Pet. 123; 73 Ind. 68; 110 Ill. 65; 117 id. 237; 98 U. S. 621. Of such proceedings it is said that the only one in this country is that in Pennsylvania cited infra; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7918, n. 3.

Land may generally be taken by devise; 24 Pa. 474; 31 W. Va. 621; but only by corporations having charter power so to take; 29 Barb. 650; 72 Ill. 50; see 15 Ohio St. 537; 38 Conn. 342; and upon the question of devise generally, see 9 Cow. 437. Foreign corporations have usually the power to acquire land by foreclosure of mortgages; 30 N. J. Eq. 408; 6 McLean 1; 15 Gray 491; and in such cases the state only and not the mortgagor can set up a want of power; 28 Neb. 672; 79 Ind. 172.

In all cases involving the right of foreign corporations to hold lands the lex rei sitæ governs; Sto. Conf. L. § 428; 4 Sandf. 252; 29 Barb. 650. See ESCHEAT.

Whenever a foreign corporation has the power to contract in a state or country it may enforce it or recover damages for a breach in like manner as other persons may do in like case; 2 Stra. 807; 2 Ld. Raym. 1535, note; 5 Cra. 61; 13 Pet. 519; 6 Cow. 46; 4 Johns. Ch. 370; 18 Wis. 109; 6 Metc. 391; 5 McLean 111; 13 Vt. 97; 17 Me. 34; 1 Hill, S. C. 44. From these and many other cases it is clearly a principle long and well settled that, unless prohibited by local statutory law, a corporation of one state may sue in another by its corporate title. Such prohibitory legislation exists in many states as already sufficiently shown; supra. When it does not exist this right of action extends to all cases and causes of action as to which a remedy exists in favor of other persons or domestic corporations; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7978; and see id. §§ 7380-8. An action by such corporation for libel has been sustained; 35 Ill. App. 627.

In such actions when, as in most jurisdictions, it is unnecessary to aver or prove the corporate existence in suits by or against corporations (see 6 Thomp. Corp.

§ 7658), or at least only to make very formal allegation of it (id. § 7661); the same rule applies to foreign corporations; id. § 7984; 31 Ind. 283; 26 Ohio St. 562; nor, as has been held, in the absence of a statute either expressly or by authoritative construction requiring it, need there be an averment of compliance with statutory pre-requisites for doing business; 2 Dak. 280; 40 N. Y. Supp. 360; 25 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 8; the ground of dispensing with the averment of compliance with such statutes is the presumption of legality and compliance with local law, discussed, supra.

Apart from this question, which only affects the right of action upon contracts made within the state, the foreign corporation has, as to all other matters, the same rights and remedies as other non-residents; 4 Colo. 369; 67 Ind. 549; 3 N. M. 237. See 73 Cal. 599. It may foreclose a mortgage even when by statute disqualified from acquiring real estate; 91 Pa. 491; 36 Minn. 108; contra, 89 Ala. 198; and purchase at the execution sale; 94 Ind. 14; or maintain an action on an insurance policy; 11 Colo. 419; or for a tax wrongfully paid; 9 Mont. 145. Where a foreign corporation, by the law of its domicile, continues to exist after the expiration of its charter for the purpose of suing on debts accrued before such expiration, it may also sue in such case in New York; 40 N. Y. Supp. 360.

In suits against foreign corporations the question of jurisdiction is of first importance, and it is the general rule that a corporation, like a natural person, cannot be sued in personam in a state within whose limits it has never been found; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7988. This conclusion springs naturally from the principle that a "corporation being the creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created;" 8 Wall. 181; but this rule is subject to exceptions growing out of the theory that, under certain circumstances, such corporations will be held in law to have acquired a domicile within a state, at least so far as to subject them to suit.

In England in spite of dicta to the contrary; L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; 1 Ex. Div. 237; there was said by the Lord Chief Justice to be no case prior to 1835 holding foreign corporations suable in that country; 54 L. J. Q. B. Div. 527. The necessities of the case resulted in a rule authorized by statute providing for acquiring jurisdiction over a foreign corporation carrying on business in England by service on a "head officer" in charge of its business there; and the court of appeal sustained the jurisdiction so acquired; 58 L. J. Q. B. Div. 508; 33 Ch. Div. 446. See 5 H. L. Cas. 416.

In the United States the exceptions to the general rule first stated are thus classified by Thompson: (1) Where a corporation had established a permanent agency in the state or country; (2) when it is agreed with the state that process may be served in it; (3) when it is agreed with the opposite party that an action may be brought against it to enforce a contract against it in a state or country other than its domicile; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7988. These exceptions were rendered necessary to meet the case of corporations in recent years doing business so extensively outside of the domicile of their creation, and particularly of what are known as "tramp corporations," purposely organized in another state to do business in their own and evade its laws; besides, trading corporations being equally migratory with individuals, the reason originally assigned for want of jurisdiction had ceased to exist; id. § 7989. Accordingly it may be considered that corporations may acquire business domiciles in other states and countries, and, wherever they do so, they may be sued without the aid of local statute law; id. In most, if not all of the states, however, statutes exist requiring foreign corporations to appoint an agent for process as a condition of doing business in the state, and so, also, by local statutes, jurisdiction is affirmatively assumed. See 129 Mass. 444; 4 Mo. App. 595; 74 Mo. 457; 3 Hun 171; 40 N. H. 548; 41 Ga. 660; 46 Ala. 641; 83 id. 498; 32 N. J. L. 15; 24 id. 223; 29 Fed. Rep. 17; 44 id. 31; 115 N. Y. 437. Delaware Constitution, 1897, Art. ix. § 5. The principles upon which the jurisdiction rests are that it must appear in the record that the corporation was engaged in business in the state, and that the person upon whom service was made represented the company there in the business; and while the certificate of service is prima facie evidence of the latter fact, it is open to contradiction when the record is offered in evidence in another state; Field, J., in 106 U. S. 350.

A corporation may subject itself to the jurisdiction of a foreign state by contract with a private person; 60 L. T. N. s. 924; or with the state; 91 Ala. 337. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7992.

Foreign corporations are sometimes held not liable to suit, except ex contractu, upon domestic contracts; 55 Ga. 194; or for torts committed within the state; 112 N. Y. 315; 76 Ala. 388; 16 Fed. Rep. 436; 25 N. J. L. 381; unless the statutory jurisdiction extends to any cause of action; 84 N. Y. 63; 40 Md. 595; 21 Wis. 506; nor are they liable to suits by non-residents on foreign contracts; 46 Vt. 697; contra, 132 Mass. 432.

The United States circuit court has no inherent power, as a court of equity, at the suit of domestic shareholders, to dissolve an English mining company, owning and operating a mine in the United States, and to wind up its business operations; nor has it any such power under the act of parliament known as the "Companies Act, 1862;" 58 Fed. Rep. 644; s. c. 7 C. C. A. 412.

With respect to what constitutes a valid service on a foreign corporation, the subject is generally regulated by statutes which must be consulted with reference to any given case, and reference may be made to 6 Thomp. Corp. Ch. 198, where the decisions are collected as to service on different classes of officers and agents. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court establish the rule that jurisdiction cannot be acquired by service upon an officer casually within the state for purposes not connected with the business of the corporation; 18 How. 404; 106 U. S. 350; 137 id. 98; 149 id. 94; 150 id. 653; 156 id. 518. The same view is supported by the weight of authority in the state courts; 141 Pa. 462; 71 Ga. 246; 26 Minn. 233; 91 Ill. 170; 32 N. J. L. 15; 2 McArthur 146; 40 Ill. App. 547; Alderson, Jud. Writs and Proc. 219; Murfree, For. Corp. 210; contra, 87 N. Y. 137; 61 Mich. 226; 47 La. Ann. 389; but in two of these states the federal courts have refused to follow the ruling of the state court; 22 Fed. Rep. 635; 44 id. 31; 68 id. 442.

So an insurance company having an isolated transaction in a state through a broker who deals with the company through another broker is not "doing business" or "found" in the state so as to be liable to substituted service or to service on the brokers; 55 Fed. Rep. 751.

Foreign corporations, it is said, cannot be logically dealt with as non-residents within the meaning of attachment laws, where they have become domesticated so far as to be liable to actions in personam; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8060; 29 Mo. 75; 7 Bush 116. See 27 N. J. L. 206; 64 Ga. 18. Formerly a foreign attachment could not be issued in courts of the United States; 4 Cra. 421; 3 Dill. 474; 103 U. S. 794; but in 1872 the federal, circuit, and district courts were authorized to adopt the state laws in force relative to attachments; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 915; and the federal courts now apply state statutes relating to attachments to foreign corporations; 51 Fed. Rep. 580. Such corporations may also be summoned as garnishees whenever they would be liable for the debt attached, or by residence or agency are amenable to process; 9 N. H. 394; 31 Pa. 114; 102 Ill. 249; 9 Conn. 430; or when they do business in the state and have a managing agent there; 51 Fed. Rep. 580.

It has been held that the dissolution of a corporation dissolves a foreign attachment against it, on the ground that to compel an appearance was the primary object of the process; 8 W. & S. 207; but the soundness of this case has been doubted on the ground that jurisdiction having attached to the res continues for the real object of the suit, — satisfaction of the demand; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8062; and this view is supported by another case which holds that comity does not interfere with it; 68 Ill. 348. But in a very recent case it was held that a state statute providing that corporations shall continue to exist for a certain period after the time fixed for dissolution, for the purpose of prosecuting and defending suits, and that no body of persons acting as a corporation shall set up want of legal organization as a defence to a suit against them as a corporation, does not control or affect foreign corporations merely doing business in the state; and a suit against such a corporation abates upon its dissolution, so that, if a judgment be thereafter entered against it, the same is void; 74 Fed. Rep. 425. See DISSOLUTION of CORPORATIONS.

A corporation, by doing business in another state and becoming liable to suit there, both in state and federal courts, does not lose its right to claim, for the purposes of federal jurisdiction, a citizenship in the state by which it was created; Murfr. For. Corp. 236. When sued in a foreign state it may remove the cause to a federal court; id.; 104 U. S. 5; 22 Fed. Rep. 353. But it is otherwise if the effect of the legislation under which it enters the foreign state be to confer corporate privileges upon it in that state. In such case the company is a citizen of both states; 22 Fed. Rep. 563; 104 U. S. 5.

FOREIGN COUNTY. Another country. It may be in the same kingdom, it will still be foreign. See Blount, Foreign.

FOREIGN COURT. The circuit court of the United States is not a foreign court relatively to the court of chancery of New Jersey; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 426.

FOREIGN CREDITOR. One who is resident in a state or country foreign to that of the domicil of the debtor or the situs of his property.

FOREIGN DECREE. See FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

FOREIGN DIVORCE. One obtained in a state or country other than that in which the marriage was solemnized and the parties, or at least the one against whom the proceeding is taken, are domiciled. See DIVORCE.

FOREIGN DOMICIL. See DOMICIL.

FOREIGN DOMINION. In English Law. A country, at one time subject to a foreign prince; which, by conquest or cession, has become a part of the dominion of the British Crown. 5 B. & S. 290.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT. The statute 59 Geo. III. c. 69, for preventing British citizens from enlisting as sailors or soldiers in the service of a foreign power. Wharton, Lex.; 4 Steph. Com. 226. See NEUTRALITY.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE. Drafts drawn on a foreign state or county. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

FOREIGN FACTOR. One who resides in a country foreign to that of his principal. See FACTOR.

FOREIGN FISHING. Oil, manufactured from whales caught by the crew of an American vessel, is not the product of foreign fishing within the purview of the revenue laws of the United States, though it has since been owned and brought into port by persons in the foreign service. 2 Sumn. 336.

FOREIGN-GOING SHIP. In the English Merchant Shipping Act, any ship employed in trading between some place or places in the United Kingdom, and other places specified in said act outside the limits of the kingdom.

FOREIGN JUDGMENT. A judgment of a foreign tribunal.

It is a general rule that foreign judgments are admitted as conclusive evidence of all matters directly involved in the case decided, where the same question is brought up incidentally. 1 Greenl. Ev. 547, and note; 12 Pick. 572; 7 Bost. L. Rep. 461. Such judgments and decrees in rem, whether relating to immovable property or movables within the jurisdiction of the foreign court, are binding everywhere; L. R. 4 H. L. 414; [1897] 1 Q. B. 55; [1896] 2 Q. B. 455. This rule applies to admiralty proceedings in rem founded on actual possession of the subject-matter, and garnishment proceeding in a like case.

It seems to be the better opinion that judgments in personam regular on their face, which are sought to be enforced in another country, are conclusive evidence, subject to a re-examination, in the courts where the new action is brought, only for irregularity, fraud, or lack of jurisdiction as to the cause or parties; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 546; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 372; Story, Confl. Laws § 607; 2 Swanst. 325; Dougl. 6, n.; 3 Sim. 458; 6 Q. B. 288; 4 Munf. 241; 15 N. H. 227; 13 Gray 591; 99 Mass. 273; 20 Conn. 544; 21 Iowa 58; but see 28 Conn. 28; 8 Paige, Ch. 44; 5 Wall. 290. It was formerly held that they were prima facie evidence merely. See 2 H. Bla. 410; Dougl. 1, 6; 3 Maule & S. 20; 9 Mass. 462; 34 N. J. Eq. 130; 13 Gray 591; 21 Ia. 370; 13 John. 192; 88 Me. 406. But this theory has been entirely overthrown, the doctrine of their conclusive character having been settled in England by the case of Bank of Australia v. Nias, L. R. 6 Q. B. 179. It is also fully recognized in this country; 26 N. Y. 148; 49 id. 571; 5 Hamm. 545; 54 Me. 28; 55 id. 389; and see the case of Hilton v. Guyot, infra.

The subject of the conclusiveness of foreign judgments has been treated with much diversity of opinion in the English courts. That they are prima facie evidence to sustain an action is clear according to all the authorities, but whether conclusive, and if not so in all cases, what defences may be admitted, was for a long time not definitely settled by the English courts. The cases were very fully reviewed by Judge Redfield with this result.

"So that now it may be regarded as fully established in England, that the contract resulting from a foreign judgment is equally conclusive, in its force and operation, with that implied by any domestic judgment. But there is still a very essential and important distinction between the two. Domestic judgments rest upon the conclusive force of the record, which is absolutely unimpeachable. Foreign judgments are mere matters en pais, to be proved the same as an arbitration and award, or an account stated; to be established, as matter of fact before the jury; and by consequence subject to any contradiction or impeachment which might be urged against any other matter resting upon oral proof. Hence any fraud which entered into the concoction of the judgment itself is proper to be adduced, as an answer to the same; but no fraud which occurred and was known to the opposite party, before the rendition of such foreign judgment, and which might, therefore, have been brought to the notice of the foreign court, can be urged in defence of it. It is proper to add, that while the English courts thus recognize the general force and validity of foreign judgments, it has been done under such limitations and qualifications that great latitude still remains for breaking the force of, and virtually disregarding such foreign judgments as proceed upon an obvious misapprehension of the principles governing the case; or where they are produced by partiality or favoritism, or corruption, or where upon their face they appear to be at variance with the instinctive principles of universal justice. But these are rare exceptions." Sto. Conf. Laws, Redfield's ed. § 618 a-618 k. And a very recent commentator states precisely the same conclusion from the English cases; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 277.

An English writer on the subject attributes the vacillation of the courts of that country to the fact that two doctrines have been discussed as the basis of the conclusive effect given to a foreign judgment. The earlier theory was that of comity, which, as defined by Blackburn, J., in opposing the doctrine, is that "it is an admitted principle of the law of nations, that a state is bound to enforce within its territories the judgment of a foreign tribunal;" L. R. 6 Q. B. 139. This doctrine was supported by Lords Nottingham, Ellenborough, Kenyon, Cockburn, and Brougham, and Chief Baron Pigot, Sir G. Jessel, and Sir R. Phillimore; 2 Swanst. 326, n.; 4 Campb. 28; 4 M. & S. 141; 7 Term 681; 30 L. J. C. P. 177; 2 Cl. & F. 470; Ir. Rep. 1 C. L. 471; 50 L. J. P. 30; L. R. 4 P. C. 144. Of the objections raised the most important was said to be uncertainty; Piggott, For. Judg. 6. See Sto. Conf. Laws § 598. The other theory, termed that of obligation, is that when a competent court has adjudicated a certain sum to be due, a legal obligation arises to pay that sum, and an action of debt to enforce the judgment may be sustained. This was first enunciated by Parke, Baron, in 1845; 9 M. & W. 810; 14 L. J. Ex. 145; it was approved in 1870 by Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.; L. R. 6 Q. B. 139; and by the same judges and Lush and Hannen, JJ., id. 155.

Both ideas are involved in what the English writer last cited terms the theory of obligation and comity, which is in substance this: A legal obligation arises in the state where the judgment was rendered, accompanied by a correlative sanction under which the obligation may be made effective so long as the defendant is within the jurisdiction of the foreign court; but when, by his absence from that jurisdiction, the remedy is no longer available, the obligation will, in another state or country, be clothed by comity with an auxiliary sanction to replace the correlative sanction which it has lost; Piggott, For. Judg. 18.

The foreign court must have had jurisdiction, and when the defendant was not a subject of or resident in the country in which the judgment was obtained, so that there existed nothing imposing on him any duty to obey it, the judgment cannot be enforced in an English court; L. R. 6 Q. B. 155; 67 L. T. 767. But the conclusiveness of a judgment when there was jurisdiction is illustrated by a decision that a mistake of English law as to an English contract, apparent on the face of the proceedings, was not ground of defence to a foreign judgment; L. R. 6 Q. B. 139.

In this country the subject has recently been elaborately discussed by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Hilton v. Guyot, in the argument and opinions of which are collected all the authorities. In that case it was held that "when an action is brought in a court of this country, by a citizen of a foreign country, against one of our own citizens, to recover a sum of money adjudged by a court of that country to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and the foreign judgment appears to have been rendered by a competent court, having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties, and upon due allegations and proofs, and opportunity to defend against them, and its proceedings are according to the course of a civilized jurisprudence, and are stated in a clear and formal record, the judgment is prima facie evidence, at least, of the truth of the matter adjudged; and it should be held conclusive upon the merits tried in the foreign court, unless some special ground is shown for impeaching the judgment, as by showing that it was affected by fraud or prejudice, or that, by the principles of international law, and by the comity of our own country, it should not be given full credit and effect;" 159 U. S. 113.

In the opinion of the majority of the court, Mr. Justice Gray reviews all the leading American and English cases, and examines in detail existing laws and usages of civilized nations, and reaches the conclusion that "where there has been opportunity for a full and fair trial abroad before a court of competent jurisdiction, conducting the trial upon regular proceedings; after due citation or voluntary appearance of the defendant, and under a system of jurisprudence likely to secure an impartial administration of justice between the citizens of its own country and those of other countries, and there is nothing to show either prejudice in the court, or in the system of laws under which it was sitting, or fraud in procuring the judgment, or any other special reason why the comity of this nation should not allow it full effect, the merits of the case should not, in an action brought in this country upon the judgment, be tried afresh, as on a new trial or an appeal, upon the mere assertion of the party that the judgment was erroneous in law or in fact."

But the court go further and rest the decision upon the principle of reciprocity, adopting and applying the rule that "judgments rendered in France, or in any other foreign country, by the laws of which our own judgments are reviewable upon the merits, are not entitled to full credit and conclusive effect when sued upon in this country, but are prima facie evidence only of the justice of the plaintiff's claim."

Accordingly, it was held that, such being the practice of the French courts, with regard to American judgments, the judgment recovered in France, which was the cause of action, was not conclusive, but subject to review upon its merits.

Chief Justice Fuller delivered a dissenting opinion in which concurred Harlan, Brewer, and Jackson, JJ., taking the ground that the question was not one of comity, but to be determined upon the broad principle of public policy that there should be an end of litigation, and that this applied equally to foreign and domestic judgments.

The principles of this decision were at the same term applied to a Canadian judgment which was held conclusive inasmuch as the pleadings showed a submission to the jurisdiction of a competent court. Mere averments that the judgment was "irregular and void," and that there was "no jurisdiction or authority on the part of the court to enter such a judgment upon the facts and the pleadings" are but averments of legal conclusions and so insufficient to impeach the judgment; and it was held that, in answer to an action upon a foreign judgment the specific facts must be given upon which it is supposed to be irregular and void or based upon fraud. If rendered upon regular proceedings and due notice or appearance, and not procured by fraud, in a foreign country, by whose laws a judgment of one of our own courts, under like circumstances, is held conclusive of the merits, it is conclusive between the parties in an action brought upon it in this country, as to all matters pleaded and which might have been tried; 159 U. S. 235.

Foreign adjudications as respects torts are not binding; Whart. Conf. L. § 793, 827; and a judgment in Germany for infringement of trade-mark cannot be set up in the United States; 50 Fed. Rep. 369. See TRADE-MARK.

The various states of the United States are considered as foreign to each other, with respect to this subject; 137 U. S. 287. In Louisiana it has been decided that a judgment rendered by a Spanish tribunal under the former government of that state is not a foreign judgment; 4 Mart. La. 301, 310.

Foreign judgments may be evidenced by exemplifications certified under the great seal of the state or country where the judgment is recorded, or under the seal of the court where the judgment remains; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 501; by a copy proved to be a true copy, or by the certificate of an officer authorized by law, which certificate must itself be properly authenticated; 2 Cra. 238; 5 id. 335; 2 Cai. 155; 7 Johns. 514; 8 Mass. 273; 60 Ill. App. 309. The acts of foreign tribunals which are recognized by the law of nations, such as courts of admiralty and the like, are sufficiently authenticated by copies under seal of the tribunal; 5 Cra. 335; 3 Conn. 171. The record of a judgment of a foreign court, not of record and of inferior territorial jurisdiction, is not admissible in evidence, in the absence of proof of facts showing that the court had jurisdiction; 37 Ill. App. 23. See 113 N. C. 453.

The constitution of the United States provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state; Const. Art. IV. § 1. It is enacted by the act of May 26, 1790, that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form. And the said records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records are or shall be taken; and by the act of March 27, 1804, that from and after the passage of this act all records and exemplifications of office books, which are or may be kept in any public office of any state, not appertaining to a court, shall be proved or admitted in any other court or office in any other state, by the attestation of the keeper of the said records or books, and the seal of his office thereto annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the presiding justice of the court of the county or district, as the case may be, in which such office is or may be kept, or of the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor, or the keeper of the great seal of the state, that the said attestation is in due form and by the proper officer; and the said certificate, if given by the presiding justice of a court, shall be further authenticated by the clerk or prothonotary of the said court, who shall certify, under his hand and the seal of his office, that the presiding justice is duly commissioned and qualified; or, if the said certificate be given by the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor, or keeper of the great seal, it shall be under the great seal of the state in which the said certificate is made. And the said records and exemplifications, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court and office within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts or offices of the state from whence the same are or shall be taken; and the provisions of both acts shall extend to the records, etc., of the territories; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 906.

The object of this clause was to prevent judgments from being disregarded in other states; 25 Mich. 247; it relates only to the validity and force of judgments rendered in one state where proved in another; 12 Fed. Rep. 375. It does not change the nature of a judgment; 13 Pet. 312; but places judgments rendered in another state on a different footing from what are known at common law as foreign judgments; 9 Wheat. 1; 3 N. J. L. 466; 6 id. 236. The clause makes the record evidence but does not affect the jurisdiction either of the court in which the judgment is rendered or of that in which it is offered in evidence. The judgment of a foreign state differs only from a foreign judgment in not being re-examinable for fraud in obtaining them, if the court had jurisdiction; 127 U. S. 265, 292. A judgment rendered in another state is to be regarded as a domestic judgment; 27 Pa. 247; 53 Vt. 177; but it is not on the footing of a domestic judgment so far as to be enforced by execution, but the manner of their enforcement is left to the state in which they are sued on, pleaded, or offered in evidence. When pleaded and proved they are conclusive, and if their enforcement is denied it amounts to the denial of a right secured by the constitution of the United States; 146 U. S. 657. The constitution and the rule of comity include only judgments in civil actions, not in criminal prosecutions; 17 Mass. 514. A judgment for a penalty cannot be enforced in another state, but whether a law is penal is to be determined by the courts called upon to enforce it; and if the court of another state declines to give it full faith and credit because, in its opinion, it is for a penalty, it denies the constitutional right; 146 U. S. 657. As to the effect of a decree of divorce in another state, see DIVORCE. The judgment of a state court has the same validity and effect in any other state as it has in the state where it was rendered; 6 Wheat. 129; 9 How. 520; 50 Mo. App. 373; 141 U. S. 87; 48 Fed. Rep. 510. The judicial proceedings within the act are only such as have been rendered by a competent court, with full jurisdiction; 9 Mass. 462; 45 Ill. App. 533; 50 N. J. L. 636; 17 Wend. 521; 11 How. 165; it may be a superior court of record or an inferior tribunal; 30 N. H. 78; 13 Ohio 209; including a judgment of the justice of the peace; 94 Tenn. 721. A judgment may be attacked on the ground of a want of jurisdiction; Mill. Const. U. S. 632; 18 Wall. 457; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 315; 27 Ohio St. 600; 22 S. E. Rep.

(S. C.) 178; 99 Cal. 374; 138 U. S. 439; 133 id. 107; thus a judgment against a defendant who was not served with proper process, and who did not appear, would be entitled to no credit in another state; 11 How. 165; 137 U. S. 287; 2 Misc. Rep. 570; but facts establishing the want of jurisdiction must be shown; 74 Fed. Rep. 51. A judgment of a foreign state, against several defendants jointly, in an action in which one of them was not served with process, cannot, in Rhode Island, be enforced against one of such defendants who in the foreign action was served with process; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 4. See 4 Harring. 281; 3 id. 241, 517. In cases where the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, fraud in obtaining the judgment may be set up as a defence; 139 Ill. 311; 70 Hun 197; or if it will constitute a ground of collateral attack; id.; 148 Ill. 536; but see 5 Wall. 290; but fraud cannot be pleaded as a ground of attack, in one Federal court, upon a judgment obtained in another; 138 U. S. 439. The constitution does not give to a judgment all the attributes to which it was entitled in the state where it was rendered; 7 Gill. & J. 434; but if duly certified, it is admissible in evidence in any state; 7 Cal. 54, 247; a state may give a judgment rendered in another state any effect it may think proper, always provided it does not derogate from the legal effect conferred upon it by the constitution and the laws of congress in this behalf; 9 Mass. 462. In case, however, full faith and credit is not given to the judgment of another state, any judgment thereon will be erroneous; 7 Wall. 139. When the court rendering the judgment has jurisdiction, its judgment is final as to the merits; 5 Wall. 302; 14 Tex. 352; 9 Mass. 462; 7 Gill. 430; 67 Fed. Rep. 459; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 306; but no greater effect can be given to a judgment than it had in the state where it was rendered; 17 Wall. 529; 18 N. Y. 468. If a judgment or decree is enforceable in the state where it is rendered, it is enforceable in any other state; 9 Pet. 86; but the constitutional provision does not give validity to a void judgment or decree; 12 Wheat. 213; 4 N. J. L. 192; 14 Pet. 49; 148 N. Y. 34. It does not impose on any state the duty of following the decision of another state as to the construction of the statutes of the latter; 3 McCrary 609; 18 Hun 507; nor enforcing within its territory the law of another state. A judgment entered in pursuance of a warrant of attorney, in a state in which such judgments are authorized, has the same force when sued on in another state as a judgment in an adversary proceeding; an action thereon can only be defeated by want of jurisdiction by fraud in procuring the judgment, or defences based on matter arising after the judgment was rendered; any defence to the original cause of action is conclusively negated by the judgment; but the sufficiency of the warrant may be inquired into and is to be determined from the evidence of the law of the state of its entry; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 306. Where a judgment is revived by scire facias, without service on or appearance by the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover thereon in another state where the defendant resides, after the statute of limitations has run against the original judgment; such revival is either a new proceeding substituted for an action of debt, and hence invalid without service, or a continuation of the original action, and therefore barred; 161 U. S. 642; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 489. And in an action on such judgment the statute of the former governs and not that of the place where the judgment was rendered; 65 Hun 17.

A judgment in personam against a corporation, obtained in a federal court of a sister state, is conclusive on the merits of the case in the courts of every other state when made the basis of an action; and the directors and managers of the corporation are as conclusively bound by the judgment as the corporation itself; 46 Fed. Rep. 584.

Judgments of the Indian courts in the Indian Territory stand on the same footing with those of the Federal territorial courts, and are entitled to the same faith and credit; 59 Fed. Rep. 836.

The provisions of the act of Congress relating to the authentication of records and judicial proceedings must be complied with in order to secure the admission of the exemplification as evidence in a suit upon the judgment in another state; it is not necessary that such exemplification should be used in pleading or in a statement of claim or affidavit of defence; 124 Pa. 280. As to pleading, see 27 Cent. L. J. 400; 26 Abb. N. C. 315.

As to the effect to be given to foreign judgments, see Story, Confl. Laws; Freem. Judgt. 596; Dalloz, Étranger; Piggott, Foreign Judgments; 20 Myers, Federal Decisions 668; 4 Law Magazine & Rev., 4th ed. 417; CONFLICT OF LAWS; JUDGMENT; FOREIGN CORPORATION.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION. The exercise by one government, within the territory of another, of powers acquired by it in any manner whatsoever, whether by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, or otherwise.

A jurisdiction other than that of the former.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION ACT. In English Law. The stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 94, by which it was provided that the crown may exercise any power or jurisdiction it may have in any foreign place or country in the same manner as if obtained by cession or conquest; and that any act done in pursuance of such power or jurisdiction shall be as valid as if done according to the local law then in force in such place. 1 Steph. Com. 103.

FOREIGN JURY. One drawn from a county other than that in which issue is joined. See JURY.

FOREIGN KINGDOM. One under the dominion of a foreign prince. 19 Johns. 375.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE. When in an action of slander the words complained of were spoken in German a declaration setting forth the words in English is not sufficient; the words must be stated in the foreign language as spoken, with an averment of the signification in English, and that they were understood by those who heard them; 3 Wend. 394. See also Cro. Eliz. 496, 865; SLANDER.

When a will was made and proved in French and in the probate it was translated into English, but as it appeared, falsely, the translation was not conclusive, but the English court of chancery held that it might determine according to what the translation ought to be; 1 P. Wms. 526.

FOREIGN LAW. The laws of a foreign country.

The courts do not take judicial notice of foreign laws; and they must, therefore, be proved as matters of fact; 4 Mood. Parl. Cas. 21; 3 Esp. 163; 1 D. & L. 614; 40 Tex. 291; 9 Humphr. 546; 2 Barb. Ch. 582; 19 Vt. 182; 9 Mo. 3; 60 Ind. 128; 64 Ga. 184; 8 Mass. 99; 2 Dow. & C. 171; 4 Conn. 517; 1 Paige 220; 10 Watts 158; 9 Gill 1; written laws, by the text, or a collection printed by authority, or a copy certified by a proper officer, or, in their absence, perhaps, by the opinion of experts as secondary evidence; Story, Confl. Laws § 641; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 486; 14 How. 426; 2 Cra. 237; 8 Ad. & E. 208; 6 Wend. 475; 10 Ala. n. s. 885; 1 Tex. 93; 10 Ark. 516; they may be construed with the aid of text-books as well as of experts; 2 Low. 142; where experts are called, the sanction of an oath is said to be required; 4 Conn. 517; 12 id. 384. See 12 Vt. 396; Story, Confl. Laws § 641; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 488, note. As to the manner of proving unwritten laws of foreign countries, the decisions show a divergence of opinion; the rule, as laid down by Lowell, J., in the case of The Pashawick, 2 Low. 142, where the reasoning of Lord Stowell, in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Consist. 54, is cited with approval, is, that the unwritten law of England may be proved in the United States courts not by experts only, but also by text-writers of authority, and by the printed reports of adjudged cases; Whart. Ev. § 300. But mere citations of English statutes and authorities cannot be accepted as proving English laws; 50 Fed. Rep. 73. But in respect to the laws of other foreign countries, where a system obtains wholly different from our own, the rigid proof by the testimony of experts alone should be insisted on. See 11 Cl. & F. 85; 14 E. L. & Eq. 249; 4 Cow. 508, n.; 1 Wall. Jr. C. C. 47; 4 Johns. Ch. 507; as to who can prove such laws; 48 N. H. 176; 1 Johns. 395; 2 La. Ann. 391. It need not be a lawyer; 74 Ill. 197; 26 N. H. 152; 8 C. B. 812; 37 Neb. 614; 129 U. S. 397. The United States courts take judicial notice of the laws of every state and territory in the United States; 35

Fed. Rep. 642; but the decisions of the various state courts are not harmonious on this point as far as regards the laws of each other. In Tennessee; 9 Heisk. 873; and Rhode Island; 11 R. I. 411; the courts will take judicial notice of the laws of sister states; in Illinois, of the jurisdiction of courts in other states; 17 Ill. 577; and the supreme court has decided that where a state recognizes acts done in pursuance of the laws of another state, the courts of the first state should take judicial cognizance of such laws so far as may be necessary to judge of the acts alleged to be done under them; 8 Wall. 513. In Louisiana, where a statute of another state has been properly brought to the notice of the court, it will in all future cases take notice of that statute and presume the law of the foreign state to be the same until some change is shown; 21 La. Ann. 594; 5 Ind. App. 89. In Pennsylvania it has been held that the courts should take notice of the local laws of a sister state in the same manner as the supreme court of the United States would do on a writ of error to a judgment; 27 Pa. 479; but see, contra, 9 Wis. 328; 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 335. See 31 Fla. 10. A copy of the authorized statute-book is recognized as proof of a foreign law in Pennsylvania; 2 Pa. 85; and the construction of those statutes may be proved either by the reports of cases, or by one familiar therewith; 163 Pa. 245; 170 Pa. 84.

Foreign unwritten laws, customs, and usages may be proved, and are ordinarily proved, by parol evidence; and when such evidence is objected to on the ground that the law in question is a written law, the party objecting must show that fact; 15 S. & R. 87; 2 La. 154.

The manner of proof varies according to circumstances. As a general rule, the best testimony or proof is required; for no proof will be received which presupposes better testimony attainable by the party who offers it. When the best testimony cannot be obtained, secondary evidence will be received; 2 Cra. 237. See 14 Cent. L. J. 125, where there is a general article on this title. A foreign law must be proved like any other fact, and in the absence of such proof it will be presumed that the common law prevails, in the foreign jurisdiction; 52 Mo. App. 60.

Exemplified or sworn copies of written laws and other public documents must, as a general thing, be produced when they can be procured; but should they be refused by the competent authorities, then inferior proof may be admitted; id.

When our own government has promulgated a foreign law or ordinance of a public nature as authentic, that is held sufficient evidence of its existence; 1 Cra. 38; 1 Dall. 462; 12 S. & R. 203.

When foreign laws cannot be proved by some mode which the law respects as being of equal authority to an oath, they must be verified by the sanction of an oath.

The usual modes of authenticating them are by an exemplification under the great seal of a state, or by a copy proved by oath to be a true copy, or by a certificate of an officer authorized by law, which must itself be duly authenticated; 2 Cra. 238; 2 Wend. 411; 6 id. 475; 5 S. & R. 523; 15 id. 84; 2 Wash. C. C. 175; 32 Md. 274; 33 Ark. 645; 67 Ill. 545.

Witnesses in Cuba examined under a commission touching the execution of a will testified, in general terms, that it was executed according to the law of that country; and, it not appearing from the testimony that there was any written law upon the subject, the proof was held sufficient; 8 Paige, Ch. 446.

A defendant pleaded infancy in an action upon a contract governed by the law of Jamaica: held that the law was to be proven as a matter of fact, and that the burden lay upon him to show it; 8 Johns. 190.

Proof of such unwritten law is usually made by the testimony of witnesses learned in the law and competent to state it correctly under oath; 2 Cra. 237; 1 Pet. C. C. 225; 2 Wash. C. C. 175; 15 S. & R. 84; 4 Johns. Ch. 520; Cowp. 174; 2 Hagg. Adm. App. 15-144; 100 Mass. 79; 14 How. 400.

In England, certificates of persons in high authority have been allowed as evidence in such cases; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 767, 769.

The public seal of a foreign sovereign or state affixed to a writing purporting to be a written edict, or law, or judgment, is of itself the highest evidence, and no further proof is required of such public seal; 2 Cra. 238; 2 Conn. 85; 1 Wash. C. C. 363; 4 Dall. 413, 416; 6 Wend. 475; 9 Mod. 66; 35 Fed. Rep. 134.

But the seal of a foreign court is not, in general, evidence without further proof, and must, therefore, be established by competent testimony; 3 Johns. 310; 2 H. & J. 193; 4 Cow. 526, n.; 3 East 221.

By the act of May 26, 1790, it is provided "that the acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto;" R. S. § 905. See RECORD. It may here be observed that the rules prescribed by acts of congress do not exclude every other mode of authentication, and that the courts may admit proof of the acts of the legislatures of the several states, although not authenticated under the acts of congress. Accordingly, a printed volume, purporting on its face to contain the laws of a sister state, is admissible as prima facie evidence to prove the statute law of that state; 4 Cra. 384; 12 S. & R. 203; 6 Binn. 321; 5 Leigh 571; 5 Ind. App. 89; 97 Ala. 417; 70 Hun 145; 53 Mo. App. 617; contra, 2 Hawks 441; 2 Harring. 34; 2 Wend. 411; 2 La. Ann. 654; 9 Wis. 328. By act of Aug. 8, 1846, a standard copy of the laws and treaties of the United States is fixed, and made competent evidence in all courts without further proof or authentication. R. S. § 908.

Foreign laws have, as such, no extra-territorial force, but have an effect by comity; Sto. Const. § 1305. In the absence of pleading and proof to the contrary, the laws of another state are presumed to be like those of the state in which the action is brought; 35 Neb. 375; 37 id. 644; 93 Cal. 172; 144 Pa. 205; 76 Hun 200. See 142 U. S. 101; 40 La. Ann. 766; 85 Tenn. 616. While a state court is bound to take judicial cognizance of the principles of common law as it prevails in other states, this is not true of the statutes of such states; 40 La. Ann. 766; 50 Ark. 237; 73 Wis. 332; 86 Tenn. 50; 38 Minn. 421. But see 156 Mass. 65. Until the fact is shown, they will be assumed to be the same as those of the forum; 1 Harr. & J. 637. See 5 Cl. & F. 14; 3 H. L. C. 19; LEX FORI.

A person claiming title under a foreign corporation is chargeable with knowledge of its chartered powers and restrictions; 19 N. Y. 207.

The effect of foreign laws when proved is properly referable to the court; the object of the proof of foreign laws is to enable the court to instruct the jury what is, in point of law, the result from foreign laws to be applied to the matters in controversy before them. The court are, therefore, to decide what is the proper evidence of the laws of a foreign country; and when evidence is given of those laws, the court are to judge of their applicability to the matter in issue; Story, Conf. Laws § 638; Greenl. Ev. 486; 2 H. & J. 193; 3 id. 234, 242; 4 Conn. 517; Cowp. 174; 20 A. L. Reg. N. s. 379. As to proof of foreign laws generally, see 14 Cent. L. J. 125; 19 id. 226, 242; 17 Myers, Fed. Dec. 456; 7 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th 269; 5 Am. L. Reg. 321; 8 So. L. Rev. 150; 13 Alb. L. J. 183; by experts, 18 id. 17; by oral proof, 25 L. R. A. 449.

As to criminal cases, see 11 Crim. L. Mag. 776; penal actions, 2 L. R. A. 779; presumptions, 24 Alb. L. J. 204; Lawson, Pres. Ev. 358-80. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS.

FOREIGN MATTER. Matter which must be tried in another county. Blount. Matter done or to be tried in another county. Cowel.

FOREIGN MINISTER. An ambassador or envoy from a foreign country. See AMBASSADOR.

FOREIGN OFFICE. The department of state through which the British sovereign communicates with foreign powers.

FOREIGN PLEA. See PLEA.

FOREIGN PORT. A port or place which is wholly without the United States. 19 Johns. 375; 2 Gall. 4, 7; 1 Brock. 235. A port without the jurisdiction of the court; 1 Dods. 201; 4 C. Rob. 1; 1 W. Rob. 29; 6 Exch. 886; 1 Bl. & H. 66, 71. The ports of the several states of the United States are foreign to each other so far as regards the authority of masters to pledge the credit of their vessels for supplies; 10 Wall. 192; 99 Mass. 388. Practically, the definition has become, for most purposes of maritime law, a port at such distance as to make communication with the owners of the ship very inconvenient or almost impossible. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law 142, n.; PORT.

FOREIGN PROCESS ACTS. English statutes providing for the service of process of certain courts in places beyond their territorial jurisdiction.

FOREIGN SERVICE. Servitium forinsecum. See FORINSECUS.

FOREIGN STATE. A foreign nation or country. In the United States the states are considered as foreign to each other with respect to those subjects which are controlled by their municipal law. See FOREIGN JUDGMENT; EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

FOREIGN TRADE. The exportation and importation of commodities to or from foreign countries, as distinguished in the United States from interstate or coastwise trade. See 1 Holmes 421; FOREIGN COMMERCE.

FOREIGN VESSEL. A vessel owned by residents in or sailing under the flag of a foreign nation. This term does not mean a vessel in which foreigners domiciled in the United States have an interest; 1 Gal. 58.

An omission in the registry and enrolment of an American vessel does not make her foreign, but, at best, only deprives her of her American privileges. Crabbe 271. See FLAG. The patent laws were not intended to apply to and govern a vessel of a foreign, friendly nation; 19 How. 183. See PATENT.

FOREIGN VOYAGE. A voyage whose termination is within a foreign country. 3 Kent 177, n. The length of the voyage has no effect in determining its character, but only the place of destination; 1 Stor. 1; 3 Sumn. 342; 2 Bost. L. Rep. 146; 2 Wall. C. C. 264; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 31.

FOREIGN WATERS. By U. S. Rev. St. § 4370 tugboats towing in whole or in part in foreign waters are exempt from a penalty therein imposed on foreign tugboats for towing vessels of the United States.

Where the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of June 15, 1846, fixed the boundary between the two countries in the strait of San Juan de Fuca by a line following the middle of the strait, but also secured to each nation a right of free navigation over all the waters of the strait, all the waters north of the boundary line were held to be "foreign waters," within the meaning of said section; 7 U. S. App. 188; s. c. 50 Fed. Rep. 437; reversing 48 id. 319.

FOREIGNER. One who is not a citizen. Cowel.

In the Old English Law, it seems to have been used of every one not an inhabitant of a city, at least with reference to that city; 1 H. Bla. 213. See, also, Cowel, Foreigne.

In the United States, any one who was born in some other country than the United States, and who owes allegiance to some foreign state or country. 1 Pet. 343, 349. An alien. See ALIEN; CITIZEN.

FOREJUDGE. To deprive a man of the thing in question by sentence of court.

Among foreign writers, says Blount, forejudge is to banish, to expel. In this latter sense the word is also used in English law of an attorney who has been expelled from court for misconduct. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FOREMAN. The presiding member of a grand or petit jury. See GRAND JURY; JURY.

FORENSIC. See FORENSIS.

FORENSIC MEDICINE. See MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

FORENSIS. Forensic. Belonging to court. Forensis homo, a man engaged in causes. A pleader; an advocate. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

FORESAID. In Scotch Law. Aforesaid. Sometimes foresaids, in the plural; 2 How. St. Tr. 715; and also in the form foresaidis; 1 Pitt. Cr. Tr. pt. 1, 107.

FORESCHOKE (Lat. Derelictum). Forsaken; especially with reference to lands abandoned by the tenant. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; Moz. & W.

FORESHORE. That part of the land immediately in front of the shore; the part of it which is between high and low water marks, and alternately covered with water and left dry by the flux and reflux of the tides. It is indicated by the middle line between the highest and lowest tides (spring and neap).

FOREST. A certain territory of wooded ground and fruitful pastures, privileged for wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, and warren, to rest and abide in the safe protection of the prince for his princely delight and pleasure, having a peculiar court and officers. Man. For. Laws, cap. 1, num. 1; Termes de la Ley; 1 Bla. Com. 289.

A royal hunting-ground which lost its peculiar character with the extinction of its courts or when the franchise passed into the hands of a subject, Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; Man. For. Laws, cap. 1; 2 Bla. Com. 83; 1 Steph. Com. 665.

FOREST COURTS. In English Law. Courts instituted for the government of the king's forest in different parts of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all injuries done to the king's deer or venison, to the vert or greensward, and to the covert in which the deer were lodged. They comprised the courts of attachments or woodmote, of regard, of swanimote, and of justice-seat (which several titles see); but since the revolution of 1688 these courts, it is said, have gone into absolute desuetude. 3 Steph. Com. 439; 2 Bla. Com. 71. But see 8 Q. B. 981, where a mandamus to the verderers of a royal forest was refused, on the ground that the court of the Chief Justice in Eyre had power to compel the verderers to permit the exercise of the rights sought to be enforced.

FOREST LAW. The old law relating to the forest, under which the most horrid tyrannies were exercised, in the confiscation of lands for the royal forests. Hallam's Const. Hist. ch. 8.

The privilege of reserving the forest for the use of the sovereign alone was instituted by the Saxon kings, who, however, occasionally conferred it upon a subject by special license; and a charter of the forest is said to have been issued by Canute at Winchester in the year 1016, but the authenticity of this document is doubted by Lord Coke; Inst. iv. 320. There is, however, no doubt that this monarch issued the Constitutiones de Foresta, by which document he appointed four chiefs of the forest (primarii) who administered justice; under these were four mediocres who undertook the care of the venison and vert; and who in turn superintended two tithing-men whose duties were to care for the vert and venison by night and who, if slaves, became free on being appointed to this office. Complaints against the mediocres and the tithing-men were heard by the primarii and by them disposed of, and complaints against the primarii were dealt with by the king himself; Hallam, Anc. Laws and Inst. sec. 10. If a freeman used violence towards a primarius of the forest, he lost his freedom and his goods; if a villein, he lost his right hand; and for a repetition of the offence by either, he forfeited his life. Offences against the vert were dealt with leniently as compared with those against the venison, and there was also a difference in the penalties imposed for killing a royal beast and a beast of the forest; thus for killing the latter, a freeman was fined, while for the former he lost his liberty. A difference was also recognized according to the rank of the offender, as, if a bishop, abbot, or baron killed a royal beast he was subject to a fine, at the pleasure of the king, while for the same offence a slave lost his life. Certain animals are enumerated in this document for the killing of which no penalty was attached, and the wild boar is especially mentioned as never having been held to be an animal of venison; id. sec. 27.

Under the Confessor these laws were not enforced with the rigidity of Canute, the penalties for trespass were moderate, and the administration of the forest law did not seem to be a subject of complaint from any class of people, but William the Conqueror soon altered this condition of affairs. The hunting of wild beasts of the forest being his chief pastime he immediately claimed absolute and exclusive right to all forests then existing, and allowed no one to enter without his license; he extended those already existing by laying waste whole towns and villages; and he devastated vast tracts in Hampshire and Yorkshire to form the new forest, "denuding the land of both God and man to make of it a home for wild beasts." Lappenburg, England, under the Anglo-Norman Kings 214. The Conqueror appointed new judges of the forests to supersede the former judges and keepers; he created the office of chief justice of the forest and the verderers subordinate to the chief justice, who could convict offenders and send them before the chief justice, but who had no power to punish such offenders. The verderers sat at Swanmote and all within the limits of the forest were bound to attend this court thrice a year, and to serve on inquests and juries when required. The agistors, the forestarii, and the regarders were also appointed by the Normans as officers of the forest, but without judicial powers. The highest penalty enforced for offences in the forest during the reign of William I. seems to have been the loss of a limb or the eyes of the offender, and this was enforced and fines were imposed for the most trivial offences; Sax. Chronicles; Comp. fol. 194.

These abuses were continued until about the year 1215, the most extensive afforestations having been made under Richard I. and John. In the 47th and 48th clauses of the great charter certain provisions are found relating to the forest, but although the belief that John issued a charter distinct from these clauses is very ancient, it is erroneous; the document given in Matthieu Paris under the name, being the forest charter of Henry III. with an altered salutation. Stubbs' Charters 338. In the great charter the heavy burden of attending the forest courts is remitted and this provision was conferred in the charta de foresta, and thus the exact analogy established by Henry II. between the courts of the shire and those of the forest was abolished. The charta de foresta disafforested the lands appropriated by Richard and John and all those seized by Henry II. which had operated to the injury of the land-owners and outside of the royal demesne; it greatly mitigated the punishment for destroying game, and provided that for that offence no man should lose life or limb, and that his punishment shall be limited to a fine or imprisonment for a year and a day; the following curious provision occurs in cap. ii.: "Whatsoever archbishop, bishop, earl, or baron coming to us at our commandment, passing by our forest, it shall be lawful for him to take and kill one or two of our deer by view of our forester, if he be present; or else he shall cause him to blow a horn for him, that he seem not to steal our deer; and likewise they shall do returning from us," and this clause is still unrepealed. By reason of "the cruel and insupportable hardships which those forest laws created for the subject," says Blackstone, "we find the immunities of charta de foresta as warmly contended for, and extorted from the king with as much difficulty, as those of Magna Charta itself"; 2 Com. 416.

After this charter was issued, the forest laws not being enforced fell gradually into desuetude, until Charles I. attempted to revive them in order to replenish his exchequer, and the forest court of justice seat fined certain persons heavily for alleged encroachments on the ancient boundaries of the forest, although the right to such land was fortified by several centuries of possession. This was one of the first grievances on which the long parliament acted, and since the passing of the act "certainty of forests"; 16 Car. I. c. 16, where it was declared that all land should be held disafforested where no justice seat, swanimote, or court of attachment had been holden for sixty years next before the first year of the reign of Charles I., the laws of the forest have practically ceased, and by acts 14 and 15 Vict. c. 43, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 42, and 19 and 20 Vict. c. 32, many of the royal forests have been disafforested on the plea of public necessity. See Hallam, Hist. Eng. Const.; Stubbs' Charters; Inderwick, King's Peace; CHARTA DE FORESTA.

FORESTAGIUM. A tribute payable to the king's foresters. Cowel.

FORESTALL. To intercept or obstruct a passenger on the king's highway. Cowel; Blount. To beset the way of a tenant so as to prevent his coming on the premises. 3 Bla. Com. 170. To intercept a deer on his way to the forest before he can regain it. Cowel. See FORESTALLING THE MARKET.

FORESTALLER. One who commits the offence of forestalling. Used, also, to denote the crime itself; namely, the obstruction of the highway, or hindering a tenant from coming to his land. 3 Bla. Com. 170. Stopping a deer before he regains the forest. Cowel.

FORESTALLING THE MARKET. Buying victuals on their way to the market before they reach it, with the intent to sell again at a higher price. Cowel; Blount; 4 Bla. Com. 158. Every device or practice, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other provisions; Co. 3d Inst. 196; 1 Russ. Cri. 169; 4 Bla. Com. 158. See 13 Viner, Abr. 430; 1 East 132; 3 M. & S. 67. At common law, as well as by stat. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 14, this was an indictable offence against public trade, but since the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, the practice of forestalling is no longer illegal. See ENGROSS.

In the United States forestalling the market takes the form of "corners" or of "trusts," which are attempts by one person or a conspiracy or combination of persons to monopolize an article of trade or commerce, or to control or regulate, or to restrict its manufacture or production in such a manner as to enhance the price; 78 Ind. 487; 68 N. Y. 558; A. & E. Encyc. See TRUST.

FORESTARIUS. A forester. An officer who takes care of the woods and forests. De forestario apponendo, a writ which lay to appoint a forester to prevent further commission of waste when a tenant in dower had committed waste. Bracton 316; Du Cange.

FORESTER. A sworn officer of the forest, appointed by the king's letters patent to walk the forest, watching both the vert and the venison, attaching and presenting all trespassers against them within their own bailiwick or walk. These letters patent were generally granted during good behavior; but sometimes they held the office in fee. Blount; Cowel.

FORETHOUGHT FELONY. In Scotch Law. Murder committed in consequence of a previous design. Erskine, b. iv. tit. 4, c. 50; Bell, Dict.

FORFANG. A taking beforehand. A taking provisions from any one in fairs or markets before the king's purveyors are served with necessities for his majesty. Blount; Cowel.

FORFEIT. To lose as the penalty of some misdeed or negligence. The word includes not merely the idea of losing, but also of having the property transferred to another without the consent of the owner and wrongdoer.

Lost by omission or negligence or misconduct. 48 Minn. 13.

This is the essential meaning of the word, whether it be that an offender is to forfeit a sum of money, or an estate is to be forfeited to a former owner for a breach of condition, or to the king for some crime. Cowel says that forfeiture is general and confiscation a particular forfeiture to the king's exchequer. The modern distinction, however, seems to refer rather to a difference between forfeiture as relating to acts of the owner and confiscation as relating to acts of the government; 1 Stor. 134; 13 Pet. 157; 11 Johns. 293. Confiscation is more generally used of an appropriation of an enemy's property; forfeiture, or the taking possession of property to which the owner, who may be a citizen, has lost title through violation of laws. See 1 Kent 67; 1 Stor. 134. A provision in an agreement, that for its breach the party shall "forfeit" a fixed sum, implies a penalty, not liquidated damages; 15 Abb. Fr. 273; 17 Barb. 260.

FORFEIT AND PAY. An agreement in a contract to forfeit and pay a specified sum in default of performance, is an agreement for liquidated damages; 57 Ark. 168; even where under the contract a bond is given as an earnest of good faith; id.

FORFEITABLE. Subject to forfeiture; as a franchise for misuser or non-user, or lands or property for crime.

FORFEITURE. A punishment annexed by law to some illegal act or negligence in the owner of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they become vested in the party injured as a recompense for the wrong which he alone, or the public together with himself, hath sustained. 2 Bla. Com. 237. A sum of money to be paid by way of penalty for a crime. 21 Ala. N. S. 672; 10 Gratt. 700.

Forfeiture by alienation. By the English law, estates less than a fee may be forfeited to the party entitled to the residuary interest by a breach of duty in the owner of the particular estate: as if a tenant for his own life aliens by feoffments or fine for the life of another, or in tail, or in fee, or by recovery; there being estates, which either must or may last longer than his own, the creating them is not only beyond his power, but is a forfeiture of his own particular estate; 2 Bla. Com. 274; 1 Co. 14 b.

In this country such forfeitures are almost unknown, and the more just principle prevails that the conveyance by the tenant operates only on the interest which he possessed, and does not affect the remainderman or reversioner; 4 Kent 81, 424; 5 Ohio 30; 1 Pick. 318; 1 Rice 459; 2 Rawle 168; 1 Wash. Va. 381; 11 Conn. 553; 22 N. H. 500; 21 Me. 372. See, also, Stearn, Real Act. 11; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 121, n.; Wms. R. P. 25; 5 Dane, Abr. 6; 1 Washb. R. P. 92, 197.

Forfeiture for crimes. Under the constitution and laws of the United States, Const. art. 3, § 3; Act of April 30, 1790, § 24, forfeiture for crimes is nearly abolished. And when it occurs the state recovers only the title which the owner had; 4 Mass. 174. See, also, Dalr. Feuds, p. 145; Fost. Cr. Law 95; 1 Washb. R. P. 92; Story, Const. 1296; 100 N. C. 240.

Forfeiture for treason. The constitution of the United States, art. 3, § 2, provides that no attainder of treason shall work forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted. The Confiscation Act provided that only the life estate of the convicted person can be condemned and sold; 9 Wall. 350; 18 id. 156. It was merely an exercise of the war power; 11 Wall. 304; and did not apply to the confiscation of enemies' property; 1 Woods 221.

Forfeiture by non-performance of conditions. An estate may be forfeited by a breach or non-performance of a condition annexed to the estate, either expressed in the deed at its original creation, or implied by law, from a principle of natural reason; 2 Bla. Com. 281; Littleton § 361; 1 Prest. Est. 478; Tud. Lead. Cas. 794; 5 Pick. 528; 2 N. H. 120; 5 S. & R. 375; 32 Me. 394; 18 Conn. 535; 12 S. & R. 190; 3 Wash. St. 424; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 245. Such forfeiture may be waived by acts of the person entitled to take advantage of the breach; 1 Conn. 79; 1 Johns. Cas. 126; 1 Washb. R. P. 454; 36 W. Va. 639. In order to authorize a claim to forfeiture of valuable property on account of violation of a condition, proceedings to enforce must be had at once; 17 Or. 140.

Equity will not lend its aid to enforce a forfeiture because of a breach of condition subsequent in a deed, although the aid is sought upon the special ground of removing a cloud on the title; 127 Ill. 101; nor will it concern itself to make up the loss of interest to one who refused the principal in the hope that he could enforce, upon purely technical grounds, a forfeiture of lands sold and all payments made thereon, under the terms of a harsh and unconscionable contract; 74 Fed. Rep. 52.

Forfeiture by waste. Waste is a cause of forfeiture. 2 Bla. Com. 283; Co. 2d Inst. 299; 1 Washb. R. P. 118.

Forfeiture of property and rights cannot be adjudged by legislative acts, and confiscation without a judicial hearing after due notice would be void as not being due process of law. Nor can a party by his misconduct so forfeit a right that it may be taken from him without judicial proceedings, in which the forfeiture shall be declared in due form; Cooley, Const. Law 450; 38 Miss. 434; 24 Ark. 161; 27 id. 26. Where no express power of removal is conferred upon the executive, he cannot declare an office forfeited for misbehavior; the forfeit must be declared by judicial proceedings; 8 B. Monr. 648; 36 N. J. L. 101.

Forfeiture of wages. A provision in a contract for service to the effect that the wages of an employe shall be forfeited for neglect or misconduct which brings damage to the company, should be strictly construed as against the company; 35 Ill. App. 481. Where, after being discharged, a railroad employe sues for wages, claiming to have been hired by the month, and this being admitted by the company, which sets up the defence that he was dismissed for cause, it is error to instruct the jury that they may find for the plaintiff if they believe from the evidence that he was hired by the month; 16 Mo. App. 522, reconciled in 20 Mo. App. 564. See WAGES; MASTER AND SERVANT.

Forfeiture of vessel. Rev. Stat. U. S. § 5283, provides for the forfeiture of every vessel which, within the limits of the United States, is fitted out and armed, or attempted to be so, to be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, or people, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of a prince, state, or people with which the United States are at peace. Held, that under this section no forfeiture can be claimed of a vessel which is only employed to transport arms and munitions of war to a vessel fitting out to pursue the forbidden warlike enterprises; 47 Fed. Rep. 84; 48 id. 99; 49 id. 646.

Forfeiture of charter. A private corporation may be dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter for the non-user or misuser of its franchises; 9 Cra. 43; 24 Pick. 52; 137 N. Y. 606. Accidental negligence or abuse of power will not warrant a forfeiture; there must be some plain abuse of its powers or neglect to exercise its franchises, and the acts of misuse or non-use must be wilful and repeated; 51 Miss. 602; 14 Am. L. Reg. 577; 17 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 128. Thus long-continued neglect on the part of a turnpike company to repair its road is cause of forfeiture; 8 R. I. 182, 521. So a bridge company is subject to forfeiture of its charter if it neglect for a long time to rebuild a bridge which has been carried away by a flood; 23 Wend. 254. Where a franchise has been granted by the legislature to construct a street railway within a certain time, with a condition that it will be forfeited if the provisions of the act are not complied with, a failure to lay the track within the time limited works a forfeiture of the right, without a suit by the state, and the franchise may be conferred upon any other person or persons; 45 Cal. 365. Where the legislature forbids the owning of lands by a corporation the state may, on a violation of the prohibition, declare a forfeiture of the franchise; 132 Pa. 591. A forfeiture must be judicially declared; 7 Cold. 420; 49 How. Pr. 20; 72 N. Y. 245; 130 id. 232. A forfeiture can be enforced by scire facias or a quo warranto only at the suit of the government, which created the corporation; 46 Md. 1; 26 Pa. 31; 46 N. J. Eq. 118. (As to the distinction between these proceedings, see 3 Term 199.) But not at the suit of an individual; 7 Pick. 344; 24 How. 278. The state may waive a cause of forfeiture; 9 Wend. 351; 73 Tex. 435. Equity has no jurisdiction in the matter; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 10, 40; 1 N. J. Eq. 369; 8 Humph. 253.

FORFEITURE OF A BOND. A failure to perform the condition on which the obligee was to be excused from the penalty in the bond. Courts of equity and of law in modern practice will relieve from the forfeiture of a bond; and, upon proper cause shown, criminal courts will, in general, relieve from the forfeiture of a recognizance to appear. See 3 Yeates 93; 2 Wash. C. C. 442; 2 Blackf. 104, 200; 1 Ill. 257.

FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE. A penalty incurred by a ward in chivalry when he or she married contrary to the wishes of his or her guardian in chivalry.

The latter, who was the ward's lord, had an interest in controlling the marriage of his female wards, and he could exact a price for his consent; and at length it became customary to sell the marriage of wards of both sexes; 2 Bla. Com. 70.

When a male ward refused an equal match provided by his guardian, he was obliged, on coming of age, to pay him the value of the marriage,—that is, as much as he had been bona fide offered for it, or, if the guardian chose, as much as a jury would assess, taking into consideration all the real and personal property of the ward; and the guardian could claim this value although he might have made no tender of the marriage; Co. Litt. 82 a; Co. 2d Inst. 92; 5 Co. 126 b; 6 id. 70 b.

When a male ward between the age of fourteen and twenty-one refused to accept an offer of an equal match (one without disparagement), and during that period formed an alliance elsewhere without his guardian's permission, he incurred forfeiture of marriage,—that is, he became liable to pay double the value of the marriage. Co. Litt. 78 b, 82 b.

FORFEITURE OF SILK. In English Law. When the importation of silk was prohibited it was customary at each term of the Exchequer to proclaim a forfeiture of such as was suffered to lie in the docks.

FORFEITURES ABOLITION ACT. The same as the Felony Act of 1870, abolishing forfeitures for felony in England.

FORGAVEL. A small rent reserved in money; a quit-rent. Sometimes written forgabulum.

FORGE. To fabricate by false imitation; especially, in law, to make a false instrument in similitude of an instrument by which one person could be obligated to another for the purpose of fraud and deceit. 92 Cal. 563. See 42 Me. 392.

FORGERY. The falsely making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability. 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 523; 29 Fla. 408.

The fraudulent making and alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right. 4 Bla. Com. 247. The essence of forgery consists in making an instrument appear to be that which it is not; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 200.

Bishop, 2 Cr. Law § 523, n., has collected nine definitions of forgery, and justly remarks that the books abound in definitions. Coke says the term is "taken metaphorically from the smith, who beateth upon his anvil and forgeth what fashion and shape he will." Co. 3d Inst. 169.

A person may commit forgery by fraudulently making, over his own signature, a paper writing which, if genuine, would possess legal efficacy, and might operate to the prejudice of another's rights; 85 Tenn. 232. One may have authority to sign the name of another to an instrument for the payment of money in a stated amount, or for a legal purpose, and yet commit a forgery by signing for a larger amount, or for an illegal purpose with intent to defraud; 51 Ark. 88.

A clerk in the telegraph office who sent to a bookmaker a telegram offering to bet on a certain horse, which purported to be sent before the race, and to be signed by a person who had authorized him to telegraph bets in his name, but which was in fact sent after the clerk knew that the horse had won the race, was held guilty of forgery under a statute against procuring money by virtue of any forged or altered instrument. Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., and Vaughan Williams, J., doubted as to the statute, but not that it was forgery at common law; [1896] 1 Q. B. 309.

intent is undoubtedly a sufficient making; although otherwise where one executes a promissory note as agent for a principal from whom he has no authority: 15 Hun 155; but a fraudulent insertion, alteration, or erasure, even of a letter, in any material part of the instrument, whereby a new operation is given to it, will amount to a forgery: 1 Stra. 18; 5 Strobb. 581; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 200; and this, although it be afterwards executed by a person ignorant of the deceit: 2 East, Pl. Cr. 855.

The fraudulent application of a true signature to a false instrument for which it was not intended, or vice versa, will also be a forgery: 11 Gratt. 822; 1 Add. 44. For example, it is forgery in an individual who is requested to draw a will for a sick person in a particular way, instead of doing so, to insert legacies of his own head, and then procure the signature of such sick person to be affixed to the paper without revealing to him the legacies thus fraudulently inserted: Noy 101; F. Moore 759, 760; Co. 3d Inst. 170; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70, s. 2; 2 Russ. Cr. 318; Bacon, Abr. Forgery (A); but one was not held to be guilty of forgery, who in writing a promissory note for an illiterate person to execute, inserts therein an amount larger than directed; 89 Ga. 788.

It has even been intimated by Lord Ellenborough that a party who makes a copy of a receipt and adds to such copy material words not in the original, and then offers it in evidence on the ground that the original has been lost, may be prosecuted for forgery; 5 Esp. 100.

It is a sufficient making where, in the writing, the party assumes the name and character of a person in existence; 2 Russ. Cri. 327. But the adoption of a false description and addition where a false name is not assumed and there is no person answering the description, is not a forgery; 1 Russ. & R. 405.

Making an instrument in a fictitious name, or the name of a non-existing person, is as much a forgery as making it in the name of an existing person; 2 Russ. Cri. 328; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 74; 90 Ga. 347; and although a man may make the instrument in his own name, if he represent it as the instrument of another of the same name, when in fact there is no such person, it will be a forgery in the name of a non-existing person; 2 Leach 775; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 963; 7 Pet. 132; 5 City H. Rec. 87. See 52 Iowa 68. But the correctness of this decision has been doubted; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 384. One who, with intent to forge the check of "R. & M.," signs the name "A. E. R. & Co." thereto, believing it to be the true name of the firm, is not guilty of forgery; 90 Cal. 586.

Though, in general, a party cannot be guilty of forgery by a mere non-feasance, yet if in drawing a will he should fraudulently omit a legacy which he had been directed to insert, and by the omission of such bequest it would cause a material alteration in the limitation of a bequest to another, as, where the omission of a devise of an estate for life to one causes a devise of the same lands to another to pass a present estate which would otherwise have passed a remainder only, it would be a forgery; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70, s. 6; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 856; 2 Russ. Cr. 320.

It may be observed that the offence of forgery may be complete without a publication of the forged instrument; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 855; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 1938.

With regard to the thing forged, it may be observed that it has been holden to be forgery at common law fraudulently to falsify or falsely make records and other matters of a public nature: 1 Rolle, Abr. 65, 68; a parish register; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70; a letter in the name of a magistrate, or of the governor of a gaol directing the discharge of a prisoner; 6 C. & P. 129; Mood. 379; the making a false municipal certificate with intent to defraud is forgery, notwithstanding the city has not power to issue such certificates; 68 Mo. 150; the alteration of a document to prevent the discovery of an embezzlement; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 47.

With regard to private writings, forgery may be committed of any writing which, if genuine, would operate as the foundation of another man's liability or the evidence of his right; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 103; 2 Mass. 397; 12 S. & R. 237; 8 Yerg. 150; as, a check; 5 Leigh 707; an assignment of a legal claim; an indorsement of a promissory note; 11 Gratt. 822; 3 Ohio 229; writing the name of the payee falsely and fraudulently on the back of a treasury warrant payable to order; 37 Fed. Rep. 108; a receipt or acquittance; 15 Mass. 526; an acceptance of a bill of exchange, or an order for the delivery of goods; 8 C. & P. 629; 3 Cush. 150; 26 Tex. App. 176; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 245; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 587; or an order for money; 79 Ga. 344; a deposition to be used in court; 50 Me. 409; a private act of parliament; 4 How. St. Tr. 951; a copy of any instrument to be used in evidence in the place of a real or supposed original; 8 Yerg. 150; false entries in the books of a mercantile house, but not necessarily so in every case; 32 Penn. 529; 46 N. H. 266; a letter of recommendation of a person as a man of property and pecuniary responsibility; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 365; a false testimonial to character; Templ. & M. 207; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 492; Dears. 285; a railway-pass; 2 C. & K. 604; a railroad-ticket; 3 Gray 441; or fraudulently to testify or falsely to make a deed or will; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 70, § 10; a certified bill of costs; 85 Tenn. 232; or of a contract which, if genuine, would be void as against public policy; 100 Cal. 664. Forgery may be of a printed or engraved as well as of a written instrument; 3 Gray 441; 9 Pick. 312; 127 U. S. 457; but falsely to subscribe a person's name to a recommendation of a medicine is not forgery; 2 Pear. 351; nor to alter a lease by interlineations in order to conform it to the purpose of parties; 89 Pa. 432; nor is the private memorandum-book of a public officer, not required to be kept by law, the subject of forgery; 3 Col. 571; nor is the forging of his docket entries by a justice of the peace indictable, under a statute making forging of the record of a court of record an indictable offence; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 110; nor the changing the date of tax receipts which still show on their face that they were given for the taxes of the year previous; 66 Miss. 14; a forgery must be of some document or writing; therefore, the printing an artist's name in the corner of a picture, in order falsely to pass it off as an original picture by that artist, is not a forgery; 1 Dears. & B. 460; Clark, Cr. L. 295.

The intent must be to defraud another; 83 Ia. 128; 83 Ala. 46; but it is not requisite that any one should have been injured; it is sufficient that the instrument forged might have proved prejudicial; 3 Gill & J. 220; 4 Wash. C. C. 726; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 51; it has been holden that the jury ought to infer an intent to defraud the person who would have to pay the instrument, if it were genuine, although from the manner of executing the forgery, or from the person's ordinary caution, it would not be likely to impose upon him; and although the object was general to defraud whoever might take the instrument, and the intention of the defrauding in particular the person who would have to pay the instrument, if genuine, did not enter into the contemplation of the prisoner; Russ. & R. 291; 101 N. C. 770; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 231; 44 La. Ann. 962. See Russ. Cri. b. 4, c. 32, s. 3; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 853; 1 Leach 367; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 400; Clark, Cr. L. 300.

Most, and perhaps all, of the states in the Union have passed laws making certain acts to be forgery with the result, upon the whole, of enlarging the meaning of the term, and the national legislature has also enacted several on this subject, which are here referred to; but these statutes do not take away the character of the offence as a misdemeanor at common law, but only provide additional punishment in the cases particularly enumerated in the statutes; 3 Cush. 150; 3 Gray 441. It has been held that the crime of uttering forged commercial paper is included in the common-law definition of the word "forgery" as used in a treaty, and that a prisoner charged with it should be surrendered, although under the law of the other treaty power that crime is known as "fraud" by means of forgery, and "forgery" is only falsification of public documents; 55 Fed. Rep. 376.

The act of offering for sale and selling a forged instrument is a sufficient representation as to its genuineness; 73 Ia. 128.

See, generally, Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, cc. 51, 70; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 1022; 2 Russ. Cr. b. 4, c. 32; 2 Bish. Cr. Law c. 22; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 398; Rosc. Cr. Ev.; Starkie, Ev.; 1 Whart. Cr. L. c. 9; COUNTERFEIT.

FORGERY ACT, 1870. The stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 58, was passed for the punishment of forgers of stock certificates, and for extending to Scotland certain provisions of the Forgery Act of 1861; Moz. & W.

FORHERDA. In Old English Law. A headland, or foreland. Cowel.

FORI DISPUTATIONES. In Civil Law. Arguments in court. Disputations or arguments before a court. Eminent citizens and statesmen often debated in the forum, and their answers to questions put were gradually adopted by the courts and incorporated into the body of the Roman law under this name. 1 Kent 530; Vicat, Voc. Jur. verb. Disputatio.

FORINSECUS (Lat.), FORINSIC. Outward; on the outside; without; foreign; belonging to another manor. Silio forinsecus, the outward ridge or furrow. Servitium forinsecum, the payment of aid, scutage, and other extraordinary military services. Forinsecum manerium, the manor, or that part of it which lies outside the bars or town and is not included within the liberties of it. Cowel; Blount; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Jacob, Foreign Service; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 273.

FORISBANITUS. Banished. Mat. Par. 1245.

FORISFACERE (Lat.). To forfeit. To lose on account of crime. It may be applied not only to estates, but to a variety of other things, in precisely the popular sense of the word forfeit. Spelman, Gloss.; Du Cange.

To confiscate. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

To commit an offence; to do a wrong. To do something beyond or outside of (foris) what is right (extra rationem). Du Cange. To do a thing against or without law. Co. Litt. 59 a.

To disclaim. Du Cange.

FORISFACTUM (Lat.). Forfeited. Bona forisfacta, forfeited goods; 1 Bla. Com. 299. A crime. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FORISFACTURA (Lat.). A crime or offence through which property is forfeited. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 32.

A fine or punishment in money.

Forfeiture. The loss of property or life in consequence of crime. Spelman, Gloss.

Forisfactura plena. A forfeiture of all a man's property. Things which were forfeited. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FORISFACTUS (Lat.). A criminal. One who has forfeited his life by commission of a capital offence. Spelman, Gloss; Leg. Rep. c. 77; Du Cange. Si quispiam forisfactus poposcerit regis misericordiam, etc. (if any criminal shall have asked pardon of the king, etc.). Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 18.

Forisfactus servus. A slave who has been a free man but has forfeited his freedom by crime. Leg. Athelstan, c. 3; Du Cange.

FORISFAMILIATED, FORISFAMILIATUS. In Old English Law. Por-

tioned off. A son was forisfamiliarized when he had a portion of his father's estate assigned to him during his father's life, in lieu of his share of the inheritance, when it was done at his request and he assented to the assignment. The word etymologically denotes put out of the family (foris familiam ponere, from which is forisfamiliaris; Glauv. l. 7, c. 3) mancipated. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 110; Bract, fol. 64.

FORIS FAMILIATION. The separation of a child from the father's family. Bell; Toml.

One who is no longer an heir of the parent was termed forisfamiliaratus. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel. Similar in some degree to the modern practice of advancement.

FORISJUDICATIO (Lat.). In Old English Law. Forejudger. A forejudgment. A judgment of court whereby a man is put out of possession of a thing. Co. Litt. 100 b; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FORISJUDICATUS (Lat.). Forejudged; sent from court; banished. Deprived of a thing by judgment of court. Bracton, 250 b; Co. Litt. 100 b; Du Cange.

FORISJURARE (Lat.). To forswear; to abjure; to abandon. Forisjurare parentilam. To remove oneself from parental authority. The person who did this lost his rights as heir. Du Cange; Leg. Hen. I. c. 88.

Provinciam forisjurare. To forswear the country. Spelman, Gloss.; Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 6.

FORJUDGE. See FOREJUDGE.

FORJURER (L. Fr.). In Old English Law. To abjure; to forswear. Forjurer royalme, to abjure the realm. Britt. cc. 1, 16.

FORLER-LAND. Land in the diocese of Hereford, which had a peculiar custom attached to it, but which has been long since disused, although the name is retained. Butl. Surv. 56.

"Some of the peculiar customs of Hereford are recently published, as that 'the reeve of the borough may have been directly accountable to the king,' while 'in most cases the king's farmer was the sheriff of the shire.'" Maitl. Domesd. 209. So also, "at Hereford the reeve's consent was necessary when a burgage was to be sold, and he took a third of the price. When a burgess died the king got his horse and arms (these Hereford burgesses were fighting men); if he had no horse, then ten shillings" or his land with the houses." Any one who was too poor to do his service might abandon his tenement to the reeve without having to pay for it. Such an entry as this seems to tell us that the services were no trivial return for the tenements; " id. 199.

FORM. In Practice. The model of an instrument or legal proceeding, containing the substance and the principal terms, to be used in accordance with the laws.

The legal order or method of legal proceedings or construction of legal instruments.

Form is usually put in contradistinction to substance. For example, by the operation of the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 5, s. 1, all merely formal defects in pleading, except in dilatory pleas, are aided on general demurrer. The difference between matter of form and matter of substance, in general, under this statute, as laid down by Lord Hobart, C. J., is that "that without which the right doth sufficiently appear to the court is form;" but that any defect "by reason whereof the right appears not" is a defect in substance; Hob. 233. A distinction somewhat more definite is that if the matter pleaded be in itself insufficient, without reference to the manner of pleading it, the defect is substantial; but that if the fault is in the manner of alleging it, the defect is formal; Dougl. 683.

For example, the omission of a consideration in a declaration in assumpsit, or of the performance of a condition precedent, when such condition exists, of a conversion of property of the plaintiff, in trover, of knowledge in the defendant, in an action for mischief done by his dog, of malice, in an action for malicious prosecution, and the like, are all defects in substance. On the other hand, duplicity, a negative pregnant, argumentative pleading, a special plea, amounting to the general issue, omission of a day, when time is immaterial, of a place, in transitory actions, and the like, are only faults in form; Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (N 5, 6); Comyns, Dig. Pleader (Q 7); 10 Co. 95 a; 2 Stra. 694; Gould, Pl. c. 9, §§ 17, 18; 1 Bla. Com. 142.

At the same time that fastidious objections against trifling errors of form, arising from mere clerical mistakes, are not encouraged or sanctioned by the courts, it has been justly observed that "infinite mischief has been produced by the facility of the courts in overlooking matters of form: it encourages carelessness, and places ignorance too much upon a footing with knowledge amongst those who practise the drawing of pleadings;" 1 B. & P. 59; 2 Binn. 434.

FORMA. Form; the prescribed or established form or method of legal proceedings; applied to obsolete actions "which are frequently mere establishments, Forma et figura judicii," the form and shape of judicial action. 3 Bla. Com. 271.

FORMA PAUPERIS. See IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

FORMALITIES. Customary behavior, dress, or ceremony; ceremonial. Cent. Dict. In England. Robes worn by the magistrates of a city or corporation, etc., on solemn occasions. Encyc. Lond.

FORMALITY. The conditions which must be observed in making contracts, and the words which the law gives to be used in order to render them valid; it also signifies the conditions which the law requires to make regular proceedings.

FORMATA. Canonical letters. Spelman.

FORMATA BREVIA. See BREVIA FORMATA.

FORMED ACTION. An action for which a form of words is provided which must be exactly followed. 10 Mod. 140.

FORMEDON. An ancient writ provided by stat. Westm. 2 (13 Edw. I.) c. 1, for him who hath right to lands or tenements by virtue of a gift in tail. Stearn, Real Act. 322; Andr. Steph. Pl. 66.

It is a writ in the nature of a writ of right, and is the highest remedy which a tenant in tail can have. Co. Litt. 316.

This writ lay for those interested in an estate-tail who were liable to be defeated of their right by a discontinuance of the estate-tail, who were not entitled to a writ of right absolute, since none but those who claimed in fee-simple were entitled to this; Fitzh. N. B. 255. It is called formedon because the plaintiff in it claimed per formam doni.

It is of three sorts: in the remainder; in the reverter; in the descender; 2 Prest. Abstr. 343.

The writ was abolished in England by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

FORMEDON IN THE DESCENDER. A writ of formedon which lies where a gift is made in tail and the tenant in tail aliens the lands or is disseised of them and dies, for the heir in tail to recover them, against the actual tenant of the freehold; Fitzh. N. B. 211; Littleton § 595.

If the demandant claims the inheritance as an estate-tail which ought to come to him by descent, from some ancestor to whom it was first given, his remedy is by a writ of formedon in the descender; Stearn, Real Act. 322.

It must have been brought within twenty years from the death of the ancestor who was disseised; 21 Jac. I. c. 16; 3 Brod. & B. 217; 6 East 83; 4 Term 300; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 193, n.

FORMEDON IN THE REMAINDER. A writ of formedon which lies where lands are given to one for life or in tail with remainder to another in fee or in tail, and he who had the particular estate dies without issue, and a stranger intrudes upon him in remainder and keeps him out of possession. Fitzh. N. B. 211; Stearn, Real Act. 323; Littleton § 597; 3 Bla. Com. 293.

FORMEDON IN THE REVERTER. A writ of formedon which lies where there is a gift in tail, and afterwards, by the death of the donee or his heirs without issue of his body, the reversion falls in upon the donor, his heirs or assigns.

In this case the demandant must suggest the gift, his own right as derived from the donor, and the failure of heirs of the donee; 3 Bla. Com. 293; Stearn, Real Act. 323; Fitzh. N. B. 212; Littleton § 597.

FORMELLA. A certain weight of more than seventy pounds, mentioned in stat. 51 Hen. III. Cowel.

FORMER RECOVERY. A recovery in a former action. The term former adjudication is sometimes, though infrequently, used.

It is a general rule that in a real or personal action a judgment unreversed, whether it be by confession, verdict, or demurrer, is a perpetual bar, and may be pleaded to any new action of the same or a like nature, for the same cause; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (I 12, n. 2); 6 Co. 7; Hob. 4, 5; Vent. 70.

There are two exceptions to this general rule. First, in the case of mutual dealings between the parties, when the defendant omits to set off his counter-demand, he may recover in a cross action. Second, when the defendant in ejectment neglects to bring forward his title, he may avail himself of a new suit; 1 Johns. Cas. 492, 502, 510. It is evident that in these cases the cause of the second action is not the same as that of the first, and, therefore, a former recovery cannot be pleaded. In real actions, one is not a bar to an action of a higher nature; 6 Co. 7. See 12 Mass. 337; RES JUDICATA.

FORMIDO PERICULI (Lat.). Fear of danger. 1 Kent, Com. 23.

FORMS OF ACTION. This term comprehends the various classes of personal action at common law, viz.: trespass, case, trover, detinue, replevin, covenant, debt, assumpsit, scire facias, and revivor, as well as the nearly obsolete actions of account and annuity, and the modern action of mandamus. They are now abolished in England by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875, and in many of the states of the United States, where a uniform course of proceeding under codes of procedure has taken their place. But the principles regulating the distinctions between the common-law actions are still found applicable even where the technical forms are abolished.

FORMULA. In common-law practice, a set form of words used in judicial proceedings. In the civil law, an action. Calvin; Black.

FORMULÆ. In Roman Law. Directions sent by the magistrate to the judge for the dispositions of cases, with respect to which the legis actiones (established actions, or, more accurately according to English legal idiom, forms of action) were inadequate. Sand. Just. Introd. lxviii.

The introduction of the formulæ marked a distinct change in the Roman system of civil process, and they were in turn succeeded by an equally radical change. These periods have been designated as three great epochs. First, was the system of the legis actiones, defined as "certain hard, sharply defined forms which a rude civilization prescribed for all proceedings." These, as civilization advanced, were necessarily replaced by more convenient forms of action, and were finally practically suppressed. The new system of formulæ was a very flexible form of organizing the proceedings adopted by the prætors, by which they were "enabled to give a means enforcing every right which the more enlarged views of an advancing civilization pronounced to be founded on equity." The prætors (in the provinces, præfects) sat as magistrates. From them the directions were sent to the judge in formal shape for each case; and the different forms in which these directions were given were expressed by the formulæ. They were binding on the judge, but no form was binding on the magistrate, who could avail himself "of any equitable doctrine, which a more refined jurisprudence or his own sense of what was right suggested to him," and so "vary the formula, so as to render substantial justice." "These formulae (which were preserved and collected), so flexible in their general character, yet couched in terms always precise and simple, furnish one of many admirable instances of the power of the Romans to express correctly the subtlest legal ideas; and it was by this machinery that the prætors principally introduced their great legal changes."

The formula ordinarily consisted of these three parts:

The demonstratio or statement of the fact or facts which the plaintiff alleges as the ground of his case.

The intentio, the really important part of the formula, a precise statement of the demand which the plaintiff made against (tendebat in) his adversary. It was necessary that it should exactly meet the law which would govern the facts alleged by the plaintiff if true.

The condemnatio, the direction to condemn or absolve according to the true circumstances of the case. In three actions, —to divide a family inheritance, or property held in common, or settle boundaries, the judge was required to adjudicate. This was termed the adjudicatio. In these actions, therefore, the parts of the formula would be four—demonstratio, intentio, adjudicatio, and condemnatio, in case, as might happen, the judge should order a payment in money by some of the parties to equalize the division; the condemnatio, under this system, being always pecuniary.

This system finally gave place to that which prevailed in the third period of the Roman system, "that of the extraordinaria judicia, by which, under the later emperors, the supreme authority took the whole conduct of the proceeding into its own hands, and arrived at what seemed to it to be just, in as direct and speedy a manner as it found possible. See a clear and satisfactory statement of the Roman system of civil process during these three periods; Sand. Just. Introd. lxi. See also Mackeld. Rom. Law § 204.

FORMULARIES. A collection of the forms of proceedings among the Franks and other early European nations. Co. Litt. Butler's note, 77.

FORNAGIUM. The fee taken by a lord of his tenants, bound to bake in his common oven, for liberty to use their own. Cowel; Moz. & W.

FORNICATION. In Criminal Law. Unlawful carnal knowledge by an unmarried person of another, whether the latter be married or unmarried.

Fornication is distinguished from adultery by the fact that the guilty person is not married. Four cases of unlawful intercourse may arise: where both parties are married; where the man only is married; where the woman only is married; where neither is married. In the first case such intercourse must be adultery; in the second case the crime is fornication only on the part of the woman, but adultery on the part of the man; in the third case it is adultery in the woman, and fornication (by statute in some states, adultery) in the man; in the last case it is fornication only in both parties.

In some states it is indictable by statute; 6 Vt. 311; 2 Tayl. C. 165; 2 Gratt. 555; and where it is there may be a conviction for this offence on an indictment for adultery; 2 Dall. 124; 4 Ired. 231; 1 Bish. Crim. L. 795. In Pennsylvania it is a misdemeanor for which an indictment lies, and is also a constituent of incest, adultery, seduction under promise of marriage, and rape; 149 Pa. 35.

FORNIX (Lat. a vault or arch). A brothel,—so-called because formerly situated in underground vaults. Fornication. Fornix et cætera. Fornication and the rest; fornication and bastardy (qq. v.).

FORNO. In Spanish Law. An oven. Las Partidas, pt. 3, t. 32. 1. 18.

FORO. In Spanish Law. The place where tribunals hear and determine causes, —exercendarum litium locus. This word, according to Varo, is derived from ferendo, and is so called because all lawsuits have reference to things that are vendible, which presupposes the administration of justice to take place in the markets.

FOROS. In Spanish Law. Emphyteutic rents. Schm. C. L. 309.

FORPRISE. An exception; reservation; excepted; reserved. Anciently, a term of frequent use in leases and conveyances. Cowel; Blount.

In another sense, the word is taken for any exaction. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FORSCHEL, or FORSCHET. A strip of land lying next to the highway. Cowel.

FORSES. Waterfalls. Cam. Brit.

FORSPEAKER. An attorney or advocate. One who speaks for another. Blount.

FORSPECA, FORSPEECA. Prolocutor; paronymphus. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FORSTAL. An intercepting or stopping in the highway. See FORESTALL.

Forstaller, forstall, forstallare, forstallment, forstaller, may all be found under FORESTALL, etc.

FORSWEAR. In Criminal Law. To swear to a falsehood.

This word has not the same meaning as perjury. It does not, ex vi termini, signify a false swearing before an officer or court having authority to administer an oath, on an issue. A man may be forsworn by making a false oath before an incompetent tribunal, as well as before a lawful court. Hence, to say that a man is forsworn will or will not be slander, as the circumstances show that the oath was or was not taken before a lawful authority; Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 16, 34; Cro. Car. 378; Bacon, Abr. Slander (B 3); Cro. Eliz. 609; 1 Johns. 505; 13 id. 48, 80; 12 Mass. 496; 1 Hayw. 116.

FORT. Something more than a mere military camp, post, or station; it implies a fortification or a place protected from attack by some such means as a moat, wall, or parapet. 12 Fed. Rep. 424.

FORTALICE, or FORTELACE. A fortress or place of strength which anciently did not pass without a special grant. 11 Hen. VII. c. 18. They were originally built for the defence of the country, either against foreign invasions, or civil commotions; and were anciently held to be inter regalia, corresponding with the Roman res publicæ, such as navigable rivers, ports, ferries, and the like, but they now pass with the lands in every charter; Ersk. Pr. 165.

FORTALITIUM. A fortalice (q. v.). Strictly, in old Scotch law, a fortified house or town, or one having a moat around it.

FORTAXED. Wrongly or extortionately taxed.

FORTHCOMING. In Scotch Law. The action by which an arrestment (attachment) of goods is made available to the creditor or holder.

The arrestee and common debtor are called up before the judge, to hear sentence given ordering the debt to be paid or the arrested goods to be given up to the creditor arresting. Bell, Dict.

FORTHCOMING BOND. A bond given for the security of the sheriff, conditioned to produce the property levied on when required. 2 Wash. Va. 189; 11 Gratt. 522; 61 Ga. 520; 87 id. 566.

The measure of damages for breach of a forthcoming bond would be the value of the property at the time the bond was given, provided that value did not exceed the amount of the execution, debt, interest, and costs; 91 Ga. 132. See BOND.

FORTHWITH. As soon as by reasonable exertion, confined to the object, it may be accomplished. This is the import of the term; it varies, of course, with every particular case; 4 Tyrwh. 837; Styles, Reg. 452; 75 Pa. 378. See 101 Ill. 621; 11 H. L. Cas. 337; 67 N. Y. 274; 58 Md. 261; 7 Ch. Div. 238; 9 Q. B. 684; 44 Ohio St. 437. When a defendant is ordered to plead forthwith, he must plead within twenty-four hours; Wharton. In other matters of practice, the word has come to have the same meaning; 2 Edw. 328. A demand for an account forthwith is not the same in substance and effect as a demand for an account within 15 days; 64 Vt. 309. Where a verdict was returned between noon and one P.M. on Saturday, while the justice was hearing other cases, an entry of judgment on the verdict on Monday was sufficient under a statute requiring it to be rendered "forthwith;" 56 Minn. 350. Where a chattel mortgage must "be forthwith deposited" to affect subsequent bona fide purchasers, the filing more than three months after execution was notice to purchasers who took title after the filing; 23 Tex. 338. A statute providing that an order to revive an action may be made forthwith, means at the first term after plaintiff's death; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 434. When an insurance policy required notice of loss to be given forthwith, it was sufficient twelve days after the fire when no harm was caused by delay; 50 Kan. 453.

FORTIA (Lat.). A word of art, signifying the furnishing a weapon of force to do the fact, and by force whereof the fact was committed, and he that furnished it was not present when the act was done. Co. 2d Inst. 182.

The general meaning of the word is an unlawful force. Spelman, Gloss.; Du Cange. Fortia frisca. Fresh force (q. v.).

FORTILITY. In Old English Law. A fortified place; a castle; a bulwark. Cowel; 11 Hen. VII. c. 18.

FORTIN. A little fort; a field fort. Enc. Dict.

FORTIOR (Lat.). Stronger. A term applied in the law of evidence to that species of presumption, arising from facts shown in evidence, which is strong enough to shift the burden of proof to the opposite party. Burr. Circ. Ev. 64.

FORTIORI. See A FORTIORI.

FORTIS (Lat.). Strong. Fortis et sana, strong and sound; staunch and strong; as a vessel. Townsh. Pl. 227.

FORTLETT. A place or port of some strength; a little fort. Old. Nat. Brev. 45.

FORTRET. A little fort; a fort.

FORTUIT (Fr.). Accidental; casual; fortuitous. Cas fortuit, a fortuitous event. Fortuitment, accidentally; by chance.

FORTUITOUS. Depending on or happening by chance; casual; not designed; adventitious. In Civil Law. Resulting from unavoidable causes.

FORTUITOUS COLLISION. An accidental collision.

FORTUITOUS EVENT. In Civil Law. That which happens by a cause which cannot be resisted.

That which neither of the parties has occasioned or could prevent. Lois des Bât. pt. 2, c. 2. An unforeseen event which cannot be prevented. Dict. de Jurisp. Cas fortuit.

There is a difference between a fortuitous event, or inevitable accident, and irresistible force. By the former, commonly called the act of God, is meant any accident produced by physical causes which are irresistible; such as a loss by lightning or storms, by the perils of the seas, by inundations and earthquakes, or by sudden death or illness. By the latter is meant such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable. Of this nature are losses occasioned by the inroads of a hostile army, or by public enemies. Story, Bailm. § 25; Lois des Bât. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1.

Fortuitous events are fortunate or unfortunate. The accident of finding a treasure is a fortuitous event of the first class. Lois des Bât. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2.

Involuntary obligations may arise in consequence of fortuitous events. For example, when to save a vessel from shipwreck, it is necessary to throw goods overboard, the loss must be borne in common: there arises, in this case, between the owners of the vessel and of the goods remaining on board, an obligation to bear proportionately the loss which has been sustained. Lois des Bât. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2. See ACT OF GOD.

FORTUNA (Lat.). Fortune; also treasure-trove. Jac.; Moz. & W.

FORTUNE-TELLER. One who pretends to be able to reveal future events; one who pretends to the knowledge of futurity.

It was a practice during the Middle Ages, and is still far from dying out, though laws for its suppression have been passed, and many fortune-tellers have been convicted and punished. Encyc. Dict.

FORTUNIUM. In Old English Law. A tournament or fighting with spears, and an appeal to fortune therein.

FORTY-DAYS-COURT. The court of attachments (q. v.) in the forests.

FORUM. At Common Law. A place. A place of jurisdiction. The place where a remedy is sought. Jurisdiction. A court of justice.

Forum actus. The forum of the place where an act was done.

Forum conscientie. The conscience.

Forum contentiosum. A court. 3 Bla. Com. 211.

Forum contractus. Place of making a contract. 2 Kent 463.

Forum domesticum. A domestic court. 1 W. Blackst. 82.

Forum domicilii. Place of domicile. 2 Kent 463.

Forum ecclesiasticum. An ecclesiastical court.

Forum ligeantiae rei. The forum of the allegiance of the defendant.

Forum originis. The forum of birth.

Forum regium. The court of the king. Stat. Westm. 2, c. 43.

Forum rei. This expression is used alternately for the forum of the defendant's domicile, in which case it is the genitive of reus, or the forum of the thing in controversy, when it is the genitive of res.

Forum rei gestae. Place of transaction. 2 Kent 463.

Forum rei sitae. The place where the thing is situated.

The tribunal which has authority to decide respecting something in dispute, located within its jurisdiction: therefore, if the matter in controversy is land or other immovable property, the judgment pronounced in the forum rei sitae is held to be of universal obligation, as to all matters of right and title on which it professes to decide, in relation to such property. And the same principle applies to all other cases of proceedings in rem, where the subject is movable property, within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing judgment. Story, Conf. Laws §§ 532, 545, 551, 592; Kaimes, Eq. b. 3, c. 8, § 4; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 541.

Forum seculare. A secular court.

In Roman Law. The paved open space in cities, particularly in Rome, where were held the solemn business assemblies of the people, the markets, the exchange (whence cedere foro, to retire from 'change, equivalent to "to become bankrupt"), and where the magistrates sat to transact the business of their office. It corresponded to the ayopa of the Greeks. Dion. Hal. l. 3, p. 200. It came afterwards to mean any place where causes were tried, locus exercendarum litium. Isidor. l. 18, Orig. A court of justice.

The obligation and the right of a person to have his case decided by a particular court.

It is often synonymous with that signification of judicium which corresponds to our word court (which see), in the sense of jurisdiction: e. g., foro interdicere, l. 1, § 13, D. 1, 12; C. 9, § 4, D. 48, 19; fori praescriptio, l. 7, pr. D. 2, 8; l. 1, C. 3, 24; forum rei accusator sequitur, l. 5, pr. C. 3, 13. In this sense the forum of a person means both the obligation and the right of that person to have his cause decided by a particular court. 5 Glück, Pand. 237. What court should have cognizance of the cause depends, in general, upon the person of the defendant, or upon the person of some one connected with the defendant.

Jurisdictions depending upon the person of the defendant. By modern writers upon the Roman law, this sort of jurisdiction is distinguished as that of common right, forum commune, and that of special privilege, forum privilegiatum.

(a.) Forum generale. General jurisdiction was of two kinds, the forum originis, which was that of the birthplace of the party, and the forum domicilii, that of his domicile. The forum originis was either commune or proprium. The former was that legal status which all free-born subjects of the empire, wherever residing, had at Rome when they were found there and had not the jus revocandi domum (i. e., the right of one absent from his domicile of transferring to the forum domicilii a suit instituted against him in the place of his temporary sojourn). L. 2, §§ 3, 4, 5, D. 5, 1; l. 28, § 4, D. 4, 6; 3 Glück, Pand. 188. After the privilege of Roman citizenship was conferred by Caracalla upon all free-born subjects of the empire, the city of Rome was considered the common home of all, communis omnium patria, and every citizen, no matter where his domicile, could, unless protected by special privilege, be sued at Rome while there present. Noodt, Com. ad Dig. 5, 1, p. 153; Hofacker, Pr. Jur. Civ. § 4221. The forum originis proprium, or forum originis speciale, was the court of that place of which at the time of the party's birth his father was a citizen, though that might possibly be neither his own birthplace nor the actual domicile of his father. Except in particular places, as Delphi and Pontus, where the nativity of the mother conferred the privilege of citizenship upon her son, the birthplace of the father only was regarded. L. 1, § 2, D. 50, 1. The case of the nullius filius was also an exception. Such a person having no known father derived his forum originis from the birthplace of his mother. L. 9, D. 50, 1.

Adoption might confer a twofold citizenship, that of the natural and that of the adoptive father; l. 7, C. 8, 48; but the latter was lost by emancipation; L. 16, D. 50, 1. In general, the birthplace of the father alone fixed the forum originis of the son. Amaya, Com. ad Tit. Cod. de incolis, n. 21, seq. 99. The forum originis was unchangeable, and continued although the party had established his domicile in another place: consequently, he could always be sued in the courts of that jurisdiction whenever he was there present; 6 Glück, Pand. p. 260.

Forum domicilii. The place of the domicile exercised the greatest influence over the rights of the party. (As to what constitutes domicile, see DOMICIL.) In general, one was subject to the laws and courts of his domicile alone, unless specially privileged. L. 29, D. 50, 1. This legal status, forum domicilii, was universal, in the sense that all suits of whatever nature, real or personal, petitory or possessory, might be instituted in the courts of the defendant's domicile even when the thing in dispute was not situated within the jurisdiction of such court, and the defendant was not present at such place at the commencement of the suit; 6 Glück, Pand. 287 et seq. It seems, however, that as regarded real actions the forum domicilii was concurrent with the forum rei site, id. 290, and, in general, was concurrent with special jurisdictions of all kinds; although in some exceptional cases the law conferred exclusive cognizance upon a special jurisdiction, forum speciale. In cases of concurrence the plaintiff had his election of the jurisdiction.

In another sense the forum domicilii was personal, as it did not necessarily descend to the heir of defendant. See jurisdiction ex persona alterius, at the end of this article.

Forum speciale, particular jurisdiction. These were very numerous. The more important are: (1.) Forum continentie causarum. Sometimes two or more actions or disputed questions are so connected that they cannot advantageously be tried separately, although in strictness they belong to different jurisdictions. In such cases the modern civil law permits them to be determined in a single court, although such court would be incompetent in regard to a portion of them taken singly. This beneficial rule did not exist in the Roman law, though formerly supposed to be derived thence. See 11 Glück, Pand. § 750, and cases there cited. (2.) Forum contractus, the court having cognizance of the action on a contract. If the place of performance was ascertained by the contract, the court of that place had exclusive jurisdiction of actions founded thereon; 6 Glück, Pand. 296. If the place of performance was uncertain, the court of the place where the contract was made might have jurisdiction, provided the defendant at the time of the institution of the suit was either present at that place or had attachable property there. Id. 298.

(3.) Forum delicti, forum deprehensionis, is the jurisdiction of the person of a criminal, and may be the court of the place where the offence was committed, or that of the place where the criminal was arrested. The latter jurisdiction, forum deprehensionis, extended at most only to the preliminary examination of the person arrested; and even this was abolished by Justinian, Nov. lxx. c. 1, cxxxiv. c. 5, on the ground that the examination as well as the punishment should take place on the spot where the crime was committed; 6 Glück, Pand. § 517.

(4.) Forum rei site is the jurisdiction of the court of that place where is situated the thing which is the object of the action. Such court had jurisdiction over all actions affecting the possession of the thing, and over all petitory actions in rem against the possessor in that character, and all such actions in personam so far as they were brought for the recovery of the thing itself. But such court had not jurisdiction of purely personal actions. Id. § 519.

Forum arresti is a jurisdiction unknown to the Roman law, but of frequent occurrence in the modern civil law. It is that over persons or things detained by a judicial order, and corresponds in some degree to the attachment of our practice. Id. § 519.

Forum gestæ administrationis, the jurisdiction over the accounts and administration of guardians, agents, and all persons appointed to manage the affairs of third parties. The court which appointed such administrator, or wherein the cause was pending in which such appointment was made, or within whose territorial limits the business of the administration was transacted, had exclusive jurisdiction over all suits arising out of his acts or brought for the purpose of compelling him to account, or brought by him to recover compensation for his outlays; L. 1, C. 3, 21; 6 Glück, Pand. § 521.

Privileged jurisdictions, forum privilegiatum. In general, the privileged jurisdiction of a person held the same rank as the forum domicilii, and, like that, did not supplant the particular jurisdictions above named save in certain exceptional cases. The privilege was general in its nature, and applied to all cases not specially excepted, but it only arose when the person possessing it was sued by another; for he could not assert it when he was the plaintiff, the rule being, actor sequitur forum rei, the plaintiff must resort to the jurisdiction of the defendant. It was in general limited to personal actions; all real actions brought against the defendant in the character of possessor or the thing in dispute followed the forum speciale. The privilege embraced the wife of the privileged person and his children so long as they were under his potestas. And lastly, when a forum privilegiatum purely personal conflicted with the forum speciale, the former must yield; 6 Glück, Pand. 339-341. To these rules some exceptions occur, which will be mentioned below.

Privileged persons were: 1. Personæ miserabiles, who were persons under the special protection of the law on account of some incapacity of age, sex, mind, or condition. These were entitled, whether as plaintiffs or defendants, to carry their causes directly before the emperor, and, passing over the inferior courts, to demand a hearing before his supreme tribunal, whenever they had valid grounds for doubting the impartiality or fearing the procrastination of the inferior courts, or for dreading the influence of a powerful adversary; 6 Glück, Pand. § 522. On the other hand, if their adversary, on any pretext whatever, had himself passed by the inferior courts and applied directly to the supreme tribunal, they were not bound to appear there if this would be disadvantageous to them, but in order to avoid the increase of costs and other inconveniences, might decline answering except before their forum domicilii. The personæ miserabiles thus privileged were minor orphans, widows, whether rich or poor, persons afflicted by chronic disease or other forms of illness (diuturno morbo fatigati et debiles), which included paralytics, epileptics, the deaf, the dumb, and the blind, etc., persons impoverished by calamity or otherwise distressed, and the poor when their adversary was rich and powerful, praesertim cum alicujus potentiam perhorrescant. This privilege was, however, not available, when both parties were personæ miserabiles; when it had been waived either expressly or tacitly; when the party had become persona miserabilis since the institution of the action,—except always the case of reasonable suspicion in regard to the impartiality of the judge; when the party had become persona miserabilis through his own crime or fraud; when the cause was trivial, or belonged to the class of unconditionally privileged cases having an exclusive forum; and when the cause of action was a right acquired from a persona non miserabilis. 6 Glück, Pand. § 522.

Clerici, the clergy. The privilege of clerical persons to be impleaded only in the episcopal courts commenced under the Christian emperors. Justinian enlarged the jurisdiction of these courts, not only by giving them exclusive cognizance of affairs and offences purely ecclesiastical, but also by constituting them the ordinary primary courts for the trial of suits brought against the clergy even for temporal causes of action. Nov. 83, Nov. 123, cap. 8, 21, 22, 23. The causes of action cognizable in the forum ecclesiasticum were—1. causæ ecclesiasticæ mere tales, purely ecclesiastical, i.e., those pertaining to doctrine, church services, and ceremonies, and right to membership; those relating to the synodical assemblies and church discipline; those relating to offices and dignities and to the election, ordination, translation, and deposition of pastors and other office-bearers of the church, and especially those relating to the validity of marriages and to divorce; or, 2. causæ ecclesiasticæ mixtæ, mixed causes, i.e., disputes in regard to church lands, tithes, and other revenues, their management and disbursement, and legacies to pious uses, in regard to the boundaries of ecclesiastical jurisdictions, in regard to patronage and advowsons, in regard to burials and to consecrated places, as graveyards, convents, etc., and, lastly, in regard to offences against the canons of the church, as simony, etc. But the privilege here treated of was the personal privilege of the clergy when defendant in a suit to have the cause tried before the episcopal court: when plaintiff, the rule actor sequitur forum rei prevailed. All persons employed in the church service in an official capacity, even though not in holy orders, were thus privileged. But the privilege did not embrace real actions, nor personal actions brought to recover the possession of a thing: these must be instituted in the forum rei site. The jurisdiction extended to all personal actions, criminal as well as civil; although in criminal actions the ecclesiastical courts had no authority to inflict corporeal or capital punishment, being restricted to the canonical judgments of deprivation, degradation, excommunication, etc. 6 Glück, Pand. § 523.

Academici. In the modern civil law the officers and students of the universities are privileged to be sued before the university courts. This species of privilege was unknown to the Roman law. See 6 Glück, Pand. § 524.

Militēs. Soldiers had special military courts as well in civil as criminal cases. In civil matters, however, the forum militare had preference only over the courts of the place where the soldier defendant was stationed; as he did not forfeit his domicile by absence on military duty, he might always be sued for debt in the ordinary forum domicilii, provided he had left there a procurator to transact his business for him, or had property there which might be proceeded against. L. 3. C. 2. 51; l. 6. codem; l. 4. C. 7. 53. Besides this, the privilege of the forum militare did not extend to such soldiers as carried on a trade or profession in addition to their military service and were sued in a case growing out of such trade, although in other respects they were subject to the military tribunal. L. 7. C. 3. 13. If after an action had been commenced the defendant became a soldier, the privilege did not attach, but the suit must be concluded before the court which had acquired jurisdiction of it. The forum militare had cognizance of personal actions only. Actions arising out of real rights could be instituted only in the forum rei sitæ. In the Roman law, ordinary crimes of soldiers were cognizable in the forum delicti. The modern civil law is otherwise. 6 Glück, Pand. 418, 421.

There are many classes of persons who are privileged in respect to jurisdiction under the modern civil law who were not so privileged by the Roman law. Such are officers of the court of the sovereign, including ministers of state and councillors, ambassadors, noblemen, etc. These do not require extended notice.

Jurisdiction ex persona alterius. A person might be entitled to be sued in a particular court on grounds depending upon the person of another. Such were—1. The Wife, who, if the marriage had been legally contracted, acquired the forum of her husband; l. 63, D. 5. 1; l. ult. D. 50. 1; l. 19, D. 2. 1; and retained it until her second marriage; l. 22, § 1, D. 50. 1; or change of domicile; § 93, Voet. Com. ad Pand. D. 5. 1. 2. Servants, who possessed the jurisdiction of their master as regarded the forum domicilii, and also the forum privilegiatum, so far at least as the privilege was that of the class to which such master belonged and was not purely personal, Glück, Pand. § 510 b. 3. The heirs, who in many cases retained the jurisdiction of his testator. When sued in the character of heir in respect to causes of action upon which suit had been commenced before the testator's death, he must submit to the forum which had acquired cognizance of the suit; l. 30, 34, D. 5. 1. When the cause of action accrued, but the action was not commenced, in the lifetime of the testator, the heir must submit to special jurisdictions to which the testator would have been subjected, as the forum contractus or gestæ administrationes, especially if personally present or possessing property within such jurisdiction; L. 19, D. 5. 1. But it is even now disputed whether in such case he was bound to submit to the general jurisdiction, forum domicilii, or the privileged jurisdiction, forum privilegiatum, of his testator; though the weight of the authorities is on the side of the negative; Glück, Pand. § 560 b. If the cause of action arose after the death of the testator, as in the case of the querela inofficiosi testamenti, of partition, of suits to recover a legacy or to enforce a testamentary trust, the heir must be pursued in his own jurisdiction, i.e., the forum domicilii or forum rei sitæ; 6 Glück, Pand. 232, and authorities there cited. And, a fortiori, if the action against the heir was not in that character, but merely in the capacity of possessor of the thing in dispute, the suit must be brought before the forum to which he was himself subject; id. p. 251.

FORUTH. A long slip of ground. Cowel.

FORWARDING MERCHANT. A person who receives and forwards goods, taking upon himself the expenses of transportation, for which he receives a compensation from the owners, but who has no concern in the vessels or wagons by which they are transported, and no interest in the freight.

Such a one is not deemed a common carrier, but a mere warehouseman or agent; 12 Johns. 232; 7 Cow. 497; see 15 Minn. 270; 2 Wheel. Abr. 142; nor is he an insurer; 27 Cal. 11. He is required to use only ordinary diligence in sending the property by responsible persons; 2 Cow. 593; 6 Allen 254; 64 N. Y. 300. See Story, Bailm. § 502;

Ang. Car. § 75; 2 Wend. 594; COMMON CARRIERS.

FOSSA (Lat.). In English Law. A ditch full of water, where formerly women who had committed a felony were drowned; the grave. Cowel. See FURCA.

FOSSAGE, FOSSAGIUM. In Old English Law. A composition paid in lieu of the duty of cleaning out and repairing the moat surrounding a fortified town. A duty or tax paid for that work.

FOSSATORIUM OPERATIO (Lat.). The service of laboring done by the inhabitants and adjoining tenants, for repair and maintenance of the ditches round a city or town. A contribution in lieu of such work, called fossagium, was sometimes paid. Kennett; Cowel.

FOSSATUM. A canal; a moat; a place inclosed by a ditch; a trench.

FOSELUM. A small ditch. Cowel.

FOSSWAY, or FOSSE. One of the four great roads of England built by the Romans; so called from the ditch on each side.

Trevisa describes it thus: "The first and greatest of the four weyes is called fosse, and stretches out of the south into the north, and begynneth from the corner of Cornewaile, and passeth forth by Devenshyre by Somersete, and forth besides Tetbury, upon Cotteswold, besides Coventre, unto Leyster, and so forth, by wyld pleyne towards Newerke, and endeth at Lincoln" (Polychron. l. 1, c. xiv.). Wharton.

FOSTER-LAND. Land given for finding food for any person, as for monks in a monastery. Cowel.

FOSTER-LOAN (Sax.). A nuptial gift; the jointure for the maintenance of a wife. Toml.

FOSTER-SHIP. Forester-ship.

FOSTERING. An ancient custom in Ireland, in which persons put away their children to fosterers. Fostering was held to be a stronger alliance than blood, and the foster children participated in the fortunes of their foster fathers. Hallam's Const. Hist. ch. 18; Moz. & W.

FOSTERLEAN. The remuneration paid for the rearing or fostering of a child. The jointure of a wife. Jacob; Encyc. Dict.

FOUND. A person is said to be found within a state when actually present therein, but as applied to a corporation it is necessary that it is doing business in such state through an officer or agent or by statutory authority in such manner as to render it liable then to suit and to constructive or substituted service of process. See 55 Fed. Rep. 751; FOREIGN CORPORATION; SERVICE; NON EST INVENTUS.

FOUNDATION. The establishment of a charity. That upon which a charity is founded and by which it is supported.

This word, in the English law, is taken in two senses, fundatio incipiens, and fundatio perficiens. As to its political capacity, an act of incorporation is metaphorically called its foundation; but as to its dotation, the first gift of revenues is called the foundation. 10 Co. 23 a.

FOUNDER. One who endows an institution. One who makes a gift of revenues to a corporation. 10 Co. 33; 1 Bla. Com. 481.

In England, the king is said to be the founder of all civil corporations; and where there is an act of incorporation, he is called the general founder, and he who endows is called the perficient founder. 1 Bla. Com. 481.

FOUNDERS' SHARES. In English Company Law. Shares issued to the founders of (or vendors to) a public company as a part of the consideration for the business, or concession, etc., taken over, and not forming a part of, the ordinary capital. As a rule, such shares only participate in profits after the payment of a fixed minimum dividend on paid-up capital. Encyc. Dict.

FOUNDEROSUS. Out of repair. Cro. Car. 366.

FOUNDLING. A new-born child abandoned by its parents, who are unknown. The settlement of such a child is in the place where found. Foundling hospitals are charitable institutions which exist in many countries for the care of such children. In England they are regulated by stat. 13 Geo. II. c. 29. See Int. Cyc. h. t.

FOUNDRY. Works for the casting of metals, without regard to whether they are cast for agricultural and mechanical, or other purposes. 44 La. Ann. 793.

FOUR (Fr.). An oven; kiln; bake-house. Four banal (banal of a manner; common), an oven owned by the proprietor of the estate, to which the tenants were obliged to bring their bread for baking. Also the proprietary right to maintain such an oven.

FOUR CORNERS. The four corners of an instrument means that which is contained on the face of it (without any aid from the knowledge of the circumstances under which it was made). This is said to be within its four corners, because every deed is still supposed to be written on one entire skin, and so to have but four corners. Wharton.

FOUR SEAS. The seas surrounding England. These were divided into the Western, including the Scotch and Irish; The Northern, or North Sea; The Eastern, being the German Ocean; The Southern, being the British Channel. Selden, Mare Clausum, lib. 2, c. 1.

Within the four seas means within the jurisdiction of England; 4 Co. 125; Co. 2d Inst. 252. See LIMITATION.

FOURCHER (Fr. to fork), or FOURCH. In English Law. A method of delaying an action formerly practised by defendants.

When an action was brought against two, who, being jointly concerned, were not bound to answer till both appeared, and they agreed not to appear both in one day, and the appearance of one excused the other's default, who had a day given him to appear with the other: the defaulter, on the day appointed, appeared; but the first then made default: in this manner they forked each other, and practised this for delay. See Co. 2d Inst. 250; Booth, Real Act. 16.

FOURIERISM. A social system invented by Charles Fourier, characterized by Mill as "the most skilfully combined and with the greatest foresight of objections, of all forms of socialism." Pol. Econ. II. I 4, which see and also Int. Cyc. for fuller accounts of the system, and Cent. Dict. and Encyc. Dict. for briefer ones.

FOUTGELD. See FOOTGELD.

FOWLS OF WARREN. Such fowls as are preserved under the game-laws in warrens. According to Manwood, these are partridges and pheasants. According to Coke, they are either campestres, as partridges, rails, and quails, sylvestres, as woodcocks and pheasants, or aquatiles, as mallards and herons. Co. Litt. 233.

FOX'S LIBEL ACT. An act passed in England in 1792, which provided that in prosecutions for libel, the jury might give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put at issue upon the indictment, and should not be required by the court to find the defendant guilty merely upon proof of the publication of the alleged libel, in the sense ascribed to it in the indictment.

FOY (L. Fr.). Faith; allegiance; fidelity.

FRACTION, FRACTIO. The act of breaking, or the state of being broken, especially by violence; a breaking or fracture. A fragment; a separated portion; a disconnected part. Cent. Dict.

FRACTION OF A DAY. A portion of a day. The dividing a day. Generally, the law does not allow the fraction of a day, and the day on which an act is done must therefore be either entirely included or excluded; 2 Bla. Com. 141; 25 Fla. 371; 11 Mass. 204; 64 Pa. 240; 20 Vt. 653; and, therefore, judgments entered on the same day are regarded as entered at the same time, and create liens equal in point of priority; 4 McLean 555; 8 W. & S. 304; but this is merely a legal fiction, which does not apply where it is necessary to distinguish between the two parts of a day; 3 Burr. 1344; 11 H. L. Cas. 411; and, therefore, it has been said that there is no such general rule of law, but that common sense and common justice sustain the propriety of considering fractions of a day whenever it will promote the purposes of substantial justice; 2 Stor. 571; 100 U. S. 689; 104 id. 474; 37 Ill. 239; 3 La. Ann. 430; 60 Me. 88; 16 Ohio 111; thus, the bankrupt act of 1841 was repealed by the act of March 3, 1843, which was not signed by the president till the evening of that day; proceedings in bankruptcy begun on the morning of that day were held to have been begun before the passage of the act; id.; tobacco stamped, sold, and removed in the morning of March 3, 1875, was not considered subject to an increased tax-rate imposed by the act of that date, which was not signed by the president until a later hour of that day; 97 U. S. 381; where a township voted aid bonds on the morning of an election day in Illinois, at which a constitutional provision was adopted forbidding the issuing of such bonds, the court found as a fact that the township vote was had before the adoption of the constitution, and, therefore, sustained the validity of the bonds; 104 U. S. 469. Although the law does not generally consider fractions of a day, yet when substantial justice requires it, courts may ascertain the precise time when a statute is approved or an act done; 147 U. S. 640. In 97 U. S. 170, the court held that the president's proclamation of June 13, 1865, removing restrictions upon trade, etc., took effect as of the beginning of that day and refused to consider the fraction of a day. In computing the time for the performance of official duties, each fraction of a day is to be considered as a full day; 12 Colo. 285. See FROM; FULL AGE; TIME; DAY.

FRACTITUM. Arable land. Toml.; Moz. & W.

FRACTURA NAVIUM. Breaking up of ships or wreck of shipping at sea. Very like naufraque (q. v.).

FRAIS (Fr.). Costs; charges; expenses.

FRAIS DE JUSTICE. Costs incurred incidentally to the action. See 1 Troplong, 135, n. 122; 4 Low. C. 77. Frais d'un procès. Costs of a suit.

FRAIS JUSQU'A BORD (Fr.). In French Commercial Law. Expenses up to the time that goods are actually shipped on board of a vessel, including such items as packing, portage, or cartage, commissions, etc. 16 Fed. Rep. 336. A shipment on which the seller pays the frais jusqu'a bord, would correspond to a sale of the goods "free on board" (q. v.).

FRANC. A French coin, of the value of about twenty cents.

FRANC ALEU. In French Law. An absolutely free inheritance. Allodial lands. Generally, however, the word denotes an inheritance free from seignorial rights, though held subject to the sovereign. Dumoulin, Cout. de Par. §1; Guyot, Rep. Univ.; 3 Kent 498, n.; 8 Low. C. 95.

FRANC TENANCIER. In French Law. A freeholder.

FRANCE. A republic of Europe. The present constitution was voted by the national assembly in 1871 and revised July 1, 1884, and June, 1885. The executive is a president who appoints the ministry. The legislative department is vested in a senate of 300 members, elected by the delegates of the municipalities, and a chamber of deputies of 584 members, elected by universal suffrage for a term of four years. The president is nominated for seven years by the senate and chamber of deputies. He initiates legislation concurrently with the two houses and makes all civil and military appointments. All his acts must be countersigned by a minister, and he cannot declare war without the previous consent of the two chambers. With the consent of the senate he may dissolve the chamber of deputies, but in such an event there must be a new election held within three months. In the administration of justice the country is divided into twenty-six courts of appeal, each having nine to twelve counsellors and a president. Three counsellors are commissioned twice a year at least to hold criminal assizes in the chief towns. Persons accused of misdemeanors are tried without a jury before three judges in the courts of correctional police of which there is one in every chief town of an arrondissement. There are tribunals of simple police which exercise summary jurisdiction in minor offences. In every canton and in every city quartier there is a juge de paix. The court of cassation, which is the supreme court of appeals, holds its sittings in Paris. See EXECUTIVE POWER; CODE.

FRANCHILANUS. A freeman. Chart. Hen. IV. A free tenant. Spel. Glos.

FRANCHISE. A special privilege conferred by government on individuals, and which does not belong to the citizens of the country generally by common right. Ang. & A. Corp. § 4; 4 Neb. 416, 420.

A certain privilege conferred by grant from government and vested in individuals. 3 Kent 458.

A royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. Finch i. 164; 2 Bla. Com. 37; 3 Cruise, Dig. 278; 13 Pet. 595; 36 W. Va. 802.

A very recent writer, who finds in the history of early English tenures a universality of oppressive services which literally made life a burden to the average land-holder, considers the first use of the terms "liberty" and "franchise" to be an expression of the relief of the possessor from some part of this burden. He says: "Lastly in our thirteenth century we learn that privileges and exceptional immunities are 'liberties' and 'franchises.' What is our definition of a liberty, a franchise? A portion of royal power in the hands of a subject. In Henry III.'s day we do not say that the Earl of Chester is a freer man, more of a liber homo, than is the Earl of Gloucester, but we do say that he has more, greater, higher liberties." Maitl. Domesd. 43.

The right or privilege of being a corporation, and of doing such things, and such things only, as are authorized by the corporation's charter. 122 Ill. 293.

"The word franchise is generally used to designate a right or privilege conferred by law. What is called 'the franchise of forming a corporation,' is really but an exemption from the general rule of the common law prohibiting the formation of corporations. All persons in this state have now the right of forming corporate associations upon complying with the simple formalities prescribed by the statute. The right of forming a corporation, and of acting in a corporate capacity under the general incorporation laws, can be called a franchise only in the sense in which the right of forming a limited partnership, or of executing a conveyance of land by deed is a franchise. Horton, C. J., in 40 Kan. 96.

It is a privilege emanating from the sovereign power of the state, owing its existence to a grant or, as at common law, to prescription, which presupposes a grant, and vested in individuals or a body politic something not belonging to the citizen of common right. 142 Ill. 404.

Commenting on Blackstone's definition, Thompson says: "It has been well observed that, under our American systems of government and laws, this definition is not strictly correct; since our franchises spring from contracts between the sovereign power and private citizens, made upon a valuable consideration, for purposes of public benefit as well as of individual advantage." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5335.

In a popular sense, the word seems to be synonymous with right or privilege: as, the elective franchise.

There are two franchises, distinct in their nature, and yet governed by substantially the same rules as to grant and exercise, which may be enjoyed by a corporation. One is the franchise of being or existing as a corporation, that is, possessing a unity and perpetuity of existence, though composed of an aggregate of changing members; the other is the exercise of rights, like the right of eminent domain or the partial appropriation of public property by exclusive use, as in ferries. Either of these franchises is a branch of sovereignty. 1 Bouv. Inst. 1690.

A franchise to be a corporation, however, is distinct from a franchise as a corporation to maintain and operate a railway; the latter may be mortgaged, without the former, and pass to a purchaser at a foreclosure sale; 112 U. S. 609.

The grant of letters patent for an invention is a franchise; (1891) 2 Q. B. 263; and so is a charter of incorporation from the state; 36 W. Va. 802.

To be a franchise, the right possessed must be such as cannot be exercised without the express permission of the sovereign power—a privilege or immunity of a public nature which cannot be legally exercised without legislative grant; 40 Minn. 213; 38 id. 366.

In a case already cited it is said that a franchise, or the right to be and act as an artificial body, is vested in the individuals who compose the corporation, and not in the corporation itself; 122 Ill. 293. "But this," it is said, "is an imperfect statement of the true conclusion,—which is, that a primary franchise, that is to say, the franchise of being a corporation, vests in the individuals who compose the corporation; while those secondary franchises which are vendible by the corporation, necessarily, and for that reason alone, must be deemed to vest in the corporation. However, judicial theory is so confused on the subject, that proceedings by information in the nature of a quo warranto, to vacate the franchises of corporations, are sometimes brought against the individuals who compose the corporation, and sometimes against the corporation itself." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5337.

Franchises are only grantable by the sovereign power, and in the United States they are usually held by the corporations created for the purpose, and can be held only under legislative grant; 15 Pick. 243; 73 Ill. 541; 13 Pet. 519; 15 Johns. 358; and may be accompanied with such conditions as its legislature may judge most befitting to its interest and policy; 134 U. S. 594; 143 id. 305.

The state is presumed to grant corporate franchises in the public interest, and to intend that they shall be exercised through the proper officers and agencies of the corporation, and does not contemplate that corporate powers will be delegated to others. Any conduct which destroys their functions, or maims or cripples their separate activity, by taking away the right to freely and independently exercise the functions of their franchise, is contrary to a sound public policy; 71 Fed. Rep. 787.

The grant of a franchise by the legislature is a contract and cannot be resumed by the state or its benefits impaired or diminished without the consent of the parties; 4 Wheat. 519; 3 Wall. 51; 3 Kent Com. 458; it is within the protection of that clause of the constitution of the United States which forbids the states from impairing the obligation of contracts; 10 Wall. 511; 9 Yerg. 490; 30 Ark. 128, 693; 97 U. S. 454; but this does not apply to mere personal privileges to members of a corporation, such as the exemption of a servant of such body from militia duty, or serving on juries, etc.; 4 Lea 316; such an exemption was held in this case unconstitutional; contra, 88 Ala. 176, where such an exemption was held part of the franchise granted to the corporation; and it may become a vested right which cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation; 67 Mo. 637 (overruling 5 Mo. App. 220). See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

By the constitution or laws of many of the states, charters can only be granted subject to amendment or repeal. As to the power of the legislature in such cases, see 109 Mass. 103; 63 Me. 269; 41 Iowa 297; Beach, Pub. Corp. 63; 146 U. S. 258; but municipal franchises are entirely under the control of the legislature; Cooley, Const. Lim. 336; 10 How. 402; 94 U. S. 113; 128 id. 174.

The grant of a franchise is construed strictly and in case of doubt most favorably to the public; 130 U. S. 1; 11 Conn. 185; 80 Me. 544; 25 Cal. 283; 69 Tex. 306; 9 Ga. 475; 127 Ind. 369; and in the absence of doubt the obvious meaning of the words is to be followed; 34 Fed. Rep. 579; 79 Ala. 465; such a grant is not held to be exclusive unless from its nature a presumption arises that it was so intended; 11 Pet. 420; 2 Port. 296; 21 Vt. 590; 127 Ind. 369; 17 Conn. 40. 454; 6 Paige 554; nor is a proviso to be so interpreted as to defeat the grant; 87 Pa. 34; 27 id. 303; 46 id. 112.

Franchises are held subject to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which see for a discussion of this branch of the subject. See also 2 Gray 1, 35; 4 id. 474; 23 Pick. 360; 66 Pa. 41; 5 Johns. Ch. 101; 13 How. 71; 105 U. S. 13; 148 id. 312.

They are also said to be liable for the debts of the owner; 2 Washb. R. P. 24; but it is the general rule that they cannot be levied upon and sold under execution without authority or statute; 34 La. The same principles apply to a mortgage or lease of a franchise, see cases cited, and also, 24 N. J. Eq. 455; 115 Mass. 347; 101 U. S. 71; 8 Phila. 94. The power to sell includes the power to mortgage; 119 U. S. 191.

The franchises which pass by a judicial sale of a railroad and franchises are those which are essential to the operation of the corporation but do not include such special privileges as an exemption from taxation; 93 U. S. 217. A corporation having public duties cannot transfer a portion of them; 50 Ind. 85; but the attempt to divide the franchise only concerns the public and cannot be objected to by a rival company; 45 Cal. 365.

An irrigation company may make a valid conveyance of all its property and right of way; 40 Kan. 96; 38 Cal. 300. See, generally, as to the sale of franchises, 4 Thomp. The remedy for a non-user or misuser of a franchise by a corporation duly created and organized is by quo warranto or scire facias, which titles see. A court of equity will not in such case interfere or declare the franchise to be forfeited; 1 N. J. Eq. 369; 2 Johns. Ch. 371; but see 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4538. Where a franchise is asserted in a proceeding to claim a right under it, its existence may be denied by way of defence; 47 Ohio St. 1. But a franchise set up by a corporation in defence if it is in de facto possession of it cannot be disputed except by a person or corporation, who in the proceeding claims a better title; 64 Cal. 69. FRANCIA. France. Bract. fol. 427 q.

FRANCIGENA. A designation formerly given to aliens in England.

FRANCUS. Free; a freeman; a Frank. Spel. Glos.

Francus bancus. Free bench (q. v.).

Francus homo. A freeman.

Francus plegius. Frank pledge (q. v.)

Francus tenens. A freeholder. See ESTATE OF FREEHOLD.

FRANK. In Old English Law. Free. Usually employed in compounds, as frank-bank, free bench (q. v.).

To send letters and other mail matter free of postage. See FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

FRANKALMOIGNE. A species of ancient tenure, still extant in England, whereby a religious corporation, aggregate or sole, holds its lands of the donor, in consideration of the religious services it performs.

The services rendered being divine, the tenants are not bound to take an oath of fealty to a superior lord. A tenant in frankalmoigne is not only exempt from all temporal service, but the lord of whom he holds is also bound to acquit him of every service and fruit of tenure which the lord paramount may demand of the land held by this tenure. The services to be performed are either spiritual, as prayers to God, or temporal, as the distribution of alms to the poor. Of this latter class is the office of the queen's almoner, which is usually bestowed upon the Archbishop of York, with the title of Lord High Almoner. The spiritual services which were due before the Reformation are described by Littleton § 135; since that time they have been regulated by the liturgy or Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England; Co. 2d Inst. 502; Co. Litt. 93, 494 a. Hargr. ed. note (b); 2 Bla. Com. 101.

In the United States, religious corporations hold land by the same tenure with which all other corporations and individuals hold. Our religious corporations are generally restricted to the holding of whatever quantity of land is required for the immediate purposes of their incorporation; sometimes, as in Pennsylvania, the maximum value of the lands is fixed by statute. Subject to this restriction, they have a fee-simple estate in their lands for the purpose of alienation, but only a determinable fee for the purpose of enjoyment. On a dissolution of the corporation, the fee will revert to the original grantor and his heirs; but such grantor will be forever excluded by an alienation in fee; and in that way the corporation may defeat the possibility of a reverter; 2 Kent 281; 2 Prest. Est. 50. And see 3 Binn. 626; 1 Watts 218; 3 Pick. 232; 12 Mass. 537; 8 Dana 114.

FRANK-FEE. Lands not held in ancient demesne. Called "lands pleadable at common law." Reg. Orig. 12, 14; Fitzh. N. B. 161; Termes de la Ley.

That which a man holds to himself and his heirs and not by such service as is required in ancient demesne, according to the custom of the manor. The opposite of copyhold. Cowel. A fine had in the king's court might convert demesne-lands into frank-fee; 2 Bla. Com. 368.

FRANK-FERME. Lands or tenements where the nature of the fee is changed by feoffment from knight's service to yearly service and whence no homage but such as is contained in the feoffment may be demanded. Britton, c. 66, n. 3; Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 80.

FRANK-FOLD. The right of the lord to fold his tenant's sheep for manuring the land. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; Keilw. 198. See FOLDAGE.

FRANK-LAW. An obsolete expression signifying the rights and privileges of a citizen, and seeming to correspond to our term "civil rights."

FRANK-MARRIAGE. A species of estate-tail where the donee had married one of kin (as daughter or cousin) to the donor and held the estate subject to the implied condition that the estate was to descend to the issue of such marriage. On birth of issue, as in other cases of estate-tail before the statute De donis, the birth of issue was regarded as a condition performed, and the estate thereupon became alienable by the donee; 1 Cruise, Dig. 71; 1 Washb. R. P. 67.

The estate is said to be in frank-marriage because given in consideration of marriage and free from services for three generations of descendants; Blount; Cowel. See, also, 2 Bla. Com. 115; 1 Steph. Com. 232.

FRANK-PLEDGE. A pledge or surety for freemen. Termes de la Ley.

The bond or pledge which the inhabitants of a tithing entered into for each one of their number that he should be forthcoming to answer every violation of law. Each boy, on reaching the age of fourteen, was obliged to find some such pledge, or be committed to prison; Blount; Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 114.

FRANK-TENEMENT. A freehold. See LIBERUM TENEMENTUM.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE. The privilege of sending certain matter through the public mails without payment therefor.

It was first claimed by the house of commons in 1660, and was confirmed by statute in 1764. The establishment of the penny postage in 1840 caused the abolition of the custom in England. See 1 Bla. Com. 323; 2 Steph. Com. 570, n.

It was formerly enjoyed by various officers of the federal government, including members of both houses of congress, theoretically for the public good.

By the act of January 31, 1873, the franking privilege was abolished from and after July 1, 1873, and the act of March 3, 1873, repealed all laws permitting the transmission by mail of any free matter whatever. The act of March 3, 1875, s. 5, permits members of congress to send free public documents and acts; a qualified exercise of the privilege has been extended to certain officials, where public convenience seemed to require it. By the act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. L. 335), it is made lawful to transmit through the mail free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States, provided that every such letter or package bears over the words "Official Business," an endorsement showing the name of the department or bureau from whence transmitted. This provision was extended by the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. L. 362), to all officers of the government and made applicable to all official mail matter. By the act of January 12, 1895 (25 Stat. L. 622), members of congress are entitled to send through the mails free, under their frank, any mail matter to any government official or to any person, correspondence not exceeding one ounce in weight, upon official or departmental business. They may also frank the congressional record or any part thereof. U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 70.

FRANKLEYN (spelled, also, Frankling and Franklin). A freeman; a freeholder; a gentleman. Blount; Cowel.

FRASSETUM. A wood or wood ground where ash trees grow. Co. Litt. 4 b.

FRATER (Lat.). Brother.

Frater consanguineus. A brother born from the same father, though the mother may be different.

Frater nutricius. A bastard brother.

Frater uterinus. A brother who has the same mother but not the same father.

Blount; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 2 Bla. Com. 232.

Fratres conjurati. Sworn brothers or companions for the defence of their sovereign or for other purposes. Hoved. 445.

Fratres poes. Certain friars who were accustomed to wear white and black garments. Walsingham 124. See BROTHER.

FRATERIA. A fraternity, brotherhood, or society of religious persons, who were mutually bound to pray for the good health and life, etc., of their living brethren, and the souls of those that were dead. Cowel.

FRATERNIA. A fraternity or brotherhood.

FRATERNITY. A body of men associated for business, pleasure, or social intercourse, by some common tie, either natural, as of the like business, interest or character, or formal, as for religious or social purposes.

"Some people of a place united together, in respect of a mystery and business, into a company." 1 Salk. 193.

FRATRIAGE. A younger brother's inheritance.

FRATRICIDE. One who has killed a brother or sister; also the killing of a brother or sister. Black, L. Dict.

FRAUD. An endeavor to alter rights, by deception touching motives, or by circumvention not touching motives. Bigelow, Fraud 5.

Fraud is sometimes used as a term synonymous with covin, collusion, and deceit, but improperly so. Covin is a secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another of his rights. Collusion is an agreement between two or more persons to defraud another under the forms of law, or to accomplish an illegal purpose. Deceit is a fraudulent contrivance by words or acts to deceive a third person, who, relying thereupon, without carelessness or neglect of his own, sustains damages thereby. Co. Litt. 357 b; Bacon, Abr. Fraud.

Actual or positive fraud includes cases of the intentional and successful employment of any cunning, deception, or artifice, used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 186.

For instance, the misrepresentation by word or deed of material facts, by which one exercising reasonable discretion and confidence is misled to his injury, whether the misrepresentation was known to be false, or only not known to be true, or even if made altogether innocently; the suppression of material facts which one party is legally or equitably bound to disclose to another; all cases of unconscientious advantage in bargains obtained by imposition, circumvention, surprise, and undue influence over persons in general, and especially over those who are, by reason of age, infirmity, idiocy, lunacy, drunkenness, coverture, or other incapacity, unable to take due care of and protect their own rights and interests; bargains of such an unconscionable nature and of such gross inequality as naturally lead to the presumption of fraud, imposition, or undue influence, when the decree of the court can place the parties in statu quo; cases of surprise and sudden action, without due deliberation, of which one party takes advantage; cases of the fraudulent suppression or destruction of deeds and other instruments, in violation of, or injury to, the rights of others; fraudulent awards with intent to do injustice; fraudulent and illusory appointments and revocations under powers; fraudulent prevention of acts to be done for the benefit of others under false statements or false promises; frauds in relation to trusts of a secret or special nature; frauds in verdicts, judgments, decrees, and other judicial proceedings; frauds in the confusion of boundaries of estates and matters of partition and dower; frauds in the administration of charities; and frauds upon creditors and other persons standing upon a like equity, are cases of actual fraud. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 6.

Legal or constructive fraud includes such contracts or acts as, though not originating in any actual evil design or contrivance to perpetrate a fraud, yet by their tendency to deceive or mislead others, or to violate private or public confidence, are prohibited by law.

Thus, for instance, contracts against some general public policy or fixed artificial policy of the law; cases arising from some peculiar confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties, where advantage is taken of that relation by the person in whom the trust or confidence is reposed, or by third persons; agreements and other acts of parties which operate virtually to delay, defraud, and deceive creditors; purchases of property, with full notice of the legal or equitable title of other persons to the same property (the purchaser becoming, by construction, particeps criminis with the fraudulent grantor); and voluntary conveyances of real estate, as affecting the title of subsequent purchasers; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 7. See Bisph. Eq. 205.

According to the civilians, positive fraud consists in doing one's self, or causing another to do, such things as induce the opposite party into error, or retain him there. The intention to deceive, which is the characteristic of fraud, is here present. Fraud is also divided into that which has induced the contract, dolus dans causam contractui, and incidental or accidental fraud. The former is that which has been the cause or determining motive of the contract, that without which the party defrauded would not have contracted, when the artifices practised by one of the parties have been such that it is evident that without them the other would not have contracted. Incidental or accidental fraud is that by which a person, otherwise determined to contract, is deceived on some accessories or incidents of the contract,—for example, as to the quality of the object of the contract, or its price,—so that he has made a bad bargain. Accidental fraud does not, according to the civilians, avoid the contract, but simply subjects the party to damages. It is otherwise where the fraud has been the determining cause of the contract, qui causam dedit contractui: in that case the contract is void. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 3, c. 2, n. § 5, n. 86, et seq. See, also, 1 Malleville, Analyse de la Discussion du Code Civil, pp. 15, 16.

What constitutes fraud. 1. It must be such an appropriation as is not permitted by law. 2. It must be with knowledge that the property is another's, and with design to deprive him of it. 3. It is not in itself a crime, for want of a criminal intent; though it may become such in cases provided by law. Livermore, Penal Law 739; See Poll. Contr. (6th ed.) 531, et seq.

Fraud, in its ordinary application to cases of contracts, includes any trick or artifice employed by one person to induce another to fall into or to detain him in an error, so that he may make an agreement contrary to his interest; and it may consist in misrepresenting or concealing material facts, and may be effected by words or by actions. See 143 U. S. 79.

Where a party intentionally or by design misrepresents a material fact or produces a false impression, in order to mislead another, or to obtain an undue advantage of him, there is a positive fraud in the fullest sense of the term; 85 Tenn. 139. It must relate to facts then existing or which had previously existed; 11 Colo. 15; 127 Ill. 187. If a person take upon himself to state as true that of which he is wholly ignorant, he will, if it be false, incur the same legal responsibility as if he had made the statements with knowledge of its falsity; 125 Pa. 52; 147 Mass. 403; 71 Wis. 196; 73 id. 39; 75 Mich. 188; 73 Iowa 749.

While, on the one hand, the courts have aimed to repress the practice of fraud, on the other, they have required that before relieving a party from a contract on the ground of fraud, it should be made to appear that on entering into such contract he exercised a due degree of caution. Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, subveniunt leges. A misrepresentation as to a fact the truth or falsehood of which the other party has an opportunity of ascertaining, or the concealment of a matter which a person of ordinary sense, vigilance, or skill might discover, does not in law constitute fraud. See 130 U. S. 648. Misrepresentation as to the legal effect of an agreement does not avoid it as against a party whom such misrepresentation has induced to enter into it,—every man being presumed to know the legal effect of an instrument which he signs or of an act which he performs. Ans. Contr. 154. But see 69 Tex. 503.

An intention to violate entertained at the time of entering into a contract, but not afterward carried into effect, does not vitiate the contract; per Tindal, C. J., 2 Scott 588; 4 B. & C. 506; per Parke, B., 4 M. & W. 115, 122; but making a promise as an inducement to a contract, with no intention of performing it, constitutes a fraud for which the contract may be rescinded; 78 Cal. 126; 40 Minn. 476; but see 42 Ill. App. 548. When one person misrepresents or conceals a material fact which is peculiarly within his own knowledge, or, if it is also within the reach of the other party, is a device to induce him to refrain from inquiry, and it is shown that the concealment or other deception was practised with respect to the particular transaction, such transaction will be void on the ground of fraud; 6

Cl. & F. 232; Comyn, Contr. 38; per Tindal, C. J., 3 M. & G. 446, 450. See 85 Ill. 304; 32 N. J. Eq. 372; 12 Ves. 78. And even the concealment of a matter which may disable a party from performing the contract is a fraud; 9 B. & C. 387; per Little-dale, J.

Equity doctrine of fraud. It is sometimes inaccurately said that such and such transactions amount to fraud in equity, though not in law; according to the popular notion that the law allows or overlooks certain kinds of fraud which the more conscientious rules of equity condemn and punish. But, properly speaking, fraud in all its shapes is as odious in law as in equity. The difference is that, as the law courts are constituted, and as it has been found in centuries of experience that it is convenient they should be constituted, they cannot deal with fraud otherwise than to punish it by the infliction of damages. All those manifold varieties of fraud against which specific relief, of a preventive or remedial sort, is required for the purposes of substantial justice, are the subjects of equity and not of law jurisdiction.

What constitutes a case of fraud in the view of courts of equity, it would be difficult to specify. It is, indeed, part of the equity doctrine of fraud not to define it, not to lay down any rule as to the nature of it, lest the craft of men should find ways of committing fraud which might escape the limits of such a rule or definition. "The court very wisely hath never laid down any general rule beyond which it will not go, lest other means for avoiding the equity of the court should be found out." Per Hardwicke, C., in 3 Atk. 278. It includes all acts, omissions, or concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscientious advantage is taken of another. "It may be stated as a general rule that fraud consists in anything which is calculated to deceive, whether it be a single act or combination of circumstances, whether it be by suppression of the truth or suggestion of what is false; whether it be by direct falsehood, or by innuendo, by speech or by silence, by word of mouth or by a look or a gesture. Fraud of this kind may be defined to be any artifice by which a person is deceived to his disadvantage." Bisph. Eq. § 206.

It is said by Lord Hardwicke, 2 Ves. Ch. 155, that in equity fraud may be presumed from circumstances, but in law it must be proved. His meaning is, unquestionably, no more than this: that courts of equity will grant relief upon the ground of fraud established by a degree of presumptive evidence which courts of law would not deem sufficient proof for their purposes; that a higher degree, not a different kind, of proof may be required by courts of law to make out what they will act upon as fraud. Both tribunals accept presumptive or circumstantial proof, if of sufficient force. Circumstances of mere suspicion, leading to no certain results, will not, in either, be held sufficient to establish fraud.

The equity doctrine of fraud extends, for certain purposes, to the violation of that class of so-called imperfect obligations which are binding on conscience, but which human laws do not and cannot ordinarily undertake to enforce: as in a large variety of cases of contracts which courts of equity do not set aside, but at the same time refuse to lend their aid to enforce: 2 Kent 39; 1 Johns. Ch. 630; 1 Ball & B. 250. The proposition that "fraud must be proved and not assumed," is to be understood as affirming that a contract, honest and lawful on its face, must be treated as such until it is shown to be otherwise by evidence, either positive or circumstantial. Fraud may be inferred from facts calculated to establish it. Per Black, C. J., in 22 Pa. 179; 148 id. 234; 59 Fed. Rep. 70.

The following classification of frauds as a head of equity jurisdiction is given by Lord Hardwicke, J., in Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Ch. 125; 1 Atk. 301; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 428.

1. Fraud, or dolus malus, may be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition. 2. It may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make, on the one hand, and no honest or fair man would accept, on the other. 3. It may be inferred from the circumstances and condition of the parties: for it is as much against conscience to take advantage of a man's weakness or necessity as of his ignorance. 4. It may be collected from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition on third persons.

Effect of. Fraud, both at law and in equity, when sufficiently proved and ascertained, avoids a contract ab initio, whether the fraud be intended to operate against one of the contracting parties, or against third parties, or against the public; Ans. Contr. 162; 1 W. Blackst. 465; Dougl. 450; 3 Burr. 1909; 3 V. & B. 42; 1 Sch. & L. 209; Domat, Lois Civ. p. 1, l. 4, t. 6, s. 3, n. 2; see 49 Conn. 93; but the injured party may elect to allow the transaction to stand; L. R. 2 H. L. 246; 49 N. Y. 626; 7 Bush 63.

The fraud of an agent by a misrepresentation which is embodied in the contract to which his agency relates, avoids the contract. But the party committing the fraud cannot in any case himself avoid the contract on the ground of the fraud; Chitty, Contr. 590, and cases cited. The party injured may lose the right to avoid the contract by laches; 47 N. H. 208; 21 Wis. 88; Bisph. Eq. § 202; 130 Mass. 50; 55 N. H. 508; 78 N. Y. 159; 67 Ill. 450. But no delay will constitute laches except that occurring after the discovery of the fraud; 11 Cl. & F. 714; 4 How. 561; 23 Iowa 467; 43 id. 556; 35 Ala. 560; 30 Minn. 64. The injured party must repudiate the transaction in toto, if at all; he may not adopt it in part and repudiate it in part; 12 How. 51; 25 Beav. 594. See 2 Phil. 425.

As to frauds in contracts and dealings, the common law subjects the wrong-doer, in several instances, to an action on the case, such as actions for fraud and deceit in contracts on an express or implied warranty of title or soundness, etc. But fraud gives no action in any case without damage; 3 Term 56; and in matters of contract it is merely a defence; it cannot in any case constitute a new contract; 7 Ves. 211; 2 Miles 229. It is essentially ad hominem; 4 Term 337.

A person cannot recover for fraudulent representations where he did not rely upon them, but relied upon information from other sources and upon his own judgment; 118 Ind. 565; 39 Kan. 752; 76 Iowa 507; 84 Ala. 95; 23 Neb. 817; 135 U. S. 609. Fraud must be clearly proved and it is proper so to instruct the jury; 148 Pa. 234. There is no error in charging that fraud is never presumed, and must be shown by satisfactory proof; 59 Fed. Rep. 70.

In Criminal Law. Without the express provision of any statute, all deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty, are condemned by the common law, and punishable according to the heinousness of the offence; Co. Litt. 3 b; Dy. 295; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 71.

In considering fraud in its criminal aspect, it is often difficult to determine whether facts in evidence constitute a fraud, or amount to a felony. It seems now to be agreed that if the property obtained, whether by means of a false token or a false pretence, be parted with absolutely by the owner, it is a fraud; but if the possession only be parted with, and that possession be obtained by fraud, it will be felony; Bacon, Abr. Fraud; 2 Leach 1066; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 673.

Of those gross frauds or cheats which, as being "levelled against the public justice of the kingdom," are punishable by indictment or information at the common law; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 4, p. 821; the following are examples:—uttering a fictitious bank bill; 2 Mass. 77; selling unwholesome provisions; 4 Bla. Com. 162; mala praxis of a physician; 1 Ld. Raym. 213; rendering false accounts, and other frauds, by persons in official situations; Rex v. Bembridge, cited 2 East 136; 5 Mod. 179; 2 Campb. 269; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 666; fabrication of news tending to the public injury; Stark. Lib. 546; Hale, Summ. 132; and per Scroggs, C. J., Rex v. Harris, Guildhall, 1680; cheats by means of false weights and measures; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 3, p. 820; and generally, the fraudulent obtaining the property of another by any deceitful or illegal practice or token (short of felony) which affects or may affect the public; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 2, p. 818; as with the common cases of obtaining property by false pretences. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION.

FRAUDARE. In Civil Law. To cheat ; defraud ; deceive.

The multifarious provisions of this celebrated statute appear to be distributed under the following heads. 1. The creation and transfer of estates in land, both legal and equitable, such as at common law could be effected by parol, i. e. without deed. 2. Certain cases of contracts which at common law could be validly made by oral agreement. 3. Additional solemnities in cases of wills. 4. New liabilities imposed in respect of real estate held in trust. 5. The disposition of estates pur auter vie. 6. The entry and effect of judgments and executions. The first and second heads, however, comprise all that in the common professional use of the term is meant by the Statute of Frauds.

And they present this important feature, characterizing and distinguishing all the minor provisions which they both contain, i. e. that whereas prior to their enactment the law recognized only two great classes of contracts, conveyances, etc.,—those which were by deed and those which were by parol, including under the latter term alike what was written and what was oral,—these provisions introduced into the law a distinction between written parol and oral parol transactions, and rendered a writing necessary for the valid performance of the matters to which they relate. Those matters are the following :—conveyances, leases, and surrenders of interests in lands ; declarations of trusts of interest in lands ; special promises by executors or administrators to answer damages out of their own estate ; special promises to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another ; agreements made upon consideration of marriage ; contracts for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them ; agreements not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof ; contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of ten pounds sterling or upwards. All these matters must be, by the statute, put in writing, signed by the party to be charged, or his attorney. It has been a question whether a promise to accept a bill of exchange is within the statute, and in some jurisdictions it is required by statute to be in writing. See ACCEPTANCE. It has been recently held in England that, apart from the special statute, it need not be in writing and is not within the statute of frauds ; [1894] 2 Q. B. 885 ; 91 U. S. 406 ; 142 id. 116 ; 34 Fed. Rep. 866 ; 9 Wash. 659.

As to contracts of indemnity to a third person see INDEMNITY ; 42 Am. St. Rep. 186-94 ; as to contracts to be performed within a year see 164 U. S. 418.

In regard to contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, the payment of earnest-money, or the acceptance and receipt of part of the goods, etc., dispenses with the written memorandum. See EARNEST ; SALE.

The substance of the statute, as regards the provisions above referred to, has been re-enacted in almost all the states of the Union ; and in many of them, other points coming within the same general policy, but not embodied in the original English statute, have been made the subject of more recent enactments : as, for instance, the requirement of writing to hold a party upon a representation as to the character, credit, etc., of a third person, which was provided in England by 9 Geo. IV. cap. 14, § 6, commonly called Lord Tenterden's Act. The legislation of the different states on these matters will be found collected in the Appendix to Browne on the Statute of Frauds.

See Throop, Val. of Verb. Agr. ; Reed ; Wood, Stat. Frauds. For sufficiency of memorandum required by the statute, see 34 Cent. L. J. 6. As to the various subjects affected by the statute of frauds see the several titles, and for reference to authorities on the different branches of the subject, see the classified list in the St. Louis Law Library Catalogue.

FRAUDULENT—CONVEYANCE.

A conveyance, the object, tendency, or effect of which is to defraud another, or the intent of which is to avoid some duty or debt due by or incumbent on the party making it. 2 Kent 440 ; 4 id. 462 ; and if fraudulent as to any provision therein, is void in toto as against creditors ; 29 W. Va. 203.

Fraudulent conveyances received early attention ; and the statutes of 13 Eliz. c. 5, and 27 Eliz. c. 4, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 18, declared all conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors, etc., to be void. By a liberal construction, it has become the settled English law that a voluntary conveyance shall be deemed fraudulent against a subsequent purchaser even with notice ; 9 East 59 ; 2 Bla. Com. 296 ; Roberts, Fraud. Conv. 2, 3.

Voluntary conveyances are not so construed in the United States, however, where the subsequent purchaser has notice, especially if there be a good consideration ; Wait, Fraud. Convey. 97 ; 2 Gray 447.

These statutes have been generally adopted in the United States as the foundation of all the state statutes upon this subject ; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 353 ; 4 Kent 462.

The mere fact of indebtedness alone will not render a voluntary conveyance void, if the grantor has property amply sufficient remaining to pay his creditor ; 71 Tex. 592 ; 22 Neb. 172.

A voluntary gift for charitable purposes is not to be treated as "covinous," within the meaning of 27 Eliz. c. 4, and is not avoided by a subsequent conveyance for value ; [1892] App. Cas. 412.

When a mortgage is given to one person for the purpose of securing debts due to himself and others, with intent on the part of the mortgagor to defraud other creditors, it is valid as to an innocent beneficiary whose debt is an honest one, although the mortgagee himself is a party to the fraud; 6 U. S. App. 510.

Voluntary conveyances by a debtor who is financially embarrassed are prima facie fraudulent as to existing creditors, and where a conveyance is made mala fide, and the fraud is participated in by both parties thereto, it cannot be upheld in derogation of the claims of creditors, existing or subsequent; 39 Minn. 527; 50 Ark. 42; 36 Fed. Rep. 29.

But although such conveyance is void as regards purchasers and creditors, it is valid as between the parties; 5 Binn. 109; 3 W. & S. 255; 4 Ired. 102; 20 Pick. 247, 354; 1 Ohio 469; 2 South. 738; 2 Hill, S. C. 488; 7 Johns. 161; 1 W. Bla. 262; 77 Iowa 203. An offence within the 13 Eliz. c. 5, § 3, is also indictable; 6 Cox, Cr. Cas. 31.

This subject is fully treated in a note to Twyne's case, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. (continued in 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 137), and in Bump; May, Fraud. Conv. See BADGES OF FRAUD.

FRAUS (Lat.). Fraud. The term of the civil law was, however, dolus (q. v.). It has been said that fraus was distinguished from dolus and had a more extended meaning. Calv. Lex.

FRAUS DANS LOCUM CONTRACTUI. A misrepresentation or concealment of some fact that is material to the contract, and had the truth regarding which been known the contract would not have been made as made, is called a "fraud dans locum contractui," i. e. a fraud occasioning the contract, or giving place or occasion for the contract.

FRAUS LEGIS (Lat.). Fraud of law. In Civil Law. The institution of legal proceedings for a fraudulent purpose. See IN FRAUDUM LEGIS.

FRAVINETUM. In Old English Law. A wood of ashes; a place where ashes grow. Co. Litt. 4 b; Shep. Touchst. 95.

FRAY. See AFFRAY.

FRECTUM. Freight. Quoad frectum navium suarum, as to the freight of his vessels. Blount.

FREDSTOLE. Freedstole. The seat of peace, a name given to a seat or chair near the altar, to which all fled who sought to obtain the privilege of sanctuary. Encyc. Dict. A sanctuary. Gib. Cod.

FREDUM. A fine paid for obtaining pardon when the peace had been broken. Spelman, Gloss.; Blount. A sum paid the magistrate for protection against the right of revenge. 1 Robertson, Charles V., App. note xxiii.

Freda was a Frankish term answering to the Saxon "wites." Maitl. Domesd. 278.

FREDWIT, or FREDWITE. A liberty to hold courts and take up the fines for beating and wounding. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.

To be free from fines.

FREE. Not bound to servitude. At liberty to act as one pleases. This word is put in opposition to slave. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 2. Used in distinction from being bound as an apprentice.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are born free; and in this sense the term is usually supposed to mean all mankind; though this seems to be doubted in 19 How. 393.

Certain: as, free services. These were also more honorable.

Confined to the person possessing, instead of being held in common: as, free fishery.

FREE ALMS. See FRANK-ALMOIGNE.

FREE BENCH. Copyhold lands which the wife has for dower after the decease of her husband. Kitch. 102; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, cap. 13, num. 2; Fitzh. N. B. 150; Plowd. 411.

Dower in copyhold lands. 2 Bla. Com. 129. The quantity varies in different sections of England; Co. Litt. 110 b; L. R. 16 Eq. 592; incontinency was a cause of forfeiture, except on the performance of a ridiculous ceremony; Cowel; Blount.

FREE BORD. An allowance of land outside the fence which may be claimed by the owner. An allowance, in some places, two and a half feet wide outside the boundary or enclosure. Blount; Cowel.

FREE BOROUGH MEN. Such great men as did not engage like the frank-pledge men for their decennier. Jac. L. Dict.

FREE CHAPEL. A chapel founded by the king and exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary. It may be one founded or endowed by a private person under a grant from the king; Cowel; Termes de la Ley.

FREE COURSE. Having the wind from a favorable quarter. To prevent collision of vessels, it is the duty of the vessel having the wind free to give way to a vessel beating up to windward and tacking; 3 Hagg. Adm. 215. At sea, such vessel meeting another close-hauled must give way, if necessary to prevent the danger of collision; 3 C. & P. 528. See 2 W. Rob. 225; 2 Dods. 87; MARITIME LAW.

FREE ENTRY, INGRESS AND EGRESS. The right to go upon land from time to time as required to assert any right, as to take emblements.

FREE FISHERY. See FISHERY.

FREE FOLD. See FOLDAGE; FRANK-FOLD.

FREE ON BOARD. A phrase applied to the sale of goods which denotes that the seller has contracted for their delivery on the vessel, cars, etc., without cost to the buyer for packing, portage, cartage, and the like. See FRAIS JUSQU'A BORD; F. O. B.

In such a contract the seller is under no obligation to act until the buyer names the ship to which the delivery is to be made; 117 Pa. 508; Abb. f. o. b.

FREE PLEDGE. See FRANKPLEDGE.

FREE SERVICES. Such as it was not becoming the character of a soldier or freeman to perform: as, to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 62; 1 Washb. R. P. 25.

FREE SHIPS. Neutral ships. "Free ships make free goods" is a phrase often used in treaties to denote that the goods on board neutral ships shall be free from confiscation even though belonging to an enemy; Wheat. Int. L. 507; 1 Kent 126. The doctrine is recognized, except as to goods contraband of war, in the Declaration of Paris (1856), q. v., and the controversy over it has been brought to a close as regards all maritime nations but the United States. This declaration, while a great step in favor of neutrals, does not free neutral commerce from the belligerent right of search for the purpose of ascertaining the true character of a ship sailing under a neutral flag, and for contraband goods. Pomeroy, Int. L. 220. While the United States are not a party to the declaration of Paris, yet, during the civil war, its second and third articles, relating to this subject, were adhered to by both parties; Wheat. Int. L. 475 a. See 3 Phill. Int. L. 3d ed. 238; Upton, Mar. Warfare 186; Wheat. Int. L. 581; FLAG, for a full discussion of the subject.

FREE SOCAGE. Tenure in free socage is a tenure by certain and honorable services which yet are not military. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 52; Dalrymple, Feuds, c. 2, § 1; 1 Washb. R. P. 25; called, also, free and common socage. See SOCAGE.

FREE SOCMEN. Tenants in free socage. 2 Bla. Com. 79.

FREE TENURE. Freehold tenure.

FREE WARREN. A franchise for the preserving and custody of beasts and fowls of warren. 2 Bla. Com. 39, 417; Co. Litt. 233. This franchise gave the grantee sole right of killing, so far as his warren extended, on condition of excluding other persons. 2 Bla. Com. 39.

FREEDMAN. In Roman Law. A person who had been released from a state of servitude. See LIBERTINE.

The term is frequently applied to the emancipated slaves in the southern states. By the fourteenth amendment of the constitution, citizenship was conferred upon them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 361. See 16 Wall. 36; 93 U. S. 542. The fifteenth amendment protects the elective franchise of freedmen and others of African descent; and this was the object of its adoption; Cooley, Const. Lim. 752.

FREEDOM. The condition of one to whom the law attributes the single individual right of personal liberty, limited only, in the domestic relations, by powers of control which are associated with duties of protection. See MARRIED WOMEN; PARENT AND CHILD; GUARDIAN AND WARD; MASTER AND APPRENTICE.

This right becomes subject to judicial determination when the law requires the public custody of the person as the means of vindicating the rights of others. The security of the liberty of the individual and of the rights of others is graduated by the intrinsic equity of the law, in purpose and application. The means of protecting this liberty of the individual without hazarding the freedom of others must be sought in the provisions of the remedial and penal law.

Independently of forfeiture of personal liberty under such laws and of its limitations in the domestic relations, freedom, in this sense, is a status which is invariable under all legal systems. It is the subject of judicial determination when a condition incompatible with the possession of personal liberty is alleged against one who claims freedom as his status. A community wherein law should be recognized, and wherein nevertheless this status should not be enjoyed by any private person, is inconceivable; and, wherever its possession is thus controverted, the judicial question arises of the personal extent of the law which attributes liberty to free persons. The law may attribute it to every natural person, and thereby preclude the recognition of any condition inconsistent with its possession. This universal extent of the law of free condition will operate in the international as well as in the internal private law of the state. In most European countries the right of one, under the law of a foreign country, to control the person of another who by such law had been his slave or bondman is not recognized under that international rule for the allowance of the effect of a foreign law which is called comity, because the law of those countries attributes personal liberty as a right to every natural person. 1 Hurd, Law of Freedom §§ 116, 300.

In other countries the power of the master under a foreign law is recognized in specified cases by a statute or treaty, while an otherwise universal attribution of personal liberty precludes every other recognition of a condition of bondage. On this principle, in some of the United States, an obligation to render personal service or labor, and the corresponding right of the person to whom it is due, existing under the law of other states, were not enforced except in cases of claim within art. 4, sec. 2, ¶ 3 of the constitution of the United States; 18 Pick. 193; 20 N. Y. 562.

Legal rights are the effects of civil society. No legal condition is the reservation of a state of nature anterior to civil society. Freedom, as here understood, is the effect of law, not a pre-existing natural element. It is, therefore, not necessarily attributed to all persons within any one jurisdiction. But personal liberty, even though not attributed universally, may be juridically regarded as a right accordant with the nature of man in society; and the effect of this doctrine will appear in a legal presumption in favor of free condition, which will throw the burden of proof always on him who denies it. This presumption obtained in the law of Rome (XII Tab. T. vi. 5; Dig. lib. 40 tit. 5, l. 53; lib. 43, tit. 29, s. 3, l. 9; lib. 50, tit. 17, ll. 20, 22) even when slavery was derived from the jus gentium, or that law which was found to be received by the general reason of mankind; 1 Hurd, Law of Freedom § 157.

In English law, this presumption in favor of liberty has always been recognized, not only in the penal and remedial law, but in applying the law of condition, at a time when involuntary servitude was lawful; Fortesque, cc. 42, 47; Co. Litt. fol. 124 b; Wood, Inst. c. 1, § 5. In the slave-holding states of the Union, a presumption against the freedom of persons of negro descent arose or was declared by statute; Cooper, Justin. 485; 1 Dev. 336; 8 Ga. 157; 5 Halst. N. J. 275. In interpreting manumission clauses in wills, the rule differed in the states according to their prevailing policy; Cobb, Slav. 298.

The condition of a private person who is legally secured in the enjoyment of those rights of action, in social relations, which might be equally enjoyed by all private persons.

The condition of one who may exercise his natural powers as he wills is not known in jurisprudence, except as the characteristic of those who hold the supreme power of the state. The freedom which one may have by his individual strength resembles this power in kind, and is no part of legal freedom. The legal right of one person involves correlative obligations on others. All persons must be restricted by those obligations which are essential to the freedom of others; 2 Harr. Cond. La. 208; but these are not inconsistent with the possession of rights which may be enjoyed equally by all. Such obligations constitute a condition opposed to freedom only as things which mutually suppose and require each other. Where the law imposes obligations incompatible with the possession of such rights as might be equally enjoyed by all, a condition arises which is contrary to freedom, see BONDAGE, and the condition of those who hold the rights correlative to such obligations becomes superior to freedom, as above defined, or is merged in the superiority of a class or caste. The rights and obligations of all cannot be alike; men must stand towards each other in unlike relations, since the actions of all cannot be the same. In the possession of relative rights they must be unequal. But individual (absolute) rights, which exist in relations towards the community in general, and capacity for relative rights in domestic relations, may be attributed to all in the same circumstances of natural condition. It is in the possession of these rights and this capacity that this freedom exists. As thus defined, it comprehends freedom in the narrower sense, as the greater includes the less; and when attributed to all who enjoy freedom in the narrower sense, as at the present day in the greater part of Europe and formerly in the free states of the Union, the latter is not distinguished as a distinct condition. But some who enjoy personal liberty might yet be so restricted in the acquisition and use of property, so unprotected in person and limited in the exercise of relative rights, that their condition would be freedom in the narrower sense only. During the middle ages, in Europe, it was possible to discriminate the existing free conditions as thus different; and the restrictions formerly imposed on free colored persons in the slaveholding states of the Union created a similar distinction between their freedom and that which, in all the states, was attributed to all persons of white race.

Freedom, in either sense, is a condition which may exist anywhere, under the civil power; but its permanency will depend on the guarantees by which it is defended. These are of infinite variety. In connection with a high degree of guarantee against irresponsible sovereign power, freedom, in the larger sense above described, may be called civil freedom, from the fact that such guarantee becomes the public law of the state. Such freedom acquires specific character from the particular law of some one country, and becomes the topic of legal science in the juridical application of the guarantees by which the several rights incident to it are maintained. This constitutes a large portion of the jurisprudence of modern states, and embraces, particularly in England and America, the public or constitutional law. The bills of rights in American constitutions, with their great original, Magna Charta, are the written evidences of the most fundamental of these guarantees. The provisions of the constitution of the United States which have this character operate against powers held by the national government, but not against those reserved to the states; 7 Pet. 243; Sedgw. Const. 597. It has been judicially declared that a person "held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof escaping into another" is not protected by any of these provisions, but may be delivered up, by national authority, to a claimant, for removal from the state in which he is found, in any method congress may direct, and that any one claimed as such fugitive may be seized and removed from such state by private claimant, without regard either to the laws of such state or the acts of congress; 13 Pet. 597.

The other guarantees of freedom in either sense are considered under the titles EVIDENCE; ARREST; BAIL; TRIAL; HABEAS CORPUS; HOMINE; REPLEGIANDO.

Irresponsible superiority, whether of one or of many, is necessarily antagonistic to freedom in others. Yet freedom rests on law, and law on the supreme power of some state. The possession of this power involves a liberty of action ; but its possession by a body of persons, each one of whom must submit to the will of the majority, is not in itself a guarantee of the freedom of any one individual among them. Still, the more equally this power is distributed among those who are thus individually subject, the more their individual liberty of action in the exercise of this power approximates to a legal right,—though one beyond any incident to civil freedom as above defined,—and its possession may be said to constitute political freedom, so far as that may be ascribed to private persons which is more properly ascribed to communities. In proportion as this right is extended to the individual members of a community, it becomes a guarantee of civil freedom, by making a delegation of the power of the whole body to a representative government possible and even necessary, which government may be limited in its action by customary or written law. Thus, the political liberties of private persons and their civil freedom become intimately connected ; though political and civil freedom are not necessarily coexistent. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 6, n., 127, n.

Political freedom is to be studied in the public law of constitutional states, and in England and America, particularly in those provisions in the bills of rights which affect the subject more in his relations towards the government than in his relations towards other private persons. See LIBERTY. The terms freedom and liberty are words differing in origin (German and Latin) ; but they are, in use, too nearly synonymous to be distinguished in legal definition. See LIBERTY ; Lieber, Civ. Lib. etc. 37, n.

FREEDOM OF THE CITY. In English Law. Immunity from county jurisdiction, and the privilege of corporate taxation and self-government held under a charter from the crown. This freedom is enjoyed of right, subject to the provision of the charter, and is often conferred as an honor on princes and other distinguished individuals. The freedom of a city carries the parliamentary franchise. Encyc. Dict. The rights and privileges possessed by the burgesses or freemen of a municipal corporation under the old English law ; now of little importance, and conferred chiefly as a mark of honor. See 11 Chic. L. J. (U. S.) 357.

The phrase has no place in American law, and as frequently used in addresses of welcome made to organizations visiting an American city, particularly by mayors, has no meaning whatever except as an expression of good will.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. See LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH. See LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

FREEHOLD. See ESTATE OF FREEHOLD.

FREEHOLD IN LAW. A freehold which has descended to a man, upon which he may enter at pleasure, but which he has not entered on. Termes de la Ley.

FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETIES. Societies in England designed for the purpose of enabling mechanics, artisans, and other working-men to purchase at the least possible price a piece of freehold land of a sufficient yearly value to entitle the owner to the elective franchise for the county in which the land is situated. Wharton.

FREEHOLDER. The owner of a freehold estate. Such a man must have been anciently a freeman ; and the gift to any man by his lord of an estate to him and his heirs made the tenant a freeman, if he had not been so before. See 1 Washb. R. P. 29, 45. One who owns land in fee, or for life, or for some indeterminate period. The estate may be equitable or legal. 75 N. C. 13.

FREEMAN. One who is not a slave. One born free or made so.

In Old English Law. A freeholder, as distinguished from a villein.

An inhabitant of a city. Stat. 1 Hen. VI. c. 11, 3 Steph. Com. 196 ; Cunningham. Law Dict.

FREEMAN'S ROLL. A list of persons admitted as burgesses or freemen for the purposes of the rights reserved by the Municipal Corporation Act. 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76. Distinguished from the Burgess Roll ; 3 Steph. Com. 197. The term was used, in early colonial history, of some of the American colonies.

FREIGHT. In Maritime Law. The sum agreed on for the hire of a ship, entirely or in part, for the carriage of goods from one port to another. 13 East 300. All rewards or compensation paid for the use of ships. 1 Pet. Adm. 206 ; 2 Boulay-Paty, t. 8, s. 1 ; 2 B. & P. 321 ; 4 Dall. 459 ; 2 Johns. 346 ; 3 Pardessus, n. 705 ; Chitty, Com. L. 407. The price to be paid for the actual transportation of goods by sea from one place to another. 154 Pa. 242.

The amount of freight is usually fixed by the agreement of the parties ; and if there is no agreement, the amount is to be ascertained by the usage of the trade and the circumstances and reason of the case ; 3 Kent 173. Pothier is of opinion that when the parties agree as to the conveyance of the goods, without fixing a price, the master is entitled to freight at the price usually paid for merchandise of a like quality at the time and place of shipment, and if the prices vary he is to pay the mean price ; Pothier, Charte-Part. n. 8. But there is a case which authorizes the master to require the highest price : namely, when goods are put on board without his knowledge ; id. n. 9. When the merchant hires the whole ship for the entire voyage, he must pay the freight though he does not fully lade the ship ; Chitty, Com. L. 407 ; 24 Wend. 304 ; he is, of course, only bound to pay in proportion to the goods he puts on board, when he does not agree to provide a full cargo. If the merchant agrees to furnish a return cargo, and he furnishes none, and lets the ship return in ballast, he must make compensation to the amount of the agreed freight; Roccus, notes 72-75; 1 Pet. Adm. 207; 10 East 530; 2 Vern. 210. See L. R. 6 Q. B. 528; 15 East 264; DEAD FREIGHT.

The general rule is that the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, in fulfillment of the agreement of the charter-party or bill of lading, is required, to entitle the master or owner of the vessel to freight; 2 Johns. 327; 3 id. 321; 143 N. Y. 90; 5 Harring. 293; 21 How. 527. But to this rule there are several exceptions.

When a cargo consists of live stock, and some of the animals die in the course of the voyage, without any fault or negligence of the master or crew, and there is no express agreement respecting the payment of freight, it is, in general, to be paid for all that were put on board; but when the contract is to pay for the transportation of them, then no freight is due for those which die on the voyage; Molloy, b. 2, c. 4, s. 8; Dig. 14, 2, 10; Abbott, Shipp., 13th ed. 534. See 37 Fed. Rep. 268.

An interruption of the regular course of the voyage, happening without the fault of the owner, does not deprive him of his freight if the ship afterwards proceeds with the cargo to the place of destination, as in the case of capture and recapture; 3 C. Rob. 101; 3 Kent 223; but where a voyage is broken up by reason of the inexcusable delay of the ship, resulting in damage to the shippers, he need not pay the freight; 39 Fed. Rep. 44. In case of the blockade of, or the interdiction of, commerce with the port to which the cargo is destined, and the return of the goods to the owner, no freight will be due; 2 Johns. 336; 10 East 526; but see 4 Dall. 455.

A shipowner who is prevented from performing the voyage by a wrongful act of the charterer is prima facie entitled to the freight that he would have earned, less what it would have cost him to earn it; 128 U. S. 474.

When the ship is forced into a port short of her destination, and cannot finish the voyage, if the owner of the goods will not allow the master a reasonable time to repair, or to proceed in another ship, the master will be entitled to the whole freight; and if, after giving his consent, the master refuses to go on, he is not entitled to freight. See DEVIATION.

When the merchant accepts of the goods at an intermediate port, it is the general rule of marine law that freight is to be paid according to the proportion of the voyage performed; and the law will imply such contract; 2 McLean 423; 2 Johns. 323. The acceptance must be voluntary, and not one forced upon the owner by any illegal or violent proceedings, as from it the law implies a contract that freight pro rata parte itineris shall be accepted and paid; 2 Burr.

883; 7 Term 381; 2 S. & R. 229; 7 Cra. 358; 6 Cow. 504; 3 Kent 182; Com. Dig. Merchant (E3), note, pl. 43, and the cases there cited. See 61 Fed. Rep. 390.

But if the master refuse to repair his vessel and send on the goods, or to procure other vessels for that purpose and the owner of the goods then receives them, such an acceptance will not be such a voluntary one as to make him liable for freight pro rata; 5 Cow. 504; 16 Am. Dec. 443; 2 Bosw. 195; and where the port designated in the charter-party was unsafe, the master was held justified in discharging part of his cargo at another port in order to be able to proceed with the rest to the point designated; [1896] 1 Q. B. 586; L. R. 6 P. D. 68.

When the ship has performed the whole voyage, and has brought only a part of her cargo to the place of destination, there is a difference between a general ship and a ship chartered for a specific sum for the whole voyage. In the former case, the freight is to be paid for the goods which may be delivered at their place of destination; in the latter, it has been questioned whether the freight could be apportioned; and it seems that in such case a partial performance is not sufficient, and that a special payment cannot be claimed except in special cases; 1 Johns. 24; 1 Bulstr. 167; 7 Term 381; 2 Campb. 466. These are some of the exceptions to the general rule called for by principles of equity, that a partial performance is not sufficient, and that a partial payment or ratable freight cannot be claimed.

If goods are laden on board, the shipper is not entitled to their return and to have them relanded without paying the expenses of unloading and the whole freight and surrendering the bill of lading or indemnifying the master against any loss or damage he may sustain by reason of the non-delivery of the bill; 6 Duer, N. Y. 194; 8 N. Y. 529. In general, the master has a lien on the goods, and need not part with them until the freight is paid; 21 How. 527; and when the regulations of the revenue require them to be landed in a public warehouse, the master may enter them in his own name and preserve the lien; Abb. Ship. pt. 3, ch. 3, § 11. His right to retain the goods may, however, be waived either by an express agreement at the time of making the original contract, or by his subsequent agreement or consent. The refusal of a master to deliver a cargo until security is furnished for the freight gives no right of action to the charterer, as the cargo is subject to a lien for freight; 48 Fed. Rep. 591. See LIEN; MARITIME LIEN; AVERAGE.

If freight be paid in advance and the goods are not conveyed and delivered according to the contract, it can, in all cases, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, be recovered back by the shipper; 5 Sandf. 578.

The captor of an enemy's vessel is entitled to freight from the owner of the goods if he perform the voyage and carries the goods to the port of original destination; 1 Kent 131; but in such cases the doctrine of freight pro rata is entirely rejected; 4 Rob. Rep. 278; 5 id. 67; 6 id. 269.

Other common carriers and railroads. In this connection the term is sometimes used as synonymous with merchandise.

As to the regulation of rates for carrying freight by statute, see IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS; RATES; INTER-STATE COMMERCE. As to discrimination in the charges, see DISCRIMINATION.

FREIGHTER. He to whom a ship or vessel has been hired, and who loads her under his contract. He who loads a general ship. 3 Kent 173; 3 Pardessus, n. 704.

The freighter is entitled to the enjoyment of the vessel according to contract, and the vessel hired is the only one that he is bound to take; there can, therefore, be no substitution without his consent. When the vessel has been chartered only in part, the freighter is only entitled to the space he has contracted for; and in case of his occupying more room or putting on board a greater weight, he must pay freight on the principles mentioned under the article of FREIGHT.

The freighter hiring a vessel is required to use the vessel agreeably to the provisions of the charter-party, or, in the absence of any such provisions, according to the usages of trade; he cannot load the vessel with merchandise which would render it liable to condemnation for violating the laws of a foreign state; 3 Johns. 105. He is also required to return the vessel as soon as the time for which he chartered her has expired, and to pay the freight.

FRENCH SPOILATION CLAIMS. On January 20, 1885 (23 Stat. L. 283), the congress of the United States, authorized all citizens of the United States or their legal representatives, to present to the court of claims valid claims which they had against France for spoiliations of property on the high seas prior to 1801. These spoiliations were committed by French war vessels and privateers in pursuance of governmental orders, inspired by alleged violations of the treaty of 1778 by the United States, and extended from about 1796 to 1801. The United States authorized retaliatory measures in 1793, and according to their supreme court, war existed between the two countries. Napoleon having succeeded to the Directory, made a treaty with the United States by which the respective pretensions of the two nations were abandoned. The claimants insisted that this proceeding was a trading off of their claims against France for a national consideration, and that their own government became liable therefor, and the court of claims has so advised congress.

FRIENDLESMAN (Sax.). An outlaw. So called because of his outlawry he was denied all help of friends after certain days. Cowel; Blount.

FRIENDWITE. A fine exacted from him who harbored an outlawed friend. Cowel; Cunningham. A quittance for forfang (exemption from the penalty of taking provisions before the king's purveyors had taken enough for the king's necessities). Cowel.

FREOBORGH. A free-surety or free-pledge. Spelman, Gloss. See FRANK-PLEDGE.

FREQUENT. To visit often; to resort to often or habitually. 109 Ind. 175.

FRERE. A brother. Britt. c. 75.

FRESH DISSEISIN. Such disseisin as a man may seek to defeat of himself, and by his own power, without the help of the king or judges. There was no limit set to the time within which this might be done. It is set in one case as a disseisin committed within fifteen days. Bracton, lib. 4, cap. 5. In another case it was held a fresh disseisin when committed within a year. Britton, cap. 32, 43, 65; Cowel.

FRESH FINE. A fine levied within a year. Stat. Westm. 2 (13 Edw. I.), cap. 45; Cowel.

FRESH FORCE. Force done within forty days. Fitzh. N. B. 7; Old N. B. 4. The heir or reversioner in a case of disseisin by fresh force was allowed a remedy in chancery by bill before the mayor. Cowel.

FRESH SUIT. Where a man robbed follows the robber with all diligence, apprehends and convicts him of felony by verdict, even if it requires a year, it is called fresh suit, and the party shall have his goods again. The same term was applied to other cases; Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 297.

FRESHET. A flood or overflowing of a river by means of rains or melted snow; an inundation. 3 Phila. 42.

FRETTUM. Freight. Moz. & W.

FRETUM. A strait. Fretum Britannicum, the strait between Dover and Calais.

FRIAR. A member of an order of religious persons, of whom there were four principal branches: 1. Minors, Grey Friars, or Franciscans. 2. Augustines. 3. Dominicans, or Black Friars. 4. White Friars, or Carmelites. Cowel; Whart.; Moz. & W.

FRIBUSCULUM. In Civil Law. A slight dissension between husband and wife, which produced a momentary separation, without any intention to dissolve the marriage,—in which it differed from a divorce. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50, s. 106; Vicat, Voc. Jur. This amounted to a separation in our law. See SEPARATION.

FRIDBORG, FRITHBORG. Frank-pledge. Cowel. Security for the peace. Spelman, Gloss.

FRIDHBURGUS (Sax.). A kind of frank-pledge whereby the principal men were bound for themselves and servants. Fleta, lib. 1, cap. 47. Cowel says it is the same with frank-pledge.

FRIEND OF THE COURT. See AMICUS CURIE.

FRIENDLESS MAN. An outlaw. Cowel.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES. Associations for the purpose of affording relief to the members and their families in case of sickness or death. They are governed by numerous acts of parliament, and were first authorized in 1793.

FRIENDLY SUIT. A suit brought by a creditor in chancery against an executor or administrator, being really a suit by the executor or administrator, in the name of a creditor against himself, in order to compel the creditors to take an equal distribution of the assets. 2 Wms. Ex. 1915. See AMICABLE ACTION; CASE STATED.

FRIGHT. An ordinary witness not an expert may testify that a horse appeared to be frightened; 117 Mass. 122. Although this was a dictum, it was followed in the court of another state which held that such witness might testify that horses were frightened by water being thrown upon them; 60 Ia. 429.

FRIGIDITY. Impotence.

FRILING, or FREOLING. A free-man born. Jac. L. Dict.; Spel. Glos.

FRIPPER, FRIPPERER. One who scours and dresses up old clothes to sell again. Moz. & W.

FRISCUS. Fresh uncultivated ground. Mon. Angl. tit. 2, p. 56. Fresh, not salt. Reg. Orig. 97. Recent or new.

FRITHBOTE. A satisfaction or fine for a breach of the peace. See FREDUM.

FRITHBREACH. The breaking of the peace. Cowel.

FRITHGAR. The year of jubilee or of meeting for peace and friendship. Jac. L. Dict.

FRITHGILDA. A guild hall. A company or fraternity for the maintenance of peace and security; a fine for breach of the peace. Jac. L. Dict.

FRITHMAN. A member of a company or fraternity. Blount.

FRITHSOCNE. Surety of defence. Jurisdiction of the peace. The franchise of preserving the peace. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

FRITHSOEN, or FRITHSTOL. Aylum; sanctuary. See FREDSTOLE.

FRITHSOKE, or FRITHSOKEN. The right of liberty of having a view; frank-pledge. Fleta. See FRITHSOCNE, which seems to be interchangeable. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict.

FRITHSPLOT, or FRITHGEARD. A spot or plot of land, encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and, therefore, affording sanctuary to criminals. Whart.

FRIVOLOUS. An answer or plea is frivolous which controverts no material allegation in the complaint, and which is manifestly insufficient. Under the English common-law amendment act, and by the codes of some of the states, the court is authorized to strike out such a plea, so that the plaintiff can obtain judgment without awaiting the regular call of the cause; 1 Abb. Pr. 41; 8 id. 149; 3 Sandf. 732. See 1 Misc. Rep. 483; 74 Hun 639; 53 Minn. 98; 51 Wis. 430.

An answer cannot be stricken out on the ground that it is frivolous, where an extended argument or illustration is required to demonstrate its frailty; 67 Hun 648; 74 id. 527. A pleading interposed for delay is frivolous, but a pleading is not frivolous because vague; 7 Wis. 383; 16 How. Pr. 135; 2 N. Dak. 72.

Frivolous is not synonymous with irrelevant; 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 338, 343; 53 Barb. 650.

FRODMORTEL, or FREOMORTEL. An immunity for committing manslaughter. Mon. Angl. t. 1. 173.

FROM. The legal effect of this word has been a fruitful subject of judicial discussion resulting in a great diversity of construction of the word as used with respect to both time and place. Many attempts have been made to lay down a general rule to determine whether it was to be treated as inclusive or exclusive of a terminus a quo, whether of time or place. Very long ago a critical writer, after reviewing the cases up to that date, undertook to formulate such a rule thus: From, as well in strict grammatical sense, as in the ordinary import thereof, when referring to a certain point as a terminus a quo, always excludes that point; though in vulgar acceptance it were capable of being taken indifferently, either inclusively or exclusively, yet in law it has obtained a certain fixed import and is always taken as exclusive of the terminus a quo. Powell, Powers 449. This conclusion states a rule applied in the majority of cases, and it was said that the prepositions "from," "until," "between," generally exclude the day to which they relate, but the general rule will yield to the intent of parties; 120 Mass. 94. But the rule has not been unvarying, and many courts have not hesitated to follow the views of Lord Mansfield, in Cowp. 714 (overruling his own decision of three years before, id. 189), that it is either exclusive or inclusive according to context and subject-matter, and the court will construe it to effectuate the intent of parties and not to destroy it.

As to time, after an examination of authorities, Washington, J., laid down what he considered the settled principles to be deduced from them: (1) When time is computed from an act done, the day of its performance is included; (2) when the words are from the date, if a present interest is to commence, the day is included, if it is a terminus from which to impute time the day is excluded; 4 Wash. C. C. 240; in which the latter principle was applied to a lease, as it was also in Lord Raym. 84; and to a bond; 15 S. & R. 135; and the first proposition has been laid down with reference to the words "from and after the passage of this act;" 9 Cra. 104; 1 Paine 261; 1 Gall. 348; contra, 1 Nott. & McC. 505. See 3 Cra. 399. From is generally held a word of exclusion; 9 Wend. 346; Anth. 243; 33 Me. 67; 18 id. 106; 12 R. I. 319; 1 Pick. 485; 7 Allen 487. But a promise made November 1st, 1811, and sued November 1st, 1817, was held barred by statute of limitation; 15 Mass. 193; Hobart 139. In many cases it is held to be either exclusive or inclusive according to the intention of the parties; 24 Barb. 9; 1 Hayw. N. C. 114; 2 Pars. Cont. 175. Where an act was to be done in a given number of days from the time of the contract, the day on which the contract was made was included; 24 Ind. 194; but if the contract merely says in so many days it means so many days from the day of date, and that is excluded; 9 N. H. 304. A fire policy from one given date to another includes the last day, whether the first is included was not decided; L. R. 5 Exch. 296. In most cases when something is required to be done in a given time from the day on which an event has happened, that day is excluded, as in case of proving claims against the estate of a decedent or insolvent; 19 Conn. 376; enrolling deeds, after execution; 5 Tenn. 233; appeal from arbitrators, afterward; 3 S. & R. 496; 1 id. 411; issuing a scire facias to revive a judgment, after entry; 6 W. & S. 327; the time an execution runs, after its date; 6 Cow. 659; redemption from execution sale; id. 518; allowing appeal from a justice; 2 Cow. 605. The principle is thus well expressed. When time is to be computed from a particular day or a particular event, as when an act is to be performed within a specified period from or after a day named, that day is excluded and the last day included; 2 Wall. 177; 3 Denio 16. But it was held that in considering the question of barring a writ of error, the day of the decree is included; 13 B. Mon. 460.

From the expiration of a policy means from the expiration of the time from which the policy was effected and not the time at which the risk is terminated by alienation; 2 Mass. 318. Six months from testator's death allowed a legatee to give security not to marry, are exclusive of that day; 15 Ves. 248. Where an annuity is given, and from and after the payment thereof and subject thereto, the principal over, the gift over is subject to make up deficiency of income; aliter if the gift over were from and after the annuitant's death, merely; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 644, reversing L. R. 4 Eq. 58. From time to time, as applied to the payment of expenses or damages caused by building a railroad; L. R. 5 Ex. 6; or the appointment, by a married woman, of rents and profits; 1 Ves. Jr. 189 and note; 3 Bro. C. C. 340; 12 Ves. 501, do not require periodical payments or appointments, nor restrain the party from a sweeping discharge or disposition of the whole subject-matter at once. From time to time is not sufficient in a bail bond which under the statute should stipulate for appearance from term to term; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1072. From day to day, in reference to adjournments, usually means to the next day but, under a statute authorizing the adjournment of a sale from day to day, a sale is good if made by adjournment to a day, certain, which did not immediately succeed the first; 4 Watts 363. From henceforth in a lease means from the delivery; 5 Co. 1; so also does one from March 25th last past (the execution being March 25th); 4 B. & C. 272; or one from an impossible date (as February 30th), or no date, but if it has a sensible date, the word date in other parts of it means date, not delivery; 4 B. & C. 908. Where authority is given to commissioners to build a bridge and then and from thenceforth, the county to be liable, means only after the bridge is built; 16 East 305.

Whenever they are used with respect to places it is said that "from," "to," and "at" are taken inclusively according to the subject-matter; 91 U. S. 343 (fixing the terminus of a railroad in an act of congress). From an object to an object in a deed excludes the terminus referred to; 52 Me. 252; 84 id. 459. From place to place means from one place in a town to another in the same town; 7 Mass. 158; 11 Gray 81. From a street means from any part of it according to circumstances; 74 Pa. 259. From a town is not always and indeed is seldom exclusive of the place named; it generally means from some indefinite place within that town; 3 Cra. C. C. 599, 606. Authority in a railroad charter to construct a railroad from a city to another point gives power to construct the road from any point within the city; 52 Ga. 244; 99 Pa. 155; 3 Head 596; contra 8 Rich. L. 177. And see 10 Johns 393, where in a similar case "to" was construed "into;" and 6 Paige 554 where, "at or near" was held equivalent to "within." But from a town to another in an indictment for transportation of liquor does not charge it as done within the town; 84 Me. 459. To construe reasonably the expression a road from a village to a creek within the same village, in a statute, requires that it be taken inclusively; 7 Barb. 416. Sailing from a port means out of it; 2 Mass. 129.

Descent from a parent cannot be construed to mean through a parent, it must be immediate, from the person designated; 2 Pet. 58, 86; 4 Ind. 51; but the words from the part of the father include a descent, either immediately from the father or from any person in the line of the father; 1 S. & R. 222.

The words to be paid for in from six to eight weeks have no definite meaning and it was properly left to the jury to say if the suit was brought prematurely; L. R.

9 C. P. 20. From the loading in a marine policy ordinarily means that the risk is covered after the goods are on board, but this meaning may be qualified by any words in the policy indicating a different intention; 16 East 240; L. R. 7 Q. B. 580, 702. A contract to deliver from one to three thousand bushels gives the seller an option to deliver any quantity he chooses within the limits named; 4 Me. 497. Appraisers living from one to one and a half miles away, in a fairly well settled community, are prima facie from the neighborhood; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 688.

FRONT. Ordinarily, as applied to a lot or tract of land, that part of it which abuts on, or gives access from, it to a highway whether natural or artificial. But sometimes as in a covenant to keep up sidewalks, the front of a corner lot may mean the side; 31 Ia. 89.

When the contract of sale calls for a store fifty-six feet front and rear and the deed describes the lot as nineteen feet wide, there being visible monuments,—side walls,—the later control and front and rear will be taken as the depth of the lot, though the natural meaning would be the width; 10 Paige 386.

A covenant not to open or put out a door to the front of the street means a door giving access to the street and not close upon it, and the covenant is broken if the door be eight feet back of the actual front; Dowl. & Ry. 556, 563.

The words front to the river (in French and Spanish deeds, face au fleuve, or frente al rio), used in describing part of a plantation, prima facie designate a riparian estate, unless, taken in such sense, they have an incongruous or absurd result; 6 Mart. La. 19, 224, in which the meaning of this expression was learnedly and elaborately defined. It is otherwise as to a sale of part of a tract when at the time of sale the vendor owned another part between that sold and the river; in the last case the words are descriptive of the situation of the property; 8 Mart. La. 572.

And the words front of the levee (frente a la levee) when there was land outside of the levee susceptible of ownership does not signify a boundary on the river; 9 Mart. La. 656, 719.

FRONT FOOT. As used in an act providing that property shall be assessed in proportion to the "front foot" has been held synonymous with "abutting foot." 131 Mo. 19.

FRONT OF AN ACRE. An expression which "has no proper application to a line, and has not a natural or generally acknowledged and received sense. It is too vague to determine the length of the front line of a lot as a basis for a decree for specific performance;" 3 Del. Ch. 466.

FRONTAGE, FRONTAGER. In English Law. A frontager is a person owning or occupying land which abuts on a highway, river, sea-shore, or the like. The term is generally used with reference to the liability of frontagers on streets to contribute towards the expense of paving, draining, or other works on the highway carried out by a local authority, in proportion to the frontage of their respective tenements. Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. There is no liability at common law binding a frontager on the sea to maintain a sea-wall on his land; 1 Q. B. D. 225. Such an owner has an easement of access, as it is called, to a highway or water on which his land fronts or abuts, which is a right distinct from the right of the public to pass over or navigate upon it; but it does not warrant an action by the frontager for obstruction to navigation without proof of special damage; L. R. 5 App. Cas. 84.

The corresponding American term is abutter (q. v.)

FROZEN SNAKE. A term used to impute ingratitude and held libellous, the court taking judicial notice of its meaning without an innuendo. 12 Ad. & El. 624.

FRUCTUARIUS (Lat.). One entitled to the use of profits, fruits, and yearly increase of a thing. A lessee; a fermor. Bracton, 241; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

Sometimes, as applied to a slave, he of whom any one has the usufruct. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FRUCTUS (Lat.). The right of using the increase of fruits: equivalent to usufruct.

That which results or springs from a thing: as, rents, interest, freight from a ship, etc.

All the natural return, increase, or addition which is added by nature or by the skill of man, including all the organic products of things. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 1 Mac-kelvey, Civil Law § 154.

FRUCTUS CIVILES (Lat. civil fruits). All revenues and recompenses which, though not fruits properly speaking, are recognized as such by the law. 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154; Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FRUCTUS INDUSTRIALES (Lat.). Those products which are obtained by the labor and cultivation of the occupant: as, corn or peaches; 1 Kauffman, Mackeld. § 154, n.; 40 Md. 212; 118 Mass. 325. Emblements are such in the common law; 2 Steph. Com. 258; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

Fruits and vegetables produced by cultivation, as distinguished from the products of perennials; such as trees, bushes, etc., which are fructus naturales. 49 Minn. 412.

FRUCTUS LEGIS. The fruit of the law i. e. execution.

FRUCTUS NATURALES (Lat.). Those products which are produced by the powers of nature alone: as wool, metals, milk, the young of animals, and the fruit of trees and other perennial plants. 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154; Calvinus, Lex. See FRUCTUS INDUSTRIALES.

FRUCTUS PENDENTES (Lat.). The fruits united with the thing which produces them. These form a part of the principal thing; 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154. Sometimes called fructus stantes, standing fruits.

FRUCTUS REI ALIENAE. Fruits taken from another's estate; the fruits of another's property.

FRUCTUS SEPARATI. In Civil Law. Separate fruits, the fruits of a thing when they are separated from it. Dig. 7, 4, 13.

FRUGES (Lat.). Anything produced from vines, underwood, chalk-pits, stone-quarries. Dig. 50. 16. 77.

Grains and leguminous vegetables. In a more restricted sense, an esculent growing in pods. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

FRUIT. The produce of a tree or plant which contains the seed or is used for food.

This term, in legal acceptance, is not confined to the produce of those trees which, in popular language, are called fruit trees, but applies also to the produce of oak, elm, and walnut trees. It denotes the produce not only of orchard, but of timber trees. 5 B. & C. 847.

FRUIT FALLEN. The produce of any possession detached therefrom, and capable of being enjoyed by itself. Thus a next presentation, when a vacancy has occurred, is a fruit fallen from the advowson. Whart.

FRUITS OF CRIME. In the Law of Evidence. Material objects acquired by means and in consequence of the commission of crime, and sometimes the subject-matter of the crime. Burr. Circ. Ev. 445; Benth. Jud. Ev. 31.

FRUMENTUM. In Civil Law. Grain. That which grows in an ear. Dig. 50.

FRUMGYLD. The first payment made to the kindred of a slain person in recompense for his murder. Blount; Termes de la Ley; Leg. Edmundi, cap. ult.

FRUMSTOLL (Sax.). A chief seat or mansion-house. Cowel. An original or paternal dwelling. Anct. Inst. Eng.

FRUSCA TERRA. In Old Records. Uncultivated and desert ground. 2 Mon. Angl. 327; Cowel.

FRUSSURA. Plowing; a breaking. Cowel.

FRUSTRUM TERRÆ. A piece or parcel of land lying by itself. Co. Litt. 5 b.

FRUTECTUM, FRUTETTUM, or FRUTICETUM. A place where shrubs or herbs grow. Jac.; Blount; Spel. Glos.

FRUTOS. In Spanish Law. Fruits; products; profits; grains. White, New Recop. b. 1, tit. 7, c. 5, § 2.

FRYMITH, FYNMITH. In English Law. The affording harbor and entertainment to any one. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FRYTHER (Sax.). In Old English Law. A plain between woods. Co. Litt. 5 b. An arm of the sea, or a strait between two lands. Cowel.

FUAGE, FOCAGE. Hearth-money. A tax laid upon each fireplace or hearth. 1 Bla. Com. 324; Spelman, Gloss. An imposition of a shilling for every hearth, levied by Edward III. in the dukedom of Aquitaine.

FUDGE. When a libellous statement was copied from a prior publication and published with the word fudge prefixed thereto, it was left to the jury to say whether the word was added to vindicate the character of the plaintiff, or merely to create an argument in favor of the publisher in case of an action; 6 C. & P. 245.

FUER. To fly; which may be by bodily flight, or by non-appearance when summoned to appear in a court of justice, which is flight in the interpretation of the law. Cowel; Toml.; Whart.

FUERO. In Spanish Law. Compilations or general codes of law.

The usages and customs which, in the course of time, had acquired the force of unwritten law.

Letters of privilege and exemption from payment of certain taxes, etc.

Charters granted to cities or towns on condition of their paying certain dues to the owner of the land of which they had enjoyment.

Acts of donation granted by some lord or proprietor in favor of individuals, churches, or monasteries.

Ordinances passed by magistrates in relation to the dues, fines, etc., payable by the members of a community.

Letters emanating from the king or some superior lord, containing the ordinances and laws for the government of cities and towns, etc.

This term has many and very various meanings, as is shown above, and is sometimes used in other significations beside those here given. See, also, Schmidt, Span. Law 64; Escriche, Dict. Razz. Feuro.

FUERO DE CASTILLA. In Spanish Law. The body of laws and customs which formerly governed the Castilians.

FUERO DE CORREOS Y CAMINOS. In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters relating to the post-office and roads.

FUERO DE GUERRA. In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters in relation to persons serving in the army.

FUERO JUZGO. In Spanish Law. The code of laws established by the Visigoths for the government of Spain, many of whose provisions are still in force. See the analysis of this work in Schmidt's Span. Law 30.

FUERO DE MARINA (called, also, Jurisdiccion de Marina). In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters relating to the navy and to the persons employed therein.

FUERO MUNICIPAL. In Spanish Law. The body of laws granted to a city or town for its government and the administration of justice.

FUERO REAL. In Spanish Law. A code of laws promulgated by Alonzo el Sabio in 1255, and intended as an introduction to the larger and more comprehensive code called Las Siete Partidas, published eight years afterwards. For an analysis of this code, see Schmidt, Span. Law 67.

FUERO VIEJO. The title of a compilation of Spanish Law, published about A. D. 992. Schm. Civil Law, introd. 65.

FUGA CATALLORUM. In Old English Law. A drove of cattle. Fleta; Blount.

FUGACIA. A chase. Cowel; Blount.

FUGAM FECIT (Lat. he fled). In Old English Law. A phrase in an inquisition, signifying that a person fled for treason or felony. The effect of this is to make the party forfeit his goods absolutely, and the profits of his lands until he has been pardoned or acquitted.

FUGATOR. In English Law. A privilege to hunt. Blount.

A driver. Fugatores carrucarum, drivers of wagons. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 78.

FUGITATE. In Scotch Practice. To outlaw by the sentence of a court; to outlaw for non-appearance in a criminal case. 2 Allison Prac. 350. See next title.

FUGITATION. In Scotch Law. A declaration that a criminal who does not appear on the day to which he is cited is a fugitive, in consequence of which he is subject to single escheat: Ersk. Prin. 591 (i. e. forfeiture all moveables to the crown; id. 155); and he may also be denounced a rebel; id.

FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE. One who, having committed a crime, flees from the jurisdiction within which it was committed, to escape punishment.

As one state cannot pursue those who violate its laws into the territories of another, and as it concerns all that those guilty of the more atrocious crimes should not go unpunished, the practice prevails among the more enlightened nations of mutually surrendering such fugitives to the justice of the injured state. This practice is founded on national comity and convenience, or on express compact. The United States recognize the obligation only when it is created by express agreement. They have contracted the obligation with many foreign states by treaty, and with one another by their federal constitution and laws. See EXTRADITION.

Surrender under Treaties. The treaties enumerate the crimes for which persons may be surrendered, and in some other particulars limit their own application. They also contain some provisions relating to the mode of procedure; but, as it was doubted whether such stipulations had the force of law; Park. Cr. Cas. 108; congress passed the act of August 12, 1848, entitled "An act for giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments for the apprehension and delivery up of certain offenders." 9 Stat. L. 302. This has since been amended; and the statutes on the subject are found in U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5270-5280.

These acts embody those provisions contained in the treaties relating to the procedure, and contain others designed to facilitate the execution of the duty assumed by treaty.

The following are the leading provisions of the law relating to the practice: 1. A complaint made under oath or affirmation charging the person to be arrested with the commission of one of the enumerated crimes. 2. A warrant for the apprehension of the person charged may be issued by any of the justices of the supreme court or judges of the several circuit or district courts of the United States, or the judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any state, or the commissioners authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States. 3. The person arrested is to be brought before the officer issuing the warrant, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be considered. 4. Copies of the depositions upon which an original warrant in the country demanding the fugitive may have been granted, certified under the hand of the person issuing such warrant, and attested upon the oath of the party producing them to be true copies of the original depositions, may be received in evidence of the criminality of the person apprehended. 5. The degree of evidence must be such as, according to the laws of the place where the person arrested shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offence had there been committed. 6. If the evidence is deemed sufficient, the officer hearing it must certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the secretary of state, and commit the prisoner to the proper gaol until the surrender be made, which must be within two calendar months. 7. The secretary of state, on the proper demand being made by the foreign government, orders, under his hand and seal of office, in the name and by authority of the president, the person so committed to be delivered to such person as may be authorized, in the name and on behalf of such foreign government, to receive him. 8. The demand must be made by and upon those officers who represent the sovereign power of their states. 9 Op. Attys. Gen. 6; 8 id. 521. By act of Aug. 3, 1882, it is directed that all extradition cases under treaties shall be heard publicly ; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 371.

The convenient and usual method of action is for some police officer or other special agent, after obtaining the proper papers in his own country, to repair to the foreign country, carry the case through with the aid of his minister, receive the fugitive, and conduct him back to the country having jurisdiction of the crime ; 8 Op. Attys. Gen. 521.

In all the treaties the parties stipulate upon mutual requisitions, etc., to deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with crime, " shall seek an asylum or shall be found in the territories of the other." The terms of this stipulation embrace cases of absence without flight, as well as those of actual flight ; 8 Op. Attys. Gen. 306. The treaties of the United States do not guarantee a fugitive an asylum in any foreign country. So far as they regulate the right of asylum at all, they limit it ; 119 U. S. 700. See as to the right of asylum, 6 Law Mag. & Rev. 4th, 262. After the arrest, and until the surrender, it is the duty of the United States to provide a suitable place of confinement and safely keep the prisoner ; 8 Op. Attys. Gen. 396. If, however, the prisoner escapes, he may be retaken in the same manner as any person accused of any crime against the laws in force in that part of the United States to which he shall so escape may be retaken on an escape ; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5272.

It is provided in all the treaties that the expense of the apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the party making the requisition. The substance of the various treaties is set forth under EX-TRADITION.

Inter-State Rendition. In art. iv. sec. 2, of the constitution, it is provided that " A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime."

The act of congress of February 12, 1793, 1 Stat. L. 302, prescribes the mode of procedure, and requires, on demand of the executive authority of a state and production of a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate charging the person demanded with treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state from whence the person so charged fled, that the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person shall have fled shall cause the person charged to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear ; but if such agent do not appear within six months, the prisoner shall be discharged.

It further provides that if any person shall by force set at liberty or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting the fugitive to the state or territory from which he fled, the person so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars and be imprisoned not exceeding one year, and that all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive shall be paid by the state or territory making the demand. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5278-9.

In the execution of the obligation imposed by the constitution, the following points deserve attention :—

The crime, other than treason or felony, for which a person may be surrendered. Some difference of opinion has prevailed on this subject, owing to some diversity of the criminal laws of the several states ; but the better opinion appears to be that the terms of the constitution extend to all acts which by the laws of the state where committed are made criminal ; 6 Pa. L. J. 412 ; 1 Kent 42, n. ; 9 Wend. 212 ; 13 Ga. 97 ; 3 Zab. 311 ; 24 How. 107 ; 56 N. Y. 187. The word " crime " embraces every species of indictable offence ; 24 How. 99 ; including an act not criminal at the time the constitution was adopted but made so afterwards ; 37 N. J. 147 ; 56 N. Y. 182 ; and an act which is criminal under the law of the state from which the accused has fled, but is not so under the law of the state into which he has fled ; 24 How. 103. It has been held that the offence must be a crime ; a prosecution under bastardy proceedings will not support an application for extradition ; 25 Alb. L. J. 108 (Michigan).

The accusation must be in the form of an affidavit or indictment found and duly authenticated. If by affidavit, it should be sufficiently full and explicit to justify arrest and commitment for hearing ; 6 Pa. L. J. 412 ; 3 McLean 121 ; 1 Sandf. 701 ; 3 Zab. 311 ; 116 Mo. 505 ; 52 Wis. 699. The demand must be made by the governor of the state ; 9 Gray 262.

The accused must have fled from the state in which the crime was committed ; and of this the executive authority of the state upon which the demand is made should be reasonably satisfied. This is sometimes done by affidavit. The governor upon whom the demand is made acts judicially, so far as to see whether the case is a proper one ; 31 Vt. 279 ; but he cannot look behind the indictment in which the crime is charged ; 32 N. J. 145 ; 16 Wall. 366. The duty to surrender the fugitive is obligatory ; 24 How. 103 ; 16 Wall. 370 ; 32 N. J. 145. But in the case of a conflict of jurisdiction between the two states the surrender may be postponed ; 16 Wall. 366 ; 51 How. Pr. 422. As to executive discretion, see 13 Am. L. Rev. 181.

In the absence of direct evidence on the question of flight, if it appear from the indictment or affidavit produced that the crime charged is atrocious in its nature, was recently committed, and the prosecution promptly instituted, the unexplained presence of the accused in another state immediately after the commission of the crime ought perhaps to be regarded as prima facie evidence of flight, sufficient, at least, to warrant an order of arrest. The order of surrender is not required, by the act of congress, to be made at the same time with the order of arrest, and time, therefore, can be taken, in doubtful cases, after the accused is arrested and secured, to hear proofs to establish or rebut such prima facie evidence; 6 Am. Jur. 226; 7 Bost. Law Rep. 386. Where an officer of a bank, the business of which is under his control, goes to another state and allows the bank, while to his knowledge in an insolvent condition, to receive a deposit, in violation of the state law, he is guilty of the offence, though not in the state at the time of the deposit or afterwards, and is a fugitive from the justice of that state; 49 Fed. Rep. 833.

Under a statute providing interstate extradition, a person is a fugitive from justice when he has committed a crime within a state, and withdrawn from the jurisdiction of its courts without waiting to abide the consequences, and it matters not that some other cause than a desire to flee induced such withdrawal; 14 U. S. App. 87.

One who sets in motion the agencies for the commission of a crime, but departs from the state before the offence is consummated, is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the statute relating to extradition; 49 Fed. Rep. 833.

In order to constitute "fleeing from justice," under R. S. sec. 1045, it is not necessary that there should be an intent to avoid the justice of the United States. It is sufficient that there is an intent to avoid the justice of the state having jurisdiction over the same territory and the same act. It is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention to avoid prosecution whether one has been begun or not; 160 U. S. 128.

The accused person may be arrested to await a demand; 49 Cal. 436; but he cannot be surrendered before a formal demand is made; 17 B. Monr. 677. But if he be so surrendered and returned to the state from which the requisition came, this is not a ground of discharge then; 18 Pa. 39.

The surrender of the accused must be made to an agent of the executive authority of the demanding state, duly appointed to receive the fugitive.

The proceedings of the executive authorities are subject to be reviewed on habeas corpus by the judicial power, and if found void the prisoner may be discharged; 3 McLean 121; 3 Zab. 311; 9 Tex. 635; 49 Cal. 434; 106 Mass. 223; 56 N. Y. 182; 49 Fed. Rep. 833. But the courts have no jurisdiction to compel the executive to comply with a requisition; 24 How. 66; 5 Cal. 237. Nor have the federal courts such jurisdiction; 24 How. 66. Nor will the court on habeas corpus try the validity of the indictment under which he is charged; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 301.

As to the trial of an offender for a different offence than that for which he was surrendered, or when his surrender was improperly obtained, see EXTRADITION.

FUGITIVE'S GOODS. Under the old English Law, where a man fled for felony, and escaped, his own goods were not forfeited as bona fugitivorum until it was found by proceedings of record (e. g. before the coroner in the case of death) that he fled for the felony. Foxley's Case, 5 Co. 109 a. See FUGAM FECIT; WAIFS.

FUGITIVE SLAVE. One who, held in bondage, flees from his master's power.

Prior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, the duty of surrendering slaves fleeing beyond the jurisdiction of the state or colony where they were held to service was not regarded as a perfect obligation, though, on the ground of inter-state comity, they were frequently surrendered to the master. Instances of such surrender or permission to reclaim occur in the history of the colonies as early as 1685; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 592. As slavery disappeared in some states, the difficulty of recovering in them slaves fleeing from those where it remained was greatly increased, and on some occasions reclamations became quite impracticable. The subject engaged the attention of the convention of 1787; and, at the instance of members from slaveholding states, a provision was inserted in the constitution for the surrender of such persons escaping from the state where they owed service, into another, which provision was considered a valuable accession to the security of that species of property; 4 Elliott, Debates 487, 492; 5 id. 176, 286.

This provision is contained in art. iv. sec. 2 of the constitution, and is as follows:—

"No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Congress, conceiving it to be the duty of the federal government to provide by law, with adequate sanctions, for the execution of the duty thus enjoined by the constitution, by the act of February 12, 1793, and again by the amendatory and supplementary act of September 18, 1850, regulated the mode of arrest, trial, and surrender of such fugitives. Some of the states have, also, at times passed acts relating to the subject; but it has been decided by the supreme court of the United States that the power of legislation in the matter was vested exclusively in congress, and that all state legislation inconsistent with the laws of congress was unconstitutional and void; 16 Pet. 608; 11 Ill. 332.

These acts of congress were held to be constitutional and valid in all their provisions; 16 Pet. 608; 5 S. & R. 62; 9 Johns. 67; 2 Paine 348; 7 Cush. 285; 6 McLean 355; 21 How. 506.

The 3d and 4th sections of act of 1793, 1 Stat. L. 302, authorized the arrest of a slave by the owner, his agent or attorney, and on proof before a United States judge or a magistrate, a certificate of ownership should be given and would be a warrant for removal. Under the act of 1850, 9 Stat. L. 462, the marshals of the United States were required to arrest such slaves.

The act of 1850, and the 3d and 4th sections of the act of 1793 were repealed by the act of June 23, 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 200. For some decisions as to the question of the interference between the acts of 1793 and 1850, see 5 McLean 469; 13 How. 420.

In the practical application of the provisions of the acts of 1793 and 1850 for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, it was held that the owner was clothed with authority in every state of the Union to seize and recapture his slave wherever he could do it without any breach of the peace or illegal violence; 16 Pet. 608; that he might arrest him on Sunday, in the night-time, or in the house of another if no breach of the peace was committed; Baldw. 577; that if the arrest was by agent of the owner, he must be authorized by written power of attorney executed and authenticated as required by the act; 6 McLean 259; and if his authority was demanded it should be shown; 3 McLean 631; but he was not required to exhibit it to every one who might mingle in the crowd which obstructed him; 4 McLean 402; that, if resisted by force in making the arrest, the owner might use sufficient force to overcome the unlawful resistance offered without being guilty of the offence of riot; 3 Am. L. J. 238; 7 Pa. L. J. 115; Baldw. 577; that whilst the examination was pending before the magistrate who had jurisdiction of the case, the person arrested was in custody of the law, and might be imprisoned for safekeeping; 2 Paine 348; 4 Wash. C. C. 461; 6 McLean 355; that the act of Sept. 18, 1850, did not operate as a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus; 5 Op. Attys. Genl. 254; but that that writ could not be used by state officers to defeat the jurisdiction acquired by the federal authorities in such cases; 7 Cush. 285; 5 McLean 92; 1 Blatchf. 635; 21 How. 506.

The provisions of the constitution and laws above cited were held to extend only to cases where persons held to service or labor in one state or territory by the laws thereof escaped into another. Hence, if the owner voluntarily took his slave into such other state or territory, and the slave left him there or refused to return, he could not institute proceedings under those laws for his recovery; 4 Wash. C. C. 396; 10 Pa. 517; 10 How. 82. And children, born in a state where slavery prevailed, of a negro woman who was a fugitive slave, were not fugitive slaves or slaves who had escaped from service in another state, within the meaning of the constitution and acts of congress; 23 Ala. n. s. 155.

Since the adoption of the thirteenth amendment of the U. S. constitution, the above is entirely obsolete and possesses no more than an historical interest.

FULL. Complete; entire; detailed.

FULL AGE. The age of twenty-one, by common law, of both males and females, and of twenty-five by the civil law. Litt. § 239; 1 Bla. Com. 463; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Full age is completed on the day preceding the anniversary of birth; Salk. 44, 625; 2 Ld. Raym. 1096; 2 Kent 263; 3 Harr. Del. 557; 4 Dana 597. See FRACTION OF A DAY.

This period is arbitrary, and is fixed by statute. In the United States the common-law period has been generally adopted. In Arkansas, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Vermont, and Washington, however, a woman is of full age at eighteen. 2 Kent 233. In Louisiana and Texas, the common-law rule, and not that of the civil law, prevails; 7 Tex. 502. See AGE.

FULL ANSWER. One which meets all the legal requirements.

FULL BLOOD. Whole blood; generally used to denote brothers and sisters who descend from the same father and mother.

FULL CONFIDENCE. Under a bequest to the wife of testator "absolutely, with full power for her to dispose of the same as she may think fit for the benefit of my family, having full confidence that she will do so," the words full confidence do not constitute a trust, but are merely an expression of the testator's wishes and belief, as distinguished from a direction amounting to an obligation; 8 Ch. D. 540.

FULL COURT. A court in banc with all the judges on the bench who are qualified to sit. It is not unusual for counsel in a case of great public importance, in the absence of one or more of the judges, to ask for a postponement of a trial or argument in order that the cause may be heard and determined by a full court and not by a mere quorum. The granting of such an application is not a matter of right, but, in a case which appears to the court to justify it, the course proposed will generally be taken. Such applications are not unusual in the United States Supreme Court, in cases involving grave constitutional questions, and in the state courts in cases involving the life of a party or some grave public question. Sometimes where a case has been decided by a majority of a quorum, but a minority of the whole number of judges, a motion for a rehearing by the full court is allowed.

Formerly in England the expression was used when other judges sat with the judge who regularly held the court. Thus the Full Court of Appeal in Chancery consisted of the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices sitting together. The Full Court in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes consisted of the Judge Ordinary and at least two other members of the court. These arrangements are, nominally at least, superseded under the Judicature Acts.

FULL DEFENCE. See DEFENCE.

FULL FAITH AND CREDIT. A phrase used in the constitution of the United States, which provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. See FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

FULL LIFE. Life in fact and in law.

FULL PROOF. In Civil Law. Proof of two witnesses, or a public instrument. Halifax, Civil Law b. 3, c. 9, nn. 25, 30; 3 Bla. Com. 370.

Evidence which satisfies the minds of the jury of the truth of the fact in dispute, to the entire exclusion of every reasonable doubt. 38 N. J. L. 450. See PLENA PROBATIO.

FULL RIGHT. The union of a good title with actual possession.

FULL SUPPLY. In a contract to furnish ice, and, in case of inability "to lay up a full supply," to be bound only to deliver such proportion "as the quantity of ice laid up to be the full supply," the words full supply had reference to the capacity of the ice-houses, and the contracting party was only bound to use reasonable and practicable means according to the usage of trade. 69 N. Y. 45, 52.

FULL WAGES. The seventh article of the Laws of Oleron provides: That if a mariner be taken sick on the voyage, he ought to be put on shore, and care should be taken of him at the expense of the ship; when the vessel is ready to sail, she is not to wait for him; but, still he is to be entitled to his full wages if he recover; and if he does not, his wife, or next of kin, is to have them; deducting only such charges as the master has been at for him. The phrase full wages means the same wages which he would have been entitled to had he lived and served out the whole voyage of the vessel. 1 Wash. C. C. 414; 2 H. Bla. 606, note.

FULLUM AQUÆ. A fleam, or stream of water. Blount.

FUMAGE, FUAGE, or FOUAGE. In English Law. A tax paid to the sovereign for every house that had a chimney. It is probable that the hearth-money imposed by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10, took its origin hence. This hearth-money was declared a great oppression, and abolished by 1 W. & M. Stat. 1, c. 10, but a tax was afterwards laid upon houses, except cottages, and upon all windows, by 1 Wm. III. c. 18. The window duty was repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36. Whart.

FUNCTION. The occupation of an office: by the performance of its duties, the officer is said to fill his function. Dig. 32. 65. 1.

FUNCTIONARY. One who is in office or in some public employment.

FUNCTUS OFFICIO (Lat.). A term applied to something which once has had life and power, but which has become of no virtue whatsoever.

For example, a warrant of attorney on which a judgment has been entered is functus officio, and a second judgment cannot be entered by virtue of its authority. When arbitrators cannot agree and choose an umpire, they are said to be functi officio. Wats. Arb. 94. If a bill of exchange be sent to the drawee, and he passes it to the credit of the holder, it is functus officio, and cannot be further negotiated; 5 Pick. 85. When an agent has completed the business with which he was intrusted, his agency is functus officio.

FUND. "Merely a name for a collection or an appropriation of money. It may be nothing but a designation of one branch of the accounts of the state; or of a certain amount of money, when collected to be applied to a particular purpose. It may have no property and represent no investments; and what are called its revenues may include all the moneys appropriated or directed to be paid to it, or for its benefit, or that of the objects it represents." 34 Barb. 135. See 24 N. J. Eq. 358; 7 H. L. Cas. 273; 69 Ia. 278.

FUNDAMENTAL. This word is applied to those laws which are the foundation of society. Those laws by which the exercise of power is restrained and regulated are fundamental. The constitution of the United States is the fundamental law of the land. See Wolffius, Inst. Nat. § 984.

FUNDAMUS. We found. One of the words by which a corporation may be created in England. 1 Bl. Comm. 473; 3 Steph. Comm. 173.

FUNDATIO (Lat.). A founding.

FUNDATOR. A founder (q. v.)

FUNDIPATRIMONIALES. Lands of inheritance.

FUNDITORES. Pioneers. Jac. L. Dict.

FUNDING SYSTEM. The practice of borrowing money to defray the expenses of government.

In the early history of the system it was usual to set apart the revenue from some particular tax as a fund to the principal and interest of the loan. The earliest record of the funding system is found in the history of Venice. In the year 1171, during a war between the republic and the Byzantine emperor Manuel Comnenas, a Venetian fleet ravaged the eastern coasts, but, being detained by negotiations at Chios, suffered severely from the plague. The remnant of the expedition, returning, took with it the frightful pestilence, which ravaged Venice and produced a popular commotion in which the doge was killed. To carry on the war, the new doge, Sebastian Giani, ordered a forced loan. Every citizen was obliged to contribute one-hundredth of his property, and he was to be paid by the state five per cent. interest, the revenues being mortgaged to secure the faithful performance of the contract. To manage the business, commissioners were appointed, called the Chamber of Loans, which after the lapse of centuries grew into the Bank of Venice. Florence and other Italian republics practised the system; and it afterwards became general in Europe. Its object is to provide large sums of money for the immediate exigencies of the state, which it would be impossible to raise by direct taxation.

In England the funding system was inaugurated in the reign of William III. The Bank of England, like the Bank of Venice and the Bank of St. George at Genoa, grew out of it. In order to make it easy to procure money to carry on the war with France, the government proposed to raise a loan, for which, as usual, certain revenues were to be set aside, and the subscribers were to be made a corporation, with exclusive banking privileges. The loan was rapidly subscribed for, and the Bank of England was the corporation which it brought into existence. It was formerly the practice in England to borrow money for fixed periods; and these loans were called terminable annuities. Of late years, however, the practice is different,—loans being payable only at the option of the government; these are termed interminable annuities. The rate of interest on the earlier loans was generally fixed at three and a half per cent. and sold at such a rate below par as to conform to the state of the money-market. It is estimated that two-fifths of the entire debt of England consists of this excess over the amount of money actually received for it. The object of such a plan was to promote speculation and attract capitalists; and it is still pursued in France.

Afterwards, however, the government

receded from this policy, and, by borrowing at high rates, were enabled, when the rate of interest declined, by offering to pay off the loan, to reduce the interest materially. The national debt of England consists of many different loans, all of which are included in the term funds. Of these, the largest in amount and importance are the "three per cent. consolidated annuities," or consols, as they are commonly called. They originated in 1751, when an act was passed consolidating several separate three per cent. loans into one general stock, the dividends of which are payable on the 5th of January and 5th of July at the Bank of England. The bank being the fiscal agent of the government, pays the interest on most of the funds, and also keeps the transfer-books. When stock is sold, it is transferred on the books at the bank to the new purchaser, and the interest is paid to those parties in whose names the stock is registered, at the closing of the books a short time previous to the dividend-day. Stock is bought and sold at the stock exchange generally through brokers. Time sales, when the seller is not the actual possessor of the stock, are illegal, but common. They are usually made deliverable on certain fixed days, called accounting-days; and such transactions are called "for account," to distinguish them from the ordinary sales and purchases for cash. Stock-jobbers are persons who act as middlemen between sellers and purchasers. They usually fix a price at which they will sell and buy, so that sellers and purchasers can always find a market for stock, or can purchase it in such quantities as they may desire, without delay or inconvenience.

In America the funding system has been fully developed. The general government, as well as those of all the states, have found it necessary to anticipate their revenue for the promotion of public works and other purposes. The many magnificent works of internal improvement which have added so much to the wealth of the country were mainly constructed with money borrowed by the states. The canals of New York, and many railroads in the western states, owe their existence to the system.

The funding system enables the government to raise money in exigencies, and to spread over many years the taxation which would press too severely on one. It affords a ready method of investing money on good security, and it tends to identify the interest of the state and the people. But it is open to many objections,—the principal of which is that it induces statesmen to countenance expensive and oftentimes questionable projects who would not dare to carry out their plans were they forced to provide the means from direct taxation. McCulloch, Dict. of Comm.; Sewell, Banking.

FUNDS. Cash on hand : as, A B is in funds to pay my bill on him. Stocks : as, A B has one thousand dollars in the funds. By public funds is understood the taxes, customs, etc., appropriated by the government for the discharge of its obligations.

In England "The Funds" are synonymous with "Government Funds," or "Public Funds;" 7 H. L. C. 280; and generally mean funded securities guaranteed by the English government; 27 L. J. Ch. 448; but do not include foreign bonds guaranteed by England; 2 Coll. 324; nor bank stock; 7 H. L. C. 273.

FUNDUS (Lat.). Land. A portion of territory belonging to a person. A farm. Lands, including houses; 4 Co. 87; Co. Litt. 5 a; 3 Bla. Com. 209.

FUNERAL EXPENSES. Money expended in procuring the interment of a corpse.

The person who orders the funeral is responsible personally for the expenses, and if the estate of the deceased should be insolvent, he must lose the amount. But if there are assets sufficient to pay these expenses, the executor or administrator is bound, upon an implied assumpsit, to pay them; 1 Campb. 298; Holt 309; 1 Hawks 394; 13 Viner, Abr. 563. See 7 Misc. Rep. 237.

Frequent questions arise as to the amount which is to be allowed to the executor or administrator for such expenses. It is exceedingly difficult to gather any certain rule from the numerous cases which have been decided upon this subject. Courts have taken into consideration the circumstances of each case, the rank in life of the decedent, whether his estate was insolvent or not, and when the executors have acted with common prudence or in obedience to the will, their expenses have been allowed. In a case where the testator directed that his remains should be buried at a church thirty miles distant from the place of his death, the sum of sixty pounds sterling was allowed; 3 Atk. 119. In another case, under peculiar circumstances, six hundred pounds were allowed; Chanc. Prec. 29. In a case in Pennsylvania, where the intestate left a considerable estate, and no children, $258.75 was allowed, the greater part of which had been expended in erecting a tombstone over a vault in which the body was interred; 14 S. & R. 64; a sum of $127 for burial expenses is not unreasonable where deceased left an estate worth $800; 67 Hun 617. The expense of raising a monument comes under the head of funeral expenses; 76 Cal. 589; 14 Hun 296; 3 Misc. Rep. 170.

Funeral expenses usually have priority in the order of payment of debts.

A husband is liable for the funeral expenses of his wife; 1 H. Bla. 90; 12 C. B. N. S. 344; 98 Mass. 538; and the liability is imposed by law quasi ex contractu; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 128. In some cases it is held that when he has paid them the husband is not entitled to reimbursement out of the wife's separate estate; 53 Ala. 89; 52 Conn. 425; 100 Cal. 345; contra, 33 Ch. Div. 575; 6 Madd. 90; 14 Hun 562; 44 Ohio St. 184, where the wife's executor paid them. The rule is not affected by the fact that the wife was separated by her fault from the husband; 43 Ill. App. 39; or that she bequeathed money to another person who assisted in managing the funeral; 41 Mich. 590. See 2 Wms. Exer. 166, n.; 3 id. 275, n.; 2 Bla. Com. 508; Godolph. p. 2; 3 Atk. 249; Bacon, Abr. Executors, etc. (L 4); Viner, Abr. Funeral Expenses.

See, generally, 27 Am. St. Rep. 732; 33 N. J. Eq. 524-9; DEAD BODY.

FUNGIBLE. A term applicable to things that are consumed by the use, as wine, oil, etc., the loan of which is subject to certain rules, and governed by the contract called mutuum. See Schmidt, Civ. Law of Spain and Mexico 145; Story, Bailm.

FUR (Lat.). A thief. One who stole without using force, as distinguished from a robber. See FURTUM.

FUR. Skins valuable chiefly on account of the fur. Skins is a term appropriated to those valuable chiefly for the skin. The word hides is inapplicable to fur skins. 7 Cow. 202, 214.

FUR MANIFESTUS (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A manifest thief. A thief who is taken in the very act of stealing.

FURANDI ANIMUS. An intention of stealing.

FURCA. A fork. A gallows or gibbet. Bract. fol. 56.

FURCA ET FLAGELLUM (Lat. gallows and whip). The meanest of servile tenures, where the bondman was at the disposal of the lord for life and limb. Cowel.

FURCA ET FOSSA (Lat. gallows and pit). A jurisdiction of punishing felons,—the men by hanging, the women by drowning. Skene; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel.

FURIGELDUM. A mulct paid for theft. Jac. L. Dict.

FURIOSITY. Madness by which the judgment is prevented from being applied to the ordinary purposes of life. Bell. It is distinguished from fatuity or idiocy. Toml.

FURIOSUS (Lat.). An insane man; a madman; a lunatic.

In general, such a man can make no contract, because he has no capacity or will; Furiosus nullum negotium genere potest, quia non intelligit quod agit. Inst. 3. 20. 8. Indeed, he is considered so incapable of exercising a will, that the law treats him as if he were absent; Furiosi nulla voluntas est. Furiosus absentis loco est. Dig. 1, ult. 40, 124, 1. See INSANE; NON COMPOS MENTIS.

FURLINGUS (Lat.). A furlong, or a furrow one-eighth part of a mile long. Co. Litt. 5 b.

FURLONG. A measure of length, being forty poles, or one-eighth of a mile.

FURLOUGH. A permission given in the army and navy to an officer or private to absent himself for a limited time.

FURNAGE (from furnus, an oven). A sum of money paid to the lord by the tenants, who were bound by their tenure to bake at the lord's oven, for the privilege of baking elsewhere. The word is also used to signify the gain or profit taken and received for baking.

FURNITURE. Personal chattels in the use of a family.

"The word relates, ordinarily, to movable personal chattels. It is very general, both in meaning and application; and its meaning changes, so as to take the color of, or be in accord with, the subject to which it is applied. Thus, we hear of the furniture of a parlor, of a bed-chamber, of a kitchen, of shops of various kinds, of a ship, of a horse, of a plantation, etc. The articles, utensils, implements, used in these various connections, as also those used in a drug or other store, as the furniture thereof, differ in kind according to the purpose which they are intended to subserve; yet being put and employed in their several places as the equipment thereof, for ornament, or to promote comfort, or to facilitate the business therein done, and being kept, or intended to be kept, for those or some one of those purposes, they pertain to such places respectively, and collectively constitute the furniture thereof; 63 Ala. 410.

"The expression household furniture must be understood to mean those vessels, utensils, or goods, which, not becoming fixtures, are designed in the manufacture originally and chiefly for use in the family, as instruments of the household and for conducting and managing household affairs. Neither of these articles would seem to hold such a place in the domestic economy. The trunk, though perhaps often made to some extent to take the place of the chest of drawers, the bureau or the wardrobe, is nevertheless in its construction designed for and adapted to the use of the traveller as such, rather than the householder. By the cabinet box we understand an article designed, in material and workmanship, rather for ornament than use, intended for keeping jewelry and other small articles of value; thus ministering to the taste of the owner rather than the necessities or convenience of the household; 33 N. H. 345. Accordingly a trunk and cabinet box were held not to be furniture."

It is held that by the term household furniture in a will, all personal chattels will pass which may contribute to the use or convenience of the householder or the ornament of the house: as, plate, linen, china (both useful and ornamental), and pictures; 1 Johns. Ch. 329, 388; 1 S. & S. 189; 2 Will. Ex. 752; Jarm. Wills 712, n.; 3 Ves. 312; 24 Or. 2; 3 Ves. 311; 41 N. J. Eq. 93; bronzes, statuary, and pictures; 124 Mass. 221; 41 N. J. Eq. 93; but a watch will not; 33 Me. 535; nor will books; 3 Ves. 311; or furniture of a school-room in a boarding school kept by a teacher; 60 Pa. 220; or silver plate used in a hotel; 1 Rob. 21. A sewing machine and piano were held exempt from attachment as "household furniture"; 13 R. I. 20; but a doubt was expressed as to the piano, and as to that it was held contra in 30 Vt. 224; 18 Wis. 163.

FURNITURE OF A SHIP. This term includes everything with which a ship requires to be furnished or equipped to make her seaworthy; it comprehends all articles furnished by ship-chandlers, which are almost innumerable. 1 Wall. Jr. 369.

FURNIVAL'S INN. A place in Holborn which was formerly an Inn of Chancery. 1 Steph. Com. 19, n. See INNS OF COURT.

FURST AND FONDUNG. Time to advise or take counsel. Jac. L. Dict.

FURTA. A right or privilege derived from the king as supreme lord of a state to try, condemn, and execute thieves and felons within certain bounds or districts of an honour, manor, etc. Cowell seems to be doubtful whether this word should not read furca, which means directly a gallows. Cowel; Holthouse, L. Dict.

FURTHER ADVANCE. A second or subsequent loan of money to a mortgagor by a mortgagee, either upon the same security as the original loan was advanced upon, or an additional security. Equity considers the arrears of interest on mortgage security converted into principal, by agreement between the parties, as a further advance. Whart.

FURTHER ASSURANCE. See COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURANCE.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION. It frequently happens that a decree in Chancery directs accounts and inquiries to be taken before the chief clerk. The hearing of any question arising out of such inquiries is called a hearing on further consideration. Hunt. Eq. Rules Sup. Ct. xl. 10.

FURTHER DIRECTIONS. When accounts in Chancery were taken before Masters, a hearing after a master had made his report in pursuance of the directions of the decree was called a hearing on further directions. This stage of suit is now called a hearing on further consideration. Hunt. Eq. See 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed. 1233, n.

FURTHER HEARING. In Practice. Hearing at another time.

Prisoners are frequently committed for further hearing, either when there is not sufficient evidence for a final commitment, or because the magistrate has not time, at the moment, to hear the whole of the evidence. The magistrate is required by law, and by every principle of humanity, to hear the prisoner as soon as possible after a commitment for further hearing; and if he neglects to do so within a reasonable time, he becomes a trespasser; 10 B. & C. 28; 5 M. & R. 53. Fifteen days was held an unreasonable time, unless under special circumstances; 4 C. & P. 134; 6 S. & R. 427.

In Massachusetts, magistrates may, by statute, adjourn the case for ten days; Gen. Stat. c. 170, § 17. It is the practice in England to commit for three days, and then from three days to three days; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 74.

FURTHER MAINTENANCE OF ACTION, PLEA TO. A plea grounded upon some fact or facts which have arisen since the commencement of the suit, and which the defendant puts forward for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff should not further maintain his action. Brown.

FURTIVE. In Old English Law. Stealthily; by stealth. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 38, 3.

FURTUM (Lat.). Theft. The fraudulent appropriation to one's self of the property of another, with an intention to commit theft, without the consent of the owner. Fleta, l. 1, c. 36; Bract. 150; Co. 3d Inst. 107.

The thing which has been stolen. Bract. 151.

FURTUM CONCEPTUM (Lat.). The theft which was disclosed when, upon searching any one in the presence of witnesses in due form, the thing stolen is found. Detected theft is, perhaps, the nearest concise translation of the phrase, though not quite exact. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FURTUM GRAVE (Lat.). Aggravated theft. Formerly, there were three classes of this theft: first, by landed men; second, by a trustee or one holding property under a trust; third, theft of the majora animalia (larger animals), including children. Bell, Dict.

FURTUM MANIFESTUM (Lat.). Open theft. Theft where a thief is caught with the property in his possession. Bract. 150 b.

FURTUM OBLATUM (Lat.). The theft committed when stolen property is offered any one and found upon him. The crime of receiving stolen property. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FUSTIGATIO. In English Law. A beating with sticks or club; one of the ancient kinds of punishment of malefactors. Bract. fol. 104 b, lib. 3, tr. 1, c. 6.

FUSTIS. In Old English Law. A staff used in making livery of seisin. Bract. fol. 40.

FUTHWITE, or FITHWITE. A fine for fighting or breaking the peace. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict.

FUTURE ACQUIRED PROPERTY. Mortgages, especially of railroad companies, are frequently made in terms to cover after acquired property; such as rolling stock, etc. Such mortgages are valid; 64 Pa. 366; 32 N. H. 484; 95 U. S. 10; L. R. 16 Eq. 383. This may include future net earnings; 15 Ia. 284; the proceeds to be received from the sale of surplus lands; L. R. 2 Ch. 201; a ditch or flume in process of construction, which was held to cover all improvements and fixtures thereafter to be put on the line thereof; 26 Cal. 620; rolling stock, etc.; 64 Pa. 366; 49 Barb. 441. Future calls of assessments on stock cannot be mortgaged; L. R. 10 Eq. 681; but it has been held that calls already made could be; id.

By statutes in most of the states a will speaks as of the death of the testator and ordinarily passes property acquired after its date. See EXPECTANCY; MORTGAGE.

FUTURE ADVANCES. See MORTGAGE.

FUTURE DEBT. In Scotch Law. A debt which is created, but which will not become due till a future day. 1 Bell, Com. 315.

FUTURE ESTATE. An estate which is to commence in possession in the future (in futuro). It includes remainders, reversions, and estates limited to commence in futuro without a particular estate to support them, which last are not good at common law except in the case of terms for years. See 2 Bla. Com. 165. In New York law it has been defined "an estate limited to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate, or on the determination by lapse of time, or otherwise, of a precedent estate created at the same time," thus excluding reversions, which cannot be said to be created at the same time, because they are a remnant of the original estate remaining in the grantor; 11 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 3d ed. 9, § 10. See, also, How. St. Mich. § 5526; Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 45, § 10; 89 Mich. 428; 52 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 920.

FUTURE USES. See CONTINGENT USES.

FUTURES. This term has grown out of those purely speculative transactions, in which there is a nominal contract of sale for future delivery, but where in fact none is ever intended or executed. The nominal seller does not have or expect to have the stock or merchandise he purports to sell, nor does the nominal buyer expect to receive it or pay the price. Instead of that, a percentage or "margin" is paid, which is increased or diminished as the market rates go up or down and accounted for to the buyer. This is simple speculation and gambling; mere wagering on prices within a given time. 14 R. I. 138.

FUTURI (Lat.). Those who are to be. Part of the commencement of old deeds. "Sciant presentes et futuri, quod ego, talis, dedi et concessi," etc. (Let all men now living and to come know that I, A B, have, etc.). Bract. 34 b.

FUZ, or FUST. A Celtic word, meaning a wood or forest.

FYGTWITE. One of the fines incurred for homicide. See FIGHTWITE.

FYKE. A bow-net for catching fish. Pub. St. Mass. 1882, p. 129.

FYLE. In Scotch Law. To defile; to declare foul or defiled. Hence to find a prisoner guilty.

FYLIT. In Scotch Practice. Fyled; found guilty. See FYLE.

FYNDRINGA (Sax.). An offence or trespass for which the fine or compensation was reserved to the king's pleasure. Leges Hen. I. c. 10. Its nature is not known. Spelman reads fynderinga, and interprets it treasure trove; but Cowel reads fynderinga, and interprets it a joining of the king's fird or host, a neglect to do which was punished by a fine called firdnite. See Cowel; Spelman, Gloss. Du Cange agrees with Cowel.

FYRD, or FYRDUNG. The military array or land force of the whole country. Contribution to the fyrd was one of the imposts forming the trinoda necessitas. Whart.

FYRDWITE. A fine for neglect of military duty. If the lord did not respond to the king's call for the quota of milites which he was required to send, he must pay the fine for each man short. The man was bound to the lord, not to the king. Maitl. Domesd. 159, 161. See FYRTHWITE.

FYRTHWITE, or FRIDWITE. A mulct paid by one who deserted the army. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict. Doubtless these words and Fyrdwite (q. v.) were different forms of the same thing.

G.

G The seventh letter of the alphabet. In Law French it is often used at the beginning of words for the English W, as in gage for wage, garranty for warranty, gast for waste.

GABEL (Lat. vectigal). A tax, imposition, or duty. This word is said to have the same signification that gabelle formerly had in France. Cunningham, Dict. But this seems to be an error; for gabelle signified in that country, previous to its revolution, a duty upon salt. Merlin, Rép. Coke says that gabel or gavel, gabhum, gabellum, gabelletum, galbelletum, and gavilletum, signify a rent, duty, or service yielded or done to the king or any other lord. Co. Litt. 142 a. See GAVEL.

GABELLA. A tax or duty on personally. Cowel; Spel. Gloss.

GABLATOIRES. Those who paid gabel (q. v.). Cowel.

GABLUM (spelled, also, gabulum gabula). The gable-end of a building. Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. p. 201; Cowel.
A tax. Du Cange.

GABULUS DENARIORUM. Money rent. Seld. Tit. 321.

GAFOL (spelled, also, gabella, gavel). Rent; tax; interest of money.

Gafol gild. Payment of such rent, etc. Gafol land was land liable to tribute or tax; Cowel; or land rented; Saxon Dict. See Taylor, Hist. of Gavelkind pp. 26, 1021; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Gloss.; Maitl. Domesd. 44.

GAGE, GAGER (Law Lat. vadium). Personal property placed by a debtor in possession of his creditor as a security for the payment of his debt; a pawn or pledge (q. v.). Granv. lib. 10, c. 6; Britton c. 27.

To pledge; to wage. Webster, Dict.

Gager is used both as noun and verb: e. g. gager del ley, wager of law; Jacobs; gager ley, to wage law; Britton c. 27; gager deliverance, to put in sureties to deliver cattle distrained; Termes de la Ley; Kitchen fol. 145; Fitzh. N. B. fol. 67, 74.

Estates in gage are those held in vadio or pledge; vivum vadium is a vifgage or living pledge; a mortgage is mortuum vadium, a dead-gage or pledge; for, whatsoever profit it yields, it redeems not itself, unless the whole amount secured is paid at the appointed time. Cowel.

GAGER DE DELIVERANCE. One who had distrained and was sued, but had delivered the cattle distrained, was obliged not only to avow the distress but also to furnish pledge or surety to deliver them, or, as it was called, gager deliverance, literally, to deposit or undertake for the discharge. See Fitz. N. B. 67; Kelham, Dict.

GAGER DEL LEY. Wager of law (q. v.).

GAINAGE. Wainage, or the draught-oxen, horses, wain, plough, and furniture for carrying on the work of tillage. Also, the land tilled itself, or the profit arising from it. Old. N. B. fol. 117.

GAINER. To obtain by husbandry. Gainure. Tillage. Gainery. Tillage or the profit therefrom or from the beasts used in it. Gainé, gaignent (que), who plough or till. Kelham; Stat. Westm. 1, cc. 16, 17.

GAINOR. One who occupies or cultivates arable land; a sokeman (q. v.). Old N. B. 12.

GAJUM. A thick wood. Spell. Gloss.

GALE. The payment of a rent or annuity. GABEL.

GALEA, GALEE, GALOIE, or GALEIS. A galley, galleys. Spel. Gloss.; Kelham.

GALENES. In Old Scotch Law. A kind of compensation for slaughter. Bell, Dict.

GALLON. A liquid measure, containing two hundred and thirty-one cubic inches, or four quarts. The imperial gallon contains about 277 and the ale gallon 282 cubic inches.

GALLOWS. An erection on which to hang criminals condemned to death. In the thirteenth century there was in certain cases power given to him who caught a thief with stolen goods upon him, to hang him, and it is said that "the manorial gallows was a common object of the country." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 564. See INFANGENETHEF; UTFANGENETHEF.

GAMACTA. A stroke or blow. Spel. Gloss.

GAMALIS. A child born in lawful wedlock; also one born to betrothed but unmarried parents. Spel. Gloss.

GAMBLE. To engage in unlawful play. To play games for stakes or bet in them. It is the most apt word in the language to express these ideas; 2 Yerg. 472; a gambler is one who follows or practices games of chance or skill with the expectation and purpose of thereby winning money or other property. Per Ames, J., 113 Mass. 193. A common gambler is one who furnishes facilities for gambling, or keeps or exhibits a gambling table, establishment, device, or apparatus. 1 Dak. 291, citing cases. A gambling policy is a life-insurance policy taken out by one who has no insurable interest in the life of the assured. See INSURABLE INTEREST. A gambling device is any contrivance or apparatus by which it is determined who is the winner or loser in a chance or contest on which money or value is staked or risked. See 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1465; 27 Ark. 362; 49 Minn. 443; 1 Kan. 474; 46 Mo. 375; 1 Cra. C. C. 535; 17 Tex. 191; GAMING; WAGER.

GAMBLING CONTRACTS. See WAGER.

GAME. Birds and beasts of a wild nature, obtained by fowling and hunting. Bacon, Abr. See 11 Metc. 79.

As applied to animals it is to be understood in its ordinary sense, in the absence of statutory definition; 15 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 458.

GAME LAWS. Laws regulating the killing or taking of birds, and beasts, as game. The English game laws are founded on the idea of restricting the right of taking game to certain privileged classes, generally landholders, and are said to be directly descended from the old forest laws. The doctrine as laid down by Blackstone that the sole right of hunting and killing game was at common law vested in the crown has been controverted by Prof. Christian who clearly demonstrated that the owner of the soil, or the lessee or occupier, if no reservation was made in the lease, possessed the exclusive right to such game restriction. In 1831 the English law was so modified as to enable any one to obtain a certificate or license to kill game, on payment of a fee. An account of present game laws of England will be found in Appleton's New Am. Cyc. vol. viii.; Eng. Cyc., Arts. & Sc. Div. and Int. Cyc. h. t.

The laws relating to game in the United States are generally, if not universally, framed with reference to protecting the animals from indiscriminate and unreasonable havoc, leaving all persons free to take game under certain restrictions as to the season of the year and the means of capture. The details of these regulations must be sought in the statutes of the several states.

As the most effective means of enforcing such statutes, most of them prohibit all persons, including licensed dealers, under penalty, from buying or selling or even having in possession or control any game purchased within a certain period after the commencement of the close season. The enforcement of these penalties has been fruitful of much litigation.

A statute forbidding any one to kill, sell, or have in possession woodcock, etc., between specified days has been held not to apply to such lawfully taken in another state; 128 Mass. 410; 51 Ohio St. 209 (followed in 59 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1099); 139 Pa. 298; contra as to game unlawfully taken in another state; 35 Am. Rep. 390, note; 19 Kan. 127; L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 553; 71 Mich. 325; it has been held not to be an offence to expose live birds for sale under a statute prohibiting the killing or having possession of certain birds after the same are killed; 134 N. Y. 393, reversing 12 N. Y. St. 24; and the mere possession of game during the closed season does not constitute an offence if it were killed during the open season; 88 Me. 385; but a statute which forbids the sale or having in possession for the purpose of sale, of such game during the close season, is constitutional and a valid exercise of the police power, even if it were killed out of the state; 68 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 227; 103 Cal. 476; 58 Minn. 393; 51 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 306; 51 Ohio St. 209; or killed within the lawful time; 60 N. Y. 10; 95 U. S. 465. The police power residing in the state authorizes it to forbid the killing of game within the state with the intention of procuring its transportation beyond the state limits, and such a prohibition is constitutional; 61 Conn. 144; s. c. 161 U. S. 516, Field & Harlan, JJ., dissenting; nor is such prohibition in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the constitution; 56 Ark. 267; but such an act is unconstitutional when applied to imported game sold in the original packages; 103 Col. 476. See also as to the keeping of game in cold storage; 7 Mo. App. 524; and the catching of trout artificially propagated; 160 Mass. 157.

See, generally, Austin, Farm and Game Law; 28 Weekly Law Bul. 325; 30 Law Mag. & Rev. 177; 7 Crim. L. Mag. 227; and as to validity, 31 Cent. L. J. 273.

GAMING. A contract between two or more persons by which they agree to play by certain rules at cards, dice, or other contrivance, and that one shall be the loser and the other the winner. Gaming is not an offence eo nomine; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 423.

When considered in itself, and without regard to the end proposed by the players, there is nothing in it contrary to natural equity, and the contract will be considered as a reciprocal gift, which the parties make of the thing played for, under certain conditions.

There are some games which depend altogether upon skill, others which depend upon chance, and others which are of a mixed nature. Billiards is an example of the first; lottery, of the second; and backgammon, of the last. See 8 Ired. 271. The decisions as to what constitutes gaming have not been altogether uniform; but under the statutes making it a penal offence, it may be defined as a staking on chance where chance is the controlling factor; that betting on a horse race is so, see 18 Me. 337; 23 Ill. 493; 8 Blackf. 332; 9 Ind. 35; 4 Mo. 536; 51 Ill. 473; contra, 23 Ark. 726; 31 Mo. 35; 8 Gratt. 592; that a billiard table is a gaming table; 28 How. Pr. 247; 39 Iowa 42; contra, 15 Ind. 474; 34 Miss. 606. Baseball is a game of skill within the criminal offence to bet on such a game; 58 Ark. 79. The following are additional examples of illegal gaming: cock fighting and betting thereon; 8 Metc. 232; 1 Hump. 486; the game of "equality;" 1 Cra. 535; a "gift enterprise;" 5 Sneed 507; 3 Heisk. 488; "keno;" 48 Ala. 122; 7 La. An. 651; "loto;" 1 Mo. 722; betting on "pool;"

39 Mo. 420; a ten-pin alley; 29 Ala. 32; contra, 18 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 169. See 32 N. J. L. 158; stock-clock; 49 Minn. 443; crap; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 187; throwing dice or playing any game of hazard, to determine who shall pay for liquor or other article bought; 14 Gray 26, 390; or throwing dice for money; 91 Ga. 152; one who keeps tables on which "poker" is played, but is not directly interested in the game, is not guilty of gaming under the Virginia code; 32 Gratt. 884; merely betting at "faro" is not carrying on the game; 53 Cal. 246; the law against any game cannot be evaded by changing the name of the game; 17 Tex. 191; athletic contests, when not conducted brutally, even when played for a stake, have been held lawful; 2 Whar. Cr. L. § 1465; betting upon a foot race is gaming within the meaning of a statute; 149 Mass. 124; pin pool has been held not to be a gambling game; 43 La. Ann. 1076.

In general, at common law, all games are lawful, unless some fraud has been practised or such games are contrary to public policy. Each of the parties to the contract must have a right to the money or thing played for. He must have given his full and free consent, and not have been entrapped by fraud. There must be equality in the play. The play must be conducted fairly. But, even when all these rules have been observed, the courts will not countenance gaming by giving too easy a remedy for the recovery of money won at play; Bacon, Abr. It has been held that money lost at a game of "five-up" may be recovered; 12 So. Rep. (Miss.) 333. See also 48 Mo. App. 43; 16 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 90.

But when fraud has been practised, as in all other cases, the contract is void; and in some cases, when the party has been guilty of cheating, by playing with false dice, cards, and the like, he may be indicted at common law, and fined and imprisoned according to the heinousness of the offence; 1 Russ. Cr. 406.

Statutes have been passed in perhaps all the states forbidding gaming for money at certain games, and prohibiting the recovery of money lost at such games; and a court of equity will not lend its aid in a gambling transaction either to the winner to compel payment of his unpaid accounts or to the loser who has paid his losses to enable him to recover them back, whether the loser pays his losses in cash or in negotiable securities; 173 Pa. 525.

Statutes which forbid or regulate places of amusement that may be resorted to for the purpose of gaming or which forbid altogether the keeping of instruments made use of for unlawful games, are within the police power of the legislature, and therefore constitutional; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749. See 8 Gray 488; 29 Me. 457; 38 N. H. 426.

The uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is sufficient to warrant a conviction of gaming; 89 Ga. 393.

GAMING CONTRACTS. See WAGER.

GAMBLING DEVICE. An invention or contrivance to determine the question as to who wins or who loses his money on a contest of chance. 52 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 42.

GAMING HOUSES. In Criminal Law. Houses kept for the purpose of permitting persons to gamble for money or other valuable thing. They are nuisances in the eyes of the law, being detrimental to the public, as they promote cheating and other corrupt practices; 1 Russ. Cr. 299; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 663; 3 Den. 101. See 53 N. J. L. 664; 85 Me. 237; 53 Mo. App. 571.

In an indictment under a statute prohibiting gaming houses, the special facts making such a house a nuisance must be averred; Whar. Cr. Law § 1466; Whar. Cr. Pl. and Pr. §§ 154, 230; 5 Cra. 378. The proprietor of a gaming establishment cannot take advantage of a statute enabling a person losing money at a game of chance to recover it back; 14 Bush 538.

They are sometimes prosecuted as disorderly houses (q. v.).

GANANCIAL. In Spanish Law. Property held in community.

The property of which it is formed belongs in common to the two consorts, and, on the dissolution of the marriage, is divisible between them in equal shares. It is confined to their future acquisitions durante el matrimonio, and the frutos or rents and profits of the other property. See 1 Burge, Conf. Laws 418; Aso & M. Inst. b. 1, t. 7, c. 5, § 1.

All that which is increased or multiplied during marriage. By multiplied is understood all that is increased by onerous cause or title, and not that which is acquired by a lucrative one; 22 Mo. 254. See 18 Tex. 634; COMMUNITY.

GANANCIAS. In Spanish Law. Gains or profits from the employment of ganancial property. White, N. Rec. b. 1, tit. 7, c. 5.

GANG-WEEK. In England, the time when the bounds of the parish are lustrated or gone over by the parish officers—Rogation week. Lond. Encyc.

GANGIATORI. Officers in ancient times whose duty it was to examine weights and measures. Skene.

GANTELOPE. A military punishment, in which the criminal running between the ranks receives a lash from each man. Lond. Encyc. This was called "running the gauntlet," the word itself being pronounced "gauntlett."

GAOL. (This word, sometimes written jail, is said to be derived from the Spanish jaulu, a cage (derived from caula), in French géole, gaol. 1 M. & G. 222, note a.) A place for the confinement of persons arrested for debt or for crime and held in the custody of the sheriff. Webst. Dict.

A prison or building designated by law or used by the sheriff for the confinement or detention of those whose persons are judicially ordered to be kept in custody. See 6 Johns. 29; 14 Vintr. Abr. 9; Bacon, Abr.; Dane, Abr. Index; 4 Com. Dig. 619. It may be used also for the confinement of witnesses; and, in general, now there is no distinction between a jail and a prison, except that the latter belongs to a greater extent of country; thus, we say a state's prison or penitentiary and a county jail. Originally, a jail seems to have been a place where persons were confined to await further proceedings—e. g. debtors till they paid their debts, witnesses and accused persons till a certain trial came on, etc.—as opposed to prison, which was for confinement, as punishment. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 514, 518. A gaol is an inhabited dwelling-house, and a house within the statutes against arson; 2 W. Bla. 682; 1 Leach, 4th ed. 63; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1020; 2 Cox, Cr. Cas. 65; 18 Johns. 115; 4 Call. 109; 4 Leigh. 683. See PENITENTIARY; PRISON; JAIL.

GAOL-DELIVERY. In English Law. To insure the trial, within a certain time, of all prisoners, a patent, in the nature of a letter, was issued from the king to certain persons, appointing them his justices and authorizing them to deliver his gaols. 3 Bla. Com. 60; 4 id. 269. This was the humblest of the temporary judicial commissions so frequent in the fourteenth century; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 179; but so few men were kept in prison, that the work was regarded as easy work which might be entrusted to knights of the shire; 2 id. 642. See GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY; OYER AND TERMINER.

GAOL LIBERTIES, GAOL LIMITS. A space marked out by limits, which is considered as a part of the prison, and within which prisoners are allowed to go at large on giving security to return. Owing to the rigor of the law which allowed capias, or attachment of the person, as the first process against a debtor, statutes were from time to time passed enlarging the gaol liberties, in order to mitigate the hardships of imprisonment: thus, the whole city of Boston was held the "gaol liberties" of its county gaol. And so with a large part of New York city. Act of March 13, 1830. The prisoner, while within the limits, is considered as within the walls of the prison; 6 Johns. 121.

GAOLER. The keeper of a gaol or prison; one who has the legal custody of the place where prisoners are kept.

It is his duty to keep the prisoners in safe custody, and for this purpose he may use all necessary force; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 601; and a prisoner who assaults him in endeavoring to break gaol may lawfully be killed by him; 1 Russ. Cr. Sharsw. ed. 860, 895. But any oppression of a prisoner, under a pretended necessity, will be punished; for the prisoner, whether he be a debtor or a criminal, is entitled to the protection of the laws from oppression. He was indictable if by oppression he induced a prisoner to accuse another; 4 Bla. Com. 128; but this statute was repealed by 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 1, id. note. He is also indictable for suffering an escape (q. v.), or for extortion; 1 Russ. Cr. Sharsw. ed. 208.

When a county court delivers persons convicted by it of murder to a gaoler for safe-keeping till brought back for execution, the governor has no authority to countermand a subsequent order of that court requiring the gaoler to deliver them up, nor will the fact that a writ of error and supersedeas had been awarded each of the prisoners by the supreme court justify the gaoler in refusing to deliver up the prisoners on the order of the court that committed them; but the fact that a court having jurisdiction has granted the prisoners a writ of habeas corpus will justify such a refusal; 23 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 296.

GARANDA, or GARANTIA. A warranty. Spel. Gloss.

GARANTIE. In French law, this word corresponds to warranty or covenants for title in English law. In the case of a sale this garantie includes two things: (1) Peaceful possession of the thing sold; and (2) absence of undisclosed defects (défauts cachés) Brown.

GARATHINX. In old Lombardic law. A gift; a free or absolute gift; a gift of the whole of a thing. Spel. Gloss.

GARAUNTOR. In Old English Law. A warrantor or vouchee, who is obliged by his warranty (garauntie) to warrant (garaunter) the title of the warrantee (garaunte), that is, to defend him in his seisin, and if he do not defend, and the tenant be ousted, to give him land of equal value. Britt. c. 75.

GARB, or GARBA. A bundle or sheaf of corn; bundle. Fleta 1, 2, c. xii.

GARBALLO DECIMÆ or GARBALLES DECIMÆ (L. Lat.; from garba, a sheaf). In Scotch Law. Tithes of corn: such as wheat, barley, oats, pease, etc. Also called parsonage tithes (decimæ rectoriæ). Erskine, Inst. b. 11, tit. 10, § 13.

GARBLE. In English statutes, to sort or cull out the good from the bad in spices, drugs, etc. Cowel.

A garbler of spices was anciently in London an officer to inspect drugs and spices, with power to enter and search any shop or warehouse and garble and clean the goods or direct it to be done. Stat. 6 Anne, c. 16; Mozl. & Whit.

GARCEONS, GARCEONES. Servants who follow a camp. Journeymen. Kelham, Wals. 242.

GARCIO STOLÆ (O. Fr. Garceons, servant). Groom of the stole. Pl. Cor. 21 Edw. I.

GARDE, or GARDIA (Garder, to watch). Wardship; custody; care. The judgment. The wardship of a city. Kelham.

GARDEIN. A constable; a keeper; a guardian. Kelham.

GARDEN. A piece of ground appropriated to raising plants and flowers.

A garden is a parcel of a house, and passes with it; 2 Co. 32; Plowd. 171; Co. Litt. 5 b, 56 a, b; Wood, Landl. and Tenn. 309. But see F. Moore 24; Bac. Abr. Grants, I. See CURTILAGE.

GARDIANUS. A guardian; defender; protector.

A warden. Gardianus ecclesie, a churchwarden. Gardianus quinque portuum, warden of the Cinque Ports (q. v.). In feudal law, gardio. Spelman, Gloss.

GARDINUM. In Old English Law. A garden. Reg. Orig. 1, b. 2.

GARENE (L. Fr.). A warren; a privileged place for keeping animals.

GARLANDA. A chaplet, coronet, or garland.

GARNESTURA. In Old English Law. Victuals, arms, and other implements of war, necessary for the defence of a town. Mat. Par. 1250. See GARNISTURA.

GARNISH. In English Law. Money paid by a prisoner to his fellow-prisoners on his entrance into prison.

To warn. To garnish the heir is to warn the heir. Obsolete.

GARNISHEE. In Practice. A person who has money or property in his possession belonging to a defendant, which money or property has been attached in his hands, with notice to him of such attachment; he is so called because he has had warning or notice of the attachment.

From the time of the notice of the attachment, the garnishee is bound to keep the money or property in his hands, to answer the plaintiff's claim, until the attachment is dissolved or he is otherwise discharged. See Serg. Att. 88; Wade, Att. 331; Drake, Att.; Comyns., Dig. Attachment, E.

Ordinarily all persons or corporations who may be sued, may also be summoned as garnishees; but a municipal corporation cannot be; 92 Ga. 261; 95 id. 747; 95 Tenn. 492; 11 Utah 209; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 713; 38 Ill. App. 27; 43 Kan. 294; 11 Mo. 60; nor can a receiver; 11 Ga. 13; 23 Texas 508; 115 Mass. 67; 114 Ill. 287; or trustee appointed by the court; 12 Md. 124; 106 Pa. 418; 44 N. H. 127; and the garnishment of an agent is insufficient as a garnishment of the principal; 62 Mo. App. 50; but an attorney may be summoned as garnishee of his client in some cases; 3 Ala. 312; 99 Mass. 187; 77 Me. 195; 20 La. Ann. 188; 63 N. H. 166.

Any rights of the garnishee under existing contracts with the principal debtor, he is entitled to have the benefit of, as against the attaching creditor; 152 U. S. 596. No judgment can be rendered against a garnishee unless one is obtained against the principal defendant; 46 Ill. App. 458. It is competent for garnishees to represent in their own defence the rights of a third party to whom they are in law liable; 121 U. S. 430. A garnishee has the right to set up any defence against attachment process which he could have done against the debtor in the principal action; 120 U. S. 506.

There are garnishees also in the action of detinue. They are persons against whom process is awarded, at the prayer of the defendant, to warn them to come in and interplead with the plaintiff; Brooke, Abr. Detinue. See ATTACHMENT.

GARNISHMENT. A warning to any one for his appearance, in a cause in which he is not a party, for the information of the court and explaining a cause. Cowel.

Now generally used of the process of attaching money or goods due a defendant in the hands of a third party. The person in whose hands such effects are attached is the garnishee, because he is garnished, or warned, not to deliver them to the defendant, but to answer the plaintiff's suit. The use of the form "garnishee" as a verb is a prevalent corruption in this country.

It is attachment in the hands of a third person, and so is a species of seizure by notice; 41 Kan. 297, 596.

For example, in the practice of Pennsylvania, when a writ of attachment issues against a debtor, in order to secure to the plaintiff a claim due by a third person to such debtor, it is served on such third person, which notice or service is a garnishment, and he is called the garnishee.

In detinue, the defendant cannot have a sci. fa. to garnish a third person unless he confess the possession of the chattel or thing demanded; Brooke, Abr. And when the garnishee comes in, he cannot vary or depart from the allegation of the defendant in his prayer of garnishment. The plaintiff does not declare de novo against the garnishee; but the garnishee, if he appears in due time, may have oyer of the original declaration to which he pleads.

Where plaintiff in execution paid to the sheriff $1,000 as the value of the debtor's homestead interest, and the land was sold under execution, the money in the sheriff's hands was subject to garnishment at the instance of the other judgment creditors; 60 Ill. App. 65; money taken from a person without his consent by a sheriff acting as trespasser in so doing, and delivered by him to a third person claiming title thereto, is not subject of garnishment in the hands of the sheriff or to the third parties as the property of the person from whom it was taken; 40 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 223.

See Brooke, Abr.; Drake; Wade; Shinn, Attachment; ATTACHMENT.

GARNISTURA. In Old English Law. Garniture; whatever is necessary for the fortification of a city or camp, or for the ornament of a thing. 8 Rymer 328; Du Cange; Cowel; Blount. See GARNISTURA.

GARROTE. A mode of capital punishment practised in Spain and Portugal formerly by a simple strangulation. The victim, usually in a sitting posture, is fastened by an iron collar to an upright post, and a knob, operated by a screw or lever, dislocates the spinal column, or a small blade severs the spinal cord at the base of the brain. Cent. Dict.; Encyc. Dict.

GARSUMME. In Old English Law. An amerement or fine. Cowel. See GRESSUME; GROSSOME; GERSUMA.

GARTH. In English Law. A yard; a homestead in the north of England. Cowel; Blount.

A yard, garden, or backside. Kelham.

GARYTOUR. In Old Scotch Law. Warder. 1 Pitt. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 8.

GAS. An aeriform fluid, used for illuminating purposes and for fuel.

From a legal point of view it is to be considered with respect to the companies by which it is usually furnished, their status and obligations as affected by the nature of the business; and also whether the gas furnished by them is manufactured or natural.

Nature of the business. The business is not an ordinary one in which any person may engage as of common right, but a franchise of a public nature which, in the absence of constitutional restriction, may be granted by the legislature; 115 U. S. 650; id. 683; 33 Fed. Rep. 659; 84 Ky. 166. A grant of the right to lay pipes is valid, but it is a franchise to be strictly construed, and is void if the conditions are not complied with, pursuant to the legislative declaration in the grant; id. 46. Such a company cannot sell, lease, or assign its corporate privileges without consent of the legislature; 85 Me. 532.

They are not, however, always treated as strictly public corporations, but in some cases such a company is said to be simply "a private manufacturing corporation which furnishes gas to individuals as agreed. This of itself does not make it a public corporation;" 63 N. Y. 326. A company furnishing gas to a municipality under contract is not performing such public service as to exempt it from ordinary taxation; 20 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 434.

A gas company having power to manufacture and sell gas has an implied power to make all contracts necessary to that end; 86 Mo. 495.

Natural Gas. The gas obtained from wells in coal and oil regions, and used for lighting and heating. In nature and character, such gas has been termed "a mineral with peculiar attributes which require the application of precedents arising out of ordinary mineral rights, with more careful consideration of the principles involved than of the mere decisions. . . . Water and oil, and still more strongly, gas, may be classed by themselves, if the analogy be not too fanciful, as minerals feræ naturæ. In common with animals, and unlike other minerals, they have the power and the tendency to escape without the volition of the owner. Their 'fugitive and wandering existence within the limits of a particular tract is uncertain;' (per Agnew, C. J. in 80 Pa. 147). They belong to the owner of the land, and are part of it, so long as they are on or in it, and are subject to his control; but when they escape, and go into other land, or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone. Possession of the land, therefore, is not necessarily possession of the gas. If an adjoining, or even a distant, owner, drills his own land, and taps your gas, so that it comes into his well and under his control, it is no longer yours, but his." Per Mitchell, J., in 130 Pa. 235.

Under a lease of land for the sole purpose of drilling and operating for oil and gas, the lessee's right in the surface of the land is in the nature of an easement of entry and examination, with a right of possession where the particular place of operation is selected, and the easement of ingress and egress, transportation and storage; id.

Whether the words "other valuable volatile substance" in a lease when they were used with petroleum, rock, or carbon oil, will include gas is a question for a jury, as the words have no settled meaning; 11 Pa. 31. The words oil and gas in a lease have been held not synonymous; 6 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 74; it is a fuel; 114 Ind. 338; but it has been held that a company incorporated for supplying heat cannot also furnish natural gas; 108 Pa. 126.

Natural gas is as much an article of commerce as any other product of the earth; 120 Ind. 575; and a state statute making it unlawful for any person to conduct natural gas out of the state violates the provisions of the federal constitution vesting in congress the regulation of interstate commerce; id.; 118 Pa. 468.

The business of transporting and furnishing natural gas is a public use, and the right of eminent domain may be constitutionally granted to companies engaged in it; 5 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 564; the business is transportation of freight; 118 Pa. 408. Because of the public nature of the business taxation may be authorized for supplying it to municipal corporations; 39 Fed. Rep. 651; and any unreasonable restraint upon the business is against public policy; 130 Ill. 268. It was held that under the Pennsylvania general incorporation act of 1874, under which companies for the manufacture and supply of gas were formed, natural gas companies could not be incorporated; 108 Pa. 111; 111 id. 35. Consequently a general law was passed providing for such companies under which, when lawfully incorporated, may they exercise the right of eminent domain and the grant of the power is constitutional; 120 Ind. 581; 63 Barb. 437; 115 Pa. 4; 160 id. 367; and the use of city streets for that purpose imposes no additional servitude; id. In Pennsylvania, the courts of common pleas may hear and determine controversies between natural gas companies and municipalities as to the manner of laying their pipes; 115 Pa. 4.

A right to take natural gas from land under the Pennsylvania act of Apr. 7, 1870, P. L. 58, is not land held in fee, subject to be sold under a special fi. fa. against an insolvent corporation; 162 Pa. 78. The lessee for oil and gas, having drilled a well and tapped the gas-bearing strata (the only one in the land), has both the possession of the gas and the right to it, and the owner will be enjoined from drilling; 130 Pa. 235. A lessee for oil only who took from the well both oil and gas was held not accountable to the lessee for the gas, which is, like air and water, the subject only of qualified property by occupancy; 28 W. Va. 210. From the nature of the gas, a lease of well-rights is necessarily exclusive so far as concerns the leased premises themselves; id.; 130 Pa. 235. A person who has a natural gas well on his premises has the right to explode nitro-glycerine therein for the purpose of increasing the flow, although such explosion may have the effect to draw gas from the land of another; 131 Ind. 599.

See also as to natural gas, 30 Cent. L. J. 497; 29 Am. L. Reg. 93, 102; 34 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 46-8.

The rights and liabilities of gas companies are, in the main, the same, whether they are engaged in the business of supplying artificial or natural gas.

Municipal lighting. The business is usually carried on by companies acting either under a legislative or municipal franchise or contract, or directly by the municipality under express legislative authority or implied power.

As to the implied power of a municipality to light its streets, etc., see ELECTRIC LIGHT.

A municipal corporation having power to light its own streets, and erect and maintain gas works has implied power to contract with others to do so; 84 Ky. 166. A municipal council exceeds its power, in granting an exclusive privilege; 43 Ohio St. 257; at least, without legislative authority; 3 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 921. The authority to lay mains and pipes in streets and provide gas does not give an exclusive right to the use of the streets for that purpose; 21 Ohio L. J. 94.

A city engaged in making and selling gas is quoad hoc a private corporation, not legislating but making contracts which bind it as a natural person, and cannot be impaired by the legislature; 31 Pa. 175.

The grant of an exclusive privilege is a contract none the less because the business requires supervision by public authority, and such grant does not restrict the power of regulation by the state; 115 U. S. 650. A grant by a city, under legislative authority, of an exclusive privilege for a term of years of supplying the city and its people with gas, does not prevent the city from erecting its own gas works under a state law giving it power to do so; 146 U. S. 258. the grant of an exclusive privilege with an option to the city to buy the plant does not bind the city to maintain it when the sale of the plant is refused on application, but the city must elect whether it will purchase at the price fixed by referees before they are chosen, and until the city does so agree it is not a breach of contract for the company to refuse to join in selecting referees; 87 Ala. 245. Under a grant for a term of years of the exclusive privilege for this purpose, the right to use the streets for light other than gas is not implied and must be authorized; 11 Ky. L. Rep. 840. In this case it was held that the city had power to contract with another person for electric lighting, and pay for both gas and electricity, but it could not dispense with the gas company's gas without liability for breach of contract. When an exclusive privilege of lighting the city and using the streets was given by the city to one company for a term of years, in consideration of low rates, to citizens, it did not estop the municipal corporation from subscribing to the stock of a new gas company seeking to introduce gas; 8 Wall. 64. As to municipal authority to light streets, see 150 Mass. 592; 8 L. R. A. 487; ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The use of highways. The right to lay gas pipes in public highways can in general be granted only by the legislature. Such is the established rule both in England and in this country; 16 Q. B. 1012; 23 L. J. Q. B. 42; 2 Ex. Div. 429; 4 Bell, App. Cas. 374; 2 El. & El. 650; 29 N. J. Eq. 242; 18 Ohio St. 262. In a city it may be granted by the municipal or local authorities when empowered by the legislature to do so; 25 Conn. 19; 30 Barb. 24; in Massachusetts it was said to be not clear whether the city could act without authority from the state; per Gray, J., in 13 Allen 160; but in Michigan it was held to be essentially a matter of local control; 38 Mich. 154. The city may forbid opening the streets within certain periods as a regulation, but a prohibition of digging up the street to introduce gas on the opposite side of it is an unreasonable exercise of authority; 12 Pa. 318. In rural highways the laying of gas pipes is held to impose a new servitude not contemplated in the condemnation; 62 N. Y. 386; Mills, Em. Dom. § 55; 160 Pa. 367; but in city streets it does not; id. See 12 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 334; EMINENT DOMAIN; HIGHWAY; STREET.

Obligation to supply gas. The difference of opinion as to the public character of gas companies necessarily results in contradictory decisions as to whether the companies are under a public duty to supply gas on request. By the more recent decisions they are held to be subject to the duty of furnishing gas upon reasonable terms to any one who applies for it, especially if the franchise is exclusive; 25 Md. 1; 7 Gas J. 418; 14 id. 927; 17 id. 663; 6 Wis. 539; 12 Rob. La. 378; 67 Cal. 120; 4 Cush. 60; and the rule also applies where it is not; 52 Mich.

499; and companies may be compelled to do so by mandamus; 45 Barb. 136. On the other hand it has been held that they are under no public duty to supply gas; 30 Conn. 521; 6 C. B. N. S. 239; 20 U. C. Q. B. 233; 12 Allen 75; L. R. 15 Eq. 157; 27 N. J. L. 245. The last case was put solely on the lack of precedent and is practically overruled; 29 N. J. Eq. 77. See 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 818.

The principle of Munn v. Illinois has been applied to gas works; 47 Ohio St. 1. But the right to regulate rates is not arbitrary, even where given to a municipality by the legislature; the right to charge reasonable rates is part of the contract of the company with the state, and this reasonableness is a matter for judicial determination; 72 Fed. Rep. 818. See RATES.

A gas company which has been granted the exclusive privilege of supplying gas in a city for a certain number of years, under an agreement that at all times it would supply the citizens for private use with a sufficient quantity of gas, need not leave a gas meter in the house of a citizen who is using electric light, furnished by another company, so that in case of accident to the electric light he may use the gas; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 618.

Rules and Regulations. In the conduct of their business such companies may make and enforce rules and regulations if fair and reasonable. Regulations have been held to be reasonable, requiring a deposit; 6 Wis. 539; 52 Mich. 499; and that a written application should be signed; 11 Wis. 234; but such an application cannot be made to embrace an agreement to be bound by illegal rules and regulations; 15 Wis. 318. Regulations may be enforced respecting the care and treatment of meters; 12 Phila. 511; and inspection of the same, and of pipes; 30 Gas J. 336; but visits must be made at stated times and with notice; 6 Wis. 539. Regulations held unreasonable or oppressive, and therefore non-enforceable, are that after the admission of gas the pipes may not be opened without a permit under penalty of treble damage; id.; that meters be placed upon main pipes of apartment buildings instead of smaller pipes of individual occupants; 104 Mass. 95; that rents should be payable half yearly in advance with penalty twenty days after default enforceable by cutting off the attachment until payment of the arrears and additional half year in advance; 29 N. J. Eq. 77.

The right to cut off the supply. The company or the municipality has, as a general rule, the right to cut off the supply of gas if the bill for supplying it is not paid within a limited period. Such a provision by ordinance is a reasonable regulation; 132 Pa. 288; and furnishing gas without objection or account of former indebtedness is not a waiver of the right to shut off the gas for such prior indebtedness; 45 Barb. 136; but in New York the right was held not to extend to indebtedness of a former occupant of the premises; 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 185; L. R. 4 C. P. D. 410; 12 Rob. (La.) 307. Even when the company has the right by statute to cut off the supply for non-payment of regular charges it does not extend to charges for special service; 20 U. C. Q. B. 233; nor can the supply be cut off from one house for non-payment for another supplied under a different contract; 25 Md. 1; 7 Grant, U. C. 112; and even when the contract authorizes refusal to continue a supply in case of default in payment for "any premises" of the owner it will apply only to future defaults; 1 Mackey 331. Whenever there is a controversy as to the indebtedness the consumer may have an injunction; 66 How. Pr. 314. As to the measure of damages see that title. See also WATER.

Liability for negligence. Gas companies and others using or generating gas, artificial or natural, are subject to the general principle that one who uses a force which he cannot control is liable for the consequences, and where it may be controlled by due care and scientific knowledge and appliances he who receives the profit must bear the responsibility; 3 C. B. 1; they are liable for negligence which must involve the omission of, required by, or the doing of something forbidden by, reasonable care; 122 Mass. 219; 2 Post. & F. 437; what is such care is not capable of exact definition but must vary with and conform to the exigencies of the situation; 8 Gray 123; 129 Mass. 318; the obligation is increased by the dangerous character of the force under control; 152 Pa. 355; 12 R. I. 149; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 115, affirmed, 34 id. 508; and it extends to the company's agents and servants; 82 Ky. 432; 12 R. I. 149. The company is liable for such consequences as were natural and probable and, in view of the nature of the agency, ought to have been foreseen; 99 Pa. 1; 152 id. 355; 8 Allen 169; 3 id. 410. See CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA; 78 Cal. 517; 44 N. Y. 459.

Where the municipality is held liable in damages for an injury resulting from the negligence of a gas company in failing to keep in repair its apparatus located under the sidewalk, the company is liable over to the municipality; 161 U. S. 316.

The company is bound to exercise reasonable care in the location, structure, and repair of its pipes to prevent escape of gas so as to become dangerous to life or property; L. R. 7 Exch. 96; 129 Mass. 318; 129 Ind. 472; Whether by reason of explosion or inhalation; 65 Hun 378; it must also provide with the like care for the inspection of pipes and repairing leaks; 34 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 547; 4 Post. & F. 324; and the discovery of such leaks; 82 Md. 113; 105 Mass. 411; 148 N. Y. 112; 152 Pa. 355; and the safe condition of its apparatus authorized to be placed under the streets; 161 U. S. 316. The failure to use such care makes the company jointly liable with one who seeks for the leak with a lighted match, for the results of an explosion; 34 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 549. The mere fact that the gas was exploded by a lighted match will not relieve the company whose negligence caused the leak; 152 Pa. 355. It is not contributory negligence to search for a gas leak with a lighted match; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 547; or a candle; 147 N. Y. 529. A city as a manufacturer and distributor of gas is liable for negligence of its officers, and its agents are bound to the exercise of due care in like manner as those of a private corporation; 105 Pa. 41; but not unless there is negligence; 13 Phila. 173.

Where the gas company is authorized by the legislature the public may not recover damages, but it will be liable to a private person; 64 Barb. 55; 6 Lans. 467. A gas company before turning on gas into an apartment house must use reasonable precautions to ascertain that the pipes in the building are in such condition that it will not flow out into the apartments of tenants, who have not applied for it, to their injury; per Peckham, J., in 147 N. Y. 529. For an elaborate note on the liability for negligence in the escape and explosion of gas, see 29 L. R. A. 337; 16 Alb. L. J. 466. See also NEGLIGENCE. As to gas as a nuisance, see that title.

Remedies. An injunction will be granted to restrain a company from improperly cutting off the supply on the ground of irreparable injury; 64 How. Pr. 33; L. R. 28 Ch. D. 138; 14 Gas J. 927; a private owner cannot ask for an injunction against acts of companies in laying pipes until a request to the municipal authorities to do it and their refusal; 142 Mass. 417; and one company will not be restrained at suit of another; 40 N. J. Eq. 427. When the gas becomes a nuisance by defective pipes, the municipality may abate it and will not be restrained, but when it is not a nuisance a bill for injunction will not be sustained at suit of the municipality; 5 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 669.

Mandamus. Will lie to compel a supply of gas either artificial; 4 Cush. 60; 56 Cal. 431; 45 Barb. 137; or natural; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 818.

A claim that gas is of poor quality is no defence to an action for the supply of it; 32 Gas J. 5; 3 id. 5; but it may be shown that the gas was put out by air passing through the tubes, the contract being to pay for gas only, and the meter not being conclusive; 65 Hun 621. An action will not lie against a gas company by a consumer for the failure of the company to give him a supply of gas of the amount and purity required by law; [1896] 1 Q. B. 592.

Connecting a rubber pipe with gas mains and taking off the gas therefrom is larceny; Dears. C. C. 203; 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 172.

As to pipes in the ground, whether real or personal, see 12 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 334; and as to gas apparatus generally, see FIXTURES.

GASTALDERS. A temporary governor of the country. Blount. A steward or bailiff. Spel. Gloss.

GASTEL (L. Fr.). Wastel; wastel-bread; the finest kind of wheat bread. Britt. c. 30; Kelham.

GASTINE (L. Fr.). Waste or uncultivated ground. Britt. c. 57.

GATE (Sax. geat), at the end of names of places, signifies way or path. Cunningham, Law Dict.

In the words beast-gate and cattle-gate, it means a right of pasture: these rights are local to Suffolk and Yorkshire respectively; they are considered as corporeal hereditaments, for which ejectment will lie; 2 Stra. 1084 1 Term 137; and are entirely distinct from right of common. The right is sometimes connected with the duty of repairing the gates of the pasture: and perhaps the name comes from this.

GAUDIES. A term used in the English universities to denote double commons.

GAUGER. An officer appointed to examine all tuns, pipes, hogsheads, barrels, and tierces of wine, oil, and other liquids, and to give them a mark of allowance, as containing lawful measure.

GAUGETUM. A guage or guaging; a measure of the contents of any vessel.

GAVEL. In Old English Law. Tribute; toll; custom; yearly revenue, of which there were formerly various kinds. Jacob, Law Dict.; Taylor, Hist. Gavelkind, 26, 102. See GABEL.

GAVELBRED. In English Law. Rent reserved in bread, corn, or provision; rent payable in kind. Cowel.

GAVELCHESTER. A certain measure of rent-ale. Cowel.

GAVELET. An obsolete writ, a kind of cessavit (q. v.), used in Kent. Cowel.

GAVELGELD. Sax gavel, rent, geld, payment). That which yields annual profit or toll. The tribute or toll itself. 3 Mon. Angl. 155; Cowel; Du Cange, Gavelgida.

GAVELHERTE. A customary service of ploughing. Du Cange.

GAVELKIND. The tenure by which almost all lands in England were held prior to the Conquest, and which is still preserved in Kent.

All the sons of a tenant of gavelkind lands take equally, or their heirs male and female by representation. The wife of such tenant is dowable of one-half the lands. The husband of such tenant has curtesy, whether issue be born or not, but only of one-half while without issue. Such lands do not escheat, except for treason or want of heirs. The heir of such lands may sell at fifteen years old, but must himself give livery. The rule as to division among brothers in default of sons is the same as among the sons. Digb. R. P. 46.

Coke derives gavelkind from "gave all kinde:" for this custom gave to all the sons alike; 1 Co. Litt. 140a; Lambard, from gavel, rent,—that is, land of the kind that pays rent or customary husbandry work, in distinction from lands held by knight service. Perambulations of Kent, 1656, p. 585. See Encyc. Brit.; Blount; 1 Bla. Com. 74; 2 id. 84; 4 id. 408; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 165; 2 id. 269, 416.

GAVELLER. An officer of the English crown, who had the management of the mines and quarries in the Forest of Dean and Hundred of St. Briavels, subject, in some respects, to the control of commissioners of woods and forests. He granted gales to free miners in their proper order, accepted surrenders of gales, and kept the registers required by the acts. There was a deputy-gaveller who appears to have exercised most of the gaveller's functions. Sweet.

GAVELMAN. A tenant who is liable to tribute. Somner, Gavelkind, p. 33; Blount. Gavelingmen were tenants who paid a reserved rent, besides customary service. Cowel.

GAVELMED. A customary service of mowing meadow-land or cutting grass (consuetudo falcandi). Somner, Gavelkind, App.; Blount.

GAVELREP. In Old English Law. Bedreap or bidreap; the duty of reaping at the bid or command of the lord. Somn. Gavelkind 19, 21; Cowel.

GAVELWERK (called also Gavelweek). A customary service, either manuopera, by the person of the tenant, or carropera, by his carts or carriages. Phillips, Purveyance; Blount; Somner, Gavelkind 24; Du Cange.

GAZETTE. The official publication of the British government, also called the London Gazette. It is evidence of acts of state, and of everything done by the queen in her political capacity. Orders of adjudication in bankruptcy are required to be published therein, and a copy of the Gazette containing such publication is conclusive evidence of the fact, and of the date thereof. Moz. & W.

GEBOCCED (Anglo-Saxon). Conveyed.

GEBUR (Sax.). A boor. Maitl. Domesd. 37.

GEBURSCRIPT. Neighborhood or adjoining district. Cowel.

GEBURUS. In Old English Law. A country neighborhood; an inhabitant of the same gaburscript, or village. Cowel.

GEBOCIAN (from Sax. boc). To convey boc land,—the grantor being said to geboecian the grantee of the land; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law. 10. But the better opinion would seem to be that boc land was not transferable except by descent. See Du Cange, Liber; BOCLAND; FOLCLAND.

GELD (from Sax. gildan; Law Lat. geldum). A payment; tax, tribute. Laws of Hen. I. c. 2; Charta Edredi Regis apud Ingulfum, c. 81; Mon. Ang. t. 1, pp. 52, 211, 379; t. 2, p. 161; Du Cange; Blount.

The compensation for a crime.

We find geld added to the word denoting the offence, or the thing injured or destroyed, and the compound taking the meaning of compensation for that offence or the value of that thing. Capitulare 3, anno 813, cc. 23, 25; Carl Magn. So, wergeld, the compensation for killing a man, or his value; orfgeld, the value of cattle; angeld, the value of a single thing; octogeld, the value eight times over, etc. Du Cange, Geldum.

GELDABILIS. In Old English Law. Taxable.

GELDABLE. Liable to be taxed. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 552; Kelham.

GELDING. A horse that has been castrated, and is thus distinguished from a horse in his natural and unaltered condition. 4 Tex. App. 220.

GEMMA (Lat). In the Civil Law. A gem; precious stones. Gems are distinguished by their transparency: such as emeralds, chrysolites, amethysts. Dig. 34, 2, 19, 17.

GEMOT (gemote, or mote; Sax., from gemeltand, to meet or assemble; L. Lat. gemotum). An assembly; a mote or moot, meeting or public assembly.

There were various kinds: as, the witena-gemot, or meeting of the wise men; the folc-gemot, or folc-moot, the general assembly of the people; the shire-gemot, or county court; the burg-gemot, or borough court; the hundred-gemot, or hundred court; the hali-gemot, or court-baron; the halmote, a convention of citizens in their public hall; the holy-mote, or holy court; the swanimote, or forest court; the ward-mote, or ward court; Cunningham, Law Dict. And see the several titles.

GENEALOGY. The summary history or table of a family, showing how the persons there named are connected together.

It is founded on the idea of a lineage or family. Persons descended from the common father constitute a family. Under the idea of degrees is noted the nearness or remoteness of relationship in which one person stands with respect to another. A series of several persons, descended from a common progenitor, is called a line. Children stand to each other in the relation either of full blood or half-blood, according as they are descended from the same parents or have only one parent in common. For illustrating descent and relationship, genealogical tables are constructed, the order of which depends on the end in view. In tables the object of which is to show all the individuals embraced in a family, it is usual to begin with the oldest progenitor, and to put all the persons of the male and female sex in descending, and then in collateral, lines. Other tables exhibit the ancestors of a particular person in ascending lines both on the father's and the mother's side. In this way four, eight, sixteen, thirty-two, etc., ancestors are exhibited, doubling at every degree. Some tables are constructed in the form of a tree, after the model of canonical law (arbor consanguinitatis), with the progenitor beneath, for the root or stem. See CONSANGUINITY.

GENEARCH. The head of the family.

GENEATH. In Saxon Law. A villein, or agricultural tenant (villanus villicus); a hind, or farmer (fimarius rusticus). Spel. Gloss.

GENER (Lat.). A son-in-law.

GENERAL AGENT. See AGENT.

GENERAL APPEARANCE. See APPEARANCE.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY. A name given in some of the states to the senate and house of representatives, which compose the legislative body.

GENERAL ASSIGNMENT. An assignment of all one's property for the benefit of his creditors, and necessarily includes an assignee who shall by the terms of the instrument, or as an inference from those terms, take as a trustee for the creditors. 18 N. Y. S. 234. See ASSIGNMENT.

GENERAL AVERAGE. A loss arising out of extraordinary sacrifices made, or extraordinary expenses incurred, for the joint benefit of a ship and cargo. 19 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 10.

The scuttling of a ship by the municipal authorities of a port, without the direction of her master, to extinguish a fire in her hold, is not a general average loss; 157 U. S. 386; which see generally on the subject. See AVERAGE; FOLLOWING BASIS.

GENERAL CHALLENGE. A challenge for cause to a particular juror, upon a ground which disqualifies him from serving in any case. Cal. Pen Code § 1071.

GENERAL CHARACTER. The general character is the estimation in which a person is held in the community where he has resided, and, ordinarily, the members of that community are the only proper witnesses to testify as to such character. Accordingly a witness who goes to the place of the former residence of a party to learn his character will not be allowed to testify as to the result of his inquiries. 2 Wend. 354. See CHARACTER.

GENERAL CHARGE. The charge or instruction of the court to the jury upon the case, as a whole, or upon its general features and characteristics. See CHARGE.

GENERAL CIRCULATION. That of a general newspaper only, as distinguished from one of a special or limited character; 1 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 114.

GENERAL COUNCIL. A council of bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, from different parts of the world.

A name sometimes applied to the British parliament.

GENERAL CREDIT. The character of a witness as one generally worthy of credit. There is a distinction between this and particular credit, which may be affected by proof of particular facts relating to the particular action; 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 232.

GENERAL CUSTOM. See CUSTOM.

GENERAL DAMAGES. See DAMAGES.

GENERAL DEMURRER. See DEMURRER.

GENERAL DENIAL. See DENIAL; PLEA; TRAVERSE.

GENERAL DEPOSIT. Of money in a bank, it means one to be returned to the depositor in a like sum, but not the same money which was deposited. 43 Ill. App. 340; 43 Ala. 138. See DEPOSIT; SPECIAL DEPOSIT.

GENERAL ELECTION. An election of officers of the general government, either federal or state, as distinguished from an election of local officers.

One held to choose an officer after the expiration of the full term of the former officer, as distinguished from one held to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the full term for which the incumbent was elected. 52 Cal. 164.

GENERAL EXECUTOR. See EXECUTOR.

GENERAL FIELD. A number of separate lots or parcels of land inclosed together and fenced as a single field. 14 Mass. 440.

GENERAL FUND. A phrase used in some states as a collective designation of all the assets of the state available for the support of the state government and for defraying the ordinary appropriations of the legislature. It is so used in New York; 27 Barb. 575, 588; and also in Delaware in the messages of the governor and other state papers to distinguish such funds as are available in the hands of the state treasurer for general purposes from assets of a special character, such as the school fund.

GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY. In English Law. One of the four commissions issued to judges holding the assizes, which empowers them to try and deliverance make of every prisoner who shall be in the gaol when the judges arrive at the circuit town, whether an indictment has been preferred at any previous assize or not.

It was anciently the course to issue special writs of gaol delivery for each prisoner, which were called writs de bono et malo; but, these being found inconvenient and oppressive, a general commission for all the prisoners has long been established in their stead. 4 Steph. Com. 333, 334; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 14, 28.

Under this authority it was necessary that the gaol be cleared and delivered of all prisoners in it, whenever or before whomever indicated or for whatever crime. Such deliverance took place when the person is either acquitted, convicted, or sentenced to punishment. Bract. 110. See COURTS OF OYER AND TERMINER AND GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY; GAOL DELIVERY; ASSIZE.

GENERAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. One granted upon a prayer in which the defendant reserves to himself no exceptions.

GENERAL INCLOSURE ACT. The Stat. 41 Geo. III. c. 109, which consolidated a number of regulations respecting the inclosure of common fields and waste lands. See 8 and 9 Viet. c. 118; INCLOSURE.

GENERAL ISSUE. In Pleading. A plea which denies or traverses at once the whole indictment or declaration, without offering any special matter to evade it.

It is called the general issue because, by importing an absolute and general denial of what is alleged in the indictment or declaration, it amounts at once to an issue. 2 Bla. Com. 305. In the early manner of pleading, the general issue was seldom used except where the party meant wholly to deny the charges alleged against him. When he intended to excuse or palliate the charge, a special plea was used to set forth the particular facts. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 617.

But now, since special pleading is generally abolished, the same result is secured by requiring the defendant to file notice of special matters of defence which he intends to set up on trial, or obliging him to use a form of answer adapted to the plaintiff's declaration, the method varying in different systems of pleading. Under the English Judicature Acts, the general issue is no longer admissible in ordinary civil actions, except where expressly sanctioned by statute.

In criminal cases the general issue is, not guilty. In civil cases the general issues are almost as various as the forms of action: in assumpsit, the general issue is non assumpsit; in debt, nil debet; in detinue, non detinet; in trespass, non culpabilis (not guilty); in replevin, non cepit, etc. Steph. Pl. 232.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE. A bureau in the United States government which has the charge of matters relating to the public lands.

It was established by the act of April 25, 1812, 2 Story, Laws 1238. Another act was passed March 24, 1824, 3 Story 1938, which authorized the employment of additional officers. And it was reorganized by an act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," July 4, 1836. It was originally a bureau of the treasury department, but was transferred in 1859 to the department of the interior. The statutes on the subject are comprised in U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 446-461. As to the organization of the executive departments of the federal government, see DEPARTMENT. See also Zabriskie's Pub. Land Laws of U. S.

GENERAL LAW. Laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws. Binney, Restrictions upon Local and Special Legislation.

Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class. 77 Pa. 348. Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves. 40 N. J. L. 123.

The later constitutions of many of the states place restrictions upon the legislature as to passing special laws in certain cases. In some states there is a provision that general laws only may be passed, in cases where such can be made applicable. Provisions requiring all laws of a general nature to be uniform in their operation do not prohibit the passage of laws applicable to cities of a certain class having not less than a certain number of inhabitants, although there be but one city in the state of that class; 18 Ohio N. S. 85; Cooley, Const. Lim. 156. See 37 Cal. 366.

The wisdom of these constitutional provisions has been the subject of grave doubt. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 156, n.

When thus used, the term "general" has a twofold meaning. With reference to the subject-matter of the statute, it is synonymous with "public" and opposed to "private"; 37 Cal. 366; 14 Wis. 372; 46 id. 218; Dwarrris, Stat. 629; Sedgw. Stat. L. 30; but with reference to the extent of territory over which it is to operate, it is opposed to "local," and means that the statute to which it applies operates throughout the whole of the territory subject to the legislative jurisdiction; 4 Co. 75 a; 1 Bla. Com. 85; 83 Ill. 585; 87 Tenn. 304; 10 Wis. 180. Further, when used in antithesis to "special" it means relating to all of a class instead of to men only of that class; 70 Ill. 398; 26 Ind. 431; 22 Ia. 391; 77 Pa. 348; 32 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 440.

When the constitution forbids the passing of special or local laws in specified cases, it is within the discretion of the legislature to decide whether a subject not named in the constitution is a proper subject for general legislation; the fact that a special law is passed in relation thereto is evidence that it was thought that a general law would not serve; and in such a case clear evidence of mistake is required to invalidate the enactment; 81 Cal. 489; 92 Ind. 236; 107 id. 15; 77 Ia. 513.

In deciding whether or not a given law is general, the purpose of the act and the objects on which it operates must be looked to. If these objects possess sufficient characteristics peculiar to themselves and the purpose of the legislation is germane thereto, they will be considered as a separate class, and legislation affecting them will be general; 49 N. J. L. 356; 41 Minn. 74; 131 Ind. 446; 87 Mich. 217; 124 Ill. 666; 87 Tenn. 214; but if the distinctive characteristics of the class have no relation to that purpose of the legislature, or if objects which would appropriately belong to the same class have been excluded, the classification is faulty, and the law not general; 87 Ga. 444; 91 Cal. 238; 32 Kan. 431; 51 N. J. L. 402; 52 id. 303; 19 Nev. 43; 2 N. Dak. 270; 106 Pa. 377. The effect, not the form of the law, determines its character; 20 Ia. 338; 71 Mo. 645; 82 id. 231; 53 N. J. L. 4; 45 Ohio St. 63; 48 id. 211; 83 Pa. 258.

See 42 N. J. L. 357; id. 533; 40 id. 123; 31 Wis. 257. See LEGISLATIVE POWER; SPECIAL LAW; STATUTE.

GENERAL LEGACY. See LEGACY.

GENERAL LIEN. See LIEN.

GENERAL MALICE. See MALICE.

GENERAL MEETING. See MEETING.

GENERAL OCCUPANT. The man who could first enter upon lands held pur autre vie, after the death of the tenant for life, living the cestui que vie. At common law he held the lands by right for the remainder of the term; but this is now altered by statute, in England, the term going to the executors if not devised; 29 Car. II. c. 3; 14 Geo. II. c. 20; 2 Bla. Com. 258. This has been followed by some states; 1 Md. Code 666, s. 220, art. 93; in some states the term goes to heirs, if undevise; Mass. Gen. Stat. c. 91, § 1.

GENERAL ORDERS. Orders or rules of court, entered for the guidance of practitioners and the general regulation of procedure, or in some branch of its general jurisdiction; as opposed to a rule or an order made in a particular case. The rules of court.

GENERAL OWNER. The general owner of a thing is one who has the primary title to it; as distinguished from a special owner, who has a special interest in the same thing, amounting to a qualified ownership, such, for example, as a bailee lien. One who has both the right of property and of possession.

GENERAL PARTNERSHIP. See PARTNERSHIP.

GENERAL PROPERTY. The right and property in a thing enjoyed by the general owner (q. v.).

GENERAL RESTRAINT OF TRADE. A contract which forbids the party to it from engaging in a particular business without limitation either of time or locality. Such contracts are void. 2 Add. Cont., Abb. & Wood ed. 737.

One which forbids the person to employ his talents, industry, or capital in any undertaking within the limits of the state or country. 9 How. Pr. 337. See RESTRAINT; GOOD WILL.

GENERAL RETAINER. See RETAINER.

GENERAL RETURN DAY. In any court the day for the return of all process, such as writs of summons, subpoena, etc., issued returnable to a particular term of the court. See RETURN OF WRITS.

GENERAL RULES. Standing orders of a court for the regulation of its practice. See GENERAL ORDERS.

GENERAL SESSIONS. See COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

GENERAL SHIP. One which is employed by the charterer or owner on a particular voyage, and is hired by a number of persons, unconnected with each other, to convey their respective goods to the place of destination. A ship advertised for general receipt of goods to be carried on a particular voyage. The advertisement should state the name of the ship and master, the general character of the ship, the time of sailing, and the proposed voyages. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law 130; Abb. Shipp. 123.

The shippers in a general ship generally contract with the master; but in law the owners and the masters are separately bound to the performance of the contract, it being considered as made with the owners as well as with the master; Abb. Shipp. 319.

GENERAL SPECIAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. One in which the defendant reserves to himself "all advantages and exceptions whatsoever." 2 Chitty, Pl. 408. See IMPARLANCE.

GENERAL STATUTE. See GENERAL LAW.

GENERAL TAIL. See FEE-TAIL.

GENERAL TENANCY. A tenancy which is not fixed and made certain, as to its duration, by agreement of the parties. 22 Ind. 122.

GENERAL TERM. A phrase used in some jurisdictions to designate the regular session of a court, for the trial and decision of causes, as distinguished from a special term, for the hearing of motions or arguments, or the despatch of routine or formal business, or the trial of a special list or class of causes or a particular case. It is also sometimes used to designate a sitting of the court in banc (q. v.).

GENERAL TRAVERSE. See TRAVERSE.

GENERAL USAGE. See USAGE.

GENERAL VERDICT. See VERDICT.

GENERAL WARRANT. A process which used to issue from the state secretary's office, to take up (without naming any person in particular) the author, printer, and publisher of such obscene and seditious libels as were particularly specified in it. The practice of issuing such warrants was common in early English history, but it received its death blow from Lord Camden, in the time of Wilkes. The latter was arrested and his private papers taken possession of under such a warrant, on a charge of seditious libel in publishing No. 45 of the North Briton. He recovered heavy damages against Lord Halifax who issued the warrant. Pratt, C. J., declared the practice to be "totally subversive of the liberty of the subject," and with the unanimous concurrence of the other judges condemned this dangerous and unconstitutional practice. See May, Const. Hist. of England; 5 Co. 91; 2 Wils. 151, 275; 10 Johns. 263; 11 id. 500; Cooley, Const. Lim. 369. Such warrants were declared illegal and void for uncertainty by a vote of the house of commons. Com. Jour. 22, April, 1766; Whart. Law Dict.

A writ of assistance.

The issuing of these was one of the causes of the American republic. They were a species of general warrant, being directed to "all and singular justices, sheriffs, constables and all other officers and subjects," empowering them to enter and search any house for uncustomed goods, and to command all to assist them. These writs were perpetual, there being no return to them. They were not executed, owing to the eloquent argument of Otis before the supreme court of Massachusetts against their legality. See Tudor, Life of Otis 66; Story, Const. 1901.

GENERAL WARRANTY. See COVENANT OF WARRANTY; WARRANTY.

GENERAL WORDS. Such words of a descriptive character as are used in conveyances in order to convey, not only the specific property described, but also all kinds of easements, privileges, and appurtenances which may possibly belong to the property conveyed. Such words are in general unnecessary; but are properly used when there are any easements or privileges reputed to belong to the property not legally appurtenant to it.

Such words are rendered unnecessary by the English conveyancing act of 1881, under which they are presumed to be included.

See, as to the effect of such words in deeds, 1 Show. 150; 4 M. & S. 423; 1 Ld. Raym. 235, 662; 2 Tyrw. 179; Lofft 398; 4 Mo. 448; in a will; 1 P. Wms. 302; in a lease; 2 Moo. 592; in a release; 3 Mod. 277; 3 Lev. 273; in a covenant; 3 Moo. 703; in a statute; 1 Bla. Com. 88; Cowp. 360; 12 Mod. 166; 2 Co. 46; 1 Ld. Raym. 321.

GENERATIO. The issue or offspring of a mother monastery.

GENERATION. A simple succession of living beings in natural descent; the age or period between one succession and another. It is not equivalent to degree. 107 N. C. 609.

GENS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A union of families, who bore the same name, who were of an ingenuous (free) birth, ingenui, none of whose ancestors had been a slave, and who had suffered no capitis diminutio (reduction from a superior to an inferior condition), of which there were three degrees, maxima, media, minima. The first was the reduction of a free man to the condition of a slave, and was undergone by those who refused or neglected to be registered at the census, who had been condemned to ignominious punishments, who refused to perform military service, or who had been taken prisoners by the enemy, though those of the last class, on recovering their liberty, could be reinstated in their rights of citizenship. The second degree consisted in the reduction of a citizen to the condition of an alien (Latinus or peregrinus), and involved in the case of a Latinus, the loss of the right of legal marriage, but not of acquiring property, and in the case of the peregrinus, the loss of both. The third degree consisted in the change of condition of a pater familias into that of a filius familias, either by adoption or by legitimation.

Gentiles sunt, qui inter se eodem nomine sunt; qui ab ingenuis oriundi sunt; quorum majorum nemo servitutem servivit: qui capite non sunt diminuti. This definition is given by Cicero (Topic 6), after Scævola, the pontifex. But, notwithstanding this high authority, the question as to the organization of the gens is involved in great obscurity and doubt. The definition of Festus is still more vague and unsatisfactory. He says, "Gentilis dicitur et ex eodem genere ortus, et is, qui simili nomine appellatur, ut ait Cincius: Gentiles mihi sunt, qui meo nomine appellantur." Gens and genus are convertible terms; and Cicero defines the latter word, "Genus autem est quod sui similes communione quadam, specie autem differentes, duas aut plures complectitur partes." De Oratore, 1, 42. The gens is that which comprehends two or more particulars, similar to one another by having something in common, but differing in species. From this it may fairly be concluded that the gens or race comprises several families, always of ingenuous birth, resembling each other by their origin, general name,—nomen,—and common sacrifices or sacred rites,—sacra gentilitia (sui similes communione quadam),—but differing from each other by a particular name,—cognomen and agnatio (specie autem differentes). It would seem, however, from the litigation between the Claudii and Marcellii in relation to the inheritance of the son of a freedman, reported by Cicero, that the deceased, whose succession was in controversy, belonging to the gens Claudia, for the foundation of their claim was the gentile rights,—gente; and the Marcellii (plebeians belonging to the same gens) supported their pretensions on the ground that he was the son of their freedman. This fact has been thought by some writers to contradict that part of the definition of Scævola and Cicero where they say, quorum majorum nemo servitutem servivit. And Niebuhr, in a note to his history, concludes that the definition is erroneous; he says, "The claim of the patrician Claudii is at variance with the definition in the Topics, which excludes the posterity of freedmen from the character of gentiles: probably the decision was against the Claudii, and this might be the ground on which Cicero denied the title of gentiles to the descendants of freedmen. I conceive in so doing he must have been mistaken. We know from Cicero himself (de Leg. 11, 22) that no bodies or ashes were allowed to be placed in the common sepulchre unless they belonged to such as shared in the gens and its sacred rites; and several freedmen have been admitted into the sepulchre of the Scipios." But in another place he says, "The division into houses was so essential to the patrician order that the appropriate ancient term to designate that order was a circumlocution,—the patrician gentes; but the instance just mentioned shows beyond the reach of a doubt that such a gens did not consist of patricians alone. The Claudian contained the Marcellii, who were plebeians, equal to the Appii in the splendor of the honors they attained to, and incomparably more useful to the commonwealth; such plebeian families must evidently have arisen from marriages of disparagement, contracted before there was any right of intermarriage between the orders. But the Claudian house had also a very large number of insignificant persons who bore its name,—such as the M. Claudius who disputed the freedom of Virginia; nay, according to an opinion of earlier times, as the very case in Cicero proves, it contained the freedmen and their descendants. Thus, among the Gaels, the clan of the Campbells was formed by the nobles and their vassals: if we apply the Roman phrase to them, the former had the clan, the latter only belonged to it." It is obvious that, if what is said in the concluding part of the passage last quoted be correct, the definition of Scævola and Cicero is perfectly consistent with the theory of Niebuhr himself; for the definition, of course, refers to the original stock of the gens, and not to such as might be attached to it or stand in a certain legal relation towards it. In Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, edited by that accomplished classical scholar, Professor Anthony, the same distinction is intimated, though not fully developed, as follows:—"But it must be observed, though the descendants of freedmen might have no claim as gentiles, the members of the gens might, as such, have claims against them; and in this sense the descendants of freedmen might be gentiles." This article by George Long is much quoted and contains references to the principal German authorities, and it may be consulted with profit. Hugo, in his history of the Roman Law, vol. 1, p. 83, says, "Those who bore the same name belonged all to the same gens: they were gentiles with regard to each other. Consequently, as the freedmen took the name of their former master, they adhered to his gens, or, in other words, stood in the relation of gentiles to him and his male descendants. Livy refers in express terms to the gens of an enfranchised slave (b. 30, 19), "Tecenæ Hispanæ . . . gentis enuptio;" and the right of inheritance of the son of a freedman was conferred on the ground of civil relationship,—gentile. But there must necessarily have been a great difference between those who were born in the gens and those who had only entered it by adoption, and their descendants; that is to say, between those who formed the original stock of the gens, who were all of patrician origin, and those who had entered the family by their own enfranchisement or that of their ancestors. The former alone were entitled to the rights of the gentiles; and perhaps the appellation itself was confined to them, while the latter were called gentilitii, to designate those against whom the gentiles had certain rights to exercise." In a lecture of Niebuhr on the Roman Gentes, vol. 1, p. 70, he says, "Such an association, consisting of a number of families, from which a person may withdraw, but into which he cannot be admitted at all, or only by being adopted by the whole association, is a gens. It must not be confounded with the family, the members of which are descended from a common ancestor; for the patronymic names of the gentiles are nothing but symbols, and are derived from heroes." Arnold gives the following exposition of the subject:—"The people of Rome were divided into the three tribes of the Ramnenses, Titenses, and Luceres, and each of these tribes was divided into ten curiæ; it would be more correct to say that the union of ten curiæ formed the tribe. For the state grew out of the junction of certain original elements; and these were neither the tribes, nor even the curiæ, but the gentes or houses which made up the curiæ. The first element of the whole system was the gens, or house, a union of several families who were bound together by the joint performance of certain religious rites. Actually, where a system of houses has existed within historical memory, the several families who composed a house were not necessarily related to one another; they were not really cousins more or less distant, all descended from a common ancestor. But there is no reason to doubt that in the original idea of a house the bond of union between its several families was truly sameness of blood; such was likely to be the earliest acknowledged tie, although afterwards, as names are apt to outlive their meaning, an artificial bond may have succeeded to the natural one, and a house, instead of consisting of families of real relations, was made up sometimes of families of strangers, whom it was proposed to bind together by a fictitious tie, in the hope that law and custom and religion might together rival the force of nature." 1 Arnold, Hist. 31. Maine, in his chapter on the origin of property, selects the village community of India as a type of "an organized patriarchal society and an assemblage of co-proprietors" which "ought at once to rivet our attention from its exactly fitting in with the ideas which our studies in the law of persons would lead us to entertain respecting the original condition of property;" Anc. L. 252. After describing it somewhat fully he says: The type with which it should be compared is evidently not the Roman family, but the Roman gens or house. The gens was also a group on the model of a family; it was the family extended by a variety of fictions of which the exact nature was lost in antiquity. In historical times, its leading characteristics were the very two which Elphinstone remarks in the village community. There was always the assumption of a common origin, an assumption sometimes notoriously at variance with fact; and, to repeat the historian's words, "if a family became extinct, its share returned to the common stock." In old Roman Law, unclaimed inheritances escheated to the gentiles. It is further suspected by all who have examined their history that the communities, like the gentes, have been very generally adulterated by the admission of strangers, but the exact mode of absorption cannot now be ascertained; id. 256. Another writer considers that the gens "was something very nearly identical with a Celtic clan, the identity or similarity of name being always supposed to have arisen from relationship, and not from similarity of occupation, as in the case of the Smiths, Taylors, Loriners, etc., of modern Europe. There was this peculiarity, however, about the gens which did not belong to the clan—viz., that it was possible for an individual born in it to cease to belong to it by capitis diminutio, or by adoption (by a family not of the same gens), or adoption as it was called when the person adopted was sui juris." Int. Cyc.

A recognized authority on the civil law refers to the obscurity of this subject in treating of successions. Under the twelve tables there were recognized only (1) sui heredes; (2) agnati; (3) gentiles, and in default of the latter the inheritance lapsed to the state. The praetors called the cognati for the first time to the succession, "probably because" says Sandars (Inst. 290), "at the time of the praetor's legislation there were few families that could boast a descent so pure and accurately known as to satisfy the requisite of gentilitas." He also says in the same connection: "The subject of gentilitas is too obscure, and repays investigation too little, to permit us to enter into it here. Probably the original notion of gentiles was that of members of some pure uncorrupted patrician stock, though not necessarily of the same descent, but bearing the same name, and having the same sacra. Probably, also, freedmen and clients of gentiles were in some degree, considered as themselves gentiles; probably if their property was not claimed by their patron it went to the members of his gens, but they had not any claim on the property of any other gentiles. We know also that there were plebeian gentes, formed probably by the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian before the plebs received the conubium. Members of plebeian gentes would, we may suppose, have the rights of gentilitas towards other members of the same plebeian gens, and it would seem that they had them towards the members of the patrician gens, from which they were an offset; Cic. de Orat. i. 39. Of the mode in which the gentiles took the inheritance, we know nothing of, nor at how late a period of history the gentes were still really in existence. Gaius (iii. 17), treats the subject as one of mere antiquarian interest." In his introduction to the Institutes, Sandars gives generally his understanding of the nature of the gens. The body of Roman citizens was composed of two distinct divisions, the populus and the plebs. The former consisted of three tribes, each of ten curiæ, and each curia was divided into ten decuriæ. For the latter another name was gens, "and it included a great number of distinct families, united by having common sacred rites, and bearing a common name. In theory at least, the members of the same gens were descended from a common ancestor, and the families of the gens were subdivisions of the same ancestral stock, but both individuals and groups were occasionally admitted from outside. A pure unspotted pedigree was claimed by every member of a gens, and there was a theoretical equality among all the members of the whole tribe. The heads of the different families in these gentes met together in a great council, called the council of the curies (comitia curiata). A small body of three hundred, answering in number to the gentes in each of the three tribes, and called the senate, was charged with the office of initiating the more important questions submitted to the great council; and a king, nominated by the senate, but chosen by the curies, presided over the whole body, and was charged with the functions of executive government."

The gentiles inherited from each other in the absence of agnates. The rule of the Twelve Tables is, "Sci adnatos nec escit, gentilis familiam nancitor," which has been paraphrased, "Si agnatus non reit, tum gentilis hæres esto."

GENTLEMAN. In English Law. A person of superior birth.

According to Coke, he is one who bears coat-armour, the grant of which adds gentility to a man's family. The eldest son had no exclusive claim to the degree; for, according to Littleton, "every son is as great a gentleman as the eldest." Co. 2d Inst. 667. Sir Thomas Smith, quoted by Blackstone, 1 Com. 406, says, "As for gentlemen, they are made good cheap in this kingdom; for whosoever studies the laws of the realm, who studies in the universities, who professeth liberal sciences, and (to be short) who can live idly and without manual labor, and will bear the port, charge, and countenance of a gentleman, shall be called master, and be taken for a gentleman." In the United States, this word is unknown to the law. See Pothier, Proc. Crim. sec. 1, App. § 3; 1 C. P. D. 60; 1 Ch. Div. 577; 3 H. & N. 382.

GENTLEWOMAN. An addition formerly appropriate in England to the state or degree of a woman. Co. 2d Inst. 667.

GENTOO LAW. See HINDU LAW.

GENUINE. Not false, fictitious, simulated, spurious, counterfeit. 37 N. Y. 492.

GEORGIA. The name of one of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

It was called after George II., king of Great Britain, under whose reign it was colonized.

George II. granted a charter, dated June 9, 1732, to a company consisting of General James Oglethorpe, Lord Percival, and nineteen others, who planted a colony, in 1733, on the bank of the Savannah river, a short distance from its mouth.

The corporation thus created was authorized, for twenty-one years, to erect courts of judicature for all civil and criminal causes, and to appoint a governor, judges, and other magistrates. The territory was to be held, as of the manor of Hampton Court in Middlesex, in free and common socage, and not in capite.

This charter was to expire by its own limitation in 1733; and under it the colony was governed by trustees, who, on December 19, 1731, in anticipation of the expiration of the charter, offered to surrender it up to the crown. The offer was accepted and on June 23, 1732, the trustees closed their accounts, made their last grant, and affixed the seal to the deed of surrender, and the colony became a royal province, of which the first governor was appointed August 6, and landed October 29, 1734; the colony having in the meantime been governed by the Board of Trade and Plantations.

A state constitution was adopted in 1777, another in 1793, and a third in 1798, which, with some amendments, remained in force until the civil war. The state seceded January 19, 1861, and was readmitted to the Union under act of congress approved July 15, 1870.

The present constitution, as revised, compiled, and amended, was adopted by a convention at Atlanta and ratified by a vote of the people on 5th December, 1877.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in a senate and house of representatives, which together constitute the general assembly.

The senate is composed of forty-four members, elected one from each senatorial district. A senator must be at least twenty-five years old, a citizen of the United States and an inhabitant of the state for four years, and have actually resided one year next before his election within the district for which he is chosen.

The house of representatives is composed of one hundred and seventy-five members, elected three from each of the six largest counties, two from the twenty-six counties having the next largest population, and one from each of the remaining one hundred and five counties. A representative must be at least twenty-one years old, a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the state two years, and have resided in the county for which he is chosen one year immediately preceding the election.

The members of both branches are elected annually, on the first Wednesday in October. The sessions are held biennially, commencing on the first Wednesday in November, and are limited to forty days, unless continued longer by a two-thirds vote in both houses.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER. The Governor is elected biennially by the qualified electors, or, in case no one has a majority, is selected by the general assembly from the two receiving the largest number of votes. He must be thirty years old, have been a citizen of the United States fifteen years, and a citizen of the state six years.

THE JUDICIAL POWER. The supreme court for the correction of errors was organized in 1845. It consists of a chief justice and two associate justices elected by the legislature for six years. This court sits only for the trial and correction of errors in law and equity in cases brought from the superior and city courts. It holds two sessions during the year at Atlanta. The court is required finally to determine each and every case on the docket at the first or second term after the writ of error or appeal is brought.

The superior court consists of sixteen judges, elected for their respective circuits, one for each, by the general assembly, for the term of four years. This court has exclusive jurisdiction in all felonies, in all cases respecting the titles to land, and in cases of divorce. In all other civil cases, it has concurrent jurisdiction with the inferior courts. All the powers of a court of equity are vested exclusively in the superior courts, and the judges of the superior courts have power, by writs of mandamus, prohibition, scire facias, certiorari, and all other necessary writs, not only to carry their own powers fully into effect, but to correct the errors of all inferior judicatories.

An ordinary is elected in each county, by the people, every four years, in whom is vested original jurisdiction over all testates and intestates' estates. An appeal lies to the superior court. This court has no jury.

Justices of the peace are elected by the people, one for every militia district in the state: they hold their office for four years. An appeal lies from the magistrates to the jury of the district, composed of five men. Their civil jurisdiction extends to all suits not exceeding one hundred dollars.

Pleadings are simplified to the last degree. All suits are brought by petition to the court. The petition must contain the plaintiff's charge, allegation, or demand, plainly, fully, and distinctly set forth, and must be signed by the plaintiff or his attorney, and to it the clerk annexes a process, requiring the defendant to appear at the term to which the same is returnable. A copy is served on the defendant by the sheriff. The defendant makes his answer in writing, in which he plainly, fully, and distinctly sets forth the cause of his defence. The case then goes to the jury, without any replication or further proceedings; and the penal code declares that every indictment or accusation of the grand jury shall be deemed sufficiently technical and correct which states the offence in the terms or language of the code, or so plainly that the nature of the offence charged may be easily understood by the jury.

In all civil cases, either party may be examined by commission or upon the stand at the instance of his adversary, both at law and in equity.

No appeal lies in the superior courts from one jury to another, either at law or in equity, but the general assembly may provide by law for an appeal from one jury to another. The jurors are made judges of the law, as well as of the facts, in criminal cases. Divorces are granted upon certain legal grounds, prescribed by statutes, upon the concurrent verdicts of two juries at different terms.

GEREFA. Reeve, which see.

GERMAN. Whole or entire, as respects genealogy or descent: thus "brother-german" denotes one who is brother both by the father's and mother's side; "cousin-german," those in the first and nearest degree, i. e. children of brothers or sisters. Tech. Dict.; 4 M. & G. 56.

GERMANY. An Empire of Europe composed of twenty-six states. The legislative power is vested in two bodies, the bun-desrath, or federal council, and the reichstag. The members of the bundesrath are annually appointed by the several states. The members of the reichstag are elected by ballot by universal suffrage for a period of five years, and may be prorogued for a period not to exceed ninety days, or it may be dissolved by the emperor. In case of dissolution new elections take place within sixty days and the new session must be opened within ninety days. All imperial laws must receive the votes of the majority of both bodies, and have the assent of the emperor. The bundesrath can declare war, make peace, enter into treaties with foreign nations and appoint and receive ambassadors, but if the territory of the empire is attacked, the emperor does not require the consent of the bundesrath to declare war, but can act independently. In connection with the chancellor the bundesrath also exercises some executive functions, through committees which are substantially boards of administration and consultation.

The Code Napoléon was until lately the common German law in many parts of Germany, and the Prussian code of Frederick the Great in other parts. In 1850 a new penal code was promulgated; in 1862 a partial codification was effected; and in 1869 a code of commercial law was enacted which is valid for the North German Confederation. Since 1870 there has been a universal criminal code for the whole empire and a common judiciary was established in 1879. A new civil code was promulgated August 19, 1896, to go into effect, with other special codes, January 1, 1900. See CODE; EXECUTIVE POWER.

GERONTOCOMI. In Civil Law. Officers appointed to manage hospitals for poor old persons. Clef des Lois Rom. Administrateurs.

GERSUME (Sax.). In Old English Law. Expense; reward; compensation; wealth; especially, the consideration or fine of a contract: e. g. et pro hac concessionem dedit nobis prædictus Jordanus 100 sol. sterling de gersume. Old charter, cited Somner, Gavelkind, 177; Tabul. Reg. Ch. 377; 3 Mon. Ang. 720; 3 id. 126. It is also used for a fine or compensation for an offence. 2 Mon. Ang. 973.

GESTATION, UTERO-GESTATION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The time during which a female, who has conceived, carries the embryo or foetus in her uterus.

This directly involves the duration of pregnancy, questions concerning which most frequently arise in cases of contested legitimacy. The descent of property and peerage may be made entirely dependent upon the settlement of this question, as to which see PREGNANCY.

There are some women to whom it is peculiar always to have the normal time of delivery anticipated by two or three weeks. Montgomery, Preg. 264. So, also, there are many cases establishing the fact that the usual period is sometimes exceeded by one, two, or more weeks, the limits of which it is difficult or impossible to determine. Coke seems inclined to adopt a peremptory rule that forty weeks is the longest time allowed by law for gestation. Co. Litt. 123 b. But although the law of some countries prescribes the time from conception within which the child must be born to be legitimate, that of England and America fixes no precise limit, but admits the possibility of the birth's occurring previous or subsequent to the usual time. The following are cases in which this question will be found discussed: 3 Bro. Ch. 349; Gardner Peerage case, Le Marchant Report; Cro. Jac. 686; 7 Hazard, Reg. of Penn. 363; 2 Wh. & Stillé, Med. Jur. § 4; 2 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 264. See PREGNANCY.

GESTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The doing or management of a thing. Negotiorum gestio, the doing voluntarily without authority business of another. L. 20, C. de neg. gest. Gestio negotiorum, one who so interferes with business of another without authority. Gestio pro hærede, behavior as heir; such conduct on the part of the heir as indicates acceptance of the inheritance and makes him liable for ancestor's debts universally: e. g. an entry upon, or assigning, or letting any of the heritable property, releasing any of the heritable property, releasing any of the debtors of the estate, or meddling with the title-deeds or heirship movables, etc. Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 82 et seq.; Stair, Inst. 3. 6. 1.

GEWRITE. In Saxon Law. Deeds or charters; writings. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 10.

GIFT. A voluntary conveyance or transfer of property; that is, one not founded on the consideration of money or blood.

A voluntary, immediate and absolute transfer of property without consideration. 139 Pa. 640.

As used by the old text writers it signified a distinct species of deed, applicable to the creation of an estate tail; while a feoffment was strictly confined to the creation of a fee-simple estate. This use is almost obsolete; Wharton. It has been said that the word denotes rather the motive of the conveyance: so that a feoffment or grant may be called a gift when gratuitous. A gift is of the same nature as a settlement; neither denotes a form of assurance, but the nature of the transaction. Watk. Conv. 199. The operative words of this conveyance are do, or dedi—I give, or I have given. The maker of this instrument is called the donor, and he to whom it is made, the donee, and the entail the gift or donation, the issue taking per formam doni. 2 Bla. Com. 316; Littleton 59; Shepp. Touchst. c. 11; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 12, 81, 211.

Gifts inter vivos are gifts made from one or more persons, without any prospect of immediate death, to one or more others. Gifts causa mortis are gifts made in prospect of death.

Gifts inter vivos have no reference to the future, and go into immediate and absolute effect. Delivery is essential. Without actual possession, the title does not pass. A mere intention or naked promise to give, without some act to pass the property, is not a gift. There may be repentance (the locus penitentie) as long as the gift is incomplete and left imperfect in the mode of making it; 1 Pars. Contr. 245; 7 Johns. 26; but see 79 Ga. 11, where it was held that a donatio inter vivos, as distinguished from a donatio mortis causa, does not require actual delivery; and it is sufficient to complete a gift inter vivos that the conduct of the parties should show that the ownership of the chattels has been changed.

The subject of the gift must be certain; and there must be the mutual consent and concurrent will of both parties. There must be an intention on the part of the donor to make a gift; Thornt. Gifts & Adv. § 70, and expressions of it are admissible as part of the res gestæ; 1 Wils. Ch. 212; 2 Redf. 251, 261, 265; 117 N. Y. 343; and also declarations of the donor prior to the gift; 25 Barb. 33; if followed up by proof of delivery; 29 Ohio St. 13; and subsequent to the gift to support it; 87 Ga. 573; 140 Mass. 157; 169 Ind. 403; but not to disapprove it; 12 Allen 114. See Thornt. Gift §§ 222-232. Acceptance is also necessary; 58 N. H. 302; 28 Md. 327; 107 Mo. 459; and this is true under both the common and civil law; 39 Cal. 120. It must be in the life-time of the donor; 34 La. Ann. 709; but it is presumed if the gift is of value; 24 Tex. 468; 63 Mich. 181. Delivery must be according to the nature of the thing. It must be an actual delivery, so far as the subject is capable of delivery. If the thing be not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it; something sufficient to work an immediate change in the dominion of the property; 45 Mo. App. 160. The donor must part not only with the possession, but with the dominion. If the thing given be a chose in action, the law requires an assignment or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be executed; 1 Swanst. 436; 1 Dev. 309. Delivery first and gift afterwards of a chattel capable of delivery, is as effectual as gift first and delivery afterwards; 64 Law T. 645. The presumption of a resulting trust in favor of the donor arises where a conveyance has been made, without consideration, to one of an estate or other property which has been purchased with the money of another; but this presumption is rebutted where the purchase may fairly be deemed to be made for another from motives of natural love and affection; 85 Pa. 84; 32 Md. 78. Knowledge by the donee that the gift has been made is not necessary; L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 104. The gift is complete when the legal title has actually vested in the donee; 108 E. C. L. R. 435; and in cases of gifts by husband to wife, or parent to child living at home, the necessity for an actual change of possession does not exist; 61 Pa. 52. Where a father gives money deposited in bank to his infant son, the gift will not be defeated by the failure of the father to deliver to the son the pass book evidencing the gift, the father as natural guardian being the proper custodian of such book during the infancy of the son; 62 Hun 194. The instances here given are merely illustrative of the cases on the subject of the necessity of delivery, the number of which is almost without limit. For a full discussion of the subject, see Thornt. Gifts & Adv. ch. ix., where the cases are collected; 15 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 701, n.; 15 Va. L. J. 737; 32 Cent. L. J. 11; 25 Ir. L. T. 4, 409. As to what circumstances will dispense with actual physical delivery, see 9 id. 639; 26 Am. L. Reg. 587; Law Q. Rev. 446; see also DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA, with respect to delivery, the requisites of which in the two classes of gifts are the same; Thornt. Gifts § 130; 1 Nott & McC. 237; 2 Sandf. Ch. 400. "Gifts inter vivos and gifts causa mortis differ in nothing, except that the latter are made in expectation of death, become effectual only upon the death of the donor, and may be revoked. Otherwise, the same principles apply to each." 46 Me. 48; 3 Del. Ch. 51; 89 Mo. 546; 80 N. Y. 422; 78 Ky. 572; 54 Md. 175. A parol gift of land is valid when possession is taken and valuable improvements are made thereunder; 83 Tex. 563.

When the gift is perfect it is then irrevocable, unless it is prejudicial to creditors or the donor was under a legal incapacity or was circumvented by fraud; except in case of donatio mortis causa (q. v.), as to which one of the distinguishing characteristics is that it is revocable during the donor's life.

If a man, intending to give a jewel to another, say to him, Here I give you my ring with the ruby in it, etc., and with his own hand delivers it to the party, this will be a good gift notwithstanding the ring bear any other jewel, being delivered by the party himself to the person to whom given; Bacon, Max. 87. See 66 Hun 632.

Where a father bought a ticket in a lottery, which he declared he gave to his infant daughter E., and wrote her name upon it, and after the ticket had drawn a prize he declared that he had given the ticket to his child E., and that the prize money was hers, this was held sufficient for a jury to infer all the formality requisite to a valid gift, and that the title in the money was complete and vested in E. See 10 Johns. 293. Where notes are endorsed by the owner, placed in a pocketbook, and the packet marked with the name of the donees, a delivery to one of the donees is sufficient, though he at once returns the packet to the donor to keep for the present; 51 Mo. App. 237.

A certificate of deposit may be the subject of gift, and, when endorsed and delivered for such purpose, the gift is perfect and cannot be revoked by the donor before the money is collected; 97 Ala. 700. A written assignment, under seal, of money in the hands of a third person, delivered to the assignee, constitutes a valid gift and acceptance of the money; 141 N. Y. 179.

See two papers containing an extended examination and discussion of the authorities on the subject of gifts causa mortis of checks and orders published after the title on that subject had gone through the press; 36 Am. L. Reg. 247, 289.

A special act directing a board of supervisors of a city to pay a certain sum as compensation for the improvement of streets to an individual was held to be a gift of public money to an individual, and hence within the inhibition of the constitution and void; 99 Cal. 17.

See, generally, Thornton, Gifts and Advancements, and an elaborate classified list of authorities in the St. Louis Law Library Catalogue. DONATIO INTER VIVOS; DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA; DONATIO.

GIFT ENTERPRISE. A scheme for the division or distribution of certain articles of property, to be determined by chance, amongst those who have taken shares in the scheme; the phrase has attained such a notoriety as to justify courts in taking judicial notice of what is meant and understood; 81 Ind. 17; 106 Mass. 422. See LOTTERY.

GIFTOMAN. In Swedish Law. He who has a right to dispose of a woman in marriage.

The right is vested in the father, if living; if dead, in the mother. They may nominate a person in their place; but for want of such nomination the brothers-german, and for want of them the consanguine brothers, and in default of the latter the uterine brothers, have the right; but they are bound to consult the paternal or maternal grandfather. Swed. Code, Marriage, c. 1.

GILDA MERCATORIA (L. Lat.). A mercantile meeting.

If the king once grants to a set of men to have gilda mercatoria, mercantile meeting assembly, this is alone sufficient to incorporate and establish them forever. 1 Bla. Com. 473. A company of merchants incorporated. Stat. Will. Reg. Scot. c. 35; Leg. Burgorum Scot. c. 99; Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; 8 Co. 125 a; 2 Ld. Raym. 1134.

GILDO. In Saxon Law. Members of a gild or decennary. Oftener spelled congildo. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss. Geldum.

GILL. A measure of capacity, equal to one-fourth of a pint. See MEASURE.

GIRANTEM. An Italian word which signifies the drawer. It is derived from girare, to draw, in the same manner as the English verb to murder is transformed into murdrare in our old indictments. Hall, Mar. Loans 183, n.

GIRTH. A girth, or yard, is a measure of length. The word is of Saxon origin, taken from the circumference of the human body. Girth is contracted from girdeth, and signifies as much as girdle. See ELL.

GIRTH AND SANCTUARY. In Scotch Law. A refuge or place of safety given to those who had slain a man in heat of passion (chaude medley) and unpremeditatedly. Abolished at the Reformation. 1 Hume 235; 1 Ross, Lect. 331.

GIST (sometimes, also, spelled git).

In Pleading. The essential ground or object of the action in point of law, without which there would be no cause of action. Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 12; 19 Vt. 102. The cause for which an action will lie; the ground or foundation of a suit, without which it would not be maintainable; the essential ground or object of a suit, without which there is not a cause of action. 101 Ill. 394. In stating the substance or gist of the action, everything must be averred which is necessary to be proved at the trial. The moving cause of the plaintiff's bringing the action, and the matter for which he recovers the principal satisfaction, is frequently entirely collateral to the gist of the action. Thus, where a father sues the defendant for a trespass for the seduction of his daughter, the gist of the action is the trespass and the loss of his daughter's services; but the collateral cause is the injury done to his feelings, for which the principal damages are given. See 1 Viner, Abr. 598; Tayl. Ev. 334; Bac., Abr. Pleas, B.; Doctr. Plac. 85; DAMAGES.

GIVE. A term used in deeds of conveyance. At common law, it implied a covenant for quiet enjoyment; 2 Hill. R. P. 366. So in Kentucky; 1 Pirtle, Dig. 211. In Maryland and Alabama it is doubtful; 7 G. & J. 311; 5 Ala. N. S. 555. In Ohio, in conveyance of freehold, it implies warranty for the grantor's life; 2 Hill. R. P. 366. In Maine it implies a covenant; 6 Me. 227; 23 id. 219. In New York it does not, by statute. See 14 Wend. 39. It does not imply a covenant in North Carolina; 1 Murph. 343; nor in England, by statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 4. See COVENANT; GIFT.

The word give, in a statute providing that no person shall give away any intoxicating liquors, etc., does not apply to giving such liquor at private dwellings, etc., unless given to a habitual drunkard, or unless such dwelling, etc., becomes a place of public resort. 144 U. S. 323. See LIQUOR LAWS.

GIVER. He who makes a gift. By his gift, the giver always impliedly agrees with the donee that he will not revoke the gift.

GIVING IN PAYMENT. In Louisiana. A term which signifies that a debtor, instead of paying a debt he owes in money, satisfies his creditor by giving in payment a movable or immovable. See DATION EN PAIEMENT.

GIVING TIME. An agreement by which a creditor gives his debtor a delay or time in paying his debt beyond that contained in the original agreement. When other persons are responsible to him, either as drawer, indorser, or surety, if such time be given without the consent of the latter, it discharges them from responsibility to him; and the same effect follows if time is given to one of the joint makers of a note; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 299. See SURETYSHIP; GUARANTY.

GLADIUS (Lat.). In old Latin authors, and in the Norman laws, this word was used to signify supreme jurisdiction: jus gladii.

GLEANING. The act of gathering such grain in a field where it grew, as may have been left by the reapers after the sheaves were gathered.

There is a custom in England, it is said, by which the poor are allowed to enter and glean upon another's land after harvest, without being guilty of a trespass; 3 Bla. Com. 212. But it has been decided that the community are not entitled to claim this privilege as a right; 1 H. Bla. 51. In the United States, it is believed, no such right exists. It seems to have existed in some parts of France. Merlin, Rép. Glanage. As to whether gleaning would or would not amount to larceny, see Wood. Landl. & T. 242; 2 Russ. Cr. 99. The Jewish law may be found in the 19th chapter of Leviticus, verses 9 and 10. See Ruth ii. 2, 3; Isaiah xxii. 6.

GLEBE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The land which belongs to a church. It is the dowry of the church. Gleba est terra qua consistit dos ecclesiae. 9 Cra. 329.

In Civil Law. The soil of an inheritance. There were serfs of the glebe, called glebæ addicti. Code 11. 47. 7, 21; Nov. 54, c. 1.

GLOSS (Lat. glossa). Interpretation; comment; explanation; remark intended to illustrate a subject,—especially the text of an author. See Webster, Dict.

In Civil Law. Glossæ, or glossemata, were words which needed explanation. Calvinus, Lex. The explanations of such words. Calvinus, Lex. Especially used of the short comments or explanations of the text of the Roman Law, made during the twelfth century by the teachers at the schools of Bologna, etc., who were hence called glossators, of which glosses Accursius made a compilation which possesses great authority, called glossa ordinaria. These glosses were at first written between the lines of the text (glossæ interlineares), afterwards, on the margin, close by and partly under the text (glossæ marginales). Cush. Intr. to Rom. Law 130.

GLOSSATOR. A commentator or annotator of the Roman law. One of the authors of the Gloss.

GLOUCESTER, STATUTE OF. An English statute, passed 6 Edw. I., c. 1, A. D. 1278: so called because it was passed at Gloucester. It was the first statute giving to a successful plaintiff "the costs of his writ purchased." There were other statutes made at Gloucester which do not bear this name. See stat. 2 Rich II.; COSTS.

GO. To issue, as applied to the process of a court. 1 W. Bla. 50; 5 Mod. 421; 18 C. B. 35. Not frequent in modern use.

To be discharged from attendance at court. See GO WITHOUT DAY.

In a statute of descents, to go to is to vest in.

GO BAIL. To become surety in a bail bond.

GO TO PROTEST. Of negotiable paper, to be protested for non-payment or non-acceptance.

GO WITHOUT DAY. Words used to denote that a party is dismissed the court. He is said to go without day, because there is no day appointed for him to appear again, or because the suit is discontinued.

GOAT, GOTE (Law Lat. gota; Germ. gote). A canal or sluice for the passage of water. Charter of Roger, Duke of Basingham, anno 1220, in Tabularis S. Bertini; Du Cange.

A ditch, sluice, or gutter. Cowel, Gote; stat. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5. An engine for draining waters out of the land into the sea, erected and built with doors and percullesses of timber, stone, or brick,—invented first in Lower Germany. Callis, Sewers 66.

GOD AND MY COUNTRY. When a prisoner is arraigned, he is asked, How will you be tried? he answers, By God and my country. This practice arose when the prisoner had the right to choose the mode of trial, namely, by ordeal or by jury, and then he elected by God or by his country, that is, by ordeal or by jury. It is probable that originally it was By God or my country; for the question asked supposes an option in the prisoner, and the answer is meant to assert his innocence by declining neither sort of trial. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 416; Barrington, Stat. 73, note. See ORDEAL; WAGER OF BATTLE.

GOD BOTE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical or church fine imposed upon an offender for crimes and offences committed against God.

GOD'S PENNY. In Old English Law. Money given to bind a bargain; earnest-money. So called because such money was anciently given to God,—that is, to the church and the poor.

"All over western Europe the earnest becomes known as the God's penny or Holy Ghost's penny (denarius Dei). Sometimes we find that it is to be expended in the purchase of tapers for the patron saint of the town, or in works of mercy. Thus the contract is put under divine protection. In the law merchant as stated by Fleta we seem to see God's penny yet afraid, if we may so speak, to proclaim itself as what it really is, namely, a sufficient vestment for a contract of sale. A few years later Edward I. took the step that remained to be taken, and by his Corta Mercatrix, in words which seem to have come from the south of Europe, proclaimed that among merchants the God's penny binds the contract of sale so that neither party may resile from it. At a later day this new rule passed from the law merchant into the common law." 2 Poll. & Maitl. 207. See DENARIUS DEI; EARNEST.

GOING WITNESS. One who is going out of the jurisdiction of the court, although only into a state or country under the same general sovereignty: as, for example, if he is going from one to another of the United States, or, in Great Britain, from England to Scotland. 2 Dick. Ch. 454. See DEPOSITION; WITNESS.

GOLD. Contracts expressly stipulating for payment in gold and silver dollars can only be satisfied by the payment of coined dollars; Bronson v. Rodes, 7 Wall. 229; where it was said: "A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold or silver coins is nothing else than an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight." This case was followed in 7 id. 278; 96 U. S. 619; 162 U. S. 291. In the last case it was said: "This court has held that parties may contract for the payment of an obligation in gold, or any other money or commodity, and it must then be paid in the medium contracted for." It has been pointed out in 29 L. R. A. 593, note, that the rule in Bronson v. Rodes has not been affected in any way by the Legal Tender Cases in 12 Wall. 457. In Trebilcock v. Wilson, 12 Wall. 687, where a note in dollars was made payable in specie, it was held that the designated number of dollars must be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, reversing the supreme court of Iowa, which had held that a tender of greenbacks or United States legal tender notes was sufficient.

In Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, the party was entitled to recover a certain amount in gold coin; it was held that where the party, with the approbation of the court, takes judgment which might be discharged in currency, it should be entered for a sum in currency equivalent to the specified amount of that coin as bullion. A decision of a state court, which holds a tender of legal tender notes as valid in the payment of a contract payable only in specie, will be reviewed by the supreme court of the United States; 12 Wall. 687. The doctrine of the latter court is therefore binding upon all the state courts.

A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold; 4 Colo. 169; a draft for a certain number of gold dollars; 43 N. Y. 209; a note payable "in gold or silver;" 21 Ohio St. 466; a ground rent payable in "gold or silver lawful money of the United States;" 61 Pa. 263; are all enforceable according to their terms. A ground rent payable in "gold or silver money of the United States" must be paid in coin or its equivalent; 61 Pa. 263. In this case Agnew, J., said that the distinction taken in the earlier Pennsylvania cases between contracts for a specific article and contracts for lawful money (coin or currency) had become unimportant since the decision in Bronson v. Rodes. In such cases it is held that payment in currency is to be computed upon the value of gold at the time of payment; 4 Colo. 169. Where rent was payable "in current money of the State of New York equal in value to money of Great Britain," it was held that if payment was made in legal tender notes, the amount paid must equal the value of the stipulated amount of coin; 65 Barb. 392.

Where an act authorized a city to issue negotiable bonds, it was held to authorize the issue of bonds payable in gold coin; 87 Ala. 240; s. c. 4 L. R. A. 742; so of bonds "payable in gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness;" 60 Fed. Rep. 961. To the same effect, 3 Dill. 195; but, contra, of levee bonds which were issued payable "in gold coin," under an act which authorized the levee board to borrow money and issue its bonds therefor; 66 Miss. 298. But this judgment was reversed by the supreme court of the United States (162 U. S. 291), which held: That the inquiry as to the medium in which the bonds were payable raised a federal question and that the bonds were legally saleable in the money of the United States, whatever its description, and not in any particular kind of money, and that they were not void because of a want of power to issue them. Field, J., concurring, said that no transaction of commerce or business, etc., that is not immoral in its character, and which is not in its manifest purpose detrimental to society, can be declared invalid because made payable in gold coin or currency when that is established or recognized by the government.

An injunction will not lie to restrain the issue of municipal bonds payable "in gold or lawful money of the United States, at the option of the holder;" 96 Ga. 312. But where a statute authorized the issue of bonds payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," an issue of bonds payable in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness was held invalid; 29 L. R. A. (Cal.) 512.

In the absence of stipulation in the contract, a right to demand payment in coin will not be implied, although it appear that payment in coin was the only method of payment recognized by law when the contract was entered into and that the parties no doubt expected that payment would be made in coin; 22 Wall. 105. So when the consideration in a note was a loan of gold and silver and there was no stipulation to pay in such money; 25 Cal. 502.

An insurance company in an action against an agent who had collected premiums in gold; 104 Mass. 192; and a hotel guest in an action against an innkeeper to recover for gold coin left at the inn for safe keeping; 46 N. Y. 291, are entitled to judgment in gold coin. In an action against an express company for failure to deliver gold coin which it received for transportation, judgment was entered in currency notes for the amount of the gold coin with the premium on gold added with interest from the date of demand; 98 Mass. 550. Where a person deposited both coin and treasury notes in a bank in 1861, it was held that the bank need not pay him in coin unless there was an express agreement to that effect; 5 Wall. 663.

GOLDSMITH'S NOTES. In English Law. Banker's notes: so called because the trades of banker and goldsmith were originally joined. Chitty, Bills 423.

GOOD AND LAWFUL MEN. Those qualified to serve on juries; that is, those of full age, citizens, not infamous or non compos mentis; and they must be resident in the county where the venue is laid. Bacon, Abr. Juries (A); Cro. Eliz. 654; Co. 31 Inst. 30; 2 Rolle 82; Cam. & N. 38.

GOOD AND VALID. Legally firm: e. g. a good title. Adequate; responsible: e. g. his security is good for the amount of the debt. Webst. A note satisfies a warranty of it as a "good" note if the makers are able to pay it, and liable to do so on proper legal diligence being used against them. 26 Vt. 406.

GOOD BEHAVIOR. Conduct authorized by law. Surety of good behavior may be demanded from any person who is justly suspected, upon sufficient grounds, of intending to commit a crime or misdemeanor. Surety for good behavior is somewhat similar to surety of the peace, but the recognizance is more easily forfeited, and it ought to be demanded with greater caution; 1 Binn. 98, n; 14 Viner, Abr. 21; Dane, Abr. As to what is a breach of good behavior, see 2 Mart. La. N. S. 683; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 61, s. 6; 1 Chitty, Pr. 676.

See SURETY OF THE PEACE.

A judge holding office for life also holds it during good behavior, dum se bene gesserit.

GOOD CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

GOOD FAITH. An honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even though the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all information or belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious. 2 S. Dak. 334. See 84 Ill. 538; 65 id. 200; 46 Ala. 73; 17 Hun 442.

That honesty of intention and freedom from knowledge, of circumstances which ought to put him on inquiry, which protects a purchaser, holder, or creditor from being implicated in an effort by one with whom he is dealing to defraud some party in interest. 111 U. S. 80. Good faith, in a statute regulating chattel mortgages, and declaring unrecorded mortgages to be invalid as against purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, means such as parted with something of value, or otherwise altered their position irretrievably, on the strength of the apparent ownership, and without notice. Good faith in this connection means actual reliance upon the ownership of the vendor or mortgagor, because without notice of the incumbrance. 21 N. J. Eq. 536.

Good faith is presumed in favor of the holder of negotiable paper; 93 U. S. 94; 94 id. 754; 3 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 360; it is a presumption of law; 116 U. S. 609; and outweighs a presumption of payment; 107 Ind. 442; and such holder takes the paper free from any infirmity in its origin except such as make it void for illegality of consideration or want of capacity in the maker; 141 Mass. 296; 96 U. S. 51. While the presumption of law is sufficient in the absence of evidence, if the good faith of a party is put in issue by his adversary, he has a right to give affirmative evidence of it; 97 U. S. 272; as, where his ownership of negotiable paper is put in issue he may prove he became the owner in good faith; 105 U. S. 728. A person to whom the want of good faith is imputed in a statement shown to have been made by him may be asked if he believed this statement to be correct; 27 N. Y. 282. After proof of circumstances relied on as showing want of good faith by putting a person on inquiry, he may explain them by showing the reasons why he did not pursue the inquiry; 54 N. Y. 288; and after stating the explanation received upon inquiry he may testify that he was satisfied with it; 73 N. Y. 236. Where the knowledge of the third person is in issue proof of general reputation is sometimes competent as tending to show reasonable ground of belief or suspicion; 69 Mass. 594; 6 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 446; 66 Barb. 205. Good faith is not disproved by a forgotten conversation; 29 Hun 214.

One who has purchased for value and without notice, or his transferee, is termed a holder in good faith; 94 U. S. 432.

Trustees and persons acting in a fiduciary capacity are held to the utmost good faith. See TRUST; TRUSTEE; FIDUCIARY.

So long as the parent, in correcting his child, acts in good faith and without malice the criminal law will not interfere with him, however severe and unmerited the punishment, unless it produces permanent injury; Bish. New Cr. L. § 881; 95 N. C. § 88. See FATHER.

GOOD MORAL CHARACTER. The naturalization laws require that in order to be admitted to citizenship the applicant must, during his residence in the United States since his declaration of intention, have "behaved as a man of good moral character"; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2165.

What is a good moral character may vary in some respects in different times and places, but "it would seem that whatever is forbidden by the law of the land ought to be considered for the time being immoral within the purview of this statute"; 5 Sawy. 195. Accordingly a person who commits perjury is not a man of good moral character, and is therefore not entitled to naturalization; id. But a distinction is drawn between acts which are mala in se and those which are mala prohibita; and it is said that a single act of the former grade is sufficient to establish immoral character, but only habitual acts of the latter character; id. It has been held that an alien who lives in a state of polygamy or believes that it may be rightfully practised in defiance of the laws to the contrary, is not a person of good moral character entitled to naturalization; Ex parte Douglass, cited in 2 Bright. Fed. Dig. 25, from 5 West. Jur. 171.

Under the English excise laws it was held that the mere fact that a man lived in a state of concubinage was not such an absence of good character as would justify his conviction under the excise law for making and using a certificate of good character knowing it to be false; 16 C. B. N. s. 584. "Good or bad character does not depend on what a man knows of himself; it means his general reputation in the estimation of his neighbors; . . . the fact of a man's living with a woman without marrying her may possibly admit of some palliating circumstances;" id.

The question what is a good moral character under the Pennsylvania license law of 1887 has recently been considered and passed upon by a divided court, the applicant for renewal having received his license upon stipulation not to apply again. It was held by Sulzberger, J., that the act "is not to be understood as setting up the highest ethical character. It means good moral character as it is used among men in the ordinary business of life, not that high type which ought to form the ideal of every virtuous person." McMichael, J., said: "I cannot consider a citizen of the United States one of good moral character who voluntarily files a stipulation that he will not apply again for the succeeding year before this court, and in violation of that agreement does make an application for a license. . . . But when a man has made a promise last year not to apply for a license this year, and has come into court with an application for a license in violation of that promise, my judgment and my judicial opinion is that he is not a man of good moral character as contemplated by the Act of Assembly." An appeal is now pending and undecided. Appeal of Donoghue. Superior Court, Pa. Oct. 3, 1897.

GOOD REPUTE. An expression synonymous with and meaning only "of good reputation." 18 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 924.

GOOD TITLE. Such a title as a court of chancery would adopt as a sufficient ground for compelling specific performance, and such a title as would be a good answer to an action of ejectment by any claimant. 6 Exch. 873. See 23 Barb. 370.

GOOD WILL. The benefit which arises from the establishment of particular trades or occupations. The advantage or benefit which is acquired by an establishment, beyond the mere value of the capital, stocks, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position, or common celebrity, or reputation for skill or affluence or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances or necessities, or even from ancient partialities, or prejudices. Story, Partn. § 99; 30 Cent. L. J. 155. See 1 Hoffm. 68; 16 Am. Jur. 87; 22 Beav. 84; 60 Pa. 161; 5 Russ. 29; 10 So. Rep. (La.) 616.

The advantages which may inure to the purchaser from holding himself out to the public as succeeding to an enterprise which has been identified in the past with the name and repute of his predecessor. 47 Fed Rep. 465.

"The term good will can hardly be said to have any precise signification. It is generally used to denote the benefit arising from connection and reputation; and its value is what can be got for the chance of being able to keep that connection and improve it. Upon the sale of an established business its good will has a marketable value, whether the business is that of a professional man or of any other person. But it is plain that good will has no meaning except in connection with a continuing business; it may have no value except in connection with a particular house, and it may be so inseparably connected with it as to pass with it, under a will, or deed, without being specially mentioned." Lindl. Partn., Wentworth's ed. 440.

"The good will . . . is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place." Per Eldon, C., in 17 Ves. 335; but this is said to be too narrow a definition by Wood, V. C., who said that the term meant every advantage . . . that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the late business. Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174.

The point of the opinion of Lord Eldon, so much referred to, was that there is no implied covenant or promise on the part of the vendor or assignor of the good will of a business, not to set up the same trade, in opposition to the purchaser, in the neighborhood; accordingly an injunction to prevent him from doing so was refused; 17 Ves. 335; Colly. Partn. 174. Since this case the English decisions, after passing through a period of vacillation, seemed recently to have established the implied contract of one who simply sells the business and good will upon a much more substantial basis. It was held by Lord Romilly in Labouchere v. Dawson that an outgoing partner may not solicit the old customers privately by letter or by a travelling agent if he has sold the good will to his former partners. This went upon the principle that a grantor may not derogate from his grant. This was considered to have gone beyond any previous case and was overruled in Pearson v. Pearson, 27 Ch. D. 145, where Cotton, L. J., said: "It is admitted that a person who has sold the good will of his business may set up a similar business next door and say that he is the person that carried on the old business, yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customers going to the old place." See 74 L. T. 343. Between the rendering of these judgments Jessel, M. R., had enjoined the solicitation of old customers but not the dealing with them; 14 Ch. D. 603; in that case good will is defined as "the formation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold," and is frequently the only thing saleable. This definition was quoted with approval by Lord Herschell in Trego v. Hunt, infra. Another decision of Jessel, M. R., restraining a former partner from dealing with old customers was reversed by the court of appeal, but the order in this case, restraining the solicitation, was not appealed from; the court said that "to enjoin a man against dealing with people whom he has not solicited is not only to enjoin him, but to enjoin them, for it prevents them from having the liberty which anybody in the country might have of dealing with whom they like;" 15 Ch. D. 306. But the court of appeal, affirming the same judge, held that on the compulsory sale of a good will in bankruptcy proceedings, the bankrupt would not be restrained from solicitation. All the decisions based upon Labouchere v. Dawson were overturned by the case in 27 Ch. D. 145, which was followed by 44 Ch. D. 616. But in the recent case of Trego v. Hunt, [1896] App. Cas. 7, reversing [1895] 1 Ch. 462, the later decisions were overruled and the doctrine of Labouchere v. Dawson, was approved. There the good will remained with the old concern and the outgoing partner who had sold it to his former partner employed a clerk in the firm to keep the names and addresses of the firm's customers so that he might solicit their business on his own account. This the house of lords restrained him from doing. Lord MacNaghten designated the good will as "the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit," the result "of the reputation and connection of the firm which may have been built up by years of honest work or gained by lavish expenditure of money."

The vendor or retiring partner "may not sell the custom and steal away the customers. It is not an honest thing to pocket the price and then to recapture the subject of sale, to decoy it away or call it back before the purchaser has had time to attach it to himself and make it his very own." But "he may do everything that a stranger in the ordinary course of business would be in a position to do. He may set up where he will. He may push his wares as much as he pleases." In the same case it was said by Lord Davy, "that the idea of good will and what is comprised in the sale of business has silently been developed and grown since the days of Lord Eldon."

In this country the expressions of the courts as to what is the precise effect of a sale of good will, without restrictive covenants, vary as much as might be expected from the indefinable nature of the subject. The opinion of Lord Eldon has been, in the main, very closely followed, though often criticised in both countries. Such a sale has been said to carry with it only the probability that the business will continue in the future as in the past; 33 Cal. 620; or the favor which the management has won from the public and the possibility that the customers will continue their patronage; 50 Mich. 401; and commend it to others; 54 id. 215. A recent writer concludes, that it amounts to nothing more than the right to succeed to the business and carry it on as a successor to the old concern; 33 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 217; and a recent federal decision terms it, "those advantages which may inure to the purchaser from holding himself out to the public as succeeding to an enterprise which has been identified in the past with the name and the repute of his predecessors;" 47 Fed. Rep. 467, affirmed 55 id. 895. The principle of Labouchere v. Dawson that the vendor would not be permitted to solicit trade from the customers of the old business was maintained in this country in cases prior to the English decisions; 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 476; 14 Allen 211; 36 Ohio St. 261; nor has he the right to hold himself out as the successor of the old firm or as continuing its business; 60 Pa. 458; 113 Mass. 175; 47 Fed. Rep. 465; affirmed, 55 id. 895; 44 N. H. 335; 3 L. T. N. S. 447; 11 id. 299; but he may set up a similar business; 35 La. Ann. 60; 32 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 551; 143 Mass. 592; 3 Brewst. Pa. 133; 5 Allen 345; 2 Tenn. Ch. 347; 128 N. Y. 650 (but in this case there was no conveyance of the good will in terms). See 129 id. 156. The vendor may bind himself not to engage in the same business within a limited time or distance, by express covenant, which, if reasonable, is valid. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

The question has been much discussed whether good will is an incident of the business, of the premises, or of the person. It has been held to be personal and not local; 21 La. Ann. 391; 25 L. J. N. S. 194; but it is said to be the general rule that the good will is an incident of the premises; 60 Pa. 161; 84 N. Y. 556; 35 La. Ann. 60; where a widow carried on the business of a licensed victualler on leased premises and assigned all her goods, stock in trade, etc., without mentioning the good will, in trust prior to her second marriage, the good will passed by the assignment as an incident to the stock and license, and not to the husband with the premises; 6 Beav. 269. It is said by the United States supreme court, that good will is only an incident, as connected with a going concern, of business having locality or name, and is not susceptible of being disposed of independently; 149 U. S. 436. See 36 Fed. Rep. 722.

As between partners, it has been held that the good will of a partnership trade survives; 5 Ves. 539; but this appears to be doubtful; 15 Ves. 227; and is not in accord with modern authorities; 27 Beav. 446; id. 236; 28 id. 453. A distinction in this respect has been suggested between commercial and professional partnerships; 3 Madd. 79; 2 De G. & J. 626; but see 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 10, where the distinction is said to be untenable. It has been held that the firm name constitutes a part of the good will of a partnership; Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174; 6 Hare 325; contra, 19 How Pr. 14. Where a partner sells out his share in a going concern, he is presumed to include the good will; Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174; see 46 Ill. App. 188; 128 U. S. 514; and he cannot use the firm name in a business of like character carried on by him in the vicinity; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 88; or a name so similar to that of the first as to mislead and draw off business; 54 Mich. 215. When a partnership is dissolved by death, bankruptcy, or otherwise, the good will is an asset of the firm, and should be sold and the proceeds distributed among the partners; 15 Ves. 218; 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 270; Lindl. Partn. Wentworth's ed. 443. On the death of a partner the good will does not go to the survivor, unless by express agreement; 23 Beav. 84; 26 L. J. N. S. 391. It has been held, however, that on the dissolution of a partnership by the death of one of its members, the surviving partners may carry on the same line of business, at the same place, without liability to account to the legal representative of the deceased partner for the good will of the firm, in the absence of their own agreement to the contrary; 37 Neb. 158. The dissolution of the firm during the life time of all the partners gives each of them the right to use the firm name; 34 Beav. 566; contra, 4 Sandf. Ch. 379. See 19 Alb. L. J. 502; 13 Cent. L. J. 161. The good will of a trade or business is a valuable right of property; 38 Cal. 450; 10 Exch. 147; it is an asset of the business; 17 Neb. 137; or of a decedent; 21 La. Ann. 391; but it does not include the use of the name of a deceased person; 8 N. Y. Supp. 652. It may be bequeathed by will; 27 Beav. 446. It may be sold like other personal property; see 3 Mer. 452; 1 J. & W. 589; 1 V. & B. 505; 17 Ves. 346; 2 Madd. 220; 2 B. & Ad. 341; 4 id. 592, 596; 5 Russ. 29; 2 Watts 111; 1 S. & S. 74; 75 Ia. 173; 62 Pa. 81. The right to use a name on a medicine may be assigned to an outgoing partner or to a successor in business, as an incident to its good will; 139 U. S. 540. In the United States the subject of good will has in the original technical sense less relative prominence than in England, but the subject has developed very great importance in connection with the use of trademarks and trade names, which titles see.

A good will may be mortgaged, assigned, or taken in execution, in connection with the business; id.; 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 79; but not if dependent on the ability and skill of the proprietor; 25 Ch. D. 472. The vendor of a business and good will who stipulates against carrying on the business in the same place, may be enjoined from doing so as the agent of another; 88 Me. 357. The purchaser who finds there is no good will is without remedy unless he can show fraudulent representation or suppression of fact by the vendor; 7 Misc. Rep. 484.

The purchaser of a good will and firm name is entitled to receive letters and telegrams addressed to it and to the advantage of business propositions from customers of the old firm contained in them; 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 985.

The measure of damages for the breach of a contract of sale of good will is the loss suffered by the vendee, not the profits made by the vendor; 110 Cal. 150.

GOODS. In Contracts. The term goods is not so wide as chattels, for it applies to inanimate objects, and does not include animals or chattels real, as a lease for years of house or land, which chattels does include. Co. Litt. 118; 1 Russ. 376.

Goods will not include fixtures; 2 Mass. 495; 4 J. B. Moore 73; a subscription for stock; 77 Md. 92; or teams and wagons, notes and accounts due; 55 Ia. 520. In a more limited sense, goods is used for articles of merchandise; 2 Bla. Com. 389. It has been held in Massachusetts that promissory notes were within the term goods in the Statute of Frauds; 3 Metc. Mass. 365; but see 24 N. H. 484; 4 Dudl. 28; so stock or shares of an incorporated company; 20 Pick. 9; 3 H. & J. 38; 15 Conn. 400; so, in some cases, bank notes and coin; 2 Stor. 52; 5 Mas. 537; 12 Wend. 486. The word "goods" is always used to designate wares, commodities, and personal chattels; the word effects is the equivalent of the word movables; 83 Pa. 126.

In Wills. In wills goods is nomen generalissimum, and, if there is nothing to limit it, will comprehend all the personal estate of the testator, as stocks, bonds, notes, money, plate, furniture, etc.; 1 Atk. 180; 1 P. Wms. 267; 1 Bro. C. C. 128; 4 Russ. 370; Wms. Ex. 1014; 1 Rop. Leg. 250; but in general it will be limited by the context of the will; see 2 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 287; 1 Ves. 63; 2 Dall. 142; Sugd. Vend. 493. See 1 Jarm. Wills 751; and the titles BIENS, CHATTELS; FURNITURE.

GOODS AND CHATTELS. In Contracts. A term which includes not only personal property in possession, but choses in action and chattels real, as a lease for years of house or land, or emblements. 12 Co. 1; 1 Atk. 182; Co. Litt. 118; 1 Russ. 376; see 31 Gratt. 131; it includes railroad ties; 39 Minn. 145.

A merchant's stock in trade is "goods and chattels permanently located," provided such goods and chattels are taxable in the city or county where they are so located; 28 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 284.

In Criminal Law. Choses in action, as bank notes, mortgage deeds, and money, do not fall within the technical definition of "goods and chattels." And if described in an indictment as goods and chattels, these words may be rejected as surplusage; 4 Gray 416; 3 Cox, Cr. Cas. 460; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 450; 1 Dears. & B. 426; 2 Zab. 207; 1 Leach 241, 4th ed. 468. See 5 Mas. 537.

In Wills. If unrestrained, these words will pass all personal property; Wms. Ex. 1014 Am. notes. See 1 Jarm. Wills 751; Add. Contr. 31, 201, 912; Beach, Wills 470.

GOODS SOLD AND DELIVERED.

A phrase used to designate the action of assumpsit brought when the sale and delivery of goods furnish the cause.

A sale, delivery, and the value of the goods must be proved. See ASSUMPSIT.

GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE.

A phrase used in the Statute of Frauds. Fixtures do not come within it; 1 Cr. M. & R. 275. Growing crops of potatoes, corn, turnips, and other annual crops, are within it; 8 D. & R. 314; 10 B. & C. 446; 4 M. & W. 347; contra, 2 Taunt. 33. See Addison, Contr. 31; Blackb. § 4, 5; 2 Dana 203; 2 Rawle 161; 5 B. & C. 829; 10 Ad. & E. 753. As to when growing crops are part of the realty and when personal property, see 1 Washb. R. P. 3. A contract for the sale of apples, peaches, and blackberries which might be raised during certain years, are chattels personal and not within the statute; 37 Mo. App. 53. Promissory notes and shares in an incorporated company, and, in some cases, money and bank-notes, have been held within it; see 2 Pars. Contr. 330; and so have a bond and mortgage; 55 N. J. Law 168; 29 Mo. App. 206; the term "merchandise" as used in the revised statutes of the United States includes goods, wares, and chattels of every description capable of being imported; R. S. § 2766. See 109 Mo. 78; GOODS AND CHATTELS.

GORGE. A defile between hills or mountains, that is a narrow throat or outlet from a region of country. 25 Kan. 214.

GOUT. In Medical Jurisprudence. A nutritional disorder associated with an excessive formation of uric acid, and characterized by attacks of acute inflammation of the joints, by the gradual deposit of urate of sodium in and about the joints, and by the occurrence of irregular constitutional symptoms. Osler, Practice of Med.

In case of insurance on lives, when there is warranty of health, it seems that a man subject to the gout is capable of being insured, if he has no sickness at the time to make it an unequal contract; 2 Park, Ins. 650.

GOVERNMENT (Lat. gubernaculum, a rudder. The Romans compared the state to a vessel, and applied the term gubernator, helmsman, to the leader or actual ruler of a state. From the Latin, this word has passed into most of the modern European languages). That institution or aggregate of institutions by which a state makes and carries out those rules of action which are necessary to enable men to live in a social state, or which are imposed upon the people forming a state.

We understand, in modern political science, by state, in its widest sense, an independent society, acknowledging no superior, and by the term government, that institution or aggregate of institutions by which that society makes and carries out those rules of action which are necessary to enable men to live in a social state, or which are imposed upon the people forming that society by those who possess the power or authority of prescribing them. Government is the aggregate of authorities which rule a society. By administration, again, we understand in modern times, and especially in more or less free countries, the aggregate of those persons in whose hands the reins of government are for the time-being (the chief ministers or heads of departments). But the terms state, government, and administration are not always used in their strictness. The government of a state being its most prominent feature, which is most readily perceived, government has frequently been used for state; and the publicists of the last century almost always used the term government, or form of government, when they discussed the different political societies or states. On the other hand, government is often used, to this day, for administration, in the sense in which it has been explained. We shall give in this article a classification of all governments and political societies which have existed and exist to this day.

Governments, or the authorities of societies, are, like societies themselves, grown institutions. See INSTITUTION.

They are never actually created by agreement or compact. Even where portions of government are formed by agreement, as, for instance, when a certain family is called to rule over a country, the contracting parties must previously be conscious of having authority to do so. As society originates with the family, so does authority or government. Nowhere do men exist without authority among them, even though it were but in its mere incipency. Men are forced into this state of things by the fundamental law that with them, and with them alone of all mammals, the period of dependence of the young upon its parents outlasts by many years the period of lactation; so that, during this period of post-lactational dependence, time and opportunity are given for the development of affection and the habit of obedience on the one hand, and of affection and authority on the other, as well as of mutual dependence. The family is a society, and expands into clusters of families, into tribes and larger societies, collecting into communities, always carrying the habit and necessity of authority and mutual support along with them. As men advance, the great and pervading law of mutual dependence shows itself more and more clearly, and acts more and more intensely. Man is eminently a social being, not only as to an instinctive love of aggregation, not only as to material necessity and security, but also as to mental and affectional development, and not only as to a given number of existing beings, or what we will call as to extent, but also as to descent of generation after generation, or, as we may call it, transmission. Society, and its government along with it, are continuous. Government exists and continues among men, and laws have authority for generations which neither made them nor had any direct representation in making them, because the necessity of government—necessary according to the nature of social man and to his wants—is a continuous necessity. But the family is not only the institution from which once, at a distant period, society, authority, government arose. The family increases in importance, distinctness, and intensity of action as man advances, and continues to develop authority, obedience, affection, and social adhesiveness, and thus acts with reference to the state as the feeder acts with reference to the canal; the state originates daily anew in the family.

Although man is an eminently social being, he is also individual, morally, intellectually, and physically; and though his individuality may endure even beyond this life, he is compelled, by his physical condition, to appropriate and to produce, and thus to imprint his individuality upon the material world around, to create property. But man is not only an appropriating and producing, he is also an exchanging being. He always exchanges and always intercommunicates. This constant intertwining of man's individualism and socialism creates mutual claims of protection, rights, the necessity of rules, of laws: in one word, as individuals and as natural members of society, men produce and require government. No society, no cluster of men, no individuals banded together even for a temporary purpose, can exist without some sort of government instantly springing up. Government is natural to men and characteristic. No animals have a government; no authority exists among them; instinct and physical submission alone exist among them. Man alone has laws which ought to be obeyed but may be disobeyed. Expansion, accumulation, development, progress, relapses, disintegration, violence, error, superstition, the necessity of intercommunication, wealth and poverty, peculiar disposition, temperament, configuration of the country, traditional types, pride and avarice, knowledge and ignorance, sagacity of individuals, taste, activity and sluggishness, noble or criminal bias, position, both geographical and chronological,—all that affects numbers of men affects their governments, and an endless variety of governments and political societies has been the consequence; but, whatever form of government may present itself to us, the fundamental idea, however rudely conceived, is always the protection of society and its members, security of property and person, the administration of justice therefor, and the united efforts of society to furnish the means to authority to carry out its objects,—contribution, which, viewed as imposed by authority, is taxation. Those bands of robbers which occasionally have risen in disintegrating societies, as in India, and who merely robbed and devastated, avowing that they did not mean to administer justice or protect the people, form no exception, although the extent of their soldiery and the periodicity of their raids caused them to be called governments. What little of government continued to exist was still the remnant of the communal government of the oppressed hamlets; while the robbers themselves could not exist without a government among themselves.

Aristotle classified governments according to the seat of supreme power, and he has been generally followed down to very recent times. Accordingly, we had Monarchy, that government in which the supreme power is vested in one man, to which was added, at a later period, the idea of hereditaryness. Aristocracy, the government in which the supreme power is vested in the aristoi, which does not mean, in this case, the best, but the excelling ones, the prominent, i. e. by property and influence. Privilege is its characteristic. Its corresponding degenerate government is the Oligarchy (from oligos, little, few), that government in which supreme power is exercised by a few privileged ones, who generally have arrogated the power. Democracy, that government in which supreme power is vested in the people at large. Equality is one of its characteristics. Its degenerate correspondent is the ochlocracy (from ochlos, the rabble), for which at present the barbarous term mobocracy is frequently used.

But this classification was insufficient even at the time of Aristotle, when, for instance, theocracies existed; nor is the seat of supreme power the only characteristic, nor, in all respects, by any means the chief characteristic. A royal government, for instance, may be less absolute than a republican government. In order to group together the governments and political societies which have existed and are still existing, with philosophical discrimination, we must pay attention to the chief-power-holder (whether he be one or whether there are many), to the pervading spirit of the administration or wielding of the power, to the characteristics of the society or the influencing interests of the same, to the limitation or entirety of public power, to the peculiar relations of the citizen to the state. Indeed, every principle, relation, or condition characteristically influencing or shaping society or government in particular may furnish us with a proper division. We propose, then, the following

Grouping of Political Societies and Governments.

I. According to the supreme power-holder or the placing of supreme power, whether really or nominally so.

The power-holder may be one, a few, many, or all; and we have, accordingly:

A. Principalities, that is, states the rulers of which are set apart from the ruled, or inherently differ from the ruled, as in the case of the theocracy.

1. Monarchy.

- a. Patriarchy.
- b. Chieftain government (as our Indians).
- c. Sacerdotal monarchy (as the States of the Church; former sovereign bishoprics).
- d. Kingdom, or Principality proper.
- e. Theocracy (Jehovah was the chief magistrate of the Israelitic state).

2. Dyarchy. It exists in Siam, and existed occasionally in the Roman empire; not in Sparta, because Sparta was a republic, although her two hereditary generals were called kings.

B. Republic.

1. Aristocracy.

- a. Aristocracy proper.
 - aa. Aristocracies which are democracies within the body of aristocrats (as former Polish government).
 - bb. Organic internal government (as Venice formerly).
- b. Oligarchy.
- c. Sacerdotal republic, or Hierarchy.
- d. Plutocracy; if, indeed, we adopt this term from antiquity for a government in which it is the principle that the possessors of great wealth constitute the body of aristocrats.

2. Democracy.

- a. Democracy proper.
- b. Ochlocracy (Mob-rule), mob meaning unorganized multitude.

II. According to the unity of public power, or its division and limitation.

A. Unrestricted power, or absolutism.

1. According to the form of government.

- a. Absolute monarchy, or despotism.
- b. Absolute aristocracy (Venice); absolute sacerdotal aristocracy, etc. etc. etc.
- c. Absolute democracy (the government of the Agora, or market democracy).

2. According to the organization of the administration.

- a. Centralized absolutism. Centralism, called bureaucracy when carried on by writing; at least, bureaucracy has very rarely existed, if ever, without centralism.
- b. Provincial (satraps, pashas, proconsuls).

B. According to divisions of public power.

1. Governments in which the three great functions of public power are separate, viz., the legislative, executive, judiciary. If a distinct term contradistinguished to centralism be wanted, we might call these co-operative governments.

2. Governments in which these branches are not strictly separate, as, for instance, in our government, but which are nevertheless not centralized governments; as Republican Rome, Athens, and several modern kingdoms.

C. Institutional government.

1. Institutional government comprehending the whole, or constitutional government.

- a. Deputative government.
- b. Representative government.
 - aa. Bicameral.
 - bb. Unicameral.

2. Local self-government. See V. We do not believe that any substantial self-government can exist without an institutional character and subordinate self-governments. It can exist only under an institutional government (see Lieber's Civil Liberty and Self-Government, under "Institution").

D. Whether the state is the substantive or the means, or whether the principle of socialism or individualism preponderates.

1. Socialism, that state of society in which the socialist principle prevails, or in which government considers itself the substantive; the ancient states absorbing the individual or making citizenship the highest phase of humanity; absolutism of Louis

- XIV. Indeed, all modern absolutism is socialistic.
2. Individualism, that system in which the state remains acknowledged a means, and the individual the substantive; where primary claims, that is, rights, are felt to exist, for the obtaining and protection of which the government is established,—the government, or even society, which must not attempt to absorb the individual. The individual is immortal, and will be of another world; the state is neither.
- III. According to the descent or transfer of supreme power.
- A. Hereditary governments.
- Monarchies.
Aristocracies.
Hierarchies, etc.
- B. Elective.
- Monarchies.
Aristocracies.
Hierarchies.
- C. Hereditary—elective—governments, the rulers of which are chosen from a certain family or tribe.
- D. Governments in which the chief magistrate or monarch has the right to appoint the successor; as occasionally the Roman emperors, the Chinese, the Russian, in theory, Bonaparte when consul for life.
- IV. According to the origin of supreme power, real or theoretical.
- A. According to the primordial character of power.
1. Based on jus divinum.
- a. Monarchies.
- b. Communism, which rests its claims on a jus divinum or extra-political claim of society.
- c. Democracies, when proclaiming that the people, because the people, can do what they list, even against the law; as the Athenians once declared it, and Napoleon III. when he desired to be elected president a second time against the constitution.
2. Based on the sovereignty of the people.
- a. Establishing an institutional government, as with us.
- b. Establishing absolutism (the Bonaparte sovereignty).
- B. Delegated power.
1. Chartered governments.
- a. Chartered city governments.
- b. Chartered companies, as the reform great East India Company.
- c. Proprietary governments.
2. Vice-Royalties; as Egypt, and, formerly, Algiers.
3. Colonial government with constitution and high amount of self-government,—a government of great importance in modern history.
- V. Constitutions. (To avoid too many subdivisions, this subject has been treated here separately. See II.)
- Constitutions, the fundamental laws on which governments rest, and which determine the relation in which the citizen stands to the government, as well as each portion of the government to the whole, and which therefore give feature to the political society, may be:
- A. As to their origin.
1. Accumulative: as the constitutions of England or Republican Rome.
2. Enacted constitutions (generally, but not philosophically, called written constitutions).
- a. Octroyed constitutions (as the French, by Louis XVIII.).
- b. Enacted by the people, as our constitutions. ["We the people charter governments; formerly governments chartered the liberties of the people."]
3. Pacts between two parties, contracts, as Magna Charta, and most charters in the Middle Ages. The medieval rule was that as much freedom was enjoyed as it was possible to conquer,—expugnare in the true sense.
- B. As to extent or uniformity.
1. Broadcast over the land. We may call them national constitutions, popular constitutions, constitutions for the whole state.

2. Special charters. Chartered, accumulated and varying franchises, medieval character.
- (See article Constitution in the Encyclopedia Americana.)
- VI. As to the extent and comprehension of the chief government.
- A. Military governments.
1. Commercial government; one of the first in Asia, and that into which Asiatic society relapses, as the only remaining element, when barbarous conquerors destroy all bonds which can be torn by them.
2. Tribal government.
- a. Stationary.
- b. Nomadic. We mention the nomadic government under the tribal government, because no other government has been nomadic, except the patriarchal government, which indeed is the incipency of the tribal government.
3. City government (that is, city-states; as all free states of antiquity, and as the Hanseatic governments in modern times).
4. Government of the Medieval Orders extending over portions of societies far apart; as the Templars, Teutonic Knights, Knights of St. John, Political societies without necessary territory, although they had always landed property.
5. National states; that is, populous political societies spreading over an extensive and cohesive territory beyond the limits of a city.
- B. Confederacies.
1. As to admission of members, or extension.
- a. Closed, as the Amphictyonic council, Germany.
- b. Open, as ours.
2. As to the federal character, or the character of the members, as states.
- a. Leagues.
- aa. Tribal confederacies; frequently observed in Asia; generally of a loose character.
- bb. City leagues; as the Hanseatic League, the Lombard League.
- cc. Congress of deputies, voting by states and according to instruction; as the Netherlands republic and our Articles of Confederation, Germanic Confederation.
- dd. Present "state system of Europe" (with constant congresses, if we may call this "system," a federative government in its incipency.)
- b. Confederacies proper, with national congress.
- aa. With ecclesiae or democratic congress (Achaean League).
- bb. With representative national congress, as ours.
- C. Mere agglomerations of one ruler.
1. As the early Asiatic monarchies, or Turkey.
2. Several crowns on one head; as Austria, Sweden, Denmark.
- VII. As to the construction of society, the title of property and allegiance.
- A. As to the classes of society.
1. Castes, hereditarily dividing the whole population, according to occupations and privileges. India, ancient Egypt.
2. Special castes.
- a. Government with privileged classes or caste; nobility.
- b. Government with degraded or oppressed caste; slavery.
- c. Governments founded on equality of citizens (the uniform tendency of modern civilization).
- B. As to property and production.
1. Communism.
2. Individualism.
- C. As to allegiance.
1. Plain, direct; as in unitary governments.
2. Varied; as in national confederacies.
3. Graduated or encapsulated; as in the feudal system, or as in the case with the serf.
- D. Governments are occasionally called according to the prevailing interest or classes; as Military states; for instance, Prussia under Frederick II.

 Maritime state.
 Commercial.
 Agricultural.
 Manufacturing.
 Ecclesiastical, etc.

VIII. According to simplicity or complexity, as in all other spheres, we have—

- A. Simple governments (formerly called pure; as pure democracy).
- B. Complex governments, formerly called mixed. All organism is complex.

See STATE; FEDERAL GOVERNMENT; EXECUTIVE POWER; JUDICIAL POWER; LEGISLATIVE POWER; UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, and the titles concerning the several states and countries.

GRACE, DAYS OF. See DAYS OF GRACE.

GRADE. Used in reference to streets: (1) The line of the street's inclination from the horizontal; (2) a part of a street inclined from the horizontal. Cent. Dict. That is, it sometimes signifies the line established to guide future construction, and at other times, the street wrought to the line; 56 Ark. 28.

Grades of crime, in legal parlance, are always spoken of and understood as higher or lower in grade, or degree, according to the measure of punishment attached and meted out on conviction, and the consequences resulting to the party convicted; 61 Barb. 619.

GRADE CROSSING. A place where one highway crosses another: in particular, a place where a railroad is crossed at grade by a public or private road, or by another railroad. The term is most frequently used with reference to the crossing of a public highway by a railroad.

At such a crossing it is the duty of the railroad company to construct and maintain safe and proper crossings; and it is liable for all injuries resulting from a failure to perform this duty; 91 Ind. 119; 42 Ia. 234; 80 Ky. 147; 36 Ohio St. 436; 56 Pa. 280; but the most numerous class of cases relating to grade crossings, arises from accidents to persons who are using the crossing, caused by the operation of trains thereon.

The rule that the roadbed and track of a railroad company are its private property, and that one who gets thereon does so at his own peril, does not apply to a highway crossing; 20 So. Rep. (Fla.) 558. At such a place the company hold its roadbed, subject to the right of the public to cross it; and that circumstance creates mutual rights and obligations. Both parties must use ordinary care in the exercise of their own rights. Theoretically, the rights of the company and a person who intends to cross are equal; practically, the more onerous duty of avoiding danger rests upon the latter, on account of the difficulty in stopping a train in rapid motion. But this fact, on the other hand, imposes upon the railroad company the duty of using every practicable agency consistent with the operation of its trains, to give due warning of their approach; 94 U. S. 165; 72 Ill. 235; 70 Ga. 261; 82 Ind. 435; 79 Ky. 442; 65 Md. 502; 58 N. Y. 451; 65 Pa. 269. Thus, the whistle must be sounded on approaching a crossing; 94 U. S. 161; 109 N. C. 472; 30 Pa. 454; and the better view is that watchmen should be stationed at every much-used crossing; 94 U. S. 161. But this rule is not uniformly held; and some courts have decided that the railroad company, unless required by statute, is under no obligation to give warning; 22 Minn. 165; 114 Mass. 350. This duty is now, however, generally prescribed by statute; and a failure to discharge it is in such a case always evidence of negligence, though not conclusive; 72 N. Y. 26; 34 S. C. 444; 90 Tenn. 144; 24 Ga. 75; 129 Mass. 310; 61 Ia. 452; 65 Ga. 120; 123 N. Y. 496; 125 N. Y. 715; 109 N. C. 472; 64 N. H. 323. As to the duty of the railway in the operation of its line at grade crossings, see Patterson, Ry. Acc. L. §§ 155, 172.

The railroad company is not alone bound to the exercise of care in approaching a crossing. A traveller who intends to cross is also bound to use ordinary prudence, by which is to be understood such as is fairly commensurate with the risk. He must, therefore, look for an approaching train, if he has a fair view of the track; and if his view is obstructed, he must also listen. If he does not do so, and is injured, he cannot recover; but if he does, and is nevertheless injured by the negligence of the company, the latter is liable to him; 110 Ill. 114; 49 Ia. 469; 31 La. Ann. 490; 67 Nev. 100; 143 Ind. 524; 39 Md. 574; 105 Mass. 203; 129 Mass. 410; 46 Minn. 220; 52 Mass. 808; 76 Mo. 138; 42 N. J. L. 180; 58 N. Y. 451; 92 N. Y. 658; 75 N. Y. 437; 24 Ohio St. 419; 73 Pa. 504; 81 id. 274; 6 Heisk. 174; 41 Wis. 44. It is not necessary to leave to the jury whether a prudent man would look and listen before attempting to cross a railroad track. It is the duty of the court to declare that a failure to do so is negligence; 75 Fed. Rep. 644; it is a conclusion of law; 61 Ark. 549; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1019; 14 C. C. A. 555; s. c. 67 Fed. Rep. 591; 54 id. (C. C. A.) 301.

One, who, on approaching a double-track railroad, looked to the north, and seeing no train, concentrated his attention on a switch-engine on the nearer track for a minute and a half, and then, without looking again to the north, started across and was struck by a train coming from that direction on the further track, was held guilty of negligence; 75 Fed. Rep. 644. See 159 U. S. 603; 3 App. D. C. 101; 14 C. C. A. 394; s. c. 67 Fed. Rep. 277. It is held in Pennsylvania that a traveller is required to stop, look, and listen for an approaching train; 73 Pa. 504; 90 Pa. 323; 97 id. 91; 102 id. 425. But this rule does not prevail in other courts, and in a recent Pennsylvania case it is said that without relaxing the rule just stated, "yet when the facts are not clear and simple, and where the existence of contributory negligence depends upon inferences to be drawn from the evidence, the question must go to the jury for decision;" 179 Pa. 227.

There are three very well-recognized exceptions to the rule which requires a traveller to look and listen for approaching trains. These are thus classified in a Rhode Island case; 14 R. I. 102: (1) When the view of the track is obstructed, and hence the injured party, not being able to see, is obliged to act upon his judgment at the time; 94 U. S. 161; 159 id. 603; L. R. 3 C. P. 368; 3 App. Cas. 1155; 57 Me. 117; 118 Mass. 431; 35 Pa. 60; (2) where the injured person is a passenger going to, or alighting from, a train, under the implied invitation and assurance of the company that he may cross the track in safety; L. 104 Mass. 157; 105 Mass. 203; 26 N. J. Eq. 474; 84 N. Y. 241; and (3) when the direct act of some agent of the company has put the person off his guard and induced him to cross the track without precautions; e. g. when the flagman beckons to him to cross; 29 Ia. 55; 10 Allen 368; 29 N. Y. 383. To these may be added cases where the traveller (as might happen to a stranger on a dark night) is ignorant of the nearness of the railroad, and when the driver of a horse, which becomes suddenly frightened, is obliged to choose between the risk of an upset or a collision. See Patterson, Ry. Acc. L. §§ 173-183, where the cases on the subject of contributory negligence at grade-crossings are collected.

It is also the general rule outside of Pennsylvania, that if the company maintains safety-gates at a crossing, which are closed at the approach of a train, a traveller who sees them standing open has the right to presume upon the implied invitation to cross; and may do so without looking and listening; 13 Wall. 270; 81 Cal. 323; 104 Mass. 108; 120 Mass. 257; 115 id. 190; 87 Ill. 401; 30 Minn. 482; 14 Nev. 351, 376; 40 N. J. L. 189; 78 N. Y. 518; 79 N. Y. 72; 24 Ohio St. 654; 48 Wis. 603.

The fact that one's sight or hearing is defective does not exonerate him from the exercise of due care, but rather raises the standard to be observed by him. The employees of the company have a right to presume that his sight and hearing are normal; and he must observe all the added precautions necessary to make him as safe as if his faculties were normal. If he does not, he is guilty of contributory negligence; 23 La. An. 320; 72 Mo. 168; 6 Oreg. 417.

As to the power of the states to require railroad companies to change, alter, or abolish grade crossings, see 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5505; POLICE POWER. As to signals at crossings; 37 Am. Rep. 443; as to care at crossings; 26 id. 207.

See CROSSING; RAILROAD; NEGLIGENCE; HIGHWAY; STREETS.

GRADUATE. One who has taken a degree in a college or university. It is said to be a word of elastic meaning, involving infinite variety in the methods and standards of graduation which may be adopted; 40 La. Ann. 463.

GRADUS (Lat. a step). A measure of space. Vicat, Voc. Jur. A degree of relationship (distantia cognatorum). Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 153; Bract. fol. 134, 374; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 2, § 1, lib. 4, c. 17, § 4.

A step or degree generally; e. g. gradus honorum, degrees of honor. Vicat, Voc. Jur. A pulpit; a year; a generation. Du Cange.

A port; any place where a vessel can be brought to land. Du Cange.

GRAFFER (Fr. greffier, a clerk, or prothonotary). A notary or scrivener. See stat. 5 Hen. VIII. c. 1.

GRAFFIUM. A register; a ledger-book or cartulary of deeds and evidences. 1 Anal. Eccles. Menevensio, apud Angl. Sacr. 653.

GRAFIO. A baron, inferior to a count. 1 Marten, Anecd. Collect. 13. A fiscal judge. An advocate. Gregor. Turon, l. 1, de Mirac. c. 33; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel. For various derivations, see Du Cange.

GRAFT. In Equity. A term used to designate the right of a mortgagee in premises to which the mortgagor at the time of making the mortgage had an imperfect title, but afterwards obtained a good title. In this case the new title is considered a graft into the old stock, enuring to the benefit of the mortgagee, and arising in consideration of the former title; 1 Ball & B. 40, 46, 57; 1 Pow. Mort. 190. See 9 Mass. 34. "It is well settled that when a mortgage of land is made, purporting to convey the land in fee, any title afterward acquired by the mortgagor will feed the mortgage and enure to the benefit of the mortgagee." 1 Pingree, Mort. § 304; 76 Am. Dec. 449; 57 Cal. 507; 67 id. 275. And this is so where the title was in the government when the mortgage was made and a patent afterwards issued to the mortgagor; 1 Pingree, Mort. § 304; 71 Wis. 279. See 4 Wall. 232; 21 How. 228. But it is the prevailing doctrine that in the absence of statutory enactment there must be a covenant of warranty or something tantamount to it, to give this effect to the mortgage; 86 Mich. 382; 90 Ala. 178; 47 Ark. 111. See 1 Pingree, Mort. §§ 696-706. The purchase of a paramount title by a purchaser from the mortgagor does not inure to the benefit of the mortgagee; id. § 1012; and in some cases the mortgagee may be estopped to assert the after-acquired title of the mortgagor against an innocent purchaser; id.; 52 Pa. 359. The same principle has obtained by legislative enactment in Louisiana. If a person contracting an obligation towards another, says the Civil Code, art. 3271, grants a mortgage on property of which he is not then the owner, this mortgage shall be valid if the debtor should ever require the ownership of the property, by whatever right. This principle is also adopted by statute in other states, as Arkansas; Mansf. Dig. § 642; and California; Civ. Code § 2930. See MORTGAGE.

GRAIN. The twenty-fourth part of a pennyweight.

For scientific purposes the grain only is used, and sets of weights are constructed in decimal progression, from ten thousand grains to one-hundredth of a grain.

Wheat, rye, barley, or Indian corn sown in the ground. It may include millet and oats; 34 Ga. 455; 29 N. J. L. 357; flaxseed; 55 Ia. 323; peas; 2 Strobh. 474; sugar cane seed; 34 Ga. 455. See AWAY-GOING CROP.

GRAINAGE. In English Law. The name of an ancient duty collected in London, consisting of one-twentieth part of the salt imported into that city.

GRAMME. The French unit of weight. The gramme is the weight of a cubic centimetre of distilled water at the temperature of 4° C. It is equal to 15.4341 grains troy, or 5.6481 drachms avoirdupois.

GRAND ASSIZE. An extraordinary trial by jury, instituted by Henry II., by way of alternative offered to the choice of the tenant or defendant in a writ of right, instead of the barbarous custom of trial by battle. For this purpose a writ de magna assiza eliganda was directed to the sheriff to return four knights, who were to choose twelve other knights to be joined with themselves; and these sixteen formed the grand assize, or great jury, to try the right between the parties; 3 Bla. Com. 351. Abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV. c. 42.

A later work says: "It is abundantly clear that, whatever may have been the practice at a later time, the grand assize was a body of twelve, not of sixteen, knights; in other words, the four electors took no part in the verdict." 2 Poll. & Maitl. 618, n. 3.

Although the jury were theoretically to speak only about matter of fact, the principle was long latent and tacit. "The recognitors in a grand assize were called upon to say whether the demandant had greater right than the tenant, and in so doing they had an opportunity of giving effect of law. . . . We must not suppose that in such a case they followed the ruling of the justices;" id. 627.

The assize of novel disseisin, the requirement of a royal writ to compel a man to answer for his free tenement, and the grand assize, are considered by the writers last quoted, to have been fashioned at the same time to uphold three principles founded upon the idea of the sacredness of a freehold and intended to assure the royal protection of possession. "No one is to be disseised of his free tenement unjustly and without a judgment, . . . (nor) even by a judgment unless he has been summoned to answer by a royal writ; no one is to be forced to defend his seisin of a free tenement by battle. The ordinance that instituted the grand assize was a one-sided measure, a protection of possessors. The claimant had to offer battle; the possessor, if he pleased, might refuse battle and put himself upon the grand assize;" 1 id. 126. As to its place in the history of possessory actions. See 2 id. 62.

GRAND BILL OF SALE. In English Law. The name of an instrument used for the transfer of a ship while she is at sea. 7 Mart. La. 318; 3 Kent. 133. See BILL OF SALE.

GRAND CAPE. In English Law. A writ judicial which lieth when a man has brought a præcipe quod reddat, of a thing that toucheth plea of lands, and the tenant makes default on the day given him in the writ original, then this writ shall go for the king, to take the land into the king's hands, and if he comes not at the day given him by the grand cape, he has lost his lands. Old N. B. fol. 161, 162; Regist. Judic. fol. 2 b; Brac. lib. 5, tr. 3, cap. 1, nu. 4, 5, 6. So called because its Latin form began with the word cape, "take thou," and because it had more words than the petit cape, or because petit cape summons to answer for default only. Petit cape issues after appearance to the original writ, grand magnum cape before. These writs have long been abolished. In Glanvill's day three successive summons preceded the cape. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 590.

GRAND COUTUMIER. Two collections of laws bore this title. One, also called the Coutumier of France, is a collection of the customs, usages, and forms of practice which had been used from time immemorial in France; the other, called the Coutumier de Normandie (which indeed, with some alterations, made a part of the former), was composed, about the fourteenth of Henry III., A. D. 1229, and is a collection of the Norman laws, not as they stood at the conquest of England by William the Conqueror, but some time afterwards, and contains many provisions probably borrowed from the old English or Saxon laws. Hale, Hist. Com. Law c. 6. The work was reprinted in 1881 with notes by William L. De Gruchy. The Channel Islands are still for the most part governed by the ducal customs of Normandy; 1 Steph. Com. 100.

GRAND DAYS. In English Practice. Those days in the term which are solemnly kept in the inns of court and chancery, viz.: Candlemas-day in Hilary Term, Ascension-day in Easter Term, St. John the Baptist's day in Trinity Term, and All Saints' day in Michaelmas Term, which are dies non juridici, or no days in court, and are set apart for festivity. Jacob, Law Dic.

All this is now altered: the grand days, which are different for each term of court, are those days in each term in which a more splendid dinner than ordinary is provided in the hall; Moz. & W.

GRAND DISTRESS (Lat. magna districtio). An ancient kind of distress, more extensive than the writs of grand and petit cape, extending to all the goods and chattels of the party distrained within the county. T. L.; Cowel. The writ lay in real actions, and was so called on account of its quality and great extent. It lay in two cases, either when the tenant or defendant was attached, and did not appear, but made default; or when the tenant or defendant had once appeared, and afterwards made default. Fleta lib. 2, c. 69; Cowell; Holt-house.

GRAND JURY. In Practice. A body of men, consisting at common law of not less than twelve nor more than twenty-four, respectively returned by the sheriff of every county to every session of the peace, over and terminer, and general gaol delivery, to whom indictments are preferred. 4 Bl. Com. 302; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 310, 311; 1 Jur. Soc. Papers: 31 Fla. 340, 356.

There is reason to believe that this institution existed among the Saxons; Crahb, Eng. Law 35. By the constitution of Clarendon, enacted 10 Hen. II. (A. D. 1164), it is provided that "if such men were suspected whom none wished or dared to accuse, the sheriff, being thereto required by the bishop, should swear twelve men of the neighborhood, or village, to declare the truth" respecting such supposed crime, the jurors being summoned as witnesses or accusers rather than judges. It seems to be pretty certain that this statute either established grand juries, if this institution did not exist before, or reorganized them if they already existed; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 63. But a later work (passing over the question of the relation of the old Frankish inquest to the initiation of criminal proceedings by presentment by indictment) says of the accusing jury of the time of Henry II: "The ancestors of our 'grand jurors' are from the first neither exactly accusers, nor exactly witnesses; they are to give voice to common repute." 2 Poll. & Maitl 639; 1 id. 130; 2 id. 644; and the conclusion reached is, "a great deal yet remained to be done before that process of indictment by a 'grand jury' and trial by a 'petty jury' with which we are all familiar would have been established. The details of this process will never be known until large piles of records have been systematically perused. This task we must leave for the historian of the fourteenth century. Apparently the change was intimately connected with the discontinuance of those cumbrous old eyres which brought 'the whole county' and every hundred and vill in it before the eyes of the justices;" 2 id. 646.

Organization. Where the common law prevails, unmodified by statutory or constitutional provisions, the law requires that twenty-four citizens shall be summoned to attend as grand jurors; but in practice not more than twenty-three are sworn, because of the inconvenience which might arise of having twelve, who are sufficient to find a true bill, opposed to another twelve who might be against it; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 161; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 854; 6 Ad. & El. 236; 2 Caines 98. There is no distinction between the qualification of grand and petit jurors; 35 S. C. 334.

In the United States the number is a matter of local regulation, and while in the main the common-law system has been continued, there is in this country a growing disposition to reduce the number of jurors by statute where it was practicable, and by constitutional provision where that was held to be necessary. It is beyond the present purpose to state in detail all the changes, or to do more than to indicate the existence of a prevailing tendency to simplify the proceedings, which, however, is coupled with a great respect for the grand jury as one of the common-law institutions protected by constitutional guaranty. For the regulations in force at any particular time in the several states, reference should be had to the local law.

The question has been much discussed whether in states having constitutional provisions for indictment by a grand jury a legislative change in the number required to find an indictment at common law is permissible. In several states this question has been answered in the negative where the constitutional provision specified "indictment by grand jury;" at least so far as to forbid a change making less than twelve sufficient to find an indictment; 107 N. C. 913; 31 Fla. 253, 340; 16 Wis. 334. See 25 Ga. 220. But the provision of the federal constitution securing the "due process of law" does not prevent the states from varying the common-law rule as to a grand jury; 85 Va. 702; 13 Col. 155; or even from dispensing with it; 110 U. S. 516. Where the state constitution prescribes a number it is obligatory; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 120; but where the grand jury consisted of less than the required number but as many jurors concurred as were necessary to find an indictment it was sufficient; 56 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 545; and where the requisite number do concur, the fact that the panel was not full, either by reason of the discharge, or improper excusing of one or more members, or any like cause, does not invalidate an indictment; 25 Tex. App. 293, 314; 22 id. 572; 77 Ia. 417; 46 Fed. Rep. 381; 69 Ga. 11; 60 Vt. 142; 89 Ill. 571; 19 Wis. 563; 68 Ala. 92. A discharge of a juror is presumed to be proper; 54 Ark. 611; 4 Ind. 193; but if improper and void it does not affect the legal organization; 19 Tex. App. 95. It will be presumed that a grand jury was legally organized; 34 La. Ann. 216; 3 Colo. 325; and where the court has power to fill up the panel it will be presumed to have been rightly done; 129 Ill. 290. It has been held that when, on calling the grand jury, some of them fail to appear, the court may orally direct the sheriff to fill the vacancy without issuing a precept; 53 Ia. 84, 154; in other states a new venire facias is necessary; 63 Ala. 163; 20 N. J. L. 218. The power to excuse grand jurors confers upon the court, by implication, the power to fill the vacancy; 129 Ind. 290. If more are present than the statute permits the indictment is bad; 34 Miss. 614; 1 Utah 226; 92 Ky. 605; 2 Pears. Pa. 461, 466. A constitutional provision fixing the number of the panel and prescribing how many must concur is held to be self-executing; 18 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 528; 9 Mont. 167.

Constitutional and statutory provision. In Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Oregon, and Colorado, the constitution gives the legislature authority to make laws dispensing with a grand jury in any case. And in Alabama and Mississippi there is provision for other process in criminal cases. In Nebraska, the legislature may provide for holding persons to answer for criminal offences on the information of a public prosecutor. In a majority of the states there is an adherence to twelve as the number required to concur in finding an indictment, although in many of these less than twenty-three may be summoned, the change being in some cases by statute and in others by constitutional provision. Of these states, the required number is thirteen to eighteen in Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee; see 15 Miss. 58; sixteen in Arkansas and Louisiana; see 23 La. Ann. 187; sixteen to twenty-three in Wisconsin; eighteen in South Carolina and Vermont; see 11

Rich. 581; 35 S. C. 344; nineteen in California, but seventeen have been held sufficient; 6 Cal. 214; see 92 Cal. 239; seventeen to twenty-three in Arizona; thirteen to twenty-three in Rhode Island. In Montana, Idaho, and Oregon the number is seven, of whom five must concur; and in Colorado, Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Texas, the number is twelve, of whom nine must concur; in Virginia, it is nine to twelve, of whom seven must concur; in Florida twelve to fifteen, of whom eight must concur; and in Indiana six, of whom five must concur; while in Iowa there is a provision for from five to fifteen according to the population of the county, with a corresponding variation in the number for concurrence. In Utah fifteen were held sufficient; 98 U. S. 145; and see 1 Utah 11. In some cases when twenty-three were required, the provision was held to be directory merely; 2 Cush. 149.

Objections. An objection must be properly made as to time and manner: 140 U. S. 575; 176 Pa. 167; 55 Md. 345; 6 Ohio 435; 67 Mo. 488; 2 Ad. & El. 236; 1 Nev. & P. 187. A person summoned to testify before the grand jury de facto cannot question its organization; 91 Cal. 545. An objection to the competency of a grand juror must be raised before the general issue; 30 Ohio St. 542; s. c. 27 Am. Rep. 478; Whart. Cr. Pl. 350. It has been held that an objection comes too late after the jury has been empanelled and sworn; 9 Mass. 110; 3 Wend. 314; but on this point the authorities are conflicting; see contra, 12 R. I. 492; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 704, n. The proper method of taking objection to the organization of a grand jury is by plea in abatement; 19 Ala. 240; 106 Ind. 386; 13 Ark. 96; 2 Lea 29; and not by demurrer; 2 Stew. 388; 1 Okla. 252; or motion to quash; 73 N. C. 437; 3 Wyo. 140; 6 Black. 248; or motion in arrest of judgment; 5 Ala. 72; or collaterally on habeas corpus; 28 Fla. 371; 87 Wis. 340. A plea in abatement must specify the objection with particularity; 86 Mo. 371; 89 Va. 136; 14 Wis. 394; 15 Ill. 511; 34 Kan. 256; 12 Neb. 61. If a method of objection is prescribed by a statute it must be followed strictly; 96 N. Y. 149; 51 Ala. 18; 33 Tex. 570; 86 Ind. 400; 17 Ohio St. 583.

Federal courts may, on their own motion, enforce other objections to grand jurors than those prescribed by state statute; 69 Fed. Rep. 973.

See an elaborate note upon the organization of grand jury in which are collected the cases relating to defects of every kind in the summoning, organization, and proceedings of grand jury; 27 L. R. A. 776; and one on the qualification of grand jurors; 28 id. 195; as to the number of grand jurors necessary or proper to act and the constitutional and statutory provisions relating thereto in states which have changed the common-law rule, see 27 id. 846; and as to the number necessary to concur in finding an indictment; 28 id. 33.

Proceedings. Being called into the jury-box, they are usually permitted to select a foreman, whom the court appoints; but the court may exercise the right to nominate one for them.

The foreman then takes the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You, A. B., as foreman of this inquest for the body of the —, of —, do swear (or affirm) that you will diligently inquire, and true presentment make of all such articles, matters, and things as shall be given you in charge, or otherwise come to your knowledge, touching the present service; the commonwealth's counsel, your fellows', and your own, you shall keep secret; you shall present no one for envy, hatred, or malice; nor shall you leave any one unpresented for fear, favor, affection, hope of reward or gain, but shall present all things truly, as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding. So help you God." It will be perceived that this oath contains the substance of the duties of the grand jury. The foreman having been sworn or affirmed, the other grand jurors are sworn or affirmed according to this formula:—"You and each of you do swear (or affirm) that the same oath (or affirmation) which your foreman has taken on his part, you and every one of you shall well and truly observe on your part." In Massachusetts it is not necessary to show that those affirming had conscientious scruples about taking the oath; 7 Gray 492; 9 Mass. 107; but in New Jersey it was originally held that it would be necessary to show this or the indictment would be invalid; 6 N. J. L. 405; 9 id. 305; 7 id. 432; but since then by the N. J. Crim. Code § 53, it is provided that objection to the indictment for form or substance shall be by demurrer or motion to quash before the jury are sworn in and not after, and an objection to affirmance not made as so provided will not avail.

On being sworn or affirmed, and having received the charge of the court, the grand jury are organized, and may proceed to transact the business which may be laid before them; 2 Burr. 1088; Bacon, Abr. Juries, A. See 12 Tex. 210. The grand jury constitute a regular body until discharged by the court, or by operation of law, as where they cannot continue, by virtue of an act of assembly, beyond a certain day. But although they have been formally discharged by the court, if they have not separated, they may be called back and fresh bills be submitted to them; 9 C. & P. 43. When properly organized, in some states, it meets and adjourns upon its own motion, and it may lawfully proceed in the performance of its duties whether the court is in session or not, until the final adjournment of the court; 39 Ill. App. 481. In other states it is always discharged from time to time by the court, to which it reports at each session. The grand juries in the federal courts usually meet and adjourn on their own motion.

The jurisdiction of the grand jury is co-extensive with that of the court for which they inquire, both as to the offences triable there and the territory over which such court has jurisdiction.

The mode of doing business. The foreman acts as president, and the jury usually appoint one of their number to perform the duties of secretary. No records are to be kept of the acts of the grand jury, except for their own use, because their proceedings are to be secret. Bills of indictment against offenders are then supplied by the attorney-general, or other officer representing government. See 11 Ind. 473; Hempst. 176; 2 Blatchf. 435. On these bills are indorsed the names of the witnesses by whose testimony they are supported. The jury are also required to make true presentment of all such matters as have otherwise come to their knowledge. These presentments, which are technically so called, are, in practice, usually made at the close of the session of the grand jury, and include offences of which they had personal knowledge: they should name the authors of the offences, with a view to indictment. The witnesses in support of a bill are to be examined in all cases under oath, even when members of the jury itself testify,—as they may do.

When the number required by law (supra) concur in finding a true bill, the foreman must write on the back of the indictment, "A true bill," sign his name as foreman, and date the time of finding. On the contrary, where there is not sufficient evidence to authorize the finding of the bill, the jury return that they are ignorant whether the person accused committed the offence charged in the bill, which is expressed by the foreman indorsing on the bill, "Ignoramus," "Not a true bill," or similar words, signing his name as before, and dating the indorsement. The grand jury cannot find a bill, true for part, and false for part; 1 Russ. Cr., Sharsw. ed. 430.

A grand jury cannot indict without a previous prosecution before a magistrate; except in offences of public notoriety, such as are within their own knowledge, or are given them in charge by the court, or are sent to them by the prosecuting officer of the commonwealth; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 338; 67 Pa. 30.

As to the witnesses, and the power of the jury over them. The jury examine all the witnesses in support of the bill, or enough of them to satisfy themselves of the propriety of putting the accused on trial, but none in favor of the accused. The jury are the sole judges of the credit and confidence to which a witness before them is entitled. It is decided that when a witness, duly summoned, appears before the grand jury, but refuses to be sworn, and behaves in a disrespectful manner towards the jury, they may lawfully require the officer in attendance upon them to take the witness before the court, in order to obtain its aid and direction in the matter; 8 Cush. 338; 14 Ala. N. S. 450. Such a refusal, it seems, is considered a contempt; 14 Ala. N. S. 450; the disobedience of this order of the court constituting the contempt; 17 Colo. 252; but the governor of a state is exempt from the powers of subpœna, and this immunity extends to his official subordinates; 81 Pa. 433. A person having knowledge of a crime has the right to go before the grand jury, and disclose his knowledge, without being summoned; 45 La. Ann. 1164.

As to the competency of evidence before grand jury see 28 L. R. A. 318; and as to the sufficiency of evidence to sustain indictment; id. 324; as to improper influence or interference with a grand jury; id. 367.

Of the secrecy to be observed. This extends to the vote given in any case, to the evidence delivered by witnesses, and to the communications of the jurors to each other. The disclosure of these facts, unless under the sanction of law, would render the imprudent juror who should make them public liable to punishment. Giving intelligence to a defendant that a bill has been found against him, to enable him to escape, is so obviously wrong that no one can for a moment doubt its being criminal. The grand juror who should be guilty of this offence might, upon conviction, be fined and imprisoned. One who stealthily listens to a grand jury while in the performance of their duties commits the offence of eaves-dropping; 3 Head 299. The duration of the secrecy depends upon the particular circumstances of each case; 20 Mo. 326. In a case, for example, where a witness swears to a fact in open court, on the trial, directly in opposition to what he swore before the grand jury, there can be no doubt that the injunction of secrecy, as far as regards this evidence, would be at an end, and the grand jurors might be sworn to testify what this witness swore to in the grand jury's room, in order that the witness might be prosecuted for perjury; 3 Russ. Cr., Sharsw. ed. 520; 4 Me. 439; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 857; 92 Ky. 120; 77 Md. 110; 65 Mass. 137. A member of the grand jury may testify as to how the jury acquired knowledge of an alleged offence; 126 Pa. 531; 157 id. 611; but see contra, 2 Halst. 347; 1 C. & K. 519. It has been held that the foreman of a grand jury may be called as a witness concerning an admission of gaming made by defendant when testifying before the grand jury concerning another offence, since the statute enjoining secrecy as to proceedings before the grand jury is intended only for the protection of the jurors and of the public; 8 Utah 21.

A grand juror is not competent to testify in a civil case as to the statements of a witness before the grand jury; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 138. It is not error to reject evidence of grand jurors disclosing testimony given before the grand jury; 105 Mo. 24. As to grand jurors as witnesses under statutory provisions, see 12 Crim. L. Mag. 583. Statements of the prosecuting officer as to what occurred in the grand jury room are inadmissible; 115 Mo. 480. The fact that a stenographer, at the request of the prosecuting attorney, attended before the grand jury and took the testimony of the witnesses, is no ground for quashing the indictment; 5 Ind. App. 356; the presence of the state's attorney while inquiry is being made by the grand jury is not objectionable; 45 Ill. App. 110; but the presence of a private prosecutor is ground for reversal of a judgment of conviction; 70 Miss. 595.

The privilege given by the fifth amendment to the constitution, that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, extends to a proceeding before a grand jury; 142 U. S. 547. See INDICTMENT; PRESENTMENT; CHARGE; INFORMATION.

GRAND LARCENY. In Criminal Law. By the English law simple larceny was divided into grand and petit: the former was committed by the stealing of property exceeding twelve pence in value; the latter, when the property was of the value of twelve pence or under; Stat. West. 1 (3 Edw. I.), c. 15. This distinction was abolished in England by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, and is recognized in only a few of the United States. Grand larceny was a capital offence, but clergyable unless attended with certain aggravations. Petty larceny was punishable with whipping, "or some such corporal punishment less than death;" and, being a felony, it was subject to forfeiture, whether upon conviction or flight. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 679; LARCENY.

GRAND SERJEANTY. See SERJEANTY.

GRANDCHILDREN. The children of one's children. Sometimes these may claim bequests given in a will to children; though in general they can make no such claim; 6 Co. 16.

The term grandchildren has been held to include great-grandchildren; 2 Eden 194; but contra, 3 Barb. Ch. 488, 505; 3 N. Y. 538.

See CHILD; CONSTRUCTION.

GRANDFATHER. The father of one's father or mother. The father's father is called the paternal grandfather; the mother's father is the maternal grandfather.

GRANDMOTHER. The mother of one's father or mother. The father's mother is called the paternal grandmother; the mother's mother is the maternal grandmother.

GRANGE. A farm furnished with barns, granaries, stables, and all conveniences for husbandry. Co. Litt. 5 a.

A combination, society, or association of farmers for the promotion of the interests of agriculture, by abolishing the restraints and burdens imposed on it by railway and other companies, and by getting rid of the system of middlemen or agents between the producer and the consumer. Encyc. Dic.

The members of such associations are called grangers, from which was derived the name, applied to certain leading cases, of granger cases, which see.

GRANGER CASES. A name applied to six cases decided by the supreme court of the United States in 1876, which are reported in 94 U. S. 113, 155, 165, 179, 180, 181, those most frequently cited being Munn v. Illinois, and C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa. They are so called because they arose out of an agitation commenced by the grangers which resulted in the enactment of statutes for the regulation of the tolls and charges of common carriers, warehousemen, and the proprietors of elevators. The enforcement of these acts was resisted and their constitutionality questioned. The supreme court affirmed the common-law doctrine that private property appropriated by the owner to a public use is thereby subjected to public regulation. They also held that the right of regulation was not restrained by the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution against the taking by the states of private property without due process of law. A text writer, who was at that time a member of the court, says of these cases: "But these decisions left undecided the question how far this legislative power of regulation belonged to the States, and how far it was in the congress of the United States"; Miller, Const. U. S. 397.

As to what are public uses see EMINENT DOMAIN.

GRANT. A generic term applicable to all transfers of real property. 3 Washb. R. P. 181, 353.

A transfer by deed of that which cannot be passed by livery. Wms. R. P. 147, 149.

An act evidenced by letters patent under the great seal, granting something from the king to a subject. Cruise, Dig. tit. 33, 54.

A technical term made use of in deeds of conveyance of lands to import a transfer. 3 Washb. R. P. 378; Devl. Deeds 12; 84 Tex. 107.

"This word is taken largely where anything is granted or passed from one (the grantor) to another (the grantee). And in this sense it doth comprehend feoffment, bargains and sales, gifts, leases, charges, and the like; for he that doth give or sell doth grant also. . . . And so some grants are of the land or soil itself; and some are of some profit to be taken out of, or from the soil, as rent, common, etc.; and some are of goods and chattels; and some are of other things, as authorities, elections, etc."; Shepp. Touchst. 228.

The term grant was anciently and in strictness of usage applied to denote the conveyance of incorporeal rights, and it is the appropriate word for that purpose. Such rights are said to lie in grant, and not in livery; for, existing only in idea, in contemplation of law, they cannot be transferred by livery of possession. Of course at common law, a conveyance in writing was necessary; hence they were said to lie in grant, and to pass by the delivery of the deed. By the act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 2, and also by statute in some states, as New York, Maine, and Massachusetts, all corporeal hereditaments are said to lie in grant as well as in livery. See 40 N. Y. 140; 59 Me. 160. Grant is now therefore both sufficient, and technically proper, as a word of conveyance of a freehold estate, and in the largest sense the term comprehends everything that is granted or passed from one to another, and is now applied to every species of property. But although the proper technical word, its employment is not absolutely necessary, and it has been held that other words indicating an intention to grant will answer the purpose; Wms. R. P. 6th Am. ed. 201; 5 T. R. 124; 5 B. & C. 101. As to the effect of the word grant in conveyances and how far any covenant is implied therefrom see COVENANT.

Grant was one of the usual words in a feoffment; and a grant differed but little from a feoffment except in the subject-matter: for the operative words used in grants are dedi et concessi, "have given and granted." But the simple deed of grant has superseded the ancient feoffment, leases, and releases which were used to convey freehold estates in possession. See, generally, 1 Dav. Conv. 73; 2 id. 76.

The word is also applied in the case of copyholds to indicate the acceptance by the lord of a person as tenant. It is termed an ordinary grant when the tenant is admitted in pursuance of a surrender by the preceding tenant; and voluntary grant when the land is in possession of the lord discharged from all rights of any tenant, or as it is termed "in hand;" in that case the lord regrants the land to the new tenant to be holden by copy of court roll.

A grant of personalty is a method of transferring personal property, distinguished from a gift, which is always gratuitous, by being founded upon some consideration or equivalent. Such grants are divided as to their subject-matter into grants of chattels real, which includes leases, assignments, and surrenders of leases, and grants of chattels personal, which consist of transfer of the right and possession of them whereby one renounces and the other acquires all title and interest therein. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 440, and see also id. notes 1, 2, and 3. Such a grant may be by parol: 3 M. & S. 7; but they are usually by assignment or bill of sale in writing. The proper legal designation of such a grant is an "assignment" or bargain or sale; 2 Steph. Com. 102.

Office grant applies to conveyances made by some officer of the law to effect certain purposes where the owner is either unwilling or unable to execute the requisite deeds to pass the title.

Among the modes of conveyance included under office grant are levies and sales to satisfy execution creditors, sales by order or decree of a court of chancery, sales by order or license of court, sales for non-payment of taxes and the like. See Blackw. Tax Title, passim; 3 Washb. R. P. 208.

Private grant is a grant by the deed of a private person. See DEED.

Public grant is the mode and act of creating a title in an individual to lands which had previously belonged to the government.

The public lands of the United States and of the various states have been to a great extent conveyed by deeds or patents issued in virtue of general laws; but many specific grants have also been made, and were the usual method of transfer during the colonial period. See 3 Washb. R. P. 181; 8 Wheat. 543; 6 Pet. 549; 16 id. 367. See LAND GRANT.

Uninterrupted possession of land for a period of twenty years or upward, has been often held to raise a presumption of a grant from the state; 4 Harr. (Del.) 521; 20 Ga. 467; 4 Dev. & B. L. 241; 6 Pet. 498; 3 Head 432; 85 Tex. 357; 66 Hun 633; 27 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 409.

By the word grant, in a treaty, is meant not only a formal grant, but any concession, warrant, order, or permission to survey, possess, or settle, whether written or parol, express, or presumed from possession. Such a grant may be made by law, as well as by patent pursuant to a law; 12 Pet. 410. See 9 Ad. & E. 532; 5 Mass. 473; 9 Pick. 80; TREATY.

The term grant is applied in Scotland to original disposition of land, as when a lord grants land to his tenants; and to gratuitous deeds; in the latter case the donor is said to grant the deed, an expression unknown in English law; Moz. & W.

The term grant is also applied to the creation or transfer by the government of such rights as pensions, patents, charters, and franchises. See Chit Prerog. 384; and also these several titles.

The word grant is also sometimes used with reference to the allowance of probate, and the issue of letters testamentary, and of administration, as to which see the several titles relating thereto.

GRANT AND DEMISE. In a lease for years these words create an implied warranty of title and a covenant for quiet enjoyment; 92 U. S. 107. See COVENANT.

GRANT, BARGAIN AND SELL. Words used in instruments of conveyance of real estate. See CONSTRUCTION. From these words, in many states, is implied a covenant of seisin. See COVENANT.

GRANTEE. He to whom a grant is made.

GRANTOR. He by whom a grant is made.

GRANTZ. In Old English Law. Grandees or noblemen. Jac. L. Dict.

GRASS. See EMBLEMENTS.

GRASS WEEK. Rogation week. A term anciently used in the inns of court and chancery.

GRASSHEARTH. In Old English Law. The name of an ancient customary service of tenants' doing one day's work for their landlord.

GRASSON, or GRASSUM. A fine paid upon the transfer of a copyhold estate.

GRATIFICATION. A reward given voluntarily for some service or benefit rendered, without being requested so to do, either expressly or by implication.

GRATIS (Lat.). Without reward or consideration.

When a bailee undertakes to perform some act or work gratis, he is answerable for his gross negligence if any loss should be sustained in consequence of it; but a distinction exists between non-feasance and misfeasance,—between a total omission to do an act which one gratuitously promises to do, and a culpable negligence in the execution of it: in the latter case he is responsible, while in the former he would not, in general, be bound to perform his contract ; 4 Johns. 84 ; 5 Term 143 ; 2 Ld. Raym. 913.

An appearance gratis is one entered without service of process.

GRATIS DICTUM (Lat.). A saying not required ; a statement voluntarily made without necessity.

Mere naked assertions, though known to be false, are not the ground of action, as between vendor and vendee. Thus it is not actionable for a vendor of real estate to affirm falsely to the vendee that his estate is worth so much, that he gave so much for it, etc. But fraudulent misrepresentations of particulars in relation to the estate, inducing the buyer to forbear inquiries he would otherwise have made, are not gratis dicta ; 6 Metc. Mass. 246.

GRATUITOUS. Without valuable or legal consideration. A term applied to deeds of conveyance.

In Old English Law. Voluntary ; without force, fear, or favor. Bract. fols. 11, 17.

GRATUITOUS BAILMENT. See BAILMENT.

GRATUITOUS CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One the object of which is for the benefit of the person with whom it is made, without any profit, received or promised, as a consideration for it : as, for example, a gift. It is sometimes called a contract of beneficence. It is the result of a classification of contracts, in relation to the motive for making them, under which they are termed either gratuitous or onerous. A contract is onerous when a party is required by its terms or nature to do or give something as a consideration. Howe, Studies in the Civil Law 107.

GRATUITOUS DEED. One made without consideration. 2 Steph. Com. 47.

GRATUITY. See BONUS ; BOUNTY.

GRAVA. In English Law. A grove ; a small wood ; a coppice or thicket. Co. Litt. 4 b.

A thick wood of high trees. Blount.

GRAVAMEN (Lat.). The grievance complained of ; the substantial cause of the action. See Greenl. Ev. § 66. The part of a charge which weighs most heavily against the accused. In England, the word is specially applied to grievance complained of by the clergy to the archbishop and bishops in convocation ; Phill. Eccl. 1944.

GRAVATIO. An accusation or impeachment. Leg. Ethel. c. 19.

GRAVE. A place where a dead body is interred.

The violation of the grave, by taking up the dead body, or stealing the coffin or grave clothes, is a misdemeanor at common law ; 1 Russ. Cr. 414 ; 6 Sawy. 442 ; and has been made the subject of statutory enactment in some of the states. See 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1188 ; Dears. & B. 169 ; 19 Pick. 304 ; 4 Blackf. 328 ; DEAD BODY.

When a body has once been buried, no one has the right to remove it without the consent of the owner of the grave, or leave of the proper ecclesiastical, municipal, or judicial authority ; 130 Mass. 423 ; 42 Pa. 293.

A singular case, illustrative of this subject, occurred in Louisiana. A son, who inherited a large estate from his mother, buried her with all her jewels, worth two thousand dollars : he then made a sale of all he inherited from his mother for thirty thousand dollars. After this, a thief broke the grave and stole the jewels, which, after his conviction, were left with the clerk of the court, to be delivered to the owner. The son claimed them, and so did the purchaser of the inheritance : it was held that the jewels, although buried with the mother, belonged to the son, and that they passed to the purchaser by a sale of the whole inheritance ; 6 Rob. La. 488. See 23 Ir. L. T. 405 ; CEMETERY ; DEAD BODY.

GRAVIS. Grievous ; great. Ad grave damnum, to the grievous damage. 11 Coke 40.

GRAVIUS. A graf ; a chief magistrate or officer. A term derived from the more ancient "grafio" and used in combination with various other words as an official title in Germany ; as Margravius, Rheingravius, Landgravius, etc. Spel. Gloss.

GRAY'S INN. See INNS OF COURT.

GREAT BODILY INJURY. In an instruction as to the danger one must reasonably have apprehended before he may take life the words "great bodily injury are equivalent to enormous injury," "enormous bodily injury" and "dreadful injury." 47 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 867.

GREAT BRITAIN. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

GREAT CHARTER. See MAGNA CHARTA.

GREAT LAKES. A name commonly used to designate the five great lakes, viz., Superior, Michigan, Huron, Ontario, and Erie.

The open waters of the Great Lakes are "high seas" within the meaning of the Revised Statutes ; 150 U. S. 249. It had been held otherwise in 32 Fed. Rep. 406. The common-law doctrine, as to the dominion, sovereignty, and ownership of lands under tide waters on the borders of the sea applies equally to the lands beneath the navigable waters of the Great Lakes ; 146 U. S. 387. See ADMIRALTY ; LAKE.

GREAT LAW, THE, or "The Body of Laws of the Province of Pennsylvania and Territories thereunto belonging, Past at an Assembly held at Chester, alias Up-land, the 7th day of the tenth month, called December, 1682."

This was the first code of laws established in Pennsylvania, and is justly celebrated for the provision in its first chapter for liberty of conscience. See Linn's Charter and Laws of Pennsylvania (Harrisburg, 1879), pp. 107, 478, etc.

GREAT SEAL. A seal by virtue of which a great part of the royal authority is exercised. The office of the lord chancellor, or lord keeper, is created by the delivery of the great seal into his custody. There is one great seal for all public acts of state which concern the United Kingdom. The seal of the United States, or of a state, used in the execution of commissions and other public documents is usually termed the great seal of the United States, or of the state, as the case may be.

GREAT TITHES. In Ecclesiastical Law. The more valuable tithes: as, corn, hay, and wood. 3 Burn, Eccl. Law 680, 681; 3 Steph. Com. 127. See TITHE.

GREE. Satisfaction for an offence committed or injury done. Cowel.

GREECE. A kingdom of Europe. The present hereditary constitutional monarchy exists under a constitution framed by a national assembly, elected in December, 1863, and adopted October 29, 1864. The king whose title is King of the Hellenes, was elected by National Assembly in March, 1863. The entire legislative power is vested in the Boulé, or chamber of deputies now consisting of two hundred and seven members elected by the people, by ballot, for a term of four years; the number of members varies with the population. There must be an attendance of at least one-half of the members to give legality to the proceedings, and no bill can become law without the consent of an absolute majority of members. The assembly has no power to alter the constitution itself. The chamber of deputies meets, on ordinary occasions, on November 1, of every year. The executive power is vested in the king and the ministers at the head of the following departments, who are responsible for the acts of his majesty: ministry of the interior, finance, justice, education, and ecclesiastical affairs, war, marine, and foreign affairs. There is also a deliberative council of state, whose members are named by the crown, and hold office for two years. There must not be less than fifteen, nor more than twenty-five. To this council must be sent all bills from the chamber of deputies, and returned with observations or amendments within ten days; but this term may be prolonged for fifteen days more. If no report is then made, the deputies may pass the law and send it up to the king. The education of the people is undertaken at the public cost; offices of state and positions of distinction are open to all.

The supreme court of justice is called as in ancient Athens the Areopagus. Besides this, there are four courts of appeal, one in each "monarchy," sixteen courts of first instance in the chief towns, the court of assizes, and one hundred and seventy-five justice-of-the-peace courts. There is a complete code of laws which is substantially the Roman law and the administration of justice is almost identical with the French system. Capital punishment is imposed for certain offences, the guillotine being the instrument of execution. The Greek judges enjoy a well-earned reputation for independence and strict uprightness.

GREEN CLOTH. An English board or court of justice, composed of the lord steward and inferior officers, and held in the royal household; so named from the cloth upon the board at which it was held.

GREEN SILVER. A feudal custom in the manor of Writtel, in Essex, where every tenant whose front door opens to Greenbury shall pay a half-penny yearly to the lord, by the name of "green silver" or "rent." Cowel.

GREEN WAX. In English Law. The name of the estreats of fines, issues, and amercements in the exchequer, delivered to the sheriff under the seal of that court, which is made with green wax.

GREENBACK. This term is the ordinary and almost exclusive name popularly applied to all United States Treasury issues, and is not applied to any other species of money; 23 Ind. 121; but this term alone is not a proper denomination for these notes; 61 Ala. 282. See LEGAL TENDER.

GREENHEW. In Forest Law. The same as Vert. (q. v.). Ternes de la Ley.

GREGFIERS. In French Law. Registrars, or clerks of the courts. They are officials attached to the courts to assist the judges in keeping the minutes, writing out judgments, orders, and other decisions given by the tribunals, and deliver copies thereof to the applicants.

GREGORIAN CODE. See CODE.

GREGORIAN EPOCH. The time from which the Gregorian calendar or computation dates; i. e. from the year 1582.

GREMIO. In Spanish Law. The union of merchants, artisans, laborers, or other persons who follow the same pursuits and are governed by the same regulations. The word guild, in English, has nearly the same signification.

GREMIUM (Lat.). Bosom. Ainsworth, Dict. De gremio mittere, to send from their bosom; used of one sent by an ecclesiastical corporation or body. Alatere mittere, to send from his side, or one sent by an individual: as, a legate sent by the pope. Du Cange. In English law, an inheritance is said to be in gremio legis, in the bosom or under the protection of the law, when it is in abeyance. See IN NUBIBUS.

GRENVILLE ACT. The statute 10 Geo. III. c. 16, by which the jurisdiction over parliamentary election petitions was transferred from the whole house of commons to select committees. Repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 22.

GRESSUME (variously spelled Gressume, Gressum, Grossome; Scotch, grassum).

In Old English Law. A fine due from a copyholder on the death of his lord. Plowd. fol. 271, 285; 1 Stra. 634. Cowel derives it from gersum.

In Scotland. Grassum is a fine paid for the making or renewing of a lease. Paterson.

GRETNA GREEN. A farmsteading near the village of Springfield, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, eight miles northwest of Carlisle. Cent. Dict. The name was afterward applied to the village which became notorious for the celebration of irregular marriages. By the law of Scotland nothing was required to constitute a marriage but the mutual declaration of the parties in the presence of witnesses—a ceremony which could be performed instantly, and it was immaterial whether or not the parties were minors. These conditions afforded an easy method of evading the Marriage Act, 26 Geo. II. c. 33, which required the publication of banns or a license. By act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, § 1, no irregular marriage in Scotland is now valid unless one of the parties had at the date thereof his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage.

GREVA. In old records. The seashore, sand, or beach. 2 Mon. Angl. 625; Cowel.

GREVE. A word of power or authority. Cowel.

GRIEVED. Aggrieved. 3 East 22.

GRITH. Peace; protection. Termes de la Ley.

GRITHBRECH (Sax. grith, peace, and brych, breaking). Breach of the king's peace, as opposed to frithbrech, a breach of the nation's peace with other nations. Leges Hen. I. c. 36; Chart. Willielm, Conq. Eccles. S. Pauli in Hist. ejusd. fol. 90.

GRITHSTOLE. A place of sanctuary. Cowel.

GROCER. In Old English Law. A merchant or trader who engrossed all vendible merchandise; an engrosser (q. v.). St. 37 Edw. III. c. 5.

GROCERIES. Articles of provision; the wares of a grocer; general supplies for table and household use.

Shovels, pails, and buckets have been held not to be groceries, although usually kept in a country grocery shop; 113 Mass. 335. It is a question of fact whether wines and liquors are groceries; 12 Mich. 135. A grocery has been held to be an "offensive trade or calling" within a prohibition of use of a dwelling-house; 101 Mass. 531. Groceries kept as part of the stock, by a merchant, are not "provisions found on hand for family use," within the meaning of an exemption law; 73 Mo. 575. See PROVISIONS.

GROOM OF THE STOLE. In England an officer of the royal household who has charge of the king's wardrobe.

GROOM PORTER. An officer belonging to the royal household. Jacob.

GRONNA. A bog; a deep hollow or pit. Cowel. A deep pit or place where turfs are dug for fuel. Hoved. 438.

GROSS. Absolute, entire. A thing in gross exists in its own right, and not as an appendage to another thing. See IN GROSS.

GROSS ADVENTURE. In Maritime Law. A maritime or bottomry loan. It is so called because the lender exposes his money to the perils of the sea, and contributes to the gross or general average. Pothier; Pardessus, Dr. Com.

GROSS AVERAGE. In Maritime Law. That kind of average which falls on the ship, cargo, and freight, and is distinguished from particular average. See AVERAGE.

GROSS NEGLIGENCE. The omission of that care which even inattentive and thoughtless men never fail to take of their own property. Jones, Bailm.; 23 Conn. 437; 3 Hurlst. & C. 337.

Such as evidences wilfulness; such a gross want of care and regard for the right of others as to justify the presumption of wilfulness or wantonness; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1264, § 52; such as implies a disregard of consequences or a willingness to inflict injury; Deering, Neg. § 29; 139 Ill. 596.

Lata culpa, or, as the Roman lawyers most accurately called it, dolo proxima, is, in practice, considered as equivalent to dolus, or fraud itself. It must not be confounded, however, with fraud; for it may exist consistently with good faith and honesty of intention, according to common-law authorities; 32 Vt. 652; Shearm. & Red. Neg. § 3; Webb, Poll. Torts 538, n.

The distinction between degrees of negligence is not very sharply drawn in the later cases. See BAILMENT; NEGLIGENCE.

The intentional failure to perform a manifest duty, in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another; a thoughtless disregard of consequences without the exertion of any effort to avoid them. 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 775; 87 Mich. 400. It has been held to have no legal significance which imports other than a want of due care; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 80.

GROSS WEIGHT. The total weight of goods or merchandise, with the chests, bags, and the like, from which are to be deducted tare and tret.

GROSSE AVANTURE (Fr.). In French Marine Law. The contract of bottomry. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 5.

GROSSE BOIS. Timber. Cowel.

GROSSEMENT (L. Fr.). Largely; greatly. Grossement enciente or ensient. Big with child; in the last stage of pregnancy. Plowd. 76.

GROSSOME. In Old English Law. A fine paid for a lease. Corrupted from gersum. Plowd. fol. 270, 285; Cowel.

GROUND. Land: soil; earth. See LAND.

It may include an improved town lot; 76 Pa. 378.

GROUND ANNUAL. In Scotch Law. An annual rent of two kinds; first, the feu-duties payable to the lords of erection and their successors; second, the rents reserved for building-lots in a city, where sub-feus are prohibited. This rent is in the nature of a perpetual annuity. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 11. 3. 52.

GROUND LANDLORD. The grantor of an estate on which a ground-rent is reserved.

GROUND OF ACTION. The foundation, basis, or data, upon which a cause of action rests. See 24 Com. 33.

GROUND RENT. A rent reserved to himself and his heirs, by the grantor of land in fee-simple, out of the land conveyed. See 9 Watts 262; 8 W. & S. 185; 2 Am. L. Reg. 577.

In Pennsylvania, it is real estate, and in cases of intestacy goes to the heir; 14 Pa. 444. See 147 id. 319. The interest of the owner of the rent is an estate altogether distinct and of a very different nature from that which the owner of the land has in the land itself. Each is the owner of a fee-simple estate. The one has an estate of inheritance in the rent, and the other has an estate of inheritance in the land out of which the rent issues. The one is an incorporeal inheritance in fee, and the other is a corporeal inheritance in fee; Irwin v. Bank of United States, 1 Pa. 349, per Kennedy, J.; 47 Md. 300. So, the owner of the rent is not liable for any part of the taxes assessed upon the owner of the land out of which the rent issues; 1 Whart. 72; 4 Watts 98. Being real estate, it is bound by a judgment, and may be mortgaged like other real estate. It is a rent-service; 1 Whart. 337.

A ground-rent, being a rent-service, is, of course, subject to all the incidents of such a rent. Thus, it is distrainable of common right, that is, by the common law; Co. Litt. 142 a; 9 Watts 262. So, also, it may be apportioned; 1 Whart. 337; 58 Md. 323; 56 id. 51. And this sometimes takes place by operation of law, as when the owner of the rent purchases part of the land; in which case the rent is apportioned, and extinguished pro tanto; Littleton 222. And the reason of the extinguishment is that a rent-service is given as a return for the possession of the land. Thus, upon the enjoyment of the lands depends the obligation to pay the rent; and if the owner of the rent purchases part of the land, the tenant, no longer enjoying that portion, is not liable to pay rent for it, and so much of the rent as issued out of that portion is, consequently, extinguished. See 2 Bla. Com. 41; 1 Whart. 235, 352; 3 id. 197, 365.

At law, the legal ownership of these two estates—that in the rent and that in the land out of which it issues—can coexist only while they are held by different persons or in different rights; for the moment they unite in one person in the same right, the rent is merged and extinguished; 2 Binn. 142; 6 Whart. 382; 5 Watts 457. But if the one estate or intestate be legal and the other equitable, there is no merger; 6 Whart. 283. In equity, however, this doctrine of merger is subject to very great qualification. A merger is not favored in equity; and the doctrine there is that although in some cases, where the legal estates unite in the same person in the same right, a merger will take place against the intention of the party whose interests are united (see 3 Whart. 421, and cases there cited), yet, as a general rule, the intention, actual or presumed, of such party will govern; and where no intention is expressed, if it appears most for his advantage that a merger should not take place, such will be presumed to have been his intention; and that it is only in cases where it is perfectly indifferent to the party thus interested that, in equity, a merger occurs; 5 Watts 457; 8 id. 146; 4 Whart. 421; 6 id. 283; 1 W. & S. 487.

A ground-rent being a freehold estate, created by deed and perpetual by the terms of its creation, no mere lapse of time without demand of payment raises, at common law, a presumption that the estate has been released; 1 Whart. 229. But this is otherwise in Pennsylvania now, by act of April 27, 1855, sec. 7, P. L. 369, whereby a presumption of a release or extinguishment is created where no payment, claim, or demand is made for the rent, nor any declaration or acknowledgment of its existence made by the owner of the premises subject to the rent, for the period of twenty-one years. This applies to the estate in the rent, and comprehends the future payments. And this act makes no exception in behalf of persons under disability when the title accrues, nor of persons taking as heirs at law or distributees; where a life tenant in ground rent released the same absolutely, as against the remainderman the limitation commenced to run from the date on which the first payment thereafter became due and unpaid, rather than at the death of the life tenant; 152 Pa. 258. It has been held that this act, affecting the remedy merely, is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract; Biddle v. Hooven, 120 Pa. 221. But this case is criticised and the Pennsylvania cases reviewed in 34 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 557. But independently of this act of assembly, arrearages of rent which had fallen due twenty years before commencement of suit might be presumed to have been paid; 1 Whart. 229. These arrearages are a lien upon the land out of which the rent issues; but, as a general rule, the lien is discharged by a judicial sale of the land, and attaches to the fund raised by the sale. See 2 Binn. 146; 3 W. & S. 9; 4 Whart. 516; 2 Watts 378; 1 Pa. 349.

Ground rents in Pennsylvania were formerly made irredeemable, usually after the lapse of a certain period after their creation. But now the creation of such is forbidden by statute. Act of 22 April, 1850. But this does not prohibit the reservation of ground-rents redeemable only on the death of a person in whom a life interest in the rents is vested; 11 W. N. Cas. (Pa.) 11. The Act of April 15, 1869, providing for the extinguishment of irredeemable ground-rents, theretofore created, by legal proceedings instituted by the owner of the land, without the consent of the owner of the ground-rent, was declared unconstitutional; 67 Pa. 479.

As ground-rent deeds are usually drawn, the owner of the rent has three remedies for the recovery of the arrearages, viz., by action (of debt or covenant; but debt is now seldom employed), distress, and (for want of sufficient distress) the right to re-enter and hold the land as of the grantor's former estate. See 2 Am. L. Reg. 577; 3 id. 65; Cadw. Gr. Rents; Mitch. R. P.

GROUNDAGE. In Maritime Law. The consideration paid for standing a ship in a port. Jacob, Law Dict.

GROWING CROPS. Growing crops of grain, potatoes, turnips, and all annual crops raised by the cultivation of man, are in certain cases personal chattels, and in others, part of the realty. A crop is to be considered as growing from the time the seed is put in the ground, at which time the seed is no longer a chattel, but becomes part of the realty, and passes with a sale of it; 69 Ala. 435. If planted by the owner of the land, they are a part of the realty, but may by sale become personal chattels, if they are fit for harvest, and the sale contemplates their being cut and carried off, and not a right in the vendee to enter and cultivate. So even with trees; 4 Metc. Mass. 580; 9 B. & C. 561; 7 N. H. 522; 11 Co. 50. The distinction has been made that growing crops of grain and annual productions raised by cultivation and the industry of man are personal chattels; while trees, fruit, or grass and other natural products of the earth are parcel of the land; 1 Denio 550. But if the owner in fee conveys land before the crop is severed, the crop passes with the land as appertaining to it; 41 Ill. 463; 33 Pa. 254; 9 Rob. (La.) 256; and the same rule applies to foreclosure sales; 8 Wend. 584; 29 Pa. 68; 42 N. Y. 150. See 20 Am. L. Reg. 615, n. But before the foreclosure sale is confirmed, the purchaser has no title, with right to possession in the crops growing on the land at the time of sale, that will entitle him to maintain replevin therefor after they have been severed by the person in possession; 46 Wis. 301. Though growing crops, unless reserved, pass under a conveyance of the land, they are subject to levy and sale the same as other personal property; 47 Minn. 525. If a tenant, who holds for a certain time, plant annual crops, or even trees in a nursery for the purposes of transplantation and sale, they are personal chattels when fit for harvest; 1 Metc.

Mass. 27, 313; 4 Taunt. 316, per Heath, J. If planted by a tenant for an uncertain period, they are regarded, whether mature or not, in many respects as personal property, but liable to become part of the realty if the tenant voluntarily abandons or forfeits possession of the premises; 5 Co. 116 a; 5 Halst. 128; Co. Litt. 55; 2 Johns 418, 421, n. See 2 Dana 206; 2 Rawle 161; 1 Washb. R. P. 3.

See as to validity and effect of mortgages on crops planted and unplanted, MORTGAGE.

Between the lessor of lands and his lessee on shares, growing crops are personal property, and they may be sold by parol as against a subsequent grantee, especially where the latter has notice of such sale; 39 Ill. App. 404. The grantor of farm lands may reserve the growing crops by oral agreement; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 914.

The measure of damages for the destruction of a crop planted, but not yet up, is the rental value of the land and the cost of the seed and labor; but when the crop is somewhat matured, so that the product can be fairly determined, the value thereof when destroyed is the measure of damages; 43 Ill. App. 108. See 56 Ark. 612; 57 id. 512. Where a crop is lost through the wrongful act of another, the measure of damages is the market value of the crop less the cost of producing, harvesting, and marketing it; 8 Wash. 337; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 550. See 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1023.

GROWTH HALFPENNY. A rate paid in some places for the title of every fat beast, ox, or other unfruitful cattle. Clayt. 92.

GRUARII. The principal officers of a forest.

GUADIA. A pledge; a custom. Spel. Gloss; Calv. Lex.

GUARANTEE. He to whom a guaranty is made. Also, to make oneself responsible for the obligation of another.

The guarantee is entitled to receive payment, in the first place, from the debtor, and, secondly, from the guarantor. He must be careful not to give time, beyond that stipulated in the original agreement, to the debtor, without the consent of the guarantor. The guarantee should, at the instance of the guarantor, bring an action against the principal for the recovery of the debt; 2 Johns. Ch. 554; 17 Johns. 384; 8 S. & R. 116; 10 id. 33; 2 Bro. Ch. 579, 582; 2 Ves. 542. But the mere omission of the guarantee to sue the principal debtor will not, in general, discharge the guarantor; 8 S. & R. 112; 6 Binn. 292. See GUARANTEE.

GUARANTOR. He who makes a guaranty.

GUARANTY. An undertaking to answer for another's liability, and collateral thereto. A collateral undertaking to pay the debt of another in case he does not pay it. Shaw, C. J., 24 Pick. 252.

A provision to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty in the case of the failure of some person who, in the first instance, is liable for such payment or performance; 60 N. Y. 438; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 2.

A promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person; 94 Cal. 98. See 72 Ill. 13.

It is distinguished from suretyship in being a secondary, while that is a primary, obligation; or, as sometimes defined, guaranty is an undertaking that the debtor shall pay; suretyship, that the debt shall be paid. Or again, a contract of suretyship creates a liability for the performance of the act in question at the proper time, while the contract of guaranty creates a liability for the ability of the debtor to perform the act; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 3. Guaranty is an engagement to pay on a debtor's insolvency, if due diligence be used to obtain payment; 52 Pa. 440.

The undertaking is essentially in the alternative. A guarantor cannot be sued as a promisor, as the surety may; his contract must be specially set forth. A guarantor warrants the solvency of the promisor, which an indorser does not; 8 Pick. 423.

The distinction between suretyship and guaranty has been expressed as follows: A surety is usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time, and on the same consideration. He is an original promisor and debtor from the beginning, and is held, ordinarily, to know every default of his principal. Usually, he will not be discharged, either by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, or by want of notice of the default of the principal, no matter how much he may be injured thereby. On the other hand, the contract of the guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join. It is usually entered into before or after that of the principal, and is often supported on a separate consideration from that supporting the contract of the principal. The original contract of his principal is not his contract, and he is not bound to take notice of its non-performance. He is often discharged by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, and is usually not liable unless notified of the default of the principal. Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 1. See also, 52 Pa. 438, 525; 87 Ind. 560; 63 Ala. 419; 135 N. Y. 423. A written guaranty which fails to show on its face the person to whom the guaranty is made is void; 17 N. Y. Supp. 509; and where a contract contains no guaranty, parol evidence of one is inadmissible; 146 U. S. 42.

At common law, a guaranty could be made by parol; but by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, re-enacted almost in terms in the several states, it is provided that "No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized."

While, under this statute "no action shall be brought" on a contract not in writing, etc., yet such a contract may be enforced by a court against an attorney, by summary proceedings; 1 Cr. & J. 374.

"Any special promise" in the act does not apply to promises implied in law; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 53.

The following classes of promises have been held not within the statute, and valid though made by parol.

First, where there is a liability pre-existent to the new promise.

1. Where the principal debtor is discharged by the new promise being made; 3 Bingh. N. C. 889; 28 Vt. 135; 8 Gray 233; 1 Q. B. 933; 8 Johns. 376; 13 Md. 131; Bro. Stat. Fr. §§ 166, 193; and an entry of such discharge in the creditor's books is sufficient proof; 3 Hill, S. C. 41. This may be done by agreement to that effect; 1 Allen 405; by novation, by substitution, or by discharge under final process; 1 B. & Ald. 297; 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 646; but mere forbearance, or an agreement to forbear pressing the claim, is not enough; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 387; 6 Vt. 666.

2. Where the principal obligation is void or not enforceable when the new promise is made, and this is contemplated by the parties. But if not so contemplated, then the new promise is void; Burge, Surety 10; 1 Burr. 373. But see, on this point, 17 Md. 283; 13 Johns. 175; 6 Ga. 14.

3. So where the promise does not refer to the particular debt, or where this is unascertained; 1 Wils. 305.

In these three classes the principal obligation ceases to exist after the new promise is made.

4. Where the promisor undertakes for his own debt. But the mere fact that he is indebted will not suffice, unless his promise refers to that debt; nor is it sufficient if he subsequently becomes indebted on his own account, if not indebted when he promises, or if it is then contingent; 4 Hill, N. Y. 211. See 82 Tex. 255. The provision of the statute does not apply whenever the main purpose of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another; 141 U. S. 479. So, if the vendee of land promise to pay the purchase-money on a debt due by the vendor; 82 Tex. 255.

5. Where the new promise is in consideration of property placed by the debtor in the promisor's hands; 1 Gray 391; 41 Me. 559; 23 Cal. 187; 72 Ill. 442. And where the new promise is made in a transaction which is in substance a sale to the promisor; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 65.

6. Where the promise does not relate to the promisor's property, but to that of the debtor in the hands of the promisor.

7. Where the promise is made to the debtor, not the creditor; because this is not the debt of "another" than the promisee; 1 Gray 76; 11 Ad. & E. 438.

8. Where the creditor surrenders a lien against the debtor or on his property, which the promisor acquires or is benefited by; Fell, Guar. c. 2; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. §§ 63, 64; 7 Johns. 463; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 21 N. Y. 412; but not so where the surrender of the lien does not benefit the promisor; 3 Metc. Mass. 396; 21 N. Y. 412; 3 Esp. 86.

In the five last classes, the principal debt may still subsist concurrently with the new promise, and the creditor will have a double remedy; but the fulfilment of the new promise will discharge the principal debt, because he can have but one satisfaction. The repeated dicta, that if the principal debt subsists, the promise is collateral and within the statute, are not sustainable; 30 Vt. 641. But the general doctrine now is that the transaction must amount to a purchase, the engagement for the debt being the consideration therefor, in whole or in part; 1 Gray 391; 5 Cush. 488.

Where one owes a debt to another, and promises to pay his debt to a creditor of such other party, the promise is not within the statute: 5 Greenl. 81; 3 B. & C. 842.

Second, if the new promise is for a liability then first incurred, it is original, if exclusive credit is given to the promisor; 5 Allen 370; 13 Gray 613; 28 Conn. 544; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 195. Whether exclusive credit is so given is a question of fact for the jury; 7 Gill 7. Merely charging the debtor on a book-account is not conclusive.

Whether promises merely to indemnify come within the statute is not wholly settled; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 158; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. §§ 59, 61. In many cases they are held to be original promises, and not within the statute; 15 Johns. 425; 4 Wend. 657. But few of the cases, however, have been decided solely on this ground, most of them falling within the classes of original promises before specified. On principle, such contracts seem within the statute if there is a liability on the part of any third person to the promisee. If not, these promises would be original under class seven, above. Where the indemnity is against the promisor's own default, he is already liable without his promise to indemnify; and to make the promise collateral would make the statute a covert fraud; 10 Ad. & E. 453; 1 Gray 391; 10 Johns. 242; 1 Ga. 294; 5 B. Monr. 332; 20 Vt. 205; 10 N. H. 175; 1 Conn. 519; 5 Me. 504. The weight of American authority is said to be in favor of applying the statute to cases of indemnity; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 59, n. When the promise to indemnify is in fact a promise to pay the debt of another it is within the statute. See 21 N. Y. 412. A promise to indemnify another against loss in becoming surety on a replevin bond is within the statute; 12 Ohio St. 219. So on a bond for stay of execution; 111 Pa. 471. But a promise to indemnify one if he will become bail in a criminal case has been held not within the statute; 4 B. & S. 414; 119 Ind. 85.

Third, guaranties may be given for liabilities thereafter to be incurred, and will attach when the liability actually accrues. In this class the promise will be original, and not within the statute, if credit is given to the promisor exclusively; 2 Term 80; 1 Cowp. 227. See 40 Ill. App. 275. But where the future obligation is contingent merely, the new promise is held not within the statute, on the ground that there is no principal liability when the collateral one is incurred; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 196. But this doctrine is questionable if the agreement distinctly contemplates the contingency; 1 Cra. C. C. 77; 5 Hill, N. Y. 483. An offer to guarantee must be accepted within a reasonable time; but no notice of acceptance is required if property has been delivered under the guaranty; 8 Gray 211; 2 Mich. 511; 54 Fed. Rep. 846; 104 U. S. 159.

"A contract of guaranty, like every other contract, can only be made by the mutual assent of the parties. If the guaranty is signed by the guarantor, at the request of the other party, or if the latter's agreement to accept is contemporaneous with the guaranty; or if the receipt from him of a valuable consideration, however small, is acknowledged in the guaranty, the mutual assent is proved, and the delivery of the guaranty to him or for his use completes the contract. But if the guaranty is signed by the guarantor, without any previous request of the other party, and in his absence, for no consideration moving between them, except future advances to be made to the principal debtor, the guaranty is in legal effect an offer or proposal on the part of the guarantor, needing an acceptance by the other party to complete the contract;" 115 U. S. 524. See 34 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 257.

The agreement of a del credere agent to pay for goods sold by him is not within the statute; 23 Vt. 720; 14 N. Y. 267.

The form of the writing is not material: it may consist of one or more writings (provided they refer to each other on their face; 27 Mo. 388; 11 East 142; but see 14 How. 446); in such case it is enough if one be signed; 11 East 142. A minute of a vote of a corporation is sufficient; 14 Allen 407.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether the consideration need appear in the writing. It was finally settled in England that it must; 5 East 10; 4 B. & Ald. 595; but this is now changed by statute 19 & 20 Vict. The cases are reviewed in Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 82. A seal imports a consideration; id. As to the signature of the party to be charged, a seal alone is generally held sufficient; Stra. 764; so is a mark; 49 Barb. 62; 2 M. & S. 286; and a signature by the initials only; 1 Den. 471; 9 Allen 474; and a signature on a telegram; 35 Barb. 463. The signature need not be at the foot of the writing; 2 M. & W. 653.

Guaranty may be made for the tort as well as the contract of another, and then comes under the term miscarriage in the statute; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 2 Day 457; 1 Wils. 305; 9 Cow. 154; 14 Pick. 174.

All guaranties need a consideration to support them, none being presumed as in case of promissory notes. A guaranty of the payment of a negotiable promissory note, written by a third person upon a note before its delivery, need express no consideration, even where the law requires the consideration of the guaranty to be expressed in writing; but the consideration which the note upon its face implies to have passed between the original parties is sufficient; 149 U. S. 293. Forbearance to sue is good consideration; Cro. Jac. 633; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 190; 4 Johns. 257; 6 Conn. 81; 27 L. J. Exch. 120; 21 Fed. Rep. 836; 77 Ind. 1. Where the guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal obligation, it shares the consideration of the latter; 8 Johns. 29; 1 Paine 580; 2 Pet. 170; 3 Mich. 393; 36 N. H. 73.

A guaranty may be for a single act, or may be continuous. The cases are conflicting, as the question is purely one of the intention of the particular contract; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. 156. The tendency in this country is said to be against construing guaranties as continuing, unless the intention of the parties is so clear as not to admit of a reasonable doubt; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 7, citing 33 Ohio St. 177; s. c. 30 Am. R. 572; Lent v. Padleford, 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 141; 24 Wend. 82; 145 Ill. 493. If the object be to give a standing credit to be used from time to time, either indefinitely or for a fixed period, the liability is continuing; 40 Ill. App. 333; 3 Ind. App. 1; but if no time is fixed and nothing indicates the continuance of the obligation, the presumption is in favor of a limited liability as to time; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 7; 63 Barb. 351. A guaranty of any bills of account for goods sold another to a certain amount is a continuing guaranty; 40 Ill. App. 333. A sealed continuing guaranty is revoked by the death of the guarantor; 22 W. N. C. (Pa.) 457.

The authorities are not agreed as to the negotiability of a guaranty. It is held that a guaranty which is a separate and distinct instrument is not negotiable separately; 3 W. & S. 272; 4 Chandl. 151; 14 Vt. 233; 31 Me. 536; 31 Barb. 92; 21 Pick. 140. The right of the acceptor of a bill, to the benefit of a guaranty given to him, is not transferable to a holder of the bill, unless it was given for the purpose of being exhibited to other parties; 3 Ch. App. 756. But if a guaranty is on a negotiable note, it is negotiable with the note; and if the note is to bearer, the guaranty has been held to be negotiable in itself; 24 Wend. 456; 6 Humphr. 261. But an equitable interest passes by transfer, and the assignee may sue in the name of the assignor; 12 S. & R. 100; 20 Vt. 506. It has been held that no suit can be maintained upon a guaranty except by the person with whom it was made; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 14; 8 Watts 361; but it has also been held that a guaranty of a note may be sued on by any person who advances money on it, but that it is not negotiable unless made upon the note the payment of which it guarantees; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 15; 26 Wend. 425.

It is held that a guaranty is not enforceable by others than those to whom it is directed; 3 McLean 279; 1 Gray 317; 6 Watts 182; 10 Ala. N. S. 793; although they advance goods thereon; 4 Cra. 224.

In one case it was held that the guarantor was not bound where the guaranty was addressed to two and acted on by one of them only; 3 Tex. 199. It was held, also, that the guaranty was not enforceable by the survivor of two to whom it was addressed, for causes occurring since the decease of the other; 7 Term 254.

In the case of promissory notes, a distinction has sometimes been made between a guaranty of payment and a guaranty of collectibility; the latter requiring that the holder shall diligently prosecute the principal debtor without avail; 4 Wis. 190; 25 Conn. 576; 6 Barb. 547; 26 Me. 358; 4 Conn. 527; 48 Minn. 207.

It has in some cases been held that an indorsement in blank on a promissory note by a stranger to the note was prima facie a guaranty; 37 Ill. App. 616. A second acceptance on a bill of exchange may amount to a guaranty; 2 Camp. 447.

A guarantor is discharged by a material alteration in the contract without his consent. Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 378; 137 N. Y. 307; 85 Ia. 617. Modification of a contract made by the contractor and the owner will not release the guarantor, if they are such as are permitted by the terms of the contract; 155 Pa. 36. See SURETYSHIP.

The guarantor may also be discharged by the neglect of the creditor in pursuing the principal debtor. The same strictness as to demand and notice is not necessary to charge a guarantor as is required to charge an indorser; but in the case of a guarantied note the demand on the maker must be made in a reasonable time, and if he is solvent at the time of the maturity of the note, and remains so for such reasonable time afterwards, the guarantor does not become liable for his subsequent insolvency; 2 H. Bla. 612; 18 Pick. 534. Notice of non-payment must also be given to the guarantor; 2 Ohio 430; but where the name of the guarantor of a promissory note does not appear on the note, such notice is not necessary unless damage is sustained thereby, and in such case the guarantor is discharged only to the extent of such damage; 12 Pet. 497. One who guarantees that another will pay promptly for goods to be purchased is not liable where the purchaser becomes insolvent after the guaranty is given, and the seller gives the guarantor no notice of the purchaser's failure to pay; 145 Ill. 488. A presentment for payment is now decided not to be necessary in order to charge one who guarantees the due payment of a bill or note; 5 M. & G. 559. It is not necessary that an action should be brought against the principal debtor; 7 Pet. 113. See, also, 2 Watts 128; 11 Wend. 620.

From the close connection of guaranty with suretyship, it is convenient to consider many of the principles common to both under the head of suretyship, which article see.

Where an innocent person acts upon a guaranty, the execution of which was procured by misrepresentation, the burden devolves upon the guarantor to show that he was free from negligence; the rule in such cases being the same with respect to the execution of guaranties as to that of negotiable instruments; 17 N. Y. Supp. 764.

Whether a guaranty is absolute or special is a question of fact; 37 Ill. App. 616.

Where the guaranty of a written contract is executed on the same paper, notice of acceptance by the person for whose benefit it is made, is unnecessary; 130 Ind. 194. See SURETYSHIP.

It is not within the general scope of a partner's authority to give guaranties in the name of the firm; Wood's Byles, Bills 48; 35 Minn. 239. And an officer of a company cannot bind it as surety or guarantor; 91 Pa. 367.

Consult Fell on Guaranty; Burge; Theobald; Putman on Suretyship; Browne; Reed, on Statute of Frauds; Addison; Chitty; Parsons; Story on Contracts. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty.

See, generally, SURETYSHIP.

GUARDAGE. The condition of one who is under a guardian. A state of wardship.

GUARDIAN. One who legally has the care and management of the person, or the estate, or both, of a child during his minority. Reeve, Dom. Rel. 311.

The term Guardian has been held to be synonymous with "next friend"; 30 Fla. 210.

A person having the control of the property of a minor without that of his person is known in the civil law, as well as in some of the states of the United States, by the name of curator. 1 Leq. él. du Droit Civ. Rom. 241. The guardian of the person is called "tutor." Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 295.

Guardian by chancery. This guardianship, although unknown at the common law, is well established in practice now. It grew up in the time of William III., and had its foundation in the royal prerogative of the king as parens patriæ. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 246.

This power the sovereign is presumed to have delegated to the chancellor; 10 Ves. 63; 2 P. Wms. 118; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 317. By virtue of it, the chancellor appoints a guardian where there is none, and exercises a superintending control over all guardians, however appointed, removing them for misconduct and appointing others in their stead; Co. Litt. 89; 1 P. Wms. 703; 1 Ves. 160; 2 Kent 227. But only, it is said, where the minor has property; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 300; 2 Russ. 1, 20.

An infant with property becomes a ward of court (1) if an action is commenced in his name; (2) if an order is made on petition or summons for the appointment of a guardian; if an order is made in like manner for maintenance; (4) if a fund belonging to an infant is paid into court under the acts for the relief of trustees; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 95. See Simpson, Inf. 2d. ed. 241; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 462 note 8.

This power, in the United States, resides in courts of equity; 1 Johns. Ch. 99; 2 id. 439; 139 Ind. 268; but more commonly by statute in probate or surrogate courts; 2 Kent 226; 30 Miss. 458; 3 Bradf. Surr. 133.

Guardian by nature is the father, and, on his death, the mother; 2 Kent 220; 2 Root 320; 2 Wend. 158; 4 Mass. 675.

This guardianship, by the common law, extends only to the person, and the subject of it is the heir apparent, and not the other children,—not even the daughter when there are no sons; for they are but presumptive heirs only, since their right may be defeated by the birth of a son after their father's decease. But as all the children male and female equally inherit with us, this guardianship extends to all the children, as an inherent right in their parents during their minority; 2 Kent 220. In default of both parents, the natural guardian is the grandfather or grandmother, or next of kin; 114 U. S. 218; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 614.

The mother of a bastard child is its natural guardian; 6 Blackf. 357; 2 Mass. 109; but not by the common law; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 314, note. The power of a natural guardian over the person of his ward is perhaps better explained by reference to the relation of parent and child. See DOMICIL. It is well settled that the court of chancery may, for just cause, interpose and control the authority and discretion of the parent in the education and care of his child; 8 Paige, Ch. 47; 10 Ves. 52.

A guardian by nature is not entitled to the control of his ward's personal property; 34 Ala. N. S. 15, 565; 1 P. Wms. 285; 6 Conn. 474; 7 Wend. 354; 3 Pick. 213; 95 Ill. 519; unless by statute. See 19 Mo. 345; 110 U. S. 42. The father must support his ward; 2 Bradf. Surr. 341. But where his means are limited, the court will grant an allowance out of his child's estate; id.; 1 Bro. Ch. 387. But the mother, if guardian, is not obliged to support her child if it has sufficient estate of its own; nor is she entitled, like the father, when guardian, to its services, unless she is compelled to maintain it. But where the mother, who is guardian of her son, engages board for him, she incurs liability personally and not as guardian; 5 Ind. App. 204.

A father as guardian by nature has no right to the real or personal estate of his child; that right, whenever he has it, must be as a guardian in socage, or by some statutory provision; 15 Wend. 631.

Guardian by nurture. This guardianship belonged to the father, then to the mother.

The subject of it extended to the younger children, not the heirs apparent. In this country it does not exist, or, rather, it is merged in the higher and more durable guardianship by nature, because all the children are heirs, and, therefore, the subject of that guardianship; 2 Kent 221; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 315; 6 Ga. 401. It extended to the person only; 6 Conn. 494; 40 L. & Eq. 103; and terminated at the age of fourteen; 1 Bla. Com. 461.

Guardian in socage. This guardianship arose when socage lands descended to an infant under fourteen years of age; at which period it ceased if another guardian was appointed, otherwise it continued; 5 Johns. 63.

The person entitled to it by common law was the next of kin, who could not by any possibility inherit the estate; 1 Bla. Com. 461. If the lands descended from a paternal relative, the mother or next of kin on her part was the guardian; if from a maternal relative the father, or next of kin on his part was; 2 Wend. 153. Although recognized in New York, it was never common in the United States; 5 Johns. 66; 7 id. 157; because, by the statutes of descents generally in force in this country, those who are next of kin may eventually inherit. Wherever it has been recognized, it has been in a form differing materially from its character at common law; 15 Wend. 631. Such guardian was also guardian of the person of his ward as well as his real estate; Co. Litt. 87, 89. Although it did not arise unless the infant was seized of lands held in socage, yet when it did arise it extended to hereditaments which do not lie in tenure and to the ward's personal estate. See Hargrave's note 67 to Co. Litt. This guardian could lease his ward's estate and maintain ejectment against a disseisor in his own name; 2 Bacon, Abr. 683. A guardian in socage cannot be removed from office, but the ward may supersede him at the age of fourteen, by a guardian of his own choice; Co. Litt. 89. In New York guardians in socage have neither common law nor statutory right to control the personal estate of the wards; 138 N. Y. 333.

There was an anciently a guardianship by chivalry at the common law, where lands came to an infant by descent which were holden by knight-service; Co. Litt. 88, 11, note. That tenure being abolished by statute Car. II., the guardianship has ceased to exist in England, and has never had any existence in the United States.

Guardians by statute are of two kinds: first, those appointed by deed or will; second, those appointed by court in pursuance of some statute.

Testamentary guardians are appointed by the deed or last will of the father; 88 Ga. 722; and they supersede the claims of all other guardians, and have control of the person and the real and personal estate of the child till he arrives at full age.

This power of appointment was given to the father by the stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24, which has been pretty extensively adopted in this country, though in some states the appointment is limited to will. Under it, the father might thus dispose of his children, born and unborn; 7 Ves. 315; but not of his grandchildren; 5 Johns. 278. Nor does it matter whether the father is a minor or not; 2 Kent 225. It continues during the minority of a male ward, both as to his estate and person, notwithstanding his marriage; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 328; 2 Kent 224; 4 Johns. Ch. 380. There seems to be some doubt as to whether marriage would determine it over a female ward; 2 Kent 224. It is more reasonable that it should, inasmuch as the husband acquires in law a right to the control of his wife's person. But it would seem that a person marrying a testamentary guardian is not entitled to the money of the ward; 12 Ill. 431. In England and most of the United States a mother cannot appoint a testamentary guardian, nor can a putative father, nor a person in loco parentis; 1 Bla. Com. 462, n.; but by statute in Illinois she may make an appointment, if the father has not done so, provided she be not remarried after his death; 2 Kent 225. In New York, the consent of the mother is required to a testamentary appointment by the father; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 400. A man cannot by law appoint his son testamentary guardian for the children of the latter; 79 Ga. 397.

Guardians appointed by court. The greater number of guardians among us, by far, are those appointed by court, in conformity with statutes which regulate their powers and duties. In the absence of special provisions, their rights and duties are governed by the general law on the subject of guardian and ward.

Appointment of guardians. All guardians of infants specially appointed must be appointed by the infant's parent; or by the infant himself; or by a court of competent jurisdiction.

After the age of fourteen, the ward is entitled to choose a guardian, at common law, and generally by statute; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 320; 15 Ala. N. S. 687; 30 Miss. 458; 11 Jur. 114. His choice is subject, however, to the rejection of the court for good reason, when he is entitled to choose again; 14 Ga. 594. So guardianship by the sole appointment of the infant cannot now be said to exist. If the court appoint one before the age of choice, the infant may appear and choose one at that age, without any notice to the guardian appointed; 30 Miss. 458; 15 Ala. N. S. 687; 50 Ga. 332; 38 Conn. 304. But if none be chosen, then the old one acts. It seems that in Indiana the old one can be removed only for cause shown; in which case, of course, he is entitled to notice; 8 Ind. 307. See 96 Pa. 243. As to the method of appointment by the Ward see 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 462, note 8. A probate, surrogate, or county court has no power to appoint, unless the minor resides in the same county; 2 Bradf. Surr. 214; 7 Ga. 362; 9 Tex. 109; 16 Ala. N. S. 759; 27 Mo. 280; 45 Mo. App. 415; but where the ward is a nonresident, guardianship is frequently recognized for the collection and preservation of his estate in the jurisdiction, and in such cases, the court where the property is situated will appoint a guardian, the existence of the property determining the jurisdiction; 4 Allen 466; 27 E. L. & Eq. 249. Persons residing out of the jurisdiction will not usually be appointed guardians; but this rule is not invariable, except in those states which require resident guardians by statute; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 419.

It has been a subject of much doubt whether a married woman may be a guardian; while there are cases which sustain their acts while acting as guardians, clear precedents for their actual appointment are wanting. See 2 Dougl. 433. It has been held, however, that a married woman may be co-guardian with a man, though her sole appointment is improper; L. R. 1 Ch. 387. See 29 Miss. 195; 1 Paige 488; 19 Ind. 88. A single woman by her marriage loses her guardianship, it would seem; but she may be reappointed; 2 Kent 225, n. b; 2 Dougl. 433. It seems probable that recent statutes relating to the rights of married women will modify these cases. Where there is a valid guardianship unrevoked, the appointment of another is void; 23 Miss. 550.

The court has jurisdiction to interfere with and remove the guardian of a child who has no property, on proof of misconduct of the guardian towards the child or on proof that it is for the welfare of the child that the guardian should be removed; [1893] 1 Ch. 143.

Powers and liabilities of guardians. The relation of a guardian to his ward is that of a trustee in equity, and bailee at law; 2 Md. 111. It is a trust which he cannot assign; 1 Pars. Contr. 116. He will not be allowed to reap any benefit from his ward's estate; 2 Comyns 230, except for his legal compensation or commission; but must account for all profits, which the ward may elect to take or charge interest on the capital used by him; 17 Ala. N. s. 306; he cannot purchase lands belonging to him; 54 Ark. 627. He can invest the money of his ward in real estate only by order of court; 3 Ind. 320; 3 Yerg. 336; 21 Miss. 9, 38 Me. 47; 56 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 82; 56 Fed. Rep. 699. And he cannot convert real estate into personalty without a similar order; Field, Inf. 109; 25 Mo. 548; 4 Jones 15; 16 B. Monr. 289; 1 Rawle 293; 1 Ohio 232; 1 Dutch. 121; 2 Kent 230. The law does not favor the conversion of the real estate of minors; 14 Pa. 372; but if it be clearly to the interest of a minor that his real estate be sold and converted into money, the court will award an order of sale, notwithstanding that in the event of his death during minority, the proceeds would go to other parties than those to whom the land would have descended had it not been converted; 6 Phila. 157. The rule is different in England; there land converted into money, or money into land, retains its character of land or money, as the case may be, during the nonage of the minor; 6 Ves. 6; 11 Ill. 278. They cannot bind their wards by contracts as to the proportion of the claims against the estate each shall bear; 2 Colo. App. 306.

He may lease the land of his ward; 1 Pars. Contr. 114; 2 Mass. 56; but if the lease extends beyond the minority of the ward, the latter may avoid it on coming of age; 1 Johns. Ch. 561; 10 Yerg. 160; 2 Wils. 129; 5 Halst. 133. He may sell his ward's personalty without order of court; 27 Ala. N. s. 198; 19 Mo. 345; 152 U. S. 499; and dispose of and manage it as he pleases; 2 Pick. 243. He is required to put the money out at interest, or show that he was unable to do this; 21 Miss. 9; 2 Wend. 424; 1 Pick. 527; 7 W. & S. 48; 13 E. L. & Eq. 140; 92 Mich. 275; 39 Ill. App. 382. And in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a guardian might have kept funds of his ward at interest; 39 Ill. App. 382. If he spends more than the interest and profits of the estate in the maintenance and education of the ward without permission of the court, he may be held liable for the principal thus consumed; 1 S. & M. 545; 26 Miss. 393; 6 B. Monr. 1292; 2 Strobh. 40; 2 Sneed 520; 99 N. C. 118.

If he erects buildings on his ward's estate out of his own money, without order of court, he will not be allowed any compensation; 11 Barb. 22; 11 Pa. 326; 23 Miss. 189; 17 Or. 115. He is not chargeable with the services of his wards if for their own benefit he requires them to work for him; 12 Gratt. 608. A married woman guardian can convey the real estate of her ward without her husband joining; 2 Dougl. 433. On marriage of a female minor in Mississippi, her husband, although a minor, is entitled to receive her estate from her guardian; 3 Miss. 893. A guardian who deposited the moneys of his ward, as guardian, in a bank that was solvent, with hissureties was held not liable for loss upon the failure of the bank; 144 Pa. 499.

Joint guardians may sue together on account of any joint transaction founded on their relation to the ward, even after the relation ceases; 4 Pick. 283; see 101 Mass. 592; and where one guardian consents to his co-guardian's misapplication of funds, he is liable; 11 S. & R. 66; 18 Pa. 175. Guardians like other trustees—executors and administrators excepted—may portion out the management of the property to suit their respective taste and qualifications, while neither parts irrevocably with the control of the whole; and in such case each is chargeable with no more than what he received, unless unwarrantable negligence in superintending the others' acts can be shown; 8 W. & S. 143; and the discharge of one who has received no part of the estate relieves him from liability; 33 Pa. 466.

Contracts between guardian and ward immediately after the latter has attained his majority are unfavorably regarded by the courts, and will be set aside where they redound to the profit of the guardian; Bisp. Eq. 234; 4 S. & R. 114; 8 Md. 230; 28 Miss. 737; 14 B. Monr. 638; 12 Barb. 84;

10 Ala. N. S. 400. Neither is he allowed to purchase at the sale of his ward's property; 2 Jones, Eq. 285; 22 Barb. 167; 54 Ark. 627. But the better opinion is that such sale is not void, but voidable only; 2 Gray 141; 10 Humphr. 275. He is not allowed, without permission of court under some statute authority, to remove his ward's property out of the state; 24 Ala. N. S. 486; 45 La. Ann. 1062. He cannot release a debt due his ward; 1 J. J. Marsh. 441; 11 Mo. 649; although he may submit a claim to arbitration; 22 Miss. 118; 11 Me. 326; 6 Pick. 269; Dy. 216; but he cannot do so when he is interested adversely to them in the subject-matter of the arbitration; 86 Tex. 172. He may collect or compromise and release debts due to the ward, subject to the liability to be called to account for his acts; 152 U. S. 499. He cannot by his own contract bind the person or estate of his ward; 1 Pick. 314; nor avoid a beneficial contract made by his ward; 13 Mass. 237; Co. Litt. 17 b, 89 a. He becomes liable for negligence for failure to sue on a note due his ward's estate until the parties thereto are insolvent; 113 N. C. 102.

He is entitled to the care and custody of the person of his ward; 7 Humphr. 111; 4 Bradf. Surr. 221; even against parents in England; L. R. 8 Q. B. 153; but latterly, the wishes and best interests of the child will be consulted; 41 Ind. 92; 50 Mich. 261. If a female ward marry, the guardianship terminates both as to her person and property. It has been thought to continue over her property if she marries a minor. If a male ward marries, the guardianship continues as to his estate, though it has been held otherwise as to his person. If he marries a female minor, it is said that his guardian will also be entitled to her property; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 328; 2 Kent 226.

A guardian may change the residence of his ward from one county to another in the same state. But it seems that the new county may appoint another guardian; 4 Bradf. Surr. 221. Whether he has the right to remove his ward into a foreign jurisdiction has been a disputed question; Field, Inf. 114. In England, a guardian, being a parent, can change the child's domicile; 10 Cl. & F. 42; otherwise probably if the guardian be not a parent; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 317. A natural guardian may change the domicile of his ward; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 614. So held of a paternal grandfather, as guardian; id. Guardians who are not natural guardians can change the municipal domicile of a ward, in the same state; Tiff. Dom. Rel. 317; but not to another state; 146 Pa. 585; 112 U. S. 472; but see 52 Barb. 294; 3 MacArth. 95. By the common law, his authority both over the person and property of his ward was strictly local; 1 Johns. Ch. 156; 1 N. H. 193; 12 Wheat. 169; 10 Miss. 532. And this is the view maintained in most of the states. See Story, Conf. Laws § 540. But see, on this question, 5 Paige, Ch. 596; 8 Ala. N. S. 789; 18 id. 34; 11 Ired. 36; 9 Md. 227; 3 Mer. 67; 5 Pick. 20; DOMICIL.

VOL.—58

The court of chancery may interfere to prevent a guardian from attempting an important change in the religious impressions of a ward if upon examination such change seems dangerous and improper; 8 D. M. & G. 760. See Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 90 and note.

Nor can a guardian in one state maintain an action in another for any claim in which his ward is interested; 11 Ala. N. S. 343; 18 Miss. 529; see 31 Barb. 304; 36 Miss. 69; 30 Conn. 508; Story, Conf. Laws § 499; a guardian appointed in one state has no authority in another, except by comity, but the modern tendency is to support the authority of the guardian appointed in the domicile; 103 U. S. 6, 13; L. R. 2 Eq. 704. He cannot waive the rights of his ward,—not even by neglect or omission; 2 Vern. 368; 14 Ill. 417. No guardian, except a father, is bound to maintain his ward at his own expense. But it is his duty to maintain and educate the ward, in a suitable manner from the income of the ward's estate; 48 Me. 279; 101 Mich. 313. It is discretionary with a court whether to allow a father anything out of his child's estate for his education and maintenance; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 324; 6 Ind. 66.

Rights and liabilities of wards. A ward owes obedience to his guardian, which a court will aid the guardian in enforcing; 3 Atk. 721; 7 Kulp 66. The general rule is that the ward's contracts are voidable; 13 Mass. 237; yet there are some contracts so clearly prejudicial that they have been held absolutely void: such as contracts of suretyship; 4 Conn. 376.

A ward cannot marry without the consent of his or her guardian; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 327. And any one marrying or aiding in the marriage of a ward without such consent is guilty of contempt of court; 2 P. Wms. 562; 3 id. 116; but this whole subject is peculiar to the laws of England and has no application in the United States; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 517. Infants are liable for their torts in the same manner as persons of full age; 5 Hill, N. Y. 391; 3 Wend. 391; 9 N. H. 441. A ward is entitled to his own earnings; 1 Bouvier, Inst. 349. He attains his majority the day before the twenty-first anniversary of his birthday; 3 Harring. 557; 4 Dana 597; 1 Salk. 44. He can sue in court only by his guardian or prochein ami; 4 Bla. Com. 464. He could not bring an action at law against his guardian, but might file a bill in equity calling him to account; 2 Vern. 342; 3 P. Wms. 119; 3 Atk. 25; 1 Ves. 91; 92 Tenn. 459. Minors who are kept occupied by their tutor, to teach them habits of industry, cannot exact compensation of him; 45 La. Ann. 134. By the practice in chancery, he was allowed one year to examine the accounts of his guardian after coming of age; 7 Paige 46. See 73 Hun 532; 86 Wis. 99. The statute of limitations will not run against him during the guardianship; 34 Ala. N. S. 15. But see LIMITATIONS.

Sale of infant's lands. It is probable that the English court of chancery did not have the inherent original power to order the sale of minors' lands; 2 Ves. 23; 1 Moll. 525. But, with the acquiescence of parliament, it claims and exercises that right for the purpose of maintaining and educating the ward. This power is not conceded as belonging to our courts of chancery in this country by virtue of their equity jurisdiction, nor to our probate courts as custodians of minors; 6 Hill 415; 2 Kent 229, n. a. It must be derived from some statute authority; 27 Ala. n. s. 198; 7 Johns. Ch. 154; 2 Pick. 243; Ambl. 419. There being no inherent authority in a guardian by virtue of his office to convey lands of his wards, a deed by him will not, in the absence of evidence of sharing his authority, convey any title; 69 Tex. 27.

It has been a much-disputed question whether an infant's lands can be sold by special act of the legislature. On the ground that the state is the supreme guardian of infants, this power of the legislature has been sustained where the object was the education and support of the infant; 29 Miss. 146; 5 Ill. 127; 20 Wend. 363; 8 Blackf. 10; 16 Mass. 326. See 103 U. S. 613; 56 Mo. 211. So it has been sustained where the sale was merely advantageous to his interest; 11 Gill & J. 87; 14 S. & R. 435. There has been some opposition on the ground that it is an encroachment on the judiciary; 4 N. H. 565, 575; 10 Yerg. 59. Such sales have been sustained where the object was to liquidate the ancestor's debts; 4 T. B. Monr. 95. This has been considered questionable in the extreme; 10 Am. Jur. 297; 10 Yerg. 59; contra, 16 Ill. 548. It has also been exercised in the case of idiots and lunatics, and sustained on the same reasons as in the case of infants; 7 Metc. 388.

A ward's title to land passes by his guardian's deed therefor, and not by the confirmation of the sale by the court; 97 Cal. 360.

By statute, we have also guardians for the insane and for spendthrifts; 2 Barb. 153; 8 Ala. n. s. 796; 18 Me. 384; 8 N. H. 569; 19 Pick. 506. This guardian is sometimes designated as the committee; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 389.

A guardian to a lunatic cannot be appointed till after a writ de lunatico inquirendo; 21 Ala. n. s. 504. An order removing a guardian is equivalent to an order to pay over the money in his hands to his successor; 9 Mo. 225, 227. In some states the court is authorized to revoke for non-residence of the guardian; id.

GUARDIAN AD LITEM. A guardian appointed to represent the ward in legal proceedings to which he is a party defendant.

The appointment of such is incident to the power of every court to try a case; 2 Cow. 430; and the power is then confined to the particular case at bar; Co. Litt. 89, n. 16. His duty is to manage the interest of the infant when sued. In criminal cases no guardian is appointed: the court acts as guardian; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 318; Field, Inf. 163. A guardian ad litem cannot be appointed till the infant has been brought before the court in some of the modes prescribed by law; 16 Ala. n. s. 509; 1 Swan 75; 2 B. Monr. 453. See 86 Ky. 198. Such guardian cannot waive service of process; 2 Ind. 74; and his powers are not limited to defence, objection, and opposition merely, but he may file a cross bill to protect the infant's interest involved in the litigation, and appeal from a decree dismissing the same; 45 Ill. App. 17. The writ and declaration in actions at law against infants are to be made out as in ordinary cases. In English practice where the defendant neglects to appear, or appears otherwise than by guardian, the plaintiff may apply for and obtain a summons calling on him to appear by guardian within a given time; otherwise the plaintiff may be at liberty to proceed as in other cases, having had a nominal guardian assigned to the infant; Macphers. Inf. 359. A like rule prevails in New York and other states; 6 Cow. 50; 12 N. H. 515; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 596.

The omission to appoint a guardian ad litem does not render the judgment void, but only voidable; 8 Metc. 196. See 39 Kan. 548. It will be presumed, where the chancellor received the answer of a person as guardian ad litem, that he was regularly appointed, although it does not appear of record; 19 Miss. 418; 98 Mich. 493. See 2 Swan 197. It is error to decree the sale of a decedent's property on the petition of the representatives, without the previous appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infant heirs; 16 Ala. n. s. 41. Where the general guardian petitions for a sale of his ward's lands, the court must appoint a guardian ad litem; 18 B. Monr. 779; 21 Ala. n. s. 363; 30 Miss. 258; 1 Ohio St. 544; but this is not necessary where the application is for leave to invest money of the ward in land; 79 Ga. 753.

It seems that a guardian ad litem can elect whether to come into hotch-pot; 15 Ala. 85. An appearance of the minor in court is not necessary for the appointment of a guardian to manage his interest in the suit; 11 E. L. & Eq. 156; 15 id. 317. If an infant comes of age pending the suit, he can assert his rights at once for himself, and if he does not he cannot generally complain of the acts of his guardian ad litem; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 602; 50 Me. 62; 48 Wisc. 89.

The appointment of a guardian ad litem is valid, although the infant has not been regularly served with process, but has only accepted service thereof; 97 N. C. 21. The rule that a next friend or guardian ad litem cannot by admissions or stipulation, surrender the rights of the infant, does not prevent a guardian ad litem or prochein ami from assenting to such arrangements as will facilitate the determination of the case in which the rights of the infant are involved; 134 U. S. 650. A married woman cannot be a guardian ad litem or next friend; 34 Ch. D. 435.

GUARDIAN, or WARDEN, OF THE CINQUE PORTS. A magistrate who has the jurisdiction of the ports or havens which are called the "Cinque Ports" (q. v.). This office was first created in England in imitation of the Roman policy, to strengthen the sea-coasts against enemies, etc.

GUARDIAN OF THE SPIRITUALITIES. The person to whom the spiritual jurisdiction of any diocese is committed during the vacancy of the see.

GUARDIAN OF THE TEMPORALITIES. The person to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the crown.

GUARDIANSHIP. The power or protective authority given by law, and imposed on an individual who is free and in the enjoyment of his rights, over one whose weakness on account of his age renders him unable to protect himself.

GUARDIANUS. A guardian, warder, or keeper. Spel. Gloss.

GUARENTIGIO. In Spanish Law. A term applicable to the contract or writing by which courts of justice are empowered to execute and carry into effect a contract in the same manner as if it were decreed by the court after the usual legal formalities. This clause, though formerly inserted in contracts of sale, etc., stipulating the payment of a sum of money, is at present usually omitted, as courts of justice ordinarily compel the parties to execute all contracts made, by authentic acts, that is, acts passed before a notary, in the presence of two witnesses.

GUARNIMENTUM. In old European Law. A provision of necessary things. Spel. Gloss.

GUASTALD. One who had the custody of the royal mansions.

GUERRA, GUERRE. War. Spel. Gloss.

GUERRILA PARTY (Span. guerra, war; guerrilla, a little war).

In Military Law. Self-constituted bodies of armed men, in times of war, who form no integral part of the organized army, do not stand on the regular pay-roll of the army, or are not paid at all, take up arms and lay them down at intervals, and carry on petty war, chiefly by raids, extortion, destruction, and massacre. Lieber, Guerr. Part. 18. See Halleck, Int. Law 386; Wools, Int. Law 299.

Partisan, free-corps, and guerrilla are terms resembling each other considerably in signification; and, indeed, partisan and guerrilla are frequently used in the same sense. See Halleck, Int. Law 386.

Partisan corps and free-corps both denote bodies detached from the main army; but the former term refers to the action of the troop, the latter to the composition. The partisan leader commands a corps whose object is to injure the enemy by action separate from that of his own main army; the partisan acts chiefly upon the enemy's lines of connection and communication, and outside of or beyond the lines of operation of his own army, in the rear and on the flanks of the enemy. But he is part and parcel of the army, and, as such, considered entitled to the privileges of the law of war so long as he does not transgress it. Free-corps, on the other hand, are troops not belonging to the regular army, consisting of volunteers generally raised by individuals authorized to do so by the government, used for petty war, and not incorporated with the ordre de bataille. The men composing these corps are entitled to the benefit of the laws of war, under the same limitations as the partisan corps.

Guerrilla-men, when captured in fair fight and open warfare, should be treated as the regular partisan is, until special crimes, such as murder, or the killing of prisoners, or the sacking of places, are proved upon them.

The law of war, however, would not extend a similar favor to small bodies of armed country people near the lines, whose very smallness shows that they must resort to occasional fighting and the occasional assuming of peaceful habits and brigandage; Lieber, Guerr. Part. 20.

GUEST. A traveller who stays at an inn or tavern with the consent of the keeper. Bacon, Abr. Inns, C 5; 8 Co. 32; Story, Bailm. § 477. It is not now deemed essential that a person should have come from a distance to constitute him a guest; 63 Wis. 6; 35 Conn. 183.

And if, after taking lodgings at an inn, he leaves his horse there and goes elsewhere to lodge, he is still to be considered a guest; 26 Vt. 316; but not if he merely leaves goods for keeping which the landlord receives no compensation; 1 Salk. 388; 3 Ld. Raym. 866; Cro. Jac. 188. And where one leaves his horse with an innkeeper with no intention of stopping at the inn himself, he is not a guest of the inn, and the liability of the landlord is simply that of an ordinary bailee for hire; 68 Md. 489; 33 N. Y. 577. The length of time a man is at an inn makes no difference, whether he stays a day, a week, or a month, or longer, or only for temporary refreshments, so always that, though not strictly transiens, he retains his character as a traveller; 5 Term 273; 5 Barb. 560. But if a person comes upon a special contract to board at an inn, he is not, in the sense of the law, a guest, but a boarder; Bacon, Abr. Inns, C 5; Story, Bailm. § 477; Wand. Inns 64; but this is a question of fact to be determined by a jury; 33 Wis. 118; 98 Cal. 678. The payment of a stipulated sum per week does not of itself change the relation of a party from that of a guest to that of a lodger; 7 Cush. 417; 33 Cal. 557; 98 id. 678; 20 Alb. L. J. 64. The relation exists where one who keeps a house for the entertainment of all who choose to visit it, extends a general invitation to the public to become guests, although the house is situated on enclosed grounds; 93 Cal. 253. See BAILEE; INNKEEPER; BOARDER.

GUEST-TAKER. See AGISTER.

GUET. In French Law. Watch. Ord. Mar. liv. 4, tit. 6.

GUIA. In Spanish Law. A right of way for narrow carts. White, New Recop. 1, 2, c. 6.

GUIDAGE. In English Law. A reward for safe conduct, through a strange land or unknown country. Cowel. The office of guiding of travellers through dangerous or unknown ways. 2 Inst. 526.

GUIDON DE LA MER. The name of a treatise on maritime law, written in Rouen in Normandy in 1671, as is supposed. It was received on the continent of Europe almost as equal in authority to one of the ancient codes of maritime law. The author of this work is unknown. This tract or treatise is contained in the "Collection de Lois maritimes," by J. M. Pardessus, vol. 2, p. 371 et seq.

GUILD, GILD. A brotherhood or company governed by certain rules and orders made among themselves by king's license; a corporation, especially for purposes of commerce; so called because on entering the guild the members pay an assessment or tax (gild) towards defraying its charges. T. L.; Du Cange. A guild held generally more or less property in common,—often a hall, called a guild-hall, for the purposes of the association. The name of guild was not, however, confined to mercantile companies, but was applied also to religious, municipal, and other corporations. A mercantile meeting of a guild was called a guild merchant.

A fridborg (q. v.), that is, among the Saxons, ten families' mutual pledges for each other to the king. Spelman. See 3 Steph. Com. 31; Turner's Hist. Ang. Sax. v. iii. p. 98.

The earliest corporations in Scotland were not for trading but to perpetuate some public service; and they took their rise from Papal bulls, royal charters, etc., or frequently such charter was presumed; Ersk. Pr. 311.

GUILD RENTS. Rents payable to the crown by any guild, or such as formerly belonged to religious guilds, and came to the crown on the dissolution of the monasteries. Toml.

GUILD HALL (Law Lat. gildhalla, variously spelled ghildhalla, guihalla, guihalla; from Sax. gild, payment, company, and halla, hall). A place in which are exposed goods for sale. Charter of Count of Flanders; Hist. Guinensi, 202, 203; Du Cange. The hall of a guild or corporation. Du Cange; Spelman: e. g., Gildhalla Teutonicorum. The chief hall of the city of London, where the mayor and commonalty hold their meetings. The hall of the merchants of the Hanseatic League in London, otherwise called the "Stilyard." Id.

GUILDHALL SITTINGS. The sittings held in the Guildhall of the city of London for city of London cases.

GUINEA. A coin issued by the English mint during the time of Wm. IV. These coins were called in. The word now means only the sum of £1. 1s.

GUILLOTINE. An apparatus for beheading criminals with a single blow, used in some countries, as France and Greece, for capital punishment. A form of it was in use in the middle ages, but, being improved by Dr. Guillotin at the time of the French Revolution, it received its present name. Cent. Dict.

GUILT. In Criminal Law. That which renders criminal and liable to punishment.

That disposition to violate the law, which has manifested itself by some act already done. The opposite of innocence. See Rutherf. Inst. b. 1, c. 18, s. 10.

In general, every one is presumed innocent until guilt has been proved; but in some cases the presumption of guilt overthrows that of innocence; as, for example, where a party destroys evidence to which the opposite party is entitled. The spoliation of papers material to show the neutral character of a vessel furnishes strong presumption against the neutrality of the ship; 2 Wheat. 227.

GUILTY. The state or condition of a person who has committed a crime, misdemeanor, or offence.

This word implies a malicious intent, and can only be applied to something universally allowed to be a crime. Cowp. 275.

In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant who is charged with a crime, misdemeanor, or tort admits or confesses it. In criminal proceedings, when the accused is arraigned, the clerk asks him, "How say you, A. B., are you guilty or not guilty?" His answer, which is given ore tenus, is called his plea; and when he admits the charge in the indictment, he answers or pleads guilty; otherwise, not guilty. See CULPRIT.

GULE OF AUGUST. The first of August, being the day of St. Peter ad Vincula. T. L.

GULES. The heraldic name of the color usually called "red." The word is derived from the Arabic word "gule," a rose, and was probably introduced by the Crusaders. Gules is denoted in engravings by numerous perpendicular lines. Heraldry who blazoned by plants and jewels called it "Mars" and "ruby;" Wharton.

GWABR MERCHED. Maid's fee. A British word signifying a customary fine payable to lords of some manors on marriage of tenant's daughter, or otherwise on her incontinence. Cowel, Marchet.

GWALSTOW. A place of execution. Cowel.

GYLTWITE OR GUILTWIT (Sax.). Compensation for fraud or trespass. Grant of King Edgar, anno 964; Cowel.

H.

H. The eighth letter of the alphabet. See ABBREVIATIONS.

HABE OR HAVE (Lat.). Sometimes used in the titles of the codes of Theodosius and Justinian for Ave (hail). Calv. Lex.; Spel. Gloss.

HABEAS CORPORA JURATORUM (Lat. that you have the bodies). In English Practice. A writ issued out of the common pleas, commanding the sheriff to compel the appearance of a jury in a cause between the parties. It answered the same purpose as a distingas juratores in the king's bench. See 3 Bla. Com. 354. It is abolished by the Common-law Procedure Act.

HABEAS CORPUS (Lat. that you have the body). A writ directed to the person detaining another and commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner at a certain time and place, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, to do, submit to, and receive whatsoever the court or judge awarding the writ shall consider in that behalf.

This is the most famous writ in the law; and, having for many centuries been employed to remove illegal restraint upon personal liberty, no matter by what power imposed, it is often called the great writ of liberty. It takes its name from the characteristic words it contained when the process and records of the English courts were written in Latin:

Præcipimus tibi quod CORPUS A B in custodia vestra detentum, ut dicitur, una cum causa captionis et detentionis sue, quocunque nomine idem A B censeatur in eadem, HABEAS coram nobis apud Westm. &c. ad subiiciendum et recipiendum ea quæ curia nostra de eo ad tunc et ibidem ordinari contigerit in hac parte, &c.

There were several other writs which contained the words habeas corpus; but they were distinguished from this and from one another by the specific terms declaring the object of the writ, which terms are still retained in the nomenclature of writs: as, habeas corpus ad respondendum, ad testificandum, ad satisfaciendum, ad prosequendum, and ad faciendum et recipiendum, ad deliberandum et recipiendum.

This writ was in like manner designated as habeas corpus ad subiiciendum et recipiendum; but, having acquired in public esteem a marked importance by reason of the nobler uses to which it has been devoted, it has so far appropriated the generic term to itself that it is now, by way of eminence, commonly called The Writ of Habeas Corpus.

The date of its origin cannot now be ascertained. Traces of its existence are found in the Year Book 48 Ed. III. 22; and it appears to have been familiar to, and well understood by, the judges in the reign of Henry VI. In its early history it appears to have been used as a means of relief from private restraint. The earliest precedents where it was used against the crown are in the reign of Henry VII. Afterwards the use of it became more frequent, and in the time of Charles I. it was held an admitted constitutional remedy; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 145; Church, Hab. Corp. 3. In writing of procedure in the thirteenth century the recent work which throws so much new light upon the early history of English law, says: "Those famous words habeas corpus are making their way into divers writs, but for any habitual use of them for the purpose of investigating the cause of imprisonment we must wait until a later time." There is also a reference to what is termed the use of habeas corpus as "at one time a part of the ordinary mesne process in a personal action," also referred to as "the Bractonian process which inserts a habeas corpus between attachment and distress," which (habeas corpus) a little later seems to disappear. No other allusion is made to the subject; 2 Pol. & Maitl. 584, 591.

A still later writer who is as earnest in tracing the fountains of English law to a Roman source, as the writers last quoted are indisposed to do so, says on the subject:

"The presence in the Pandects of every important doctrine of habeas corpus is an interesting fact, and suggests that the proceeding probably came to England, as it did to Spain, from the Roman law. There is no evidence, so far as I have been able to discover, that the process was of British or Teutonic origin. It is fully described in the forty-third book of the Pandects. The first text is the line from the 'Perpetual Edicts,' ait prætor: quem liberum dolo malo retines, exhibeas. 'The prætor declares: produce the freeman whom you unlawfully detain.' The writ was called the interdict or order 'de homine libero exhibendo.' After quoting this article of the Edict, the compilers of the Pandects introduced the commentary of Ulpian to the extent of perhaps two pages of a modern law book, and the leading rules which he derives from the text are law, I believe, to-day in England and America. Thus he says:—

"This writ is devised for the preservation of liberty to the end that no one shall detain a free person."

"The word freeman includes every freeman, infant or adult, male or female, one or many, whether sui juris, or under the power of another. For we only consider this: Is the person free?"

"He who does not know that a freeman is detained in his house is not in bad faith; but as soon as he is advised of the fact he becomes in bad faith."

"The prætor says exhibeas (produce, exhibit). To exhibit a person is to produce him publicly, so that he can be seen and handled."

"This writ may be applied for by any person; for no one is forbidden to act in favor of liberty."

"And to this commentary of Ulpian the compilers also add some extracts from Venuleius, who, among other things says:

"A person ought not to be detained in bad faith for any time; and so no delay should be granted to the person who thus detains him." In other words, a writ of habeas corpus should be returnable and heard instantaneously.

"It seems certain that this writ might have been applied for in Britain during the four centuries of Roman occupation, at least when not suspended by a condition of martial law; and after the restoration of the Christian Church in the seventh century, and the occupation of judicial positions by bishops and other learned clerics, familiar with such procedure, it is not unreasonable to assume that it was revived and took its place in English law." Howe, Studies in the Civil Law 54.

After the use of the writ became more common, abuses crept into the practice, which in some measure impaired the usefulness of the writ. The party imprisoning was at liberty to delay his obedience to the first writ, and might wait till a second and third were issued before he produced the party; and many other vexatious shifts were practised to detain state prisoners in custody; 3 Bla. Com. 135.

Greater promptitude in its execution was required to render the writ efficacious. The subject was accordingly brought forward in parliament in 1688, and renewed from time to time until 1679, when the celebrated Habeas Corpus Act of 31 Car. II. was passed. The passage of this act has been made the theme of the highest praise and congratulation by British authors, and is even said to have "extinguished all the resources of oppression;" Hurd, Hab. Corp. 93; Church, Hab. Corp. 37.

This act being limited to cases of commitments for "criminal or supposed criminal matters," every other species of restraint of personal liberty was left to the ordinary remedy at common law; but, doubts being entertained as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the judge to inquire into the truth of the return to the writ in such cases, an attempt was made, in 1757, in the house of lords, to render the jurisdiction more remedial. It was opposed by Lord Mansfield as unnecessary, and failed, for the time, of success. It was subsequently renewed, however; and the act of 56 Geo. III. c. 100 supplies, in England, all the needed legislation in cases not embraced by the act of 31 Car. II.; Hurd, Hab. Corp.

The English colonists in America regarded the privilege of the writ as one of the "dearest birth-rights of Britons;" and sufficient indications exist that it was frequently resorted to. The denial of it in Massachusetts by Judge Dudley in 1689 to Rev. John Wise, imprisoned for resisting the collection of an oppressive and illegal tax, was made the subject of a civil action against the judge, and was, moreover, denounced, as one of the grievances of the people, in a pamphlet published in 1689 on the authority of "the gentlemen, merchants, and inhabitants of Boston and the country adjacent." In New York in 1707 it served to effect the release of the Presbyterian ministers Makemie and Hampton from an illegal warrant of arrest issued by the governor, Cornbury, for preaching the gospel without license. In New Jersey in 1710 the assembly denounced one of the judges for refusing the writ to Thomas Gordon, which, they said, was the "undoubted right and great privilege of the subject." In South Carolina in 1692 the assembly adopted the act of 31 Car. II. This act was extended to Virginia by Queen Anne early in her reign, while in the assembly of Maryland in 1723 the benefit of its provisions was claimed, independent of royal favor, as the "birth-right of the inhabitants." The refusal of parliament in 1774 to extend the law of habeas corpus to Canada was denounced by the continental congress in September of that year as oppressive, and was subsequently recounted in the Declaration of Independence as one of the manifestations on the part of the British government of tyranny over the colonies; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 109-120.

It is provided in art. i. sec. 9, § 2 of the constitution of the United States that "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

Similar provisions are found in the constitutions of most of the states. In Virginia, Vermont, Louisiana, and North Carolina, however, it is forbidden to suspend the privilege of the writ in any case; but in the constitution of Maryland, the writ is not mentioned. In Massachusetts the suspension cannot exceed twelve months, and in New Hampshire, three months. In Florida the governor is authorized to suspend the writ in case of insurrection or rebellion.

In 1861, C. J. Taney decided in the U. S. circuit court of Maryland, that congress alone possessed the power under the constitution to suspend the writ; 9 Am. L. Reg. 524; Taney 246; this view was also taken by other courts; 16 Wis. 360; 44 Barb. 98; 21 Ind. 370; contra, 5 Blatchf. 63. In the beginning of the war of the rebellion, President Lincoln suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus on his own authority, and without the sanction of an act of congress. He was supported in his opinion of his right to suspend by some of the legal writers of the time, notably by Horace Binney of Philadelphia; but the better opinion has always been that this suspension without the sanction of congress was unconstitutional. For the history of this controversy see 3 Political Science Quarterly 454; 5 Am. Lawyer 169. The privilege of the writ is, however, necessarily suspended whenever martial law is declared in force; for martial law suspends all civil process. A prisoner of war, therefore, or one held by military arrest under the law martial, is not a subject for the habeas corpus writ; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 63. See MARTIAL LAW. Nor is a prisoner in the military or naval service whose offence is properly cognizable before a court martial; 158 U. S. 109. Congress, by act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. L. 755, authorized the president to suspend the privilege of the writ throughout the whole or any part of the United States, whenever in his judgment the public safety might require it, during the rebellion. Under the provisions of this act, a partial suspension took place, but it was held that the suspension of the privilege of the writ does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course; and on the return made to it the court decides whether the party applying is denied the right of proceeding any further with it; 4 Wall. 115. Nor does the suspension of the writ legalize a wrongful arrest and imprisonment; it deprives the person thus arrested of the means of procuring his liberty, but does not exempt the person making the illegal arrest from liability for damages, nor from criminal prosecution; 21 Ind. 472; contra, 1 Pacific L. Mag. 360; 1 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 64.

The power has never been exercised by the legislature of any of the states, except that of Massachusetts, which, on the occasion of "Shay's Rebellion," suspended the privilege of the writ from November, 1786, to July, 1787. And in the Confederate States, the privilege was suspended during the war of the rebellion; 2 Winston 143; 27 Tex. 705.

Congress has prescribed the jurisdiction of the federal courts under the writ; but, never having particularly prescribed the mode of procedure, they have substantially followed in that respect the rules of the common law.

In most of the states statutes have been passed, not only providing what courts or officers may issue the writ, but, to a considerable extent, regulating the practice under it; yet in all of them the proceeding retains its old distinctive feature and merit,—that of a summary appeal for immediate deliverance from illegal imprisonment.

Jurisdiction of state courts. The states, being in all respects, except as to the powers delegated in the federal constitution, sovereign political communities, are limited, as to their judicial power, only by that instrument; and they, accordingly, at will, create, apportion, and limit the jurisdiction of their respective courts over the writ of habeas corpus, as well as other legal process, subject only to such constitutional restriction; Church, Hab. Corp. 67.

The restrictions in the federal constitution on this subject are necessarily implied from the express grants of judicial power therein to the federal courts in certain cases specified in art. iii. sec. 2, and in which the decision of the supreme court of the United States is paramount over that of all other courts and conclusive upon the parties.

Jurisdiction of the federal courts. This is prescribed by several acts of congress. By the 14th sec. of the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. L. 81, it is provided that the supreme, circuit, and district courts may issue writs of seire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles and usages of law; and that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, may grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment; "provided, that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol, unless they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify."

By the seventh section of the "Act further to provide for the collection of duties or imposts," passed March 2, 1833, 4 Stat. L. 634, the jurisdiction of the justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts is extended to "all cases of a prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined on or by any authority or law for any act done or omitted to be done, in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree of any judge or court thereof." The federal courts may grant the writ to inquire into the cause of restraint of any person in jail under the authority of a state in violation of the constitution or of a law or treaty of the United States, but except in cases of peculiar urgency they will not discharge the prisoner in advance of a final hearing of his cause in the courts of the state, and even after such final determination in those courts will generally leave the petitioner to his remedy by writ of error from this court; 160 U. S. 231. See also 155 U. S. 89. This decision was rendered necessary by the practice of using the writ of habeas corpus as a means to take an appeal from state tribunals to the supreme court of the United States for the purpose of delaying the trial or execution of criminals, and the evil of it has been well set forth by Hon. Seymour D. Thompson in 30 Am. Law Rev. 289, 290.

By the "Act to provide further remedial justice in the courts of the United States," passed August 29, 1842, 5 Stat. L. 539, the jurisdiction of the justices and judges aforesaid is further extended "to all cases of any prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, when he, she, or they, being subjects or citizens of a foreign state, and domiciled therein, shall be committed or confined or in custody under or by any authority or law, or process founded thereon, of the United States, or of any of them, for or on account of any act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, or authority, privilege, protection, or exemption set up or claimed under the commission or order or sanction of any foreign state or sovereignty, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations, or under color thereof."

By the third section of the "Act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service," passed July 20, 1790, 1 Stat. L. 131, it is provided that refractory seamen in certain cases shall not be discharged on habeas corpus or otherwise.

By an act approved February 6, 1867, it is provided that when, in any suit begun in a state court and removed to the circuit court of the United States, the defendant is in actual custody under state process, the clerk of the circuit court shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa to the marshal to take the prisoner into custody to be dealt with in said circuit court according to its rules of law and order; R. S. § 642.

By act of congress, May 3, 1885, an appeal may be taken from the judgment of the United States circuit courts in habeas corpus cases to the supreme court. Since the passage of this act it has been generally held that the supreme court will not issue the writ where it may be done as well in the proper Circuit Court, unless there are special circumstances making action by the supreme court expedient or necessary; 119 U. S. 584; 137 U. S. 63. The writ will not be issued when it appears by the petition that the question has already been decided against the petitioner by another judge in the same court; 45 Fed. Rep. 241. In cases where the right of appeal seems inadequate by reason of its delay, the court may hold the person entitled to the writ as a means of speedy determination of the question; 40 Fed. Rep. 399. In 128 U. S. 395, a judge of the supreme court refused to grant the writ in chambers to the captain of a steamer committed under the laws of Pennsylvania for selling liquor on the steamer without license on the ground that the federal question if any could be raised by writ of error.

Federal courts cannot grant the writ upon a petition that the person is held under the capias of a state court issued upon a judgment that has been vacated; 39 Fed. Rep. 869. A district court cannot, by issuing a writ, declare a judgment of a state criminal court a nullity where such court had full jurisdiction over the crime; 43 Fed. Rep. 661. But the writ can be issued to test the question as to the arrest and imprisonment of a supposed fugitive from justice on the charge of a different offence from that for which he was extradited; 45 Fed. Rep. 471. See also 43 Fed. Rep. 517. In general the writ may be issued by federal courts in every case where a party is restrained of his liberty without due process of law in the territorial jurisdiction of such courts; 40 Fed. Rep. 66; 135 U. S. 1. The granting of the writ is within the discretion of the court and will not be reversed unless an abuse thereof be shown; 33 Fed. Rep. 117. But where the petitioner had been convicted on the indictment of a grand jury impanelled by a court without authority, it was held that the writ became a writ of right and the court having power to issue it could not exercise sound discretion against issuing it; 40 Fed. Rep. 66. A medical director in the navy notified by the secretary of the navy that he was under arrest and should confine himself to the city of Washington is not under such restraint as to sustain the writ; 114 U. S. 564.

The writ does not issue as a matter of course from the federal courts and the petition must show a prima facie right thereto; 52 Fed. Rep. 795; 51 id. 434; 49 id. 238. And only in rare cases will federal courts discharge prisoners held under process of state courts; 79 Fed. Rep. 305, 308. See 30 Am. L. Reg. 209.

The supreme court issues the writ by virtue of its appellate jurisdiction; 4 Cra. 75; 108 U. S. 552; and it will not grant it at the instance of the subject of a foreign government to obtain the custody of a minor child detained by a citizen of one of the states; for that would be the exercise of original jurisdiction; 2 How. 65. An appeal lies to the supreme court from a final order of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico ordering a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged; 164 U. S. 612.

It will grant it on the application of one committed for trial in the circuit court on a criminal charge; 4 Cra. 75; 3 Dall. 17; and where the petitioner is committed on an insufficient warrant; 3 Cra. 448; and where he is detained by the marshal on a capias ad satisfaciendum after the return-day of the writ; 7 Pet. 568; also for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the restraint of the liberty of prisoners in jail under or by color of the authority of the United States, and all persons who are in custody in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States; 128 U. S. 289. An alien immigrant may have a writ to test the lawfulness of his restraint from landing by a federal office; 142 U. S. 651.

None of the courts of the United States have authority to grant the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment, where the prisoner is imprisoned under process issued from the state courts, excepting where he is denied, or cannot enforce, in the judicial tribunals of the state, any right secured to him by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States; R. S. § 641; 2 Woods 342. It was refused by the supreme court where the party for whose benefit the application was made had been convicted in a state court of levying war against the state; 3 How. 103. Federal courts will proceed with great caution upon applications for writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person imprisoned under process of the state courts, and, when practicable, will investigate the questions raised before issuing the writ; 49 Fed. Rep. 238. See also paper by Seymour D. Thompson on the abuse and too rigorous use of the writ of habeas corpus by the federal judges; 6 Rep. Am. Bar. Assoc. 243.

It was refused by the circuit court where the petitioner, a secretary attached to the Spanish legation, was confined under criminal process issued under the authority of the state of Pennsylvania; 1 Wash. C. C. 232; also where the petitioner, a British seaman, was arrested under the authority of an act of the legislature of the state of South Carolina, which was held to conflict with the constitution of the United States; 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 56.

It will be granted, however, where the imprisonment, although by a state officer, is under or by color of the authority of the United States, as where the prisoner was arrested under a governor's warrant as a fugitive from justice of another state, requisition having been regularly made; 3 McLean 121; or where extradited under a treaty with a foreign country upon the charge of a certain offence for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted, and immediately thereafter he was arrested under a charge entirely separate and distinct from the former one; 39 Fed. Rep. 204. It will also be granted where U. S. Marshals or their deputies are arrested by state authority for using force or threats in executing process of the federal courts; 47 Fed. Rep. 802; but see 51 id. 277. Federal judges should grant writs to persons imprisoned for any act done in pursuance of a law of the United States; 135 U. S. 1.

The power of the federal courts to issue the writ is confined to cases in which the prisoner is in custody under or by order of the authority of the United States, or is committed for trial before some court thereof, or is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States, or of an order, process, or decree of a court or judge thereof; or is in custody in violation of the constitution, or of a law or treaty of the United States, or being a subject or citizen of a foreign state, and domiciled therein, is in custody for an act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption claimed under the commission, or order, or sanction of any foreign state, or under color thereof, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations; or where it is necessary to bring the prisoner into court to testify; R. S. § 753.

If it appears from the petition itself that the applicant for the writ of habeas corpus is not entitled thereto, the writ need not be awarded; 128 U. S. 289; 52 Fed. Rep. 795. The writ cannot be made to perform the office of a writ of error to review the decision of a committing magistrate in extradition proceedings; 161 U. S. 502. Nor will the writ lie, except in rare and exceptional cases, where there is a remedy by writ of error or appeal; 159 U. S. 95. The writ may be issued to determine the right to the custody of an infant as between parents who are living apart; 42 Fed. Rep. 113.

Proper use of the writ. The true use of the writ is to cause a legal inquiry into the cause of imprisonment, and to procure the release of the prisoner where that is found to be illegal.

If the imprisonment be claimed by virtue of legal process, the validity and present force of such process are the only subjects of investigation; 5 Hill 164; 4 Barb. 31; 4 Harr. Del. 575.

But such process cannot, in this proceeding, be invalidated by errors which only render it irregular. The defects, to entitle the prisoner to be discharged, must be such as to render the process void; for the writ of habeas corpus is not, and cannot perform the office of, a writ of error; 3 Vt. 114; 4 Day 436; 3 Hawks 25; 2 La. 422, 587; 2 Park. Cr. Cas. 650; 1 Hill, N. Y. 154; 4 C. & P. 415; 7 Ohio St. 81; 81 Wis. 158; 25 Fla. 214; 16 Or. 33; 131 U. S. 267; 133 id. 333; 148 id. 162; 150 id. 637; 51 Fed. Rep. 434; 118 Mo. 377; but will only be issued if applied for to relieve from imprisonment under the order or sentence of some inferior federal court, when such court has acted without jurisdiction, or has exceeded its jurisdiction, and its order is for that reason void; 4 U. S. App. 73.

Although the writ of habeas corpus does not lie for the determination of mere errors where a conviction has been had and the commitment thereunder is in due form, yet if the court had no jurisdiction of the offence charged, or if it affirmatively appears by the record that the prisoner was tried and sentenced for the commission of an act which under the law constitutes no crime, the judgment is void and the prisoner should be discharged; 73 Cal. 120, 365; 127 U. S. 731; 131 id. 176; 19 Nev. 178; 79 Ga. 785.

It cannot be used to oust another competent and acting jurisdiction, or to divert or defeat the course of justice therein; 5 Ark. 424; 1 Ill. 198; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 351; 19 Ala. N. S. 438; 2 Wheat. 532; 3 Yerg. 167; 1 Edw. Ch. 551; 1 Harr. Del. 392; 6 Miss. 80; 1 Curt. 178; 2 Green, N. J. 312; 4 McCord 233; 1 Watts 66; 7 Cush. 285; 8 Ohio St. 599; 139 U. S. 449. It was not intended by congress that the federal courts should, by writs of habeas corpus, obstruct the ordinary administration of the criminal laws of the states through their own tribunals; 140 U. S. 278; 142 id. 155.

The only ground on which a court, without some special statute authorizing it, will give relief on habeas corpus to a prisoner under conviction and sentence of another court, is the want of jurisdiction in such court over the person or the cause, or some other matter rendering its proceedings void; 149 U. S. 70; 134 id. 136; 131 id. 176.

The writ is also employed to recover the custody of a person where the applicant has a legal right thereto: as, the husband for his wife, the parent for his child, the guardian for his ward, and the master for his apprentice; 35 W. Va. 698; 35 Fed. Rep. 354; [1892] App. Cas. 326. But in such cases, as the just object of the proceeding is rather to remove illegal restraint than to enforce specifically the claims of private custody, the alleged prisoner, if an adult of sound mind, is generally permitted to go at large; if an infant of sufficient age and discretion, it is usually permitted to elect in whose custody it will remain, provided that it does not elect an injurious or improper custody; and if of tender years, without such discretion, the court determines its custody according to what the true interests and welfare of the child may at the time require; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 450.

Application for the writ. This may be made by the prisoner, or by any one on his behalf, where for any reason he is unable to make it.

It is usually made by petition in writing, verified by affidavit, stating that the petitioner is unlawfully detained, etc., and, where the imprisonment is under legal process, a copy thereof, if attainable, should be presented with the petition; for where the prisoner is under sentence on conviction for crime, or in execution on civil process, or committed for treason or felony plainly expressed in the warrant, he is not, in most of the states, entitled to the writ; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 209; Church, Hab. Corp. 91. The application must set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what authority, if known; 131 U. S. 280.

Where, with ample opportunity to do so, an accused did not apply for the writ of habeas corpus until after the jury had been sworn and his trial begun in a state court, the federal court will not interpose at that stage of the cause; 146 U. S. 183.

The return. The person to whom the writ is directed is required to produce the body of the prisoner forthwith before the court or officer therein named, and to show the cause of the caption and detention; 5 Term 89; 2 South. 545. The return must specify the true cause of the detention; and the party imprisoned may deny any of the facts set forth in the return, or may allege other facts that may be material in the case, so that the facts may be ascertained and the matter disposed of as law and justice require; 131 U. S. 280. No evidence is necessary to support the return, as it imports verity until impeached; 137 U. S. 86.

If the writ be returned without the body, the return must show that the prisoner is not in the possession, custody, or power of the party making the return, or that the prisoner cannot, without serious danger to his life, be produced; and any evasion on this point will be dealt with summarily by attachment; 5 Term 89; 10 Johns. 328; 1 Dudl. 46; 5 Cra. 622.

Where the detention is claimed under legal process, a copy of it is attached to the return. Where the detention is under a claim of private custody, all the facts relied on to justify the restraint are set forth in the return.

The hearing. The questions arising upon the return or otherwise in the proceeding, whether of fact or of law, are determined by the court or judge, and not by a jury; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 299.

The evidence on the hearing is such as is allowed in other summary proceedings in which the strictness exacted on the trial in civil actions or criminal prosecutions is somewhat relaxed, the practice sometimes permitting affidavits to be read where there has been no opportunity for cross-examination; but the introduction of such evidence rests in the sound discretion of the court; Archb. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 204; Coxe 403; Sandf. 701; 20 How. S. Tr. 1376; 1 Burr's Trial 97. The court is not concluded by the finding of a committing magistrate, but may go behind his order of commitment, and by certiorari look into the evidence before him; 5 Blatchf. 303; 32 Pa. 520. See 49 Fed. Rep. 569.

Pending the hearing the court may commit the prisoner for safekeeping from day to day, until the decision of the case; 14 How. 134; Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus (B 13); 5 Mod. 22.

If the imprisonment be illegal, it is the duty of the court to discharge the prisoner from that imprisonment; but if the court or officer hearing the habeas corpus be invested with the powers of an examining and committing magistrate in the particular case, and the evidence taken before the court, or regularly certified to it in the habeas corpus proceeding, so far implicate the prisoner in the commission of crime as to justify his being held for trial, it is usual for the court, in default of bail, to commit him as upon an original examination; 3 East 157; 16 Pa. 575; 2 Cra. C. C. 612; 5 Cow. 12. Where a prisoner is held under a valid sentence and commitment, the illegality of a second sentence will not be inquired into as habeas corpus till the term under the first sentence has expired; 17 Nev. 139.

If the prisoner is not discharged or committed de novo, he must be remanded, or, in a proper case, let to bail; and all offences are bailable prior to the conviction of the offender, except "capital offences when the proof is evident or presumption great;" Hurd, Hab. Corp. 430.

Recommitment after discharge. The act of 31 Car. II. prohibited, under the penalty of five hundred pounds, the reimprisoning for the same offence of any person set at large on habeas corpus, except by the legal order and process of such court wherein such prisoner was bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause. Somewhat similar provisions are found in the statutes of many of the states. But these provisions are not held to prevent the subsequent arrest of the prisoner on other and more perfect process, although relating to the same criminal act; 9 Pet. 704; 2 Miss. 163.

HABEAS CORPUS ACTS. See HABEAS CORPUS.

HABEAS CORPUS AD DELIBERANDUM ET RECIPIENDUM (Lat.).

A writ which is issued to remove, for trial, a person confined in one county to the county or place where the offence of which he is accused was committed. Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus, A; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132. Thus, it has been granted to remove a person in custody for contempt to take his trial for perjury in another county; 1 Tyrwh. 185.

HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM ET RECIPIENDUM (Lat.). A writ usually issued in civil cases to remove an action from an inferior court, where the defendant is sued and imprisoned, to some superior court which has jurisdiction over the matter, in order that the cause may be determined there. This writ is commonly called habeas corpus cum causa, because it commands the judges of the inferior court to return the day and cause of the caption and detainer of the prisoner; Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus, A; 3 Bla. Com. 130; Tidd, Pr. 296.

This writ may also be issued at the instance of the bail of the defendant, to bring him up to be surrendered in their discharge, whether he is in custody on a civil suit or on a criminal accusation; Tidd, Pr. 298; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132.

HABEAS CORPUS AD PROSECUTENDUM (Lat.). A writ which issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner in order to prosecute in the proper jurisdiction wherein the fact was committed. 3 Bla. Com. 130.

HABEAS CORPUS AD RESPONDENDUM (Lat.). A writ which is usually employed in civil cases to remove a person out of the custody of one court into that of another, in order that he may be sued and answer the action in the latter. 2 Mod. 198; 3 Bla. Com. 129; Tidd, Pr. 300.

This writ lies also to bring up a person in confinement to answer a criminal charge: thus, the court issued it to the warden of the fleet, to take the body of the prisoner confined there before a magistrate to be examined respecting a change of felony or misdemeanor; 5 B. & Ald. 730.

But it was refused to bring up the body of a prisoner under sentence for a felony, for the purpose of having him tried for a previous felony.

HABEAS CORPUS AD SATISFACIENDUM (Lat.). A writ which is issued to bring a prisoner from the prison of one court into that of another, in order to charge him in execution upon a judgment of the last court. 3 Bla. Com. 130; Tidd, Pr. 301.

HABEAS CORPUS AD SUBJICIENDUM. See HABEAS CORPUS.

HABEAS CORPUS AD TESTIFICANDUM (Lat.). A writ which lies to bring up a prisoner detained in any jail or prison, to give evidence before any court of competent jurisdiction. Tidd, Pr. 739; 3 Bla. Com. 130; 20 Iowa 372; 91 Mo. 250; 3 Burr. 1440; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 351.

The allowance of this writ resting in the discretion of the court, it will be refused if the application appear to be in bad faith or a mere contrivance; 3 Burr. 1440.

It was refused to bring up a prisoner of war; 2 Dougl. 419; or a prisoner in custody for high treason; Peake, Add. Cas. 21.

It would of course be refused where it appear from the application that the prisoner was under sentence for crime which rendered him incompetent as a witness.

The application for the writ is made upon affidavit, stating the nature of the suit and the materiality of the testimony, together with the general circumstances of restraint which render the writ necessary: Cowp. 672; 2 Cow. & H. Notes to Phill. Ev. 658.

HABEAS CORPUS CUM CAUSA.

See HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM ET RECIPIENDUM.

HABENDUM (Lat.). In Conveyancing. The clause usually following the granting part of the premises of a deed, which defines the extent of the ownership in the thing granted to be held and enjoyed by grantee. 3 Washb. R. P. 436.

It commences with the words "to have and to hold," habendum et tenendum. It is not an essential part of a deed, but serves to qualify, define, or control it; Co. Litt. 6 a. 299; 4 Kent 468; 8 Mass. 162, 174; and may be rejected if clearly repugnant to the rest of the deed; Shepp. Touchst. 103; Skinn. 543. See, generally, 3 Washb. R. P. 436; 4 Kent 468; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 273; Elph. Deeds 217.

HABENTES HOMINES (Lat.). Rich men. Du Cange.

HABENTIA. Wealth; Riches. Mon. Ang. t. 1. 100.

HABERE (Lat.). To have. It is said to designate the right, while tenere (to hold) signifies the possession, and possidere (to possess) includes both. Calv. Lex.

HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM (Lat.). In Practice. A writ of execution in the action of ejectment; originally to recover possession of a chattel interest in real estate.

The sheriff is commanded by this writ that, without delay, he cause the plaintiff to have possession of the land in dispute which is therein described: a fi. fa. or ca. sa. for costs may be included in the writ. The duty of the sheriff in the execution and return of that part of the writ is the same as on a common fi. fa. or ca. sa. The sheriff is to execute this writ by delivering a full and actual possession of the premises to the plaintiff. For this purpose, he may break an outer or inner door of the house; and, should he be violently opposed, he may raise the posse comitatus; 5 Co. 91 b; 1 Leon. 145.

The name of this writ is abbreviated hab. fac. poss. See 10 Viner, Abr. 14; Tidd, Pr. 1081; 2 Arch. Pr. 58; 3 Bla. Com. 412.

HABERE FACIAS SEISINAM (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ of execution, used in most real actions, by which the sheriff is directed that he cause the demandant to have seisin of the lands which he has recovered. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3374. It lay to recover possession of the freehold, while to recover a chattel interest in real estate the habere facias possessionem was the appropriate writ. It was practically abolished in England by the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1860, but is still known in some of the states in connection with the action of dower.

This writ may be taken out at any time within a year and a day after judgment. It is to be executed nearly in the same manner as the writ of habere facias possessionem, and for this purpose the officer may break open the outer door of a house to deliver seisin to the demandant; 5 Co. 91 b; Com. Dig. Execution, E. The name of this writ is abbreviated hab. fac. seis.

HABERE FACIAS VISUM (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ which lay when a view is to be taken of lands and tenements. Fitzh. N. B. Index, View.

HABERE LICERE. See SALE.

HABERGEON. A diminutive of hauberk, a short coat of mail without sleeves. Blount.

HABERJECTO. A cloth of mixed color. Magna charta, c. 26.

HABETO TIBI RES TUAS. Have or take thy property to thyself. A phrase used in connection with the Roman law of divorce. Calv. Lex. Where a marriage in one of their modes, by which the wife passed in manum viri, was dissolved by divorce, the husband had to restore the dos, as in case of the wife's death, unless her misconduct was the cause; Sand. Just. 152.

HABILIS (Lat.). Fit; suitable; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 436. Active; useful (of a servant). Du Cange. Proved; authentic (of Book of Saints). Du Cange. Fixed; stable (of authority of the king). Du Cange.

HABIT. A disposition or condition of the body or mind acquired by custom or a frequent repetition of the same act. See 2 Mart. La. n. s. 622; 18 Pa. 172; 5 Gray 851. The customary conduct, to pursue which one has acquired a tendency, from frequent repetition of the same acts. 105 U. S. 354.

The habit of dealing has always an important bearing upon the construction of commercial contracts. A ratification will be inferred from the mere habit of dealing between the parties: as if a broker has been accustomed to settle losses on policies in a particular manner, without any objection being made, or with the silent approbation of his principal, and he should afterwards settle other policies in the same manner, to which no objection should be made within a reasonable time, a just presumption would arise of an implied ratification: for, if the principal did not agree to such settlement, he should have declared his dissent. See USAGE.

The habit of an animal is, in its nature, a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind; 131 U. S. 22.

HABIT AND REPUTE. Applied in Scotch law to a general understanding and belief of something's having happened : e. g. marriage may be constituted by habit and repute ; Bell, Dict.

HABITABLE REPAIR. Such a state of repair that leased premises may be occupied, not only with safety, but with reasonable comfort. 2 Mood. & R. 186.

HABITANCY. See INHABITANT.

HABITANT. A resident ; an inhabitant (q. v.). A native of Canada of French descent, particularly of the peasant or farming class ; a tenant who kept hearth and home on the seignior.

HABITATION (Lat. Habitatio). In Civil Law. The right of a person to live in the house of another without prejudice to the property.

It differed from a usufruct in this, that the usufructuary might apply the house to any purpose,—as of a store or manufactory ; whereas the party having the right of habitation could only use it for the residence of himself and family ; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 184 ; Domat, l. 1, t. 11, s. 2, n. 7.

In Estate. A dwelling-house ; a home stall. 2 Bla. Com. 4 ; 4 id. 220.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS ACT. The stat. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99. Its object was to give the police greater control over convicted criminals at large, and to provide for the registration of criminals. Now repealed and other provisions substituted for it, by the Prevention of Crime Act, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112. Moz. & W.

In Massachusetts it is held that the state habitual criminal act is not contrary to the United States constitution prohibiting ex post facto laws ; 155 Mass. 163 ; 158 id. 598.

HABITUAL DRUNKARD. A person given to inebriety or the excessive use of intoxicating drink, who has lost the power or the will, by frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it. 18 Pa. 172 ; 5 Gray 85. One who has the habit of indulging in intoxicating drinks so firmly fixed that he becomes drunk whenever the temptation is presented by his being near where liquor is sold. 35 Mich. 210. The custom or habit of getting drunk ; the constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy, and whisky, whereby intoxication is produced ; not the ordinary use, but the habitual use of them ; the habit should be actual and confirmed, but need not be continuous, or even of daily occurrence ; 9 So. Rep. (La.) 750. If there is a fixed habit of drinking to excess, so as to disqualify a person from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business, it is habitual intemperance ; 19 Cal. 267 ; but see 53 Ia. 511.

Habitual drunkenness of a husband does not entitle the wife to a divorce ; L. R. 1 P. & M. 46 ; contra, 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 1731. The fact that a man has had delirium tremens once does not prove, as a matter of law, that he is habitually intemperate, so as to contradict his representation to the contrary ; 122 U. S. 501.

By the laws of some states, such persons are classed with idiots, lunatics, etc., in regard to the care of property ; and in some, they are liable to punishment. See 8 N. Y. 388 ; Crabbe 558 ; 6 Wash. 271. See Rogers, Drinks, etc. ; DRUNKENNESS ; DELIRIUM TREMENS ; INTOXICATION.

HABITUALLY. Customarily ; by frequent practice or use. It does not mean entirely or exclusively ; 91 Cal. 274.

HABLE. A seaport ; a harbor ; a naval station. Stat. 27 Hen. VI. c. 3.

HACIENDA. In Spanish Law. A generic term, applicable to the mass of the property belonging to a state, and the administration of the same. Also a private estate or plantation.

As a science, it is defined by Dr. Jose Canga Argüells, in his "Diccionario de Hacienda," to be that part of civil economy which teaches how to aggrandize a nation by the useful employment of its wealth.

A royal estate. Newman & B. Dict.

HACKNEY CARRIAGES. Carriages plying for hire in the street. The driver is liable for negligently losing baggage ; 2 C. 13, 877 ; 33 How. Pr. 481. They are usually regulated in large cities by statute or ordinance ; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86 ; 122 Mass. 60.

HADBOTE. In English Law. A recompense or amends made for violence offered to a person in holy orders.

HADD. A boundary or limit. A statutory punishment defined by law, and not arbitrary. Moz. & W.

HADERUNGA. Hatred ; ill-will ; prejudice. Spelman.

HADGONEL. A tax or mulct. Jacob.

HAEC EST CONVENTIO (Lat.). This is an agreement. Words with which agreements anciently commenced. Yearb. H. 6 Edw. II. 191.

HAEC EST FINALIS CONCORDIA (L. Lat.). This is the final agreement. The words with which the foot of a fine commenced. 2 Bl. Com. 351.

HÆREDA. The name, under the Gothic constitutions, of the hundred court (q. v.). 3 Bla. Com. 35 ; 3 Steph. Com. 281, 282, n. (q.).

HÆREDE ABDUCTO. An ancient writ that lay for the lord, who, having by right the wardship of his tenant under age, could not obtain access to his person, by reason of the ward having been carried away by another person. Old. Nat. Brev. 93 ; Cowel.

HÆREDE DELIBERANDO ALTERI QUI HABET CUSTODIAM TERRÆ. An ancient writ, directed to the sheriff, requiring him to command one who had taken away an heir under age, being his ward, to deliver him to the person whose ward he was by reason of his land. Reg. Orig. 161.

HÆREDE RAPTO. An ancient writ that lay for the ravishment of the lord's ward. Reg. Orig. 163.

HÆREDES. Heirs. Plural of Hæres, which see, together with titles immediately following it.

HÆREDIPETA (Law Lat.). In Old English Law. The next heir to lands. Laws of Hen. I.; Du Cange. And who seeks to be made heir (qui cupit hæreditatem). Concil. Compostel. anno 1114 can. 18, inter Hispan. t. 3, p. 324; Du Cange.

HÆREDITAS (Lat. from hæres). In Civil Law. "Nihil aliud est hæreditas, quam successio in universum jus, quod defunctus habuit." Inheritance is nothing else than succession to every right which the deceased possessed. Dig. 50. 17; 50. 16; 5. 2; Mack. C. L. § 605; Bracton 62 b. See HÆRES.

In Old English Law. An estate transmissible by descent; an inheritance. Marten, Anecd. Collect. t. 3, p. 369; Co. Litt. 9.

HÆREDITAS DAMNOSA. A burdensome inheritance. See DAMNOSA HÆREDITAS.

HÆREDITAS JACENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A prostrate inheritance. The inheritance left to a voluntary heir was so called so long as he had not manifested, either expressly or by silence, his acceptance or refusal of the inheritance, which, by a fiction of law, was said to sustain the person (sustinere personam) of the deceased, and not of the heir. Mack. C. L. § 635 a. An estate with no heir or legatee to take. Code, 10. 10., 1; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 68.

In English Law. An estate in abeyance; that is, after the ancestor's death and before assumption of heir. Co. Litt. 342 b. An inheritance without legal owner, and therefore open to the first occupant. 2 Bla. Com. 259.

HÆREDITAS LUCTUOSA. The succession of parents to the estate of deceased children. 4 Kent 397. It was called a mournful inheritance because out of the ordinary and natural course of mortality. It was sometimes termed tristis successio.

HÆRES. In Roman Law. One who succeeds to the rights and occupies the place of a deceased person, being appointed by the will of the decedent. It is to be observed that the Roman hæres had not the slightest resemblance to the English heir. He corresponded in character and duties almost exactly with the executor under the English law.

The institution of the hæres was the essential characteristic of a testament: if this was not done, the instrument was called a codicillus. Mack. C. L. §§ 632, 650.

Who might not be instituted. Certain persons were not permitted to be instituted in this capacity: such as, persons not Roman citizens, slaves of such persons, persons not in being at the death of the testator, and corporations, unless especially privileged. Also, the emperor could not be made hæres with the condition that he should prosecute a suit of the testator against a subject. Nor could a second husband or wife be instituted hæres to a greater portion of the estate than was left to that child of the first marriage which received least by the will. So, a widow who married before the expiration of her year of mourning could not institute her second husband as hæres to more than a third of her estate. And a man who had legitimate children could not institute as hæres a concubine and her children to more than a twelfth of his estate, nor the mother alone to more than one-twenty-fourth; Mack. C. L. § 651.

The institution of the hæres might be absolute or conditional. But the condition, to be valid, must be suspensive (condition precedent, see CONDITION), possible, and lawful. If, however, this rule was infringed, certain conditions, as the resolutive (condition subsequent, see CONDITION), the impossible, and the immoral or indecent, were held nugatory, while others invalidated the appointment of the hæres,—as the preposterous and capitatory, i. e. the appointment of a hæres on condition that the appointee should, in turn, institute the testator or some other person hæres in his testament. In regard to limitations of time, they must, to be valid, commence ex die incerto. A condition that A should become hæres after a certain day, or that he should be hæres up to a day whether certain or uncertain, was nugatory. The testator might assign his reasons for the institution of a particular hæres, but a mistake in the facts upon which those reasons were based did not, in general, affect the validity of the appointment. The institution might be accompanied with a direction that the hæres should apply the inheritance either wholly or in part to a specified purpose, which he was bound to comply with in case he accepted the inheritance, unless it was physically impossible to do so, or unless the hæres himself was the only person affected by such directions. The hæres might be instituted either simply, without any interest in the estate, or with a fixed share therein, or with regard to some particular thing; Mack. C. L. § 653. It was customary, in order to provide against a failure to accept on the part of the direct hæres, to substitute one or more hæredes to him. This substitution might be made in various forms; but the result was the same in all,—that if the first of the direct hæredes failed to accept the inheritance, whether from indisposition, permanent incapacity, or from dying before the testator, the substitute stood in his stead. There might be several degrees of substitutes, each ready to act in case of the failure of all the preceding; and the rule was substitutus substituto est substitutus instituto; which meant that on a failure of all the intermediate substitutes, the lowest in rank succeeded to the position of the instituted hæres. This was called substitutio vulgaris. There was another, the substitutio pupillaris, which was nothing more than the appointment, by the testator, of a hæres to a minor child under his authority,—which appointment was good in case the child died after the testator, and still a minor. It was, in fact, making a testament for such minor—an act which he could not perform for himself; Mack. C. L. §§ 668, 669.

Persons entitled to the inheritance. Though, generally speaking, the testator might institute as hæres any person whatever not within the exceptions above mentioned, yet his relatives, within certain limits, were considered as peculiarly entitled to the office, and if he instituted any one else they could not be entirely excluded, but were admitted to a share of the inheritance, which share, called portio legitima, or pars legitima, was fixed by law. The rules in regard to the persons entitled to this share of the estate, and its amount, are very intricate, and too voluminous to be introduced here. They may be found in Mackeldey, §§ 654-657. Among those entitled to the pars legitima, the immediate ascendants and descendants of the testator were peculiarly distinguished in this, that they must be mentioned in the testament, either by being formally instituted as hæredes, or by being formally excluded, while the other relatives so entitled might receive their shares as a legacy, or in any other way, without being formally instituted. From this necessity of mentioning this class of relatives, they were called successores necessarii.

Acquisition of the inheritance. Except in the case of a slave of the testator (hæres necessarius), or a person under his authority (potestas) at his death (hæres suus et necessarius), the institution of a person as hæres did not oblige him to accept the office. A formal acceptance was requisite in the case of all other persons than the two classes just mentioned, whence such persons were called hæreses voluntarii, and in opposition to the sui hæredes, extranei hæredes. This acceptance might be express (aditio hæreditatis), or tacit, i. e. by performing some act in relation to the inheritance which admitted of no other construction than that the person named as hæres intended to accept the office. The refusal of the office, if express, was called repudiatio; if tacit, through the neglect of the hæres to make use of his rights within a suitable period, it was called omissio hæreditatis. The acceptance could not be coupled with a condition; and a refusal was final and irrevocable; Mack. C. L. §§ 681-683.

Rights and liabilities of the hæres. The fundamental idea of the office is that as regards the estate the hæres and the testator form but a single person. Hence it follows that the private estate of the hæres and the estate of the testator are united (confusio bonorum defuncti et hæredis); the hæres acquires all rights of property, and becomes liable to all demands, except those purely personal, to which the testator was entitled and subject, and is, consequently, responsible for all the debts of the deceased, even if the estate left by the latter is not sufficient to pay them. He must, moreover, recognize as binding upon him all acts of the testator relating to the estate. He is bound to obey the directions of the will, especially to perform the trusts and pay the legacies imposed upon him, yet this only so far as the residue of the estate, after liquidating the debts, enables him to do so.

These were the strict rules of the law; but two modes, the spatium deliberandi and the beneficium inventarii, were in course of time contrived for relieving the hæres from the risk of loss by an acceptance of the office.

The spatium deliberandi was a period of delay granted to the hæres, upon application to the magistrate, in order that he might investigate the condition of the estate before deciding whether to accept or reject the office. If the hæres was pressed by the other hæredes, or by the creditors of the estate, to decide whether to accept or reject the office he must decide immediately, or apply for the spatium deliberandi, which when allowed by the emperor continued for a year, and when by a judge, for nine months, from the day of its allowance. If the hæres had not decided at the expiration of this period, he was held to have accepted. If he was not pressed to a decision by the other hæredes or by the creditors, he was allowed a year from the day he was notified of the inheritance having been conferred upon him, to deliberate whether to accept or not. If, after deliberating for the allotted period, he should accept the inheritance, he became responsible for the debts of the testator, without regard to whether the estate was sufficient or not to pay them.

The beneficium inventarii was an extension to all hæredes of the privilege belonging to soldiers not to be responsible for the debts beyond the assets. This privilege to the hæres was conditional upon his commencing an inventory within thirty days and completing it within sixty from the time he became notified of his appointment. The inventory must be prepared in the presence of a notary, and must be signed by the hæres, with a declaration that it included the whole estate, etc., to which fact he might be obliged to make oath. He then became liable only to the extent of the assets. He was allowed, before paying the debts, to deduct the expenses of the funeral, of establishing the testament, and of making the inventory. He could not be forced to pay debts or legacies during the preparation of the inventory, and afterwards he paid the claimants in full in the order in which they presented themselves, and when the assets were exhausted could not be required to pay any more. His own claims against the estate might be paid first, and his debts to the estate were part of the assets. If he neglected to prepare the inventory within the legal period, he forfeited the privileges of it; which also was the case if he applied for the spatium deliberandi; so that he must choose between the two.

The creditors and legatees of the testator were allowed the beneficium separationis, by which, when the hæres was deeply in debt, and, by reason of the confusio bonorum defuncti et hæredis, they were in danger of losing their claims, they were permitted to have a separation of the assets from the private estate of the hæres. Application for this privilege must have been made within five years from the acceptance of the inheritance; but it would not be granted if the creditors of the testator had in any way recognized the hæres as their debtor. If it was granted, they were in general restricted to the assets for payment of their claims, and the private estate of the hæres was discharged. If the assets were not exhausted in satisfying the creditors and legatees of the testator, the creditors of hæres might come in upon the balance; but these latter were not entitled to the beneficium separationis.

The hæres might transmit the inheritance by will; but, in general, he could not do so till after acceptance. To this, however, there were numerous exceptions.

The remedies of the hæres are too intimately connected with the general system of Roman jurisprudence to be capable of a brief explanation. See Mack. C. L. §§ 692, 693; Dig. 5. 3; Cod. 3. 31; Gaius, iv. § 144, etc.; Maine, Anc. Law.

Cohæredes. When several hæredes have accepted a joint inheritance, each, ipso jure, becomes entitled to a proportional share in the assets, and liable to a proportional share of the debts, though the testator may, if he choose, direct otherwise, and they may also agree otherwise among themselves; but in both these cases the creditors are not affected, and may pursue each hæres to the extent of his legal share of liability, and no further.

One of the cohæredes has a right to compel a partition of the assets and liabilities, subject, however, to an agreement among themselves, or a direction by the testator, that the inheritance shall remain undivided for a time; Mack. C. L. §§ 694, 695.

HÆRES ASTRARIUS. In Old English Law. An heir in actual possession of the house of his ancestor. Bract. 85, 267 b.

HÆRES DE FACTO. An heir, made so by reason of the disseisin or other wrongful act of his ancestor. An heir in fact in contradistinction to an heir de jure.

HÆRES EX ASSE. In Civil Law. Sole heir. In inheritances and other money matters where a division was made the as (a unit) with its parts, was used to designate the portions, thus: Hæres ex asse, heir to the whole; hæres ex semisse, heir to one-half; hæres ex dodrante, heir to three-fourths; and so, hæres ex besse, triente, quadrante, sextante, etc.

HÆRES EXTRANEUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An extraneous or foreign heir, that is one who is not a child or slave of the testator. Those only could be extraneous heirs who had a capacity of accepting the inheritance both at the time of making the will and at the death of the testator. Halifax, Anal. b. 11, c. 6, § 38.

HÆRES FACTUS (Lat.). An heir appointed by will. This expression is applicable in the Roman law and systems founded on it, but not in the English common law; Moz. & W.

HÆRES FIDEI-COMMISSARIUS (Lat.). See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

HÆRES FIDUCIARIUS (Lat.). See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

HÆRES LEGITIMUS (Lat.). A lawful heir, being a legitimate child of parents who were married.

HERES NATUS (Lat.). An heir who is such by birth or descent. This is the only form of heirship recognized in the English law; Wms. R. P., 6th Am. ed. 96.

HERES NECESSARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A necessary heir, i. e. a slave instituted heir. He was so-called because whether he wished it or not, on the death of the testator he became instantly free and necessarily heir. A person suspecting that he was insolvent usually made a slave his heir so that his goods would be sold, if that were necessary, in the name of this heir and not as those of the testator. Inst. 2. 19. 1; id. 1. 6. 1; Sand. Introd. § 76.

HERES PROXIMUS (Lat.). The child or descendant of the deceased. Dalr. Feud. 110.

HERES RECTUS (Lat.). In Old English Law. A right heir. Fleta, 1. 6. c. 1. § 11.

HERES REMOTIOR (Lat.). A more remote heir. A kinsman, not a child or descendant.

HERES SUUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One's own heir; the natural heir of the decedent; his lineal descendants. Persons who were in the power of the testator but became sui juris at his death. Inst. 2. 13; id. 3. 1. 4. 5.

HERES SUUS ET NECESSARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An heir by relationship and necessity. The descendants of an ancestor in direct line were so-called, sui, denoting the relationship, and necessarii, the necessity of law which made them heirs without their election, and whether the ancestor died testate or intestate. Halifax, Anal. b. 11, c. 6, § 33; Mack. Civ. L. § 681; Inst. 2. 19. 2.

HERETARE. To give a right of inheritance or make a donation hereditary to the grantee and his heirs. Cowel.

HERETICO COMBURENDO. A writ for the burning of heretics last executed in the ninth year of James I., and abolished in 1677. See DE HERETICO COMBURENDO.

HAFNE. A haven or port. Cowel.

HAFNE COURTS (hafne, Dan. a haven, or port). Haven courts; courts anciently held in certain ports in England. Spelman, Gloss.

HAG. A division of a coppice or wood on which timber was cut annually by the proprietor. Ersk. Pr. 222.

HAGA. A house in a city or borough. Scott.

HAGIA. A hedge. Mon. Angl. tome 2, 273.

HAGNE. A little hand-gun. Stat. 33 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

HAGNEBUT. A hand-gun larger than the hagne. Stat. 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 14; 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2.

HAIA. An enclosed park. Cowel.

HAIEBOTE. A permission to take thorns, etc., to repair hedges. Blount.

HAILL. Whole. All and haill are common words in Scotch conveyances. 1 Bell, App. Cas. 499.

HAILWORKFOLK. Holy work folk. Persons who held lands of which the tenure was the service of defending or repairing some church or monument.

HAIMHALDARE. In Old Scotch Law. To seek restitution of one's own goods and gear and bring the same home again. Skene de Verb. Sign.

HAIMSUCKEN. See HAMESUCKEN.

HAIR. A capillary outgrowth from the skin. It has been held not to include the bristles of animals; 13 Blatch. 251.

HAKETON. A military coat of defence.

HAKH. Truth; the true God; a just or legal prescriptive right or claim; a perquisite claimable under established usage by village officers. Wilson, Gloss. Ind.

HAKHDAR. The holder of a right. Moz. & W. See HAKH.

HALAKAR. The realization of the revenue. Wilson, Gloss. Ind.; Moz. & W.

HALF-BLOOD. A term denoting the degree of relationship which exists between those who have one parent only in common.

By the English common law, one related to an intestate of the half-blood only could never inherit, upon the presumption that he is not of the blood of the original purchaser; but this rule has been greatly modified by the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106.

In this country, the common-law principle on this subject may be considered as not ordinarily in force, though in many states some distinction is still preserved between the whole and the half-blood; 4 Kent 403, n.; 2 Yerg. 115; 1 M'Cord 456; 31 Pa. 289; Dane, Abr. Index; Reeves, descents, passim; 2 Washb. R. P. 411. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

HALF-BROTHER, HALF-SISTER. Persons who have the same father, but different mothers; or the same mother, but different fathers.

HALF-CENT. A copper coin of the United States, of the value of one two-hundredth part of a dollar, or five mills, and of the weight of ninety-four grains. The first half-cents were issued in 1793, the last in 1857.

HALF-DEFENCE. See DEFENCE.

HALF-DIME. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of five cents, or the one-twentieth part of a dollar.

It weighs nineteen grains and two-tenths of a grain,—equal to four-hundredths of an ounce Troy,—and is of the fineness of nine hundred thousandths; nine hundred parts being pure silver, and one hundred parts copper. The fineness of the coin is prescribed by the 8th section of the general mint law, passed Jan. 18, 1837; 5 Stat. L. 137. The weight of the coin is fixed by the 1st section of the act of Feb. 21, 1853; 10 Stat. L. 160. The second section of this last-cited act directs that silver coins issued in conformity to that act shall be a legal tender in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars. This provision applies to the half-dollar and all silver coins below that denomination. The first coinage of half-dimes was in 1793. A few half "dismes," with a likeness of Mrs. Washington, the wife of the president, upon the obverse of the coin, were issued in 1792; but they were not of the regular coinage.

By act of 9 June, 1879, 21 Stat. L. 7 (Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 488), silver coin of smaller denominations than one dollar shall be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding ten dollars. The coining of the half-dime was abolished by act of 12 Feb. 1873, c. 131, s. 16. Its place was supplied by a five-cent piece composed of three-fourths copper and one-fourth nickel, of the weight of seventy-seven and sixteen-hundredths grains troy. The minor coins, viz., the five, three, two, and one cent pieces, are a legal tender for any amount not exceeding twenty-five cents in any one payment.

HALF-DOLLAR. A silver coin of the United States, of half the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain one hundred and eighty-five grains and ten-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or two hundred and eight grains of standard, silver. Act of April 2, 1792. 1 Stat. L. 348. Under the provisions of this law, the fineness of the silver coins of the United States was 892.4 thousandths of pure silver.

The weight and fineness of the silver coins were somewhat changed by the act of Jan. 18, 1837, 5 Stat. L. 137; the weight of the half-dollar being by this act fixed at two hundred and six and one-quarter grains, and the fineness at nine hundred thousandths; conforming, in respect to fineness with the coinage of France and most other nations.

The weight of the half-dollar was reduced by the provisions of the act of February 21, 1853, 10 Stat. L. 160, to one hundred and ninety-two grains.

The half-dollars coined under the acts of 1792 and 1837 (as above) were a legal tender at their nominal value in payment of debts to any amount. Those coined since the act of February 21, 1853, were, under it, a legal tender in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars. Sec. 2. The silver coins struck in the year 1853, under this last-cited act, may be distinguished from the others of that year by the arrow-heads on the right and left of the date of the piece. In 1854, and subsequent years, the arrow-heads are omitted.

By the act of 12 Feb. 1873, c. 131, s. 15, the weight of the half-dollar shall be twelve and one-half grams (192.9 grains), and by act of June 9, 1879, Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 488, it is a legal tender for sums not exceeding ten dollars. The same act enables the holder of any silver coins of a smaller denomination than one dollar, to exchange them in sums of twenty dollars, or any multiple thereof, at the U. S. Treasury, for lawful money of the United States.

HALF-EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of five dollars.

The weight of the piece is 129 grains (act, June 28, 1834) of standard fineness, namely, nine hundred thousandths of pure gold, and one hundred of alloy of silver and copper: "provided that the silver do not exceed one-half of the whole alloy." Act of Jan. 18, 1837, 5 Stat. L. 136. For the proportion of alloy in gold coins of the United States since 1853, see EAGLE.

For all sums whatever the half-eagle was a legal tender of payment of five dollars. It is now a legal tender to any amount, when not below the standard weight, and then in proportion to its actual weight. Act of February 12, 1873.

HALF ENDEAL or HALFEN DEAL. A moiety or half of a thing.

HALF-KING. In Saxon Law. Half-King. A title accorded to aldermen of all England. Crabb. Eng. L. 28; Spel. Glos.

HALF-MARK. A noble; six shillings, eight pence.

HALF-PROOF. In Civil Law. That which is insufficient as the foundation of a sentence or decree, although in itself entitled to some credit. Vicat, Probatio.

HALF-SEAL. A seal used in the English chancery for the sealing of commissions to delegates appointed upon any appeal, either in ecclesiastical or marine causes. 8 Eliz. c. 3.

HALF-TIMER. In England a child employed in a factory who, under the factory act of 1878, must give one school attendance on each work-day when employed on the morning and afternoon set, or two attendances on each non-working day, if employed on the alternate day system. "Experience has established the fact, that in proportion to the hours spent in school, these 'half-timers' make more rapid progress than the whole-day scholars; at the same time, whether they are designed to be factory workers for life or not, they are acquiring habits of industry and manual dexterity which are of essential use in any future employment." See Int. Cyc. Tit. Factory Acts, Education.

HALF-TONGUE. A jury half of one tongue or nationality and half of another. Vide De medietate linguæ, Jacob, Law Dict.

HALF-YEAR. In the computation of time a half year consists of one hundred and eighty-two days. Cro. Jac. 166; Co. Litt. 135 b; N. Y. Rev. Stat. part 1, c. 19, t. 1, § 3.

HALL. A man employed in ploughing. Wilson, Gloss. Ind.; Moz. & W.

HALIMAS. In English Law. The feast of all-Saints, on November 1. One of the cross-quarters of the year was computed from Halimas to Candlemas. Whart.

HALIMOTE. See HALMOTE.

HALL. A public building used either for the meetings of corporations, courts, or employed to some public uses : as, the city hall, the town hall. Formerly this word denoted the chief mansion or habitation.

HALL-MARK. An official stamp affixed by the goldsmiths upon articles made of gold or silver as an evidence of genuineness, and hence used to signify any mark of genuineness. "The power of free alienation is the 'hall-mark' of a fee-simple absolute." Rand. Em. Dom. § 206.

HALLAGE. A toll or license fee on goods vended in a hall. Jac. L. Dict. ; 6 Co. 63.

A toll due to the lord of a market or fair, on commodities vended in the common hall. Cowel.

HALLAZCO. In Spanish Law. The finding and taking possession of something which previously had no owner, and which thus becomes the property of the first occupant. Las Partidas, 3. 5. 28, 5. 48. 49, 5. 20. 50.

HALLUCINATION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The perception by any of the senses of an object which has no existence. The conscious recognition of a sensation of sight, hearing, feeling, taste, or smell which is not due to any impulse received by the perceptive apparatus from without, but arises within the perceptive apparatus itself. A false perception in contradistinction to a delusion or false belief. Wood, Am. Text-Book of Med.

An error, a blunder, a mistake, a fallacy ; and when used in describing the condition of a person, does not necessarily carry an imputation of insanity. 64 Vt. 233.

An instance is given of a temporary hallucination in the celebrated Ben Jonson, the poet. He told a friend of his that he had spent many a night in looking at his great toe, about which he had seen Turks and Tartars, Romans and Carthaginians, fight, in his imagination. 1 Collin. Lun. 34. If, instead of being temporary, this affection of his mind had been permanent, he would doubtless have been considered insane. See, on the subject of spectral illusions, Hibber, Alderson, and Farrar's Essays ; Scott on Demonology, etc. ; 3 Bostock, Physiology 91, 161 ; 1 Esquirol, Maladies Mentales 159. See INSANITY.

HALMOTE or HALIMOTE. A court baron (q. v.). It was sometimes used to designate a convention of citizens in their public hall and was also called folk-mote and hallmote. The word halimote rather signifies the lord's court or a court baron held in a manor in which the differences between the tenants were determined. Cunn. L. Dict. ; Cowel.

"Furthermore," it is said, "it seems to have been a common practice for a wealthy abbey to keep a court, known as a halimote, on each of its manors, while in addition to these manorial courts it kept a central court, a libera curia for all its greater freehold tenants. And we may now and again meet with courts which are distinctly called courts of honors. The rule then was not merely this, that the lord of a manor may hold a court for the manor ; but rather this, that a lord may hold a court for his tenants." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 573.

HALYWERCFOLK. Those who held by the service of guarding and repairing a church or sepulchre, and were excused from feudal services. Hist. Dunelm. apud Whartoni Ang. Sax. pt. 1, p. 749. Especially in the county of Durham, those who held by service of defending the corpse of St. Cuthbert. Jacob, Law Dict.

HAM. A place of dwelling ; a home-close ; a little narrow meadow. Blount. A house or little village. Cowel.

HAMA. A hook ; an engine with which a house on fire is pulled down. Yel. 60. A piece of land.

HAMBLING or HAMELING. Expedition (q. v.).

HAMEL, HAMELETA, or HAMLETA. A hamlet.

HAMESUCKEN. In Scotch Law. The crime of hamesucken consists in "the felonious seeking and invasion of a person in his dwelling-house." 1 Hume 312 ; Burnett 86 ; Allison, Cr. Law of Scotl. 199. By some authorities the word is written Hamesecken ; Cowel ; 4 Bla. Com. 223.

The mere breaking into a house, without personal violence, does not constitute the offence, nor does the violence without an entry with intent to commit an assault. It is the combination of both which completes the crime, and the injury to the person must be of a grievous character. The punishment of hamesucken, in aggravated cases of injury, is death ; in cases of inferior atrocity, an arbitrary punishment ; Alison, Cr. Law of Scotl. ch. 6 ; Erskine, Inst. 4. 9. 23.

This term was formerly used in England instead of the now modern term burglary ; 4 Bla. Com. 223.

But in Hale's Pleas of the Crown it is said, "The common genus of offences that comes under the name of hamesucken is that which is usually called house-breaking ; which sometimes comes under the common appellation of burglary, whether committed in the day or night to the intent to commit felony : so that house-breaking of this kind is of two natures." 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 547 ; 22 Pick. 4.

HAMFARE. This word by some is said to signify the freedom of a man's house ; but Cowel seems to think that it signifies the breach of peace in a house. Holthouse.

HAMLET. A small village ; a part or member of a vill. It is the diminutive of ham, a village. Cowel.

HAMMA. A close joining to a house ; a croft ; a little meadow. Cowel.

HAMMER. Used in connection with auction sales ; as to bring or come to the hammer, to sell or be sold at auction. Cent. Dict.

HAMSOCUE (Saxon from ham, house, sockue, liberty, immunity. The word is variously spelled hamsoca, hamsocua, hamsoken, hainsuken, hamesaken). The right of security and privacy in a man's house. Du Cange. The breach of this privilege by a forcible entry of a house is breach of the peace ; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Gloss. ; Du Cange ; Bracton, lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 2, § 3. The right to entertain jurisdiction of the offence. Spelman ; Du Cange. Immunity from punishment for such offence. id. ; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 18. An insult offered in one's own house (insultus factus in domo). Brompton, p. 957 ; Du Cange.

HANAPER. A hamper or basket in which were kept the writs of the court of chancery relating to the business of a subject, and their returns ; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 113 ; 10 Ric. II. c. 1 ; equivalent to the Roman fiscus. According to Spelman, the fees accruing on writs, etc., were there kept ; Du Cange ; 3 Bla. Com. 49. The office where it was kept was called the Hanaper office.

HAND. A measure of length, four inches long : used in ascertaining the height of horses.

In legal parlance, handwriting or written signature, as " witness my hand," etc. ; 18 Colo. 538 ; 10 Mod. 103.

HAND-BILL. A written or printed notice displayed to inform those concerned of something to be done.

HAND-BOROW (from hand, and Saxon borow, a pledge). Nine of a decenary or friborg (q. v.) were so called, being inferior to the tenth or head borow,—a decenna or friborga being ten freemen or frankpledges, who were mutually sureties for each other to the king for any damage. Du Cange, Friborg, Head-borow.

HAND DOWN. To announce or file an opinion in a cause. Used originally and properly of the opinions of appellate courts transmitted to the court below ; but in later usage the term is employed more generally, but inaccurately, with reference to any decision by a court upon a case or point reserved for consideration.

HAND-FASTING. Betrothment.

HAND-GRITH. Peace or protection given by the king with his own hand used in the laws of Henry I. Tomlin ; Cowel ; Moz. & W. ; Stat. Hen. I. c. 13.

HAND-HABEND. In Saxon Law. One having a thing in his hand ; that is, a thief found having the stolen goods in his possession,—latro manifestus of the civil law. See Laws of Hen. I. c. 59 ; Laws of Athelstane § 6 ; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 38, § 1 ; Britton p. 72 ; Du Cange, Handhabenda. Jurisdiction to try such thief. Id.

HAND MONEY. Earnest (q. v.) when it is in cash.

HANDSALE. Anciently, among all the northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind a bargain,—a custom still retained in verbal contracts : a sale thus made was called handsale, venditio per mutuum manuum complexionem. In process of time the same word was used to signify the price or earnest which was given immediately after the shaking of hands, or instead thereof. In some parts of the country it is usual to speak of hand-money as the part of the consideration paid or to be paid at the execution of a contract of sale. See 2 Bla. Com. 448 ; Heineccius, de Antiquo Jure Germanico, lib. 2, § 335 ; Toul-lier, liv. 3, t. 3, c. 2, n. 33 ; EARNEST.

HANDSEL. Earnest ; handsale (q. v.).

HANDWRITING. Anything written by a person. The manner in which a person writes, including the formation of the characters, the separation of the words, and other features distinguishing the written matter, as a mechanical result, from the writing of other persons.

That branch of the law of evidence which treats of handwriting is largely concerned with the determination of the genuineness or falsity of signatures. As to what constitutes a writing, generally, see that title, and, as to writing as required by the statutes of wills, see WILL.

With respect to proof of handwriting a signature by a person unable to write, or, as it has been held, by one who can write, may be by mark, which is proved as the handwriting would be in case of a written signature. See MARK. The law of evidence as to handwriting applies also where it is in a disguised hand ; 4 Esp. 117 ; 5 Cush. 295 ; 9 Conn. 55 ; or when a cipher is used ; 135 Mass. 533.

One's own testimony is not the best evidence on this subject, and the writer need not be called ; 2 Camp. 508 ; 1 Hawks 190 ; 49 N. J. L. 26. See 67 Barb. 124. Whether it is evidence at all is a question confused by the general disqualification of parties who were naturally in most cases those to whom the question would arise, and it has been of late assumed by many writers that since the statutes allowing parties to be witnesses they may be such, for this as well as any other purpose. See 5 Mass. 261 ; 5 Ohio 5 ; s. c. 22 Am. Dec. 767, with note citing cases. The handwriting of attesting witnesses after thirty years need not be proved ; Stark. Ev. Sharsw. ed. 521 ; so also of unattested documents taken from proper depositaries ; 7 East 279 ; 62 Me. 414. The extrajudicial admissions of a party as to his handwriting are evidence to prove the same, though not of a very satisfactory nature ; Whart. Ev. 705.

It is said that a witness has three means of becoming acquainted with a person's handwriting : (1) by seeing him write ; (2) by having seen his writing ; and (3) by a comparison of the writing in question with other writings shown to be genuine ; Best, Ev. § 233 ; Steph. Ev. Art. 51.

As to the first, it is generally held that it is enough that the witness has seen the party write only once; 22 Gratt. 405; 17 N. H. 71; 135 Mass. 533; 26 Pa. 388; 8 C. & P. 380; 104 Ill. 327; 142 id. 453; 42 Mich. 473. The contrary, however, was held in one case, in which it was said:

"It is not enough that he (the witness) had seen the person, as is the proof of this case, write but once, and then under circumstances showing that the attention of the witness was not specially directed to the peculiarities of the penmanship;" 1 Bond 51.

Any person who has seen one write and has acquired a standard in his own mind of the general character of the writing is competent to testify as to his belief of the genuineness of a writing; 45 La. Ann. 207. Merely seeing the party write his surname once was held insufficient to warrant testifying to the full signature; 2 Stark. 164; but seeing the surname written several times was sufficient; Mood. & M. 39. See 1 Disney 539; 8 Gill 77. It is sufficient although the witness never saw the person write before the date of the paper in question; 10 Cush. 453; or although he had not seen him write for many years before the trial; 8 Gill 87 (three years); id. 18 (six years); 8 Scott 384 (ten years); 25 How. St. Tr. 71 (nineteen years); but not that he has seen writing that is done with reference to his testifying at the trial either at or before it; 90 Pa. 89; 16 N. J. L. 267; with this exception the circumstances under which the witness has seen the party write affect his credit, not his competency; Jones, Ev. § 559; 54 N. Y. 398; 26 Pa. 388; 135 Mass. 533.

As to the second method it is not necessary that the witness has seen the party write, as such personal acquaintance may be acquired by having seen papers purporting to be genuine and which have been acknowledged to be such by the writer; 49 Minn. 420; 38 S. C. 395; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 575; 54 N. Y. 398; 17 Pa. 514; 45 Ill. App. 462; but this is not always sufficient; 108 Mass. 344. The witness is qualified, as such, by knowledge derived from correspondence, including letters received from a person in answer to those written and addressed to him; 3 Allen 598; 62 Ga. 100; 103 Ind. 419; 41 Miss. 216; 39 Neb. 660; 83 Ala. 351; 1 Cra. 491; 25 Pa. 133; 46 Mich. 482; 21 Wend. 557; 5 A. & E. 740; but the mere receipt of letters is insufficient to prove that they were written by the person purporting to sign them; 124 Ind. 495; there must be a ratification or recognition; 21 Wend. 557; 113 Mass. 274; 46 Vt. 228; 40 Ill. 346; 59 Tex. 411; contra, 2 C. & K. 744; 2 C. & P. 21; but such knowledge may be gained in the ordinary course of business, as by seeing documents written by the person; 27 Gratt. 313; 8 Hun 175; 28 Ill. App. 445; and only seeing letters addressed to strangers purporting to be those of the person in question; 113 Mass. 275; 28 Pa. 318. Such knowledge may be that of a clerk who sees correspondence or documents; 12 Wall. 317; 2 Johns. Ch. 211; 2 Metc. 522; 5 C. & P. 213; 10 Mo.

597; a clerk in a bank; 56 Wis. 156; 35 Ala. 370; a servant who has taken his master's letters to the post; 5 A. & E. 740; or a public officer who has seen many official documents filed in his office, signed by a justice, may prove his signature; 47 Cal. 294; 2 Metc. 522; 12 Wall. 317. The weight of the testimony will depend on the means of knowledge; 37 Fed. Rep. 331. The witness must have an opinion; 38 Ill. 363; and may give it if the handwriting is disguised; 5 Cush. 301; s. c. 32 Am. Dec. 711; 36 N. H. 182; but positive knowledge or certainty is not necessary; 8 Ves. 474; 80 Ia. 180; 33 N. Y. 669; 116 Mo. 605; he need not swear to belief, an opinion is sufficient; 25 Pa. 133; 38 Ill. 363; Whart. Ev. § 709. A witness has been permitted to testify that the signature was like the writing of the party whose signature it is alleged to be; 4 Esp. 37.

The witness in such cases need not be an expert; 72 Ala. 19; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 575; or familiar with the person's handwriting generally if he is so with the signature; 105 Mass. 62; as, e. g. he may prove the signature of a firm, when unacquainted with the handwriting of any partner; where he testifies that in his opinion, the handwriting was the same as that of many notes he had presented to the firm, and which had been paid by them; 10 Ired. 385.

A signature upon an ancient writing may be proved by a witness who has become familiar with it by the inspection of other authentic ancient documents on which the same signature appeared; 8 Wend. 426; 15 id. 111. If a witness says that he knows a party's handwriting, he is prima facie competent to testify with respect to it and, if not cross-examined, his knowledge is taken to be admitted; 8 Watts 485; 17 Pick. 490; 5 McLean 186; contra, 8 Ill. 644; 17 Ohio 16; he may be cross-examined as to the extent of his knowledge; 56 Md. 439; which goes to the weight of his testimony; 72 Ala. 79. But if want of knowledge appear; 46 Vt. 228; 38 Kan. 691; 3 Humph. 367; or his testimony is insufficient; 2 Cra. 253; 27 Tex. 345; 30 N. J. L. 387; 3 V. & B. 172; it may be rejected. But see 66 Pa. 253. A witness may testify as to handwriting who cannot read or write himself; 132 Mass. 105.

A witness may be asked if he would act upon the signature which he testifies to as genuine; 147 U. S. 150; contra, 44 N. Y. 514; his knowledge cannot be tested by irrelevant papers; 13 Gray 525; 11 A. & E. 322; 91 Mo. 399; 104 Ill. 327; 44 N. Y. 514. But see 2 M. & R. 536; 14 Me. 478; 41 Ala. 626; 1 Whart. Ev. § 10. But he may refresh his memory by reference to papers from which his knowledge is derived; 4 Cra. 312; 66 Md. 113; 26 Pa. 388; 42 Mich. 113; 6 Rand. 316.

The third method of proving handwriting is what is termed comparison. It is defined to be a mode of deducing evidence of the authenticity of a written instrument, by showing the likeness of the handwriting to that of another instrument proved to be that of the party whom it is sought to establish as the author of the instrument in question. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 578.

Another much cited definition is "when other witnesses have proved the paper to be the handwriting of a party, and then the witness on the stand is desired to take the two papers in hand, compare them, and say whether or not they are the same handwriting; the witness collects all his knowledge from comparison only; he knows nothing of himself; he has not seen the party write nor held any correspondence with him;" Duncan, J., 6 S. & R. 571.

But more briefly, though with great precision, Starkie says: "By comparison is meant a comparison by the juxtaposition of two writings in order, by such comparison, to ascertain whether both were written by the same person." Stark. Ev. Metc. ed. pt. 4, 654.

Scarcely any title of the law, certainly none in the law of evidence, has given rise to more discussion in England and in this country and the "confusion, obscurity, and contradiction" which is to be observed in the cases quite justifies the criticism of Woodward, J., in 43 Pa. 9, that much of the difficulty of the subject has arisen from the failure of judges to observe the essential rule "that terms be first correctly defined and then always used in the defined sense." A very pregnant cause of the confusion was the failure to preserve the distinction between comparison properly defined and the use of admittedly genuine signatures merely to enable a witness to refresh the memory as to his ideal standard formed by previous knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose signature was in issue. The latter process is in no sense a proper application of the term comparison as understood in the law of evidence, though often so used by judges. It is true as said by Patteson, J., in Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 703 (and repeated in almost the same words by Judge Woodward in the case just cited), that all evidence of handwriting, except in the single instance where the witness saw the document written, is in its nature, comparison of hands. It is the belief which the witness entertains, upon comparing the writing in question with the exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge. This language aptly expresses the idea which was in the mind of its author, but it has been quoted time and again by judges who apparently did not have clearly in mind the distinction which it was intended to emphasize and has contributed, perhaps, not a little to the continued misuse of the word comparison in this connection. Where a witness testifies from the comparison (used in what might be termed the colloquial sense referred to by Justice Patteson) of the writing in question with a mental standard derived from previous knowledge of the handwriting, he is simply stating his opinion, not in the sense of opinion evidence, but based upon his own knowledge. When a witness examines the writing in question and, placing it in juxtaposition with other writings proved to be genuine, having no previous knowledge, and testifies to his belief from the similitude, or want of it, it is properly and technically, evidence by comparison of hands. This distinction is stated with precision in some very early cases; Peake, N. P. 20; 21 How. St. Tr. 810; Rex v. Tanyd, cited McNally, Ev. 409. It is in this latter technical sense that the phrase comparison of hands is here used and the cases properly relating to the subject apply to the two questions: (1) whether such comparison may be made by the jury, genuine writings, otherwise irrelevant, being admitted for that purpose; (2) whether it may be made by expert witnesses and their conclusions proved for the information of the jury.

Such evidence was admissible in the Roman law; 1 Whart. Ev. § 711, citing De Prob. de Lit. Comp. L. 20, c. iv. 21; Nov. 49, cap. 2; and also under the Code Napoleon, by three sworn experts appointed by the court, or agreed upon, and the writings must be executed before a notary or admitted; Gen. Code Proc. pt. 1, l. 2, tit. 10, s. 200.

At common law the genuineness of a contested writing could not be proved by comparison, by a witness, of such writing with other writings acknowledged to be genuine; 1 Cr. & J. 47; 1 Nev. & P. 1; 7 C. & P. 548, 595; 1 Mood. & R. 133; 5 A. & E. 703. It was otherwise in the ecclesiastical courts; id.; 1 Phil. 78. See 2 Addams 53, 79, 91, note a; 1 id. 162, 214, 216.

Ancient writings could be proved by comparison; 14 East 327, n. a; 7 East 279, 282; Mood. & R. 141; 10 Cl. & F. 193; 2 H. L. Cas. 534, 557. The right of the jury to make comparisons, though denied by Lord Kenyon when the jurors were illiterate; Peake, N. P. C. 20; was allowed by him when the jury were considered competent; id. 27; and it was afterwards fully established; 1 Cr. & J. 47; 1 N. & P. 1; 4 C. & P. 267. Comparison by experts, after some fluctuation, it was settled could not be made; 5 C. & P. 196; 5 B. & A. 330; 5 A. & E. 703.

It had required infinite discussion to settle the rule of these cases. Something called comparison was known in very early cases; 10 How. St. Tr. 312; 12 id. 183, 306; 12 Mod. 72; but at this period the terms comparison of hand and similitude of hands were used to describe every method of the proof of writing except by one who had seen the document written. It is therefore necessary that the cases should be critically reviewed with reference to the varied meaning with which these terms were employed at different periods. This work has been very well done by Professor John H. Wigmore in 30 Am. L. Rev. 481. The conclusion reached is thus stated:— "(1) That the classes of witnesses who may testify to handwriting have increased in number by successive enlargements; (2) that the whole meaning of 'comparison of hands' has changed; (3) that the mere process of juxtaposition coram judicio, whether for witness or for the jury, was historically orthodox and unquestionable; and (4) that the opposite fates, at common law, of juxtaposition by experts and juxtaposition by jury—exclusion for the former but sanction (limited) for the latter—were due simply to the fact that the former had never been attempted till the 1800s and was merely prevented from coming into existence, while the latter had always existed and was thus able to survive the attempts on its life." The entire article should be referred to in any examination of this subject, as, on the whole, throwing new light upon it from a point of view not elsewhere so well treated. It may be added that the historical development of the English rule has not lost its importance by reason of its being superseded in England by statute. It is of primary importance in considering the decisions in those American jurisdictions which adhere to the old rule, and scarcely less so in properly estimating those in the jurisdictions which have abandoned it. See infra.

The question was set at rest by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 27, authorizing comparison with a writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine to be made by witnesses, and such writings to be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute. Under this act the jury may make comparison with papers relevant or not; 1 F. & F. 270; 2 id. 24; 4 id. 490. The court must determine the genuineness of the document offered for comparison and its decision is appealable; 30 L. T. 223.

The rule of the English courts (prior to this statute) forbidding the admission of documents irrelevant to the matter in issue for the sole purpose of comparison is known as the English rule, and is so referred to by American courts, including those which have and those which have not adopted it.

The objections to permitting comparison of the disputed paper with others conceded to be genuine but admitted for the sole purpose of comparison, which led to the adoption of the English rule, have been thus summarized: "First, that the writings offered for the purpose of comparison with the documents in question might be spurious, and consequently that, before any comparison between them and it could be instituted, a collateral issue must be tried to determine their genuineness. Nor is this all,—if it were competent to prove the genuineness of the main document by comparison with others, it must be equally so to prove that of the latter by comparison with fresh ones; and so the inquiry might go on ad infinitum, to the great distraction of the attention of the jury and delay in the administration of justice. Secondly, that the specimens might not be fairly selected. Thirdly, that the persons composing the jury might be unable to read, and consequently be unable to institute such comparison." Best, Ev. § 238.

The rule is followed, generally, by the federal courts. It is specifically adopted by the supreme court; 91 U. S. 270; 125 id.

397; 151 id. 303; 6 Pet. 763. In the circuit and district court while the rule of the supreme court is generally followed; 56 Fed. Rep. 384; there is opportunity for some variation, growing out of the frequent necessity in those courts for the administration of local law. Comparison was allowed by both jury and experts in 12 Blatchf. 390; 31 Fed. Rep. 19; 32 id. 198, contra, 10 id. 469. No comparison was permitted by experts in 1 Baldw. 49; 1 Wash. C. C. 1; 4 id. 729; but it was allowed by the jury with papers otherwise in evidence; 3 Wall. Jr. 88, 115; and with papers offered for comparison, merely; 1 Gall. 170. In the fourth circuit the supreme court rule was directly followed; 29 Fed. Rep. 247; and that of course is to be considered the rule of the federal courts unless the case is controlled by local law.

Many of the state courts have also followed the old English rule, and while permitting comparison by the jury, with papers in evidence in the case, they exclude irrelevant papers; 72 Ala. 79; 84 id. 53; 96 id. 357; 11 So. Rep. (Ala.) 365; 32 Ark. 337; 5 Col. 340; 40 Ill. 346; 64 id. 356; 142 id. 302 (contra, 46 Ill. App. 598; see 31 id. 592; 144 Ill. 652; 147 id. 652); 13 B. Monr. 257 (see also 83 Ky. 259); 11 Md. 148; 56 id. 439 (a genuine and disputed signature on the same page are not subject to comparison by the jury; 14 id. 566); 42 Mich. 473; 67 id. 222 (but in a later case irrelevant papers were admitted which had been shown to the party, denying the signature in dispute, on cross-examination; the court expressly stating that the case was different; 69 Mich. 287); 3 Mont. 262; 1 Pac. Rep. (N. Mex.) 170; 1 N. Dak. 30; 2 R. I. 319; 10 W. Va. 49; 28 Tex. 211; 67 id. 567; 69 id. 700; 82 id. 259; but papers otherwise in the case must be admitted or proved to be genuine; 47 id. 503; 29 W. Va. 147.

In some if not all of the states in which the subject is now regulated by statute the prior decisions were in support of this rule; 5 Houst. 220; 5 Neb. 247 (see 31 id. 124); 75 N. Y. 288; 95 id. 73; 2 Heisk. 206; 3 Baxt. 42 (but where no objection was interposed signatures admitted to be genuine were given to the jury for comparison; 90 Tenn. 167); 32 Wis. 34.

In some states the decisions indicate a tendency to allow comparison by the jury and experts where the genuineness is not denied or is conceded or the party is estopped to deny it. In Missouri earlier decisions excluded irrelevant papers but permitted comparison both by jury and experts with papers otherwise in the case; 29 Mo. 386; 83 id. 693; and later ones permitted it with other papers as to which no collateral issue could be raised, as if the genuineness was proved or the party was estopped to deny it or if they belonged to the witness who was acquainted with the handwriting in dispute; 15 Mo. App. 460; 67 Mo. 380 (and see 91 Mo. 399); and in North Carolina comparison by the jury was not permitted even with papers in the case; 1 Ired 16; 3 Jones 407; 101 N. C. 119; but it has been allowed by experts with papers admitted to be genuine and otherwise in evidence; 76 id. 142; and see 113 id. 688.

In Indiana the decisions are conflicting but comparisons are allowed, in most cases both by jury and experts, if the paper is genuine, otherwise by experts alone; 32 Ind. 472; 43 id. 381; 46 id. 38. See 60 id. 241; 66 id. 123; 78 id. 64. The later cases allowed comparison by experts as well as by the jury; 103 Ind. 14; 126 id. 106.

In many states comparison is permitted with genuine documents, without respect to relevancy; and usually when it is allowed at all it may be made by experts as well as by the jury.

There has, however, been some indisposition to permit experts to make the comparison. It has been permitted by the jury and experts; 1 Root 308; 9 Conn. 55; 10 Kan. 335; 47 id. 242; 17 Pick. 490; 35 Minn. 425; Wright 293; 36 Ohio St. 195; 8 Utah 11; in some cases it has been allowed by the jury; 14 Me. 482; 143 Mass. 23; 5 Vt. 532; 39 id. 225; 58 N. H. 156; and in others by experts; 52 Me. 9; 116 Mass. 331; 50 Miss. 24; 53 N. H. 452; 54 id. 456 (after much fluctuation); 82 Va. 1; 80 Cal. 82; but it was not permitted with a press copy of a disputed writing, though semble that the original might have been used; 66 Cal. 525. The signatures used for comparison must be genuine; 36 Conn. 218.

In Pennsylvania and South Carolina until the late statute of the former state, infra, the decisions were substantially in accord. When there was conflicting direct evidence, only the jury might make comparison with papers duly proved; 10 S. & R. 110; 3 Watts 321; 82 Pa. 211; 96 id. 489; 155 id. 453; 1 McMull. 120; 2 McCord 516; 3 Brev. 51. The evidence of genuineness of a paper offered for comparison must be conclusive; 6 Whart. 284; 93 Pa. 123; and comparison could only be made by witnesses acquainted with the party's writing; 1 S. & R. 333; 28 Pa. 318. In criminal cases expert testimony is allowed; Pennsylvania act of 1860, March 31, § 55, P. L. 284.

A recent statute of Pennsylvania (1895, May 15, P. L. 69), codifying the law on this subject, enacts, (1) That the opinion of those acquainted with the handwriting of the supposed writer, and of experts, shall be deemed relevant; (2) That experts may compare the disputed writing with others admitted or proved to the judge's satisfaction to be genuine; (3) That experts may be required by counsel to state in full the ground of their opinions; (4) That the question shall still be one entirely for the jury; and (5) That the act shall apply to all courts and all persons having authority to receive evidence.

In several states, including some in which the courts had adhered to the English rule, the question has been settled by statute permitting the comparison of handwriting. Among the states which have legislated upon the subject are California, Delaware, Georgia, Iowa, Louisiana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Tennessee, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania as above stated. The most common form of such statutes is to authorize comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the court to be genuine, to be made by a witness and to permit the submission of such writings and evidence of witnesses respecting the same, to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute. The tendency in the United States is in the direction of the rule established under these statutes. It is not within the present purpose to state all the decisions or to indicate the exact condition of the law in the several states. For any special case recourse should be had to the decisions and statutes of the particular state.

Under a statute providing that "evidence respecting the handwriting may also be given by comparison, made by a witness skilled in such matters, or the jury, with writings admitted or treated as genuine, by the party against whom the evidence is offered" papers not otherwise competent are admissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to make a comparison; 147 U. S. 150; 56 Fed. Rep. 384.

Prior to the statute of 17 and 18 Vict. already cited, the English rule as to comparison was subject to certain exceptions which have been said to be as well settled as the rule itself; Bradley, J., in 91 U. S. 270; one of these was the admission of ancient writings; see supra; the other is that if a paper admitted to be in the handwriting of the person in question is in evidence for some other purpose in the cause, the signature in question may be compared with it by the jury. This is a settled rule of the American courts, including those which adhere to the English rule against comparison as well as those which, either under statute or decision, admit it; id.; 75 N. Y. 288; 113 N. C. 688; 126 Ind. 106; 144 Ill. 652; 72 Mich. 265; 90 Ia. 673; 56 Fed. Rep. 384; 125 U. S. 397, 414; 151 id. 303; 157 id. 127.

A writing specially prepared for the purpose of comparison is inadmissible on a question of genuineness; 151 U. S. 303. A party cannot himself write specimens for the instruction of witnesses; Whart. Ev. § 715; nor can he make test writings to be used for a comparison of hands; 110 Mass. 155; 128 id. 46; 64 Cal. 334; 151 U. S. 303.

In England, by statute, a person whose handwriting is in dispute, may be called upon by the judge to write in his presence, and such writing may be compared with the writing in question; Whart. Ev. § 706. See 4 F. & F. 490; 45 Me. 534, contra, 62 Conn. 515.

On cross-examination, other writings not in the case may be shown to the witness, and he may be asked whether they are in the handwriting of the party in question; if so declared by the witness, they may be shown not to be genuine and given to the jury for comparison; Whart. Ev. § 710; see 11 Ad. & E. 322.

Experts may be permitted to testify as to whether handwriting is natural or feigned; Tayl. Ev. 1209, 1590; 43 Pa. 9; 69 id. 225; 116 Mass. 331; 37 Miss. 461; as to the nature of the ink used; 30 N. Y. 385; 34 Pa. 365; whether the whole of an instrument was written by the same person, at the same time, and with the same pen and ink; 34 Pa. 365; 11 Gray 250; 90 Mich. 112; whether the figures in a check have been altered; 18 Ind. 329; see 7 Abb. (N. Y.) N. Cas. 113; 33 N. J. Eq. 819; 77 Pa. 20; 62 Ga. 100; 61 Ala. 33; 47 Wis. 530; 39 Md. 36.

An expert witness need not be a professional; 18 S. C. 506; a merchant and dealer in commercial paper is by his vocation qualified to some extent to testify as to the genuineness of a signature to a note; 45 Mo. App. 346. But the value of expert testimony as to handwriting, is to be determined by his opportunity and circumstances. If an illiterate man seldom brought by his business into familiarity with handwriting, his opinion is entitled to much less weight than if educated and accustomed to correspondence, and seeing people write; 37 Fed. Rep. 331.

The jury are not bound by expert evidence further than it accords with their own opinions or than they think it is to be credited; 31 id. 19; proof of a genuine signature to a document whose authenticity is denied casts upon the opposite party the burden of showing that the writing above the signature was forged; 150 U. S. 312.

On a question of the genuineness of the signatures of makers of an accommodation note, testimony of an expert that the ordinary handwriting of the nominal payee, as shown in letters, was such as to convince him that the payee could not successfully imitate the handwriting of one of the witnesses as easily as that of one of the makers of the note, though possibly irrelevant, is unimportant and its admission is not ground for reversal; 147 U. S. 150.

Forgeries of handwriting, and paper and ink to imitate various degrees of age, are so skilfully made, that examination and comparison, even by so-called experts, in the way heretofore usual in courts of justice, are often inadequate and misleading. A scientific use of the microscope, photography, and chemical agents, will generally prove a much surer means of discovering truth. See at large on this branch of the subject, Dr. Frazer's valuable Manual of the Study of Documents. See, generally, works on Evidence; Hogan, on Disputed Handwriting; 16 Am. L. Rev. 569; 17 id. 21; 10 Cent. L. J. 121, 141; 12 id. 507; 32 id. 531; 15 Can. L. J. 149, 181; 17 Myers, Fed. Dec. 369; 20 Weekly L. B. 350; 29 Sol. J. 584; 18 Am. L. HANGING. Death by the halter, or the suspending of a criminal, condemned to suffer death, by the neck, until life is extinct. A mode of capital punishment.

In Utah a person convicted of a capital crime has a right of election between hanging and shooting; Comp. L. § 5131. See

CRIMES; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; EXECUTION.

In Old English Law. Pending, as hanging the process. Co. Litt. 13a, 266a. Remaining undetermined. 1 Show. 77.

HANGING IN CHAINS. An ancient practice of hanging a murderer, after execution, upon a gibbet, in chains, near the place where the murder was committed. Abolished by 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 26.

HANGMAN. An executioner. The name usually given to a man employed by the sheriff to put a man to death, according to law, in pursuance of a judgment of a competent court and lawful warrant.

HANGWITE (from Saxon hangian, to hang, and wite, fine). Fine, in Saxon law, for illegal hanging of a thief, or for allowing him to escape. Immunity from such fine. Du Cange.

HANIG. Some customary labor to be performed. Holthouse.

HANSE. A commercial confederacy for the good ordering and protection of the commerce of its members. An imposition upon merchandise. Du Cange, Hansa.

HANSE TOWNS. A number of towns in Europe which joined in a league for mutual protection of commerce as early as the twelfth century.

Amsterdam and Bremen were the first two that formed it, and they were joined by others in Germany, Holland, England, France, Italy, and Spain, numbering ninety at one time. They made war and peace to protect their commerce, and held countries in sovereignty, as a united commonwealth. They had a common treasury at Lubeck, and power to call an assembly as often as they chose. For purposes of jurisdiction, they were divided into four colleges or provinces. Great privileges were granted them by Louis VI. of France and succeeding monarchs. One of their principal magazines was at London. Their power became so great as to excite the jealousy of surrounding nations, who forced the towns within their jurisdiction which belonged to the league to renounce it. Their number and power became thus gradually reduced, beginning from the middle of the fifteenth century; and the last general assembly, representing six cities, was held in Lubeck in 1669. Of the last three remaining cities, Hamburg and Bremen were incorporated into the German Zoll-Verein in 1888, and Lubeck some years previously, and are now, in substance, free cities or states constituting part of the German Empire. See Zimmern, The Hansa Towns. See CODE.

HANS GRAVE. The head officer of a company or corporation.

HANTELODE (German hant, a bond, and load, laid.). An arrest. Du Cange; Toml.; Moz. & W.; Holthouse.

HAP. To catch. Thus "hap the rent," "hap the deep-poll," were formerly used. Tech. Dict.

HAPPINESS. The "pursuit of happiness," as used in the United States Constitution, is said to be the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase one's prosperity, or develop one's faculties, so as to give to one his highest enjoyment. 111 U. S. 757.

HAQUE. In Old Statutes. A handgun, about three-quarters of a yard long.

HARACIUM. In English Law. A stud of horses and mares kept for breeding. Spel. Glos.

HARBINGER. An officer of the king's household. Toml.

HARBOR (Sax. here-berga, station for an army). A place where ships may ride with safety; any navigable water protected by the surrounding country; a haven. It is public property.

Harbor is to be distinguished from "port," which has a reference to the delivery of cargo. See 7 M. & G. 870; 9 Metc. 371-377; 2 B. & Ald. 460. Thus, we have the "said harbor, basin, and docks of the port of Hull." 2 B. & Ald. 60. But they are generally used as synonymous. Webster, Dict.

In the United States the control of harbors and regulation of dock lines and the like is exercised by the states, although under the power to regulate commerce the federal government annually expends large sums of money in the improvement of navigation in harbors as well as other navigable waters.

A state may enact police regulations for the conduct of shipping in any of its harbors; 7 Cow. 351; Cooley, Const. Lim. 730; and congress has full power to make regulations on the same subject; 12 How. 299; 21 Ind. 450; 2 Wall. 450; 36 N. Y. 292. A statute passed for the protection of a harbor, which forbids the removal of stone, gravel, and sand from the beach, is constitutional; 11 Metc. 55; and the United States has the authority to make a contract for the removal of rock from a harbor; 134 N. Y. 156.

New harbor lines may be established without further legislative authority, and such establishment is a practical discontinuance of the old lines; 60 Conn. 278. The state board of harbor commissioners has power to establish harbor lines in front of towns; 4 Wash. 6; and an act which provides for the disestablishment of such lines is contrary to the state constitution and void; 13 Wash. 65; such an act on the part of such commissioners does not deprive a riparian owner of the right of access to his land, but merely determines the line to which he may fill without encroaching on public rights; 18 R. I. 504. The mere establishment of general harbor lines by such commissioners is not of itself an injury or a taking of the property and cannot be enjoined; 152 U. S. 59; 5 Del. Ch. 433. The authority to make improvements in harbors implies the power to employ all necessary means thereto; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 238.

In England, as well as Scotland, the right to erect and hold ports and havens is vested in the crown; though a subject may have such right by charter, grant, or prescription, but in all cases charged with the right of the public to use it. In England such grantee is bound to repair, but in Scotland only to the extent of the dues received.

The insufficiency of the common-law power led to an extended course of legislation for the control of ports and harbors, through what is known in Great Britain as the harbor authority, which is vested in commissioners or bodies corporate or otherwise. Such bodies are charged with the duty of general supervision of the construction, extension, improvement, and lighting of the harbor and collection of dues therefrom. The general consolidation act of 10 Vict. c. 271, defined these duties and powers in detail as did the general act of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 47, supplemented by various local acts.

In Torts. To receive clandestinely or without lawful authority a person for the purpose of so concealing him that another having a right to the lawful custody of such person shall be deprived of the same. 2 Wall. Jr. 317. See 5 How. 215; 3 McLean 631. For example, the harboring of a wife or an apprentice in order to deprive the husband or the master of them; or, in a less technical sense, it is the reception of persons improperly; Poll. Torts 275; 10 N. H. 247; 5 Ill. 498.

It may be aptly used to describe the furnishing of shelter, lodging, or food clandestinely or with concealment, and under certain circumstances, may be equally applicable to those acts divested of any accompanying secrecy; 55 Fed. Rep. 415.

The harboring of such persons will subject the harbinger to an action for the injury; but, in order to put him completely in the wrong, a demand should be made for their restoration, for in cases where the harbinger has not committed any other wrong than merely receiving the plaintiff's wife, child, or apprentice, he may be under no obligation to return them without a demand; 1 Chit. Pr. 564; 2 No. C. Law Rep. 249; 5 How. 215, 227. See ENTICE.

HARD CASES. A phrase used to indicate decisions which, to meet a case of hardship to a party, are not entirely consonant with the true principle of the law. It is said of such: Hard cases make bad law. Hard cases must not make bad equity more than bad law; 6 Ia. 279.

HARD LABOR. In those states where the penitentiary system has been adopted, convicts who are to be imprisoned, as part of their punishment, are sentenced to perform hard labor. This labor is not greater than many freemen perform voluntarily, and the quantity required to be performed is not at all unreasonable. In the penitentiaries of Pennsylvania it consists in being employed in weaving, shoemaking, and such like employment.

Hard labor was first introduced in English prisons in 1706. By the Prison Act of 1865, it is divided into two classes, one for males above sixteen years old the other for males below that age and females; Moz. & W.

HARDHEIDIS. In old Scotch Law. Lions; coins formerly of the value of half pence. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1. 64, note.

HARDSHIP. See HARD CASES.

HARIOT. The same as heriot (q. v.). Cowel: Termes de la Ley. Sometimes spelled Harriott; Wms. Seis. 203.

HARMONIZE. Though not strictly synonymous with the word "reconcile," it is not improperly used by a court in instructing the jury that it is their duty to "harmonize" conflicting evidence if possible. 3 S. Dak. 134.

HARNASCA. Defensive armor; harness. Spel. Glos.

HARNES. The defensive armor of a soldier or knight. All warlike instruments. Hoved. 725. In modern poetical sense a suit of armor. The term is sometimes used to denote the trappings of a war-horse.

Harness was the early name for body armor of all kinds. Modern writers have tried to discriminate between harness as the armor of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, and armor as confined to the plate suits of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but armor is the modern English word for defensive garments of all sorts, and harness in this sense, is a poetical archaism. Cent. Dict.

The tackle or furniture of a ship.

HARO, HARRON. An outcry, or hue and cry, after felons and malefactors. Cowel. The original of the clamour de haro comes from the Normans. Moz. & W.

HART. A stag or male deer of the forest five years old complete.

HARTER ACT. An act of congress of February 13, 1893, 2 Supp. R. S. 81, which provides that—"If the owner . . . shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agents or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of said vessel."

Under this act it has been held that due diligence is not satisfied by the mere appointment of competent persons to repair. Due diligence in repair and equipment must be exercised in fact; 68 Fed. Rep. 919; 69 id. 470; 74 id. 253. See SHIPPING.

HASP AND STAPLE. A mode of entry in Scotland by which a bailee declared a person heir on evidence brought before himself, at the same time delivering the property over to him by the hasp and staple of the door, which was the symbol of possession. Bell; Ersk. Pr. 433.

HASPA. In Old English Law. A name anciently given to the hasp of a door, which was often used in giving livery of seisin of premises which included a house.

HASTA (Lat.). A spear which in Roman law was the sign of an auction sale. Hastea subjecie, to put under the spear, like the modern phrase put under the hammer signified put up at auction. Calv. Lex.

In feudal law it was the symbol of the investiture of a fee. Lib. Feud. 2, 2.

HAT MONEY. In Maritime Law. Primage; a small duty paid to the captain and mariners of a ship.

HAUBER. A great baron or lord. Spel. Gloss.

HAUGH, or HOUGH. Low-lying rich lands, lands which are occasionally overflowed. Encyc. Dict.

HAUL. In an indictment for larceny this word is a sufficient substitute for carry, in the statutory phrase steal, take and carry away, being in the sense used equivalent to it. 108 Ind. 171.

HAUR. In the laws of William the Conqueror, hatred. Toml.

HAUSTUS (Lat. from haurire, to draw).

In Civil Law. The right of drawing water, and the right of way to the place of drawing. L. 1, D. de Servit. Præd. Rustic.; Fleta, l. 4, c. 27, § 9.

HAUT CHEMIN (L. Fr.). Highway. Yearb. M. 4 Hen. VI. 4.

HAUT ESTRET (L. Fr.). High street; highway. Yearb. P. 11 Hen. VI. 2.

HAUTHONER. A man armed with a coat of mail. Jac. L. Dict.

HAVE. See HABENDUM; HABE.

HAVEN. A place calculated for the reception of ships, and so situated, in regard to the surrounding land, that the vessel may ride at anchor in it in safety. Hale, de Port. Mar. c. 2; Chitty, Com. Law 2; 15 East 304, 305. See CREEK; PORT; HARBOR; ARM OF THE SEA.

HAW. A small parcel of land so called in Kent; houses. Cowel.

HAWAII. A group of islands in the Pacific Ocean about one thousand five hundred miles from the western coast of California. A republic was proclaimed and a new constitution promulgated July 4, 1894, succeeding a provisional government formed in January, 1893. The constitution provides for a president who is elected for six years and a cabinet of four members, a council of state of fifteen members, and a house of representatives of fifteen members. Justice is administered by a supreme court sitting in Honolulu with a chief justice and two associate justices. There are also circuit and district judges as prescribed by the legislature. The common law is administered as in England and the United States and the judicial decisions of those countries are of authority in the same way as those of each country are referred to in the other.

A treaty for the annexation of Hawaii to the United States has recently been negotiated and submitted to the United States Senate for its approval.

HAWBERK or HAWBERT. A shirt of mail. Moz. & W. See FIEF D'HAUBERK.

HAWGH or HOWGH. A valley. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HAWKER. An itinerant or travelling trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale and sells them in a fixed place of business. Superadded to this, though perhaps not essential, is generally understood one who not only carries goods for sale, but seeks for purchasers, either by outcry, which some lexicographers conceive as intimated by the derivation of the word, or by attracting notice and attention to them, as goods for sale, by an actual exhibition or exposure of them by placards or labels, or by a conventional signal, like the sound of a horn for the sale of fish; 12 Cush. 495. To prevent imposition, hawkers are generally required to take out licenses, under regulations established by the local laws of the states. See 46 Minn. 435; and these laws have generally been held to be constitutional; 117 Pa. 207; 116 Mass. 254; 51 Ala. 52; 57 Ind. 74; PEDDLER. One who goes about a village carrying samples and taking orders for a non-resident firm is not a hawker or peddler; 135 Ill. 36. It is termed Hawking. See 107 Ind. 505.

See 7 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 667, note.

HAY. In a bequest, "Hay" in a barn is included in the words "All the household furniture and other property in and about the buildings." 63 Me. 350.

HAYBOTE (from haye, hedge, and bote, compensation). Hedgebote; one of the estovers allowed a tenant for life or for years; namely, material to repair hedges or fences, or to make necessary farming utensils. 2 Bla. Com. 35; 1 Washb. R. F. 99.

HAYWARD (from haye, hedge, and ward, keeping). In Old English Law. An officer appointed in the lord's court to keep a common herd of cattle of a town: so called because he was to see that they did not break or injure the hedges of inclosed grounds. His duty was also to impound trespassing cattle, and to guard against pound-breaches. Kitch. 46; Cowel.

HAZAR-ZAMIN. A bail or surety for the personal attendance of another. Moz. & W.

HAZARD. An unlawful game of dice. Hazardor. One who plays at it. Jac. L. Dict.

HAZARDOUS. Risky; perilous; involving hazard or special danger. See next title.

HAZARDOUS CONTRACT. A contract in which the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event. La. Civ. Code, art. 1769. See 1 J. J. Marsh. 596; 3 id. 84; MARITIME LOAN.

In a fire insurance policy, the terms "hazardous," "extra hazardous," "specially hazardous," and "not hazardous," are well understood technical terms, having distinct meanings. A policy covering only goods "hazardous" and "not hazardous" cannot be made to cover goods or merchandise "extra hazardous" or "specially hazardous;" 38 N. Y. 364.

On the other hand, it has been held that "hazardous" and "extra hazardous" are terms having no technical meaning, but are to be taken in their popular sense of dangerous and extra dangerous; 50 Minn. 409. See RISKS AND PERILS.

HE. Properly a pronoun of the masculine gender, but usually construed in statutes to include both sexes and corporations. Where in a written instrument, a person, whose name was designated by an initial is referred to as "he," it is not conclusive that such person is a man, but the contrary may be shown by parol; 71 Cal. 38. See HIS.

HEAD. The principal source of a stream. Webst. Dict. The head of a creek will be taken to mean the head of its longest branch, unless there be forcible evidence of common reputation to the contrary; 2 Bibb 112.

The principal person or chief of any organization, corporation, or firm.

HEAD OF A FAMILY. Householder, one who provides for a family. 19 Wend. 476. There must be the relation of father and child, or husband and wife; 3 Humph. 216; 17 Ala. n. s. 486; contra, 20 Mo. 75; 41 Ga. 153. The father being dead, the mother is the head of the family; 62 Pa. 475. See 16 Mass. 135; 45 Ga. 153; 2 How. 581. See FAMILY; HOMESTEAD.

HEAD-COURT. Courts formerly held in Scotland yearly by sheriffs, stewards, and barons who had certain civil and criminal jurisdiction prior to 20 Geo. II. c. 50, by which the obligation of the vassals to attend these courts was abolished. Ersk. Prin. 34-40.

HEAD-LAND. In Old English Law. A narrow piece of unploughed land left at the end of a ploughed field for the turning of the plough. Called, also, butt. Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 587; 2 Leon. 70, case 93; 1 Litt. 13.

HEAD MONEY. A name popularly applied to a tax on aliens landing in the United States under U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 370. Such tax by a state is unconstitutional; 92 U. S. 259; but as a federal regulation of commerce it is valid; 112 id. 580. See IMMIGRATION.

HEAD-NOTE. The syllabus of a reported case.

HEAD-PENCE. An exaction of 40*d.* or more, collected by the sheriff of Northumberland from the people of that county twice in every seven years, without account to the king. Abolished by 23 Hen. VI. c. 6, in 1444. Cowel.

HEAD-SILVER. A name sometimes given to a Common Fine (q. v.). Also said to be a fine of £40 levied by the sheriff upon the inhabitants of Northumberland, twice in seven years.

HEADBOROUGH. In English Law. An officer who was formerly the chief officer in a borough, who is now subordinate to the constable. Originally the chief of the tithing, or frank pledge. St. Armand, Leg. Power of Eng. 88. See DECENNARY.

HEAFODWEARD. A service rendered by a thane or a geneath or vellein, the precise nature of which is unknown. Anc. Eng. Inst.

HEALSFANG (from Germ. hals, neck, fangen, to catch). A sort of pillory, by which the head of the culprit was caught between two boards, as feet are caught in a pair of stocks.

"The fine which every man would have to pay in commutation of this punishment, had it been in use,"—for it was very early disused, no mention of it occurring in the laws of the Saxon kings. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Gloss; Spelman, Gloss.

HEALGEMOTE. Halimote (q. v.).

HEALTH. Freedom from pain or sickness; the most perfect state of animal life. It may be defined as the natural agreement and concordant disposition of the parts of the living body.

Public health is an object of the utmost importance, and has attracted the attention of the national and state legislatures.

By the act of Congress of the 25th of February, 1799, it is enacted: sect. 1. That the quarantines and other restraints, which shall be established by the laws of any state, respecting any vessels arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof, whether coming from a foreign port or some other port of the United States, shall be observed and enforced by all officers of the United States in such place; sect. 4. In times of contagion the collectors of the revenue may remove, under the provisions of the act, into another district; sect. 5. The judge of any district court may, when a contagious disorder prevails in his district, cause the removal of persons confined in prison under the laws of the United States, into another district; sect. 6. In case of the prevalence of a contagious disease at the seat of government, the president of the United States may direct the removal of any or all public offices to a place of safety; sect. 7. In case of such contagious disease at the seat of government, the chief justice, or, in case of his death or inability, the senior associate justice, of the supreme court of the United States, may issue his warrant to the marshal of the district court within which the supreme court is by law to be holden, directing him to adjourn the said session of the said court to such other place within the same or adjoining district as he may deem convenient. And the district judges, under the same circumstances, have the same power to adjourn to some other part of their several districts.

By the act of March 3, 1879, ch. 202, § 1, R. S. Suppl. 480, enforced by subsequent acts, a National Board of Health was established, to consist of seven members appointed by the president, and of four members detailed from the departments, whose duties shall be to obtain information upon all matters affecting the public health, to advise the heads of departments and state executives, to make necessary investigations at any places in the United States, or at foreign ports, and to make rules guarding against the introduction of contagious diseases into the country, and their spread from state to state. See 143 U. S. 578.

The protection of cattle from contagious diseases has received legislative attention in some of the states. In Pennsylvania, the governor may make proclamation whenever pleuro-pneumonia exists among the cattle in any county, and adopt means, such as the quarantining of affected places, to prevent its spread; act May 1, 1879. The introduction of cattle into Virginia, between March 10, and October 10, without careful inspection, is forbidden; act April 2, 1879.

Closely connected with the subject of health is the adulteration of food. See ADULTERATION. The English Sale of Food and Drugs Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, § 6) provides that "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food" not of the quality demanded, and authorizes the appointment of a public analyst with power to examine and certify samples of food, drinks, and drugs; L. R. 4 Q. B. D. 233; L. R. 3 Ex. D. 176. A state analyst with similar powers has been appointed in most states. This is a more practical measure than has been attempted in the previous legislation throughout the country, where the mode of detection and proof have been left to the operation of general rules.

In Scotland the care of the public health is vested in the county council acting through the district committee. These authorities are charged with the regulation of sewerage, privies, scavenging, nuisances, lodging-houses and cellar dwellings, and with the prevention of infection. Earsk. Pr. 619; Act 1867, § 94; 52 Vict. c. 50.

Public policy requires that health officers be undisturbed in the exercise of their powers, unless clearly transcending their authority; 3 Paige 218; 1 Dill. § 369; but in so acting such officers must not interfere with the natural right of individuals; 21 Vt. 13; 67 id. 502; the people "shall be secure in their persons and homes from unreasonable searches and seizures"; 10 Phila. 94; 40 N. J. Eq. 325. See 146 N. Y. 63, which case, overruling 32 N. Y. 317, held that health officers may not quarantine persons refusing to be vaccinated when small-pox is imminent. A board of health is not a natural or an artificial person, and cannot sue or be sued; 2 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 181. A court of chancery can only interfere with the trustees of a sanitary district where such trustees have acted in violation of the law or in a fraudulent manner; 58 Ill. App. 306.

Offences against the provisions of the health laws are generally punished by fine and imprisonment. They are offences against public health, punishable by the common law by fine and imprisonment, such, for example, as selling unwholesome provisions. 4 Bla. Com. 162; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 822; 6 id. 133; 3 Maule & S. 10; 4 Campb. 10.

Mandamus will issue to compel a board of health to award compensation to one whose property it has occupied or destroyed to prevent the spread of contagious disease, when such board of health has refused so to do; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1094.

Injuries to the health of particular individuals are, in general, remedied by an action on the case, or perhaps, in some instances, for breach of contract, and may be also by abatement, in some cases of nuisance. See 4 Bla. Com. 197; 81 Ky. 171; 26 Mo. App. 253; Billings; Parker & Worthington, Pub. Health; Upton, Health Stat.; NUISANCE; ABATEMENT; QUARANTINE; CONTAGIOUS DISEASES; VACCINATION.

HEALTH OFFICER. The name of an officer invested with power to enforce the health laws. The powers and duties of health officers are regulated by local laws.

HEALTHY. Free from disease or bodily ailment or from a state of the system susceptible or liable to disease or bodily ailment. 13 Ired. 357.

HEARING. In Chancery Practice. The trial of a chancery suit. 24 Wis. 165; 112 Mass. 339.

The hearing is conducted as follows. When the cause is called on in court, the pleadings on each side are opened in a brief manner to the court by the junior counsel for the plaintiff; after which the plaintiff's leading counsel states the plaintiff's case and the points in issue, and submits to the court his arguments upon them. Then the depositions (if any) of the plaintiff's witnesses, and such parts of the defendant's answer as support the plaintiff's case, are read by the plaintiff's solicitor; after which the rest of the plaintiff's counsel address the court. Then the same course of proceedings is observed on the other side, excepting that no part of the defendant's answer can be read in his favor if it be replied to. The leading counsel for the plaintiff is then heard in reply; after which the court pronounces the decrees. 14 Viner, Abr. 233; Com. Dig. Chancery, (T 1, 2, 3); Daniell, Chanc. Pract.

In Criminal Law. The examination of a prisoner charged with a crime or misdemeanor, and of the witnesses for the accused. See EXAMINATION.

HEARSAY EVIDENCE. That kind of evidence which does not derive its value solely from the credit to be given to the witness himself, but rests also, in part on the veracity and competency of some other person. 1 Phill. Ev. 185.

Hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which fact is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge; this species of testimony supposes some better which might be adduced in a particular case and its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind of the existence of the fact, and the frauds which might be practiced under its cover combine to support the rule that it is inadmissible; 110 U. S. 581; 7 Cra. 295.

The term applies to written as well as oral matter; but the writing or words are not necessarily hearsay, because those of a person not under oath. Thus, information on which one has acted; 2 B. & Ad. 845; 9 Johns. 45; the conversation of a person suspected of insanity; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 574; 2 Ad. & E. 3; 7 id. 313; see 51 Kan. 720; 24 S. W. S. 321; have been held admissible as original evidence under the circumstances, and for particular purposes. One may testify to his own age, where it is shown that his father and mother are dead; 49 Kan. 730; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 541; 108 N. C. 747. See as to age, 11 Cent. L. J. 401.

As a general rule, hearsay reports of a transaction, whether oral or written, are not admissible as evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 124; 9 Ind. 572; 5 Iowa 532; 14 La. Ann. 830; 6 Wis. 63; 68 Hun 412; 97 Ala. 639; 5 C. C. App. 220; 6 id. 428; 86 Ky. 605; 77 Ga. 563. The rule applies to evidence given under oath in a cause between other litigating parties; 1 East 373; 3 Term 77; 7 Cra. 296.

At one time in England it was held on the authority of Luttarell v. Reynell, 1 Mod. 282, that hearsay evidence of a witness' previous declarations might be admitted to confirm his testimony by showing that he "was constant to himself"; but this theory of confirming a sworn statement by declarations not under oath was abandoned in England; Buller, J., in 3 Doug. 242; and (except in a few cases which followed the earlier English case) repudiated in the United States; Stark. Ev. Sharsw. ed. 253, n. 2; 12 Am. L. Reg. 1, where the cases are collected.

Matters relating to public interest, as, for example, a claim to a ferry or highway, may be proved by hearsay testimony; 1 Stark. Ev. 195; 6 M. & W. 234; 1 M. & S. 679; 19 Conn. 250; but the matter in controversy must be of public interest; 2 B. & Ad. 245; 29 Barb. 593; 14 Md. 398; 6 Jones, N. C. 459; the declarations must be those of persons supposed to be dead; 11 Price 162; 1 C. & K. 58; 12 Vt. 178; and must have been made before controversy arose; 13 Ves. 514; 3 Campb. 444; 4 id. 417. See 103 N. C. 203. The rule extends to deeds, leases, and other private documents; 10 B. & C. 17; 1 M. & S. 77; maps; 2 Moore & P. 525; 19 Conn. 250; and verdicts; 1 East 355; 9 Bingh. 465; 10 Ad. & E. 151; 7 C. & P. 181. Testimony based on daily market reports from a commercial center comes from a public authentic source and is not hearsay; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 186.

Ancient documents purporting to be a part of the res gestæ are also admissible, although the parties to the suit are not bound; 5 Term 413, n.; 5 Price 312; 4 Pick. 160. See 2 C. & P. 440; 3 Johns. Cas. 283; 1 H. & J. 174; 4 Denio 201. So also declarations which form part of the res gestæ, which explain and give character to what was done at the time are not liable to the objection that they are hearsay; Stark. Ev. Sharwood's ed. 53, note 1, 89, note 1, where the cases illustrating this branch of the subject are collected and classified by the American editor.

When two persons not speaking a common language voluntarily agree on a third to interpret between them, the latter is to be regarded as the agent of each to translate and communicate what he says to the other, and such communication to the interpreter is not hearsay, and the party to whom it is made may testify to it; 50 Minn. 91; 51 Ia. 25; the weight only of such being affected thereby and not its competency; 157 Mass. 393.

HEARTH-MONEY. A tax, granted by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10, abolished 1 Will. & Mary, St. 1, c. 10, of two shillings on every hearth or stove in England and Wales. Jacob, Law Dict. Commonly called chimney-money. Id.

HEARTH-SILVER. A sort of modus for tithes, viz.: a prescription for cutting down and using for fuel the tithe of wood. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 304.

HEAT OF PASSION. This does not mean passion or anger which comes from an old grudge, or no immediate cause or provocation; but passion or anger suddenly aroused at the time by some immediate and reasonable provocation, by words or acts of one at the time. 106 Mo. 198.

HEBBERMAN. An unlawful fisher in the Thames below London bridge; so called because they generally fished at ebbing tide or water. 4 Hen. VII. c. 15; Jacob, Law Dict.

HEBBERTHEF. The privilege of having goods of a thief and trial of him within such a liberty. Cartular, S. Edmundi MS. 163; Cowel.

HEBBING-WEARS. A device for catching fish in ebbing water. Stat. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

HEBDOMAD. A week; a space of seven days.

HEBDOMADIUS. A week's man; a canon, or prebendary in a cathedral church, who has the care of the choir and the officers belonging to it, for his own week. Cowel.

HECCAGIUM. Rent paid to the lord for liberty to use engines called hecks. Toml.

HEDA. A small haven, wharf, or landing-place.

HEDAGIUM (Sax. hedu, hitha, port). A toll or custom paid at the hith or wharf, for landing goods, etc., from which an exemption was granted by the king to some particular persons and societies. Cartular. Abbatia de Redinges; Cowel.

HEDGE-BOTE. Wood used for repairing hedges or fences. 2 Bla. Com. 35; 16 Johns. 15; HAYBOTE.

HEDGE-PRIEST. A hedge-parson; specifically, in Ireland, formerly, a priest who has been admitted to orders directly from a hedge-school, without preparation in theological studies at a regular college. Cent. Dict.

HEGEMONY. The leadership of one among several independent confederate states.

HEGIRA. The epoch or account of time used by the Arabians and the Turks, who begin the Mohammedan era and computation from the day that Mahomet was compelled to escape from Mecca to Medina which happened on the night of Thursday, July 15th, A. D. 622, under the reign of the Emperor Heraclius. Townsend, Dict. Dates; Wilson, Gloss. The era begins July 16th. The word is sometimes spelled Hejira but the former is the ordinary usage. It is derived from hijrah, in one form or another, an oriental term denoting flight, departure.

HEIFER. A young cow which has not had a calf. A beast of this kind two years and a half old was held to be improperly described in the indictment as a cow; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 616; 1 Leach 105.

HEIR. At Common Law. He who is born or begotten in lawful wedlock, and upon whom the law casts the estate in lands, tenements, or hereditaments immediately upon the death of his ancestor. Thus, the word does not strictly apply to personal estate. Wms. Per. Pr.

Ordinarily used to designate those persons who answer this description at the death of the testator. In its strict and technical import applies to the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to the estate in case of intestacy. 2 Bla. Com. 201; 52 Ill. 62; 139 id. 433; 37 S. C. 255.

The term heir has a very different signification at common law from what it has in those states and countries which have adopted the civil law. In the latter, the term applies to all persons who are called to the succession, whether by the act of the party or by operation of law. The person who is created universal successor by a will is called the testamentary heir; and the next of kin by blood is, in cases of intestacy, called the heir-at-law, or heir by intestacy. The executor of the common law is in many respects not unlike the testamentary heir of the civil law. Again, the administrator in many respects corresponds with the heir by intestacy. By the common law, executors—unless expressly authorized by the will—and administrators have no right except to the personal estate of the deceased; whereas the heir by the civil law is authorized to administer both the personal and real estate. 1 Brown, Civ. Law 344; Story, Conf. Laws § 508.

No person is heir of a living person. A person occupying a relation which may be that of heirship is, however, called heir apparent or heir presumptive; 2 Bla. Com. 203; and the word heir may be used in a contract to designate the representative of a living person; 9 Conn. 272. A monster cannot be heir; Co. Litt. 7 b; nor at common law could a bastard; 2 Kent 208. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

In the word heirs is comprehended heirs of heirs in infinitum; Co. Litt. 7 b, 9 a; Wood, Inst. 69. The words "heir" and "heirs" are interchangeable, and embrace all legally entitled to partake of the inheritance; 83 Va. 724.

According to many authorities, heir may be nomen collectivum, as well in a deed as in a will, and operate in both in the same manner as the word heirs; 1 Rolle, Abr. 253; Ambl. 453; Cro. Eliz. 313; 1 Burr. 38. But see 2 Prest. Est. 9, 10. In wills, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator, the word heirs is sometimes construed to mean the next of kin; 1 Jac. & W. 338; 51 N. J. Eq. 1; and statutory next of kin; 41 L. T. Rep. n. s. 209; 2 Hawks 472; the word "heir" can be construed as "distributees" or "representatives"; 84 Penn. 245; and children; Ambl. 273; 36 S. C. 33; 87 Ga. 239; 91 Tenn. 119; 62 N. H. 558; 117 Ind. 308; it can be construed to mean "heirs of his body"; 75 Md. 141; and grand-children; 81 Va. 40. Under the term "heirs-at-law" a widow has been allowed to share; 158 Mass. 392; 63 Ind. 72; but see 137 N. Y. 106. See 12 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 721; 13 id. 46; Jarm. Wills 905.

In a bequest of personality the word "heirs" is used to mean those entitled under the statute of distribution in case of intestacy; 136 Pa. 153.

IN CIVIL LAW. He who succeeds to the rights and occupies the place of a deceased person. See the following titles, and HERES.

HEIR AT LAW. He who, after his ancestor dies intestate, has a right to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments which belonged to him or of which he was seised. The same as heir general.

In its general definition heir at law is not limited to children; it may be and is often used, in cases where there are no children; it includes parents, brothers, sisters, etc.; 7 U. S. App. 63.

HEIR APPARENT. One who has an indefeasible right to the inheritance, provided he outlive the ancestor. 2 Bla. Com. 208.

HEIRS, BENEFICIARY. In Civil Law. Those who have accepted the succession under the benefit of an inventory regularly made. La. Civ. Code, art. 879. If the heir apprehend that the succession will be burdened with debts beyond its value, he accepts with benefit of inventory, and in that case he is responsible only for the value of the succession.

HEIR, COLLATERAL. One who is not of the direct line of the deceased, but comes from a collateral line: as, a brother, sister, an uncle and aunt, a nephew, niece, or cousin, of the deceased.

HEIR, CONVENTIONAL. In Civil Law. One who takes a succession by virtue of a contract—for example, a marriage contract—which entitles the heir to the succession.

HEIR, FORCED. One who cannot be disinherited. See FORCED HEIRS.

HEIR, GENERAL. Heir at common law.

HEIR, IRREGULAR. In Louisiana. One who is neither testamentary nor legal heir, and who has been established by law to take the succession. See La. Civ. Code, art. 874. When the deceased has left neither lawful descendants, nor ascendants, nor collateral relations, the law calls to his inheritance either the surviving husband or wife, or his or her natural children, or the state; id. art. 911. This is called an irregular succession.

HEIR, LEGAL. In Civil Law. A legal heir is one who is of the same blood as the deceased and who takes the succession by force of law. This is different from a testamentary or conventional heir, who takes the succession in virtue of the disposition of man. See La. Civ. Code, art. 873, 875; Dict de Jurisp. Héritier légitime. There are three classes of legal heirs, to wit: the children and other lawful descendants, the fathers and mothers and other lawful ascendants, and the collateral kindred. La. Civ. Code, art. 883. See Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 229.

HEIR-LOOM. Chattels which, contrary to the nature of chattels, descend to the heir along with the inheritance, and do not pass to the executor.

This word seems to be compounded of heir and loom, that is, a frame, viz. to weave in. Some derive the word loom from the Saxon loma, or geloma, which signifies utensils or vessels generally. However this may be, the word loom, by time, is drawn to a more general signification than it bore at the first, comprehending all implements of household, as tables, presses, cupboards, bedsteads, wainscots, and which, by the custom of some countries, having belonged to a house, are never inventoried after the decease of the owner as chattels, but accrue to the heir with the house itself. Minshew; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 361.

Charters, deeds, and other evidences of the title of the land, together with the box or chest in which they are contained, the keys of a house, and fish in a fish-pond, are heirlooms. Co. Litt. 3 a, 185 b; 7 Co. 17 b, Cro. Eliz. 372; Brooke, Abr. Charters, pl. 13; 2 Bla. Com. 427; 14 Viner, Abr. 291; Darl. P. P. 16.

Diamonds bequeathed to one "as head of the family" and directed "to be deemed heirlooms in the family" are held in trust for the legatee and his successors; 23 W. R. 592; chattels bequeathed upon trust to permit the same to go and be enjoyed by the person possessed of the title, in the nature of heirlooms, vest absolutely in the first taker: 23 Ch. D. 158; and to the testator's nephew to go to and be held as heirlooms by him and his eldest son on his decease, is held to create an executory trust with a life interest in the first taker; L. R. 6 Eq. 540. An election by one who takes heirlooms under a deed of trust, to take under a will did not operate as a forfeiture of the heirlooms as the interest in them was unassignable: 31 Ch. D. 466.

HEIR PRESUMPTIVE. One, who, in the present circumstances, would be entitled to the inheritance, but whose rights may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born. 2 Bla. Com. 208. In Louisiana, the presumptive heir is he who is the nearest relation of the deceased capable of inheriting. This quality is given to him before the decease of the person from whom he is to inherit, as well as after the opening of the succession, until he has accepted or renounced it; La. Civ. Code, art. 876.

HEIR, TESTAMENTARY. In Civil Law. One who is constituted heir by testament executed in the form prescribed by law. He is so called to distinguish him from the legal heirs, who are called to the succession by the law; and from conventional heirs, who are so constituted by a contract inter vivos. See HÆRES FACTUS; DEVESEE.

HEIR, UNCONDITIONAL. In Louisiana. One who inherits without any reservation, or without making an inventory, whether the acceptance be express or tacit. La. Civ. Code, art. 878.

HEIRESS. A female heir to a person having an estate of inheritance. When there are more than one, they are called co-heiresses, or co-heirs.

HEIRSHIP MOVABLES. In Scotch Law. The movables which go to the heir, and not to the executor, that the land may not go to the heir completely dismantled, such as the best of furniture, horses, cows, etc., but not fungibles. Hope, Minor Pr. 538; Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 13-17; Bell, Dict.

HELL. The name given to a place under the exchequer chamber, where the king's debtors were confined. Rich. Dict.

HELM. A tiller; the handle or wheel of a ship; a defensive covering for the head; a helmet; thatch or straw.

HELOWE-WALL. The end-wall covering and defending the rest of the building. Paroch. Antiq. 573.

HELSING. A Saxon brass coin, of the value of an English half-penny.

HEMOLDBORH, or HELMELBORCH. A title to possession. The admission of this old Norse term into the laws of the Conqueror is difficult to be accounted for; it is not found in any Anglo-Saxon law extant. Whart.

HENCHMAN. A footman; one who holds himself at the bidding of another.

HENEDPENNY. A customary payment of money instead of hens at Christmas; a composition of eggs. Cow. Dic.

HENFARE. A fine for flight on account of murder. Domesd.

HENGEN. A prison for persons condemned to hard labor. Anc. Inst. Eng.

HENGHEN (ergastulum). In Saxon Law. A prison, or house of correction. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Engl. Gloss.

HENGWYTE. In Old English Law. An acquittance from a fine for hanging a thief. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 817.

HEORDFESTE. The master of a family; from the Saxon hearth faest, fixed to the house or hearth. Moz. & W.

HEORDPENNY. Peter-pence. Cow. Dic.

HEORDWERCK. In Saxon Law. The service of herdsman, done at the will of their lord.

HEPTARCHY. The name of the kingdom or government established by the Saxons on their establishment in Britain: so called because it was composed of seven kingdoms, namely, Kent, Essex, Sussex, Wessex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumberland.

HER. In an indictment for rape the use of this word is sufficient to show that the person alluded to is a female; 54 Ark. 660; but it has been held that in a written instrument the use of the pronoun "his" to designate a person therein named is not conclusive that such person is a male, and parol evidence will be admitted to show that such person is a female; 71 Cal. 38.

HERALD (from French hérault). An officer whose business it is to register genealogies, adjust ensigns armorial, regulate funerals and coronations, and, anciently, to carry messages between princes and proclaim war and peace.

In England, there are three chief heralds, called kings-at-arms, of whom Garter is the principal, instituted by king Henry V., whose office is to attend the knights of the Garter at their solemnities, and to marshal the funerals of the nobility. The next is Clarenceux, instituted by Edward IV., after he became duke of Clarence, and whose proper office is to arrange the funerals of all the lesser nobility, knights, and squires on the south side of Trent. The third Norroy (north roy), who has the like office on the north side of Trent. There are, also, six inferior heralds, who were created to attend dukes or great lords in their military expeditions. The office, however, has grown much into disuse,—so much falsity and confusion having crept into their records that they are no longer received in evidence in any court of justice. This difficulty was attempted to be remedied by a standing order of the house of lords, which requires Garter to deliver to that house an exact pedigree of each peer and his family on the day of his first admission; 3 Bla. Com. 105; Encyc. Brit.

HERALDRY. (1) The science of heralds; (2) an old and obsolete abuse of buying and selling precedence in the paper of causes for hearing. 2 North's Life of Lord-Keeper Guilford, 2d ed. 86.

HERALDS' COLLEGE. In 1450, the heralds' in England were collected into a college by Richard II. The earl marshal of England was chief of the college, and under him were three kings-at-arms (styled Garter, Clarenceux, Norroy), six heralds-at-arms (styled of York, Lancaster, Chester, Windsor, Richmond, and Somerset), and four pursuivants-at-arms (styled Blue Mantle, Rouge croix, Rouge dragon, and Portcullis). This organization still continues. Encyc. Brit.

HERBAGE. In English Law. An easement which consists in the right to pasture cattle on another's ground. A right to herbage does not include a right to cut grass, or dig potatoes, or pick apples; 4 N. H. 303.

HERBAGIUM AUTERIUS. The first cutting of hay or grass, as distinguished from the aftermath. Paroch. Antiq. 459.

HERBERGAGIUM. Lodgings to receive guests in the way of hospitality. Cowel.

HERBERGARE. To harbor; to entertain.

HERBERGATUS. Spent in an inn. Cowel.

HERBERY, or HERBURY. An inn. Cowel.

HERCE, or HERCIA. A harrow. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 77.

HERCIARE. To harrow. 4 Inst. 270.

HERCIATURE. In Old English Law. Harrowing; work with a harrow. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 82, § 2.

HERCISCUNDA. In Civil Law. To be divided. Familia herciscunda, an inheritance to be divided. Actio familie herciscundæ, an action for dividing an inheritance. Erciscunda is more commonly used in the civil law. Dig. 10, 2; Inst. 3 28, 4.

HERD-WERCK. Customary uncertain services as herdsman, shepherds, etc. Anno 1166, Regist. Ecclesiæ Christi Cant. MS.; Cowel.

HEREAFTER. Used as an adverb, it does not necessarily refer to unlimited time; it is not a synonym for "forever." It rather indicates the direction in time merely to which the context refers, and is limited by it. 50 N. J. Eq. 640.

HEREBANNUM. Calling out the army by proclamation. A fine paid by freemen for not attending the army. A tax for the support of the army. Du Cange.

HEBOTE. The king's edict commanding his subjects into the field. Moz. & W.; Cowel.

HEREDAD. In Spanish Law. A portion of land that is cultivated. Formerly it meant a farm, haciendo de campo, real estate.

HEREDAD YACENTE (From Lat. "hereditas jacens," q. v.). In Spanish Law. An inheritance not yet entered upon or appropriated. White, New Recop. b, 2, tit. 19, c. 2, § 8.

HEREDERO. In Spanish Law. Heir; he who, by legal or testamentary disposition, succeeds to the property of a deceased person. "Hæres censeatur cum defuncto una eademque persona." Las Partidas, 7. 9. 13.

HEREDITAGIUM. In Sicilian and Neapolitan Law. That which is held by hereditary right; the same hereditamentum (hereditament) in English Law. Spel. Gloss.

HEREDITAMENTS. Things capable of being inherited, be it corporeal or incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed, and including not only lands and everything thereon, but also heir-looms, and certain furniture which, by custom, may descend to the heir together with the land. Co. Litt. 5 b; 2 Bla. Com. 17; Chal. R. P. 43; 23 Barb. 338; 84 Iowa 407. By this term such things are denoted as may be the subject-matter of inheritance, but not the inheritance itself; it cannot, therefore, by its own intrinsic force, enlarge an estate prima facie a life estate, into a fee; 2 B. & P. 251; 8 Term 503.

HEREDITARY. That which is the subject of inheritance.

HEREDITARY RIGHT TO THE CROWN. The crown of England, by the positive constitution of the kingdom, has ever been descendible, and so continues, in a course peculiar to itself, yet subject to limitation by parliament; but, notwithstanding such limitation, the crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited. 1 Bla. Com. c. 3.

HEREFARE (Sax.). A going into or with an army; a going out to war (profectio militaris); an expedition. Cowel; Spel. Gloss.

HEREGEAT. A heriot (q. v.).

HEREGELD. A tribute or a tax levied for the maintenance of an army. Moz. & W.; Spel. Gloss.

HERENACH. An arch-deacon. Cowel.

HERES. See HÆRES.

HERESCHIP. In Old Scotch Law. Theft or robbery. Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 2, pp. 26, 89.

HERESLITA, HERESSA, HERESSIZ. A hired soldier who departs without license. 4 Inst. 128.

HERESY. An offence which consists not in a total denial of Christianity, but of some of its essential doctrines, publicly and obstinately avowed. What in old times used to be adjudged heresy was left to the determination of the ecclesiastical judge; and the statute 2 Hen. 4, c. 15, defines heretics as teachers of erroneous opinions, contrary to the faith and blessed determinations of the holy church. Various laws have been passed before and after the reformation explaining wholly or partially what is meant by heresy. Heresy is now subject only to ecclesiastical correction, by virtue of Stat. 29 Car. 2, c. 9; 4 Bl. Com. 44; 4 Steph. Com. 203. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

HERETOCH. A general, leader, or commander, also a baron of the realm. Du Fresne.

HERETOFORE. Time past in distinction from time present and time future. 40 Conn. 156.

HERETUM. In Old Records. A court or yard for drawing up guards or military retinue. Cowel.; Jac. L. Dict.

HEREZELD. In Scotch Law. A gift or present made or left by a tenant to his lord as a token of reverence. Skene.

HERGE. In Saxon Law. Offenders who joined in a body of more than thirty-five to commit depredation.

HERIGALDS. In Old English Law. A sort of garment. Cowel.

HERIOT. In English Law. A customary tribute of goods and chattels, payable to the lord of the fee on the decease of the owner of the land. If a man fell before his lord in battle, no heriot was demanded; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 293.

Heriot service is such as is due upon a special reservation in the grant or lease of lands, and therefore amounts to little more than a mere rent. Heriot custom arises upon no special reservation whatsoever, but depends merely upon immemorial usage and custom. See 2 Bla. Com. 97, 422; Comyns, Dig. Copyhold (K 18); Bacon, Abr.; 2 Saund.; 1 Vern. 441.

HERISCHILD. A species of English military service.

HERISCHULDÆ. A fine for disobedience to proclamation of warfare. Skene.

HERISCINDIUM. A division of household goods. Blount.

HERISLET. Laying down of arms. Blount. Desertion from the army. Spel. Gloss.

HERISTALL. A castle; the station of an army; the place where a camp is pitched. Spel. Gloss.

HERITABLE. See INHERITANCE.

HERITABLE BOND. In Scotch Law. See BOND.

HERITABLE JURISDICTION. In Scotch Law. Grants of criminal jurisdiction made to great families for the better execution of justice. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 43. Bell, Dict.

HERITABLE OBLIGATION. One whose rights and duties descend to the heir, so far as the heir accepts the succession. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 133.

HERITABLE RIGHTS. In Scotch Law. Rights which go to the heir; generally, all rights in or connected with lands. Bell, Dict. Heritable.

HERITABLE SECURITY. Security constituted by heritable property. Encyc. Dict.

HERITAGE. In Civil Law. Every species of immovable which can be the subject of property: such as lands, houses, orchards, woods, marshes, ponds, etc., in whatever mode they may have been acquired, either by descent or purchase. 3 Toullier 472. See Co. Litt. s. 731.

HERITOR. In Scotch Law. A proprietor of land. 1 Kames, Eq. Prin.

HERMANDAD (called also, Santa Hermandad). In Spanish Law. A fraternity formed among different towns and villages to prevent the commission of crimes, and to prevent the abuses and vexations to which they were subjected by men in power.

To carry into effect the object of this association, each village and town elected two alcaldes,—one by the nobility and the other by the community at large. These had under their order inferior officers, formed into companies, called cuad villeros. Their duty was to arrest delinquents and bring them before the alcaldes, when they were tried substantially in the ordinary form. This tribunal, established during the anarchy prevailing in feudal times, continued to maintain its organization in Spain for centuries; and various laws determining its jurisdiction and mode of proceeding were enacted by Ferdinand and Isabella and subsequent monarchs. Nov. Recop. tit. 35, b. 12, § 7. The abuses introduced in the exercise of the functions of the tribunals caused their abolition, and the santas hermandades of Ciudad Rodrigo, Talavera, and Toledo, the last remnants of these anomalous jurisdictions, were abolished by the law of the 7th May, 1835.

HERMAPHRODITES. Persons who have in the sexual organs the appearance of both sexes. They are adjudged to belong to that sex which prevails in them; Co., Litt. 2. 7; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, t. 2, s. 1, n. 9.

The sexual characteristics in the human species are widely separated, and the two sexes are very rarely united in the same individual; there are a few cases on record, however, in which both ovaries and testicles were present. In one there were two ovaries, a rudimentary uterus, and a single testicle containing spermatozoa. Am. Text Book of Gynecology. Cases of malformation are occasionally found, in which it is very difficult to decide to which sex the person belongs. See 2 Med. Exam. 314; 1 Briand, Med. Leg. c. 2, art. 2, § 2, n. 2; Guy Med. Jur. 42, 47; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 11th

ed. 164 et seq.; Wharton & S. Med. Jur. § 408 et seq.

HERMENEUTICS (Greek, ἑρμηνεύω, to interpret). The art and science, or body of rules, of truthful interpretation. It has been used chiefly by theologians; but Zachariæ, in "An Essay on General Legal Hermeneutics" (Versuch einer allg. Hermeneutik des Rechts), and Dr. Lieber, in his work on Legal and Political Hermeneutics, also makes use of it. See INTERPRETATION; CONSTRUCTION.

HERMER. A great lord. Jacob.

HERMOGENIAN CODE. See CODE.

HERnescus. A heron. Cowel.

HERNESIUM, or HERNASIUM. Household goods; implements of trade or husbandry; the rigging or tackle of a ship. Cowel.

HEROUDES. Heralds. Du Cange.

HERPEX. A harrow. Spel. Gloss.

HERPICATIO. In Old English Law. A day's work with a harrow. Spel. Gloss.

HERRING SILVER. This was a composition in money for the custom of supplying herrings for the provision of a religious house. Whart.

HERSHIP. The crime, in Scotland, of carrying off cattle by force; it is described as "the masterful driving off of cattle from a proprietor's grounds." Bell; Moz. & W.

HERUS. A master. Servus facit ut herus det, the servant does (the work), in order that the master may give (him the wages agreed on). Herus dat ut servus faciat, the master gives (or agrees to give, the wages), in consideration of, or with a view to, the servant's doing (the work). 2 Bla. Com. 445.

HESIA. An easement. Du Cange.

HEST CORN. Corn or grain given or devoted to religious persons or purposes. Cowel; 2 Mon. Ang. 367 b.

HESTA or HESTHA. A small loaf of bread.

HIDAGE. In Old English Law. A tax levied, in emergencies, on every hide of land; the exemption from such tax. Bract. lib. 2, c. 56. It was payable sometimes in money, sometimes in ships or military equipments; e. g. in the year 994, when the Danes landed in England, every three hundred hides furnished a ship to king Ethelred, and every eight hides one pack and one saddle. Jacob, Law Dict.

HIDALGO (spelled, also, Hijodalgo). In Spanish Law. He who, by blood and lineage, belongs to a distinguished family, or is noble by descent. Las Partidas 2. 12. 3.

HIDE (from Sax. hyden, to cover; so, Lat. tectum, from tegere). In Old English Law. A building with a roof; a house.

As much land as might be ploughed with one plough. The amount was probably determined by usage of the locality; some make it sixty, others eighty, others ninety-six, others one hundred or one hundred and twenty, acres. Co. Litt. 5; 1 Plowd. 167; Shepp. Touchst. 93; Du Cange.

A hide was anciently employed as a unit of taxation. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 347, such tax being called hidegild.

As much land as was necessary to support a hide, or mansion-house. Co. Litt. 69 a; Spelman, Gloss; Du Cange, Hida; 1 Introd. to Domesday 145. At present the quantity is one hundred acres. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Engl. Gloss.

HIDE AND GAIN. In English Law. A term anciently applied to arable land. Co. Litt. 85 b.

HIDE LANDS. In Old English Law. Lands appertaining to a hide, or mansion. See HIDE.

HIDEL. In Old English Law. A place of protection; a sanctuary. St. 1 Hen. VII. cc. 5, 6; Cowel.

HIDGILD, or HIDE GILD. A sum of money paid by a villein or servant to save himself from whipping. Fleta, l. 1, c. 47, § 20.

HIERARCHY. Originally, government by a body of priests. Stubbs, Const. Hist. § 376. Now, the body of officers in any church or ecclesiastical institution, considered as forming an ascending series of ranks or degrees of power and authority, with the correlative subjection, each to the one next above.

HIGH BAILIFF. An officer attached to an English county court. His duties are to attend the court when sitting; to serve summons; and to execute orders, warrants, writs, etc. Stats. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 33; Poll. C. C. Pr. 16. He also has similar duties under the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the county courts. Bankruptcy Rules 1870, 58.

HIGH COMMISSION COURT. In English Law. An ecclesiastical court of very extensive jurisdiction, for the vindication of the peace and dignity of the church, by reforming, ordering, and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, and all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities.

It was erected by stat. 1 Eliz. c. 1, and abolished by 16 Car. II. c. 11.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY. See ADMIRALTY.

HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY. See CHANCERY.

HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES. In English Law. See COURT OF DELEGATES.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY. See COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT. In English Law. The English Parliament, as composed of the house of peers and house of commons.

The house of lords sitting in its judicial capacity.

This term is applied to parliament by most of the law writers. Thus, parliament is said by Blackstone to be the supreme court of the kingdom, not only for the making but also for the execution of the laws; 4 Bla. Com. 259. Lord Coke and Lord Hale also apply the term "court" to the whole parliament; and see Finch, Law 233; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 2. But, from the fact that in general judicial proceedings the house of commons takes no part, but only in the trial of impeachments, and then only as prosecutor, and from the fact that the house of commons disclaimed possession of judicial powers at the deposition of Richard II., and the twelve judges made a similar decision in 1 Hen. VII., the propriety of this use of the term has been questioned: Bla. Com. Warren, Abr. 215. The propriety of its application would seem to be derived from the claim of parliament to be considered as the successor of the aula regis, which was a judicial as well as a legislative body, and, if the succession is established, would be applicable although the judicial power may have been granted to the various courts. See COURTS; HOUSE OF LORDS; IMPEACHMENT.

HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS. The constitution of the U. S. provides that the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the U. S. shall be removed from office on impeachment for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. This does not apply to senators and members of congress, but does to U. S. circuit and district judges; Blount's Trial 102; Peck's Trial; 10 Law Trials; Chase's Trial; 11 id. See 6 Conn. 417. See IMPEACHMENT.

HIGH SEAS. The uninclosed waters of the ocean, and also those waters on the seacoast which are without the boundaries of low-water mark. 1 Gall. 624; 5 Mas. C. C. 290; 1 Bla. Com. 110; Bened. Adm.; 2 Hagg. Adm. 398.

The act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 8, enacts that if any person shall commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder, etc., which if committed within the body of a county would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death, every such offender, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death; and the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought. See 4 Dall. 426; 3 Wash. C. C. 515; 1 Mas. 147; 1 Gall. 624; 4 Blatchf. 420.

It was held in 32 Fed. Rep. 406 that the Great Lakes are not high seas, and that these words have been employed from time immemorial to designate the ocean below low-water mark, and have rarely if ever been applied to interior or land-locked waters of any kind; but the supreme court of the United States has held otherwise, saying that this term is also applicable to the open, unenclosed waters of the Great Lakes; 150 U. S. 249. See FAUCES TERRÆ; GREAT LAKES.

HIGH TREASON. In English Law. Treason against the king, in contradistinction from petit treason, which is the treason of a servant towards his master, a wife towards her husband, a secular or religious man towards his prelate. See PETIT TREASON; TREASON.

HIGH-WATER MARK. That part of the shore of the sea to which the waves ordinarily reach when the tide is at its highest. 6 Mass. 435; 1 Pick. 180; 1 Halst. 1; 1 Russ. Cr. 107; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 803.

Wherever the presence of the water is so common as to mark on the soil a character, in respect to vegetation, distinct from that of the banks; it does not include low lands which, though subject to periodical overflow, are valuable for agricultural purposes. 58 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 295. See SEA-SHORE; TIDE.

HIGHWAY. A passage, road, or street which every citizen has a right to use. 3 Kent 432; 3 Yeates 421.

The term highway is the generic name for all kinds of public ways, whether they be carriage-ways, bridle-ways, foot-ways, bridges, turnpike roads, railroads, canals, ferries, or navigable rivers; 6 Mod. 255; Ang. Highw. c. 1; 3 Kent 432. A cul de sac is also a highway; 11 East 375, note; 18 Q. B. 870; 8 Allen 242; 24 N. Y. 559 (overruling 23 Barb. 103); 87 Ill. 189; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 49; 60 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1048; but an alley would not be; 32 Mich. 111; 90 Mich. 104.

Highways are created either by legislative authority, by dedication, or by necessity.

First, by legislative authority. In England, the laying out of highways is regulated by act of parliament; in this country, by general statutes, differing in different states. In England, the uniform practice is to provide a compensation to the owner of the land taken for highways. In the act authorizing the taking, in the United States, such a provision must be made, or the act will be void under the clause in the federal and in the several state constitutions that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." The amount of such compensation may be determined either by a jury or by commissioners, as shall be prescribed by law; 1 Bla. Com. 139; Ang. Highw. c. 2; Thomp. Highw. 233; 8 Price 535; 18 Pick. 511; 25 Wend. 463; 21 N. H. 358; Baldw. 222; 3 Watts 292; 16 N. Y. 97; 14 Wisc. 609. In case the statute makes no provision for indemnity for land to be taken, an injunction may be obtained to prevent the taking; 3

Paige, Ch. 45; 2 Johns. Ch. 162; 9 Ind. 433; 34 Me. 247; see 132 Ind. 4; or an action at law may be maintained after the damage has been committed; 5 Cow. 165; 16 Conn. 98; and cases cited above.

See 32 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 88; EMINENT DOMAIN.

Second, by dedication, which title see.

Third, by necessity. If a highway be impassable, from being out of repair or otherwise, the public have a right to pass in another line, and, for this purpose, to go on the adjoining ground, even when sown with grain and enclosed with a fence; but they must do no unnecessary damage; Cro. Car. 366; 7 Cush. 408; 2 Show. 28; 7 Barb. 309. This right, however, is only temporary and gives the public no permanent easement; 41 N. H. 628.

A highway is simply an easement or servitude, carrying with it, as its incidents, the right to use the soil for the purposes of repair and improvement; and, in cities, for the more general purposes of sewerage, the distribution of light and water, and the furtherance of public morality, health, trade, and convenience. The owner of the land over which it passes retains the fee and all rights of property not incompatible with the public enjoyment, such as the right to the herbage, the trees and fruit growing thereon, or minerals below, and may work a mine, sink a drain or cellar, or carry water in pipes beneath it, or sell the soil if it be done without injury to the highway; 4 Viner, Abr. 502; Com. Dig. Chemin (A 2); Ang. Highw. c. 7; 1 N. H. 16; 1 Sumn. 21; 3 Rawle 495; 10 Pet. 25; 6 Mass. 454; 15 Johns. 447; 31 N. Y. 151; 34 Vt. 336; 28 Conn. 165; 83 Me. 508; 88 Va. 985; 45 La. Ann. 426; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 710; [1893] 1 Q. B. 142; 40 Minn. 337; 164 Mass. 350; but see 125 N. Y. 164; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 894. The title to a spring within the right of way of a turnpike company is in the owner, who may use the water as he pleases, and the turnpike company has no easement in such spring; 172 Pa. 460. The owner may maintain ejectment for encroachments on the highway or an assize if disseized of it; 3 Kent 432; Adams, Eject. 19; 9 S. & R. 26; 1 Conn. 135; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 141; 35 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 581; or trespass against one who builds on it; 2 Johns. 357; or who digs up and removes the soil; 12 Wend. 98; [1893] 1 Q. B. 142; or cuts down trees growing thereon; 1 N. H. 16; or damages them in putting up telephone wires; 2 Can. S. C. R. 276; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 710; or who stops upon it for the purpose of using abusive or insulting language; 11 Barb. 390. A landowner has the right to the lateral support of the soil in the adjoining street, and a city is liable for any damage occasioned by removing this lateral support in grading the street; 40 Minn. 389. A steam railroad used for the purposes of transporting persons, and property upon a highway is an additional servitude for which an abutting owner is entitled to compensation; 2 E. D. Sm. 97; 3 Hill 567; 4 Zab. 592; 16 Miss. 649; 38 Mich. 62; 67 Ill. 444; 4 Cush.

63; and so with any railroad which carries both passengers and freight, irrespective of the method of propulsion; 28 Minn. 373. See 41 Cal. 256; 52 Ind. 428; 48 id. 178; 66 Miss. 279; 46 Ia. 366; 47 Mich. 393. As to a railway for passengers only the question depends upon the character and extent of the use, and not upon the motive power; 35 Minn. 112; 79 Me. 363; 41 Fed. Rep. 556; 87 Mich. 361; 27 N. Y. 188; 21 Ill. 516; but when such a road seriously interferes with the rights of an abutting owner, it is held an additional servitude. This rule applies to an elevated railroad, which is considered an obstruction to the easement of air and light and the easement of access; 104 N. Y. 268; 90 id. 122; 91 id. 148; 106 N. Y. 147; 43 Ohio St. 190; and to any railroad which causes changes of grade in the street; 59 Cal. 290; 7 Barb. 508; 17 Neb. 548; 83 Ill. 535; 6 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 325; 22 Minn. 527; 121 Mass. 241; 33 Ind. 435; but only in states which so provide by their constitutions or by statutes; 1 Pick. 418; 6 Ind. 237; 79 id. 491; 26 Ark. 276. Where the horse is the motive power of a passenger railway on a street or highway, and the grade is unchanged, no new servitude is imposed; 78 Ind. 261; an electric railway is held to come within this rule; 5 Dist. Rep. Pa. 18; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 535; 167 Pa. 62; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 351; 93 Tenn. 492; 32 Conn. 579; 52 Md. 242; 27 Wis. 194; 85 Mich. 634; 139 Pa. 419; and a cable road; 32 Fed. Rep. 270; 121 N. Y. 536, reversing 56 Hun 527; contra, 1 N. Y. Supp. 197; the erection of poles and stringing of wires by a telephone company is not an additional servitude; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 111 (contra, 49 Fed. Rep. 113); nor by an electric light company; 54 Hun 469. But the occupation of a country road by an electric light company constitutes an additional servitude; 39 N. Y. Supp. 522; or by a telegraph company; 143 N. Y. 133; or by an electric railway company; 167 Pa. 62; or a gas company; 62 N. Y. 386. See POLES; WIRES. As to other uses of city streets and compensation to abutters for damages resulting therefrom, see EMINENT DOMAIN.

The owners on the opposite sides prima facie own respectively to the centre line of the street; 33 Pa. 124; 86 Hun 424; 17 N. J. Eq. 75. And a grant of land "by," or "on," or "along" a highway carries, by presumption, the fee to the centre line, if the grantor own so far, though this presumption may be rebutted by words showing an intention to exclude the highway, such as, "by the side of," "by the margin of," or other equivalent expressions; Ang. Highw. § 315; 11 Me. 463; 4 Day 228; 13 N. H. 381; 8 Metc. 266; 2 R. I. 508; 60 N. Y. 609; 5 Whart. 18. But, while in most of the states this is the rule, there are exceptions as, in Kansas and Nebraska, where the fee of highways is vested in the county; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 894; 46 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 627; and in New York city where by act of 1813 the fee is vested in the municipality in trust for the public; 27 N. Y. 188; 45 id. 732; 68 id. 593; 125 id. 164; and in Illinois, in the municipality in trust for the public; 75 Ill. 301; 11 id. 554; 67 id. 439; and it is held that even where the abutting owner does not own the fee in the highway, he has special easements therein not enjoyed by the public, as those of light, air, and access; 36 Hun 427; 34 id. 121; 9 id. 246; 4 Paige 510; 102 Ill. 64; 21 Fed. Rep. 309; 7 Wall. 272; 7 Col. 113; 39 Ohio St. 333; 41 Hun 117; 44 N. J. Eq. 120; 106 Ind. 29. See FRONTAGE. Where the fee of a highway is in the adjoining owner, it reverts to him upon a discontinuance, vacation, or abandonment; 8 Bosw. 372; 4 Mass. 429; 110 Pa. 370; 36 Barb. 136; 10 Pet. 26; 15 Johns. 447; 28 Kan. 470. But in Illinois it is held that such land reverts to the original owner and not to the abutter who acquires title to it after the establishment of the way; 75 Ill. 301.

In England, the inhabitants of the several parishes are prima facie bound to repair all highways lying within them, unless by prescription or otherwise they can throw the burden upon particular persons; Shelf. Highw. 44; 5 Burr. 1700; 12 Mod. 409. In this country, the English parochial system being unknown, this feature of the common law does not prevail. The liability to repair is here determined by statute, and, in most of the states, devolves upon the towns, or other local municipalities; 8 Barb. 645; 13 Pick. 343; 1 Humphr. 217; 125 Pa. 24; 74 Iowa 644. The liability being thus created, its measure is likewise to be ascertained by statute, the criterion being, generally, safety and convenience for travel, having reference to the natural characteristics of the road and the public needs; Ang. Highw. § 259; 2 W. & M. 337; 19 Vt. 470; 4 Cush. 307, 365; 14 Me. 198. For neglect to repair, the parish in England, and in this country the town or body chargeable, is indictable as for a nuisance; 2 Wms. Saund. 158, n. 4; 28 N. H. 195; Ang. Highw. § 275; and, in many states, is made liable, by statute, to an action on the case for damages in favor of any person who may have suffered special injury by reason of such neglect; 17 How. 161; 3 Cush. 174; 22 Pa. 384; 31 Me. 299; Ang. Highw. § 286; 83 Va. 355; 71 Tex. 280. But to make a county liable, the defect in the highway must have been the sole cause of the injury; 31 W. Va. 477. Contributory negligence defeats recovery for injuries caused by a defective highway; 29 S. C. 140; 97 Mo. 151; 31 W. Va. 477; 77 Ga. 288. The duty of repair may, in this country, rest on an individual to the exclusion of the town; 23 Wend. 446; or on a corporation who, in pursuance of their charter, build a road, and levy tolls for the expense of maintaining it; 7 Conn. 86. The taking of toll is prima facie evidence of the duty; 1 Hawks 451.

In Pennsylvania any one or more taxpayers in a township or road district may, upon proper proceedings, and giving a bond, acquire a right to make, repair, etc., all the roads, and thereupon be free from road taxes for a year; act of June 12, 1893.

Any act or obstruction which incom-modates or impedes the lawful use of a highway by the public, except such as arises by necessity from unloading wagons, putting up buildings, etc., is a common-law nuisance; 4 Steph. Com. 294; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76; Ang. Highw. § 345; 1 Denio 524; 8 Ohio St. 358; 29 Am. L. Reg. 342; 145 Pa. 453; 23 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 1115; 43 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 196; 46 Ill. App. 67. A fruit stand on a city street is an obstruction; 6 Gill 425; 73 Ind. 185. The drawing large crowds before a shop window; 1 S. & R. 219; the stopping teams or vehicles for such a time or at such a place as unreasonably to interfere with public travel; 3 Campb. 226; 54 Md. 148; 39 Ohio St. 333; 85 N. C. 522; (but a reasonable necessity will justify a temporary obstruction; 72 Wis. 199); collecting a noisy and disorderly crowd by music or speaking; 19 Pa. 412; 64 N. H. 48; conducting an execution sale on the street; 13 S. & R. 403; are nuisances and may be abated by any one whose passage is thereby obstructed; 3 Steph. Com. 5; 5 Co. 101; 10 Mass. 70; 18 Wis. 265; or the person causing or maintaining the same may be indicted; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76; Thomp. Highw. 305; 2 Saund. 158, note; 7 Hill, N. Y. 575; 13 Metc. Mass. 115; 2 R. I. 493; 29 Am. L. Reg. 342; or may be sued for damages in an action on the case by any one specially injured thereby; Co. Litt. 56 a; 1 Binn. 463; 7 Cow. 609; 19 Pick. 147; 6 Oreg. 378; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 531, and note; 2 Ill. 229; 53 Barb. 629; 5 Blackf. 35; and a court of equity will take jurisdiction of a civil action to abate and enjoin the maintenance of an obstruction to a highway which is a public nuisance; 47 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 255. At common law the public have no right to pasture cattle on the highways; 2 H. Bla. 527; 16 Mass. 33; 5 Wis. 27.

Disobedience of a city ordinance forbidding the leaving of horses unhitched on the street of a city is negligence, for which the employer of the driver must answer in damages to a person sustaining injuries therefrom; 8 Houst. 562.

The legislature has power to authorize certain obstructions which would otherwise be a public nuisance, such as the laying of railroad tracks or bridging of streams or constructing sewers, etc., or laying gas and water pipes; 14 Gray 93; 12 Ia. 246; 65 Mo. 325; 16 N. Y. 97; 31 Wis. 316; 57 Me. 481; 34 Mich. 462; 68 N. Y. 71.

It is the duty of travellers upon highways, for the purpose of avoiding collision and accident, to observe due care in accommodating themselves to each other. To observe this purpose, it is the rule in England, that, in meeting, each party shall bear or keep to the left; and in this country, to the right; 2 Steph. N. P. 984; Story, Bailm. § 599; Thomp. Highw. 384; 2 Dowl. & R. 255; 158 Mass. 46. This rule, however, may and ought to be varied, where its observance would defeat its purpose; 8 C. & P. 103; 12 Metc. 415; 23 Pa. 196. The rule does not apply to equestrians and foot-passengers; 24 Wend. 465; 2 D. Chipm. 128; 8 C. & P. 373, 691; 2 Misc. Rep. 238; but it has been held to apply to bicyclists; 32 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 652. It is another rule that travellers shall drive only at a moderate rate of speed, furious driving on a thronged thoroughfare being an indictable offence at common law; 1 Pet. 590; 13 id. 181; 8 C. & P. 694. In case of injury by reason of the non-observance of these rules or of other negligence, as by the use of unsuitable carriages or harness, or horses imperfectly trained, the injured party is entitled to recover his damages in an action on the case against the culpable party, unless the injury be in part attributable to his own neglect; Ang. Highw. § 345; 1 Pick. 345; 11 East 60; 63 Conn. 150; 5 W. & S. 544; 5 C. & P. 379; 19 Wend. 399. The legislature has complete power to regulate the highways in a state, and may prescribe what vehicles may be used on them with a view to the safety of the passengers over them and the preservation of the roads; 97 N. C. 477; it may regulate the improvement for the public good of highways, whether on land or by water, subject to the right of congress to interpose when such highways are the means of interstate and foreign commerce; 119 U. S. 543. See Thompson; Pope, Highw.; Elliott, Roads & Streets; Booth, Street Ry.; 24 Alb. L. J. 464; 33 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 469.

And see BICYCLE; BRIDGE; TURNPIKE; RAILROAD; CANAL; FERRY; GRADE CROSSING; RIVER; STREET; WAY; NEGLIGENCE; NAVIGABLE WATERS.

HIGHWAYMAN. A robber on the highway.

HIGLER. In English Law. A person who carries from door to door, and sells by retail, small articles of provisions, and the like.

HIGUELA. In Spanish Law. The written acknowledgment given by each of the heirs of a deceased person, showing the effects he has received from the succession.

HIIS TESTIBUS. Words formerly used in deeds, signifying these being witnesses. They have been disused since Henry VIII. Co. Litt.; Cowel.

HIJRA. Flight; departure. Given by some authorities for Hegira (q. v.). Moz. & W.

HILARY TERM. In English Law. A term of court, beginning on the 11th and ending on the 31st of January in each year. Superseded (1875) by Hilary Sittings, which begin January 11th and end on the Wednesday before Easter. See TERM.

HINDENI HOMINES. A society of men in the Saxon times. Toml.

HINDER AND DELAY. A phrase used to signify an act amounting to an attempt to defraud rather than a successful fraud. To put some obstacle in the path of, or interpose some time unjustifiably, before a creditor can realize what is owed out of his debtor's property. 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 63; 74 N. Y. 597. The question of fraudulent intent is one of fact; 9 Col. 8. The word "hinder" is not synonymous with "delay"; 68 Mo. 435.

HINDU LAW. The system of native law prevailing among the Gentoos, and administered by the government of British India.

In all the arrangements for the administration of justice in India, made by the British government and the East India Company, the principle of reserving to the native inhabitants the continuance of their own laws and usages within certain limits has been uniformly recognized. The laws of the Hindus and Mohammedians have thus been brought into notice in England, and are occasionally referred to by writers on English and American law. The native works upon these subjects are very numerous. The chief English republications of the Hindu law are, Colebrooke's Digest of Hindu Law, London 1801; Sir Wm. Jones's Institutes of Hindu Law, London, 1797. For a fuller account of the Hindu Law, and of the original Digests and Commentaries, see Morley's Law of India, London, 1858, and Macnaghten's Principles of Hindu and Mohammedan Law, London, 1860. The principal English republications of the Mohammedan Law are Hamilton's Hedaya, London, 1791; Baillie's Digest, Calcutta, 1805; Précis de Jurisprudence musulmane selon le Rite malikite, Paris, 1848; and the treatises on Succession and Inheritance translated by Sir William Jones. See, also, Norton's Cases on Hindu Law of Inheritance; Rattigan, Hindu Law. An approved outline of both systems is Macnaghten's Principles of Hindu and Mohammedan Law; also contained in the "Principles and Precedents" of the same law previously published by the same author.

HINE or HIND. A servant, or one of the family, but more properly a servant at husbandry; and he that oversees the rest is called the master hine. Cowel; Moz. & W.

HINE-FARE. The loss or departure of a servant from his master. Domesd.

HINEGELD. A ransom for an offence committed by a servant. Cowel.

HIPOTECA. In Spanish Law. A mortgage of real property. Johnson, Civ. Law of Spain, 156 [149]; White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 7.

HIRE. A bailment in which compensation is to be given for the use of a thing, or for labor and services about it. 2 Kent 456; Story, Bailm. § 359. The divisions of this species of contract are denoted by Latin names.

Locatio operis faciendi is the hire of labor and work to be done or care and attention to be bestowed on the goods let by the hirer, for a compensation.

Locatio operis mercium vehendarum is the hire of the carriage of goods from one place to another, for a compensation. Jones, Bailm. 85, 86, 90, 103, 118; 2 Kent 456.

Locatio rei or locatio conductio rei is the bailment of a thing to be used by the hirer for a compensation to be paid by him.

This contract is voluntary, and founded in consent; it involves mutual and reciprocal obligations; and it is for mutual benefit. In some respects it bears a strong resemblance to the contract of sale; the principal difference between them being that in cases of sale the owner parts with the whole proprietary interest in the thing, and in cases of hire the owner parts with possession only for a temporary purpose. In a sale, the thing itself is the object of the contract; in hiring, the use of the thing is its object; Vinnius, lib. 3, tit. 25, in pr.; Pothier, Louage, nn. 2-4; Jones, Bailm. 86; Story, Bailm. § 371. See Edwards, Jones, Story, Schouler, Bailments; Parsons, Story, Contracts; 2 Kent 456; BAILMENT.

HIREMAN. A subject. Du Cange.

HIRER. He who hires. See 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 578; BAILMENT.

HIRST or HURST. In Old English Law. A wood. Domesd; Co. Litt. 4 b.

HIS. A demise by A to B for the term of "his" natural life may enure as a demise either for the life of A or that of B according to circumstances; 2 Nev. and M. 833.

In a policy of insurance the word "his" instead of "their" as descriptive of the property of the assured, does not render the policy void, if the assured has an insurable interest, although the interest may be qualified or defeasible or even an equitable interest; 10 Pick. 40; 29 Conn. 10; 16 Wend. 385; 122 Mass. 94; but where the policy expressly requires that a statement be made whether the insured owns the sole interest in the premises, the use of the word "his" instead of "their" amounts to a misrepresentation, if the insured is not the sole owner; 68 Mo. 127. REPRESENTATION.

The ninth clause of the thirty-ninth section of the bankruptcy act does not apply to an accommodation indorser of negotiable paper whose indorsement is in no way connected with the business of the indorser, as such paper is not "his" commercial paper within the meaning of said clause; 2 Dill. 533.

HIS EXCELLENCY. A title given by the constitution of Massachusetts to the governor of that commonwealth. Mass. Const. part 2, c. 2, s. 1, art. 1. This title is customarily given to the governors of the other states, whether or not it be the official designation in their constitutions and laws.

HIS HONOR. A title given by the constitution of Massachusetts to the lieutenant governor of that commonwealth. Mass. Const. part 2, c. 2, s. 2, art. 1. It is also customarily given to some inferior magistrates, as the mayor of a city.

HISSA. A lot or portion; a share of revenue or rent. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

HIWISC. A hide of land.

HLAFORDSWICE (Sax. hlaford, lord, literally bread-giver, and wice). In Old English Law. Betraying one's lord; treason. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 59, 301.

HLASOCNA. The benefit of the law. Du Cange; Toml.

HLOTH (Sax.). An unlawful company. Moz. and W.

HLOTHBOTE (Sax. hlOTH, company, and bote, compensation). In Old English Law. Fine for presence at an illegal assembly. Du Cange, Hlothbota.

HOCK-TUESDAY MONEY. A duty given to the landlord, that his tenants and bondmen might solemnize the day on which the English mastered the Danes, being the second Tuesday after Easter week. Cowel.

HODGE-PODGE ACT. A name given to a legislative act which embraces many subjects. Such acts, besides being evident proofs of the ignorance of the makers of them, or of their want of good faith, are calculated to create a confusion which is highly prejudicial to the interests of justice. Instances of this wretched legislation are everywhere to be found. See Barrington, Stat. 449. In Pennsylvania, and in other states, bills, except general appropriation bills, can contain but one subject, which must be expressed in the title. Const. of Penn. art. 3, sec. 3.

HOE. An implement for loosening the earth after digging the same. It is per se a deadly weapon; 113 Ill. 38.

HOG. This word may include a sow; 2 S. C. 21; a pig; 60 Ala. 60; 58 id. 355; and may refer to the dead as well as the living animal; 7 Ind. 195; 55 Ala. 140; 16 Fla. 564; and it is synonymous with swine; 10 Tex. App. 177.

HOGA. In Old English Law. A hill or mountain. Domesday.

HOGGUS OR HOGICTUS. A hog or swine. Cowel.

HOGHENHYNE (from Sax. hogh, house, and hine, servant). A domestic servant. Among the Saxons, a stranger guest was, the first night of his stay, called uncuth, or unknown; the second, gust, guest; the third, hoghenhyne; and the entertainer was responsible for his acts as for those of his own servant. Bract. 124 b; Du Cange, Agenhine; Spelman, Gloss. Homehine.

HOGSHEAD. A liquid measure, containing half a pipe; the fourth part of a tun, or sixty-three gallons.

HOLD. A technical word in a deed introducing with "to have" the clause which expresses the tenure by which the grantee is to have the land. The clause which commences with these words is called the tenendum. See TENENDUM; HABENDUM.

For the distinction between the power to hold and the power to purchase, see 7 S. & R. 313; 14 Pet. 122.

To decide, to adjudge, to decree: as, the court in that case held that the husband was not liable for the contract of the wife, made without his express or implied authority.

To bind under a contract: as, the obligor is held and firmly bound.

In the constitution of the United States it is provided that no person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due. Art. iv. sec. ii. § 3. The main purpose of this provision in the constitution no longer exists, through the abolition of slavery; but it includes apprentices; 1 Am. L. Reg. 654. See FUGITIVE SLAVE.

HOLD PLEAS. To hear or try causes. 3 Bla. Com. 35, 298.

HOLDER. The holder of a bill of exchange is the person who is legally in the possession of it, either by indorsement or delivery, or both, and entitled to receive payment either from the drawee or acceptor, and is considered as an assignee. 4 Dall. 53. And one who indorses a promissory note for collection, as an agent, will be considered the holder for the purpose of transmitting notices; 20 Johns. 372; 2 Hall N. Y. 112; 6 How. 248. No one but the holder can maintain an action on a bill of exchange; Byles, Bills 2. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

HOLDING OVER. The act of keeping possession by the tenant, without the consent of the landlord, of premises which the latter, or those under whom he claims, had leased to the former, after the term has expired.

When a proper notice has been given, this injury is remedied by ejectment, or, under local regulations, by summary proceedings. See 4 Rawle 123; 2 Bla. Com. 150; 3 id. 210; Woodf. L. & T. 788. A tenant enters on another term by holding over, notwithstanding his inability to move on the day the term ended; 133 N. Y. 287; 88 Ga. 610. If a lessee for years holds over, the landowner has the legal option to treat him as a trespasser or as a tenant for another year; 91 Mich. 590; 38 W. Va. 607; 8 Misc. Rep. 430; and the law presumes this holding to be upon the terms of the original demise; 38 W. Va. 607. See 49 Mo. App. 631; LANDLORD AND TENANT; FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER.

The term is also applied to the retaining possession of a public office by an incumbent, after his term has expired, which is not always unlawful, as such action is sometimes authorized by statute or common law, to prevent an interregnum.

HOLIDAY. A religious festival; a day set apart for commemorating some important event in history; a day of exemption from labor. Webster, Dict. (Webster applies holyday especially to a religious, holiday to a secular festival.) In England they are either by act of legislation, or by ancient usage, and are now regulated by the Bank Holiday Act of 1871, extended by the act 38 Vict. c. 13. Fasts and thanksgiving days are also occasionally appointed by the crown. See Wharton, Dict.; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 308.

In the United States there are no established holidays of a religious character having a legal status without legislation, and the lack of precision in the earlier statutes on the subject has given rise to much confusion and a great variety of definition. It has been said that a legal holiday is, ex vi termini, dies non juridicus; 38 Wis. 673; but this case does not warrant so broad a statement; 29 Am. L. Reg. 139. One thing which seems to be absolutely settled is that a legal holiday does not have the legal relations of Sunday, which was clothed with the idea of sanctity and is in its very nature dies non juridicus. Legal holidays are, however, merely the creation of statute law, and the lack of uniformity in the statutes of the several states makes the term itself very difficult of exact definition. The various definitions of the term holiday are collected in an article on the subject in 29 Am. L. Reg. 137, the writer of which thus states the conclusion reached after a critical examination of them: "Legal holidays as distinguished from the first day of the week are those days which are set apart by statute or by executive authority for fasting and prayer, or those given over to religious observance and amusements, or for political, moral or social, duties or anniversaries, or merely for popular recreation and amusement under such penalties and prohibitions alone as are expressed in positive legislative enactments."

The earlier statutes in the United States had for their object, mainly, the regulation of commercial paper falling due on days which were by general consent observed as holidays. Under such statutes it is simply provided that such paper payable upon the day named shall be due and payable on the day before or the day after. The difference in the statute law of several states as to this point is stated infra. As in the statutes, the day is specified and they are construed with exactness, there is little in the way of decision on this subject. It has been held that usage at a bank known to the parties to a note is sufficient to make a holiday such as to change the day for demanding payment, at least so far as to authorize a tender by the endorser on the following day; 3 Pick. 414. In most of the states it is the rule, and such is the general commercial usage, to allow only two days of grace where the third would fall on a holiday, and to authorize demand of payment and protest on the day next preceding it. The question when a note falling due on a legal holiday which happens to be Sunday is legally payable is to be determined as in the case of any other note falling due on Sunday. This is so by general usage without special provision by statute, though in some states there is such provision, as in Georgia; Code § 2783. In New Jersey a note falling due on the 30th of May, Decoration Day, when Sunday, cannot be presented and protested for non-payment until the following Tuesday; 43 N. J. Law 299. Where paper is drawn without grace, payment may not be demanded until the next day; 49 N. Y. 269; as is the case with respect to Sunday; 20 Wend. 205; 2 Conn. 69; in the last case the distinction is thus well put by Swift, C. J.: "The same custom of merchants which has indulged three days of grace after a note is due, if that day, the last day of grace, is not Sunday, allows but two, where it is Sunday; and, it being an indulgence, it is perfectly consistent to require payment on the second day of grace to avoid giving four days of grace; but this is a very different thing from requiring a note to be paid before it is due."

The rule of commercial paper as affected by holidays has been applied for the sake of uniformity to other maturing contracts; 39 Wis. 533. In some states, as California, the Dakotas, Idaho, and Massachusetts, the statutes extend the time for the performance of all contracts, except works of charity or necessity, to the next following day; but in Kentucky it was held that there being nothing in the statute prohibiting business transactions on a holiday, the performance of a contract was required according to its terms; 85 Ky. 88; and this, it has been said, is the reasonable and logical view, the doctrine of the Wisconsin case being probably founded upon the confusion of holidays with Sundays; 29 Am. L. Reg. 153.

Judicial proceedings are usually invalid on holidays, and in most of the state statutes such proceedings are expressly prohibited; but a mere statutory provision requiring that public offices be closed does not prevent the sitting of courts or the discharge of judicial duties by judges; 47 Hun 129; which are valid unless prohibited by a statute; 19 Fla. 54.

The following acts have been held valid when wholly or partially done upon a holiday; a sheriff's sale; 65 Tex. 111; a criminal examination on which a commitment was based; 29 Mich. 175; giving a case to the jury in a trial for murder; 32 Minn. 118; or trying a murder case; 12 Tex. App. 496; the conclusion of such trial and the conviction of the prisoner; 104 N. C. 743; 84 Ala. 432; entering a judgment by a justice of the peace; 19 Mo. App. 41; 92 Tenn. 476; commencing a criminal trial; 9 Tex. App. 179; hearing a civil case; 63 Tex. 162; service of process; 20 Abb. N. C. 14; 50 Hun 105; 56 id. 423; notice of days of election; 17 Ore. 564; return of process; 37 N. J. Eq. 339; 38 id. 420; which see as to legal proceedings, and see also 5 Paige 511; service of a statement for a new trial; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 1074; service of an order for payment of money; 39 N. Y. Supp. 686; a judgment by confession; 45 Ill. App. 326; and the entry of an appeal; 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 65. In Pennsylvania the supreme court will hear arguments on a legal holiday; 17 W. N. C. Pa. 502.

The following acts have been held invalid: the appointment of justices to hear the disclosure of an insolvent debtor; 78 Mo. 580; entering judgment by default; Abb. Pr. 411; entering a judgment (where the statute prescribed that the day should be for all purposes whatever considered as the first day of the week); 8 Ohio C. C. 489. As to judgment, see 14 Alb. L. J. 153; verdict, 4 Cent. L. J. 156.

With respect to ministerial acts the question may arise whether attendance of the officer and the performance of the duty is required, and this is to be settled entirely by the language of the statute. With respect to the validity of such acts performed on a holiday, unless expressly made void by statute, the general rule is that an officer may act. This is held even where the statute expressly prohibits the transaction of judicial business, so an order of attachment past due is ministerial business, and may be issued where such a statute exists; 36 Neb. 720. Acts which have been held ministerial are, taking a judgment; 7 Biss. 455; the entry of a judgment on a warrant of attorney; 1 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 563; a sale for taxes; 104 Ind. 459; the issuing of a summons by a justice of the peace; 61 Wis. 414; 47 Mich. 614; but where the statute prohibits judicial business a trial and judgment would not be valid; 38 id. 673; 32 id. 89; and it has been held that a sheriff's sale was not void because made on a holiday and, if confirmed, the title would not be endangered, but that it was not a proper day and that, upon exception, the sale would have been set aside; 1 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 567.

In the absence of statutory requisitions it was held that a school should be allowed the legal holidays without deduction of salary to the teachers; 39 Mich. 484.

The taking of an acknowledgment or deposition is usually held valid if performed upon a legal holiday, as being not a judicial act but private business; 30 Ark. 612; 73 Wis. 548; 41 Minn. 269.

Under a statute excluding from computation of time for serving papers Sunday, or a holiday, Saturday, which is made a half-holiday, is excluded; 19 Abb. N. C. 267; 20 id. 11.

An act making Saturday afternoon a legal half-holiday so far as regards the transaction of business in the public offices does not apply to proceedings by a municipal common council, and an ordinance passed on Saturday afternoon is valid; 55 N. J. L. 245.

Acts designating holidays for the presentment and payment of commercial paper and regulating the same constitute them each, for that purpose only, and not within an act prohibiting the sale of liquor on legal holidays; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 51. An act providing that such holiday shall be considered the same as Sunday, and an act forbidding the holding of courts on Sunday, and one forbidding service of process on February 22d do not invalidate a sale on that day under a power in a deed of trust; 112 Mo. 171.

Under a statute providing that no court shall be open or transact any business on any legal holiday, unless it be to instruct or discharge a jury, or receive a verdict and render judgment thereon, an assignment for the benefit of creditors was not avoided by the fact that the assignee's bond was approved by a court commissioner on a legal holiday, though that be considered a judicial act; 44 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 643. See as to business in court, 8 West. L. J. 452. Under a rule of reference fixing Decoration Day as the day for choosing arbitrators, the defendant could not be required to attend on a legal holiday and the proceedings were void; 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 207.

See, generally, a very full note and collection of statutes and authorities; 29 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 137; 19 L. R. A. 316; 4 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 347; 7 So. L. Rev. 697.

The legal holidays in the several states and territories are here given as provided at the time this title goes to press, but as the statutes differ materially they should be referred to as to particular cases: Independence day (July 4), Thanksgiving day, and Christmas day are observed in all the states and territories; New Year's day, in all except Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. Washington's birthday, in all except Iowa, Nebraska, and New Mexico. Decoration day in all except Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. Labor day is observed on the first Monday in September in all except California, Louisiana, Vermont, Mississippi, Arkansas, Nevada, West Virginia, North Carolina, and New Mexico, and Indian Territory, the first two states having appointed a different date, which see infra, and the others having no statutory provisions regarding the day. The following states in addition to the holidays enumerated observe the following, Alabama, Mardi Gras, Good Friday, Memorial day, (Apr. 23). Arizona, Arbor day, first Friday after Feb. 1, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). California, State admission day (September 9), Labor day (first Monday in October), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Connecticut, Good Friday. Colorado, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November), and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. District of Columbia, Inauguration day. Florida, Lee's birthday (January 19), Davis' birthday (June 3), Memorial day (April 26), election day (first Tuesday after the first Monday in November and first Tuesday in October). Georgia, Lee's birthday, Memorial day, (April 23). Idaho, Arbor day (May 7), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November), and any day appointed by the president or governor or any municipal authority as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Illinois, Lincoln's birthday (February 12), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November and also in Chicago, first Monday in April). Indiana, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Indian Territory, any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Iowa, Any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving fast or other religious observance. Louisiana, Anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans (January 8), Mardi Gras, Good Friday, All Saints day (November 1), Labor day (November 5). Maine, Fast day (usually appointed on Thursday in April). Maryland, Good Friday, Battle of North Point (September 12), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Massachusetts, Battle of Lexington (April 19), Battle of Bunker Hill (June 17). Missouri, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Minnesota, Lincoln's birthday (February 12), Good Friday, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November), and the forenoon of every day on which any election is held. Montana, Arbor day (second Tuesday in May), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). Nebraska, Arbor day (April 22). New Hampshire, Fast day appointed by the governor, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November). New Jersey, Lincoln's birthday, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November), and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. New York, Lincoln's birthday, election day, and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. North Carolina, Lee's birthday (January 19), Memorial day (May 10), Anniversary of the signing of the Mecklenberg declaration of independence (May 20). North Dakota, election day, and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Oklahoma, any day the president may appoint as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Oregon, election day and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Pennsylvania, Lincoln's birthday, Good Friday, election days, (third Tuesday of February, and first Tuesday after first Monday in November), any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Rhode Island, Arbor day (appointed by the governor), election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November, also first Tuesday in April). South Carolina, election day. South Dakota, same as North Dakota. Tennessee, Good Friday, election day (first Tuesday after first Monday in November, and also first Tuesday in August). Texas, Anniversary of Texas Independence (March 2), Battle of San Jacinto (April 12), election day. Utah, Arbor day (April 15), Pioneer day (July 24), any fast or thanksgiving day appointed by the president or governor. Vermont, Fast day, appointed by the governor, Memorial day (May 10). Virginia, Lee's birthday (January 19), and any day appointed by the president or governor as a day of thanksgiving, fast, or other religious observance. Washington, Lincoln's birthday (February 12), election day. West Virginia, election day. Wisconsin, election day, and Thanksgiving. Wyoming, Arbor day (appointed by the governor), election day. When a holiday falls on Sunday it is transferred to the following Monday throughout the States, except in Arizona and Arkansas.

Saturday is a holiday after twelve o'clock noon all the year round and throughout the state in Connecticut, District of Columbia, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Ontario, and in cities of 100,000, and over, in Colorado, Louisiana, Missouri. In Delaware, Wilmington all the year and in New Castle County from June 1, to September 30. In California, San Francisco. In Iowa, Des Moines, in Illinois, Chicago, Maine, Portland, only from June to September. In Ohio cities of 50,000 and over; in South Carolina, Charleston; in Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin this holiday is observed by custom only. Pennsylvania throughout the state from June 15 to September 15.

When a note falls due on Sunday, or a statutory holiday, it is usually considered due on the preceding day unless otherwise provided by statute. The following states have so provided: Alabama, Arizona, Connecticut, California, District of Columbia, Idaho, Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, Michigan, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, Virginia, and Wisconsin, as have Quebec and Ontario. In Indian Territory and New Mexico it is unsettled as to whether notes due on a holiday are payable the day before or the day after.

HOLOGRAFO. In Spanish Law. Olographi. A term applicable to the paper, document, disposition, and more particularly to the last will of a person, which in order to be valid must be wholly written, signed, and dated by the testator. "Holographum, apud Testum, appellatur testamentum, quod totum manu testatoris scriptum est et subscriptum."

HOLOGRAPH. What is written with one's own hand. See OLOGRAPH.

HOLY ORDERS. In Ecclesiastical Law. The orders or dignities of the church. Those within holy orders are archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons. The form of ordination in England must be according to the form in the Book of Common Prayer. Besides these orders, the church of Rome had five others, viz. : subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and ostiaries. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 39.

HOMAGE (anciently hominium, from homo). A mere acknowledgment of tenure made by a tenant by knight-service upon investiture, in the following form :—

The tenant in fee or fee-tail that holds by homage shall kneel upon both his knees, ungirded, and the lord shall sit and hold both the hands of his tenant between his hands, and the tenant shall say, "I become your man (homo) from this day forward of life, and member, of earthly honor, and to you shall be faithful and true, and shall bear to you faith for the lands that I claim to hold of you, saving that faith that I owe to our lord the king;" and then the lord so sitting shall kiss him. The kiss is indispensable (except sometimes in the case of a woman. Du Cange). After this the oath of fealty (q. v.) is taken; but this may be taken by the steward, homage only to the lord. Termes de la Ley. This species of homage was called homagium planum or simplex, 1 Bla. Com. 367, to distinguish it from homagium ligium, or liege homage, which included fealty and the services incident. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

Liege homage was that homage in which allegiance was sworn without any reservation, and was, therefore, due only to the sovereign; and, as it came in time to be exacted without any actual holding from him, it sunk into the oath of allegiance. Termes de la Ley.

The obligation of homage is mutual, binding the lord to protection of the vassal, as well as the vassal to fidelity. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 16.

HOMAGE ANCESTRAL. Homage was so called where time out of mind a man and his ancestors had held by homage; and in this case the lord who had received the homage was bound to acquit the tenant of all services to superior lords, and, if vouched, to warrant his title. If the tenant by homage ancestral aliened in fee, his alienee held by homage, but not by homage ancestral. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bla. Com. 300.

HOMAGE JURY. The jury of a lord's court, or court baron: so called because generally composed of those who owed homage to the lord, or the pares curiæ. Kitchen; 2 Bla. Com. 54, 366.

HOMAGER. One that is bound to do homage to another. Jacob, Law Dict.

HOMAGIO RESPECTUANDO. A writ to the escheator commanding him to deliver seisin of land to the heir of full age, notwithstanding his homage not done which ought to be performed before the heir had livery, except there fall out some reasonable cause to hinder him. Termes de la Ley.

HOMAGIUM LIGIUM. See HOMAGE.

HOMAGIUM PLANUM. See HOMAGE.

HOMAGIUM REDDERE. The renunciation of homage, as when a vassal made a final declaration of defying his lord, of which there was a set form and method prescribed by the feudal law. Jac. L. Dict.

HOMBRE BUENO. In Spanish Law. The ordinary judge of a district.

Hence, when the law declares that a contract, or some other act, is to be conformable to the will of the hombre bueno, it means that it is to be decided by the ordinary judge. Las Partidas 7. 34. 31.

In matters of conciliation, it applies to the two persons, one chosen by each party, to assist the constitutional alcalde in forming his judgment of reconciliation. Art. 1, chap. 3, decree of 9th October, 1812.

Arbitrators chosen by litigants to determine their differences.

Persons competent to give testimony in a cause. L. 1. t. 8. b. 2, Fuero Real.

HOME. That place or country in which one in fact resides with the intention of residence, or in which he has so resided, and with regard to which he retains either residence or the intention of residence. Dicey, Confl. L. 81.

"'Home' and 'domicil' do not correspond, yet 'home' is the fundamental idea of 'domicil.' The law takes the conception of 'home,' and moulding it by means of certain fictions and technical rules to suit its own requirements, calls it 'domicil.' Or perhaps this may be best expressed by slightly altering Westlake's statement, 'Domicil is, then, the legal conception of residence,' etc., and saying, 'Domicil is, then, the legal conception of home.' 'Domicil' expresses the legal relation existing between a person and the place where he has, in contemplation of law, his permanent home." Jac. Dom. c. 3, § 72.

In Massachusetts a person having a dwelling-house in each of two towns of the state may have his home in one town for the purposes of taxation, although he spends the greater portion of the year in the other, and is there on the first of May; 124 Mass. 132. In this case domicil for taxation and home are treated as synonymous; id. 145; 12 Cush. 49; 23 Pick. 170.

The principal place of abode of a man and his family, when it is only a temporary abode, is not his home in the sense here required; 124 Mass. 147.

Dwelling-place, or home, means some permanent abode or residence, with intention to remain; and it is not synonymous with domicil, as used in international law, but has a more restricted meaning; 19 Me. 293.

A home and dwelling-place do not, necessarily, continue until another is acquired; it may be abandoned, and the individual cease to have any home; id. One who abandons his home or dwelling-house, with or without design of acquiring one elsewhere, has no home by construction, in the place abandoned; id.

This case was disapproved and it was held that the town domicil, not being used in a statute (under construction) to indicate a particular status as to habitation can only be used properly as synonymous with the town residence, dwelling-place, or home; 43 Me. 406. See DOMICIL; HOMESTEAD; FAMILY.

HOME PORT. Any port within a state in which the owner of a ship resides.

The question as to what constitutes a foreign port has usually arisen respecting the claims of material-men for supplies furnished to the master, and in this respect it has been held that the home port of a vessel does not necessarily imply the limits of the state in which her owner resides; 9 Wheat. 401; contra, 1 Blatchf. & H. 66; where Charleston, S. C., was held a foreign port in respect to New York.

In England by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act it is provided that every port within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Stark, and the islands adjacent to any one of them, being part of the dominions of Her Majesty, shall be deemed a home port; 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97. See BOTTOMRY; PORT.

HOMESTALL. The mansion-house.

HOMESTEAD. The home place—the place where the home is. It is the home—the house and the adjoining land—where the head of the family dwells—the home farm. 36 N. H. 166.

The place of a home or house; that part of a man's landed property which is about and contiguous to his dwelling-house; the land, or town, or city lot, upon which the family residence is situated. 24 Ark. 158; 55 id. 303; 47 Kan. 580.

The term necessarily includes the idea of a residence; 24 Tex. 224. It must be the owner's place of residence—the place where he lives; 23 Tex. 502.

The homestead laws of various states are constitutional or statutory provisions for the exemption of a certain amount or value of real estate occupied by a debtor as his homestead from a forced sale for the payment of his debts. In some cases restraints are placed upon the alienation by the owner of his property, and in some cases the exempt property, upon the death of the owner, descends to the widow and minor children, free from liability for his debts. They are of a comparatively recent origin; 51 N. H. 261; but are now said to exist in all but seven states; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. Their policy has been eulogized in many decided cases. See 4 Cal. 26; 1 Iowa 439; 18 Tex. 415; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 1.

Homestead acts have generally received a liberal construction; 45 Miss. 182; 36 Vt. 271; 46 N. H. 43, contra, 28 La. Ann. 594, 665; 3 Minn. 53. They cannot be considered as in derogation of the common law, inasmuch as, at common law, real estate was not liable to execution for the payment of debts; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 4; 7 Mont. 206; but see 16 Minn. 161; 7 Mich. 501; 3 Ia. 287. Exemption laws giving a right to a homestead are for protection of the citizens of the state only; 87 Tenn. 78; 98 N. C. 304; 98 id. 462.

In some states there is a money limit put to the homestead; in others a limit of the quantity of land exempted. The value, under the statute, is the value at the time the homestead is designated; 42 Tex. 199; contra, 37 Cal. 180. The courts cannot exempt money instead of land; 7 Mich. 500; but see 37 Cal. 180, where it was held that if the homestead exceeded the constitutional limit of value, and enough of it could not be separated and subjected to execution to reduce the value to that limit, the property would be sold and the constitutional amount set apart to the debtor. But where it can be separated, it will be, although it is within the same enclosure and used in connection with the dwelling for the use of the family; 39 Ill. App. 330. In 60 Mo. 308, it was held that the law confers a homestead right only in land and not in the proceeds of the sale of land.

The owner of an undivided interest in land is not entitled to a homestead exemption therein; 3 Lea 76; 30 La. Ann. 1130 (contra, 55 Miss. 89; 73 Tex. 210); so where land is held by the parties as partners; 5 Sawy. 843. A learned author gives as the conclusive test of a homestead—"that the form, physical characteristics, and geography of the premises must be such as, when taken in connection with their use by the owner, and their value when the statute creates a limit as to value, will convey notice to persons of ordinary prudence who deal with him that they are his homestead." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 104, citing 21 Wall. 481, 42 Tex. 195, 44 id. 597, as sustaining this doctrine.

"The courts have generally held that the mere fact that the debtor carries on his business upon his homestead premises or rents out a portion thereof, as in case of one who keeps a country tavern; 16 Cal. 181; or uses the lower part of his dwelling for business purposes; 22 Mich. 260; or who, living in town, keeps boarders and lodgers; 1 Nev. 607; or one who lets rooms in his dwelling to tenants; 11 Allen 194; or who rents out part for a store and uses another part for a printing office; 10 Minn. 154; does not deprive it of its homestead character." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 120; nor does he, where he leases the greater part of his house to be used as a boarding-house, he retaining several rooms in which he and his family lived; 94 Cal. 291. A building may not be used exclusively as a residence and yet retain the character of a homestead; 80 Wis. 474. A store; 58 Ill. 425; or mill; 2 Woods 657 (per Bradley, J.); situated on the homestead lot; a smithshop separated from it by a highway; 42 Vt. 27; a brewery in which the debtor lives with his family; 2 Dill. 339; a lawyer's office in a separate block; 19 Tex. 371; and a garden adjoining the dwelling; 76 Cal. 315; a business block, partly a residence; 3 Okla. 80; part store-room and part dwelling; 44 Neb. 269; have been included within the rule. A house built in the business part of the town and used principally as a store-building, though the owner sleeps in a small back room and takes his meals elsewhere, is not a homestead; 95 Ala. 96. And in Iowa a building occupied at once for a dwelling and for business purposes may be divided horizontally and the business part sold in execution; 4 Ia. 363; but see, contra, Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 134, n.; 9 Wis. 70; "and in other states a homestead cannot be reserved in tenements and separate buildings occupied by tenements, although upon the enclosure whereon is situated the debtor's dwelling;" Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 120; 36 N. H. 153; 33 Cal. 220; 16 Wis. 114. Nor can a person have two homesteads at the same time; 62 Mich. 373; 74 Cal. 266; 69 Tex. 248. Where land was occupied by a tenant at the time of levy and execution, the levy is not void as on a homestead because the owner intended at some future time to occupy it as a house; 92 Mich. 427.

In Illinois it is said that the homestead laws are not to be taken only to save a mere shelter for the debtor and his family, but to give him the full enjoyment of the entire lot of ground exempted, to be used either in the cultivation of it, or in the erection and use of buildings on it, either for his own business or for deriving income in the way of rent; 74 Ill. 206; and the homestead right may be conveyed separately from the fee; 144 Ill. App. 645.

There is a conflict of decision as to whether a tract of land detached from the one on which the homestead dwelling-house is built, but used by the debtor in connection with it, is exempt. The opinion supported by the weight of authority is that it is not; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 145; 36 Ia. 394; 15 Minn. 116; 16 Gray 146; 15 Wis. 635; 47 Kan. 580; 55 Ark. 303; 83 Ala. 159; contra, 69 N. C. 289; 33 Tex. 212; 84 id. 398; 62 Mo. 498; 56 Miss. 30. A homestead may be designated in an undivided interest in lands; 1 Kan. App. 599; but not in partnership real estate; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 334; or by a co-tenant in lands held in common; 110 Cal. 198; or by a remainderman, though after the estate vests in possession it may be held as a homestead against a judgment creditor; 115 N. C. 426; s. c. 26 L. R. A. 814. It may be claimed in lands situated in different counties; 116 N. C. 520.

A homestead law, so far as it attempts to withdraw from the reach of creditors property which would have been within their reach under the laws in force at the time the debt was contracted, is unconstitutional; 15 Wall. 610, reversing s. c. 44 Ga. 353; 6 Baxt. 225.

Provisions exist in most of the states forbidding the alienation of the property designated as a homestead, except when the deed is joined in by the wife. 81 Tex. 317; 97 N. C. 344. In others the payment of purchase money can be secured by a mortgage; so may the payment of purchase money and money borrowed for improvements on the property. Where the existence of a homestead is made to depend upon a selection by the debtor, the latter may alien the property at any time prior to such selection, by the usual formalities; 2 Mich. 465. The purchaser in good faith of a homestead succeeds to the debtor's rights and will be protected against his creditors; 11 Ill. App. 27. A homestead right is not forfeited by a conveyance of land with the intent to defraud creditors; 98 N. C. 190; 87 Ky. 554; 40 Minn. 193; 29 S. C. 175.

Homesteads may be designated by one of three ways:—1, by a public notice of record; 2, by visible occupancy and use; 3, by the actual setting apart of the homestead under the direction of a court of justice; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 230. Statutory provisions, if they exist, must be followed. In the absence of a statutory provision, filing a declaration of intention to designate a certain property as a homestead has no legal effect; 4 Cal. 23. The right to a homestead existing at the time the statute is passed is not affected by a declaration under the statute; 47 La. 563. As to construction of declarations and what is sufficient, see 93 Ga. 819; 105 Cal. 95. A declaration enures to the benefit of the wife whether she knows of it or not; 108 id.; 214; and a wife may make a declaration; 96 Ga. 338. As to the designation of a homestead by occupancy, "it may be laid down as the prevalent doctrine that actual residence by the head of the family prior to the contraction of the debt, etc., he occupying it as a home and with the intention of dedicating it to the uses of a residence for his family, will be sufficient to impress upon the premises so occupied the character of a homestead." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 260. This designation will be sufficient to preserve the homestead character for the benefit of the widow and minor children; 29 Ark. 280. In order to give the character of a homestead, the purchase must always be with the intent of present, and not simply future, occupancy; 21 Kan. 533; 72 Tex. 491; 71 Mich. 150. And temporary absence of the owner will not divest him of the right to the same; 48 Kan. 16; 55 Ark. 55. Actual occupancy is necessary; 47 Ia. 414; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 48; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 34; 107 Ala. 465; but one occupying a house with persons whom he is under no obligation to support, is not a householder within the homestead act; 159 Ill. 148. When one occupies a homestead but has a fixed intention of occupying and holding other lands as such and is prevented by death, the latter will be treated as his homestead; 72 Miss. 361.

Of the debts for which a homestead is liable, the first is taxes; 96 Ga. 220. An assessment for municipal improvements is not a "tax" within the provision of a state constitution permitting a homestead to be subjected to a forced sale for taxes; 88

Tex. 458, overruling 58 id. 549. This view is said to be supported by an almost unbroken line of decisions; 4 Ballard's Ann. of R. P. § 346, note; 3 id. § 720. A homestead may be sold on a judgment for alimony; 59 Minn. 347.

Homesteads have also been held liable to an equitable lien for materials furnished for their improvement; 105 Ala. 933; to prior liens on the land; 56 Kan. 170; or contracts existing when the statute is enacted; 93 Ga. 540; 62 Minn. 380. When the statute makes it liable to debts existing at the time of its purchase this includes renewal of prior notes; 67 Vt. 128; s. c. 27 L. R. A. 303.

When the exemption does not apply to a debt contracted for the purchase of the homestead, it has been held that the homestead cannot be sold to pay money borrowed from a third person to pay off that debt; 94 Tenn. 232; 50 Ill. 500; 52 Kan. 126; Contra; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 679. There is however, a conflict of authority on this point from which it is said to be impossible to extract any consistent rule. See Thomp. Hom. & Ex. §§ 338-347; Waples, Hom. & Ex. 337-346; 99 Am. Dec. 571 note.

Money due on an insurance policy upon homestead property is not subject to garnishment; 88 Tex. 218; 83 Ia. 342; 50 Cal. 101; 48 N. Y. 188; 29 Vt. 289; 29 Minn. 309; 31 Ark. 652; 5 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 193.

The right of exemption is lost by the unequivocal abandonment of the homestead by the owner, with the intention of no longer treating it as his place of residence; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 263, citing 37 Tex. 572; 69 id. 248; Waples, Hom. & Ex. 558; 4 N. H. 51. A lease of land for more than a year, and a residence elsewhere, was held to forfeit the homestead; 59 Ala. 566; also the owner's removal from the state; 87 Ga. 761; 91 id. 367; 101 N. C. 311. The building situated on the homestead loses its exemption from seizure and sale upon being segregated from the homestead property; 33 Ark. 303; 55 id. 126.

To establish an abandonment there must be a removal with the intention of not returning; 44 Neb. 269; but when removal for a temporary purpose is permitted by statute, it must be for a fixed and temporary purpose or for a temporary reason; 89 Wis. 558. To leave a homestead farm and move in town to become a merchant, intending to return "if he quit business," was an abandonment; 60 Ark. 262. See also 67 Ala. 558; 75 Mo. 559. Leaving a tenant at will in possession is not abandonment; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1084; nor is storing goods in the house and sleeping in it at times, the wife being insane; id. 291. An abandonment does not relate back so as to give validity to a void prior sale of the homestead under an execution; 10 Wash. 379.

It has been held that the homestead may be abandoned by a husband's conveyance and the removal to another place against the desire of the wife; 88 Tex. 421; 14 Cal.

507; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 276; contra, 95 Ga. 415. See ABANDONMENT.

A deed or mortgage of a homestead must be the joint conveyance of the husband and wife; 109 Cal. 165; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 333. A mere release of dower by the wife is not sufficient; 60 Ark. 269; nor an execution by the husband under a power of attorney from the wife; 54 Kan. 442. And a conveyance by the claimant to his or her wife or husband, not subscribed or acknowledged by the latter is a nullity; 159 Ill. 93. Even when the wife is insane, a conveyance by the husband is void; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 315; 61 Ia. 160; 35 Neb. 829; and so also where the wife is living apart from her husband; 72 Wis. 553; 47 Kan. 587; 29 Ark. 280; 95 N. C. 281. See 65 Am. Dec. 481.

This right of exemption depends upon the construction of statutes in various states. The decisions are, therefore, far from harmonious. The subject has been fully and very ably treated in Judge Thompson's work frequently cited above. See also 36 Am. Rep. 728; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1, 137; id. 641, 705 (by Judge Dillon). See FAMILY; EXEMPTION; MANOR; MANSION.

Every person who is the head of a family, or is over 21 years of age and is a citizen, or has declared his intention to become such, also soldiers, seamen, and members of the marine corps, including officers, who have served in the rebellion for ninety days, and remained loyal to the government, may take up a quarter section or less of unappropriated public lands, as a homestead; R. S. § 2289 et seq.

HOMICIDE (Lat. homo, a man, cedere, to kill). The killing any human creature. 4 Bla. Com. 177.

Excusable homicide is that which takes place under such circumstances of accident or necessity that the party cannot strictly be said to have committed the act wilfully and intentionally, and whereby he is relieved from the penalty annexed to the commission of a felonious homicide.

Felonious homicide is that committed wilfully under such circumstances as to render it punishable.

Justifiable homicide is that committed with full intent, but under such circumstances of duty as to render the act one proper to be performed.

According to Blackstone, 4 Com. 177, homicide is the killing of any human creature. This is the most extensive sense of this word, in which the intention is not considered. But in a more limited sense, it is always understood that the killing is by human agency; and Hawkins defines it to be the killing of a man by a man. 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 8, § 2. See Dalloz, Dict.; 5 Cush. 303. Homicide may perhaps be described to be the destruction of the life of one human being, either by himself or by the act, procurement, or culpable omission of another. When the death has been intentionally caused by the deceased himself, the offender is called felo de se; when it is caused by another, it is justifiable, excusable, or felonious homicide.

The distinction between justifiable and excusable homicide is that in the former the killing takes place without any manner of fault on the part of the slayer; in the latter there is some slight fault, or at any rate the absence of any duty rendering the act a proper one to be performed, although the blame is so slight as not to render the party punishable. The distinction is very frequently disregarded, and would seem to be of little practical utility; See 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 617. But between justifiable or excusable and felonious homicide the distinction, it will be evident, is of great importance. 1 East, Pl. Cr. 260, gives the following example: "If a person driving a carriage happen to kill another, if he saw or had timely notice of the mischief likely to ensue, and yet wilfully drove on, it will be murder; if he might have seen the danger, but did not look before him, it will be manslaughter; but if the accident happened in such a manner that no want of due care could be imputed to the driver, it will be accidental death and excusable homicide." See 4 Bla. Com. 176; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 580; Cl. Cr. L. 131.

There must be a person in actual existence; 6 C. & P. 349; 7 id. 814, 850; 9 id. 25; 24 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 285; but the destruction of human life at any period after birth is homicide, however near it may be to extinction from any other cause; 2 C. & K. 784; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 632; but a child in the act of being born would not be included; 5 C. & P. 539; and the death must have occurred within a year and a day from the time the injury was received; 1 Dev. 139; 6 Cal. 210; 41 Tex. 496; 66 Mo. 125; 101 Mass. 6. It is not necessary that the injury inflicted was the sole cause of the death, provided it contributed mediately or immediately in a degree sufficient for the law's notice; 33 La. Ann. 797; 2 Bish. Cr. Law §§ 637, 638; 10 Nev. 106. A person illegally arrested may use such force as is necessary to regain his liberty, and should there be reasonable ground to believe that the officer making the arrest intends shooting the prisoner to prevent his escape, such prisoner may shoot the officer in self-defence; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1074. So where one is assaulted and there is reasonable ground for him to fear loss of his life, or great bodily harm, he is not obliged to retreat nor consider whether he may so act in safety, but he is entitled to stand his ground and meet any attack made upon him with a deadly weapon, even if in so doing he cause the death of his assailant; 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 745. The person killed, to constitute the homicide felonious, must have been entitled to his existence. Thus, a soldier of the enemy in time of war has no right to his life, but may be killed. A criminal sentenced to be hanged has no right to his life; but no person can take it but the authorized officer, in the prescribed manner. See MURDER; MAN-

SLAUGHTER; SELF-DEFENCE; ADEQUATE CAUSE.

HOMMES DE FIEF (Fr.). In Feudal Law. Men of the fief; feudal tenants; the peers of the lord's court. Montesq., Esprit des Lois, liv. 28, c. 27.

HOMMES FEODaux (Fr.). In Feudal Law. Feudal tenants; the same with hommes de fief (q. v.). Montesq., Esprit des Lois, liv. 28, c. 36.

HOMO (Lat.). A human being, whether male or female. Co. 2d Inst. 45.

In Feudal Law. A vassal; one who, having received a feud, is bound to do homage and military service for his land; variously called vassalus, vassus, miles, clien, feodalis, tenens per servitium militare, sometimes baro, and most frequently leudes. Spelman, Gloss. Homo is sometimes also used for a tenant by socage, and sometimes for any dependent. A homo claimed the privilege of having his cause and person tried only in the court of his lord. Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 152.

Homo chartularius. A slave manumitted by charter. Homo commendatus. In feudal law. One who surrendered himself into the power of another for the sake of protection or support. See COMMENDATION. Homo ecclesiasticus. A church vassal; one who was bound to serve a church, especially to do service of an agricultural character. Spel. Gloss. Homo exercitulis. A man of the army (exercitus); a soldier. Homo-feodalis. A vassal or tenant; one who held a fee (feodum), or part of a fee. Spel. Gloss. Homo fiscalis, or fiscalinus. A servant or vassal belonging to the treasury or fiscus. Homo francus. In old English law. A freeman. A Frenchman. Homo ingenuus. A free man. A free and lawful man. A yeoman. Homoliber. A freeman. Homo ligius. A liege man; a subject; a king's vassal. The vassal of a subject. Homo novus. In feudal law. A new tenant or vassal; one who was invested with a new fee. Spel. Gloss. Homo pertinens. In feudal law. A feudal bondman or vassal, one who belonged to the soil (qui glebe adscribitur). Homo regius. A king's vassal. Homo Romanus. A Roman. An appellation given to the old inhabitants of Gaul and other Roman provinces, and retained in the law of the barbarous nations. Spel. Gloss. Homo trium litterarum. A man of three letters; that is the three letters, "f," "u," "r;" the Latin word fur meaning "thief."

HOMOLOGACION. In Spanish Law. The tacit consent and approval, inferred by law from the omission of the parties, for the space of ten days, to complain of the sentences of arbitrators, appointment of syndics, or assignees, of insolvents, settlements of successions, etc. Also, the approval given by the judge of certain acts and agreements for the purpose of rendering them more binding and executory. Escriche.

HOMOLOGATION. In Civil Law. Approbation; confirmation by a court of justice; a judgment which orders the execution of some act: as, the approbation of an award and ordering execution on the same. Merlin, Répert.; La. Civ. Code; Dig. 4. 8; 7 Toullier, n. 224. See L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1026. To homologate is to say the like, similiter dicere. 9 Mart. La. 324.

A judgment homologating, as far as not opposed, the account of distribution of a syndic, is res judicata, except as to opponents, whether the account was correct or not; 14 So. Rep. (La.) 90.

In Scotch Law. An act by which a person approves a deed, so as to make it binding on him, though in itself defective. Erskine, Inst. 3. 3. 47; 2 Bligh. 197; 1 Bell, Com. 144.

HOND HABEND. See HAND HABEND.

HONOR. In English Law. The seigniori of a lord paramount. 2 Bla. Com. 91.

In Common Law. To accept a bill of exchange; to pay a bill accepted, or a promissory note, on the day it becomes due. 7 Taunt. 164; 1 Term 172.

HONORABLE. A title of distinction or respect.

In England it is given to the younger sons of earls, to the children of viscounts and barons, to persons occupying official places of trust and honor, and to the house of commons as a body. In the United States it is usually given to persons who hold or have held positions of importance under the national or state government.

HONORARIUM. Something given in gratitude for services rendered.

A voluntary donation in consideration of services which admit of no compensation in money; in particular to advocates at law, deemed to practice for honor or influence and not for fees. 14 Ga. 89.

It is so far of the nature of a gift that it cannot be sued for; 5 S. & R. 412; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 38; 2 Atk. 332; 3 Bla. Com. 28. Of this character are in England, the professional fees of barristers and of physicians. The same rule once prevailed in Pennsylvania, but was afterwards rejected; 19 Pa. 95; and now prevails in New Jersey; 3 Green 35; and to some extent in the federal courts, as applied to counsel in the special sense of the term; Weeks, Atty. 548; 2 Cra. C. C. 144. In many states the contrary rule has been expressly laid down; 10 Tex. 81; 6 Fla. 214; 14 Mo. 54; 26 Wend. 452 (a full discussion by Walworth, C.); 1 Pick. 415. The payment of the fees of English solicitors, attorneys, and proctors is provided for by statute and rules of court. See Weeks, Atty. 536. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 28.

HONORARY CANONS. Those without emolument. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, § 23.

HONORARY FEUDS. Titles of nobility which were not of a divisible nature, but could only be inherited by the eldest son in exclusion of the rest. 2 Bla. Com. 56; Wright, Tenures 32.

HONORARY SERVICES. Services by which lands in grand serjeantry were held: such as, to hold the king's banner, or to hold his head in the ship which carried him from Dover to Whitsand, etc. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 73, and note.

HOO. A hill. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOOK. The verb "to hook" may not be equivalent to "to steal." 7 Blackf. 117.

HOPCON. A valley. Cowel.

HOPE. A valley. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HORA AURORÆ. The morning bell.

HORÆ JUDICIÆ (Lat.). Hours judicial, or those in which judges sit in court. In Fortesque's time, these were from 8 to 11 A. M., and the courts of law were not open in the afternoon. Co. Litt. 135 a; Co. 2d Inst. 246; Fortesque 51, p. 120, note.

HORDA. In old records a cow in calf.

HORDERA. A treasurer. Du Cange.

HORDERIUM. A hoard, treasury, or repository. Cowel.

HORDEUM PALMALE. Beer barley. Cowel.

HORN TENURE. Tenure by winding a horn on approach of an enemy, called tenure by cornage. If lands were held by this tenure of the king, it was grand serjeantry; if of a private person, knight-service. Many anciently so held their lands towards the Picts' Wall. Co. Litt. § 156; Camd. Britan. 609.

HORNBOOK. A book containing the first principles of any science or branch of knowledge; a primer.

Horn book law. The elementary or rudimentary law.

HORNGELD. A forest tax paid for horned beasts, also an acquittance thereof, which was granted by the king unto such as he thought good. Cowel; Toml.

HORNING. In Scotch Law. A process issuing on a decree of court of sessions, or of an inferior court, by which the debtor is charged to perform, in terms of his obligation, or on failure made liable to caption, that is, imprisonment. Bell, Dict. Horning Letters of ; Diligence. The name comes from the ancient custom of proclaiming letters of horning not obeyed, and declaring the recusant a rebel, with three blasts of a horn, called putting him to the horn. 1 Ross, Lect. 258, 308.

HORREUM. A place for keeping grain, a storehouse. Calvinus, Lex ; Bract. fol. 48.

HORS DE SON FEE (Fr. out of his fee).

In Old English Law. A plea to an action brought by one who claimed to be lord for rent-services as issuing out of his land, by which the defendant asserted that the land in question was out of the fee of the demandant. 9 Co. 30 ; 2 Mod. 104.

HORS WEALH. In Old English Law. The wealth, or Briton who had the care of the king's horses.

HORS WEARD. In Old English Law. A service or corvée, consisting in watching the horses of the lord. Anc. Inst. Eng.

HORSE. Until a horse has attained the age of four years he is called a colt. 1 Russ. & R. 416. This word is sometimes used as a generic name for all animals of the horse kind ; 44 Ga. 263 ; 3 Brev. 9. See Yelv. 67 a ; 84 N. C. 226.

It is also used to include every description of the male, as gelding or stallion, in contradistinction to the female ; 38 Tex. 555. In a statute giving a remedy against railroad companies for injuries to horses and cattle, it includes mules ; 50 Ill. 184 ; 47 id. 462. The exemption of a horse from execution has been held to include whatever is essential to his enjoyment, as shoes and saddle ; 21 Tex. 449 ; and it may include an ass or a jackass ; 2 Heisk. 222 ; 47 Ill. 463 ; but not a stallion not kept for farm work ; 33 Cal. 383.

HORSE GUARDS. The name applied to the public office in Whitehall appropriated to the departments under the general-commanding-in-chief. The term is also used conventionally to signify the military authorities at the head of army affairs, in contradistinction to the civil chief, the secretary of state for war.

HORSE RACE. Any race in which any horse, mare, or gelding is run or made to run in competition with any other horse, mare, or gelding or against time, for any prize of what nature or kind soever, or for any bet or wager made or to be made in respect to any such horse, mare, or gelding or the riders thereof, and at which more than twenty persons are present. Stat. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 18, s. 1.

The first statute regarding horse-racing was passed in 1664, entitled an act against deceitful, disorderly, and excessive gaming ; but this act being found insufficient to prevent the abuses at which it was directed, the statute 9 Anne, c. 14, was passed in 1710, reciting that all mortgages and instruments, where the consideration was money won by gaming or betting, or the repayment of money lent at such gaming and betting, should be void ; and that the loser of ten pounds or upward on such gaming or betting might, within three months, sue and recover back treble the value of his losses ; and that any person winning ten pounds or upwards might be indicted and, on conviction, forfeit five times the value so won, and if won by cheating, the winner should be deemed infamous, and suffer such corporal punishment as in cases of wilful perjury. This act, being only directed to races at which betting of ten pounds or over was indulged, increased the number at which the limit was below that amount to such an extent that it was found necessary to restrict still further the practice, and in 1740 and 1745 the acts 13 Geo. II. c. 19 and 18 Geo. II. c. 34 went into effect. The latter, as an encouragement to breeders, legalized those races at which the stakes amounted to fifty pounds, and also made a distinction between matches and races. So much of the acts 16 Car. II. c. 7 and 9 Anne, c. 14 as rendered void any note, bill or mortgage given for a gambling contract was repealed during the reign of William IV. and they were amended so as to make such instruments not void, but given for an illegal consideration ; 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 41. This statute is still in force. The acts 3 & 4 Vict. c. 5 and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 repealed the former acts of 16 Car. II. c. 7, and all of 9 Anne, c. 14 that had not already been altered by 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 41. The act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 38 was supplementary to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as were also 37 Vict. c. 15 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 18, and 55 Vict. c. 9.

Contributions or subscriptions towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner of any lawful horse race are not unlawful and do not constitute a wager ; 1 Q. B. D. 189 ; [1895] 1 Q. B. 698 ; but a match between two horses, for a sum of money contributed by their respective owners, although legal, is a void contract within the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 ; and money in the hands of a stakeholder or loser cannot be recovered by the winner in an action at law ; 1 C. P. D. 573 ; and see 2 Ex. D. 442 (overruling 5 C. B. 831) ; 5 App. Cas. 342 approving 2 Ex. D. 442.

The stakeholder is bound to retain the money in his hands until it is clearly decided which party is entitled to it ; 2 M. & W. 369 ; but he is merely a stakeholder, and has no right to the stakes until he actually receives them in his hands ; 5 C. & P. 147. Where the race has not been, and cannot be, run, the position of the stakeholder is that of a debtor to each party for the amount contributed by each, and a specific demand of the stake from him is unnecessary ; but where there is a possibility that the race may still be run and decided, each party must make a specific demand of his stake from the stakeholder before he can recover from him ; 28 L. J. Q. B. 126. In a lawful horse race, the payment of entrance money to the stakeholder constitutes a legal contract, and such money cannot be recovered back unless there is a mutual rescission of the contract ; 2 M. & W. 369. See also 25 L. J. Ex. 169. As to the recovery back of money paid to a stakeholder pending the result of an illegal contest, it has been held that it may be recovered before the contest takes place, but not afterwards ; 8 B. & C. 226 ; 46 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 161 ; but the former case, although regarded as an authority ;

5 H. & N. 928; 1 Q. B. D. 193; [1895] 1 Q. B. 698; 110 Cal. 159; has been doubted; 14 M. & W. 712; and held irreconcilable with the statute; 9 Ir. C. L. R. 13. In Diggle v. Higgs, 2 Ex. D. 442, the court say "what legal right there may be to recover back money, paid under such a contract, the statute leaves it untouched." In the United States it is held that the depositor may revoke the stakeholder's authority to pay over the stakes and bring an action against him for its recovery; 9 Col. 212; and if, after the receipt of such notice, the stakeholder pay over the money to the winner, he is liable to the depositor; 48 Mo. App. 48; 110 Cal. 159.

If the owner of a horse entered for a race is aware of its disqualification he may recover his money back before the race, but not afterwards; 2 C. & P. 608.

Money expended by one part owner of a racehorse for the common benefit of another owner and himself, with the understanding that the owners are to share alike in the winnings of such horse, is recoverable (from the second owner), to the amount of one-half the sum expended where the horse loses the race; 26 L. J. C. P. 181.

In this country the decisions as to whether horse racing constitutes gaming within the statutes are not uniform. It has been held, to be gaming or a gambling device; 33 Ala. 428; 23 Ark. 726; 30 id. 428; 2 Coldw. 235; 9 Col. 214; 8 Blackf. 332; 2 Bush 263; 4 Harr. Del. 554; 69 Ga. 609; 7 Cow. 252; 1 Den. 170; 23 Ill. 493; 51 id. 184; 9 Ind. 35; 1 Allen 563; 51 Mich. 212; 16 Minn. 299; 39 id. 153; 4 Mo. 536; 31 id. 35; 13 Johns. 88; 43 Tex. 654; 18 Me. 337; 1 Head 154; 2 Swan 279; contra, 8 Gratt. 592; 46 Mo. 375; 31 Md. 35.

Racing a horse on or along a public road, though no bet has been offered on the result of such race, has been held an indictable offence; 7 Humph. 502; and the fact that a charter has been granted for a race-course will not authorize betting thereon; 2 Bush 263. To trot a horse in another state for a wager or for stakes is not prima facie illegal in that state; 81 N. Y. 539. In many of the states, however, the times at, and seasons in, which horse-racing may be indulged are regulated by statutes which tax and license the racing associations. The trotting for a purse or premium contributed or subscribed by other persons is not trotting for a wager; 67 Vt. 586; 46 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 296, affg. 39 N. Y. Supp. 865; 81 N. Y. 532; 57 Ia. 481; 13 Or. 135; 71 Wis. 296; 63 Ind. 58; but see 35 N. Y. Supp. 245; 94 Pa. 132; 24 Mich. 441.

Pools on horse races are games within the statute against gaming; 51 Mich. 203; 154, Ill. 284; 164 Mass. 203; contra, 63 Md. 242; and the rule applies to pools sold in one state on a race to be run in another; 8 Lea 411; 92 Tenn. 275; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 930; but not where only the orders for bets were taken and transmitted by telegraph, as it was held that the actual betting was done out of the state; 17 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 546; 89 Va. 878.

The general rule against betting on horse races applies to all betting wherever done; 49 N. J. L. 463; and all pooling schemes are within the statute; 79 Ky. 618; but in some states betting or pool-selling with reference to races run on a licensed track are excepted from the statutory prohibition; 1 Humph. 384; 7 id. 501; 2 Coldw. 235; 2 Swan 279; but not otherwise; 92 Tenn. 275.

One who keeps a room as a resort for persons who bet on horse races is guilty of keeping a disorderly house; 23 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 581; so where one maintains a partly enclosed place for the purpose of making books and selling pools; 154 Ill. 284.

Blackboards, sheets, manifold books, and policy slips for placing bets on horse races are gambling devices; 160 Mass. 310; 39 Minn. 153; contra, 93 Mich. 631.

Although the business of pool selling is illegal, the crime of embezzlement may be committed by the agent who receives the money, in appropriating it to his own use; 80 Mo. 358.

Money lent for the purpose of betting on a gambling device cannot be recovered; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 867; nor can a note given for money lent for such a purpose; 43 N. H. 497; and see 1 Flip. 410. In the District of Columbia, it is held that the Statute 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, supra, is still in force and that all notes given for gambling contracts are void, even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser; 21 D. C. 88; contra, 48 Ala. 512. A promissory note given for an interest in a race horse is not void; 62 Ill. App. 650. See Byles, Bills 141; Oliphant, Horses 307; 2 McClain, Cr. L. § 1297 GAMING; GAMING HOUSE; LOTTERY; WAGER; STAKEHOLDER; BETTING.

HORTUS (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A garden. Dig. 32. 91. 5.

HOSPITAL. An institution for the reception and care of sick, wounded, infirm, or aged persons; generally incorporated, and then of the class of corporations called "eleemosynary" or "charitable." See CHARITABLE USES; CHARITIES.

HOSPITALLERS. The knights of a religious order, so called because they built a hospital at Jerusalem, wherein pilgrims were received. All their lands and goods in England were given to the sovereign by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 24.

HOSPITATOR (Lat.). A host or entertainer.

Hospitator communis. An innkeeper. 8 Co. 32.

Hospitator Magnus. The marshal of a camp.

HOSPITIA. Inns. Hospitia communia, common inns. Reg. Orig. 105.

Hospitia curiæ, inns of the court. Hospitia cancellariæ, inns of chancery. Crabb, Eng. Law 428; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 102.

HOSPITICIDE. One who kills his guest or host.

HOSPITIUM. An inn; a household.

HOSPODAR. A Turkish governor in Moldavia or Wallachia.

HOSTAGE. A person delivered into the possession of a public enemy in the time of war, as a security for the performance of a contract entered into between the belligerents.

Hostages were frequently given as a security for the payment of a ransom-bill; and if they died their death did not discharge the contract; 3 Burr. 1734; 1 Kent 106; Dane, Abr. Index.

HOSTELER. An innkeeper. Now applied, under the form ostler, to those who look to a guest's horses. Cowel.

HOSTELLAGIUM. In English Law. A right reserved to the lords to be lodged and entertained in the houses of their tenants.

HOSTES. Enemies. Hostes humani generis, enemies of the human race; i. e. pirates.

HOSTIA. In Old Records. The hostbread, or consecrated wafer, in the eucharist. Cowel.

HOSTILARIA, HOSPITALARIA. A place or room in religious houses used for the reception of guests and strangers.

HOSTILE. When applied to the possession of an occupant of real estate holding adversely it is not to be construed as showing ill-will, or that he is an enemy of the person holding the legal title; but it means an occupant who holds and is in possession as owner, and therefore against all other claimants of the land. 33 Neb. 861.

HOSTILE EMBARGO. One laid upon the vessels of an actual or prospective enemy. See EMBARGO.

HOSTILE WITNESS. A witness who manifests so much hostility or prejudice under examination in chief that the party who has called him, or his representative, is allowed to cross-examine him, i. e. to treat him as though he had been called by the opposite party. Whart. See WITNESS.

HOSTILITY. A state of open enmity; open war. Wolff, Droit de la Nat. § 1119.

Permanent hostility exists when the individual is a citizen or subject of the government at war.

Temporary hostility exists when the individual happens to be domiciliated or resident in the country of one of the belligerents; in this latter case the individual may throw off the national character he has thus acquired by residence, when he puts himself in motion, bona fide, to quit the country sine animo revertendi; 3 C. Rob. 12; 3 Wheat. 14. See ENEMY; DOMICIL.

HOT WATER ORDEAL. See ORDEAL.

HOTCHPOT (spelled, also, hodge-podge, hotch-potch). The blending and mixing property belonging to different persons, in order to divide it equally. 2 Bla. Com. 190.

The bringing together all the personal estate of the deceased, with the advancements he has made to his children, in order that the same may be divided agreeably to the provisions of the statute for the distribution of intestates' estates.

In bringing an advancement into hotchpot, the donee is not required to account for the profits of the thing given: for example, he is not required to bring into hotchpot the produce of negroes, nor the interest of money. The property must be accounted for at its value when given; 1 Wash. Va. 224; 17 Mass. 358; 3 Pick. 450; 2 Des. 127; 3 Rand. 117, 559. See ADVANCEMENT.

HOTEL. See INNKEEPER; BOARDER; GUEST.

HOURLY. The twenty-fourth part of a natural day; the space of sixty minutes of time. Co. Litt. 135.

HOUSE. A place for the habitation and dwelling of man.

A collection of persons; an institution; a commercial firm; a family.

In a grant or demise of a house, the curtilage and garden will pass, even without the words "with the appurtenances" being added; Cro. Eliz. 89; 3 Leon. 214; 1 Plowd. 171; 2 Wms. Saund. 401, n. 2; 4 Pa. 93; 113 Mo. 27. In a grant or demise of a house with the appurtenances, no more will pass although other lands have been occupied with the house; 1 P. Wms. 603; Cro. Jac. 526; 2 Co. 32; Co. Litt. 5 d, 36 a, b; 2 Wms. Saund. 401, n. 2.

If a house, originally entire, be divided into several apartments, with an outer door to each apartment, and no communication with each other subsists, in such case the several apartments are considered as distinct houses; 6 Mod. 214; Woodf. L. & T. 178.

A church is a "house" within a statute prescribing a street line for houses; L. R. 15 Eq. 159; a smoke house is a house; 37 Tex. 412; but a theatre is not a house; 14 M. & W. 181.

As to what the term includes in cases of arson and burglary, see ARSON; BURGLARY; DWELLING-HOUSE; FLAT; APARTMENT. See, also, ARREST.

HOUSE-BOTE. An allowance of necessary timber out of the landlord's woods for the repairing and support of a house or tenement. This belongs of common right to any lessee for years or for life. House-bote is said to be of two kinds, estoverium ædificandi et ardendi. Co. Litt. 41 b.

HOUSE-DUTY. A tax on inhabited houses imposed by 14 and 15 Vict. c. 36, in lieu of window-duty, which was abolished.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. One of the constituent houses of the English parliament.

It is composed of the representatives elected by the people, as distinguished from the house of lords, which is composed of the nobility. It consists of six hundred and seventy members; four hundred and ninety-five from England and Wales, seventy-two from Scotland, and one hundred and three from Ireland. See PARLIAMENT; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF CORRECTION. A place for the imprisonment of those who have committed crimes of lesser magnitude.

HOUSE OF ILL-FAME. In Criminal Law. A house resorted to for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness. 5 Fred. 603.

A disorderly house need not be a dwelling house. "However lexicographers may define the word 'house,' it is clear the legislature has used it as generic, and has applied it to nearly all kinds of buildings;" 36 Conn. 77. A flat boat, floating on a river, with a cabin on it, with men and women eating, sleeping, and living on it, may be such; 35 Ia. 199; so also a tent, of which it has been said, "such structures are more apt to become disorderly nuisances than houses of brick or stone, owing to the facility with which noises made within could be heard from without;" 2 Tex. App. 222. So it has been held of one room of a steamship, though the latter is not an inn; 118 Mass. 456.

Keeping a house of ill-fame is an offence at common law; 3 Pick. 26; 17 id. 80; 1 Russ. Cr. 322; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 1082. So the letting of a house to a woman of ill-fame, knowing her to be such, with the intent that it shall be used for purposes of prostitution, is an indictable offence at common law; 3 Pick. 26; 11 Cush. 600. And it is no defence that the landlord did not know the character of the tenant; 96 Ala. 1. If a lodger lets her room for the purpose of indiscriminate prostitution, she is guilty of keeping a house of ill-fame, as much as if she were the proprietor of the whole house; 2 Raym. 1197; 15 R. I. 24. A married woman who lives apart from her husband may be indicted alone, and punished, for keeping a house of ill-fame; 1 Metc. Mass. 151. See 11 Mo. 27; 10 Mod. 63. The house need not be kept for lucre, to constitute the offence; 21 N. H. 345; 2 Gray 357; 18 Vt. 70. See 17 Pick. 80; 6 Gill 425; 4 Ia. 541; 2 B. Monr. 417.

It is not necessary, in order to sustain a charge of keeping such a house, that the indecency, disorder, or misconduct should be patent from the outside; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 21; and it has been said evidence of its general reputation as a house of ill-fame is admissible; 2 Cra. C. C. 675; 79 Ia. 742; 105 Ind. 271; 61 Cal. 380; Dudley 346; 20 Ont. 489; contra, 32 Md. 231; 45 N. H. 466; 1 S. & R. 341; 24 How. Pr. 276; 4 Cra. C. C. 338; 39 Ia. 379; 64 Me. 523; but evidence of the reputation of the women frequenting the house and the character of their conversation and acts in and about it is admissible; id.; 7 Gray 328; 1 Allen 8. Wharton says: "It has been ruled, though on questionable authority, that the 'ill-fame,' or bad repute, may be proved"; 2 Whart. Cr. L. 10th ed. § 1452; but the doubt cast by this language on the cases referred to is not warranted by the cases, a long list of which, in addition to those above cited, may be found in a note to the section quoted. And indeed the same author in another work says: "On indictments, however, for keeping houses of ill-fame, when such is the statutory term describing the offence, the ill-fame or bad reputation of the house may be put in evidence. The bad reputation of the visitors is, in any view, competent evidence. But of a disorderly house the reputation is inadmissible, being secondary evidence of disorder, which is susceptible of immediate proof;" Whart. Cr. Ev. 9th ed. § 261. On indictment for keeping a house of ill-fame the reputation of the house as such must be proved; 17 Conn. 467; 38 id. 523; but it must be "ill-repute in the vicinity. . . . Rumors at a distance do not make up reputation"; 79 Mich. 110. But the reputation where admitted at all must be connected in time with the person who is now the proprietor; 22 Tex. App. 639. It is not necessary to prove who frequents the house; it is enough to show that unknown persons were there behaving as charged; 1 Term 748. Contracts of lease of such a house, or to furnish goods for the purposes of the business, if made with knowledge of the use intended, are illegal and void; L. R. 1 Eq. 626; and see L. R. 4 Q. B. 309; L. R. 1 Ex. 213. See BAWDY HOUSE; BROTHEL; DISORDERLY HOUSE.

HOUSE OF LORDS. One of the constituent houses of the English parliament.

It is at present composed of twenty-six lords spiritual (bishops and archbishops), and five hundred and thirty-four lords temporal; but the number is liable to vary. See PARLIAMENT; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF REFUGE. A prison for juvenile delinquents. See 55 Am. Rep. 456-62.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. The name given to the more numerous branch of the federal congress, and of the legislatures of several of the states of the United States.

The constitution of the United States, art. I. s. 2, § 1, provides that the "house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states; and the electors of each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." No person can be a representative until he shall have attained the age of twenty-five and has been seven years a citizen of the United States, and unless he is at the time of his election an inhabitant of the state in which he is chosen: U. S. Const. art. I. sec. 2, § 2. A representative cannot hold any office under the United States; art. I. s. 6, § 2; nor can any religious test be required of him; art. VI. § 3; nor is any property qualification imposed upon him. Representatives are apportioned (Amend. XIV. sec. 2) among the several states according to their respective numbers, excluding Indians not taxed; with a proviso, that, if the right to vote for state or U. S. officers is denied to any male inhabitants of a state, of 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the representation in such state shall be proportionately reduced. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative; U. S. Const. art. I. sec. 1. A reapportionment among the states is made every tenth year. Under the act of Feb. 7, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 735), it consists of 356 members, which is based upon the census of 1890. The house of representatives has the exclusive right of originating bills for raising revenues, but the senate may concur with amendments, U. S. Const. I. sec. 7; Story on Const. 571. See CONGRESS; QUORUM; SPEAKER; MAJORITY.

HOUSAGE. A fee paid by a carrier for housing goods. Toml.

HOUSEBREAKING. In Criminal Law. The breaking and entering the dwelling house of another by night or by day, with intent to commit some felony within the same, whether such felonious intent is executed or not. Housebreaking by night is burglary. Cl. Cr. L. 237.

This crime is of a local character, and the evidence respecting the place must correspond with the allegation in the indictment. An indictment for housebreaking must allege the ownership of the house; 31 W. Va. 355. See BURGLARY; BREAKING.

HOUSEHOLD. Those who dwell under the same roof and constitute a family. Webst. But it is not necessary that they should be under a roof, or that the father of the family be with it, if the mother and children keep together so as to constitute a family; 18 Johns. 402.

Belonging to the house and family; domestic. Webster, Dict.

HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE. By this expression, in wills, all personal chattels will pass that may contribute to the use or convenience of the household or the ornament of the house: as, plate linen, china, both useful and ornamental, and pictures. 2 Wms. Exec. 1185; 1 Rep. Leg. 273. But goods or plate in the hands of testator in the way of his trade will not pass, nor books, nor wines; 1 Jarm. Wills. 591, 596, notes; 1 Ves. Sen. 97; 2 Will. Ex. 1017; 1 Johns. Ch. 329.

But books and wines have been held, on the other hand, to pass in a bequest, where the testator had made them part of the household furniture by his use of them; 1

Robt. 21; see 2 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 489; 33 Me. 535; 60 Pa. 220; and so has plate; 3 Ves. 313; 29 Beav. 573; bronzes, statuary, pictures; 124 Mass. 228. See FIXTURES; FURNITURE.

HOUSEHOLD GOODS. In a will this expression will pass everything of a permanent nature (that is, articles of household which are not consumed in their enjoyment) that were used or purchased, or otherwise acquired by the testator, for his house, but not goods in the way of his trade. Plate will pass by this term, but not articles of consumption found in the house, as malt, hops, or victuals, nor guns and pistols, if used in hunting or sport, and not for defence of house. A clock in the house, if not fixed to it, will pass; 1 Jarm. Wills 589; 1 Rep. Leg. 253; 2 Will. Exec. 464. See 2 Munf. 234; 33 Me. 535.

HOUSEHOLD STUFF. Words sometimes used in a will. Plate will pass under the term; 2 Freem. 64; but not apparel, books, cattle, victuals, and choses in action, which do not fall within the natural meaning of the word, unless there be an intention manifest that they should pass; 15 Ves. 319. Goods, as seven hundred beds in possession of testator for purposes of trade, do not pass under the term "utensils of household stuff;" 2 P. Wms. 302. In general, "household stuff" will pass all articles which may be used for the convenience of the house; Swinb. Wills 484. See FIXTURES; HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE.

HOUSEHOLDER. Master or chief of a family; one who keeps house with his family. Webst. But a man who has absconded from the state, and left his wife and children remaining together as a family, was for their benefit held to be a householder; 18 Johns. 402; 19 Wend. 475.

A keeper of a tavern or boarding-house, or a master or mistress of a dwelling-house; 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 248. A person having and providing for a household. The character is not lost by a temporary cessation from housekeeping; 14 Barb. 456; 19 Wend. 475; 51 How. Pr. 45. For purposes of bail, one who rents and occupies part of a building as an office has been held a householder; 33 How. Pr. 323. See 3 Code R. 17; 37 Ala. 106; 52 id. 161; 1 Q. B. 72; 59 How. Pr. 71.

HOUSEKEEPER. One who occupies a house.

A person who, under a lease, occupies every room in the house except one, which is reserved for his landlord, who pays all the taxes, is not a housekeeper; 1 Chitty, Bail. 502. Nor is a person a housekeeper who takes a house which he afterwards underlets to another, whom the landlord refuses to accept as his tenant: in this case the undertenant paid the taxes, and let to the tenant the first floor of the house, and the rent was paid for the whole house to the tenant, who paid it to the landlord; id. note.

In order to make the party a housekeeper, he must be in actual possession of the house; 1 Chitty, Bail. 288; and must occupy a whole house. See 1 B. & C. 178; 2 Term 406; 3 Petersd. Abr. 103, note; 2 Mart. La. 313. See HOUSEHOLDER.

HOVEL. A place used by husbandmen to set their ploughs, carts and other farming utensils, out of the rain and sun. Law. Lat. Dict. A shed; a cottage; a mean house.

HOWE. In Old English Law. A hill. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOUGH. A valley. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOY. A small vessel usually rigged as a sloop, and employed in conveying passengers and goods from place to place on the sea coast. Webster.

HOYMAN. The master or captain of a hoy.

Hoymen are liable as common carriers; Story, Bailm. § 496.

HUDE-GELD. In Old English Law. A compensation for an assault (transgressio illata) upon a trespassing servant (servus). Supposed to be a mistake or misprint in Fleta for hinegeld. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 20. Also, the price of one's skin, or the money paid by a servant to save himself from a whipping. Du Cange.

HUE AND CRY. In Old English Law. A pursuit of one who had committed felony, by the highway.

The meaning of hue is said to be shout, from the Saxon huer; but this word also means foot, and it may be reasonably questioned whether the term may not be up foot and cry, in other words, run and cry after the felon. We have a mention of hue and cry as early as Edward I.; and by the Statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. 1., "immediately upon robberies and felonies committed, fresh suit shall be made from town to town, and county to county, by horsemen and footmen, to the seaside. The constable (the person being described, etc.) is to call upon the parishioners to assist him in the pursuit in his precinct; and to give notice to the next constable, who is to do the same as the first, etc. If the county will not answer the bodies of the offenders, the whole hundred shall be answerable for the robberies there committed, etc." A person engaged in the hue and cry apprehending a felon was, on the felon's conviction, entitled to forty pounds, on a certificate of the judge or justice before whom there was conviction, as well as to the felon's horse, furniture, arms, money, and other goods taken with him, subject to the rights of other persons therein; Wood, Inst. 370. See 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 100.

HUEBRA. In Spanish Law. An acre of land, or as much as can be ploughed in a day by two oxen. 2 White, Recop. 49.

HUISSERIUM. A ship used to transport horses. Also termed "uffer."

HUISSIER. An usher of the court. An officer who serves process.

In France, an officer of this name performs many of the duties of an English sheriff or constable. In Canada there may be many huissiers in each county, whose acts are independent of each other, while there can be but one sheriff, who is presumed cognizant of the acts of his subordinates. The French huissier certifies his process; the Canadian merely serves what is put into his hands.

HULKA. A hulk, or small vessel. Cowel.

HULLUS. A hill. Cowel; 2 Mon. Angl. 292.

HUMAGIUM. A moist place. Mon. Angl.

HUNDRED. In English Law. A division of a county, which some make to have originally consisted of one hundred hides of land, others of ten tithings, or one hundred free families. See 60 Conn. 124.

It differed in size in different parts of England; 1 Steph. Com. 122. In many cases, when an offence is committed within a hundred, the inhabitants are liable to make good the damage if they do not produce the offender. See 12 East 244.

This system was probably introduced by Alfred (though mentioned in the Pœnitentiæ of Egbert, where it seems to be the addition of a later age), being borrowed from the continent, where it was known to the Franks, under the name centena, in the sixth century. See Charlemagne Capit. l. 3, c. 10; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 543.

It had a court attached to it, called the hundred court, or hundred lagh, like a court baron, except in its larger territorial jurisdiction. It was governed by the hundredary (hundredarius); 9 Co. 25. The jurisdiction of this court has devolved upon the county courts. Jacob, Law Dict.; Du Cange. Hundred-penny was a tax collected from the hundred by its lord or by the sheriff. Hundred-fetena signified the dwellers in the hundred; Charta Edg. Reg. Mon. Angl. to. 1, p. 16. In Delaware the subdivisions of a county are called hundreds. They correspond to towns in New England, townships in Pennsylvania, parishes in Louisiana, and the like.

HUNDRED COURT. An inferior court, long obsolete, and practically abolished by the County Courts Act of 1867, sec. 28, whose jurisdiction extended to the whole territory embraced in a hundred. They were courts not of record; the freeholders were the judges; they were held before the steward of the manor as register; and they resembled courts baron in all respects except in their territorial jurisdiction; 3 Bla. Com. 34, 35.

HUNDRED-FECTA. The performance of suit and service at the hundred courts.

HUNDRED-FETENA. Dwellers or inhabitants of a hundred.

HUNDRED GEMOTE. An assembly among the Saxons of the freeholders of a hundred.

It met twelve times in the year, originally; though subsequently its meetings became less frequent.

It had an extensive jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and was the predecessor of the county court and sheriff's tourn, and possessed very similar powers; Spelman, Gloss. Hundredum; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 7.

HUNDRED LAGH (Sax.). Liability to attend the hundred court. Spelman, Gloss. See Cowel; Blount.

HUNDRED-PENNY. The hundred-fel, or tax collected by the sheriff or lord of a hundred.

HUNDREDARIUS. The chief officer of a hundred. Cowel.

HUNDREDARY (hundredarius). The chief magistrate of a hundred. Du Cange.

HUNDREDES EARLDOR, or HUNDREDEDES MAN. The presiding officer in the hundred-court. Anc. Inst. Eng.

HUNDREDORS. The inhabitants of a hundred, who, by several statutes, are held to be liable, in the cases therein specified, to make good the loss sustained by persons within the hundred by robbery or other violence, therein also specified. The principal of these statutes are 13 Edw. I. st. 2, c. 1, s. 4; 28 Edw. III. c. 11; 27 Eliz. c. 13; 29 Car. II. c. 7; 8 Geo. II. c. 16; 22 Geo. II. c. 24.

Persons serving on juries, or fit to be empanelled thereon, dwelling within the hundred where the land in question lies. 35 Hen. VIII. c. 6. And some such were necessarily on every panel till the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. 4 Steph. Com. 370. One that had the jurisdiction of the hundred. The bailiff of the hundred. Horne, Mirr. of Just. lib. 1; Jacob, Law Dict.

HUNG. Sometimes applied to a jury which fails to agree upon a verdict. Anderson, L. Dict.

HUNGER. The desire to eat. Hunger is no excuse for larceny; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 54; 4 Bla. Com. 31. As to death from hunger, see DEATH.

HUNTING. The act of pursuing and taking wild animals; the chase.

The chase gives a kind of title by occupancy by which the hunter acquires a right or property in the game which he captures. In the United States the right of hunting is universal, and limited only so far as to exclude hunters from committing injuries to private property or to the public—as, by shooting on public roads—or from trespassing. See FERÆ NATURÆ; OCCUPANCY.

HURDEREFERST. A domestic; one of a family.

HURDLE. In English Law. A species of sledge, used to draw traitors to execution.

HURST, HYRST, HERST, or HIRST. A wood or grove of trees. Co. Litt. 4 b.

HUSBAND. A married man; a man who has a wife.

His obligations at common law. He was bound to receive his wife at his home, and to furnish her with all the necessities and conveniences which his fortune and his rank enabled him to do, and which her situation required; 9 C. & P. 643; 1 Hurl. & N. 641; 33 Minn. 348; but this did not include such luxuries as, according to her fancies, she deemed necessities; 76 Ia. 638. He was required to fulfil toward her his marital promise of fidelity, and could, therefore, have no carnal connection with any other woman without a violation of his obligations. See ADULTERY; CRIM. CON.; DIVORCE. As he was bound to govern his house properly, he was liable for its misgovernment, and he could be punished for keeping a disorderly house, even where his wife had the principal agency. See BAWDY HOUSE; DISORDERLY HOUSE; HOUSE OF ILL-FAME. He was liable for her torts; 11 Gray 437; 112 Mass. 287; 5 Car. & P. 484; 115 Mo. 1; 44 Ill. 42; 26 Ohio St. 9; Add. Pa. 13; 21 Ind. 427; 48 Me. 348; 58 Mo. 361; 49 N. H. 314; 37 Vt. 448; 8 Minn. 236; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 912; 101 Mass. 344; and for her crimes, if committed in his presence, except treason and murder where they were jointly liable; 15 Ohio 72; 94 Ala. 31; 10 South 506; 74 Ia. 589; see 10 Mass. 154; 111 N. Y. 401; 45 La. Ann. 1221; but he may introduce evidence to rebut the presumption of coercion; 74 Ia. 589; and he should not be joined for trespass committed by her in the management of her separate estate; 135 N. Y. 201. He was liable for his wife's debts incurred before coverture; 1 P. Wms. 462, 469; 47 N. Y. 351; 41 Vt. 311; 19 Wis. 333; 13 Mass. 384; 38 Ga. 255; 13 Ind. 44; 10 B. Monr. 411; 89 Va. 786; provided they were recovered from him during their joint lives; id.; and this rule applies where the husband was an infant; 9 Wend. 238; 7 Metc. 164; 25 Vt. 220; and, generally, for such as were contracted by her after coverture, for necessities, or by his authority, express or implied, and for her funeral expenses; 12 C. B. 344; 1 H. Bla. 90; 98 Mass. 538; 41 Mich. 596. See DEAD BODY.

His rights. Being the head of the family, the husband had the right to establish himself wherever he pleased, and in this he could not be controlled by his wife; 63 Pa. 450; 10 Rich. Eq. 163; 29 N. J. Eq. 96; 87 Ill. 250; 11 Post. 11. See DOMICIL. He was entitled to all her earnings; 2 Man. & G. 172; 1 Salk. 114; 7 Pick. 65; 77 Ill. 155; 46 id. 18; 23 Me. 305; 94 U. S. 580; 51 Ind. 61; 2 J. Y. 589; and formerly he might use such gentle force to restrain her of her liberty as might seem necessary; 2 Kent 181; 1 Strange 678; but this is now otherwise; 1 Q. B. D. 671; although it has been held that he may restrain her from committing a crime; 1 Grant, Cas. 389; or from interfering with the exercise of his parental control over his children; 42 Tex. 221. He also had the right to moderately chastise her; 1 Bla. Com. 445; 1 Phil. N. C. 453; but this is no longer recognized, and any chastisement inflicted on the wife renders him guilty of assault and battery; 108 Mass. 458; 1 Swab.

& T. 601; 2 Paige 501; [1891] 1 Q. B. 671; 67 Me. 304; 8 N. H. 307; and excessive cruelty or frequent repetition of slight abuses is in many states a ground of divorce. See DIVORCE; CRUELTY.

HUSBAND LAND. In Old Scotch Law. A piece of land containing about six acres. Skene.

HUSBAND OF A SHIP. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

HUSBANDMAN. See FARMER.

HUSBRECE. Housebreaking; burglary.

HUSCARLE. A menial servant. Domesd.

HUSFASTNE. He that holdeth house and land. Termes de la Ley; Cowel.

HUSGABLE. House rent or house tax. Toml.

HUSH MONEY. A colloquial expression to designate a bribe to hinder information; pay to secure silence. See BLACK-MAIL.

HUSTINGS. In English Law. The name of a court held before the lord mayor and aldermen of London: it was the principal and supreme court of that city. See Co. 2d Inst. 327; St. Armand, Hist. Essay on the Legisl. Power of England 75.

The place of meeting to choose a member of parliament.

The term is used in Canadian as well as English law. Formerly the manner of conducting an election in Canada and England for a member of the legislative body was substantially as follows. Upon warrant from the proper officer, a writ issued from the clerk of the crown in chancery, directed to the sheriff, registrar, or other returning officer of the electoral division. He thereupon issued and posted in public places a proclamation appointing a day, place, and hour for his holding an election, and also fixing a day when a poll would be opened, if one were demanded and granted. The first day was called nomination day. On this day he proceeded to the hustings, which were in the open air and accessible to all the voters, proclaimed the purpose of the election, and called upon the electors present to name the person they required to represent them. The electors then made a show of hands, which might result in an election, or a poll might be demanded by a candidate or by any elector. On such demand, a poll was opened in each township, ward, or parish of the election district, at the places prescribed by statute. Now, however, by statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, the votes are given by ballot in accordance with certain fixed rules.

It is also applied to a local court in Virginia. Va. Code, 1887, § 3072; 6 Gratt. 696.

HUTESIUM ET CLAMOR. Hue and cry (q. v.).

HYDROMETER. An instrument for measuring the density of fluids: being immersed in fluids, as in water, brine, beer, brandy, etc., it determines the proportion of their density, or their specific gravity, and thence their quality. See Act of Congr. Jan. 12, 1825, 3 Story, Laws 1976.

HYPNOTISM. Artificial catalepsy; induced somnambulism; a method of artificially inducing sleep; artificial somnambulism.

The following summary of the physical manifestations accompanying hypnotism, is given in the International Cyclopædia:

"This is a term invented by the late Mr. Braid, of Manchester, to designate certain phenomena of the nervous system which in many respects resemble those which are induced by animal magnetism, but which clearly arise from the physical and psychical condition of the patient, and not from any emanation proceeding from others. The following are the directions of Mr. Braid, for inducing the phenomena, and especially the peculiar sleep-like condition of hypnotism. Take a silver lancet-case, or other bright object, and hold it between the fingers of the left hand, about a foot from the eyes of the person experimented on, in such a position above the forehead as to produce the greatest strain on the eyes compatible with a steady fixed stare at the object. The patient must be directed to rivet his mind on the object at which he is gazing. His pupils will first contract, but soon dilate considerably; and if they are well dilated, the first and second fingers of the operator's right hand, extended and a little separated, are carried from the object towards the eyes; the eyelids will most probably close with a vibratory motion. After 10 or 15 seconds have elapsed, it will be found that the patient retains his arms and legs in any position in which the operator places them. It will also be found that all the special senses, excepting sight, are at first extremely exalted, as also are the muscular sense, and the sensibility of heat and cold; but after a time the exaltation of function is followed by a state of depression far greater than the torpor of natural sleep. The patient is now thoroughly hypnotized. The rigidity of the muscles and the profound torpor of the nervous system may be instantly removed and an opposite condition induced by directing a current of air against the muscles which we wish to render limber, or the organ we wish to excite to action; and then by mere repose the senses will speedily regain their original condition. If a current of air directed against the face is not sufficient to arouse the patient, pressure and friction should be applied to the eyelids, and the arm or leg sharply struck with an open hand.

"From the careful analysis of a large number of experiments Mr. Braid is led to the conclusion that by a continual fixation of the mental and visual eye upon an object, with absolute repose of body and general quietude, a feeling of stupor supervenes, which renders the patient liable to be readily affected in the manner already described. As the experiment succeeds with the blind, he considers that it is not so much the optic, as the sentient, motor, and sympathetic nerves, and the mind through which the impression is made. See Tuke's Sleepwalking and Hypnotism (1884).

"Many of the minor operations of surgery have been performed on patients in the hypnotized state without pain, and hypnotism has been successfully employed as a therapeutic agent in numerous forms of disease, especially such as have their seat in the nervous system. An interesting memoir On Hypnotic Therapeutics was published by Mr. Braid in the 17th volume of The Monthly Journal of Medical Science (1853)." Int. Cyc. sub v.

A committee of the British Medical Association made a report to the annual meeting in 1892, in the course of which they say:

"Test experiments which have been carried out by members of the committee have shown that this condition is attended by mental and physical phenomena, and that these differ widely in different cases.

"Among the mental phenomena are altered consciousness, temporary limitation of the will power, increased receptivity of suggestion from without, sometimes to the extent of producing passing delusions, illusions, and hallucinations, an exalted condition of the attention and post-hypnotic suggestions.

"Among the physical phenomena are vascular changes (such as flushings of the face and altered pulse rate), deepening of the respirations, increased frequency of deglutition, slight muscular tremors, inability to control suggested movements, altered muscular sense, anaesthesia, modified power of muscular contraction, catalepsy, and rigidity, often intense. It must, however, be understood that all these mental and physical phenomena are rarely present in any one case. The committee takes this opportunity of pointing out that the term hypnotism is somewhat misleading, inasmuch as sleep, as ordinarily understood, is not necessarily present. The committee are of opinion that, as a therapeutic agent, hypnotism is frequently effective in relieving pain, procuring sleep, and alleviating many functional ailments. As to its permanent efficacy in the treatment of drunkenness, the evidence before the committee is encouraging, but not conclusive."

In the trial of Czyski, referred to infra, some interesting opinions were expressed by the scientific experts. Dr. Fuchs of Bonn gave his opinion of hypnotism in general, and his view was a total denial of its power. He does not consider it an instrument by which the human will can be controlled in a permanent or irresistible way. Nobody would succeed in inducing one who simulates disease to relinquish simulation. Of course witnessing the exhibitions of practitioners, the impression is made that their orders are implicitly obeyed. His conviction was that all the subjects practiced on were stupid people. They are under no other compulsion than the desire to make themselves interesting, or from some inducement to do the practitioner a favor. Hypnotism will not succeed with any person who has the feeling of serious responsibility. He has the conviction that all the instances of hypnotism which he had seen were only a farce. And this opinion was given after seeing experiments of such men as Luys and Charcot. Dr. Grashey, of Munich, thus defined hypnotic influence and suggestion. "Suggestion means to suggest to somebody a certain thought, to persuade him that a certain idea transferred is his own. Suggestions play a great role in the intellectual life of men, and especially in education. Children have no independent judgment and rapidly adopt the thoughts suggested to them by their parents, teachers, and friends. But suggestive effect is due not merely to words, but also to example. A person can be suggested to go to sleep. Such a sleep, induced by suggestion, is called hypnosis, and the inducement of hypnosis is called hypnotism. The person who hypnotizes another is called a hypnotizer. Hypnosis, or sleep induced by suggestion, has the peculiarity that the subject remains in mental rapport with the hypnotizer, who can suggest or transfer thoughts to the hypnotized person, and then the latter can offer less resistance than in a wakeful state. Hypnosis has also the peculiarity that it can be produced easier and easier as the operation is repeated. . . . According to my conception the grown man can be held devoid of his free will irresponsible then only when the action is exclusively or predominantly the product of abnormal or diseased factors, abnormal or diseased illusions, abnormal or diseased feelings, disposition, and will impulses. . . . If, however, as it is generally assumed, the suggestibility increases with every new production of hypnosis, the will power, as against the will of the hypnotizer, decreases by degrees, and the interference with the freedom of the subject will increase as well as the restriction of the power of will. . . . And thus we see a hypnotizer attain finally such power over his subject that a single word, a single look, may put him to sleep. . . . Not only in regard to the time of going to sleep, of the beginning of hypnosis, is the person hypnotized dependent upon the hypnotizer, but also in regard to thoughts and feelings. A thought which is slightly opposed during the first condition of hypnosis in a less degree than in the normal condition will meet with less opposition as the hypnotizing progress is continued; sentiments and dispositions which were but slightly indicated during the first operation will grow, become stronger and more intense as the process is repeated.

"Again a hypnotizer who has gained a certain power over an individual by a repetition of hypnotic procedures can suggest successfully a thought or a sentiment which in the commencement would hardly have been received, and thus the hypnotized individual falls into a condition of subservience in ideas and sentiments at the cost of his own freedom of will;" 14 Med. Leg. J. 159-162.

The principal legal interest in the subject of hypnotism arises out of the question, whether, and if so to what extent, crime may be induced by hypnotic suggestion, or the will of the hypnotic subject sufficiently controlled to enable the hypnotizer to obtain the unconscious execution of papers such as wills or promises to pay money, without knowledge or consciousness on the part of the subject. Though the existence of this force cannot be questioned, it has been the subject of extended discussion, much of which is unprofitable and often based upon newspaper reports of legal proceedings which have proved to be entirely untrustworthy. The sensational character of much that has been written on the subject, even in influential legal journals, has tended to obscure the questions which really require consideration both by courts and by the legislature. These questions are carefully considered in an article on Hypnotism and the Law in 13 Med. Leg. J. 47, one on the same subject, 95 L. T. 500, and another on Hypnotism in the Criminal Courts, 13 Med. Leg. J. 351. The first article is based mainly on the answers received from leading scientists to four questions as follows:—(1) Can crime be committed by the hypnotizer, the subject being the unconscious and innocent agent and instrument? (2) If the subject is unconscious, and even unwilling, has the hypnotizer such power and domination over the hypnotized as would control action to the extent of the commission of a crime? (3) Is it certain or possible to remove by hypnotic suggestion from the mind of the subject all memory of acts or occurrences which happen in the hypnotic state? (4) Would it be possible for a hypnotizer so to control a hypnotized subject as, for example, to make him sign (a) a will in the presence of third persons, declare it to be his will, and request them to sign their names as witnesses, without subsequent consciousness of the occurrence; (b) or a note of hand or a check?

The answers to these questions show a very decided difference of opinion among American scientific men who have given special attention to the subject, and the same difference appears to exist in a marked degree in European thought. It is impossible as yet to state any satisfactory conclusion from this diversity of opinion, and there has as yet been no recognition of the subject by the courts, notwithstanding the amount of discussion in the press,—much of it thoughtless and unprofitable,—of cases popularly, though erroneously, supposed to touch the question of the procurement of crime by hypnotic suggestion. In spite of this difference, however, and leaving the questions above quoted to be answered by further investigations, so far as they may be, there is a practical question much mooted as to the necessity or propriety of any recognition of hypnotism by the law and of its legal regulation, at least to the extent of forbidding public exhibitions of it, or its use except by those skilled in the science to which it may be a legitimate adjunct; and even as to whether its use by physicians and surgeons may not be a proper subject of legal regulation. Another question raised is whether hypnotism is a justifiable inquisitorial agent. Such use of it is said to be permitted under the law of Holland; 95 L. T. 500; and it is quite possible that in countries accustomed to the inquisitorial character of investigations of crime, as in continental Europe, it may be thought proper. It may be assumed that it would be so entirely foreign to American and English ideas as to be unlikely to receive serious consideration in either country.

The consensus of medical opinion would seem to be in favor of regulation. The committee of the British Medical Association, in the report above quoted, stated that they had "satisfied themselves of the genuineness of the hypnotic state," and that dangers may arise in its use "from want of knowledge, carelessness, or intentional abuse, or from too continuous repetition of suggestions in unsuitable cases." And the conclusion was that, when used for therapeutic purposes, it should be confined to qualified medical men, and under no circumstances employed for female patients except in the presence of a relative or a person of their own sex. The report also expressed strong disapproval of public exhibitions of hypnotic phenomena, and a hope that some legal restrictions may be put upon them; 11 Med. Leg. J. 73. A report of a similar committee of the American Medico-Legal Society suggested the legal questions involved in the subject of Hypnotism and evoked a general discussion which may be found in 8 Med. Leg. J. 263, 353; 13 id. 47, 351. These references are valuable only to direct the inquirer to the variety and contrariety of opinion upon the subject. One of the best considered discussions from a legal point of view will be found in the paper on the forensic aspect of hypnotism in 3 Am. Lawy. 534, in which the writer, after carefully considering the cases with which hypnotism has been connected in the popular mind, reaches the conclusion that it has no place in the law. He contends that the person hypnotized cannot be compelled to commit an act which is repugnant and offensive to his sense of morality or, as in case of signing a will, opposed to his instinct of self-preservation, although, under its influence, he may do many things inconsistent with his reason. This writer further considers that the mind of the patient while in a hypnotic state is clear as to what he is doing and his acts are performed in pursuance merely of a desire to please the hypnotizer. The restriction of its use to physicians is disapproved on the ground that, as a class, medical practitioners are not more familiar with its use than are any other class of scientists, and it would be unsafe for the legislature to assume the existence of a monopoly of virtue among medical men.

A very decided inclination towards the views thus summarized will be found among legal minds directed to the subject, as also a very weighty, if not the preponderance of, scientific opinion. The view that the commission of crime cannot be procured by hypnotic suggestion unless in the case of a person whose moral character is such that he might do the act in a normal state, will be found well reasoned and stated in a paper on Hypnotism and Crime; 13 Med. Leg. J. 240, to which reference may be made for authorities and opinions of great value. Dr. Cocke, an investigator of recognized authority, concludes that there are few cases in which the hypnotized subject will not refuse to do a wrong act or to submit to a wrong, no matter if it be suggested; 18 Crim. L. Mag. 100.

Considering the vast amount of discussion which this subject has evoked, it is surprising to find upon how slight a basis of actual legal proceedings it rests. Cases seriously discussed are found upon examination to have no connection with the subject.

Two cases in Europe have been much commented on in connection with hypnotism. The first of these, the Bompard case, excited such wide attention that the main facts of it are generally understood and the details of it were much confused by the theatrical accessories to the trial in the French courts. The effort was made to show that a murder was the result of hypnotic suggestion, and it is believed to be the general impression of those who have examined the case that that was, to a greater or less extent, an element in the crime. The character of the trial, however, greatly lessens its value as a factor in reaching conclusions either valuable or accurate. There was also so wide a difference of opinion among the experts that it has been very truly remarked: "This trial does not, therefore, clear the air of the difficulties of the medico-legal inquiry, whether crime can be committed by the suggestion of the hypnotizer, of which the subject is the innocent and also unconscious actor;" id. 353. For report of the case see Jurid. Rev. Jan. 1890; see also Int. Cyc. N. Y. 1893, p. 763. Considerable research has failed to discover any other case involving the direct question.

The Czynski case, at Munich, seems to be the only authentic one in which a conviction of hypnotism was really secured. The prisoner was charged with having had recourse to hypnotic suggestions in order to win the affections of a woman of high social position and to obtain her consent to live with him in illicit intercourse, and, subsequently, after he had subjected her to his will, to inveigle her into a false marriage performed by a friend of the prisoner who personated a priest. The accused had given public exhibitions of his hypnotic powers in Dresden and claimed to be able to treat maladies by touching with his hands the parts of the body affected while the patient was in a hypnotized state. His arrest and trial in 1894 created a profound sensation throughout Europe. He was convicted and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. For a full report of the trial, see 14 Med. Leg. J. 150.

The Kansas case of State v. Gray was reported and extensively commented upon by the newspaper press and some influential legal journals (51 Alb. L. J. 87 and 3 Am Lawy. 3) as having turned upon the ground of hypnotic influence, but this was clearly a misrepresentation, the actual decision being that one who aids, abets, counsels, or assists in the commission of a crime is equally guilty as one who actually commits the same; 39 Pac. Rep. 1050. One of the journals cited supra in a subsequent issue corrected its error as to the facts of that case and published a letter from the trial judges which states that, "The question of hypnotism was never raised, never insisted upon, either in the evidence, the arguments, or the instructions," and "the only reference, either direct or remote, during the whole trial that was made to the question of hypnotism," was the remark of counsel for the defence to the jury that "we might almost say that Gray possessed a hypnotic power over McDonald." McDonald as principal and Gray as accessory, being charged with murder, upon a severance, the latter was tried first and convicted and afterwards the former was acquitted on the ground of self-defense; 3 Am. Lawy. 45; 13 Med. Leg. J. 51.

The case of Hayward, tried at Minneapolis for the murder of Katherine Ging, and afterwards hanged, and the case at Eau Claire, Wisconsin, in which a young man named Pickens was charged with hypnotizing two young girls, have both been shown to have no connection with hypnotism; 18 Crim. L. Mag. 100. The facts of both cases may be found in 13 Med. Leg. J. 241.

In a California case of a woman on trial for murder, in whose behalf it was alleged that she was hypnotized by her husband, it was held that evidence that she was told by her husband to commit the act does not tend to show that she was hypnotized, and does not render admissible evidence of the effect of hypnotism on persons subject to its influence; 105 Cal. 166.

Notwithstanding the drift of opinion indicated above there are writers of authority on medico-legal subjects who think differently. In discussing the possibility of rape committed upon a person in the hypnotic state, a late work, after alluding to the lack of attention given to hypnotism in England and America, continues: "Like other theories and investigations received at first with ridicule, hypnotism has been placed on a sure scientific basis, thanks to the labor of Charcot and his successors. It has found a place in French, Austrian, and Hungarian law, and must, sooner or later, creep into the Anglo-Saxon. The great French experts in legal medicine, so far as we know, without an exception (Tardieu, Devergie, Brouardel, Vibert, Tourdes, Tourrette) recognize the possibility that the will may be entirely abolished under hypnotic influence." It is further asserted that the crime mentioned is not frequent, but that it undoubtedly exists in a small number of authentic cases. See 2 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 452, where these cases are narrated, and the authorities given. It will be found that they are all open to the criticism and doubt which affect the question of rape on a sleeping woman, and which are inherent in the nature of the crime. HYPOBOLUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The bequest or legacy given by the husband to his wife, above her dowry. Tech. Dict.

HYPOTHECATION. A right which a creditor has over a thing belonging to another, and which consists in a power to cause it to be sold, in order to be paid his claim out of the proceeds.

There are two species of hypothecation, one called pledge, pignus, and the other properly denominated hypothecation. Pledge is that species of hypothecation which is contracted by the delivery by the debtor to the creditor of the thing hypothecated. Hypothecation, properly so called, is that which is contracted without delivery of the thing hypothecated; 2 Bell, Com. 25.

In the common law, cases of hypothecation, in the strict sense of the civil law, that is of a pledge of a chattel without possession by the pledgee, are scarcely to be found; cases of bottomry bonds and claims for seamen's wages against ships are the nearest approach to it; but these are liens and privileges, rather than hypothecations; Story, Bailm. § 288. It seems that chattels not in existence, though they cannot be pledged, can be hypothecated, so that the lien will attach as soon as the chattel has been produced; 14 Pick. 497.

In Scotland hypothec is the landlord's right, independently of any stipulation, over the crop and stocking of his tenant, giving the landlord a security over the crop of each year for the rent of that year; Bell.

Conventional hypothecations are those which arise by agreement of the parties. Dig. 20. 1. 5.

General hypothecations are those by which the debtor hypothecates to his creditors all his estate which he has or may have.

Legal hypothecations are those which arise without any contract therefor between the parties, expressed or implied.

Special hypothecations are hypothecations of a particular estate.

Tacit hypothecations are such as the law gives in certain cases, without the consent of the parties, to secure the creditor. They are a species of legal hypothecation.

Thus, the public treasury has a lien over the property of public debtors; Code, 8. 15. 1. The landlord has a lien on the goods in the house leased, for the payment of his rent; Dig. 20. 2. 2; Code 8. 15. 7. The builder has a lien, for his bill, on the house he has built; Dig. 20. 1. The pupil has a lien on the property of the curator for the balance of his account; Dig. 46. 6. 22; Code, 5. 37. 20. There is hypothecation of the goods of a testator for the security of the legacy: Code 6. 43. 1.

HYPOTHEQUE. In French Law. Hypothecation; the right acquired by the creditor over the immovable property which has been assigned to him by his debtor as security for his debt, although he be not placed in possession of it.

It thus corresponds to the mortgage of real property in English law, and is a real charge, following the property into whose-soever hands it comes. It may be legale, as in the case of the charge which the state has over the lands of its accountants, or which a married woman has over those of her husband; judiciaire, when it is the result of a judgment of a court of justice; and conventionnelle, when it is the result of an agreement of the parties; Brown.

HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION. A question put to an expert witness containing a recital of facts assumed to have been proved or proof of which is offered in the case, and requiring the opinion of the witness thereon.

It must present fairly the state of facts which the counsel claims to have proved or which the testimony of the witnesses tends to prove; 49 N. Y. 42; 83 id. 358; 90 id. 640; 97 id. 501; 66 Ind. 94; 70 id. 15; 118 id. 42; 104 id. 409; 34 Minn. 430; 38 id. 511; 112 Mass. 470; 152 id. 589; 48 Vt. 335; 87 Ga. 69; 72 Ia. 84; 74 id. 352; 65 Miss. 204; 68 id. 233; 30 Fla. 41; 10 Or. 448; 32 Ill. App. 463; 48 Mo. 291; 31 W. Va. 659; 35 id. 682; 66 Md. 419; 75 Tex. 667; 42 Mich. 206; 88 id. 567; 63 Wis. 664; 76 Cal. 328; and such state of facts must be relevant to the issue; 97 N. Y. 501; 138 id. 423; 35 Vt. 398; 28 Ohio St. 547; 63 Conn. 393; 64 Fed. Rep. 689. The question must contain all the facts proved when it was put; 2 Misc. Rep. 335; 62 Mo. App. 563; and the witness will not be allowed to answer a question which excludes from his consideration testimony which is essential to the formation of an intelligent opinion concerning the matter; 80 Wis. 523; 55 Mo. App. 540; but the authorities as to this point are conflicting, as it has been held that a question should not be rejected because it does not include all the facts in the case; 135 Ind. 254; 63 Conn. 393; unless it thereby fails to present the case fairly; 63 Conn. 393. A question put to an expert witness calling for his opinion may refer him to the testimony in the case if he has heard it, instead of stating the facts which the answer tends to prove, but in such a case the witness must assume the testimony to be true; 43 Minn. 279; 12 Misc. Rep. 13; and it has been held that he may not base his opinion on the testimony but must confine himself to the hypothetical statement; 57 Hun 123, 586; 136 N. Y. 1. The witness may not assume for himself from the testimony the facts on which he bases his opinion without informing the jury what he supposes the facts to be; 15 N. Y. Supp. 176; he may, however, include as a basis of his opinion, facts known to be true as well as those stated in the question; 75 Tex. 501; 90 Wis. 405.

The truth of the facts assumed by the question is, in doubtful cases, a question for the jury, and if they find that the assumed facts are not proved, they should disregard the opinions based on such hypothetical questions, and the court will so instruct them; 64 Mich. 148; 69 id. 400; but the court is not required to submit the matter to the jury unless there is some substantial evidence tending to establish the hypothesis; 70 Ind. 15. If there is no testimony in the case tending to prove the facts assumed in the question, it is improper; the facts must be proved or proof of them must be offered; 69 Mich. 400; 64 id. 148; 52 Me. 304; 39 Iowa 615; 115 Pa. 599; 28 Ohio St. 547; 63 Wis. 664; 65 Miss. 204; 107 Ill. 365.

The length of the question is to be regulated, largely, by the discretion of the trial judge; 130 U. S. 73; it has been held an error to permit it to be so long and complicated as to confuse the witness or baffle his memory; 53 Mich. 531; 107 Ill. 365; but to obviate this difficulty the court may require the question to be reduced to writing; 88 Mich. 598. If unfair and misleading, hypothetical cases assumed in framing questions are to be considered in determining whether or not a fair trial has been had; 32 Ill. App. 463; but it cannot be expected that the interrogatory will include the proofs or theory of the adversary, since this would require a party to assume the truth of that which he generally denies; 96 Ind. 550. Hypothetical questions cannot be asked of an ordinary observer; 40 Pa. 199; 46 Mo. 224; 14 Gray 335; 58 Miss. 367; 117 Mass. 143; 27 Conn. 192. And, as to this, a professional man, in a matter of which he has not made special study is regarded as an ordinary observer; 64 Barb. 364.

I. O. U. In Common Law. A memorandum of debt in use among merchants and others. It is not a promissory note, as it contains no direct promise to pay; 4 C. & P. 324; 1 Mann. & G. 46; 1 C. B. 543; Pars. Bills & Notes; but if words are superadded to the acknowledgment from which an intention to accompany it with an engagement to pay may be gathered, it will be construed as a promissory note; 1 Dan. ICE. Ice formed in a stream not navigable is part of the realty, and belongs to the owner of the bed of the stream, who has a right to prevent its removal; 33 Ind. 402; 34 Conn. 462; 80 Wis. 531; 101 Ill. 46; but see, contra, 41 Mich. 318, where it is said that the ephemeral character of ice renders it incapable of any permanent or beneficial use as part of the soil, and therefore a sale of ice already formed, as a distinct commodity, should be held a sale of personalty whether in the water or out of the water. See, also, 32 Am. Rep. 160, note; 32 Am. L. Reg. 166. Riparian owners on navigable streams have no title to the ice which forms on such streams, as an incident to their ownership of the bank; and if a statute gives them title to the ice opposite their property, and prescribes a remedy for invasion of their rights therein, that remedy is exclusive; 11 Misc. Rep. 197. The right of taking ice either for use or sale from a pond which is a public water, is a public right which may be exercised by any citizen who can obtain access to the pond without trespassing on the lands of other persons, or unreasonably interfering with their rights; 7 Allen 158; 121 Mass. 539; 26 Kan.

682. A landowner cannot cut ice for sale from a pond situated on his land, where its removal works an actual injury to one having a pondage right therein; 62 Conn. 398; but the owner of land abutting on a mill-pond may take ice from the pond if it does not interfere with the use of the mill; 42 Neb. 238. Ice in an ice-house is a subject of larceny, but before being gathered it is not, being part of the pond or river; 3 Hill 395; 6 id. 144. See Bish. N. Cr. L. § 765, n. 2.

ICENI. The ancient name for the people of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire.

ICONA. A figure or representation of a thing. Du Cange.

ICTUS. In Old English Law. A stroke or blow from a club or stone; a bruise, contusion, or swelling produced by a blow from a club or stone, as distinguished from "plaga" (a wound). Fleta, lib. 1, c. 41, 3.

ICTUS ORBIS (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. A maim, a bruise, or swelling; any hurt without cutting the skin.

When the skin is cut, the injury is called a wound. Bracton, lib. 2, tr. 2, c. 5 and 24.

Ictus is often used by medical authors in the sense of percussus. It is applied to the pulsation of the arteries, to any external lesion of the body produced by violence; also, to the wound inflicted by a scorpion or venomous reptile. Orbis is used in the sense of circle, circuit, rotundity. It is applied, also, to the eyeballs: oculi dicuntur orbes. Castelli, Lex. Med.

ID EST (Lat.). That is. Commonly abbreviated i. e.

IDAHO. One of the states of the United States.

It was a part of the Louisiana purchase but was included in the portion affected by the joint occupation of the United States and Great Britain under the treaty of 1818 which was terminated in 1846. It was a part of the Oregon territory organized under act of August 14, 1848, and afterwards of the territory of Washington organized under act of March 2, 1853; it was organized as a separate territory under its present name by act of March 3, 1863. It then included Montana and part of Wyoming, which were afterward separately organized, and the present boundaries of Idaho were settled by act of July 25, 1863, setting apart Wyoming as a territory. Under a constitution adopted August 6, and ratified November 2, 1890, it was admitted as a state July 3, 1890; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1. Supp. 754.

LEGISLATIVE POWER. The legislature consists of a senate of eighteen members and a house of representatives of thirty-six members, both elected for two years. The members may be increased and apportioned by the legislature, but not to exceed twenty-four senators and sixty representatives. The sessions are biennial, on the first Monday after January 1st. Special and local laws are prohibited in a great variety of enumerated cases covering practically the entire range of subjects liable to be so dealt with; Const. Art. III.

EXECUTIVE POWER. The executive department consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, state auditor, state treasurer, attorney-general and superintendent of public instruction, each elected for two years, and vested with the usual powers of such officers. The governor, secretary of state, and attorney-general constitute a board of pardons, but the governor may grant reprieves until the next session of the board, which must then act on the case; Const. Art. IV. A district attorney is elected in each judicial district for four years.

JUDICIAL POWER. This is vested in a supreme court, district, and probate courts and justices of the peace.

The supreme court has original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and such others as are necessarily incident to its appellate jurisdiction. The latter includes the review in all cases, properly removed to it, of final decisions of the district courts or the judges thereof.

The district courts have original jurisdiction of cases at law and in equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as is conferred by law; Const. Art. V. It has jurisdiction by statute in civil actions in which the subject of litigation is not capable of pecuniary estimation, or in which it may be so estimated which involve title or possession of real estate, legality of taxes, fines, etc., or where the value of property is over one hundred dollars; also of all special proceedings, the writs of mandate, review, prohibition, habeas corpus, and those required for the due exercise of their powers; also of the trial of all indictments. They have also an appellate jurisdiction in cases from the probate or justices' courts; Rev. Stat. § 3830.

There are five district judges who arrange their own terms and hold the courts semi-annually at the several county seats; Const. Art. V. § 11.

The probate courts have jurisdiction of all probate matters, civil causes where the amount does not exceed five hundred dollars, and, concurrently with the justices of the peace, of criminal matters. These courts are held in each county on the fourth Monday of each month for probate business, and for all other business are always open; Const. Art. V. § 20; Rev. Stat. § 3841.

Justices of the peace have civil jurisdiction in cases where the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred dollars, and in which title or possession of real estate is not in issue. They have also criminal jurisdiction of petit larceny, breakers of the peace, riots, affrays, assaults and battery, wilful injury to property and misdemeanors when the fine is not over one hundred dollars, or the imprisonment does not exceed six months, or both. These courts are always open; Rev. Stat. § 3851-4.

The distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms thereof, are prohibited, and there is one form of action, denominated a civil action, for enforcement of private rights or redress of private wrongs; and all actions prosecuted by the state for public offences are termed criminal actions. Feigned actions are prohibited. Const. Art. V. § 1. See LOUISIANA; OREGON; WASHINGTON; MONTANA; WYOMING.

IDEM (Lat.). The same. According to Lord Coke, "idem" has two significations, sc. idem syllabis seu verbis (the same in syllables or words), and idem re et sensu, (the same in substance and in sense). 10 Coke 124 a.

IDEM PER IDEM. The same for the same. An illustration of a kind that really adds no additional element to consideration of the question.

IDEM SONANS (Lat.). Having the same sound.

In indictments and pleadings, when a name which it is material to state is wrongly spelled, yet if it be idem sonans with that proved, it is sufficient. The following have been held to be idem sonans, Segrave for Seagrave; 2 Stra. 889; Whyneard for Winyard; Russ. & R. 412; Benedetto for Beneditto; 2 Taunt. 401; Keen for Keene; Thach. Cr. Cas. 67; Deadema for Diadema; 2 Ired. N. C. 346; Hutson for Hudson; 7 Mo. 142; Coonrad for Conrad; 8 Miss. 291; Gibney for Giboney; 81 Tex. 422; Allen for Allain; 144 Ill. 32; Emery for Emley; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 695; Johnston for Johnson; 50 Kan. 420; Busse for Bosse; 86 Tex. 336; Chambles for Chambless; 28 Ala. 53; Conly for Conolly; 2 Greene (Iowa) 88; Usrey for Usury; 10 Ala. 370; Faust for Foust; 163 U. S. 452; Bubb for Bopp; 39 Pa. 429; Heckman for Hackman; 88 id. 120; Shaffer for Shafer; 29 Kan. 337; Woolley for Wolley; 21 Ark. 462; Penryn for Pennyryne; 14 Md. 121; Barbra for Barbara; 52 Kan. 35; Isreal B. for Israel B.; 32 Tex. Cr. Rep. 637; Alwin for Alvin; 50 Ill. App. 202; Helmer for Hillmer; 34 Tex. Cr. Rep. 415; July for Julia; id. 1; Elliott for Ellett; 85 Tenn. 171; Chegawgequay for Chegawgoquay; 75 Mich. 289; Kealiber, Keolihier, Kelliher, Kellier, Keolhier, Kelhier, all sufficient for Kealhier; 81 Me. 531; Luckenbough for Luckenbach; 78 Ia. 101; Rooks for Rux; 83 Ala. 79. The rule seems to be that if names may be sounded alike without doing violence to the power of letters found in the various orthography, the variance is immaterial; 27 Tex. App. 30; 1 Whart. Cr. L. 309; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 688; 28 Am. Rep. 435. Whether or not the names are idem sonantia was held a question for the jury, where the name was laid Darius C (pronounced in Dorset dialect D'rius) and it was in fact Trius; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 231; 3 Russ. Cr. Sharsw. ed. 317. See 6 Ala. N. S. 679; 147 Mass. 414. In the following cases the variances there mentioned were declared to be fatal; McCarn for McCann; Russ. & R. 351; Shakspeare for Shakepear; 10 East 83; Calver for Calvert and Day for Dax; 2 Cr. & M. 189; Moores for Mohr; 55 Mo. App. 325; Mulette for Merlette; 100 Ala. 42; Siemson for Simonson; 21 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 510; Bart for Bartholomew; 29 Ill. 508; Comyns for Cummins; 24 Ill. 602; Grautis for Gerardus; 4 Cow. 148; Henry for Harry; 21 Ill. 535; Jeffery for Jeffries; 1 Hempst. 299; Byerly for Byrly; Baldw. 83.

The same principle applies to words as well as names, and a verdict is not vitiated by misspelling if the words are idem sonans, as mrd for murder, turn for term, too for two; but a verdict for damages was void when given for impunitive damages, or when a burglar was found guilty of bergelery, or where the defendant was found guilty instead of guilty, there being no such words as the last three in English; 2 Tex. App. 487; id. 504; 4 id. 527; 36 Tex. 152.

IDENTITATE NOMINIS (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ which lay for a person taken upon a capias or exigent, and committed to prison, for another man of the same name: this writ directs the sheriff to inquire whether he be the person against whom the action was brought, and if not, then to discharge him; Fitzh. N. B. 267. In practice, a party in this condition would be relieved by habeas corpus.

IDENTITY. Sameness. Identity of persons is a phrase applied especially to those cases in which the issue before the jury is, whether a man be the same person with one previously convicted or attainted. 4 Bla. Com. 396; 4 Steph. Com. 468.

In cases of larceny the question of the identity of property is for the jury and a verdict will be set aside where the court said in the charge that one of the stolen "bills was positively identified;" 17 Wis. 675. The question of identity of a prisoner as well as of property may arise. In a case of larceny of a hog the question of identity both of prisoner and hog was submitted to the jury; 1 Tex. App. 623; and evidence of a confession given by a fellow-prisoner of the accused (who had conversed with him through soil pipes in the gaol) that he recognized him by his voice was allowed to go to the jury on the question of identity; 75 Pa. 319. As to the modes of identifying different kinds of personal property, see Harris, Identification, Ch. XIII. And as to the different kinds of evidence resorted to for proving the identity of a prisoner, see id. Ch. IV. In cases of larceny, trover, and replevin, the things in question must be identified; 4 Bla. Com. 396. So, too, the identity of articles taken or injured must be proved in all indictments where taking property is the gist of the offence, and in actions of tort for damage to specific property. See 2 Crim. Law Mag. 287; 34 La. Ann. 1092. Many other cases occur in which identity must be proved in regard either to persons or things. One case in which such questions arise under chattel mortgages, in which this identification need be such only as would enable identification by a third person aided by inquiry, and not such as would enable a stranger to select it; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 54; 24 Ia. 323; 74 Ind. 495; 66 Ala. 258; 7 Ohio St. 194; 13 Gray 517. The question is sometimes one of great practical difficulty, as in case of the death of strangers, reappearance after a long absence, and the like. See Ryan, Med. Jur. 301; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 509; 1 Hall, Am. L. J. 70; 6 C. & P. 677; 1 Cr. & M. 730; 53 Ga. 496; 1 Hagg. Cons. 180; Shelf. Marr. & D. 226; Best, Pres. App. Case 4; 88 Ill. 498; Wills, Circ. Ev. 143; 4 Bla. Com. 396; 4 Steph. Com. 468; Harris, Identif.

Identity of the name of a grantor or grantee is prima facie evidence of identity of the person; 35 Neb. 587; and a conveyance by a grantee of the same name as the holder of the title is presumably sufficient; 78 Ia. 499; even where the names are not identical in spelling, as Savery and Savory; 80 Tex. 120; 15 Daly 479. These cases apply a general principle, that a presumption of identity of persons arises from identity of name, and the former is recognized as prima facie evidence of the latter in a great variety of cases; 108 U. S. 47; 87 Mo. 197, 643; 4 Q. B. 626; 9 Cow. 140; 18 N. Y. 86; 75 Cal. 240; 46 Mich. 320; 78 Me. 176; 29 Vt. 179; 83 Ala. 528; 76 Tex. 1; contra, 9 M. & W. 75; 1 Dana 155; 2 R. I. 319; 5 Ia. 486; 29 N. H. 420. But it has been held that it is a question for the jury to determine the identity of a grantor with the former grantee; 28 Cal. 221; or that a person pleading former conviction is the same party; 39 Me. 154; or that a person bearing the name of a deceased is one of his heirs; 6 Jones, L. 528. The identity of a family name and initials raises no presumption of identity; 27 Mich. 489. As between father and son of the same name it is presumed that the former is intended if there is no distinguishing mark; 10 Paige 170; Hob. 330; 90 Ill. 612; 1 Stark. 106; 9 N. H. 519.

As to the effect of variation in names with respect to records as notice, see 4 L. R. A. 122; 9 id. 471; 12 id. 58. And as to names in a record index, see 14 id. 393.

IDEO (Lat.). Therefore. Calv. Lex.

IDEO CONSIDERATUM EST. Therefore it is considered. See CONSIDERATUM EST PER CURIAM.

IDEOT. An old form for idiot (q. v.).

IDES (Lat.). In Civil Law. A day in the month from which the computation of days was made.

The divisions of months adopted among the Romans were as follows: The calends occurred on the first day of every month, and were distinguished by adding the name of the month: as, callendis Januarii, the first of January. The nones occurred on the fifth of each month, with the exception of March, July, October, and May, in which months they occurred on the seventh. The ides occurred always on the ninth day after the nones, thus dividing the month equally. In fact the ides would seem to have been the primal division, occurring in the middle of the month, nearly. Other days than the three designated were indicated by the number of days which would elapse before the next succeeding point of division. Thus, the second of April is the quarto nonas Aprilis; the second of March, the sexto nonas Martii; the eighth of March, octavius idus Martii; the eighth of April, sextus idus Aprilis; the sixteenth of March, decimus septimus calendis Aprilis.

This system is still used in some chanceries in Europe; and we therefore give the following Table of the Calends, Nones, and Ides.

	Jan., Aug. Dec., 31 days.	March, May, July, Oct., 31 days.	April, June, Sept. Nov., 30 days.	Feb. 28, bissextile, 29 days.

IDIOCHIRA (from Gr. idios, private, and χείρ, hand). In Civil Law. An instrument privately executed, as distinguished from one publicly executed. Vocat. Jur.

IDIOCY. In Medical Jurisprudence. Mental deficiency of varying grades down to extreme stupidity resulting from imperfect development or disease of the nervous centers either prenatal or occurring before the evolution of the mental faculties in childhood. Brush in Cyclopædia of Diseases of Children. A condition of defective brain-development. See 3 Wittth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 364 et seq.; 2 Ham. Leg. Med. 80 et seq.

It always implies some defect or disease of the brain, which is generally smaller than the standard size and irregular in its shape and proportions. Hydrocephalus is an occasional cause of idiocy. The senses are very imperfect at best, and one or more are often entirely wanting. None can articulate more than a few words; while many utter only cries or muttered sounds. Some make known their wants by signs or sounds which are intelligible to those who have charge of them. The head, the features, the expression, the movements,—all convey the idea of extreme mental deficiency. The reflective faculties are entirely wanting, whereby they are utterly incapable of any effort of reasoning. The perceptive faculties exist in a very limited degree, and hence they are rendered capable of being improved somewhat by education, and reformed, in some measure, from their brutish condition. They have been led into habits of propriety and decency, have been taught some of the elements of learning, and have learned some of the coarser industrial occupations. The moral sentiments, such as self-esteem, love of approbation, veneration, benevolence, are not unfrequently manifested; while some propensities, such as cunning, destructiveness, sexual impulse, are particularly active.

In some parts of Europe a form of idiocy prevails endemically, called cretinism. It is associated with disease or defective development of other organs besides the head. Cretins are short in stature, their limbs are attenuated, the belly tumid, and the neck thick. The muscular system is feeble, and their voluntary movements restrained and undecided. The power of language is very imperfect, if not entirely wanting. In the least degraded forms of this disease the perceptive powers may be somewhat developed, and the individual may evince some talent at music or construction. In Switzerland they make parts of watches. Cretinism like idiocy is frequently congenital, and its causation is very obscure.

Both idiocy and cretinism exhibit various degrees of mental deficiency, but they never approximate to any description of men supposed to be rational, nor can any amount of education efface the chasm which separates them from their better-endowed fellow-men. The older law-writers, whose observation of mental manifestations was not very profound, thought it necessary to have some test of idiocy; and accordingly, Fitzherbert says, if he have sufficient understanding to know and understand his letters, and to read by teaching or information, he is not an idiot. Natura Brevium 583. Again, he says, a man is not an idiot if he hath any glimmering of reason, so that he can tell his parents, his age, or the like common matters. The inference was, no doubt, that such a man is responsible for his criminal acts. At the present day, such an idea would not be entertained for a moment, nor are we aware of any case on record of an idiot suffering capital punishment. See INSANITY; DEMENTIA; IMBECILITY.

IDIOT. A person who has been without understanding from his nativity, and whom the law, therefore, presumes never likely to attain any. Shelf. Lun. 2; 3 Wittth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 371.

It is an imbecility or sterility of mind, and not a perversion of the understanding; Chitty, Med. Jur. 327, note s, 345; 1 Rus. Cr. 6; Bacon, Abr. Idiot (A); Brooke, Abr.; Co. Litt. 246, 247; 3 Mod. 44; 1 Vern. 16; 4 Co. 126; 1 Bl. Com. 302; Tayl. Med. Jur. 688. When a man cannot count or number twenty, nor tell his father's or mother's name, nor how old he is, having been frequently told of it, it is a fair presumption that he is devoid of understanding; Fitzh. N. B. 233. See 1 Dow, P. Cas. N. S. 392; 3 Bligh, N. S. 1. Persons born deaf, dumb, and blind were presumed to be idiots; for, the senses being the only inlets of knowledge, and these, the most important of them, being closed, all ideas and associations belonging to them are totally excluded from their minds; Co. Litt. 42; Shelf. Lun. 3. See 118 Mo. 127. But this is a mere presumption, which, like most others, may be rebutted; and doubtless a person born deaf, dumb, and blind, who could be taught to read and write, would not be considered an idiot. A remarkable instance of such a one may be found in the person of Laura Bridgman, who was taught how to converse, and even to write. See Locke, Hum. Und. b. 2, c. 11, §§ 12, 13; Ayliffe, Pand. 234; 4 Comyns, Dig. 610; 8 id. 644. See DEAF AND DUMB; DEAF, DUMB AND BLIND; IDIOCY.

Idiots are incapable of committing crimes, or entering into contracts. They cannot, of course, make a will; but they may acquire property by descent.

IDIOTA. In the Civil Law. An unlearned, illiterate, or simple person. Calv. Lex. A private man; one not in office.

In Common Law. An idiot or fool.

IDIOTA INQUIRENDO, WRIT DE. This is the name of an old writ which directs the sheriff to enquire whether a man be an idiot or not. The inquisition is to be made by a jury of twelve men. Fitzh. N. B. 332.

IDONEUM SE FACERE. IDONEARE SE. To purge one's self by oath of a crime of which one is accused.

IDONEUS (Lat.). Sufficient; fit; adequate. He is said to be idoneus homo who hath these three things, honesty, knowledge, and civility; and if an officer, etc., be not idoneus, he may be discharged; 8 Co. 41. If a clerk presented to a living is not persona idonea, which includes ability in learning, honesty of conversation, etc., the bishop may refuse him. And to a quare impedit brought thereon, "in literatura minus sufficiens is a good plea, without setting forth the particular kind of learning;" 5 Co. 58; 6 id. 49 b; Co. 2d Inst. 631; 3 Lev. 311; 1 Show. 88; Wood, Inst. 32.

So of things: idonea quantitas; Calvinus, Lex.; idonea paries, a wall sufficient or able to bear the weight.

In Civil Law. Rich; solvent: e. g. idoneus tutor, idoneus debitor. Calvinus, Lex.

IFUNGIA. The finest white bread, formerly called "cocked bread." Blount.

IGLISE (L. Fr.). A church. Kelham. Another form of "eglise."

IGNIS JUDICIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. The judicial trial by fire.

IGNITEGIUM. The curfew (q. v.). Cowel.

IGNOMINY. Public disgrace; infamy; reproach; dishonor. Ignominy is the opposite of esteem. Wolff § 145. See 38 Ia. 220.

IGNORAMUS (Lat. we are ignorant or uninformed). In Practice. The word which is written on a bill by a grand jury when they find that there is not sufficient evidence to authorize their finding it a true bill. They are said to ignore the bill, which is also said to be thrown out. The proceedings being now in English, the grand jury indorse on the bill, Not found, No bill, or, No true bill. 4 Bla. Com. 305.

IGNORANCE. The lack of knowledge. Ignorance is distinguishable from error. Ignorance is want of knowledge; error is the nonconformity or opposition of ideas to the truth. Considered as a motive of actions, ignorance differs but little from error. They are generally found together, and what is said of one is said of both.

Essential ignorance is ignorance in relation to some essential circumstance so intimately connected with the matter in question, and which so influences the parties that it induces them to act in the business; Pothier, Vente, nn. 3, 4; 2 Kent 367.

Non-essential or accidental ignorance is that which has not of itself any necessary connection with the business in question, and which is not the true consideration for entering into the contract.

Ignorance of fact is the want of knowledge as to the fact in question; as if a man marry a married woman, supposing her unmarried; 11 Allen 23.

It is not yet fully settled, at least in this country, whether a person who does a criminal act, supposing it to be lawful through ignorance of fact, can properly be convicted; 12 Am. L. Rev. 469. Such a conviction was held proper; 11 Allen 23 (where a man was convicted of adultery, in innocently marrying a woman whose husband was living); 114 Mass. 566; 103 id. 444; 98 id. 6; 124 id. 324; 69 Ill. 601; 24 Wis. 60; 56 Mo. 546; contra, 53 Ga. 229; 24 Ind. 113; 30 Ohio St. 382. See 62 Ala. 141; 46 Ind. 459. The doctrine was adhered to in a late Massachusetts case, where a belief that the husband was dead was held no defence in a prosecution for bigamy; 163 Mass. 453. The opposite conclusion was reached in England by nine out of fourteen judges; 23 Q. B. D. 168. The Massachusetts court took issue directly with the English case. Mr. Bishop severely criticises the Massachusetts doctrine and, reviewing the authorities, strongly approved the English rule; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 303 a, note. Nevertheless, it is generally well established that ignorance of facts is a defence, where a knowledge of certain facts is essential to an offence, but no defence where a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge. Thus there can be no conviction of murder, larceny, or burglary, without proof of the intention, mens rea, to commit these crimes; but where selling liquor to minors is by statute indictable, the mistaken belief that the vendee is of full age, is no defence; 98 Mass. 6; 158 id. 499; see 19 Alb. L. J. 84; 1 Whar. Cr. L. § 88; 2 id. § 1704; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 427; 37 W. Va. 1; 127 Pa. 330; but see 116 Ind. 495; 71 Mich. 548. Nor is it any defence that the party selling intoxicating liquor did not know that it was intoxicating; 52 Kan. 69; 148 Mass. 428; 66 Miss. 502.

Ignorance of a fact extrinsic and not essential to a contract, but which, if known, might have influenced the actions of a party to the contract, is not such a mistake as will authorize equitable relief; 132 U. S. 318. Nor is ignorance of facts a sufficient ground for equitable relief, if it appear that the requisite knowledge might have been obtained by reasonable diligence; 99 U. S. 35, 47.

See Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 84; MISTAKE.

Ignorance of the laws of a foreign government, or of another state, is ignorance of fact; 9 Pick. 112, where there will be found a discussion of the difference between ignorance of law and ignorance of fact. See also Clef des Lois Rom. Fait.

Ignorance of law consists of the want of knowledge of those laws which it is our duty to understand, and which every man is presumed to know.

The principle that ignorance of the law is no defence, ignorantia legis neminem ex- cusat, is generally recognized. It was a maxim of the Roman law, in which this case was put, to illustrate the distinction between ignorance of law and fact:—If the heir is ignorant of the death of his ancestor, he is ignorant of a fact; but if, being aware of his death, and of his own relationship, he is, nevertheless, ignorant that certain rights have thereby become vested in himself, he is ignorant of the law; D. 22. 6. 1. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 632. The English rule is that every man is presumed to know the law, subject to certain qualifications with respect to questions of doubtful construction, practice, and the like; Broom, Leg. Max. 8th Am. ed. 254; 6 Cl. & Fin. 911; 11 Exch. 840. In a later case it was held that the court will only relieve against a payment of money under mistake of law, if there be some equitable ground which renders it inequitable that the party who received the money should retain it; 3 Ch. D. 351. This case is said by Brett to "contain probably the best statement . . . of the principles upon which the courts proceed in relieving or declining to relieve on the ground of mistake of law;" L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 80. The case itself proceeded upon the ground that an erroneous construction of an instrument was a mistake of law, and it was so held in several cases; 4 Ch. D. 389; id. 693; L. R. 14 Eq. 85; 6 H. L. Cas. 798, 811; but for a dictum, contra, see L. R. 6 H. L. 223, 234; and see also 42 Ch. D. 98; [1893] 1 Ch. 101, 111. The same general rule is recognized by American courts, though earlier cases indicate hesitation on the part of the courts before it was definitely settled. It was said in an early case that whether money paid through ignorance of the law can be recovered back, is a question much vexed and involved in no inconsiderable perplexity; 9 Pick. 112; and that when one makes a promise as an "expression of an opinion of what he should be obliged to allow, rather than of what he was willing to allow, and being under a mistake of his right, he is not bound by it;" 1 Binn. 27, 37. But it may be considered as well established that money paid with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances cannot be recovered back upon the ground that the party supposed he was bound in law to pay it, when in truth he was not; 9 Cow. 674, 681; 74 Pa. 371; 90 Ind. 244; 50 Ga. 304 (practically overruling 7 id. 64 and 31 id. 117); 35 N. J. L. 290; 46 Ark. 167; 15 Minn. 35; 46 Mo. 200; 16 Cal. 143; 1 Or. 292; contra, 2 Metcalfe (Ky.); and a person cannot be permitted to disavow or avoid the operation of an agreement entered into with a full knowledge of the facts, on the ground of ignorance of the legal consequences which flow from those facts; 1 Johns. Ch. 512, 516. See 1 Atk. 591; 1 V. & B. 23, 30; 1 Ch. Cas. 84; 2 Vern. 243; 18 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 285; 77 Ga. 340. Ignorance of one's legal right does not take a case out of the rule of equitable estoppel where one encourages a purchaser to take land from one having a color of title when otherwise he would be entitled to interpose an equitable bar to the latter's legal title; 6 id. 166.

It has been said that whatever rule may prevail elsewhere, in the equity courts of the United States, there is no relief from a mistake of law alone; 30 Fed. Rep. 466; 1 Pet. 15; 12 id. 55; 91 U. S. 50, 51; 97 id. 185; 99 id. 46. But there is to be found by careful reading of the Federal cases the same disposition apparent in English cases, to avoid the establishment of an inflexible rule which shall preclude relief if there be any other circumstances or any feature of the case itself to warrant it. In the familiar case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 2 Mas. 244, 8 Wheat. 174, 1 Pet. 1, the United States supreme court said, where an instrument is executed by the parties, which contains a mistake of the draughtsman either of fact or law it may be reformed but not when it was executed in the form agreed upon under a misapprehension of the law as to its nature or effect; that a mistake of law is not a ground for reforming a deed and the exceptions are both few and peculiar, but it was not the intention to lay down a rule that there might not be relief against a plain mistake arising from ignorance of law; and in a later case the court quoted this expression with approval and also the declaration from 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. Redf. ed. § 138 e, that established misapprehension of the law does afford a basis for relief resting on discretion and to be exercised only in flagrant and unquestionable cases; 98 U. S. 85, 91.

In some cases the laches of the other party affects the liability of one who promises under a mistake of law, as, when one, through a mistake of the law, as an endorser of a bill of exchange, acknowledges himself under an obligation which the law will not impose on him, as payment after failure of the holder to give seasonable notice of protest for non-acceptance, he shall not be bound thereby; 7 Mass. 452, 488. See also 12 East 38; 2 J. & W. 263; 3 B. & C. 280; the operation of the rule is adjusted to the equitable conditions existing as between the parties. "If a man has actually paid what the law would not have compelled him to pay, but what in equity and conscience he ought, he cannot recover it back; [1 Wend. 355; 18 Cal. 265; 17 N. H. 573; 50 Me. 130]; but where money is paid under a mistake, which there was no ground to claim in conscience, the party may recover it back;" 1 Term 285; 15 Am. Rep. 171, 184.

The subject may be well summed up by the collation of two or three cases which show the substantial uniformity of the application of the doctrine. "The maxim ignorantia legis neminem excusat is not universally applicable, but only when damages have been inflicted or crimes committed. It is true that the law will not permit the excuse of ignorance of the law to be pleaded for the purpose of exempting persons from damages for breach of contract, or from punishment for crimes committed by them, but on other occasions and for other purposes, it is evident that the fact that such ignorance existed will sometimes be recognized so as to affect a judicial decision; 44 N. J. L. 244; and "there is no maxim which says that for all intents and purposes a person must be taken to know the legal consequences of his acts;" Lush., J., in L. R. 3 Q. B. 639; "it would be too much to impute knowledge of this rule of equity" (the doctrine of election); Westbury, Ld. Ch., in 11 H. L. Cas. 602.

Ignorance was held no defence in the case of a woman convicted of illegal voting, who set up a defence that she believed she had a legal right to vote; 11 Blatch. 200, 374; 57 Barb. 625; so in an indictment for adultery, where defendant erroneously believed she had been legally divorced; 65 Me. 30; so in the conviction of a man for polygamy, who, knowing that his wife was living, married again in Utah, and set up the Mormon doctrine as a defence; 98 U. S. 145. It was held not a defence that the defendant believed that, by reason of the absence of the first wife, the marriage was void and that he was released from it, as that was a mistake of law; 32 Tex. Cr. Rep. 214. A Jew may be indicted under a state law, for working on Sunday; 123 Mass. 40; so where one shoots another through criminal negligence, his ignorance of the law can form no basis for acquittal; 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 13.

An elector's ignorance of a law disqualifying a candidate at an election does not make his vote a nullity; he must have knowledge both of the law and the fact which constitutes the disqualification; 50 N. Y. 463; L. R. 3 Q. B. 629.

Involuntary ignorance is that which does not proceed from choice, and which cannot be overcome by the use of any means of knowledge known to a person and within his power; as, the ignorance of a law which has not yet been promulgated.

Voluntary ignorance exists when a party might, by taking reasonable pains, have acquired the necessary knowledge. For example, every man might acquire a knowledge of the laws which have been promulgated; Doctor & Stud. 1, 46; Plowd. 343.

See, generally, 3 Smith, L. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 1712; Terry, Pr. Ang. Am. L. §§ 252-5; Broom, Leg. Max. 8th Am. ed. 253 (where there will be found a discriminating discussion of the subject); Eden, Inf. 7; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 7, n. v; Bisph. Eq. 187; Merlin, Répert.; Savigny, Droit Rom. App. VIII. 387; 1 Bro. C. C. 92; 14 Johns. 501; 12 Am. L. Rev. 471; 4 So. L. J. N. s. 153; 10 Am. Dec. 323; 37 W. Va. 715; 28 N. J. L. 274; 76 Va. 315; 62 Wis. 332; MISTAKE.

IGNORANTIO ELENCHI. An overlooking of the adversary's counter position in an argument.

IGNORE. To be ignorant of. Webster, Dict. To pass over as if not in existence. A grand jury is said to ignore a bill when they do not find the evidence such as to induce them to make a presentment. Brande.

IKBAL. Acceptance (of a bond, etc.). Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKBAL DAWA. Confession of judgment. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAH. Compulsion; especially constraint exercised by one person over another to do an illegal act, or to act contrary to his inclination. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAR. Agreement, assent, or ratification. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAR NAMA. A deed of assent and acknowledgment. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

ILL. In Old Pleading. Bad; defective in law; null; naught; the opposite of good or valid.

ILL-FAME. A technical expression, which not only means bad character as generally understood, but applies to every person, whatever may be his conduct and character in life, who visits bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, and other places which are of ill-fame. 2 Hill, N. Y. 558; 17 Pick. 80; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 720, 767; 1 Hagg. Cons. 302; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 44.

The common interpretation of the term "house of ill-fame" is as a mere synonym for "bawdy-house," having no reference to the fame of the place. Yet, in evidence, some courts allow proof of the fact to be aided by the fame; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 1088. See DISORDERLY HOUSE; HOUSE OF ILL-FAME.

ILLATA ET INVECTA. Things brought into the house for use by the tenants were so called, and were liable to the jus hypothecæ of Roman law, just as they are to the landlord's right of distress at common law.

ILLEGAL. Contrary to law; unlawful.

ILLEGAL CONDITIONS. All conditions that are impossible, or contrary to law, immoral, or repugnant to the nature of the transaction. See CONDITION.

ILLEGAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

ILLEGAL CONTRACT. See CONSIDERATION; CONTRACT; UNLAWFUL AGREEMENT; VOID; VOIDABLE.

ILLEGAL TRADE. That which is carried on in violation of law, municipal or international. See ILLICIT.

ILLEGALITY. That which is contrary to the principles of law, as contradistinguished from mere rules of procedure. It denotes a complete defect in the proceedings. 2 Tex. App. 74; 1 Abb. Pr. N. s. 432; 2 Halst. 203.

ILLEGITIMACY. The status of a child born of parents not legally married at the time of birth. Moz. & W.

ILLEGITIMATE. That which is contrary to law; it is usually applied to children born out of lawful wedlock. 25 Alb. L. J. 131. See BASTARD.

ILLEVIABLE. A debt or duty that cannot or ought not to be levied. Nihil set upon a debt is a mark for illeviable.

ILLICENCIATUS. In Old English Law. Without license. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 5, 12.

ILLICIT. What is unlawful; what is forbidden by the law.

This word is frequently used in policies of insurance, where the assured warrants against illicit trade. By illicit trade is understood that "which is made unlawful by the laws of the country to which the object is bound." It is distinguished from "contraband trade," though sometimes used interchangeably with it. 1 Pars. Mar. Ins. 614. The assured, having entered into this warranty, is required to do no act which will expose the vessel to be legally condemned; 2 La. 337, 338. See INSURANCE; WARRANTY.

ILLICITE. Unlawfully.

This word has a technical meaning, and is requisite in an indictment where the act charged is unlawful: as, in the case of a riot; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 25, § 96.

ILLICITUM COLLEGIUM. An unlawful corporation.

ILLINOIS. One of the states of the United States, being the twenty-eighth admitted to the Union.

Civil government was organized under the jurisdiction of the United States, by the ordinance of the Continental Congress, in 1787, the present state being then a part of the northwestern territory. In 1800 that territory was divided, and a territorial government was created in the Indiana territory, including this present state. In 1809 the territory of Illinois was created, and continued under the same ordinance and the laws of the Indiana territory. For a fuller statement of the territorial history, see OHIO.

In 1818 Illinois formed a constitution and was admitted into the Union. A second constitution went into operation April 1, 1848; and a third, now the fundamental law of the state, August 8, 1870.

LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is exercised by a senate and house of representatives, which constitute the general assembly.

The senate is composed of fifty-one members elected by the people of the senatorial districts (which are determined by apportionment every ten years beginning with 1871) for the term of four years. The senators at the first session were divided into two classes, so that one class are elected every two years.

The house consists of three times the number of the members of the senate, three representatives being elected in each senatorial district; the term of office two years. Minority representation is adopted in the election of representatives.

The constitution forbids the state or any county, city, town, township, or other municipality ever to become responsible for the liabilities, or extend its credit in aid, of any corporation, association, or individual; § 20, 76 Ill. 433; 82 id. 562; 88 id. 302.

Special or local legislation is substantially prohibited; § 22; 69 Ill. 595; 84 id. 590; 78 id. 385.

EXECUTIVE POWER.—The executive department consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor of public accounts, treasurer, superintendent of public instruction, and attorney-general, each holding office for a term of four years, except the treasurer who holds for two years, and cannot be his own successor; Art. 5, §§ 1-2.

The officers of the executive department have the powers and duties usually incident to their offices respectively; §§ 5-21.

JUDICIAL POWER.—The judiciary system is in the main elective. The judicial powers are vested in one supreme court, appellate courts, circuit courts, county courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, police magistrates, and in certain courts created by law in and for cities and incorporated towns (art. 6, § 1).

The supreme court consists of seven judges, and has original jurisdiction in cases relating to the revenue, in mandamus and habeas corpus and appellate jurisdiction in other cases. One of the judges is chief justice; four constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of four is necessary to every decision; §§ 2-5.

There are four inferior appellate courts called the appellate courts of their respective districts. Each appellate court is held by three judges of the circuit courts, who are assigned by the supreme court. The concurrence of two of the judges is necessary to every decision.

These courts exercise appellate jurisdiction only. They have jurisdiction of appeals and writs of error from the circuit, county, and city courts in law and chancery cases, other than criminal cases above a misdemeanor, and those involving a franchise, or freehold, or the validity of a statute in which cases the appeal is directly to the supreme court. The decisions of these courts are final where the amount involved does not exceed $1,000, unless in the opinion of the majority of the court the principles of law involved are of such importance as to require to be passed upon by the supreme court, in which case the proper certificate is made in that court. The opinions of the appellate courts are not of binding authority in any cause or proceeding other than that in which they may be given; Art. 6, § 11; Laws 1885, 65; Myers, R. S. 399-403.

Circuit Courts.—The state is divided into thirteen circuits, for each of which not exceeding four judges may be elected by the qualified voters of the circuits, to hold office for six years. Circuit courts have original jurisdiction of all causes in law and equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as is provided by law. They hold two or more terms each year in every county. Art. 6, §§ 12-17; Bradwell, Laws 1877, pp. 78-79.

County Courts.—A county court is held in each county, consisting of one judge elected by the people for the term of four years. They are courts of record, and have original jurisdiction in all matters of probate, settlement of estates of deceased persons, appointment of guardians and conservators, and settlement of their accounts, in matters relating to apprentices, and in proceedings for the collection of taxes. They have concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit courts in all that class of cases wherein justices of the peace have jurisdiction where the amount of value involved does not exceed $1000. Art. 6, §§ 18-19; Bradwell's Laws 1877, p. 81; 69 Ill. 641.

City Courts.—City courts may be established in all cities having a population of three thousand and over. They are courts of record, and have concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit courts within the city in which they may be, in all civil cases, and in criminal cases (except treason and murder); also in appeals from justices of the peace in their respective cities. The term of office of the judges is four years. Rev. Stat. 1874, ch. 37, §§ 191-212; Bradwell, Laws 1877, p. 83; Br. Laws 1879, p. 90; 78 Ill. 218. See Laws 1889, p. 104.

Justices of the Peace.—In each township or election precinct may be elected from two to five justices of the peace, whose term of office is four years. They have jurisdiction in their respective counties where the amount claimed does not exceed $200, as provided by statute. Rev. Stat. 1874, ch. 79, §§ 13 and 14; and in criminal cases; Rev. Stat. 1874, ch. 38, §§ 319-371; 69 Ill. 371.

For Cook county, and all counties containing 100,000 population and over, there are special constitutional and statutory provisions concerning the judiciary.

Jurisprudence.—The common law of England, so far as applicable and of a general nature, including the British statutes prior to 4 Jac. I. with a few certain exceptions, and which are of a general nature, is the rule of decision, and of full force until repealed by legislative authority. Rev. Stat. 1874, ch. 28.

ILLITERATE. Unacquainted with letters.

When an ignorant man, unable to read, signs a deed or agreement, or makes his mark instead of a signature, and he alleges and can prove that it was falsely read to him, he is not bound by it, in consequence of the fraud. And the same effect would result if the deed or agreement were falsely read to a blind man who could have read it before he lost his sight, or to a foreigner who did not understand the language. For a plea of "laymen and unlettered," see 4 Rawle 85, 94, 95.

To induce an illiterate man, by false representations and false reading, to sign a note for a greater amount than that agreed on, is indictable as a cheat; 1 Yerg. 76. See, generally, 2 Nel. Abr. 946; 2 Co. 3; 11 id. 28; F. Moore 148; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 156.

ILLNESS. Pregnancy may create an illness within the meaning of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, § 17, so as to give the presiding judge discretionary power to admit in evidence upon a criminal trial the deposition of a witness, duly taken, who, owing to pregnancy is proved to be unable to travel; 3 Q. B. D. 426.

ILLOCABLE. Not capable of being let out or hired.

ILLUD (Lat.). That.

ILLUSION. A term loosely applied to both delusions and hallucinations, but more frequently to the latter (q. v.). By some it is restricted to the perception of objects in characters which they do not possess.

The patient is deceived by the false appearance of things, and his reason is not sufficiently active and powerful to correct the error; and this last particular is what distinguishes the sane from the insane. Illusions are not unfrequent in a state of health, but reason corrects the errors and dissipates them. A square tower seen from a distance may appear round, but on approaching it the error is corrected. A distant mountain may be taken for a cloud, but as we approach we discover the truth. To a person in the cabin of a vessel under sail, the shore appears to move; but reflection and a closer examination soon destroy this illusion. An insane individual is mistaken in the qualities, connections, and causes of the impressions he actually receives, and he forms wrong judgments as to his internal and external sensations; and his reason does not correct the error; 1 Beck. Med. Jur. 538; Tayl. Med. Jur. 683; Esquirol, Maladies Mentales, prém. partie, iii., tome 1, p. 202; Dict. des Sciences Médicales, Hallucination, tome 20, p. 64. See HALLUCINATION.

ILLUSORY APPOINTMENT. Such an appointment or disposition of property under a power as is merely nominal and not substantial.

Illusory appointments are void in equity; Sugd. Pow. 499; 1 Vern. 67; 1 Term 438, note; 4 Ves. 785; 16 id. 26; 1 Taunt 289. The rule at common law was, to require some allotment, however small, to each person, where the power was given to appoint to and among several persons; but the rule in equity requires a real substantial portion to each, a mere nominal allotment being deemed fraudulent and illusive; 4 Kent 342; 5 Fla. 52; 2 Stockt. Ch. 164.

In England equity jurisdiction on this point was ended by the statute 1 Wm. IV. c. 46, which declares that no appointment shall be impeached in equity, on the ground that it was unsubstantial, illusory, or nominal; but the entire exclusion of any object of a power not in terms exclusive was illegal, notwithstanding that act, until 1874. In that year the statute 37 and 38 Vict. c. 37 was passed, providing that, under a power to appoint among certain persons, appointments may be made excluding one or more objects of the power; Moz. & W. Dict.

IMAGINE. In English Law. In cases of treason the law makes it a crime to imagine the death of the king. In order to complete the offence, there must, however, be an overt act,—the terms compassing and imagining being synonymous. It has been justly remarked that the words to compass and imagine are too vague for a statute whose penalty affects the life of a subject. Barrington, Stat. 243. See FICTION.

IMBARGO. Obsolete for embargo (q. v.).

IMBASING OF MONEY. Mixing the species with an alloy below the standard of sterling, which the king by his prerogative may do. Toml.

IMBECILITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A form of mental disease consisting in mental deficiency, either congenital or resulting from an obstacle to the development of the faculties supervening in infancy. Idiocy.

Generally, it is manifested both in the intellectual and moral faculties; but occasionally it is limited to the latter, the former being but little, if at all, below the ordinary standard. Hence it is distinguished into intellectual and moral. In the former there are seldom any of the repulsive features of idiocy, the head, face, limbs, and movements, being scarcely distinguishable, at first sight, from those of the race at large. The senses are not manifestly deficient, nor the power of articulation; though the use of language may be very limited. The perceptive faculties exhibit some activity; and thus the more obvious qualities of things are observed and remembered. Simple industrial operations are well performed, and, generally, whatever requires but little intelligence is readily accomplished. Occasionally a solitary faculty is prominently, even wonderfully, developed,—the person excelling, for instance, in music, in arithmetical calculations, or mechanical skill, far beyond the ordinary measure. For any process of reasoning, or any general observation or abstract ideas, imbeciles are totally incompetent. Of law, justice, morality, property, they have but a very imperfect notion. Some of the affective faculties are usually active, particularly those which lead to evil habits, thieving, incendiarism, drunkenness, homicide, assaults on women.

The kind of mental defect here mentioned is universal in imbecility, but it exists in different degrees in different individuals, some being hardly distinguishable, at first sight, from ordinary men of feeble endowments, while others encroach upon the line which separates them from idiocy; Tayl. Jur. 689.

The various grades of imbecility, however interesting in a philosophical point of view, are not very closely considered by courts. They are governed in criminal cases solely by their tests of responsibility, and in civil cases by the amount of capacity in connection with the act in question, or the abstract question of soundness or unsoundness.

Touching the question of responsibility, the law makes no distinction between imbecility and insanity. See 1 C. & K. 129.

In civil cases, the effect of imbecility is differently estimated. In cases involving the validity of the contracts of imbecile persons, courts have declined to gauge the measure of their intellects, the only question with them being one of soundness or unsoundness, and "no distinction being made between important and common affairs, large or small property;" 4 Dane, Abr. 561. See 4 Cow. 207. Courts of equity, also, have declined to invalidate the contracts of imbeciles, except on the ground of fraud; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 238. Of late years, however, courts have been governed by other considerations. If the contract were for necessities, or showed no mark of fraud or unfair advantage, or if the other party, acting in good faith and ignorant of the other's mental infirmity, cannot be put in statu quo, the contract has been held to be valid; Chitty, Contr. 112; Story, Contr. § 27; Poll. Contr. 88; 4 Exch. 17.

The same principles have governed the courts in cases involving the validity of the marriage contract. If suitable to the condition and circumstances of the party, and manifestly tending to his benefit, it has been confirmed, notwithstanding a considerable degree of incompetency. If, on the other hand, it has been procured by improper influences, manifestly for the advantage of the other party, it has been invalidated; 1 Hagg. 355; Ray, Med. Jur. 100. The law has always showed more favor to the wills of imbeciles than to their contracts. "If a man be of a mean understanding, neither of the wise sort nor of the foolish, but indifferent, as it were, betwixt a wise man and a fool,—yea, though he rather inclined to the foolish sort, so that for his dull capacity he might worthily be called grossum caput, a dull pate, or a dunce,—such a one is not prohibited to make a testament;" Swinb. Wills, part 2, s. 4. Whether the testament be established or not, depends upon the circumstances of the case; and the English ecclesiastical courts have always assumed a great deal of liberty in their construction of these circumstances. The general principle is that if the will exhibits a wise and prudent disposition of property, and is unquestionably the will of the testator, and not another's, it should be established, in the face of no inconsiderable deficiency; 1 Hagg. 384. Very different views prevailed in a celebrated case in New York; Stewart v. Lispenard, 26 Wend. 256. The mental capacity must be equal to the act; and if that fact be established, and no unfair advantage have been taken of the mental deficiency, the will, the marriage, the contract, or whatever it may be, is held to be valid.

The term moral imbecility is applied to a class of persons who, without any considerable, or even appreciable, deficiency of intellect, seem to have never been endowed with the higher moral sentiments. They are unable to appreciate fully the distinctions of right and wrong, and, according to their several opportunities and tastes, they indulge in mischief as if by an instinct of their nature. To vice and crime they have an irresistible proclivity, though able to discourse on the beauties of virtue and the claims of moral obligation. While young, many of them manifest a cruel and quarrelsome disposition, which leads them to torture brutes and bully their companions. They set all law and admonition at defiance, and become a pest and a terror to the neighborhood. It is worthy of notice, because the fact throws much light on the nature of this condition, that a very large proportion of this class of persons labor under some organic defect. They are scrofulous, rickety, or epileptic, or, if not obviously suffering from these diseases themselves, they are born of parents who did. Their progenitors may have been insane, or eccentric, or highly nervous, and this morbid peculiarity has become, unquestionably, by hereditary transmission, the efficient cause of the moral defect under consideration. Thus lamentably constituted, wanting in one of the essential elements of moral responsibility, they are certainly not fit objects of punishment; for though they may recognize the distinctions of right and wrong in the abstract, yet they have been denied by nature those facilities which prompt men more happily endowed to pursue the one and avoid the other. In practice, however, they have been regarded with no favor by the courts; Ray, Med. Jur. 112. See INSANITY; DEMENTIA.

IMBLADARE. To plant or sow grain. Bract. fol. 176 b.

IMBRACERY. See EMBRACERY.

IMBROCUS. A gutter; a brook; a water passage. Cowel.

IMMATERIAL. Unnecessary or non-essential; impertinent (q.v.); indecisive.

IMMATERIAL AVERMENT. In Pleading. A statement of unnecessary particulars in connection with, and as descriptive of, what is material. Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 186. Such averments must, however, be proved as laid, it is said; Dougl. 665; though not if they may be struck out without striking out at the same time the cause of action, and when there is no variance; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 188. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 282.

IMMATERIAL ISSUE. In Pleading. An issue taken upon some collateral matter, the decision of which will not settle the question in dispute between the parties in action. For example, if, in an action of debt on bond, conditioned for the payment of ten dollars and fifty cents at a certain day, the defendant pleads the payment of ten dollars according to the form of the condition, and the plaintiff, instead of demurring, tenders issue upon the payment, it is manifest that, whether this issue be found for the plaintiff or the defendant, it will remain equally uncertain whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his action, or not; for, in an action for the penalty of a bond, conditioned to pay a certain sum, the only material question is whether the exact sum were paid or not, and the question of payment of a part is a question quite beside the legal merits; Hob. 113; 5 Taunt. 386; Cro. Jac. 585; 2 Wms. Saund. 319 b. A repleader will be ordered when an immaterial issue is reached, either before or after verdict; 2 Wms. Saund. 319 b, note; 1 Rolle, Abr. 86; Cro. Jac. 585. See REPLEADER.

IMMEDIATE. As to time. Present; without delay or postponement. Strictly it implies not deferred by any lapse of time, but as usually employed, it is rather within reasonable time having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the case. This word and immediately (q. v.) are of no very definite signification and are much subject to the context. In legal proceedings they do not impart the exclusion of any interval of time; 31 N. J. L. 313. As to immediate delivery. see 36 N. J. L. 148. "Immediate" notice may be construed as meaning "reasonable notice;" 27 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 436. See 7 Cent. L. J. 15, 73.

As to place, etc. Not separated by any intervening space, cause, right, object, or relation. See 2 Lev. 77; 7 Mann. & G. 493; 20 Pa. 198; 43 Wis. 316, 479; IMMEDIATELY; FORTHWITH.

As to descent. Judge Story says it may be mediate or immediate with respect to the estate or right, or with respect to the pedigree or degrees of consanguinity; 6 Pet. 112.

IMMEDIATELY. The words "forthwith" and "immediately" have the same meaning. They are stronger than the expression "within a reasonable time," and imply prompt, vigorous action, without any delay, and whether there has been such action is a question of fact, having regard to the circumstances of the particular case; 4 Q. B. Div. 471. See 4 Yo. & Colly. Ch. 511; 8 M. & W. 281.

IMMEMORIAL POSSESSION. In Louisiana. Possession of which no man living has seen the beginning, and the existence of which he has learned from his elders. 2 Mart. La. 214; 7 La. 46; 3 Toul. p. 410; Poth. Contr. de Société, n. 244.

IMMEMORIAL USAGE. Prescription; custom which has existed so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

IMMEUBLES. In French Law. Immovables. They derive their character as such (1) from their own nature as lands, etc.; (2) from their destination, as animals or implements furnished to a tenant by his landlord; and (3) by the object to which they are annexed.

IMMIGRATION. The removing into one place from another. It differs from emigration, which is the moving from one place into another.

By an act of congress, passed August 3, 1882, it was provided that there should be collected "a duty of fifty cents for each and every passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who shall come by steam or sail vessel from a foreign port to any port within the United States . . . The money thus collected shall be paid into the United States treasury, and shall constitute a fund to be called the immigrant fund, and shall be used, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, to defray the expense of regulating immigration under this act and for the care of immigrants arriving in the United States." This has been termed the head-money tax. This act of congress is similar in its essential features to statutes enacted by many states of the Union for the protection of their own citizens, and for the good of the immigrants who land at seaports within their borders. A statute of New York, covering this ground was, however, held void as infringing upon the ground of national legislation; 92 U. S. 259, 273, and 107 id. 59. The question arose under the act of congress in the supreme court of the United States in what were called the head-money cases; 112 id. 580; and that act was held valid. See POLICE POWER.

The immigration of the Chinese has been and continues to be the subject of important legislation. The act of congress of March 3, 1875, Rev. Stat. §§ 2158-2164, prohibits any vessels being built or registered in the United States for the purpose of procuring from any port the subjects of China, Japan, or any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported to any foreign place, to be disposed of or sold as servants or apprentices; § 2158. Vessels so employed shall be forfeited; § 2159. Building, fitting out, or otherwise preparing or navigating vessels for such trade, is punishable by fine and imprisonment; §§ 2160, 2161. But this act does not interfere with voluntary immigration; § 2162; and no tax shall be enforced by any state, upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country, which is not equally imposed upon every person immigrating thereto, from any other foreign country; § 2164. The immigration of convicts and women for purposes of prostitution is also prohibited; Supplement to Rev. Stat. p. 181, §§ 3 & 5; 18 Stat. L. 477; 53 Fed. Rep. 1001; also alien laborers; 23 Stat. L. 332; and also all Chinese laborers, whether under contract or not; 25 Stat. L. 476, 504.

The act which provides for the exclusion from admission of certain classes of aliens, and which makes the decision of the inspectors of immigration adverse to the right of any alien to land, final and conclusive unless appeal is taken to the superintendent of immigration, is a constitutional exercise of the power of congress; 142 U. S. 651.

The government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory, although no actual hostilities exist with the nation of which the aliens are subjects; 130 U. S. 581. See ALIEN; CHINESE; DEPORTATION.

IMMISCERE (Lat.). In Civil Law. To put or let into, as a beam into a wall. Calv. Lex.

In Old English Law. To turn cattle out on a common. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 20, § 7.

IMMOBILIS (Lat.). Immovable. Immobilia, or res immobiles, immovables (q. v.).

IMMORAL CONSIDERATION. One contrary to good morals, and therefore invalid. Contracts based upon an immoral consideration are generally void; Poll. Con. 286. An agreement in consideration of future illicit cohabitation between the parties; 3 Burr. 1568; 1 Esp. 13; 1 B. & P. 340 & 341; an agreement for the value of libelous and immoral pictures, 4 Esp. 97, or for printing a libel, 2 Stark. 107, or for an immoral wager, Chitty, Contr. 156; cannot, therefore, be enforced. For whatever arises from an immoral or illegal consideration is void; quid turpi ex causa promissum est non valet; Inst. 3. 20. 24.

It is a general rule that whenever an agreement appears to be illegal, immoral, or against public policy, a court of justice leaves the parties where it finds them; when the agreement has been executed, the court will not rescind it; when executory, the court will not help the execution; 4 Ohio 419; 4 Johns. 419; 11 id. 388; 12 id. 306; 19 id. 341; 3 Cow. 213; 2 Wils. 341. See CONSIDERATION.

IMMORALITY. That which is contra bonos mores.

In England, it is not punishable, in some cases, at the common law, on account of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions; e. g. adultery. But except in cases belonging to the ecclesiastical courts, the court of king's bench is the custos morum, and may punish delicta contra bonos mores; 3 Burr. 1438; 1 W. Blackst. 94; 2 Stra. 788.

IMMOVABLES. In Civil Law. Property which, from its nature, destination, or the object to which it is applied, cannot move itself or be removed. Pothier, des Choses, § 1; Clef des Lois Rom. Immeubles.

IMMUNITY. An exemption from serving in an office, or performing duties which the law generally requires other citizens to perform. See Dig. lib. 50. t. 6; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 821; 4 H. & M'H. 341.

IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. By Article First, Section 10, Clause 1, of the Constitution of the United States "No state shall pass . . . any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

There has been much discussion as to the reasons which led the Convention of 1787 to insert this clause in the constitution. They seem to have intended that it should prevent the states from passing stay laws and bankrupt laws (Bradley, J., 99 U. S. 745), and other acts which would interfere with private contracts or engagements previously formed. Stay laws to prevent the collection of debts had been passed in many of the states, especially in the South. In the Dartmouth College case, 4 Wheat. 518,

Chief Justice Marshall said that he thought it more than possible that the convention had not intended by the clause to preserve the integrity of the charters of corporations. But in Pennsylvania the legislature had revoked the charter of the College of Philadelphia and virtually confiscated its property by taking it away from its trustees and giving it to another set of trustees who were of the political party which controlled the legislature. The same legislature had annulled the charter of the Bank of North America to which it was hostile, and would have succeeded in wrecking it, if the bank had not had another charter from congress, and soon after obtained one from the state of Delaware. These acts of spoliation alarmed all men of property, and James Wilson, a Pennsylvania member of the convention, who had been interested in both the bank and the college, was most active in procuring the adoption of the clause. Fisher's "Pennsylvania: Colony and Commonwealth" 375, 383; Fisher's "Evolution of the Constitution" 262; Shirley's "Dartmouth College Case" 213, 220; Alfred Russell's Address before Grafton and Coos Bar Association of New Hampshire, 1895 (reprinted Am. Law Rev. vol. 30, p. 321).

This article of the constitution forbids only the states to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and there is no express provision prohibiting congress from passing such laws. It would seem, moreover, as some have argued, that there is an implied power in congress to pass such laws, for we find in the constitution a number of general prohibitions in which both congress and the states are prohibited from passing bills of attainder and ex post facto laws; 1 Pet. 22. The omission of the prohibition in one case and the expression of it in the other might seem to imply that the power to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts remained in congress; and congress is expressly given power to pass bankrupt laws which impair the obligation of contracts between debtors and creditors; 4 Wheat. 122; and, under the decisions of the supreme court, congress may issue notes as legal tender in satisfaction of antecedently contracted debts. But the general exercise of such a power by congress has been said to be contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation; Federalist No. 44. Bradley, J., in a dissenting opinion in the Sinking-Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 746, took the same view of the origin of this provision, and said further that it fully explained the fact that no such inhibition was laid upon the national legislature, and he was further of opinion that the absence of such inhibition furnished no ground of argument in favor of the proposition that congress can pass arbitrary and despotic laws with regard to contracts any more than with regard to any other subject-matter of legislation.

The provision of the constitution is, however, not applicable to laws enacted by the states before the first Wednesday in March, 1789; 5 Wheat. 420.

All contracts, whether executed or executory, express or implied, are within the prohibition; 6 Cranch 135; 7 id. 164; 8 Wheat. 1; 109 U. S. 285; 15 Wall. 300; 116 U. S. 131; and also judgments founded upon contracts; 103 U. S. 358; 105 id. 228, 733. A state law annulling private conveyances is also within the prohibition, as are laws repealing grants and corporate franchises; 3 Hill, N. Y. 531; 1 Pick. 224; 2 Yerg. 534; 13 Miss. 112; 9 C. R. A. 43, 292; 2 Pet. 657; 4 Wheat. 656; 6 How. 301.

A state constitution is not a contract, the obligation of which the state is prohibited by the federal constitution from impairing; 121 U. S. 282; nor is a judgment for a tort; 109 U. S. 285; 131 U. S. 405. But the prohibition applies to state constitutions as well as to the laws of a state; 10 Wall. 511; 115 U. S. 650; 116 id. 631; and to a decision of a state court altering a former construction of a law, subsequently to which construction the contract was made. The prohibition does not apply to judicial decisions or the acts of state tribunals or officers under statutes in force at the time of making the contract; 163 U. S. 273; citing 121 id. 358; 150 id. 18; 159 id. 103. "The sound and the true rule is that, if the contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all the departments of its government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature of the state, or decision of its courts, altering the construction of the law." Taney, C. J., in 16 How. 432; approved in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175. See, also, id. 678; 101 U. S. 677; 105 id. 728.

The judgment of a state court declaring a contract invalid does not impair the obligation of the contract, unless such judgment gives effect to some provision of the state constitution, or some act which is claimed by the unsuccessful party to impair the obligation of the contract in question; 121 U. S. 388. In such cases, the supreme court of the United States does not accept as conclusive the judgment of the state court as to the non-impairment of the contract; 101 U. S. 791; 109 id. 244.

An act may regulate or limit existing remedies on a contract, provided it leaves a substantial remedy in force; for instance, by providing that service of process may be made on any officer or agent of a corporation; 95 U. S. 168; an act may abolish imprisonment for debt as a remedy for breach of contract; 103 U. S. 714; may invalidate technically defective mortgages; 108 U. S. 477; and conveyances by femes covert; 23 Wall. 137; grant new trials; 11 How. 202; repeal usury laws, though if not repealed they would have rendered a contract void; 108 U. S. 143; may reduce the period of limitation for bringing suits if it leaves a reasonable period for suits for breaches of existing contracts; 104 U. S. 660; require the recording of existing mortgages, if it allow a reasonable time before the act takes effect; 108 U. S. 514; may provide for the reorganization of an insolvent corporation, and that creditors who have notice and do not dissent, shall be bound thereby; 109 U. S. 401.

An act is invalid which, after a contract is made, changes the measure of damages to be recovered for a breach; 115 U. S. 566; also, which imposes as a condition precedent to enforcing a right that the plaintiff shall prove that he never aided the rebellion against the United States; 16 Wall. 234. So is an act which, after a judgment has been enrolled, materially increases the debtor's exemption; 15 Wall. 610; and an act which, after the execution of a mortgage, increases the period of redemption after foreclosure; 24 How. 461; and an act which forbids a sale on the foreclosure of a mortgage at which less than two-thirds of the appraised value of the mortgage premises is realized; 1 How. 311.

The law, as declared by a decision of the supreme court, when not a construction of a statute, does not enter into contracts made thereafter, and the subsequent reversal of the decision does not, therefore, impair the obligation of contracts; 121 U. S. 388; 159 id. 103. See 2 Hare, Am. Const. L. 726.

Contracts to which a state is a party are within the protection of this constitutional prohibition; 6 Cra. 87; and a provision in a charter of a toll bridge company that it shall not be lawful for any person to erect another bridge within a specified distance of the bridge authorized by said charter constitutes a contract which binds the state not to authorize the construction of such other bridge; 3 Wall. 51. A contract between a state and a party, whereby he is to perform certain duties for a specified period for a stipulated compensation, is within the protection of the constitution; 103 U. S. 5. It being held that where a state descends from the plane of its sovereignty, it is regarded, pro hac vice, as a private person itself and is bound accordingly.

A state is bound by its grants of franchises and exclusive privileges, such as the privilege of supplying a municipality with water; 115 U. S. 674; or gas; id. 650, 683. A state is bound by the issue of bonds and coupons under the terms of an act which provided that such coupons should be receivable for taxes, etc., and a subsequent act which forbids the receipt of these coupons for taxes is a violation of the contract and void as against coupon-holders; 114 U. S. 270; 116 id. 572; 121 id. 105.

A state, when it borrows money and promises to pay it with interest, cannot, by its own ordinance, relieve itself from performing to the letter all that it has expressly promised to its creditors; 96 U. S. 433. But with regard to grants, this clause of the constitution was not intended to control the exercise of the ordinary functions of government. It was not intended to apply to public property, to the discharge of public duties, to the exercise or possession of public rights, or to any changes or qualifications in these which the legislature of a state may at any time deem expedient; 1 Ohio St. 603, 609, 657; 5 Me. 339; 13 Ill. 27; 13 Ired. 175; 1 Green, N. J. 553; 1 Dougl. Mich. 225; 17 Conn. 79; 6 S. & R. 322; 13 Pa. 133; 1 H. & J. 236; 6 How. 548; 1 Sumn. 277. See 4 Wheat. 427; 19 Pa. 258; 4 N. Y. 419; 3 How. 133.

One of the first applications of the doctrine of the impairment of contracts was to the charter of a corporation in the Dartmouth College case; 4 Wheat. 518; which held that the charter was a contract the obligation of which could not afterwards be impaired by the legislature without the corporation's consent. Since then charters of incorporation which are granted for the private benefit or purposes of the corporation have always been held to be contracts between the legislature and the corporation, having for their consideration or liability the duties which the corporation assumes by accepting them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 279; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 1044; Hare, Am. Const. L. 421, 527; 146 U. S. 258. To guard against the danger which the growth of great corporations, under the protection of this principle, has developed, the new constitutions of many of the states forbid the granting of corporate powers except subject to amendment and repeal. Provisions of this sort have become so general that the effect of the doctrine that a state cannot pass an act impairing the obligation of a contract has been largely modified. The decisions of the supreme court of the United States have also worked further modifications. The first was in the famous Charles River Bridge case in 1837, 11 Pet. 420, where the court held that when the legislature had chartered a bridge company with the right to take tolls there was no implied contract that they would not charter another company to build a bridge alongside of the first which would in effect destroy the profits of the first by competition. The next modification was in the Granger cases in 1876; 94 U. S. 113 to 187; which held that the regulation by the legislature of the rates to be charged by railroads and elevators was not an impairment of the obligation of a contract. See also 143 U. S. 339. This doctrine having been carried to great lengths in allowing the legislature to regulate the rates to be charged, the supreme court has now modified the doctrine by declaring that the power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and that a legislature, under the pretence of regulating fares and freights, cannot require a railroad to carry persons and property without profit; 164 U. S. 578, 593.

On the general subject of the power of the legislature under its right reserved to alter, amend, and repeal, see 109 Mass. 103; 63 Me. 569; 41 Ia. 297; 9 R. I. 194; Cooley, Const. Lim. 279, note; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 1093; 146 U. S. 258; 138 id. 287.

In general, only contracts are embraced in this provision which respect property or some object of value and confer rights which can be asserted in a court of justice. Debts are not property. A non-resident creditor of a state cannot be said to be, by virtue of a debt which it owes him, a holder of property within its limits; 96 U. S. 432.

The following acts have been held void as impairing the obligation of a contract: The Insolvent Act of 1812 of Pennsylvania, so far as it attempted to discharge the contract; 6 Wheat. 131; the Insolvent Law of Indiana affecting debts to citizens of other states; 5 How. 295; the Act of Maryland of 1841 taxing stockholders in banks impaired the obligation in the Act of 1821 organizing banks; 3 How. 133; the Act of Ohio of 1851, taxing the state bank; 16 How. 369; General Tax Law of North Carolina as applied to a railroad whose charter exempted it from taxation; 13 Wall. 264; the same in South Carolina; 16 Wall. 244; the same in New Jersey; 95 U. S. 104; the same in Illinois as applied to the charter of a university; 99 U. S. 309; the same in Louisiana applied to the charter of an asylum; 105 U. S. 362; the Act of Illinois of 1841 restricting mortgage sales impaired the obligation of a mortgage contract; 1 How. 311; the Acts of Arkansas withholding assets of state banks from creditors impaired contracts with creditors; 15 How. 304; the Act of New York of 1855 authorizing a bridge to be built impaired the obligation in a charter to another company; 3 Wall. 51; the Act of Georgia of 1868 exempting property from execution impaired the obligation of a prior judgment; 13 Wall. 646; the same in Georgia; 15 Wall. 610; the same in North Carolina; 96 U. S. 595; the Act of Virginia of 1876 as to the deduction of taxes from coupons on state bonds impaired the obligation to the state bondholders under the Funding Act of 1871; 102 U. S. 672; the Ordinance of New Orleans of 1881 authorizing a light company to furnish New Orleans with gas impaired the obligation to another company under another act; 115 U. S. 550; so in Kentucky; 115 U. S. 683.

Grants of exclusive privileges by state governments are subject to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the state. The legislature has full authority to exercise an unlimited power as to the management, employment, and use of the eminent domain of the state, and to make all provisions necessary to the exercise of this right or power, but no authority whatever to give it away or take it out of the people directly or indirectly; 6 How. 532; 20 Johns. 75; 17 Conn. 61; 23 Pick. 360; 15 Vt. 745; 8 N. H. 398; 8 Dana 289; 9 Ga. 517; 84 Va. 271. See EMINENT DOMAIN; FRANCHISES.

The power of one legislature to exempt altogether from taxation certain lands or property, and in this way to bind subsequent legislatures and take from the people one of their sovereign rights, may, where a consideration has been given, be considered now as distinctly settled by the supreme court of the United States, though not without remonstrance on the part of state courts; and the abandonment of this taxing power is not to be presumed where the deliberate purpose of the state does not appear: 4 Pet. 514; 3 How. 133; 4 Mass. 305; 2 Hill, N. Y. 353; 10 N. H. 138; 5 Gill 231; 13 Vt. 525; 30 Pa. 442; 1 Ohio St. 563, 591, 603; 7 Cra. 164; 10 Conn. 495; 8 Wall. 430; 20 id. 36. See 143 U. S. 192; 143 id. 1; 37 Fed. Rep. 24; 86 Tenn. 614. The grant of the power of taxation by the legislature to a municipal corporation is not a contract, but is subject to revocation, modification, and control by the legislature; 139 U. S. 189.

In relation to marriage and divorce, it is now settled that this clause does not operate. The obligation of the marriage contract is created by the public law, subject to the public will, and to that of the parties: 7 Dana 181; 125 U. S. 190; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 9. The prevailing doctrine seems to be that the legislature has complete control of the subject of granting divorces, unless restrained by the constitution of the state; but in a majority of the states the constitutions contain this prohibition: Cooley, Const. Lim. 133; and there the jurisdiction in matters of divorce is confined exclusively to the judicial tribunals, under the limitations prescribed by law: 2 Kent 106. But where the legislature has power to act, its reasons cannot be inquired into; marriage is not a contract but a status; the parties cannot have vested rights of property in a domestic relation; therefore the legislative act does not come under condemnation as depriving parties of rights contrary to the law of the land; 8 Conn. 541; Cooley, Const. Lim. 112.

In relation to bankruptcy and insolvency, the constitution, art. 1, § 8, cl. 4, gives to congress the power of making a bankrupt law. But it seems to be settled that this power is not exclusive; because the several states may also make distinct bankrupt laws,—though they have generally been called insolvency laws,—which will only be superseded when congress chooses to exercise its power by passing a bankruptcy law; 4 Wheat. 122; 12 id. 213; 13 Mass. 1. See 3 Wash. C. C. 313; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 59.

Exemption from arrest affects only the remedy, an exemption from attachment of the property, or a subjection of it to a stay law or appraisement law, impairs the obligation of the contract. Such a statute can only be enforced as to contracts made subsequently to the law; 1 How. 311; 8 Wheat. 1, 75; see 9 Pet. 359; 4 Wall. 535; 96 U. S. 69; but a law abolishing distress for rent has been held to be applicable to cases in force at its passage; 14 N. Y. 22. With regard to exemption from arrest the supreme court holds that in modes of proceeding and forms to enforce the contract the legislature has the control, and may enlarge, limit, or alter them, provided it does not deny a remedy, or so embarrass it with conditions or restrictions as seriously to impair the value of the right; 103 U. S. 720. See 135 U. S. 662. Whatever belongs, merely, to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of a contract; 134 U. S. 515.

It is admitted that a state may make partial exemptions of property, as of furniture, food, apparel, or even a homestead; 1 Denio 128; 1 N. Y. 129; 2 Dougl. Mich. 38; 4 W. & S. 218; 17 Miss. 310. A homestead exemption may be made applicable to previously existing contracts; 66 N. C. 164; contra, 22 Gratt. 266; 6 Baxt. 225. But a law preventing all legal remedy upon a contract would be void; 13 Wall. 662; 1 S. C. n. s. 63; 15 Wall. 610. An act providing that dower or right of dower shall not be subject to seizure or execution for the husband's debts during his lifetime, cannot affect the rights of creditors whose claims arose before the passage of the act; 109 N. C. 685. See 101 id. 382.

Nothing in the constitution prevents a state from passing a valid statute to divest rights which have been vested by law in an individual, provided it does not impair the obligation of a contract; 3 Dall. 386; 2 Pet. 412; 8 id. 89; 5 Barb. 48; 9 Gill 299; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 66. See 54 Fed. Rep. 660; 129 U. S. 36; 134 id. 296. This inhibition in the constitution is wholly prospective, and the states may legislate as to contracts thereafter made as they see fit; 96 U. S. 603; 128 U. S. 489; 121 id. 388; 145 id. 454.

Insolvent laws are valid which are in the nature of a cessio bonorum, leaving the debt still existing, or which provide for the discharge of the debt, but refer only to subsequent contracts, or which merely modify or affect the remedy, as by exempting the person from arrest, but still leave means of enforcing. But a law exempting the person from arrest and the goods from attachment on mesne process or execution would be void, as against the constitution of the United States; 6 How. 328; 16 Johns. 233; 6 Pick. 440; 9 Conn. 314; 1 Ohio 236; 9 Barb. 382; 4 Gilm. 221; 13 B. Monr. 285; the right of antecedent creditors are protected by the constitution; 129 U. S. 36. The state insolvent laws in practice operate in favor of the citizens of the particular state only, as to other citizens of the same state, and not against citizens of other states, unless they have assented to the relief or discharge of the debtor expressly, or by some equivalent act, as by becoming a party to the process against him under the law, taking a dividend, and the like; 1 Gall. 371; 3 Mas. 88; 5 Mass. 509; 13 id. 18, 19; 2 Blackf. 366; 3 Pet. 41; but the mere circumstance that the contract is made payable in the state where the insolvent law exists will not render such contract subject to be discharged under the law; 1 Wall. 223, 234; 4 id. 409.

Some states refuse to aid a citizen of another state in enforcing a debt against a citizen of their own state, when the debt was discharged by their insolvent law. In such cases the creditor must resort to the court of the United States within the state;

1 Gall. 168; 8 Pick. 194; 2 Blackf. 394; Baldw. 296; 9 N. H. 478. See INSOLVENT LAWS.

A statute of limitation does not impair the obligation of a contract, or deprive one of property without due process of law, unless, in its application to an existing right of action, it unreasonably limits the opportunity to enforce that right by suit; 137 U. S. 245; 137 id. 258, note; 135 id. 662.

The law of place acts upon a contract, and governs its construction, validity, and obligation, but constitutes no part of it. The law explains the stipulations of parties, but never supersedes or varies them.

This is very different from supposing that every law is applicable to the subject-matter, as statutes of limitation and insolvency, or enters into and becomes a part of the contract. This can neither be drawn from the terms of the contract, nor presumed to be contemplated by the parties.

There is a broad distinction taken as to the obligation of a contract and the remedy upon it. The abolition of all remedies by a law operating in presenti is, of course, an impairing of the obligation of the contract. But it is admitted that the legislature may vary the nature and extent of remedies, as well as the times and modes in which these remedies may be pursued, and barsuits not brought within such times as may be prescribed. A reasonable time within which rights are to be enforced must be given by laws which bar certain suits; 3 Pet. 290; 1 How. 311; 2 Gall. 141; 8 Mass. 430; 1 Blackf. 33; 14 Me. 344; 7 Ga. 163; 21 Miss. 335; 1 Hill, S. C. 328; 7 B. Monr. 163; 9 Barb. 489.

The meaning of obligation is important with regard to the distinction taken between the laws existing at the time the contract is entered into and those which are enacted afterwards. The former are said to have been in contemplation of the parties, and so far entered into their contract. The latter are said to impair, provided they affect the contract at all. See cases supra.

The weight of authority is that this clause of the constitution, like that which relates to the regulation of commerce by the congress of the United States, does not limit the power of a state to enact general police regulations for the preservation of public health and morals; 8 How. 163; 1 Ohio St. 15; 12 Pick. 194; 7 Cow. 349, 585; 27 Vt. 149; 17 Colo. 376. See 8 Mo. 607, 697; 3 Harr. Del. 442; 5 How. 504; 7 id. 283; 11 Pet. 102. See, generally, Story, Const. § 1368; Sergeant, Const. Law 356; Hare, Am. Const. L. 768; Rawle, Const.; Dane, Abr. IMPALARE. To impound. Du Cange.

IMPANEL. In Practice. To write the names of jurors on a panel (q. v.), which is a schedule or list, in England of parchment: this is done by the sheriff, or other officer lawfully authorized.

In American practice, the word is used of a jury drawn for trial of a particular cause by the clerk, as well as of the general list of jurors returned by the sheriff. Grah. Pr. 275. See 1 Archb. Pr. 365; 3 Bla. Com. 354; 7 How. Pr. 441. Strictly speaking and at common law, juries are impanelled when the jurymen are selected and ready to be sworn; 55 Fed. Rep. 928.

IMPARGANCUTUM. The right to impound cattle.

IMPARLANCE (from Fr. parler, to speak).

In Pleading and Practice. Time given by the court to either party to answer the pleading of his opponent: as, either to plead, reply, rejoin, etc.

It is said to be nothing else but the continuance of the cause till a further day; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (C). In this sense imparlances are no longer allowed in English practice; 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 700; Andr. Steph. Pl. 162.

Time to plead. This is the common signification of the word; 2 Wms. Saund. 1, n. 2; 2 Show. 310; Barnes 346; Laws, Civ. Pl. 93. In this sense imparlances are not recognized in American law, the common practice being for the defendant to enter an appearance, when the cause stands continued, until a fixed time has elapsed within which he may file his plea. In the act of congress of May 19, 1828, § 2, the word imparlance was originally used for "stay of execution," but the latter phrase has been substituted for it; Rev. Stat. § 988. See CONTINUANCE.

A general imparlance is the entry of a general prayer and allowance of time to plead till the next term, without reserving to the defendant the benefit of any exception; so that after such an imparlance the defendant cannot object to the jurisdiction of the court, or plead any matter in abatement. This kind of imparlance is always from one term to another.

A general special imparlance contains a saving of all exceptions whatsoever, so that the defendant after this may plead not only in abatement, but he may also plead a plea which affects the jurisdiction of the court, as privilege. He cannot, however, plead a tender, and that he was always ready to pay, because by craving time he admits that he is not ready, and so falsifies his plea; Tidd, Pr. 418.

A special imparlance reserves to the defendant all exception to the writ, bill, or count; and therefore after it the defendant may plead in abatement, though not to the jurisdiction of the court.

See Comyns, Dig. Abatement (I) 19, 20, 21, Pleader (D); 1 Chitty, Pl. 420; 1 Sell. Pr. 265; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (C).

IMPARSONEE. A clergyman who by induction (q. r.) is in possession of a benefice. He is then termed persona imparsonata—a parson imparsoned. 1 Bla. Com. 391; Co. Litt. 300.

IMPARTIALLY. See FAITHFULLY.

IMPEACHMENT. A written accusation usually by the house of representatives of a state or of the United States to the senate of the state or of the United States against an officer.

The constitution declares that the house of representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment: art. 1, s. 2, cl. 5; and that the senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments: art. 1, s. 3, cl. 6.

The persons liable to impeachment are the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the United States; art. 2, s. 4. A question arose upon an impeachment before the senate, in 1799, whether a senator was a civil officer of the United States within the purview of this section of the constitution; and it was decided by the senate, by a vote of fourteen against eleven, that he was not; Senate Jour. Jan. 10, 1799; Story, Const. § 791; Rawle, Const. 213; Von Holst Con. Hist. 160. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

The offences for which a guilty officer may be impeached are treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; art. 2, s. 4. The constitution defines the crime of treason; art. 3, s. 3. Recourse must be had to the common law for a definition of bribery. Not having particularly mentioned what is to be understood by "other high crimes and misdemeanors," resort, it is presumed, must be had to parliamentary practice and the common law in order to ascertain what they are; Story, Const. § 795. It is said that impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the constitution or the laws which is deserving of punishment in this manner or is of such a character as to render the officer unfit to hold his office. It is primarily directed against official misconduct, and is not restricted to political crimes alone. The decision rests really with the senate; Black, Const. L. 121. The guilt of the accused must be established beyond a reasonable doubt; 37 Neb. 96.

The mode of proceeding in the institution and trial of impeachments is as follows: When a person who may be legally impeached has been guilty, or is supposed to have been guilty, of some malversation in office, a resolution is generally brought forward by a member of the house of representatives, either to accuse the party, or for a committee of inquiry. If the committee report adversely to the party accused, they give a statement of the charges and recommend that he be impeached. When the resolution is adopted by the house, a committee is appointed to impeach the party at the bar of the senate, and to state that the articles of impeachment against him will be exhibited in due time and made good before the senate, and to demand that the senate take order for the appearance of the party to answer to the impeachment. The house then agree upon the articles of impeachment, and they are presented to the senate by a committee appointed by the house to prosecute the impeachment. The senate then issues process, summoning the party to appear at a given day before them, to answer to the articles. The process is served by the sergeant-at-arms of the senate, and a return is made of it to the senate under oath. On the return-day of the process, the senate resolves itself into a court of impeachment, and the senators are sworn to do justice according to the constitution and laws. The person impeached is called to answer, and either appears or does not appear. If he does not appear, his default is recorded, and the senate may proceed ex parte. If he does appear, either by himself or attorney, the parties are required to form an issue, and a time is then assigned for the trial. The final decision is given by yeas and nays; but no person can be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; Const. art. 1, s. 2, cl. 6. See "Chase's Trial," and "Trial of Judge Peck;" also proceedings against Judge Humphreys, June 26, 1862, Congress. Globe, pt. 4, 3d sess., 32d Congress, pp. 2942-2953; and Trial of President Johnson, March 5, 1868, Congress. Globe, pt. 5, supplement, 40th Congress, 2d sess.; Lecture by Prof. Theo. W. Dwight, before Columbia Coll. Law School, 6 Am. Law Reg. 257; Article by Judge Lawrence, of Ohio, same volume, p. 641.

When the president is tried, the chief justice presides. The judgment, in cases of impeachment, does not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Disqualification, as a punishment, is discretionary with the senate; Black, Const. L. 122. The party impeached remains liable to trial and punishment according to law. See UNITED STATES COURTS. Proceedings on impeachments under the state constitutions are somewhat similar.

In England, the articles of impeachment are a kind of indictment found by the house of commons, and tried by the house of lords. It has always been settled that a peer could be impeached for any crime. It was formerly believed that a commoner could only be impeached for high misdemeanors, not for capital offences; 4 Bla. Com. 260; but it seems now settled they may be impeached for high treason; May's Parl. Prac. Ch. 23. Impeachments have been very rare in England in modern times.

In Evidence. An allegation, supported by proof, that a witness who has been examined is unworthy of credit.

Every witness is liable to be impeached as to his character for truth; and, if his general character is good, he is presumed at all times to be ready to support it; 49 Ill. 299. See 97 Ala. 14.

It is not admissible to impeach a defendant's testimony by showing that at a former trial for a like offence, he raised a similar issue and was contradicted; 155 Mass. 168. An accused person who testifies in his own behalf, is subject to impeachment, as other witnesses, by evidence of previous contradictory statements; 98 Ala. 169; 86 Tenn. 259. A witness cannot be impeached by the contradiction of immaterial statements; 58 Ark. 125; nor can he be as to collateral and irrelevant matter on which he was cross-examined; 66 Miss. 196; 75 Cal. 108; 76 Ia. 67; 39 Kan. 115; 97 N. C. 443; 69 Tex. 730; 61 Vt. 53; 32 W. Va. 177. Statements out of court inconsistent with those made by a witness in court are admissible to impeach him, where the proper foundation has been laid; 97 Mo. 165; 77 Ga. 781; 23 Neb. 683; 40 Minn. 65, 77; 74 Ia. 623; 86 Ala. 110; 25 Tex. App. 686. In order to impeach a witness by showing his contradictory statements on other occasions, his attention must be first called to the time, place, and circumstances of the statements, whether they are in writing or were made orally; 137 U. S. 507; 132 id. 394.

IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE. A restraint from committing waste upon lands or tenements; or, a demand of compensation for waste done by a tenant who has but a particular estate in the land granted, and, therefore, no right to commit waste.

All tenants for life or any less estate are liable to be impeached for waste, unless they hold without impeachment of waste; in the latter case they may commit waste without being questioned, or any demand for compensation for the waste done; 11 Co. 82. See WASTE.

IMPECHIARE. To impeach, accuse, or prosecute for felony or treason. Cowel.

IMPEDIATUS. Disabled from mischief by expeditation (q. v.). Cowel.

IMPEDIENS. One who hinders; the defendant or deforciant in a fine. Cowel; Blount.

IMPEDIMENTO. In Spanish Law. A prohibition to contract marriage, established by law between certain persons.

The disabilities arising from this clause are two-fold, viz. :—

Impedimento Dirimente. Such disabilities as render the marriage null, although contracted with the usual legal solemnities. The disabilities arising from this source are enumerated in the following Latin verses :—

"Error, conditio, votum, cognatio, crimen, Cultus disparitas, vis, ordo, ligamen, honestas, Si sis affinis, si forte coire nequibis, Si parochi et duplicis desit præsentia testis, Raptave sit mulier, nec parti reddita tutæ, Hæc faciendæ vetant connubia, facta retractant."

Among these impediments, some are absolute, others relative. The former cannot be cured, and render the marriage radically null; others may be removed by previous dispensation.

In Spain, marriage is regarded in the twofold aspect of a civil and a religious contract. Hence the disabilities are of two kinds, viz. : those created by the local law and those imposed by the church.

In the earlier ages of the church, the emperors prohibited certain marriages: thus, Theodosius the Great forbade marriages between cousins-german; Justinian, between spiritual relations; Valentinian, Valens, Theodosius, and Arcadius, between persons of different religions.

The Catholic church adopted and extended the disabilities thus created, and by the third canon at the twenty-fourth session of the Council of Trent, the church reserved to itself the power of dispensation. As the Council of Trent did not determine, being divided, who had the power of granting dispensation, it is accorded in Italy to the pope, and in France and Spain, with few exceptions, to the bishops. The dispositions of the Council of Trent being in force in Spain (see Schmidt, Civ. Law of Spain, p. 6, note a), the ecclesiastical authority is alone invested with this power in Spain.

For the cases in which it may be granted, see Schmidt, Civ. Law c. 2, s. 14.

Impedimento, Impediente, or Prohibitivo.—Such disabilities as impede the contracting of a marriage, but do not annul it when contracted.

Anciently, the impediments expressed in the following Latin verses were of this nature :—

"Incestus, raptus, sponsalia, mors muliebris, Susceptus propriæ sobolis, mors presbyterialis, Vel si pœniteat solemniter, aut monialem Accipiat quisquam, votum simplex, catechismus, Ecclesiæ vetitum, nec non tempus feriarum, Impediunt fieri, permittunt facta temeri."

For the effects of these impediments, see Escriche, Dict. Raz. Impedimento Prohibitivo.

IMPEDIMENTS. Legal hindrances to making contracts. Some of these impediments are minority, want of reason, coverture, and the like. See CONTRACT; INCAPACITY.

In Civil Law. Bars to marriage.

Absolute impediments are those which prevent the person subject to them from marrying at all, without either the nullity of marriage or its being punishable.

Dirimant impediments are those which render a marriage void: as, where one of the contracting parties is already married to another person.

Prohibitive impediments are those which do not render the marriage null, but subject the parties to a punishment.

Relative impediments are those which regard only certain persons with regard to each other: as, the marriage of a brother to a sister.

IMPENSÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Expense; outlay. Divided into necessariæ, for necessity, utiles, for use, and voluptuariæ, for luxury; Dig. 79. 6. 14; Voc. Jur.

IMPERATIVE. Mandatory as opposed to directory, as used of a statute (q. v.).

IMPERATOR. Emperor. The title of the Emperor in Rome and used also for the Kings of England in charters before the conquest. 1 Bla. Com. 242.

IMPERFECT OBLIGATIONS. Those which are, in view of the law, of binding force.

IMPERFECT RIGHTS. See RIGHTS.

IMPERFECT TRUST. An executory trust (q. v.).

IMPERITIA. Want of skill.

IMPERIUM. The right to command, which includes the right to employ the force of the state to enforce the laws: this is one of the principal attributes of the power of the executive. 1 Toullier, n. 58.

IMPERSONALITAS. Impersonality. An expression used where no particular person is referred to, as where the words ut dicitur are used. Co. Litt. 352 b.

IMPERTINENT (Lat. in, not, per-tinens, pertaining or relating to).

In Pleading. IN EQUITY. A term applied to matters introduced into a bill, answer, or other proceeding in a suit which are not properly before the court for decision at that particular stage of the suit. 1 Sumn. 506; 3 Stor. 13; 1 Paige, Ch. 555; 5 Blackf. 439; 15 Fed. Rep. 561. Impertinent matter is not necessarily scandalous; but all scandalous matter is impertinent.

The rule against admitting impertinent matter is designed to prevent oppression, not to become oppressive; 1 T. & R. 489; 6 Beav. 444; 27 N. H. 38. No matter is to be deemed impertinent which is material in establishing the rights of the parties or ascertaining the relief to be granted; 3 Paige, Ch. 606; 12 Beav. 44; 10 Sim. 345; 13 id. 583.

A pleading may be referred to a master to have impertinent matter expunged at the cost of the offending party; Story, Eq. Pl. § 266; 19 Me. 214; 4 Hen. & M. 414; 2 Hayw. 407; 4 C. E. Gr. 343; but a bill may not be after the defendant has answered; Coop. Eq. Pl. 19. In England, the practice of excepting to bills, answers, and other proceedings for impertinence has been abolished. The 27th Equity Rule of the United States courts requires that exceptions for scandal or impertinence shall point out the exceptionable matter with certainty; 6 Paige 388; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. *343, n., *350, n.

AT LAW. A term applied to matter not necessary to constitute the cause of action or ground of defence; 5 East 275; 2 Mass. 283. It constitutes surplusage, which see.

In Practice. A term applied to evidence of facts which do not belong to the matter in question. That which is immaterial is, in general, impertinent, and that which is material is not, in general, impertinent. 1 M'C. & Y. 337. Impertinent matter in the interrogatories to witnesses or their answers, in equity, will be expunged after reference to a master at the cost of the offending party; 2 Y. & C. 445.

IMPESCARE. To impeach or accuse. Impescatus, impeached. Jac.; Blount.

IMPETITIO VASTI. Impeachment of waste, which title see.

IMPETRATION. The obtaining any thing by prayer or petition. In the ancient English statutes it signifies a pre-obtaining of church benefices in England from the church of Rome which belonged to the gift of the king or other lay patrons.

IMPIER. Umpire (q. v.).

IMPIERMENT. Impairing or prejudicing. Jac. L. Dict.

IMPIGNORATA. Pledged; given in pledge (pignori data); mortgaged. A term applied in Bracton to land. Bract. fol. 20.

IMPIGNORATION. The act of pawning or pledging.

IMPLACITARE (Lat.). To implead; to sue.

IMPLEAD. In Practice. To sue or prosecute by due course of law. 9 Watts 47.

IMPLEMENTS (Lat. impleo, to fill). Such things as are used or employed for a trade, or furniture of a house. 11 Metc. 82.

Whatever may supply wants: particularly applied to tools, utensils, vessels, instruments of labor: as, the implements of trade or of husbandry. Webster, Dict.; 23 Iowa 359; 6 Gray 298; or a music teacher's piano; 69 Ill. 338. The word does not include horses or other animals; 11 Met. 79; 5 Ark. 41; 44 Conn. 93.

IMPLICATA (Lat.). Small adventures for which the freight contracted for is to be received although the cargo may be lost. Targa, c. 34; Emerigon, Mar. Loans § 5.

IMPLICATION. An inference of something not directly declared, but arising from what is admitted or expressed. See CONTRACT; DEED; EASEMENT; WAY; WILL.

IMPLIED. This word is used in law as contrasted with "express;" i. e., where the intention in regard to the subject-matter is not manifested by explicit and direct words, but is gathered by implication or necessary deduction from the circumstances, the general language, or the conduct of the parties.

IMPLIED ABROGATION. See ABROGATION.

IMPLIED ASSUMPSIT. See ASSUMPSIT.

IMPLIED COLOR. See COLOR.

IMPLIED CONSENT. See CONSENT.

IMPLIED CONSIDERATION. One that is implied by law, or presumed to exist in contradistinction to an expressed consideration (q. v.). In a case of a sealed instrument or negotiable paper the consideration is presumed. See CONSIDERATION.

IMPLIED CONTRACT. See CONTRACT.

IMPLIED COVENANT. See COVENANT.

IMPLIED MALICE. See MALICE.

IMPLIED TRUST. See TRUST.

IMPLIED USES. See RESULTING USE; USE.

IMPLIED WARRANTY. See CAVEAT EMPTOR; SALE; WARRANTY.

IMPORTATION. In Common Law. The act of bringing goods and merchandise into the United States from a foreign country. 5 Cra. 368 ; 9 id. 104, 120 ; 2 M. & G. 155, note a.

To prevent the mischievous interference of the several states with the national commerce, the constitution of the United States, art. I. s. 10, provides as follows : " No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws ; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States ; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of congress ; " Story, Const. § 1616. Under this section it has been held that a state law imposing a license tax on importers of foreign liquors was unconstitutional : 12 Wheat. 419. See 5 How. 504 ; 7 id. 283 ; 12 id. 299 ; 11 Pet. 102. As was a state law imposing a tax on the tonnage of vessels entering her ports ; 94 U. S. 238. But a state tax on the gross receipts of a railroad company, where freights are received partly from another state, is not a tax on imports ; 8 Wall. 123 ; 15 id. 284. An importation is not complete, within the revenue laws, until a voluntary arrival within some port of entry ; 9 Cra. 104 ; 13 Pet. 486 ; 4 Wash. C. C. 158 ; 1 Gall. 206 ; but see 1 Pet. C. C. 256 ; and the duties accrue at the time of such arrival ; 1 Deady 124 ; but the importation, as between the importer and the government, is not complete as long as the goods remain in the custody of the officers of the customs, and until delivered to the importer, they are subject to any duties on imports which congress may see fit to impose ; 2 Cliff. 512. See EXPORTATION.

IMPORTED. This word, in general, has the same meaning in the tariff laws that its etymology shows, im porto, to bear ; to carry. To " import " is to bear or carry into. An " imported " article is one brought or carried into a country from abroad. 49 Fed. Rep. 99. See IMPORTS ; IMPOSTS.

IMPORTS. Goods or other property imported or brought into the country from foreign territory. Story, Const. § 949. See U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8 ; 1, § 10 ; 7 How. 477 ; 9 id. 619 ; 8 Wall. 110, 123.

Imports cease to be " imported articles " within the constitution, after the packages are broken up, or, after the first wholesale disposition of them ; 1 Dev. & B. L. 19 ; but imported goods, after having been sold by the importer, are subject to state taxation, even though still in the original packages ; 5 Wall. 479. See ORIGINAL PACKAGE. Persons cannot be considered imports ; 4 Metc. 282.

IMPORTUNITY. Urgent solicitation, with troublesome frequency and pertinacity.

Wills and devises are sometimes set aside in consequence of the importunity of those who have procured them. Whenever the importunity is such as to deprive the devisor of the freedom of his will, the devise becomes fraudulent and void ; Dane, Abr. c. 127, a. 14, s. 5, 6, 7 ; 2 Phill. Eccl. 551.

IMPOSITIONS. Imposts, taxes, or contributions. See 104 Mass. 470.

IMPOSSIBILITY. A thing which under the law or according to the due course of nature cannot be done or performed.

Impossibility of performance is an important head of the law of contract, and the questions arising as to its effect may be affected by the classification to which the impossibility is assigned, the time at which it arises, and whether it affects the promise or the consideration for it.

There may be an impossibility of fact, existing in the nature of things, or arising out of the circumstances of the case or a legal impossibility created by law.

Of the first kind there may be a contradiction in the contract resulting from promises inconsistent with each other when made. There may also be a physical impossibility as when the thing contracted for is against the course of nature. Of the latter class examples are suggested of an agreement " to make two spheres of the same substance, but one twice the size of the other of which the greater should fall twice as fast as the smaller when they were both dropped from a height ; or to construct a perpetual motion ; " the former having been considered an elementary fact before Galileo's experiment and the latter being still attempted, though as yet unsuccessfully. Wald, Pol. Cont. 350.

A physical impossibility may be either absolute, which means impossible in any case, as if one should contract to reach the moon ; or relative, as to make a payment to one who is dead. Of this kind is what is termed practical impossibility, as when a ship is so injured that it cannot be repaired except at an excessive or unreasonable cost ; in this case it is treated as a total loss, being physically but not practically possible to repair. Certain accidents occurring from death, tempests, and the like are characterized by the phrase " impossibility arising by the act of God " (q. v.).

A contract or condition, the performance of which is made impossible by a rule of law, is termed a legal impossibility ; as if one should give a bond to secure a simple contract with a collateral agreement that there should be no merger of the contract debt. A logical impossibility exists when the agreement is inconsistent with the nature of the transaction, as where a gift is made to one expressly for his own benefit with a condition that he immediately transfer it to a third person.

The impossibility may exist at the time of making the agreement, in which case it is said to be original ; or it may be caused by matter arising ex post facto, as where the party to be benefited dies after the contract to be executed though before the performance. Such subsequent impossibility may be caused by the act of the party making the promise or the party to be benefited, or of a stranger, as a public enemy (q. v.), or by the act of God (q. v.).

An agreement to perform an impossibility whether in law or in fact is void ; Wald, Pol. Cont. 352 ; Leake, Cont. 358 ; 3 Add. Cont. 8th Am. ed. 1196 ; Harr. Cont. 34, 174. See L. R. 5 C. P. 577. There may, however, be the liability in damages for the breach of an unqualified undertaking to perform an impossibility ; id. ; 149 U. S. 1 ; the real question in such a case is the existence of the liability; id.; 2 Q. B. 680; it is a question of construction, whether the language of the contract is to be treated as not applying to a situation which renders its literal performance impossible; Harr. Cont. 176. A contract to perform a notorious impossibility known to the parties to be such at the time of making the contract is void; 15 M. & W. 253; L. R. 6 Q. B. 124; L. R. 5 C. P. 577; if the impossibility has arisen after the making of the contract, although without any fault of the covenantor, he is not discharged from liability under it; 160 U. S. 514; an impossibility is no defence if occasioned by the act of a stranger; 2 Ld. Raym. 1164; 2 El. & Bl. 688; or of alien enemies; Aley 26. Where, in an action of breach of promise of marriage, a plea that consummation had become impossible by reason of bodily disease endangering the life of the defendant was held by four judges to three in the Exchequer chamber to be no defence, the court of the queen's bench having been equally divided; El. Bl. & El. 748, 29 L. J. Q. B. 45; but of this case it is said that "it is so much against the tendency of the latter cases that it is of little or no authority beyond the point actually decided;" Wald, Poll. Cont. 378; and in an American case upon analogous facts the court approved the criticism upon the English case and refused to follow it. The cases upon this subject are necessarily of infinite variety, as is natural where the question is so largely one of construction. To examine them in detail would be impossible within the scope of this title, but they will be found collected and classified in the various works on contracts. See Wald, Pol. Cont. ch. vii.; 3 Add. Cont. 8th Am. ed. 1196; Leake, ch. iii. sec. iii.; Harr. Cont. ch. v. sec. 2; 16 Cent. L. J. 105; Keener, Quasi-Cont. ch. iv. sec. iii.; CONTRACT; UNLAWFUL AGREEMENT; CONDITION; PERFORMANCE.

IMPOSSIBLE CONTRACT. One which the law will not hold binding upon the parties because of the natural or legal impossibility of the performance by one party of that which is the consideration for the promise of the other. 7 Wait, Act. & D. 124. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

IMPOSTS. Taxes, duties, or impositions. A duty on imported goods or merchandise. Federalist, no. 30; Elliott, Deb. 289; Story, Const. § 949; Cooley, Tax. 3.

The Constitution of the United States gives congress power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, excises, and imposts," and prohibits the states from laying "any imposts or duties on exports or imports" without the consent of congress; U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, n. 1; art. 1, § 10, n. 2. See Bacon, Abr. Smuggling; Davis, Imp.; Co. 2d Inst. 62; Dig. 165, n.; 7 Wall. 433; 9 Rob. (La.) 324.

IMPOTENCE. In Medical Jurisprudence. Inability on the part of the male organ of copulation to perform its proper function. Impotence applies only to disorders affecting the function of the organ of copulation, while sterility applies only to lack of fertility in the reproductive elements of either sex. Dennis, System of Surgery.

Impotence may be considered as incurable, curable, accidental, or temporary. Absolute or incurable impotence is that for which there is no known relief, principally originating in some malformation or defect of the genital organs. Its existence or non-existence is not to be determined by mere anatomical appearances, and the mere fact of age alone is never sufficient to imply absence of the procreative power; 2 With. & Beck. 396. It may also be the result of infirmity rather than of age or deformity, as the effect of vicious habits; id. 398.

Ability to procreate is not the test; it is enough if the parties are able to have sexual intercourse; 18 Kan. 371; 5 Paige 554; 3 Phill. Ecc. 325; and impotency arising after the marriage does not avoid it; 30 L. J. Prob. Mat. & Adm. 73. Unless otherwise by statute, impotence renders a marriage voidable, not void; L. R. 1 Ex. 246; 24 N. J. Eq. 19.

It has been held that, in a divorce case, an examination may be ordered of a defendant alleged to be impotent; 47 Ia. 376-83; 29 Kan. 466, 474. See also 19 Cent. L. J. 144-48 and 2 Bish. M. & D. § 590, and cases cited in both.

Impotence is a statutory ground of divorce in most states, and in some courts it is held that jurisdiction of suits for nullity, is impliedly conferred with jurisdiction in divorce; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 39. See 35 Vt. 365; 33 Md. 401. Where this defect existed at the time of the marriage and was incurable, by the ecclesiastical law and the law of several of the American states, the marriage may be declared void ab initio; Comyns, Dig. Baron and Femme (C 3); Bacon, Abr. Marriage, etc. (E 3); 1 Bla. Com. 440; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 67; Code, 5. 17. 10; 5 Paige, Ch. 554; 25 N. H. 267; but see Hopk. Ch. 557. Impotency arising from idiocy intervening after the marriage is no ground for divorce in Vermont; 2 Atk. 188; see Merlin, Rep. impuissance. But it seems the party naturally impotent cannot allege that fact for the purpose of obtaining a divorce; 3 Phill. Ecc. 147; 1 Eng. Ecc. 184. See 2 Phill. Ecc. 10; 3 id. 325; 1 Eng. Ecc. 408; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 377; Ryan, Med. Jur. 95-111; Bish. Marr. & D.; 1 Bla. Com. 440; 1 Hagg. 725. See, as to the signs of impotence, 1 Briand, Méd. Leg. c. 2, art. 2, § 2, n. 1; Dictionnaire des Sciences médicales, art. Impuissance; and generally, Trebuchet, Jur. de la Méd. 100; 1 State Tr. 315; 8 id. App. no. 1, p. 23; 3 Phill. 147; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 523; Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 237.

IMPOTENTIAM, PROPERTY PROPTER. A qualified property, which may subsist in animals feræ naturæ, on account of their inability, as where hawks, herons, or other birds build in a person's trees, or coney, etc., make their nests or burrows in a person's land, and have young there, such person has a qualified property in them till they can fly or run away, and then such property expires. 2 Steph. Com. 7th ed. 8.

IMPOUND. To place in a pound goods or cattle distrained or astray. 3 Bla. Com. 12; 126 Mass. 364. Also, to retain in the custody of the law. A suspicious instrument produced at a trial is said to be impounded, when it is ordered by the court to be retained, in case criminal proceedings should be taken.

IMPREScriptIBILITY. The state of being incapable of prescription.

A property which is held in trust is imprescriptible: that is, the trustee cannot acquire a title to it by prescription; nor can the borrower of a thing get a right to it by any lapse of time, unless he claims an adverse right to it during the time required by law.

IMPREScriptIBLE RIGHTS. Such as a person may use or not, at pleasure, since they cannot be lost to him by the claims of another founded on prescription.

IMPRESSION. A case involving a new state of facts or a question yet undetermined and therefore without precedent is usually termed a "case of first impression."

IMPRESSMENT. The arresting and retaining mariners for the king's service. 1 Bla. Com. 420; 3 Steph. Com. 594.

It was "the mode formerly resorted to of manning the British navy. The practice had not only the sanction of custom, but the force of law, for many acts of parliament, from the reign of Philip and Mary to that of George III., had been passed to regulate the system of impressment. Impressment consisted in seizing by force, for service in the royal navy, seamen, river-watermen, and at times landmen, when state emergencies rendered them necessary. An armed party of reliable men, commanded by officers, usually proceeded to such houses in the seaport towns as were supposed to be the resort of the seafaring population, laid violent hands on all eligible men and conveyed them forcibly to the ships of war in the harbor. As it was not in the nature of sailors to yield without a struggle, many terrible fights took place between the press-gangs and their intended victims—combats in which lives were often lost. In point of justice there is little, if anything, to be said for impressment, which had not even the merit of an impartial selection from the whole available population;" Int. Cyc.

IMPRESment MONEY. Money paid on enlisting or impressing soldiers or sailors.

In Old English Law. Money given out for a certain purpose to be afterwards accounted for. Money advanced by the crown to be employed for its own purpose in connection with the government, as in the case of secret service money. See Man. Exch. Pr. 17; 13 Eliz. c. 4; 1 Mad. Exch. c. 10, 13, p. 387; 6 Price 424 a; and Public Revenues Acts of New Zealand.

IMPRETIABILIS (Lat.). Beyond price; invaluable.

IMPRIMATUR (Lat.). A license or allowance to one to print.

At one time, before a book could be printed in England, it was requisite that a permission should be obtained: that permission was called an imprimatur. In some countries where the press is liable to censorship, an imprimatur is required.

IMPRIMERE. To press upon; to impress or press; to imprint or print.

IMPRIMERY. In some of the ancient English statutes this word is used to signify a printing office; the art of printing; a print or impression.

IMPRIMIS (Lat.). In the first place. It is commonly used to denote the first clause in an instrument, especially in wills, item being used to denote the subsequent clauses. This is also its classical and literal meaning. Ainsworth, Dict. See Fleta, lib. 2, c. 54. Imprimis and imprimus also occur. Du Cange; Prec. Ch. 430; Cases temp. Talb. 110; 6 Madd. 31; Magna Cart. 9 Hen. III.; 2 Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. The use of imprimis does not import a precedence of the bequest to which it is prefixed; 59 Me. 325; 1 Rop. Leg. 426.

IMPRISON. To confine; to put in prison; to detain in custody.

IMPRISONMENT. The restraint of a man's liberty.

The restraint of a person contrary to his will. Co. 2d Inst. 589; Bald. 239, 600.

It may be in a place made use of for purposes of imprisonment generally, or in one used only on the particular occasion, or by words and an array of force, without bolts or bars, in any locality whatever; 9 N. H. 491; 7 Humphr. 43; 13 Ark. 43; Webb, Poll. Torts 259; 1 W. Bla. 19; 7 Q. B. 742; but it cannot be applied to the detention of a youth in a reform school; 52 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 935. A forcible detention in the street, or the touching of a person by a peace-officer by way of arrest, are also imprisonments; Bac. Abr. Trespass (D. 3); 1 Esp. 431, 526; 3 Harr. (Del.) 416. See 7 Humphr. 43; 26 How. Pr. 84. It is not necessary to touch the person, but it is enough if he is within the power of the officer and submits; 100 Mass. 79. Forcibly taking a person in an omnibus across a city; 92 Mich. 498; or where a person is constantly guarded by detectives so that he is at no time free to come and go as he pleases, but his movements are at all times subject to the control and direction of those who have him in charge; 36 Fed. Rep. 252; constitute imprisonment. It has been decided that lifting up a person in his chair and carrying him out of the room in which he was sitting with others, and excluding him from the room, was not an imprisonment; 1 Chitty, Pr. 48; and the merely giving charge of a person to a peace-officer, not followed by any actual apprehension of the person, does not amount to an imprisonment, though the party, to avoid it, next day attend at a police court; 3 B. & P. 211; 1 C. & P. 153; and if, in consequence of a message from a sheriff's officer holding a writ, the defendant execute and send him a bail bond, such submission to the process will not constitute an arrest; 6 B. & C. 528; D. & R. 233. No other warrant is necessary for the detention of a prisoner than a certified copy of the judgment against him; 32 Cal. 48; or of the precept on which the arrest was made; 9 N. H. 185.

It is not error in a judgment in a criminal case, to make one term of imprisonment commence where another terminates; 153 U. S. 308.

See, FALSE IMPRISONMENT; ARREST; INFAMY; FELONY; ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES; PERSONAL LIBERTY.

IMPRISTI. Followers; partisans; adherents; supporters. Those who take the part of or side with another in attack or defence.

IMPROBATION. In Scotch Law. An act by which falsehood and forgery are proved. Erskine, Inst. 4. 119; Stair, Inst. 4. 20.

The setting aside of deeds or other writings prima facie probative, on the ground of falsehood or forgery. Bell, Dict.

Under the Scotch division of action into ordinary and rescissory the latter are further divided into (1) actions of proper impropriations; (2) actions of reduction-improbatum; (3) action of simple reduction.

Proper impropriations are brought for declaring writings false or forged. The proof in this proceeding is either direct by the testimony of the writer and the instrumentary witnesses, or indirect from circumstances or insinuating arguments. If one of two instrumentary witnesses supports the writing and the other does not, the writing is nullified; but the user will not be subjected to the payment of falsehood being supported by one witness. Where witnesses test the deed without knowing the grantor and seeing him subscribe, or hearing him own his subscription, the deed is not only improbatum but such witnesses are declared accessory to forgery; Ersk. Pr. iv. 1. 5, iv. 37.

Reduction-improbatum is an action whereby a person who may be hurt or affected by a writing, insists on its production in court in order to have it set aside or its effects ascertained under the certification if the writing, if not produced, shall be declared false and forged. This certification is a fiction of law, introduced that the production of the writing may be effectually forced; and therefore it acts only in the effects of the pursuer; so that the writing, though declared false, continues in full force in all questions with third party; id. iv. 1. 5.

In simple reduction the certification is only temporary, the effect though not the form being to declare the writings null until within the period allowed with opening up decrees in absence, or on default they be produced; so that they recover their full force after production, even against the pursuer himself; id. iv. 1. 6. The most usual grounds of reduction of writings are, the want of the requisite solemnities; or that the grantor was minor; or interdicted; or inhibited; or, formerly, that he signed the deed on his death-bed; or, both formerly and now, that he was compelled or frightened into it; or was circumvented; or that he granted it in prejudice of his lawful creditors; id. iv. 1. 9.

IMPROPER. Not suitable; unfit; not suited to the character, time, and place. 48 N. H. 196.

IMPROPER FEUD. "Under the title of improper or derivative feuds were comprised all such as do not fall within the other descriptions; such, for instance, as were originally bartered and sold to the feudatory for a price; such as were held upon base or less honorable service, or upon a rent, in lieu of military services; such as were in themselves, alienable, without mutual license; and such as might descend indifferently either to males or females. But, where a difference was not expressed in the creation, such new created feuds did in all respects follow the nature of an original, genuine, and proper feud." 1 Bla. Com. 58. See FEUDUM.

IMPROPER NAVIGATION. The navigation of a ship without due care and skill. It includes anything wrongly done with a ship, or any part of it, in the course of the voyage; L. R. 6 C. P. 563.

IMPROPRIATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of employing the revenues of a church living to one's own use: it is also a parsonage or ecclesiastical living in the hands of a layman, or which descends by inheritance. Techn. Dict.

The transfer to a layman of a benefice to which the cure of souls is annexed with an obligation to provide with a performance of the spiritual duties attached to the benefice is said to be nearly the same as an appropriation. Holth. Before the Reformation the terms were used without a very clear distinction, and appropriations by spiritual persons and incorporation were termed impropriation. Later the use of the latter word was restricted by Spelman and others to appropriation by laymen. Moz. & W.

The distinction is thus clearly stated: The practice of impropriation differs from the somewhat similar but more ancient usage of appropriation, inasmuch as the latter supposes the revenues of the appropriated benefice to be transferred to ecclesiastical or quasi-ecclesiastical persons or bodies, as to a certain dignitary in a convent, a college, a hospital; while impropriation applies that the temporalities of the benefice are enjoyed by a layman; the name, according to Spelman, being given in consequence of their thus being improperly applied, diverted from their legitimate use. The practice of impropriation, and still more that of appropriation, as in the case of monasteries, etc., and other religious houses, prevailed extensively in England before the Reformation; and on the suppression of the monasteries, all such rights were (by 27 Henry VIII. c. 28, and 31 Henry VIII. c. 13) vested in the crown, and were by the crown freely transferred to laymen, to whose heirs have thus descended, not only the right to the tithes, but also in many cases the entire property of rectories. The spiritual duties of such rectories are discharged by a clergyman, who is called a vicar, and who receives a certain portion of the emoluments of the living, generally consisting of a part of the glebe-land of the parsonage, together with what are called the "small tithes" of the parish. Int. Cyc.

The word impropriation is said to be derived from in proprietatem, because the living is held as a lay property. Phill. Ecc. L. 275.

An impropriate rector was the term applied to a lay rector as opposed to a spiritual rector; and tithes in the hands of a lay owner were called impropriate tithes, as those in the hands of a spiritual owner were termed appropriate tithes.

See 1 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com. 678; Brown, Dict.; APPROPRIATION.

IMPROVE. To cultivate; to reclaim. 4 Cow. 190.

"Improved" land may mean simply land "occupied;" it is not a precise technical word; 8 Allen 213; it includes ground appropriated for a railroad; 68 Pa. 396.

Land on which there are three dwelling-houses, besides suitable farm buildings, which has been farmed for the last twenty years, and from which, in the last eighteen years, there has been received $12,000 in rents, besides a share of the landlord in the growing crops, is not "unimproved real estate," as that phrase is used in a will; 173 Pa. 320; and the fact that the property was bought by the testator for the purpose of being cut into city lots, and sold as such, does not render it "unimproved" land; id.

In Scotch Law. To impeach as false or forged. To improve a lease means to grant a lease of unusual duration, to encourage a tenant, when the soil is exhausted, etc. Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 676.

IMPROVEMENT. An amelioration in the condition of real or personal property effected by the expenditure of labor or money for the purpose of rendering it useful for other purposes than those for which it was originally used, or more useful for the same purposes. It includes repairs or addition to buildings, and the erection of fences, barns, etc.; 70 Pa. 98; 16 How. Pr. 220; 10 So. Rep. (Ala.) 157; 1 Cush. 93; 78 N. Y. 1, 581; or a windmill; 49 Kan. 434.

As between the rightful owner of lands and an occupant who in good faith has put on improvements, the land with its improvements belongs to the rightful owner of the land, without compensation for the increased value at common law; 8 Wheat. 1; 1 Dana 481; 3 Ohio St. 463; 4 McLean 489; 5 Johns. 272; 2 Paine 74; 66 Miss. 21; 7 Ind. App. 561; though the rule may be otherwise in equity; 3 Atk. 134; 3 Sneed 228; 1 Yerg. 360; 24 Vt. 560; 2 Johns. Cas. 441; 133 U. S. 553; see 133 id. 21; and by statute in some of the states; 10 Cush. 451; 2 N. H. 115; 20 Vt. 614; 13 Ala. N. S. 31; 9 Me. 62; 13 Ohio 308; 9 Ill. 87; 9 Ga. 133; 12 B. Monr. 195; 16 La. 423; 3 Cal. 69; 1 Zab. 248; 38 Minn. 433; 37 Fed. Rep. 756; and their value may be offset to an action for mesne profits at common law; 2 Wash. C. C. 165; 4 Cow. 168; 4 Dev. N. C. 95; 6 Humphr. 324; 1 Story 478; 2 Greene 151; 3 La. 63. See 95 Mich. 619; 153 Pa. 238. A life tenant is not entitled to payment for improvements made by him without the consent of the remaindermen; 127 Pa. 348; 37 Fed. Rep. 756; 40 Minn. 450. In determining the right to recover for improvements placed on land, ordinary repairs necessary for the enjoyment of the object sold cannot be classed as improvements; 41 La. Ann. 6.

As to dower in improvements, see DOWER, and as to improvement in Patent Law, see PATENT.

IMPROVIDENCE. Such want of care and foresight in the management of property as would be likely to render it less valuable and impair the interests of those who may be or become entitled to it. Such is the construction of the word in a statute excluding one found incompetent by reason of improvidence, to perform the duties of an administrator; 1 Barb. Ch. 45. See also 14 N. Y. 449; 4 Redf. 218.

IMPRUAMENTUM. Improvement of land, from impruare, to improve it.

IMPUBER (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who is more than seven years old, or out of infancy, and who has not attained the age of puberty; that is, if a boy, till he has attained his full age of fourteen years, and if a girl, her full age of twelve years. Domat, Liv. Prél. t. 2, s. 2, n. 8.

IMPUNITY. Freedom or safety from punishment. The phrase impunitive damages was said to be unintelligible; 36 Tex. 153.

IMPUTATIO. In Civil Law. Legal liability.

IMPUTATION OF PAYMENT. In Civil Law. The application of a payment made by a debtor to his creditor.

The rules covering this subject are thus stated, substantially, in Howe, Studies in the Civil Law, 156:—

1. The debtor may apply his payment as he pleases, with the exception that in case of a debt carrying interest it must be first applied to discharging the interest.

2. If the debtor makes no application, the creditor may apply the funds by informing the debtor at the time of payment.

3. The law imputes in the neglect of the parties to do so, and it will be made by the law in favor of the debtor. It directs that imputation which would have been best for the debtor at the time of payment. Hence it applies the funds to obligations most burdensome to the debtor: e. g. to a debt which is not disputed, rather than to one that is; to a debt that is due rather than to one that is not; to one on which the debtor may be arrested, rather than to one on which he cannot; to a debt for which the debtor has given sureties, rather than to one which he owes singly; to a debt for which the debtor is principal obligor, rather than one of which he is merely surety; to a mortgage rather than to an unsecured debt, and to a debt which would render the debtor insolvent if unpaid, rather than to any less important one.

4. Of debts of equal grade, if there be no imputation by the parties, the application will be to that of the longest standing.

5. To debts of the same date, and in other respects equal, the application will be pro rata.

6. As to debts bearing interest, the imputation is to interest before principal.

When the creditor is to pay himself out of a fund realized,—for example, from the sale of property pledged,—he should apply the money to the debt secured by the pledge, rather than to some other; to interest before principal; to the debt of the highest rank, rather than to those of lower rank; and if there are several of equal rank then pro rata.

Some of these rules have been followed in England and America, some decisions following the exact language of the Roman law. See 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. 13th ed. § 459; but see APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

In Louisiana the preceding civil law rules are in force. The statutory enactment, Civ. Code, art. 2159, is a translation of the Code Napoleon, art. 1353-1356, slightly altered. See Pothier, Obl. n. 528, by Evans, and notes. Payment is imputed first to the discharge of interest; 1 Mart. La. N. S. 571; 5 La. Ann. 738. But if the interest was not binding, being usurious, the payment must go to the principal; 2 La. Ann. 363; 5 id. 616. The law applies a payment to the most burdensome debt; 10 La. 1, 357; 2 La. Ann. 405, 520. A creditor's receipt is an irrevocable imputation, except in cases of surprise or fraud; 2 La. Ann. 24; 3 id. 351, 810. See APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

IN. A preposition which is used in real estate law to designate title, seisin, or possession, or when one is said to be "in by lease of his lessor." It may be as an abbreviation of invested or intitled, or of in possession.

IN ACTION. A thing is said to be in action when it is not in possession, and for its recovery, the possessor unwilling, an action is necessary. 2 Bla. Com. 396. See CHOSE IN ACTION.

IN ADVERSUM. Where a decree is obtained against one who resists, it is termed "a decree not by consent but in adversum." 3 Sto. 318.

IN ÆQUA MANU. In equal hand. Fleta, l. 3, c. 14, § 2.

IN ÆQUALI JURE (Lat.). In equal right. See MAXIMS.

IN ÆQUALI MANU. In equal hand; held indifferently between two parties. Where an instrument was deposited by the parties to it, in the hands of a third person, to hold it under certain conditions or stipulations it was said to be held in æquali manu. Reg. Orig. 28.

IN ALIENO SOLO. On another's land. 2 Steph. Com. 20.

IN ALIO LOCO. See CEPIT IN ALIO LOCO.

IN AMITY. The fact that an Indian tribe which committed depredations was carrying on hostilities only to resist the opening of a military road does not permit its being considered a tribe "in amity" with the United States within the meaning of the act of congress of March 3, 1891, concerning a claim for Indian depredations; 161 U. S. 291.

IN APERTA LUCE. In open daylight; in the day-time. 9 Co. 65 b.

IN APICIBUS JURIS. Among the subtleties or extreme doctrines of the law. 1 Kames, Eq. 190.

IN ARBITRIUM JUDICIS. At the pleasure of the judge.

IN ARCTA ET SALVA CUSTODIA. In close and safe custody. 3 Bla. Com. 415.

IN ARTICULO. In a moment; immediately. C.1, 34, 2.

IN ARTICULO MORTIS. At the point of death.

IN AUTRE, or AUTER, DROIT (L. Fr.). In another's right. As representing another. An executor, administrator, or trustee sues in autre droit.

Where two estates come to one person, so that if in the same right they would merge, if one of them be in autre droit, there will be no merger. 2 Bla. Com. 177, but see Sharsw. note 17.

IN BANCO. In banc (q. v.).

IN BLANK. Without restriction. Applied to indorsements on promissory notes where no indorsee is named. See INDORSEMENT.

IN BONIS. Among the goods, or property; in actual possession. Inst. 4, 2, 2. In bonis defuncti, among the goods of the deceased.

IN CAMERA. A case is said to be heard in camera when the doors of the court are closed and only persons concerned in the case are admitted. This is done when the facts are such as to make a private hearing expedient, as in some divorce cases. The term belongs rather to the English law of practice in which the power to grant private hearings in certain cases is established, though there has been a difference of opinion as to its exact limitations.

It was said by Lord Eldon that it was the uniform practice in chancery, as long as the court had existed, in the case of family disputes, on the application of counsel on both sides, to hear the same in the chancellor's private room, and that what was so done was not the act of the judge but of the parties; Coop. t. Eldon 106; in a later case, on application for a private hearing relating to the custody of a young lady who was a ward of the court, Lord Brougham directed the case to be heard in private on the assurance of counsel that such course was proper, notwithstanding that one party withheld his consent; 2 Russ. & M. 688; and it is noted that this course was frequently followed by the same judge; id. In a patent case, the court being of opinion that the patent was valid, permitted the defendant to state his secret process in camera; 24 Ch. D. 156; an application for an injunction to restrain a solicitor from disclosing confidential information was ordered to be heard in private without consent of defendant, upon the statement of plaintiff's counsel that in his opinion a public hearing would defeat the object of the action; 31 Ch. D. 55; 9 Ch. App. 522; but this will not be done without consent of both parties unless it is clear that such would be the result of a public hearing; id. Jessell, M. R., considered that a private hearing was not within the power of the court, even by consent, except in cases affecting lunatics, or wards of court, or where the object of the action would be otherwise defeated, or in those cases where the practice of the old ecclesiastical courts is continued; 4 Ch. D. 173. It has been held that, following that practice, suits for nullity of marriage or judicial separation may be heard in camera, but not a petition for dissolution of marriage; L. R. 1 P. & D. 640; this case was put upon the ground that the matter was controlled, to that result, by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, § 22; but in a later case there was a distinct disapproval of the limitation, and it was said that as the ecclesiastical courts had the power to hear nullity suits in private when it was desirable for the sake of public decency, the same power must exist in other cases where it was required for the same reason; 1 L. R. 3 P. & M. 230. It is also held that under the present English practice, a law court has power to try a case in camera, without a jury, when the parties consent; 53 J. P. 822.

The term in camera is not used in American law, but the constitutional provision in most of the state constitutions and in the sixth amendment of the federal constitution, securing the right of a person accused to a speedy and public trial, gives rise to a question of constitutional law entirely different from the question of practice under English law. As to this subject, see OPEN COURT. A hearing in camera also differs from one at chambers (q. v.); the former being a private hearing by a court and the latter a hearing by a judge not in a regular session of court.

IN CAPITA (Lat.). To or by the heads or polls. Thus, where persons succeed to estates in capita, they take each an equal share; so, where a challenge to a jury is in capita, it is to the polls, or to the jurors individually, as opposed to a challenge to the array. 3 Bla. Com. 361. Per capita is more commonly used in the former instance.

IN CAPITE (Lat.). In chief. A tenant in capite was one who held directly of the crown, 2 Bla. Com. 60, whether by knight's service or socage. Chal. R. P. 5. But tenure in capite was of two kinds, general and special; the first from the king (caput regni), the second from a lord (caput feudi). A holding of an honor in the king's lands, but not immediately of him, was yet a holding in capite; Kitch. 127; Dy. 44; Fitzh. N. B. 5. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

IN CASU PROVISIO. In a (or the) case provided. In tali casu editum et provisum, in such case made and provided. Touch. Pl. 164, 165.

IN CAUSA. In the cause, as distinguished from in initialibus (q. v.), a term in Scotch practice. 1 Brown, Ch. 252.

IN CHIEF. Principal; primary; directly obtained. A term applied to the evidence obtained from a witness upon his examination in court by the party producing him, in relation to the matter in issue at the trial. The examination so conducted for this purpose.

Evidence or examination in chief is to be distinguished from evidence given on cross-examination and from evidence given upon the voir dire.

Evidence in chief should be confined to such matters as the pleadings and the opening warrant; and a departure from this rule will be sometimes highly inconvenient, if not fatal. Suppose, for example, that two assaults have been committed, one in January and the other in February, and the plaintiff prove his cause of action to have been the assault in January; he cannot abandon that, and afterwards prove another committed in February, unless the pleadings and openings extend to both; 1 Campb. 473. See, also, 6 C. & P. 73; 1 Mood. & R. 282.

This matter, however, is one of practice; and a great variety of rules exist in the different states of the United States, the leading object, however, being in all cases the same,—to prevent the plaintiff from introducing in evidence a different case from the one which he had prepared the defendant to expect from the pleadings.

IN COMMENDAM (Lat.). The state or condition of a church living which is void or vacant, and which is commended to the care of some one. In Louisiana, there is a species of limited partnership called partnership in commendam. See COMMENDAM.

IN COMMUNI. In common. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 4, § 2.

IN CONSIDERATIONE EJUS. In his sight or view. 12 Mod. 95.

IN CONSIDERATIONE INDE. In consideration thereof. 3 Salk. 64, pl. 5.

IN CONSIDERATIONE LEGIS. In consideration or contemplation of law; in abeyance. Dyer 102 b.

IN CONSIDERATIONE PRÆMISSORUM. In consideration of the premises. 1 Strange 535.

IN CONTINENTI. Immediately; without any interval or intermission. Dig. 44, 5, 1. Sometimes written in one word, "incontinenti."

IN CORPORE. In body or substance; in a material thing or object.

IN CRASTINO. On the morrow. In crastino Animarum, on the morrow of All Souls. 1 Bla. Com. 342.

IN CUJUS REI TESTIMONIUM. In testimony whereof; q. v.

IN CUSTODIA LEGIS (Lat.). In the custody of the law. In general, when things are in custodia legis, they cannot be distrained, nor otherwise interfered with by a private person, or by another officer acting under authority of a different court or jurisdiction; 10 Pet. 400; 20 How. 583, and cases cited: 75 Md. 445. See CUSTODIA LEGIS.

IN DELICTO. In fault. See IN PARI DELICTO.

IN DIEM. For a day; for the space of a day. Calv. Lex.

IN DOMINICO. In demesne. In dominico suo ut de feodo, in his demesne as of fee.

IN DORSO. On the back, from which come indorse, indorsement. 2 Bla. Com. 468. In dorso recordi, on the back of the record. 5 Co. 45.

IN DUBIO. In doubt; either in a condition of uncertainty, or in a doubtful case.

IN DUPLO. In double. Damna in duplo, double damages. Fleta, 4. 10. 1.

IN EADEM CAUSA. In the same state or condition. Calv. Lex.

IN EMULATIONEM VICINI. In hatred or envy of a neighbor. Where an act is done or action brought, solely to hurt or distress another, it is said to be in emulationem vicini. 1 Kames, Eq. 56.

IN EQUITY. In a court of chancery in contra-distinction to a court of law; within the contemplation or purview of equity jurisprudence; according to the doctrine of equity.

IN ESSE (Lat.). In being. In existence. An event which may happen is in posse; when it has happened, it is in esse. The term is often used of liens or estates. A child in its mother's womb is, for some purposes, regarded as in esse; 3 Barb. Ch. 488.

IN EVIDENCE. The proofs in a cause which have been offered and admitted are said to be in evidence.

IN EXCAMBIA. In exchange. The technical and formal words in an old deed of exchange.

IN EXECUTION AND PURSUANCE OF. Words used to express the fact that the instrument is intended to carry into effect some other instrument, as in case of a deed in execution of a power. They are said to be synonymous with "to effect the object of;" 7 Biss. 129.

IN EXITU. In issue. De materia in exitu, of the matter in issue. 12 Mod. 372.

IN EXTENSO. Fully; at length; a copy of a document made verbatim.

IN EXTREMIS (Lat.). At the very end. In the last moments; on the point of death.

IN FACIE CURIAE. In the face of the court. Dyer 28.

IN FACIE ECCLESIAE (Lat.). In the face or presence of the church. A marriage is said to be made in facie ecclesiae when made in a consecrated church or chapel, or by a clerk in orders elsewhere; and one of these two things is necessary to a marriage in England in order to the wife's having dower, unless there be a dispensation or license; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 404, 405. But see 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85; 1 Vict. c. 22; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72. It was anciently the practice to marry at the church-door, and there make a verbal assignment of dower. These verbal assignments, to prevent fraud, were necessarily held valid only when made in facie et ad ostium ecclesiae. See 2 Bla. Com. 103; Taylor, Gloss.

IN FACIENDO (Lat.). In doing. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1308.

IN FACT. Words used in pleading to introduce an amount of fact,—as "the said plaintiff (or defendant) further in fact saith,"—indicating that what follows is a statement of acts of parties as distinguished from a legal conclusion or intendment. The latter in equity pleading, when it may frequently be proper, after a statement of the facts on which the conclusion rests, begins,—“and the defendant is advised that, etc.” When pleadings were in Latin the words in facto were used, thus in facto dicit, he, in fact, says. See 1 Salk. 22 Pl. 1.

IN FAVOREM LIBERTATIS (Lat.). In favor of liberty.

IN FAVOREM VITAE (Lat.). In favor of life.

IN FEODO. In fee. Bract. f. 207; Fleta, 1. 2, c. 64, § 15. Seisitus in feodo, seised in fee. Id. 8. 7. 1.

IN FIERI (Lat.). In process of completion. A thing is said to rest in fieri when it is not yet complete: e. g. the records of a court were anciently held to be in fieri, or incomplete, till they were recorded on parchment, but now till the giving of judgment, after which they can be amended only during the same term. 2 B. & Ad. 791; 3 Bla. Com. 407. It is also used of contracts.

IN FINE (Lat.) At the end. A term used with a citation to denote that it is at the end of the section, chapter, book, law, or paragraph.

IN FORMA PAUPERIS (Lat.). In the character or form of a poor man.

When a person is so poor that he cannot bear the charges of suing at law or in equity, upon making oath that he is not worth five pounds, and bringing a certificate from a counsellor at law that he believes him to have a just cause, he is permitted to sue in forma pauperis, in the manner of a pauper; that is, he is allowed to have original writs and subpoenas gratis, and counsel assigned him without fee; 3 Bla. Com. 400. See 3 Johns. Ch. 65; 1 Paige, Ch. 588; 3 id. 273; 5 id. 58; 2 Moll. 475.

IN FORO. In the forum (q. v.; before the tribunal or court).

IN FORO CONSCIENTIAE (Lat.). Before the tribunal of conscience; conscientiously. The term is applied to moral obligations as distinct from the obligations which the law enforces. In the sale of property, for example, the concealment of facts by the vendee which may enhance the price is wrong in foro conscientie, but there is no legal obligation on the part of the vendee to disclose them, and the contract will be good if not vitiated by fraud; Pothier, Vent. part 2, c. 2, n. 233; 2 Wheat. 185, note v.

IN FORO CONTENTIOSO. In the tribunal or forum of litigation.

IN FORO ECCLESIASTICO. In an ecclesiastical forum, tribunal, or court. Fleta, l. 2, c. 57, § 14. Early in the reign of Henry III., the Episcopal constitutions were published, forbidding all ecclesiastics to appear as advocates in foro sæculari, nor did they long continue to act as judges there, not caring to take the oath of office which was found necessary. 1 Bla. Com. 20.

IN FORO SÆCULARI. In a secular court. See last title; 1 Bla. Com. 20; Fleta 2. 57. 14.

IN FRAUDEM CREDITORUM (Lat.). In fraud of creditors or with an intent to defraud them. Inst. 1. 6. 3.

IN FRAUDEM LEGIS (Lat.). In fraud of the law; contrary to law. Taylor, Gloss. Using process of law for a fraudulent purpose. If a person gets an affidavit of service of declaration in ejectment, and thereupon gets judgment and turns the tenant out, when he has no manner of title in a house, he is liable as a felon, for he used the process of law in fraudem legis; 1 Ld. Raym. 276; Sid. 254.

An act done in fraudem legis cannot give a right of action in the courts of the country whose laws are evaded; 1 Johns. 433.

IN FULL. Complete, or without abbreviation, e. g. a copy of a paper. Of the entire amount due, as used in a receipt for money.

IN FULL LIFE. Neither physically nor civilly dead. The term life alone has also been taken in the same sense, as including natural and civil life: e. g. a lease made to a person during life is determined by a civil death, but if during natural life it would be otherwise. 2 Co. 48. It is a translation of the French phrase en plein vie. Law Fr. & L. Lat. Dict.

IN FUTURO. At a future time. The alternative expressions are in præsentì and in esse. 2 Bla. Com. 166, 175.

IN GENERALI PASSAGIO (L. Lat.). In the general passage; passagium being a journey, or, more properly, a voyage, and especially when used alone or with the adjectives magnum, generale, etc.,—the journey to Jerusalem of a crusader, especially of a king. 36 Hen. III.; 3 Prynne, Collect. 767; Du Cange.

In generali passagio was an excuse for non-appearance in a suit, which put off the hearing sine die; but in simplici peregrina- tione or passagio—i. e. being absent on a private pilgrimage to the Holy Land—put off the hearing for a shorter time. Bracton 338.

IN GENERE (Lat.). In kind; of the same kind. Things which when bailed may be restored in genere, as distinguished from those which must be returned in specie, or specifically, are called fungibles. Kaufman's Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 148, note.

Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 619, defines genus as what the philosophers call species, viz.: a kind. See Dig. 12. 1. 2. 1. See LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

IN GREMIO LEGIS (Lat.). In the bosom of the law. This is a figurative expression, by which is meant that the subject is under the protection of the law: as, where the title to land is in abeyance. See GREMIUM; IN NUBIBUS; ABEYANCE.

IN GROSS. At large; not appurtenant or appendant, but annexed to a man's person: e. g. common granted to a man and his heirs by deed is common in gross; or common in gross may be claimed by prescriptive right. 2 Bla. Com. 34. See EASEMENT.

IN HAC PARTE. In this behalf; on this part or side.

IN HAEC VERBA. In these words.

IN HOC. In this.

IN IISDEM TERMINIS. In the same terms. 9 East 487.

IN INDIVIDUO. In the distinct individual, specific, or identical form. Sto. Bailm. § 97.

IN INFINITUM. Indefinitely; imports to infinity.

IN INITIALIBUS (Lat.). In Scotch Law. In the preliminaries. Before a witness is examined as to the cause in which he is to testify, he must deny bearing malice or ill-will, being instructed what to say, or having been bribed, and these matters are called initialia testimonii, and the examination on them is said to be in initialibus: it is similar to our voir dire. Bell, Dict. Initialia Testimonii; Erskine, Inst. p. 451; Halkerston, Tech. Terms.

IN INITIO. At the beginning; in the beginning, as in initio legis, at the outset of the suit. Bract. f. 400.

IN INTEGRUM (Lat.). The original condition. See RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM. Vicat, Voc. Jur. integer.

IN INVITUM (Lat.). Unwillingly. Taylor, Gloss. Against an unwilling party (or one who has not given his consent); by operation of law. Wharton, Dict.

IN IPSIS FAUCIBUS. In the very throat. A vessel just entering a port is said to be in ipsis faucibus portæ.

IN ITINERE (Lat.). On a journey; on the way. Justices in itinere were justices in eyre, who went on circuit through the kingdom for the purpose of hearing causes. 3 Bla. Com. 331; Spelman, Gloss. In itinere is used in the law of lien, and is there equivalent to in transitu; that is, not yet delivered to vendee.

IN JUDGMENT. In a court of justice.

A case is said to be in judgment when it has proceeded so far as that the successful party is entitled to judgment.

In a judgment seat: Lord Hale was characterized "one of the greatest and best men who ever sat in judgment." 1 East 306.

IN JUDICIO (Lat.). In or by a judicial proceeding; in court. In judicio non creditur nisi juratis, in judicial proceedings no one is believed unless on oath. Cro. Car. 64. See Bracton, fol. 98 b, 106, 287 b.

In Civil Law. The proceedings before a prætor, from the bringing the action till issue joined, were said to be in jure; but after issue joined, when the cause came before the judex, the proceedings were said to be in judicio. See JUDEX.

IN JURE (Lat. in law). In Civil Law. A phrase which denotes the proceedings in a cause before the prætor, up to the time when it is laid before a judex; that is, till issue joined (litis contestatio); also, the proceedings in causes tried throughout by the prætor (cognitiones extraordinarie). Vicat, Voc. Jur. Jus.

In English Law. In law; rightfully; in right. In jure, non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur.

IN JURE ALTERIUS. In another's right. Hale, Anal. § 26.

IN JURE PROPRIO. In one's right. Hale, Anal. § 26.

IN JUS VOCARE. To call, cite, or summon to court. Inst. 4, 16, 3; Calv. Lex. In jus vocando, summoning to court. 3 Bla. Com. 279.

IN KIND. Of the same class, description, or kind of property, as a deposit, mandate, or loan which is said to be returnable in kind where the terms and character of the transaction do not require the return of the identical money, security, or thing, but only its equivalent in amount or kind. See IN GENERE; LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

IN LAW. In contemplation of law; implied by law; subsisting by force of law. See IN FACT.

IN LECTO MORTALI. On a death-bed. Fleta, 5, 28, 12.

IN LIMINE (Lat.). In or at the beginning. This phrase is frequently used: as, the courts are anxious to check crimes in limine.

IN LITEM (Lat.). For a suit; to the suit. Greenl. Ev. § 348.

IN LOCO. In place; in lieu; instead; in the place or stead. Townsh. Pl. 38.

IN LOCO PARENTIS (Lat.). In the place of a parent: as, the master stands towards his apprentice in loco parentis. See APPRENTICESHIP; GUARDIAN.

IN MAJOREM CAUTELAM. For greater security. 1 Stra. 105.

IN MALAM PARTEM. In a bad sense; so as to wear an evil appearance.

IN MEDIAS RES (Lat.). In the middle of things; into the heart of the subject, without preface or introduction.

IN MEDIO. Intermediate.

In Scotch Law. A term denoting a fund in controversy in an action of double or multiple-poining, which is a species of interpleader resorted to by a debtor distressed or threatened by two or more persons claiming the debt. While the subject in controversy continues in medio, any third person who conceives he has right to it may, though he should not be cited as a defender, produce his titles as if he were an original party to the suit, and he will be admitted for his interest in the competition. Ersk. Pr. 4, 1, 30.

IN MERCY. To be in mercy is to be at the discretion of the king, lord, or judge in punishing any offence not directly censured by the law. Thus, to be in the grievous mercy of the king is to be in hazard of a great penalty; 11 Hen. VI. c. 6. So, where the plaintiff failed in his suit, he and his pledges were in the mercy of the lord, pro falso clamore suo. This is retained nominally on the record; 3 Bla. Com. 376. So the defendant is in mercy if he fail in his defence; id. 398. See MERCY.

IN MISERICORDIA (Lat. in mercy). The entry on the record where a party was in mercy was, Ideo in misericordia, etc. The phrase was used because the punishment in such cases ought to be moderate. See Magna Cart. c. 14; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 5, c. 6. Sometimes misericordia means the being quit of all ameracements (q. v.)

IN MITIORI SENSU (Lat. in a milder acceptance).

A phrase denoting a rule of construction formerly adopted in slander suits, the object of which was to construe phrases, if possible, so that they would not support an action. Ingenuity was continually exercised to devise or discover a meaning which by some remote possibility the speaker might have intended; and some ludicrous examples of this ingenuity may be found. To say of a man who was making his livelihood by buying and selling merchandise, "He is a base, broken rascal; he has broken twice, and I'll make him break a third time," was gravely asserted not to be actionable,—"ne poet dar porter action, car poet estre intend de burstness de belly." Latch 114. And to call a man a thief was declared to be no slander, for this reason: "perhaps the speaker might mean he had stolen a lady's heart."

The rule now is to construe words agreeably to the meaning usually attached to them. It was long, however, before this rule, rational as it is, and supported by every legal analogy, prevailed in actions for words, and before the favorite doctrine of construing words in their mildest sense, in direct opposition to the finding of the jury, was finally abandone by the courts. "For some inscrutable reason," said Gibson, J., "the earlier English judges discouraged the action of slander by all sorts of evasions, such as the doctrine of mitiori sensu, and by requiring the slanderous charge to have been uttered with the technical precision of an indictment. But, as this discouragement of the remedy by process of law was found inversely to encourage the remedy by battery, it has been gradually falling into disrepute, inasmuch that the precedents in Croke's Reports are beginning to be considered apocryphal." 20 Pa. 162; 7 S. & R. 451; 1 N. & M'C. 217; 2 id. 511; 8 Mass. 248; 1 Wash. Va. 152; 1 Kirb. 12; Heard, Lib. & S. § 162.

IN MODUM ASSISÆ. In the manner or form of an assize. Bract. fol. 183b. In modum juratæ, in manner of a jury. Id. fol. 181b.

IN MORA (Lat.). In delay; in default. In the civil law a borrower in mora is one who fails to return the thing borrowed at the proper time; Sto. Bailm. § 254. In Scotch law a creditor is in mora who has failed in respect to the diligence required in levying an attachment on the property of the debtor. Bell, Dict.

IN MORTUA MANU (Lat. in a dead hand). Property owned by religious societies was said to be held in mortua manu, or in mortmain, since religious men were civiliter mortui. 1 Bla. Com. 479; Taylor, Gloss.

IN NOMINE DEI, AMEN. In the name of God, Amen. A phrase, anciently used in wills and many other instruments, the translation of which is often used in wills at the present day, but chiefly by ignorant draughtsmen or testators.

IN NOTIS. In the notes.

IN NUBIBUS (Lat.). In the clouds; in abeyance; in custody of law. In nubibus, in mare, in terra vel, in custodia legis: in the air, sea, or earth, or in the custody of the law. Taylor, Gloss. In case of abeyance, the inheritance is figuratively said to rest in nubibus, or in gremio legis: e. g. in case of a grant of life estate to A, and afterwards to heirs of Richard, Richard in this case, being alive, has no heirs until his death, and, consequently, the inheritance is considered as resting in nubibus, or in the clouds, till the death of A, when the contingent remainder either vests or is lost and the inheritance goes over. See 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 107, n.; 1 Co. 137; ABEYANCE.

IN NULLIUS BONIS. Among the goods or property of no person; belonging to no person, as treasure-trove and wreck were anciently considered.

IN NULO EST ERRATUM (Lat.). In Pleading. A plea to errors assigned on proceedings in error, by which the defendant in error affirms there is no error in the record. As to the effect of such plea, see 1 Ventr. 252; 1 Stra. 684; 9 Mass. 532; 1 Burr. 410; T. Raym. 231. It is a general rule that the plea in nullo est erratum confesses the fact assigned for error; Yelv. 57; Dane, Abr. Index; but not a matter assigned contrary to the record; 7 Wend. 55; Bacon, Abr. Error (G).

IN ODIUM SPOLIATORIS (Lat.). In hatred of a despoiler. All things are presumed against a despoiler or wrongdoer: in odium spoliatoris omnia presumuntur. See MAXIMS.

If a man wrongfully opened a bundle of papers, sealed and left in his hands, so that he may have altered them or abstracted some, all presumptions will be taken against him in settling an account depending on the papers; 3 Macq. Sc. App. 766; the same rule is applied if one withhold evidence bearing on the case; 1 Stark. 35; 18 Jur. 703; or an agreement with which he is charged; 9 Cl. and Fin. 775. See at large 1 Sm. L. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 638-9; Br. Leg. Max. 8th Am. ed. 988; SPOLIATION.

IN OMNIBUS. In all things; on all points. "A case parallel in omnibus;" 10 Mod. 104. A modern phrase to the same effect is "on all fours" (q. v.).

IN PACATO SOLO. In a country which is at peace.

IN PACE DEI ET REGIS. In the peace of God and the king. Fleta 1, c. 31, § 6. Formal words in old appeals of murder.

IN PAIS. This phrase, as applied to a legal transaction, primarily means that it has taken place without legal formalities or proceedings. Thus a widow was said to make a request in pais for her dower when she simply applied to the heir without issuing a writ; Co. Litt. 32b. So conveyances are divided into those by matter of record and those by matter in pais. In some cases, however, "matters in pais" are opposed not only to "matters of record," but also to "matters in writing," i. e. deeds, as where estoppel by deed is distinguished from estoppel by matter in pais; id. 352a; 4 Kent 260.

IN PAPER. In English Practice. A term used of a record until its final enrolment on the parchment record. 3 Bla. Com. 406; 10 Mod. 88; 2 Lilly, Abr. 322; 4 Geo. II.

IN PARI CAUSA (Lat.). In an equal cause. It is a rule that when two persons have equal rights in relation to a particular thing, the party in possession is considered as having the better right: in pari causa possessor potior est. Dig. 50, 17, 128; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 952. See MAXIMS; PRESUMPTION.

IN PARI DELICTO (Lat.). In equal fault; equal in guilt. Neither courts of law nor of equity will interpose to grant relief to the parties, when an illegal agreement has been made and both parties stand in pari delicto. The law leaves them where it finds them, according to the maxim, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis (or, possidentis). 15 Kan. 157. See MAXIMS; DELICTUM.

IN PARI MATERIA (Lat.) Upon the same matter or subject. Statutes in pari materia are to be construed together; 7 Conn. 456.

IN PATIENDO. In suffering, permitting, or allowing.

IN PECTORE JUDICIS. In the breast of the judge. Latch 180. A term applied to a judgment.

IN PEJOREM PARTEM. In the worst part; on the worst side. Latch 159.

IN PERPETUAM REI MEMORIAM (Lat.). For the perpetual memory or remembrance of a thing. Gilbert, For. Rom. 118.

IN PERPETUUM REI TESTIMONIUM. In perpetual testimony of a matter; for the purpose of declaring and settling a thing forever. 1 Bla. Com. 86.

IN PERSON. A party, plaintiff or defendant, who sues out a writ or other process, or appears to conduct his case in court himself, instead of through a solicitor or counsel, is said to act and appear in person. Any suitor, but one suing in forma pauperis, may do this.

IN PERSONAM (Lat.). A remedy where the proceedings are against the person, in contradistinction to those which are against specific things, or in rem (q. v.).

IN PIOS USUS. For pious uses; for religious purposes. 2 Bla. Com. 505.

IN PLENO COMITATU. In full county court. 3 Bla. Com. 36.

IN PLENO LUMINE. In public; in common knowledge; in the light of day.

IN PLENO VITA. In full life. Yearb. P. 18 Hen. VI. 2.

IN POSSE (Lat.). In possibility; not in actual existence: used in contradistinction to in esse.

IN POTESTATE PARENTIS. In the power of a parent. Inst. 1, 8, pr.; id. 1, 9; 2 Bla. Com. 498.

IN PRÆMISSORUM FIDEM. In confirmation or attestation of the premises. A notarial phrase.

IN PRÆSENTI (Lat.). At the present time: used in opposition to in futuro. A marriage contracted per verba de præsentis is good: as, I take Paul to be my husband, is a good marriage; but words de futuro would not be sufficient, unless the ceremony was followed by consummation. 4 La. Ann. 347; 6 Binn. 405.

IN PRENDER (L. Fr.). In taking. Such incorporeal hereditaments as a party entitled to them was to take for himself were said to be in prender. Such was a right of common. 2 Steph. Com. 15.

IN PRIMIS. In the foremost place. A term used in argument. Usually written inprimis (q. v.).

IN PRINCIPIO (Lat.). At the beginning. This is frequently used in citations: as, Bacon, Abr. Legacies, in pr.

IN PROMPTU. In readiness; at hand. Usually written inpromptu.

IN PROPRIA PERSONA (Lat.). In his own person; himself: as, the defendant appeared in propria persona; the plaintiff argued the cause in propria persona. Sometimes abbreviated on the printed court lists, P. P.

IN RE (Lat.). In the matter: as, in re A B, in the matter of A B. In the headings of legal reports these words are used more especially to designate proceedings in bankruptcy or insolvency, or the winding up of estates or companies.

IN REBUS (Lat.). In things, cases, or matters.

IN REM (Lat.). A technical term used to designate proceedings or actions instituted against the thing, in contradistinction to personal actions, which are said to be in personam.

Proceedings in rem include not only those instituted to obtain decrees or judgments against property as forfeited in the admiralty or the English exchequer, or as prize, but also suits against property to enforce a lien or privilege in the admiralty courts, and suits to obtain the sentence, judgment, or decree of other courts upon the personal status or relations of the party, such as marriage, divorce, bastardy, settlement, or the like. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 625, 541; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 14, 24.

Courts of admiralty enforce the performance of a contract, when its performance is secured by a maritime lien or privilege, by seizing into their custody the very subject of hypothecation. In these suits, generally, the parties are not personally bound, and the proceedings are confined to the thing in specie; Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law 98. See Bened. Ad. 270, 362; 2 Gall. 200; 3 Term 269.

There are cases, however, where the remedy is either in personam or in rem. Seamen, for example, may proceed against the ship or freight for their wages, and this is the most expeditious mode; or they may proceed against the master or owners; 4 Burr. 1944; 2 Bro. Civ. & Adm. Law, 396. See, generally, 1 Phill. Ev. 254; 1 Stark. Ev. 228; Dane, Abr.; Serg. Const. Law 202, 212; Pars. Marit. Law; Bened. Adm. 503. No action in rem lies for damages incurred by loss of life; 145 U. S. 335. A contract for launching a vessel carried some distance up the beach by a storm, is a maritime contract, for which the vessel is liable in rem; 48 Fed. Rep. 569. See ADMIRALTY; BOTTOMRY; LIEN.

IN RENDER. A thing in a manor is said to lie in render when it must be rendered or given by the tenant, e. g. rent; to lie in prender, when it may be taken by the lord or his officer when it chance. West, Symbol. pt. 2, Fines, § 126.

IN RERUM NATURA (Lat.). In the nature (or order) of things; in existence. Not in rerum natura is a dilatory plea, importing that the plaintiff is a fictitious person.

In Civil Law. A broader term than in rebus humanis: e. g. before quickening, an infant is in rerum natura, but not in rebus humanis; after quickening, he is in rebus humanis as well as in rerum natura. Calvinius, Lex.

IN SCRINIO JUDICIS. In the writing-case of the judge; among the judge's papers. "That is a thing that rests in scrinio judicis, and does not appear in the body of the decree." Hardr. 51.

IN SEPARALI. In several; in severally. Fleta 2, c. 54, 20.

IN SIMILI MATERIA. Dealing with the same or a kindred subject-matter.

IN SIMPLICI PEREGRINATIONE. In simple pilgrimage. Bract. fol. 338. A phrase in the old law of essoins. See IN GENERALI PASSAGIO.

IN SOLIDUM, IN SOLIDO (Lat.). In Civil Law. For the whole; as a whole. An obligation or contract is said to be in solido or in solidum when each is liable for the whole, but so that a payment by one is payment for all: i. e. it is a joint and several contract. 1 W. Bla. 388.

Possession is said to be in solidum when it is exclusive. "Duo in solidum precario habere non magis possunt, quam duo in solidum vi possidere aut clam; nam neque justæ neque injustæ possessiones duæ concurrere possunt." Savigny, lib. 3, § 11. The phrase is commonly used in Louisiana.

IN SOLO. In the soil or ground. In solo alieno, in another ground. In solo proprio, in one's ground. 2 Steph. Com. 20.

IN SPECIE (Lat.). In the same form: e. g. a ship is said to no longer exist in specie when she no longer exists as a ship, but as a mere congeries of planks. 8 B. & C. 561; Arnould, Ins. 1012. To decree a thing in specie is to decree the performance of that thing specifically.

IN STATU QUO (Lat.). In the same situation as; in the same condition as.

IN STIRPES. In the law of descent, according to roots or stocks; by representation as distinguished from succession per capita. More commonly written per stirpes (q. v.).

IN TANTUM. In so much; so much; so far; so greatly. Reg. Orig. 97, 106.

IN TERMINIS TERMINANTIBUS. In terms of determination; exactly in point. 11 Co. 40 b. In express or determinate terms. 1 Leon. 93.

IN TERROREM (Lat.). By way of threat, terror, or warning. For example, when a legacy is given to a person upon condition not to dispute the validity or the dispositions in wills and testaments, the conditions are not, in general, obligatory, but only in terrorem: if, therefore, there exist probabilis causa litiganda, the non-observance of the conditions will not be a forfeiture. 1 Hill, Abr. 253; 3 P. Wms. 344; 1 Atk. 404. But when the acquiescence of the legatee appears to be a material ingredient in the gift, the bequest is only quousque the legatee shall refrain from disturbing the will; 2 P. Wms. 52; 2 Ventr. 352. See DURESS.

IN TERROREM POPULI (Lat. to the terror of the people).

A technical phrase necessary in indictments for riots. 4 C. & P. 373.

Lord Holt has given a distinction between those indictments in which the words in terrorem populi are essential, and those wherein they may be omitted. He says that, in indictments for that species of riots which consists in going about armed, etc., without committing any act, the words are necessary, because the offence consists in terrifying the public; but in those riots in which an unlawful act is committed, the words are useless; 11 Mod. 116; 10 Mass. 518.

IN TESTIMONIUM. In witness or in evidence whereof. The first words of the attestation clause of certain legal instruments.

IN TOTIDEM VERBIS (Lat.). In just so many words: as, the legislature has declared this to be a crime in totidem verbis.

IN TOTO (Lat.). In the whole; wholly; completely: as, the award is void in toto. In the whole the part is contained; in toto et pars continetur. Dig. 50. 17. 123.

IN TRAJECTU. In the passage over; on the voyage over. 3 C. Rob. Adm. 338.

IN TRANSITU (Lat.). During the transit, or removal from one place to another. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

IN VACUO (Lat. in what is empty). Without concomitants or coherence. Whart.

IN VADIO (Lat.). In pledge; in gage.

IN VENTRE SA MERE (L. F.). In his mother's womb. It is written indifferently in this form, or en ventre sa mere (q. v.).

See POSTHUMOUS CHILD; CURTESY; DOWER; INFANT; INJUNCTION.

IN VINCULIS. In chains; in actual custody. Gilb. For. Rom. 97.

Applied also, figuratively, to the condition of a person who is compelled to submit to terms which oppression and his necessities impose on him; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 302.

IN VIRIDI OBSERVANTIA. Present to the minds of men, and in full force and operation.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF. These words, which, when conveyancing was in the Latin language, were in ejus rei testimonium, are the initial words of the concluding clause in deeds: "In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands," etc.

INADEQUATE PRICE. A term applied to indicate the want of a sufficient consideration for a thing sold, or such a price as, under ordinary circumstances, would be considered insufficient.

Inadequacy of price is generally connected with fraud, gross misrepresentations, or an intentional concealment of defects in the thing sold. In these cases it is clear that the vendor cannot compel the buyer to fulfil the contract; 1 Bro. P. C. 187; L. R. 12 Eq. 320; 6 Johns. 110; 3 Cra. 270; 6 Yerg. 508; 11 Vt. 315; 1 Metc. Mass. 93; 20 Me. 462; 1 Brown. Ch. 440.

In general, however, inadequacy of price is not sufficient ground to avoid an executed contract, particularly when the property has been sold by auction; 7 Ves. 30, 35, n.; 3 Bro. Ch. 228; 104 Mass. 420; if there is no fraud and the parties deal at arm's length, upon their independent judgment, it will be held good; 19 Ala. 765; 102 Mass. 60; 75 Mo. 631; 31 Fed. Rep. 369. But if an uncertain consideration, as a life annuity, be given for an estate, and the contract be executory, equity, it seems, will enter into the adequacy of the consideration; 7 Bro. P. C. 184; 1 Bro. Ch. 156. See Sugd. Vend. 189; 1 B. & B. 165; 1 M'Cord, Ch. 383; 4 Des. Ch. 651; 97 Mass. 180. And if the price be so grossly inadequate and given under such circumstances as to afford a necessary presumption of fraud or imposition, a court of equity will grant relief; 6 Ga. 515; 49 Miss. 582; 8 B. Monr. 11; 2 Harr. & G. 114; 11 N. H. 9; 1 Metc. Mass. 93; 3 McLean 332; 19 How. 303; 58 Ill. 191; 110 id. 390; 20 Fla. 157; 71 Iowa 428; 50 Me. 438; 113 U. S. 89; Story, Eq. Jur. § 244; Leake, Contr. 1150. As to cases of sales of their interests by heirs and reversioners for inadequate price, see CATCHING BARGAIN; EXPECTANCY;

See CONSIDERATION; POST OBIT; MACEDONIAN DECREE; JUDICIAL SALE.

INADMISSIBLE. What cannot be received. Parol evidence, for example, is ordinarily inadmissible to contradict a written agreement.

IN ÆDIFICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Building on another's land with one's own materials, or on one's own land with another's materials. L. 7, §§ 10, 18, D. de Acquis. Rer. Domin.; Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 363. The word is especially used of a private person's building so as to encroach upon the public land. Calvinus, Lex. The right of possession of the materials yields to the right to what is on the soil. Id. See ACCRETION.

INALIENABLE. A word denoting the condition of those things the property in which cannot be lawfully transferred from one person to another. Public highways and rivers are inalienable. There are also many rights which are inalienable, as the rights of liberty or of speech.

INAUGURATION. A word applied by the Romans to the ceremony of dedicating a temple, or raising a man to the priesthood, after the augurs had been consulted.

It was afterwards applied to the installation of emperors, kings, and prelates, in imitation of the ceremonies of the Romans when they entered the temple of the augurs. It is applied in the United States to the installation of the chief magistrate of the republic, and of the governors of the several states.

INBLAURA. Profit or product of the ground. Cowel.

INBORH. A security, pledge, or hypotheca, consisting of the chattels of a person unable to obtain a personal "borg" or surety.

INCAPACITY. The want of a quality legally to do, give, transmit, or receive something.

In general, the incapacity ceases with the cause which produces it. If the idiot should obtain his senses, or the married woman's husband die, their incapacity would be at an end. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

INCASTELLARE. To make a building serve the purpose of a castle. Jacob.

INCAUSTUNO or ENCAUSTUNO. Ink. Fleta, l. 2, c. 27, § 5.

INCENDIARY (Lat. incendium, a kindling). One who maliciously and wilfully sets another person's building on fire; one guilty of the crime of arson. See ARSON; BURNING.

INCEPTION. The commencement; the beginning. In making a will, for example, the writing is its inception. 3 Co. 31 b; Plowd. 343.

INCERTÆ PERSONÆ. Uncertain persons as posthumous heirs, a corporation, the poor, a juristic person, or persons who cannot be ascertained until after the execution of a will. Sohm. Inst. Rom. L. 104, 458.

INCEST. The carnal copulation of a man and a woman related to each other in any of the degrees within which marriage is prohibited by law. 1 Bish. Marr. & D. 112, 376, 442. It involves the assent of both parties; 39 Mich. 124; but it is held that it may exist as to the man although without the consent of the woman; 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1090; 99 Cal. 359. It is punished by fine and imprisonment, under the laws of most, if not all, of the states, but seems not at common law to be an indictable offence; 4 Bla. Com. 64; 78 N. C. 469. See 31 Tex. Cr. R. 186.

Preparations for an attempted incestuous marriage have been held not indictable; 14

Cal. 159. A man indicted for rape may be convicted of incest; 2 Met. 193; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 419. See Dane, Abr. Index; 6 Conn. 446; 11 Ga. 53; 1 Park. Cr. 344. See 20 Or. 437. And as to whether the crime is rape or incest may be left to the jury; 96 Mich. 449. Proof of one commission of the offence is sufficient for conviction; 13 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 360.

INCESTUOSI. Those offspring incestuously begotten. Mack. Rom. L. § 143.

INCH (Lat. uncia). A measure of length, containing one-twelfth part of a foot; originally supposed equal to three grains of barley laid end to end.

INCHOATE. That which is not yet completed or finished. Contracts are considered inchoate until they are executed by all the parties. During the husband's life, a wife has an inchoate right of dower; 2 Bla. Com. 130; so with the right of an unborn child to take by descent; 2 Paige, Ch. 35; and a covenant which purports to be tripartite, and is executed by only two of the parties, is incomplete, and no one is bound by it; 2 Halst. 142. See LOCUS PŒNITENTIÆ.

INCIDENT. This term is used both substantively and adjectively of a thing which, either usually or naturally and inseparably depends upon, appertains to, or follows another that is more worthy. For example, rent is usually incident to a reversion. 1 Hill. R. P. 243; while the right of alienation is necessarily incident to a fee-simple at common law, and cannot be separated by a grant; 1 Washb. R. P. 54. So a court baron is inseparably incident to a manor, in England; Kitch. 36; Co. Litt. 151. All nominate contracts and all estates known to common law have certain incidents which they draw with them and which it is not necessary to reserve in words. So the costs incurred in a legal proceeding are said to be incidental thereto. See Jacob, Law Dict.

INCIPIATUR (Lat.). In Practice. This word, which means "it is begun," signifies the commencement of the entry on the roll on signing judgment, etc. The custom is no longer necessary in England, and was unknown here. But see 3 Steph. Com. 566, n.

INCLOSURE. The extinction of common rights in fields and waste lands. 1 Steph. Com. 655.

The separation and appropriation of land by means of a fence, hedge, etc., together with such fence or hedge. 36 Wis. 44; 34 id. 672; 39 Vt. 331; 63 Ind. 530; 8 Hun 269; where, in a will, the executors were directed to inclose with an iron fence meeting-house grounds, school-house grounds, and burial ground, it was held that the intention was clear to inclose each of the grounds on all sides; 112 Pa. 52.

A paper or letter inclosed with another in an envelope.

INCLOSURE ACTS. English statutes regulating the subject of inclosure. The most notable was that of 1801, 41 Geo. III. c. 109.

INCLOSURE COMMISSION ACT, 1845. The statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 118, establishing a board of commissioners for England and Wales and empowering them, on the application of persons interested to the amount of one-third of the value of the land, and provided the consent of persons interested to the amount of two-thirds of the land and of the lord of the manor (in case the land be waste of a manor) be ultimately obtained, to inquire into the case and to report to parliament as to the expediency of making the inclosure. 1 Steph. Com. 655.

INCLUDE (Lat. in claudere to shut in, keep within). In a legacy of "one hundred dollars including money trusted" at a bank, it was held that the word "including" extended only to a gift of one hundred dollars; 132 Mass. 218; but in a bequest of a sum of money inclusive of a note of the legatee, it was held that the note was included in the legacy; 154 Pa. 340. In a contract to furnish a street paving machine, exclusive of patterns which were to be furnished by defendant, such patterns were found to be defective and incomplete, and on a second bid, where plaintiff agreed for increased cost to build the machine "including revised patterns and drawings," these words were held not to change the contract so as to require the plaintiffs to furnish a machine that would "work satisfactorily, as a machine," but that it only required the parts designed and constructed by them to be suitable for the intended purpose and all the machinery and workmanship to be good; 160 Pa. 317.

INCLUSIVE. Comprehended in computation. In computing time, as ten days from a particular time, the last day is generally to be included and the first excluded. See EXCLUSIVE; TIME; 154 Pa. 340, as to its use in a legacy.

INCOME. The gain which proceeds from property, labor, or business; it is applied particularly to individuals. The income of the state or government is usually called revenue. The word is sometimes considered synonymous with "profits," the gain as between receipts and payments; 4 Hill 23; "rent, and profits," "income," and "net income" of the estate are equivalent expressions; 5 Me. 203; it may mean "money" or the expectation of receiving money; 14 Blatch. 71; 15 Wall 63; and a note is ground for expecting income, and in the sense of a statute taxing incomes the amount thereof is to be returned when paid; id. 1. See 14 La. Ann. 815; 30 Barb. 637; 16 Fed. Rep. 14. In the ordinary commercial sense "income" especially when connected with the word "rent," may mean clear or net income. "Produce" or "product" as a substituted word may relieve a will from obscurity; 100 Pa.

481; 44 id. 347. In a gift of the income, etc., of shares of stock, it is not synonymous with increase, and while it will include dividends from the stock, will not embrace the sum by which the stock has increased; 62 Conn. 62. As to when dividends are to be considered as income, see 31 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 386, n; 136 Pa. 43; DIVIDEND.

It has been held that a devise of the income of land is in effect the same as a devise of the land itself; 9 Mass. 372; 80 N. Y. 320; 92 Pa. 254; s. c. 2 Am. Prob. Rep. 196; 72 Me. 109; and a gift of the income of a fund is a gift of the fund; 1 Johns. Ch. 494; 32 N. J. Eq. 591; and the income of property is a gift of the property; 53 Conn. 259; 105 Pa. 441; 2 Rep. Leg. 371.

INCOME TAX. See TAX.

INCOMMUNICATION. In Spanish Law. The condition of a prisoner who is not permitted to see or to speak with any person visiting him during his confinement.

A person accused cannot be subjected to this treatment unless it be expressly ordered by the judge, for some grave offence, and it cannot be continued for a longer period than is absolutely necessary. Art. 7. Reglamento de 26 Setiembre, 1835. This precaution is resorted to for the purpose of preventing the accused from knowing beforehand the testimony of the witnesses, or from attempting to corrupt them and concert such measures as will efface the traces of his guilt. As soon, therefore, as the danger of his doing so has ceased, the interdiction ceases likewise. Escricho.

INCOMPATIBILITY. Incapability of existing or being exercised together.

Thus the relations of landlord and of tenant cannot exist in one man at the same time in reference to the same land. Two offices may be incompatible either from their nature or by statutory provisions. See U. S. Const. art. 6, § 3, n. 5, art. 1, § 6, n. 2; 4 S. & R. 277; 17 id. 219; 46 How. Pr. 170; 9 S. C. 179; OFFICE.

Incompatibility is ordinarily not a ground for divorce; 12 La. Ann. 882; 6 Am. L. Reg. O. S. 740; 4 Greene 324; though in some states it is. See DIVORCE.

INCOMPETENCY. Lack of ability or fitness to discharge the required duty.

At Common Law. Judges and jurors are said to be incompetent from having an interest in the subject-matter. A judge is also incompetent to give judgment in a matter not within his jurisdiction. See JURISDICTION. With regard to the incompetency of a judge from interest, it is a maxim in the common law that no one should be a judge in his own cause (aliquis non debet esse iudex in propria causa); Co. Litt. 141 a. See 4 Com. Dig. 6; 43 La. Ann. 924; 31 Fla. 594. The greatest delicacy is constantly observed on the part of judges, so that they never act when there is the possibility of doubt whether they can be free from bias; and even a distant degree of relationship has induced a judge to decline to sit; 1 Knapp 376. Where one has acted as counsel, he cannot, subsequently, sit in judgment on the matter in which he has given his advice; 30 Fla. 595; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 449; 111 Mo. 526. The slightest degree of pecuniary interest is considered an insuperable objection. But at common law interest forms the only ground for challenging a judge. It is not a ground of challenge that he has given his opinion before; 2 Binn. 454. See 4 Mod. 226; 13 Mass. 340; Cox 190; 3 Ohio 289; 3 Cow. 725; 12 Conn. 88; 1 Penning. N. J. 185; 4 Yeates 466; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 648; 69 Tex. 300; 88 Ga. 151; Salk. 396; Bac. Abr. Courts (B). In New York it is held that a conviction of larceny, when one of the members of the trial court is related to the prisoner within the sixth degree, is void; 142 N. Y. 130. See JUDGE; JURY; COMPETENCY; INTEREST.

In Evidence. A witness may be at common law incompetent on account of a want of understanding, a defect of religious belief, a conviction of certain crimes, infamy of character, or interest; 1 Phill. Ev. 15. The last ground of incompetency is removed to a considerable degree in most states; and the second is greatly limited in modern practice. See WITNESS.

In French Law. Inability or insufficiency of a judge to try a cause brought before him, proceeding from lack of jurisdiction.

INCONCLUSIVE. Not finally decisive. Inconclusive presumptions are capable of being overcome by opposing proof.

INCONSULTO. In the Civil Law. Unadvisedly; unintentionally. Dig. 28, 4, 1.

INCONTINENCE. Impudicity; indulgence in unlawful carnal connection.

INCORPORATED. See INCORPORATION.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. A society of attorneys and solicitors whose function it is to carry out the acts of parliament and orders of court with reference to articulated clerks; to keep an alphabetical roll of attorneys and solicitors; to issue certificates to persons duly admitted and enrolled, and to exercise a general control over the conduct of solicitors in practice, and to bring cases of misconduct before the judges. 3 Steph. Com. 217.

INCORPORATION. The act of creating a corporation; that which is incorporated. A legal or political body formed by the union of individuals under certain conditions, rules, and laws, and having certain privileges and partial or perpetual succession.

In Civil Law. The union of one domain to another.

INCORPORATION BY REFERENCE. The bringing into one document in legal effect, of the contents of another by referring to the latter in such manner as to adopt it.

INCORPOREAL CHATTELS. The incorporeal rights or interests growing out of personal property, such as copyrights and patent rights, stocks and personal annuities. 2 Sandf. 552, 559; 2 Steph. Com. 9.

INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENT. Anything, the subject of property, which is inheritable and not tangible or visible. 2 Woodd. Lect. 4. A right issuing out of a thing corporate (whether real or personal) or concerning or annexed to or exercisable within the same. 2 Bla. Com. 20; 80 Wis. 222; 1 Washb. R. P. 10; Chal. R. P. 47; 18 Colo. 298.

Their existence is merely in idea and abstract contemplation, though their effects and profits may be frequently the object of the bodily senses; Co. Litt. 9a; Pothier, Traité des Choses § 2. According to Blackstone, there are ten kinds of incorporeal hereditaments: viz. advowsons, tithes, commons, ways, offices, dignities, franchises, corodies, annuities, and rents. 2 Bla. Com. 20. In the United States there are no advowsons, tithes, dignities, nor corodies, commons are rare, offices rare or unknown, and annuities have no necessary connection with land. 3 Kent 402, 454. And there are other incorporeal hereditaments not included in this list, as remainders and reversions dependent on a particular estate of freehold, easements of light, air, etc., and equities of redemption; 1 Washb. R. P. *11.

Incorporeal hereditaments were said to be in grant; corporeal, in livery: since a simple deed or grant would pass the former, of which livery was impossible, while livery was necessary to a transfer of the latter. But this distinction is now done away with, even in England. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 2; 1 Washb. R. P. 10; Will. R. P. 279, 364, 370; 13 Mass. 483.

INCORPOREAL PROPERTY. In Civil Law. That which consists in legal right merely. The same as choses in action at common law.

INCORRIGIBLE. Incapable of being corrected, amended, or improved.

Under the statute 17 Geo. II. c. 5, incorrigible rogues were subjected to two years' imprisonment in the house of correction, and for escaping from confinement therein were made felons and liable to transportation for seven years. A similar breach and escape by a vagabond or rogue constituted him an incorrigible rogue; 4 Bla. Com. 169.

INCORRUPTIBLE. That which cannot be affected by immoral or debasing influences, such as bribery or the hope of gain or advancement.

INCREASE. That which grows out of land or is produced by the cultivation of it. 23 Tex. 27. As to increase of risk in an insurance policy, see RISKS AND PERILS.

INCREASE, COSTS OF. See COSTS DE INCREMENTO; ACCRETION; INCOME; PROFIT.

INCULPATE. To accuse of crime; to impute guilt to; to bring or expose to blame; to censure. Webster.

INCUMBENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk resident on his benefice with cure: he is so called because he does, or ought to, bend the whole of his studies to his duties. In common parlance, it signifies one who is in possession of an office: as, the present incumbent. One does not become the incumbent of an office, until legally authorized to discharge its duties, by receiving his commission and taking the official oath; 11 Ohio St. 46.

INCUMBRANCE. Any right to, or interest in, land which may subsist in third persons, to the diminution of the value of the estate of the tenant, but consistently with the passing of the fee. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 4 Mass. 629; 113 N. Y. 81.

A public highway; 2 Mass. 97; 3 N. H. 335; 10 Conn. 431; 12 La. Ann. 541; 27 Vt. 739; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 545; 47 Ill. App. 278 (but see 46 Pa. 232; 16 Ind. 142; 22 Wis. 628; 87 Ala. 220; 58 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1081); a private right of way; 15 Pick. 68; 5 Conn. 497; an easement which is open, visible, and well known; 113 N. Y. 81; a claim of dower; 4 Mass. 630; 23 Ala. N. S. 616; though inchoate only; 2 Me. 22; 22 Pick. 447; 3 N. J. 260; an outstanding mortgage; 5 Me. 94; 30 id. 392; 133 U. S. 610; (other than one which the covenantee is bound to pay; 2 N. H. 458; 12 Mass. 304; 11 S. & R. 109; 4 Halst. 139; see 88 Mich. 94; 63 Vt. 53); a liability under the tax laws; 30 Vt. 655; 5 Ohio St. 271; 5 Wis. 407; see 148 Mass. 102; (but no tax or assessment can exist so as to be an incumbrance, until the amount is ascertained or determined; 113 N. Y. 644); an attachment resting upon land; 43 Conn. 129; 116 Mass. 392; a condition, the non-performance of which by the grantee may work a forfeiture of the estate; 4 Metc. Mass. 412; a paramount title; 3 Cush. 309; restriction as to the kind of building which may be erected on land; 75 Hun 70; a mechanic's lien; 51 Wis. 293; have been held incumbrances within the meaning of the covenant against incumbrances, contained in conveyances; Warv. Vend. 994. The term does not include a condition on which an estate is held; 3 Gray 515; 6 id. 572.

The vendor of real estate is bound in England to disclose incumbrances, and to deliver to the purchaser the instruments by which they were created or on which the defects arise; and the neglect of this is to be considered fraud; Sudg. Vend. 6; 1 Ves. Sen. 96. See 6 Ves. 193; 10 id. 470; 1 Sch. & L. 227; 7 S. & R. 73.

The interest on incumbrances is to be kept down by the tenant for life; 1 Washb. R. P. 95, 257, 573; 5 Johns. Ch. 482; 5 Ohio 28; to the extent of rents accruing; 31 E. L. & Eq. 345; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 60; and for any sum paid beyond that he becomes a creditor of the estate; 2 Atk. 463; 1 Bail. Eq. 397.

When the whole incumbrance is removed by a single payment, the share of the tenant for life is the present worth of an annuity for the life of the tenant equal to the annual amount of the interest which he would be obliged to pay; 1 Washb. R. P. 93, 573. The rule applies to estates held in dower; 10 Mass. 315, n.; 10 Paige, Ch. 71, 158; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 324; 7 H. & J. 367; in curtesy; 1 Washb. R. P. 142; in tail only in special cases; 1 Washb. R. P. 80; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 613; 3 P. Wms. 229. See COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

INCUR. To have liabilities cast upon one by act or operation of law, as distinguished from contract, where the party acts affirmatively. 15 How. Pr. 56.

INDEBITATUS ASSUMPSIT (Lat.). In Pleading. That species of action of assumpsit in which the plaintiff alleges, in his declaration, first a debt, and then a promise in consideration of the debt to pay the amount to the plaintiff.

It is so called from the words in which the promise is laid in the Latin form, translated in the modern form, being indebted he promised. The promise so laid is generally an implied one only. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 334; Steph. Pl. 318; 4 Co. 92 b. This form of action is brought to recover in damages the amount of the debt or demand; upon the trial the jury will, according to evidence, give verdict for whole or part of that sum; 3 Bla. Com. 155; Selw. N. P. 68.

Indebitatus assumpsit is in this distinguished from debt and covenant, which proceed directly for the debt, damages being given only for the detention of the debt. Debt lies on contracts by specialty as well as by parol, while indebitatus assumpsit lies only on parol contracts, whether express or implied; Bro. Act. at Law 317.

For the history of this form of action, see 3 Reeve, Hist. Com. Law; 2 Comyns, Contr. 549; 1 H. Bla. 550; 3 Bla. Com. 154; Yelv. 70; Papers by J. B. Ames, 2 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 53, 377. See ASSUMPSIT.

INDEBITI SOLUTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The payment to one of what is not due to him. If the payment was made by mistake, the civilians recovered it back by an action called condictio indebiti; with us, such money may be recovered by an action of assumpsit.

INDEBTEDNESS. The state of being in debt, without regard to the ability or inability of the party to pay the same. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 343; 2 Hill, Abr. 421.

But in order to create an indebtedness there must be an actual liability at the time, either to pay then or at a future time. If, for example, a person were to enter and become surety for another, who enters into a rule of reference, he does not thereby become a debtor to the opposite party until the rendition of the judgment on the award; 1 Mass. 134. As to indebtedness of a municipality, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

INDECENCY. An act against good behavior and a just delicacy. 2 S. & R. 91.

The law, in general, will repress indecency as being contrary to good morals; but, when the public good requires it, the mere indecency of disclosures does not suffice to exclude them from being given in evidence; Tayl. Ev. 816.

The following are examples of indecency: the exposure by a man of his naked person on a balcony, to public view, or bathing in public; 2 Campb. 89; 3 Day 103; 1 D. & B. 208; 18 Vt. 574; 5 Barb. 203; see 46 N. J. L. 16; or in the house of another in the presence of a young girl; 128 Mass. 52; or the exhibition of bawdy pictures; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 42; 2 S. & R. 91. This indecency is punishable by indictment. See 1 Kebl. 620; 2 Yerg. 482, 589; 1 Mass. 8; 1 Russ. Cr. 302; 4 Bla. Com. 65, n.; Burn, Just. Lewdness. And an ordinance making such exposure an offence without reference to the intent which accompanies the act, is a valid exercise of police power; 93 Mich. 135.

INDECENT ASSAULT. See ASSAULT.

INDECENT EXHIBITION. Any exhibition contra bonos mores, as the taking a dead body for the purpose of dissection or public exhibition. 2 T. R. 734.

INDECENT EXPOSURE. See EXPOSURE OF PERSON.

INDECENT LIBERTIES. See ASSAULT.

INDECENT PUBLICATIONS. Statutes forbidding the keeping, exhibiting, or sale of indecent books or pictures, and providing for their destruction, if seized, are within the police power of a state, and are constitutional. Cooley, Const. Lim. 748. See OBSCENITY; MAIL.

INDECIMABLE. Not tithable.

INDEFEASIBLE. That which cannot be defeated or undone. This epithet is usually applied to an estate or right which cannot be defeated.

INDEFENSUS (Lat.). One sued or impleaded who refuses or has nothing to answer.

INDEFINITE FAILURE OF ISSUE. See FAILURE OF ISSUE.

INDEFINITE NUMBER. A number which may be increased or diminished at pleasure.

When a corporation is composed of an indefinite number of persons, any number of them consisting of a majority of those present may do any act, unless it be otherwise regulated by the charter or by-laws.

INDEFINITE PAYMENT. That which a debtor who owes several debts to a creditor makes without making an appropriation: in that case the creditor has a right to make such appropriation.

INDEMNIFY. To secure or save harmless against loss or damage, of a specified character, which may happen in the future.

To compensate or reimburse one for a loss previously incurred; L. R. 14 Eq. 479. See 14 Minn. 467.

To indemnify is said to be synonymous with "to save harmless." 1 Root 292.

Indemnification is the act of indemnifying or making good a loss. Indemnificatus, indemnified. Indemnitas (formerly indempnis), without damage; harmless. Indemnitor, one who enters into a contract of indemnity for the benefit of another; indemnatee, one who is to be benefited by such a contract.

INDEMNITY. That which is given to a person to prevent his suffering damage. 2 M'Cord 279.

It is a rule established in all just governments that when private property is required for public use, indemnity shall be given by the public to the owner. This is the case in the United States. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

Contracts made for the purpose of indemnifying a person for doing an act for which he could be indicted, or an agreement to compensate a public officer for doing an act which is forbidden by law, or for omitting to do one which the law commands, are absolutely void. But when the agreement with an officer was not to induce him to neglect his duty, but to test a legal right, as to indemnify him for not executing a writ of execution, it was held to be good; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 780.

In general, a mere promise of indemnity to a third person is not within the statute of frauds; [1894] 2 Q. B. 885, aff. 8 B. & C. 728; 19 L. R. Eq. 198; 8 T. L. R. 668; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 406; 145 N. Y. 446; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1000; and this rule applies to a promise to indemnify the surety on a liquor-dealer's bond; 64 Conn. 264; to a contract of agency, by which the agent agrees to be responsible for the non-payment of debts which may thereafter become due by others; 69 L. T. N. S. 354; to a promise to indemnify one if he will indorse K.'s notes, so that K. can have them discounted; 145 N. Y. 446; and to a verbal promise of A to B to indemnify him if he will become surety for C for a debt of the latter to D; 41 Neb. 516. But it is held in Illinois, that a guarantee of indemnity to a surety is within the statute; 45 Ill. App. 155; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 164; aff. 49 Ill. App. 509. See GUARANTY; SURETYSHIP; INSURANCE.

INDEMNITY LANDS. Those lands which are, by the grant in aid of a railroad, allowed to be selected in lieu of parcels lost by previous disposition or reservation for other purposes, and the title to which accrues only from the time of their selection. 117 U. S. 232; 133 id. 513.

Title to indemnity lands does not vest in a railroad company until they are actually selected and the selection approved by the secretary of the interior; 141 U. S. 358.

INDENT (Lat. in, and dens, tooth). To cut in the shape of teeth.

Deeds of indenture were anciently written on the same parchment or paper as many times as there were parties to the instrument, the word chirographum being written between, and then the several copies cut apart in a zigzag or notched line (whence the name), part of the word chirographum being on either side of it; and each party kept a copy. The practice now is to cut the top or side of the deed in a waving or notched line; 2 Bla. Com. 295.

To bind by indentures; to apprentice; as, to indent a young man to a shoemaker. Webster, Dict.

In American Law. An indented certificate issued by the government of the United States at the close of the revolution for the principal or interest of the public debt. Ramsay, Hamilton, Webster; Eliot, Funding System 35; 5 McLean 178; Acts of April 30, 1790, sess. 2, c. 9, § 14, and of March 3, 1825, sess. 2, c. 65, § 17. The word is no longer in use in this sense.

INDENTURE. A formal written instrument made between two or more persons in different interests, as opposed to a deed poll, which is one made by a single person, or by several having similar interests.

Its name comes from a practice of indenting or scaloping such an instrument on the top or side in a waving line. This is not necessary in England at the present day, by stat. 8 & 9 Vic. c. 106, § 5, but was in Lord Coke's time, when no words of indenture would supply its place; 5 Co. 20. In this country it is a mere formal act, not necessary to the deed's being an indenture. See Bac. Abr. Leases, etc. (E 2); Com. Dig. Fait (C, and note d); Littleton § 370; Co. Litt. 143 b, 229 a; Cruise, Dig. t. 32, c. 1, s. 24; 2 Bla. Com. 294; 2 Washb. R. P. 587; 1 Steph. Com. 447; Will. R. P. 177. The ancient practice was to deliver as many copies of an instrument as there were parties to it. And as early as King John it became customary to write the copies on the same parchment, with the word chirographum, or some other word written between them, and then to cut them apart through such word, leaving part of each letter on either side the line, which was at first straight, afterwards indented or notched; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 89; Du Cange; 2 Washb. R. P. 587. See INDENT.

INDENTURE OF A FINE. Indentures made and engrossed at the chirographer's office and delivered to the cognizor and the cognizee, usually beginning with the words: "Hæc est finalis concordia." And then reciting the whole proceedings at length. 2 Bla. Com. 351; Moz. & W.

INDEPENDENCE. A state of perfect irresponsibility to any superior. The United States are free and independent of all earthly power.

Independence may be divided into political and natural independence. By the former is to be understood that we have contracted no ties except those which flow from the three great natural rights of safety, liberty, and property. The latter consists in the power of being able to enjoy a permanent well-being, whatever may be the disposition of those from whom we call ourselves independent. In that sense a nation may be independent with regard to most people, but not independent of the whole world. See DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Questions as to the power of municipalities to appropriate money for the celebration of the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence have arisen. It has been held that no such power exists; 2 Denio 110; 22 Conn. 522; Allen 103.

INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

One who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, and without being subject to the control of his employer, except as to the result of his work. 38 Tenn. 692.

The term is also defined to denote one who has the right to select, employ, and control the action of the workmen; 40 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 104; 66 Cal. 509; 80 Ill. App. 185; one who is subject to his employer as to the results of his work only. 7 Lea 367.

A still broader definition has been given as follows:—"Where a person is employed to perform a certain kind of work, in the nature of repairs or improvements to a building, by the owner thereof, which requires the exercise of skill and judgment as a mechanic, the execution of which is left entirely to his discretion, without any restriction as to its exercise, and no limitation as to the authority conferred in respect to the same, and no provision is especially made as to the time in which the work is to be done, or as to the payment for the services rendered, and the compensation is dependent upon the value thereof, such person does not occupy the relation of servant under the control of the master, but is an independent contractor." 101 N. Y. 377.

Any one who follows a recognized independent calling has been held to be an independent contractor; as a slater; 71 Me. 318; an architect; 30 Md. 179; a horse trainer; 11 Bradw. 39; a manufacturer of shingles; 46 Wis. 138; a builder; 11 Bush 464; a licensed public carman; 2 Daly 271; or drayman; 2 Mich. 368; or drover; 12 Ad. & El. 737; a plumber; 6 Phila. 256; and a stevedore; 19 Fed. Rep. 926; 88 Pa. 269; 6 L. R. C. P. 24; 11 Hun 354; 29 La. Ann. 791; and the mode of payment and the fact that materials are furnished by the employer have been held to have but little weight in determining whether the employee is an independent contractor or not; 15 Fed. Rep. 875; 61 Miss. 581. The rule is that where a person is under the entire direction and control of another he is to be considered his servant, no matter who pays him; 6 M. & W. 497; 5 B. & C. 560. The test to determine whether one who renders service to another does so as a contractor or not is to ascertain whether he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work and not as to the means by which it was accomplished; 101 N. Y. 385.

In cases of an independent contract, the employer is not responsible; 5 Gray 349; 103 Mass. 194; 30 Barb. 229; 5 N. Y. 48; 30 Hun 391; 86 Pa. 153; 103 id. 32; 25 Ill. 438; 83 id. 354; 88 Ala. 591; 39 Ohio St. 466; 66 Cal. 509; 28 La. Ann. 943; 7 H. & N. 826; 4 Exch. 244; 2 C. P. Div. 369; 57 Vt. 252; 19 Neb. 620; 61 Miss. 581; 11 Wis. 180. In 1 Bos. & P. 404, the rule was laid down that not only was the employer liable for the negligence of a contractor, but for that of a servant of a sub-contractor. This decision was followed in some of the earlier English and American cases, but the weight of authority in both countries has overruled it, the question of its authority having been decisively settled in each country, in what have become leading cases; 4 Exch. 244; 3 Gray 349. But see 6 H. & N. 488, and 2 Black 418, with the criticism of these cases in 87 Va. 711.

A like rule governs the question of the liability of the employer and the contractor for the negligence and torts of the sub-contractor or his servants; 7 H. & N. 826; 11 C. B. 867; 2 C. P. Div. 369; 80 Pa. 102; 64 N. Y. 138.

If he undertakes to provide the material, he is liable for an injury caused by his failure to provide it; 5 Bosw. 447; and generally, he is liable if the contract reserves to him such a power of supervision or control of the work as will destroy the free agency of the contractor, whether the supervision be exercised by himself or by persons designated by him; 92 N. Y. 10; 39 Ohio St. 466; 57 Pa. 374; 111 Pa. 316; 30 Wis. 365; 61 Ill. 431; 7 La. Ann. 321; 9 Col. 554; but not if the power of supervision reserved is not such as to interfere with the discretion of the contractor in the manner of executing the work, but is confined to seeing that the intended result is produced; 41 Ill. 502; 124 Ind. 376. A recent case accurately expresses the exact rule as to supervision to be that the employer, through its chief engineer, may reserve the right to criticize the work but not to control it; 87 Va. 711.

The employer will be held liable if the injurious act complained of was contemplated by the contract; 28 Minn. 156; 46 Wis. 188; 26 Ill. App. 263; if the contract work is necessarily dangerous or harmful; 84 Ala. 469; 41 Ohio St. 465; 19 W. Va. 323; 103 Mo. 172; 3 L. R. H. L. 330; and when work is per se dangerous and the employer does not stipulate that the contractor shall use proper precautions to avoid injury to others, the employer is liable; 2 Duv. 137; 6 Daly 469; or when the work contracted for becomes or occasions a public nuisance, unless it be due solely to the negligence of the contractor; 44 Ia. 27; 111 Ind. 195; 116 N. Y. 588; 83 Ill. 354; 111 Pa. 316; 112 Mass. 96; or when the contractor is incompetent; 80 Hun 60; 35 N. J. L. 17; and that the employer was ignorant of such incompetency will not excuse him; id.; but see 114 Mo. 55; 4 E. D. Smith 281. But it was held that when the defendants employed a carpenter and bridge builder of experience to build a bridge, it was not enough for the plaintiff to show that the work was unskillfully done; it must appear that the defendants were guilty of negligence in selecting him; that they either knew, or with proper diligence ought to have known, his incompetency; and the law presumes they made a proper selection; hence the burden of showing the contrary rests upon those who assert it; 91 Pa. 185, 191.

After acceptance of the contract work, the employer will be liable for an injury caused by a defect in it; 125 Mass. 232; 15 Minn. 304; 118 Pa. 362; 123 id. 220; 92 N. Y. 10; 29 Cal. 243; 51 Tex. 503; 18 Kan. 34; and, if ratified by him, for the tortious acts of the contractor; 102 Mass. 211; 81 Ga. 337.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation it has been held that such a corporation cannot rid itself of responsibility for the acts of an independent contractor; 66 N. Y. 181; as he is acting under the authority of the district or city council, and without such authority, he would be a trespasser on the streets; 74 L. T. Rep. 69; and notwithstanding the nature of the work to be performed, it is the duty of the municipality to see that the streets are in a safe condition for travel; 14 Bush 87; 49 Ga. 316; 53 Md. 110; 41 Barb. 381; 2 Mo. App. 571; 9 Humph. 760; contra, 46 Pa. 213; or, as recently held in England, so to construct its sewers as not to injure the gas mains or other underground conveniences, and the municipality was held liable even when there was an independent contractor for the injury caused by an explosion in a private house because of an escape of gas from a main broken by the negligence of the contractor; [1896] 1 Q. B. 335.

And this rule is to be applied even though the contractor has stipulated that he will be responsible for all damages that may be caused in the execution of the work; 49 Me. 119; 42 Mo. App. 392; 116 N. Y. 558; 18 Ore. 426; contra, 53 Barb. 629. It has been held that where there is a statutory requirement that the contract be given to the lowest bidder, the municipality was not liable; 6 Cal. 528. See 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 352; 29 Am. L. Rev. 229; 3 Alb. L. J. 261. See MASTER AND SERVANT; MUNICIPAL CORPORATION; NEGLIGENCE.

INDEPENDENT PROMISES. Those made in a contract or agreement upon which one party has a right of action against the other for any injury sustained by him by reason of a breach of the covenants or promises in his favor, and where an allegation of non-performance of his covenant by the plaintiff is no defence to such action.

When the performance of one depends or is conditional on the prior performance of the other, the agreements or covenants are said to be dependent. 4 Rawle 26; 5 Wend. 496. Where performance of each is dependent or conditional upon performance of the other, they are mutually dependent.

Where there are promises on both sides in an agreement,—executory considerations,—it always becomes a question whether one party is bound to perform his before the opposite party shall be required to perform those on his side. When the agreements are dependent, neither party is bound actually to perform his part of the agreement to entitle him to an action for a breach by the other; it is enough that he was able to perform his part and offered to do so; 14 Conn. 479; 14 Me. 476; 15 La. Ann. 675.

Where the consideration is executory, technically speaking, the promise and not the performance is the consideration, and hence the obligation of one may be independent of the performance of the other. Upon examination and proper construction of mutual promises, it may appear "that the obligation of the one promise is made expressly or impliedly conditional upon the due performance of the other; and then the performance of the promise, constituting the executory consideration, is a condition precedent to the liability to perform the other promise; in the latter case the mutual promises are called dependent, and in the former they are called independent." Leake, Cont. 344.

In Jones v. Barkley, 2 Dougl. 684, Lord Mansfield thus classified mutual promises: "There are three kinds of covenants. 1. Such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favor, and where it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. 2. There are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenants. 3. There is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and, in these, if one party was ready, and offered, to perform his part, and the other neglected, or refused, to perform his, he who was ready and offered has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act." In this case, it was clearly laid down that the criterion by which it is determined whether promises are dependent or not, is the intention of the parties, and this is to be determined from the whole contract; id.; 2 W. & S. 227; 4 id. 527; 13 How. 307; 3 Bing. N. S. 355; 29 L. J. C. P. 253; 30 id. 65; or as Lord Kenyon aptly says, "It must depend on the good sense of the case;" 6 Term 570. The rule was clearly stated in a recent case: "The question whether covenants are dependent or independent must be determined in each case upon the proper construction to be placed upon the language employed by the parties to express their agreement. If the language is clear and unambiguous it must be taken according to its plain meaning as expressive of the intention of the parties, and, under settled principles of judicial decision, should not be controlled by the supposed inconvenience or hardship that may follow such construction. If the parties think proper, they may agree that the right of one to maintain an action against another shall be conditional or dependent upon the plaintiff's performance of covenants entered into on his part. On the other hand, they may agree that the performance by one shall be a condition precedent to the performance by the other. The question in each case is, which intent is disclosed by the language employed in the contract;" 153 U. S. 364, 576; and the intention is to be discovered from the order of time in which the acts are to be done, rather than from the construction of the agreement or the arrangement of the words; 4 Wash. C. 714; 6 Harr. & J. 85. See also 11 Pick. 151; 2 Cush. 287; 26 Conn. 176; 6 Gray 407.

It is said that the dependency may be expressed or implied, as the condition is expressed or implied, and that the doctrine of implied dependency was introduced by Lord Mansfield, in Kingston v. Preston, cited in 2 Dougl. 684, before which, if there was no expressed dependency, a breach by one party was no defence to an action by the other and only gave him a cross-action; Harr. Cont. 153.

What is meant by implied dependency may be briefly stated: From the definition of dependency it is clear that the term is used to describe certain conditions which necessarily belong only to bilateral contracts. As these conditions must originate in the intention of contracting parties, if expressed in the contract, they are governed by the law of conditions generally. In the absence of precise expression, the law imputes an intention, which creates an implied condition. The principles which regulate these conditions constitute the law of implied dependency and they are peculiar to the subject; Langd. Sum. Cont. 134.

The question of dependency is so much a matter of intention that there is much truth in the remark "that arbitrary rules are useless"; Harr. Cont. 153. Nevertheless certain rules of construction have been generally agreed upon and applied in the interpretation of contracts, with respect to this subject.

A note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 319, termed by Pollock "the classic on the subject," Poll. Cont. 386, gives the five rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams which are most referred to (Langd. Sel. Cas. Cont. 641, n. 5). These rules are adopted, in a different order, in Leake, Cont. 345-7, and substantially the same general principles have been grouped in four rules; 1 Bouv. Inst. 701; Platt, Cov. 80. These classifications are extremely interesting as affording a good illustration of what is practically an early codification of the principles governing an important branch of the law of contract, and, while the first is accessible, their repetition here is proper, as they must necessarily be referred to in connection with the brief statement which present limitations permit, of the rules of construction generally accepted.

The rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams are: 1. If a day be appointed for payment of money or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration of the money or other act. 2. But when a day is appointed for the payment of money, etc., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration of the money, etc., is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, etc., before performance. 3. Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant without averring performance in the declaration. 4. But where the mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, and performance must be averred. 5. Where two acts are to be done at the same time, as, where A covenants to convey an estate to B on such a day, and, in consideration thereof B covenants to A a sum of money on the same day, neither can maintain an action without showing performance of, or an offer to perform, his part, though it is not certain which of them is obliged to do the first act; and this particularly applies to all classes of sale. 1 Wms. Saund. 320 b.

The rules referred to as given by Bouvier are: When the mutual covenants go the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other.

Where the act of one party must necessarily precede any act of the other, as where one agrees to manufacture an article from materials to be furnished by the other, or to pay for goods on delivery, or to pay money on demand, the covenants are independent, and one act is a condition precedent to the other.

When mutual covenants go only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and when a breach may be paid for in damages, the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and is not allowed to plead it as a condition precedent.

When a day is appointed for the payment of money, and the day comes before the thing for which the money is to be paid can be done, then, though the agreement is to pay the money before the doing of the thing, yet an action may be brought for the money before the performance; because the agreement is positive that the money shall be paid on that day, and the presumption is that the party intended to rely on his remedy and not on a previous performance. Bouv. Inst. 701.

Benjamin also lays down five rules based on those of Williams, but not following them in detail. The first combines rules 1 and 2; the second, third, and fourth are rules 3, 4, and 5 respectively; and the fifth is a brief statement, substantially, of the rule of intention of Lord Mansfield in Jones v. Barkley, which it is said "remains unchanged"; Benj. Sales § 561. For these rules of Benjamin see id. § 562.

Dependent promises can only exist as part of the same contract, but more than one contract may be included in one instrument; Harr. Cont. 159; Langd. Sum. Cont. § 115. So, on the other hand, each of two mutual promises may be contained in a separate instrument, each complete in itself and neither making any reference to the other. In such case, it has been said, there is no doubt that each forms a separate unilateral contract; id. § 117.

To be dependent, a simultaneous performance must have been intended; 8 Term 366; 84 Ill. 448; 13 Pick. 281; it is not sufficient that the performance of each promise was intended to be within the same period; 11 H. L. Cas. 337. They must be capable of performance at the same time and place, and involve an exchange of rights; Langd. Sum. Cont. § 133; but if a time is fixed for the performance of one, and not the other, they are dependent; id.; 4 H. & N. 500; 7 Term 125.

All the stipulations of a contract should be considered in determining the question of dependency, which may be general,—as to the whole consideration on each side,—or, it may exist only as to two distinct promises. Thus a contract may be partly bilateral and partly unilateral and as to the former part, the promises may be dependent.

A unilateral contract, from its nature, can contain only independent promises.

The conditions which must exist to render implied dependency possible are thus enumerated: "1st. The subject of implied dependency must be a covenant or a promise, as distinguished from a debt. 2dly. The subject of dependency and the thing upon which it depends must be of the same nature, i. e. they must both be covenants or both be promises. 3dly. The covenants or the promises must be mutual. 4thly. They must each be a part of the same contract; and it does not follow that they are so because they are made at the same time, or are contained in the same instrument. 5thly. If in writing, they must each be contained in the same instrument, or in different instruments which refer to each other. 6thly. The contract which contains the covenants or the promises must be wholly bilateral, or else it must clearly appear that the covenants or promises in question were given and received in payment for each other. 7thly. The performance of each of the covenants or promises must, it seems, be equally certain in legal contemplation;" Langd. Sum. Cont. § 120.

When the mutual contracts go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other, but where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration, it is not a condition precedent, but an action lies for the breach of it; 1 H. Bla. 273, note; 2 W. Bla. 1312; 11 Pick. 151; 21 N. Y. 547; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 e, rules 3 & 4; 29 L. J. Ex. 73. Professor Langdell goes further and insists that two promises are not mutually dependent unless the performance of one is full payment for the performance of the other; Langd. Sum. Cont. §§ 133, 136; but Professor Harriman considers this "theory of equivalency," though "most ingeniously developed," as not "based on satisfactory authority"; Harr. Cont. 158.

This difference of opinion between these able writers on the subject is itself sufficient to show that the point is not definitely settled. Possibly the lack of precise authority upon this single point of a subject, of which the substantial principles have been settled for more than a century, might be considered as fairly indicating that it is more interesting than material,—rather theoretical than practical. See [1894] App. Cas. 266. It should, perhaps, rather be said that differences of opinion (of which another on a very practical point is noted infra) between these two writers who have, more than any others, philosophically examined the subject, indicate that the generalizations of Mr. Serjeant Saunders, while containing the essential principles, are to be applied only with some modification to modern conditions. It is therefore essential that the student or practitioner in dealing with particular cases should include in his researches both the ancient learning and the modern investigations which have illuminated the topic. To these it is hoped that this title may furnish a reference,—it is manifestly possible to do little more, in the way of critical examination and comparison of cases.

Where a day is appointed for payment of money or doing any act, and such day must or may happen before the thing which is the consideration of the payment or performance of the other act, is to be made or done, the promises are independent; 6 Term 570; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 b, rule 1; 14 Wend. 219; 2 Johns. 272; 5 id. 78; 2 Pick. 300; a distinction has been drawn, however, as to whether the time of the latter payment or performance is fixed entirely by reference to the former, and when it is so, the first is a condition precedent; 6 Cow. 296; otherwise, if it is to be determined without reference to the other; 10 A. & E. 50; 10 M. & W. 355; 6 C. B. 103.

It is the second of Serjeant Williams' rules, and the view is supported by Leake (Cont. 346), that if the day appointed is to happen after the act or payment, the promises are dependent; the cases cited being 18 C. B. 673 and 25 L. J. C. P. 254. The view that the last promise to be performed is dependent,—the other not,—is supported by Langdell, Summary of Contracts § 122, on the authority of Grant v. Johnson, 1 Seld. 247, which is put directly upon that rule. But Harriman dissents from this view and considers the authority relied upon by Langdell as "unsound in its reasoning," and he subjects it to severe criticism, as the result of what he terms the "peculiar and erroneous doctrine" of the New York courts; Harr. Cont. 154. In this connection it is to be observed also that the rule thus questioned is not included in the fundamental rules of construction set forth in Bouvier's Institutes, citing Platt on Covenants, supra.

If two acts are to be done at the same time the promises are mutually dependent; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 e, rule 5; 9 C. B. 132; 9 Q. B. 164; but each must be capable of performance concurrently, i. e. in a moment of time; the object of both must be an exchange of property or right; and it must be between the immediate parties to the contract and capable of being performed at the same place; Langd. Sum. Cont. § 69; 6 Cow. 296.

In case of contracts for payment of purchase money of land by instalments it is said that the promises to pay those instalments which become due before the date set for the delivery of the deed are absolute and independent, and in no way affected by a failure to deliver the deed at the time specified. But where the deed is to be delivered simultaneously with the payment of the last instalment, then on payment of the previous instalments the tender of the deed and the tender of the last instalment become mutual concurrent conditions; 13 Pick. 281; 84 Ill. 448; 5 id. 561; 39 id. 354; Harr. Cont. 156.

Where a contract is made for the sale of goods to be delivered in instalments each to be paid for on delivery, it was held that the promises were dependent, and the failure to deliver one instalment as stipulated released the other party from the obligation to accept future deliveries; 115 U. S. 188. In this case the supreme court reviewed the English cases and considered the doctrine of Hoare v. Rennie, 5 H. & N. 19, as better supported by English authority than Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, and Brandt v. Lawrence, 1 Q. B. Div. 344; the case relied upon to establish this view was Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455, and it was considered as not contravened by Mersey Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434. See, also, 97 N. Y. 216; 12 R. I. 82; 60 Pa. 182; contra, 2 Allen 492; 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 59; 21 id. 398, n.

INDETERMINATE. That which is uncertain, or not particularly designated: as, if I sell you one hundred bushels of wheat, without stating what wheat. See CONTRACT.

INDIA. A dependency of Great Britain, in Southern Asia. By 21 and 22 Vict. c. 106 (1858), the territories of the Indian Empire were transferred from the East India Company to the British Crown, and its government was settled by the act 32 and 33 Vict. c. 97. The Executive is vested in a governor-general, or viceroy appointed by the crown, who, acting under the powers of state, has power to make laws in the dominion of Indian princes as well as for all persons in British India. He is assisted by a council of seven, consisting of the commander-in-chief and six members appointed by the crown, with a centralized system of governors, etc., for provinces, and commissioners for divisions and districts. The government is carried on by the secretary of state and council of fifteen. Members of council are appointed for ten years by the secretary of state. There are six administrative departments and also a legislative department.

INDIAN. The name of the aboriginal inhabitants of America.

In general, Indians have no political rights in the United States; they cannot vote at the general elections for officers, nor hold office. In New York they are considered as citizens, and not as aliens, owing allegiance to the government and entitled to its protection; 20 Johns. 188, 633. But it was ruled that the Cherokee nation in Georgia was a distinct community; 6 Pet. 515. See 8 Cow. 189; 9 Wheat. 673; 14 Johns. 181, 332; 18 id. 506. The title of the Indians to land was that of occupation merely, but could be divested only by purchase or conquest; 2 Humph. 19; 1 Dougl. 546; 2 McLean 412; 8 Wheat. 571; 2 Washb. R. P. 521; 3 Kent 378.

By act of March 3, 1871, no Indian nation or tribe within the United States shall be recognized as an independent nation with whom it may contract by treaty, but prior treaties are not to be thereby impaired.

By act of March 3, 1885, any Indian committing upon the person or property of another Indian or any other person, murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, arson, burglary, or larceny, within any territory and within or without an Indian reservation, is subject to the laws of the territory, and shall be tried in the same manner and be subject to the same penalties as other persons charged with the same crimes; and if such offence be committed within a reservation in a state, he shall be subject to the same laws, etc., as if it were committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. This act was held constitutional in 118 U. S. 375. See 151 U. S. 577; 81 Fed. Rep. 625.

The crime of murder committed by one Cherokee Indian upon the person of another within the jurisdiction of the Cherokee nation is not an offence against the United States; 163 U. S. 376.

The indictment, the venue of the trial, and the jury on the prosecution of an Indian for murder committed in a territory are to be according to the territorial laws; 130 U. S. 343. See 2 Harv. L. Rev. 169; Rep. Am. Bar Assn. 1891, 261.

The provisions in the treaty of February 4, 1869, with the Bannock Indians, whose reservation was within the limits of what is now the State of Wyoming, that "they shall have the right to hunt upon the unoccupied lands of the United States so long as game may be found thereon," etc., does not give them the right to exercise this privilege within the limits of that state in violation of the laws; 163 U. S. 504.

The act of February 8, 1887, provides for the allotment of lands to Indians in severalty. By it Indians receiving allotments thereby have the benefit of, and are subject to, the laws both civil and criminal of the state or territory in which they reside.

Every Indian born in the United States to whom an allotment shall have been made by this act, or under any law or treaty, and any Indian born within the United States who has voluntarily taken up his residence therein apart from any Indian tribe and adopted the habits of civilized life, is made a citizen of the United States, without impairing his right to tribal property.

An Indian woman who marries a citizen of the United States, voluntarily resides apart from her tribe, and adopts the habits of civilized life, becomes a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides; 57 Fed. Rep. 959; but in a few states, marriages between white persons and Indians are forbidden by statute; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 26. See CITIZENS; INDIAN TRIBE.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS ACTS.

As early as May 19, 1796, an act was passed by the United States congress, providing an eventual indemnification to citizens of the United States for depredations committed by Indians in taking or destroying their property; 1 St. L. 472. Other acts of a similar character were passed from time to time. By the act of March 3, 1891, congress conferred on the court of claims "jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and finally adjudicate all claims for property of citizens of the United States taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any band, tribe, or nation in amity with the United States, without just cause or provocation on the part of the owner or agent in charge, and not returned or paid for;" this embraced cases theretofore examined and allowed by the Interior Department, and cases authorized to be examined under the act of congress making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, approved March 3, 1885, and under subsequent acts. See 1 Sup. Rev. Stat. 913.

INDIAN TERRITORY. One of the territories of the United States. It is bounded on the north by the state of Kansas, on the east by the states of Arkansas and Missouri, on the south by the state of Texas, and on the west and north by the territory of Oklahoma. It comprises the Indian reservations of the Quapaw Agency and of the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, the five civilized tribes. The constitution and all general laws of the United States which prohibit crimes and misdemeanors in the jurisdiction of the United States, and all laws relating to national banking associations, have the same force and effect in the Indian Territory as elsewhere in the United States. See 1 Sup. R. S. pp. 731-738.

The territory is divided into three judicial districts and has United States district and circuit court and a court of appeals.

The criminal laws of Arkansas are held to be in force, except where the punishment for the same offence has been provided for both by the laws of Arkansas and of the United States, in which case the laws of the United States will govern, and all laws heretofore enacted conferring jurisdiction upon United States courts held in Arkansas, Kansas, and Texas, outside the limits of Indian Territory, as to offences committed in said Indian Territory, are by act of March 1, 1895, repealed. See 2 Sup. R. S. 392-398.

INDIAN TRIBE. A separate and distinct community or body of the aboriginal Indian race of men found in the United States.

Such a tribe, situated within the boundaries of a state, and exercising the powers of government and sovereignty, under the national government, is deemed politically a state,—that is, a distinct political society, capable of self-government; but it is not deemed a foreign state in the sense of the constitution. It is rather a domestic dependent nation. Such a tribe may properly be deemed in a state of pupillage; and its relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to a guardian; 5 Pet. 1, 16; 20 Johns. 193; 3 Kent 308; Story, Const. § 1096; 118 U. S. 384; 4 How. 567; 1 McLean 254; 6 Hill 546; 8 Ala. n. s. 48. "They were and always have been regarded as having a semi-independent position when they preserved their tribal relations; not as states, not as nations, not as possessed of the full attributes of sovereignty, but as a separate people with the power of regulating their internal and social relations, and thus far not brought under the laws of the Union or of the state within whose limits they resided;" 118 U. S. 375. See 163 id. 84. Their local self-government is subject to the supreme legislative authority of the United States; 135 U. S. 641.

The United States has power to pass such laws as may be necessary to their full protection and to punish all offences committed against them or by them within their reservation; 151 U. S. 577. No state can, either by its constitution or other legislation, withdraw the Indians within its limits from the operation of the laws of congress regulating trade with them; notwithstanding any rights it may confer on them as electors or citizens; 3 Wall. 407; 5 id. 737, 761. See 53 Minn. 354; nor can it authorize leases of Indian lands; 82 Hun 396. Several Indian tribes within the limits of the United States have an organized government. See CHOCTAW NATION; CHICKASAW NATION; CHEROKEE NATION. The pueblo Indians of New Mexico are not an Indian tribe within the meaning of the acts of congress; 94 U. S. 614. The Indians residing in Maine, whose tribal organizations have ceased to exist, are not "Indian Tribes," within the treaty-making power of the federal government; 84 Me. 465. The policy of congress is to vest in the courts of the Cherokee nation jurisdiction of all controversies between Indians, or in which a member of the nation is the only party; 141 U. S. 107. See IN AMITY; INDIAN.

INDIANA. The name of one of the states of the United States.

This state was admitted into the Union by virtue of a resolution of congress, approved December 11, 1816.

The boundaries of the state are defined, and the state has concurrent jurisdiction with the state of Kentucky on the Ohio river, and with the state of Illinois on the Wabash. As to the soil, the southern boundary of Indiana is low-water mark on the Ohio river.

The first constitution of the state was adopted in the year 1816, and has since been superseded by the present constitution, which was adopted in the year 1851.

LEGISLATIVE POWER. This is vested in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives. The senate is composed of fifty members, elected by the people for the term of four years. The house of representatives consists of one hundred members, elected by the people for the term of two years.

The sessions of the general assembly are held biennially, at the capitol of the state, commencing on the Thursday next after the first Monday of January of every odd year, unless a different day or place is appointed by law. But if in the opinion of the governor the public welfare shall require it, he may at any time call a special session.

EXECUTIVE POWER. The governor is elected quadrennially, at the annual election in October, to serve for the term of four years. He is not eligible to reelection. He must be at least thirty years of age, have been a citizen of the United States for five years, have resided in the state five years next preceding his election, and must not hold any office under the United States or this state.

The lieutenant-governor shall be chosen at every election for a governor, in the same manner, continue in office for the same time, and possess the same qualifications.

A secretary of state, an auditor, a treasurer, and a superintendent of education are elected biennially, for the term of two years. They are to perform such duties as may be enjoined by law; and no person is eligible to either of said offices more than four years in any period of six years.

JUDICIAL POWER. The supreme court consists of five judges, a majority of whom form a quorum, which shall have jurisdiction co-extensive with the limits of the state in appeals and writs of error, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by law. It shall also have such original jurisdiction as the general assembly may confer, and upon the decision of every case shall give a statement, in writing, of each question arising in the record of such case, and the decision of the court thereon.

The appellate court consists of five judges, and has the exclusive jurisdiction of all appeals from the circuit, superior, and criminal courts, in cases of misdemeanor; certain cases arising before a justice of the peace; actions seeking the recovery of a money judgment only, where the amount in controversy does not exceed $3,500; cases for the recovery of specific personal property; actions between landlord and tenant; appeals from orders allowing or disallowing claims against decedent's estates, and jurisdiction in certain other minor matters. Acts 1891, pp. 39-44; acts 1893, pp. 29-30.

The circuit courts shall each consist of one judge. The state shall, from time to time, be divided into judicial circuits. They shall have such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law.

Tribunals of conciliation may be established, with such powers and duties as shall be prescribed by law, or the powers and duties of the same may be conferred on other courts of justice; but such tribunals, or other courts when sitting as such, shall have no power to render judgment to be obligatory on the parties, unless they voluntarily submit their matters of difference and agree to abide by the judgment of such tribunal or court.

The judges of the supreme court are elected by the qualified voters to serve for a term of seven years. The circuit judges are elected for terms of six years, and the judges of the courts of common pleas, of which there are twenty-one in the state, are elected for terms of four years.

The state is divided into as many districts as there are judges of the supreme court; formed of contiguous territory as nearly equal in population as, without dividing a county, the same can be made. One of said judges shall be elected from each district, and reside therein; but said judge shall be elected by the electors of the state at large,

Justices of the peace, in sufficient numbers, are to be elected for the term of four years in each township. Their courts are courts of record.

Amendments to the constitution of 1851 were submitted to a vote of the people in the spring of 1880, but were decided, on technical grounds, not to have been adopted; 69 Ind. 505; in March, 1881, they were again voted on and adopted. They do not affect the provisions as given above.

INDICARE. In the Civil Law. To show or discover. To fix or tell the price of a thing. Calv. Lex.

INDICATIF. An abolished writ by which a prosecution was in some cases removed from a court-christian to the Queen's Bench. Encyc. Lon.

INDICATION. In the Law of Evidence. A sign or token; a fact pointing to some inference or conclusion. Bur. Circ. Ev. 251, 263.

INDICATIVE EVIDENCE. This is not evidence so called, but the mere suggestion of evidence proper, which may possibly be secured if the suggestion is followed up. Brown.

INDICAVIT. A writ or prohibition that lay for a patron of a church where the clergyman presented by him to a benefice is made defendant in an action of tithes commenced in the ecclesiastical court of another clergyman, where the tithes in question extended to the fourth part of the benefice; for in this case the suit belonged to the king's court (i. e. the common law court) by the Stat. Westm. 2, c. 5. Cowel. The person sued might also avail himself of this writ. Toml.

INDICIA (Lat.). Signs; marks. Conjectures which result from circumstances not absolutely certain and necessary, but merely probable, and which may turn out not to be true, though they have the appearance of truth.

The term is much used in the civil law in a sense nearly or entirely synonymous with circumstantial evidence. It denotes facts which give rise to inferences, rather than the inferences themselves. However numerous indicia may be, they only show that a thing may be, not that it has been. An indicium can have effect only when a connection is essentially necessary with the principal. Effects are known by their causes, but only when the effects can arise only from the causes to which they are attributed. When several causes may have produced one and the same effect, it is, therefore, unreasonable to attribute it to any particular one of such causes.

The term is much used in common law of signs or marks of identity: for example, in replevin it is said that property must have indicia, or ear-marks, by which to distinguish it from other property of the same kind. So it is much used in the phrase "indicia of crime," in a sense similar to that of the civil law.

INDICTABLE. Capable of being indicted; liable to be indicted; as, an indictable offender.

That forms a subject or ground of indictment.

ment; as, an indictable offence. Encyc. Dict.

INDICTED. Having had an indictment found against him.

INDICTEE. One who is indicted. See INDITEE.

INDICTION. The space of fifteen years.

It was used in dating at Rome and in England. The institution of indiction dates from the time of Constantine I., Sept. 1, or, according to some authorities, Sept. 15, 312; but the first instance of their use is mentioned in the Theodosian Code, under the reign of Constantius II. The papal court adopted computation by indictions about 800, the commencement of the first indiction being referred to Jan. 1, 313. The first year was reckoned the first of the first indiction, and so on till the fifteen years afterwards. The sixteenth year was the first year of the second indiction; the thirty-first year was the first year of the third indiction, etc.

INDICTMENT. In Criminal Practice. A written accusation against one or more persons of a crime or misdemeanor, presented to, and preferred upon oath or affirmation by, a grand jury legally convoked. 4 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 126; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 152; Bac. Abr.; Com. Dig.; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 168.

An accusation at the suit of the crown, found to be true by the oaths of a grand jury (q. v.).

A written accusation of a crime presented upon oath by a grand jury.

The word is said to be derived from the old French word inditer, which signifies to indicate, to show, or point out. Its object is to indicate the offence charged against the accused. Rey, des Inst l'Angl. tome 2, p. 347.

A presentment and indictment differ; 2 Inst. 739; Comb. 225. A presentment is properly that which the grand jurors find and present to the court from their own knowledge or observation. Every indictment which is found by the grand jurors is presented by them to the court; and therefore every indictment is a presentment, but not every presentment is an indictment; 9 Gray 291; Story, Const. § 1784.

The essential requisites of a valid indictment are,—first, that the indictment be presented to some court having jurisdiction of the offence stated therein; and the indictment must allege specifically that the crime was committed within its jurisdiction; 22 Neb. 418; 25 Tex. App. 453, 454; 37 W. Va. 812; second, that it appear to have been found by the grand jury of the proper county or district; third, that the indictment be found a true bill, and signed by the foreman of the grand jury; fourth, that it be framed with sufficient certainty; for this purpose the charge must contain a certain description of the crime or misdemeanor of which the defendant is accused, and a statement of the facts by which it is constituted, so as to identify the accusation; Cowp. 682; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 167; 4 S. & R. 194; 4 Bla. Com. 301; 4 Cra. 167; 26 Tex. App. 540; it should set out the material facts charged against the accused; 7 Nev. 153; 148 U. S. 197; 124 id. 483; but need not specify the statute on which founded; 88 Ga. 584. An indictment may charge a statutory offence in the language of the statute without greater particularity when, by that means, all that is essential to constitute the offence is stated fully and directly, without uncertainty or ambiguity; 17 Or. 358; 100 N. C. 449; 39 Kan. 152; 40 La. Ann. 170; fifth, the indictment must be in the English language. But if any document in a foreign language, as a libel, be necessarily introduced, it should be set out in the original tongue, and then translated, showing its application; 6 Term 162.

The formal requisites are,—first, the venue, which at common law should always be laid in the county where the offence has been committed, although the charge be in its nature transitory, as a battery; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 35. See 74 Cal. 94. The venue is stated in the margin thus: "City and county of —, to wit." Second, the presentment, which must be in the present tense, and is usually expressed by the following formula: "the grand inquest of the commonwealth of —, inquiring for the city and county aforesaid, upon their oaths and affirmations present." See, as to the venue, 1 Ark. 171; 9 Yerg. 357; 6 Metc. 225; 92 Cal. 277. Third, the name and addition of the defendant; but in case an error has been made in this respect, it is cured by the plea of the defendant; Bac. Abr. Misnomer (B), Indictment (G 2); 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 175; 1 Chitty, Pr. 202; Russ. & R. 489. Where the defendant's name is stated differently in different parts of the indictment, it is fatally defective; 21 Tex. App. 348; or where it fails to state his given name, or aver that it is not known, a plea of misnomer in abatement should be sustained; 40 Ill. App. 17; 25 Tex. App. 402; or where it gives a wrong name; 90 Ga. 95. See IDEM SONANS. Fourth, the names of third persons, when they must be necessarily mentioned in the indictment, should be stated with certainty to a common intent, so as sufficiently to inform the defendant who are his accusers. When, however, the names of third persons cannot be ascertained, it is sufficient, in some cases, to state "a certain person or persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown." 2 East, Pl. Cr. 651, 781; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 181; Plowd. 85; 8 C. & P. 773. Fifth, the time when the offence was committed should, in general, be stated to be on a specific year and day. In some offences, as in perjury, the day must be precisely stated; 2 Wash. C. C. 328; but although it is necessary that a day certain should be laid in the indictment, yet, in general, the prosecutor may give evidence of an offence committed on any other day previous to the finding of the indictment; 5 S. & R. 316. See 11 S. & R. 177; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 217, 224; 17 Wend. 475; 3 Dev. 567; 6 Miss. 14; 4 Dana 496; 1 Cam. & N. 369; 1 Hawks 460; 84 Ky. 52; 147 Mass. 539; 30 Tex. App. 480; 131 N. Y. 478; 140 U. S. 118. It is not material, except where time is of the essence of the offence, to charge in an indictment the true day on which an offence was committed, or to prove the day as charged; 97 N. C. 463. Sixth, the offence should be properly described. This is done by stating the substantial circumstances necessary to show the nature of the crime, and next, the formal allegations and terms of art required by law. Steph. Cr. Proc. 156. An omission of matter of substance in an indictment is not aided or cured by verdict; 124 U. S. 483. An indictment charging a crime "on or about" a certain date is not defective, these words being surplusage, the real date being that specifically charged; 44 La. Ann. 323.

As to the substantial circumstances. The whole of the facts of the case necessary to make it appear judicially to the court that the indictors have gone upon sufficient premises should be set forth; but there should be no unnecessary matter, nor anything which on its face makes the indictment repugnant, inconsistent, or absurd. And if there is no necessary ambiguity, the court is not bound, it has been observed, to create one by reading the indictment in the only way which will make it unintelligible. It is a clear principle that the language of an indictment must be construed by the rules of pleading, and not by the common interpretation of ordinary language; for nothing indeed differs more widely in construction than the same matter when viewed by the rules of pleading and when construed by the language of ordinary life; 16 Q. B. 846; 1 Ad. & E. 448; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 183; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 3); 2 Leach 660; 2 Stra. 1226. Averments of matters not material or necessary ingredients in the offence charged may be rejected as surplusage; 51 N. J. L. 259. An indictment is not insufficient by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant; 152 U. S. 211. All indictments ought to charge a man with a particular offence, and not with being an offender in general: to this rule there are some exceptions, as indictments against a common barrator, a common scold, and a keeper of a common bawdy-house; such persons may be indicted by these general words; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 230, and the authorities there cited. The offence must not be stated in the disjunctive, so as to leave it uncertain on what it is intended to rely as an accusation: as, that the defendant erected or caused to be erected a nuisance; 2 Gray 501; 6 D. & R. 143; 2 Stra. 900; 2 Rolle, Abr. 31.

There are certain terms of art used, so appropriated by the law to express the precise idea which it entertains of the offence, that no other terms, however synonymous they may seem, are capable of filling the same office: such, for example, as traitorously (q. v.), in treason; feloniously (q. v.), in felony; 84 Ky. 354; 112 N. C. 848; 115 Mo. 389; burglariously (q. v.), in burglary; maim (q. v.), in mayhem, etc.

Seventh, the conclusion of the indictment should conform to the provision of the constitution of the state on the subject, where there is such provision; as in Pennsylvania; Const. art. 5, s. 11, which provides that all "prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and conclude against the peace and dignity of the same"; see 35 W. Va. 280; it is not necessary that each count should so conclude; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 294. As to the necessity and propriety of having several counts in an indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 248; Steph. Cr. Proc. 153; COUNT; as to joinder of several offences in the same indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 253; Archb. Cr. Pl. 60; in one count, see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 182, note. A count in an indictment may refer to allegations in other counts to avoid repetition; 5 Park. Cr. R. 134; 63 Hun 579; 153 U. S. 308. Several defendants may, in some cases, be joined in the same indictment; Archb. Cr. Pl. 59; as where one is charged with assault with intent to kill, and another as accessory before the fact; 65 N. H. 284; 155 Mass. 224.

At common law an indictment cannot be amended by the court. It was said by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes: "Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves;" 4 Burr. 2527. The rule has been continuously adhered to; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 25, § 97; Stark. Cr. Pl. 287; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 90; 3 Cush. 279; 3 Hawks 184. "It is a well-settled rule of law that the statute respecting amendments does not extend to indictment;" Shaw, C. J., in 13 Pick. 200; 3 Hawks 184; and "an amendment cannot be allowed even with the consent of the prisoner;" 16 Pick. 120; 4 Park. Cr. Rep. 387. The caption, however, may be amended, being, as it is said, no part of the indictment itself; 2 McCord 301; 42 N. J. L. 504; 5 Wis. 337.

In England the rule forbidding an amendment of an indictment has been changed by stat. 14 and 15 Vict. c. 100. In this country the subject does not rest on the common law, but there is also to be considered the constitutional guaranty to an accused of a trial, "on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury." It was settled by the United States Supreme Court that in the federal courts an indictment cannot be amended by the court, both by reason of the common-law rule and the constitutional provision; 121 U. S. 1. The question whether the rule could be changed by statute was not actually involved, but it would seem to be settled in the negative by the reasoning of the opinion in that case. The question had been considered in some state courts, and it has been held that without amendment of the state constitution, the legislature may authorize amendment of indictments by the court, not changing the offence; 53 Miss. 403; 55 id. 434, 528; in other cases it was held that the legislature might dispense with or regulate matter of form; 29 Mich. 232; 7 Nev. 157; but they could not "dispense with such allegations as are essential to reasonable particularity and certainty in the description of the offence; 45 Ind. 338.

It is said by Bishop that "if a statute should authorize a material amendment to be made in an indictment for an offence which, by the constitution of the state was punishable only by indictment, the statutory direction would be a nullity." Bish. Cr. Proc., 2d ed. § 97; 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 446.

An indictment may be quashed at common law for such deficiency in body or caption as will make a judgment given on it against the defendant erroneous, but it is a matter of discretion; Bac. Abr. Indictment, K; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 298; Archb. Cr. Pl. 66.

After verdict in a criminal case, it will be presumed that those facts without proof of which the verdict could not have been found were proved, though they are not distinctly alleged in the indictment; provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend them in reasonable intentment; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 356; 2 C. & K. 868; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 73; Steph. Cr. Proc. 171. After verdict, defective averments in the second indictment may be cured by reference to sufficient averments in the first count; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 340. A single good count in an indictment is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty and judgment thereon; 53 N. J. L. 601; 94 Ala. 55.

It is not error to join distinct offences in one indictment, in separate counts, against the same person; 155 U. S. 434.

In an indictment for a statutory offence, while it is doubtless true that it is not always sufficient to use simply the language of the statute in describing the offence, yet, if such language is, according to the natural import of the words, fully descriptive of the offence, then it ordinarily is sufficient; 155 U. S. 438.

The fact that a grand jury has ignored an indictment is not a bar to the subsequent finding of a true bill for the same offence; 50 Fed. Rep. 918. The finding of an indictment must appear from the order book of the court in which defendant was indicted; if it does not so appear, a verdict against him will be set aside; 89 Va. 156; 29 Fla. 511. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" used his initials instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; 4 Ind. App. 583; 106 Mo. 111. One cannot be convicted of a higher degree of offence than that charged in the indictment; 132 Ind. 427; but there may be a conviction of a lesser offence; 12 So. Rep. (Fla.) 640.

INDICTOR. He who causes another to be indicted. The latter is sometimes called the indittee.

INDIFFERENT. To have no bias or partiality. 7 Conn. 229. A juror, an arbitrator, and a witness ought to be indifferent; and when they are not so they may be challenged. See 9 Conn. 42.

INDIGENA (Lat. from indu, old form of in, in, and geno, gigno, to beget). A native; born or bred in the same country or town. Ainsw. A subject born, or naturalized by act of parliament. Opposed to alienigena. Rymer, to. 15, p. 37; Co. Litt. 8 a.

INDIRECT EVIDENCE. Evidence which does not prove the fact in question, but one from which it may be presumed.

Inferential evidence as to the truth of a disputed fact, not by testimony of any witness to the fact, but by collateral circumstances ascertained by competent means. 1 Stark. Ev. 15; Wills, Circ. Ev. 24; Best, Ev. 21, § 27, note; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

INDITEE (L. Fr.). In Old English Law. A person indicted. Mirr. c. 1, § 3; 9 Coke.

INDIVIDUUM (Lat.). In the Civil Law. That cannot be divided. Calv. Lex.

INDIVISIBLE. That cannot be separated.

The effect of the breach of a contract depends in a large degree upon whether it is to be regarded as indivisible or divisible; i. e. whether it forms a whole, the performance of every part of which is a condition precedent to bind the other party or is composed of several independent parts, the performance of any one of which will bind the other party pro tanto. This question is one of construction, and depends on the circumstances of each case; and the only test is whether the whole quantity of the things concerned, or the sum of the acts to be done, is of the essence of the contract. It depends, therefore, in the last resort, simply upon the intention of the parties; 68 Md. 47; 110 N. C. 251. See 9 Q. B. D. 648; 69 N. Y. 348; 151 Pa. 534; 47 N. J. L. 290; 40 N. J. Eq. 612; 115 U. S. 188; 143 Mass. 1; 12 R. I. 82; 102 N. Y. 366.

When a consideration is entire and indivisible, and it is against law, the contract is void in toto; 11 Vt. 592; 2 W. & S. 235. When the consideration is divisible, and part of it is illegal, the contract is void only pro tanto. In such case, it has been said, the connection between the different contracts is physical, not legal. See, generally, Harriman, Cont. 132-136; 1 Wall. 221.

To ascertain whether a contract is divisible or indivisible is to ascertain whether it may or may not be enforced in part, or paid in part, without the consent of the other party. See ENTIRETY; INDEPENDENT PROMISES.

INDIVISUM (Lat.). That which two or more persons hold in common without partition; undivided.

INDORSAT. In Old Scotch Law. Indorsed. 2 Pitt. Crim. Tr. 41.

INDORSE. To write on the back. Bills of exchange and promissory notes are indorsed by a party's writing his name on the back. See INDORSEMENT. Writs in Massachusetts are indorsed in some cases by a person's writing his name on the back, in which case he becomes liable to pay the costs of the suit.

INDORSEE. The person or party to whom a bill of exchange is indorsed, or transferred by indorsement. See INDORSEMENT.

INDORSEE IN DUE COURSE. An indorsee in due course is one who, in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value, before its apparent maturity or presumptive dishonor, and without knowledge of its actual dishonor, acquires a negotiable instrument duly indorsed to him, or indorsed generally, or payable to the bearer. Civil Code, Cal. 3123.

INDORSEMENT. In Commercial Law. That which is written on the back of an instrument in writing and which has relation to it.

Writing one's name on the back of a promissory note or other negotiable instrument. 20 Vt. 499.

Written on the back of an original instrument, or on an "allonge" attached thereto, if there be not sufficient space on the original paper. 141 Ill. 461. It need not appear that it was physically impossible to indorse on the instrument. It may be on another paper when necessity or convenience requires it; 16 Wis. 616.

An indorsement is generally made primarily for the purpose of transferring the rights of the holder of the instrument to some other person. It has, however, various results, such as rendering the indorser liable in certain events; and hence an indorsement is sometimes made merely for the purpose of additional security. This is called an accommodation indorsement when done without consideration.

A blank indorsement is one in which the name of the indorser only is written upon the instrument. It is commonly made by writing the name of the indorser on the back; 13 S. & R. 315; but a writing across the face may answer the same purpose; 18 Pick. 63; 16 East 12. Its effect is to make the instrument thereafter payable to bearer; Byles, Bills *151.

A conditional indorsement is one made subject to some condition without the performance of which the instrument will not be or remain valid. 4 Taunt. 30. A bill may be indorsed conditionally, so to impose on the drawee who afterwards accepts a liability to pay the bill to the indorsee or his transferees in a particular event only; Byles, Bills *150. An indorsement on a note, making it payable on a contingency does not affect its negotiability; 15 Wend. 562.

An indorsement in full, or a special in- dorsement, is one in which mention is made of the name of the indorsee. Chitty, Bills 170. The omission of the words "or order" is not material, for the indorsee takes it with all its incidents, including its negotiable quality; Byles, Bills *151. The omission of the words "or order" in a special indorsement will not restrain the negotiability of a bill; 2 Burr. 1216; 1 Stra. 557.

A qualified indorsement is one which restrains, or limits, or qualifies, or enlarges the liability of the indorser, in any manner different from what the law generally imports as his true liability, deducible from the nature of the instrument. Chitty, Bills 261; 7 Taunt. 160. The words commonly used are sans recours, without recourse; 2 Mass. 14. An indorsement without recourse, or at the indorsee's "own risk," will not expose the indorser to any liability; 30 Mo. 196; 12 Wis. 639; 2 Allen 434; 46 Pa. 140; 1 Cow. 512. But such an indorsement warrants the genuineness of all prior signatures; 18 Ohio St. 516; that the indorser has title to the note; 6 Leigh 230; that the note is valid between the original parties, and not illegal, or without consideration; 58 Me. 437; 22 Kan. 157; and that the parties were competent to contract; id. The assignment without recourse leaves the assignor liable as vendor; 40 Ill. App. 108.

A restrictive indorsement is one which restrains the negotiability of the instrument to a particular person or for a particular purpose; 1 Rob. La. 222. Such are "Pay A. B. or order, for my use," or "for my account," or "only."

By the law merchant, bills and notes payable to order can be transferred only by indorsement; 16 Mass. 314; 73 Ill. 485; 63 Ga. 380; 101 U. S. 68; 17 Fed. Rep. 575; Sto. Prom. N. § 120; 34 Kan. 223. Indorsement is not complete before delivery of the note; 24 Conn. 333; 15 Colo. 445; hence the word indorsee in a declaration on a bill imports a delivery; Wood's Byles, Bills § 153.

An instrument promising to pay a sum certain with interest, as per annexed coupons, reciting that note and coupons were secured by mortgage, was negotiable; but an indorsement, "for value received, we hereby assign and transfer the within bond, together with all our interest in, and rights under the same, without recourse," was not a commercial indorsement, but a mere assignment passing an equitable interest subject to the defences of the makers, and the negotiability of the instrument was thereby destroyed, and the subsequent indorsement of the transferee did not make him liable for payment in the absence of any independent contract; 59 Fed. Rep. 853.

When, by such an assignment, the legal title is left in the payee, the equitable interest merely passing to the transferee, it necessarily follows that the negotiable character of the instrument is destroyed; 39 Mich. 171. And a subsequent indorsement by the transferee does not, in the absence of a special contract, render him liable; Dan. Neg. Inst. 666; 4 Watts 400; 44 Pa. 454; 126 id. 194. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note without proof of a special contract to become responsible means nothing and creates no liability; 1 Greene (Ia.) 334; Dan. Neg. Inst. 709. See also 6 Kan. 490; 52 Mich. 525; 71 Mo. 627. The person making such indorsement guaranties the note to be genuine, and that it is what it purports to be; nothing more. He does not guaranty its payment, although he might do this by independent contract expressed in the contract or otherwise; 1 Greene (Ia.) 334.

The effect of the indorsement of a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange is to transfer the property in the note to the person mentioned in the indorsement when it is made in full; 30 S. C. 356; or to any person to whose possession it may lawfully come thereafter even by mere delivery, when it is made in blank, so that the possessor may sue upon it in his own name at law, as well as if he had been named as the payee; 11 Pet. 80; 2 Hill N. Y. 80; 34 Neb. 803; 1 Misc. Rep. 91; 6 C. C. App. 423.

Any person who has possession of the instrument is presumed to be the legal bona fide owner for value, until the contrary is shown; 60 Ill. 289.

The payee of a note can restrain its negotiability, but a subsequent indorser can revive its negotiable quality; 1 Bay 160.

The parties are presumed to stand to each other in the relations in which their names appear. Where the holder has knowledge, the facts may be shown as between him and the other parties; 42 N. H. 9.

An indorsement on the last day of grace is good; 36 N. H. 273; contra, 11 Gray 38. An indorsement is presumed to be of the same date as the instrument; 16 Ind. 265; 28 Ill. 397; or at least to have been made before maturity; 53 Tex. 136; 94 U. S. 753.

An indorsement may be made before the bill or note itself, and so render the indorser liable to all subsequent parties; Byles, Bills *167; 30 Md. 284. A blank indorsement upon a blank piece of paper, with intent to give a person credit, is, in effect, a letter of credit; if a promissory note is afterwards written on the paper, the indorser cannot object; Dougl. 496; 6 Cra. 142; but if the holder had notice of any fraud he cannot fill in the blanks; 3 Q. B. D. 643.

When the indorsement is made before the note becomes due, the indorsee and all subsequent holders are entitled to recover the face of the note against the maker, without any right on his part to offset claims which he may have against the payee; or, as it is frequently stated, the indorsee takes it free of all equities between the antecedent parties of which he had no notice; 8 M. & W. 504; 8 Conn. 505; 13 Mart. La. 150; 16 Pet. 1. The indorser of a promissory note before maturity without recourse is responsible thereon if the note is fraudulent, fictitious, or forged; 32 Neb. 773.

An indorsement admits the signatures and capacity of every prior party; Byles, Bills *155.

The blank indorsement of a non-negotiable bill has been held to operate as the drawing of a bill payable to bearer; 33 L. J. Q. B. 209. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note by a payee operates to assign the payee's rights to the indorser, who takes the former's place; 33 Wis. 427.

After a bill is due, the indorsee takes it on the credit of the indorser and subject to all equities; 4 M. & G. 101; as was said by Lord Ellenborough, "it comes disgraced to the indorsee;" 1 Campb. 19. But the maker can only set up such defences as are connected with the note, not those arising out of an independent transaction; 35 Mo. 99; 3 H. & N. 891; such as set-off as against the holder; 15 Ia. 79; 10 Exch. 572. It is otherwise as to a check, which may be transferred by indorsement after it is payable; Byles, Bills *171; but taking a check six days old is a circumstance from which the jury may infer fraud; 9 B. & C. 388. A note payable on demand is not to be taken as overdue without some evidence of demand of payment and refusal; 4 B. & C. 327; although it is several years old and no interest has been paid on it; Byles, Bills *171; a promissory note payable on demand is intended to be a continuing security; 9 M. & W. 15; but it has been held to be overdue and dishonored after a reasonable time; 2 Mich. 401; so after three months; 41 N. Y. 581 (but see 42 Barb. 50); after ten months; 41 Vt. 24.

A bill or note cannot be indorsed for part of the amount due the holder, as the law will not permit one cause of action to be cut up into several, and such an indorsement is utterly void as such, but when it has been paid in part, it may be indorsed as to the residue; 36 Tex. 305.

Indorsers, also, unless the indorsement be qualified, become liable to pay the amount demanded by the instrument upon the failure of the principal, the maker of a note, or the acceptor of a bill, upon due notification of such failure, to any subsequent indorsee who can legally claim to hold through the particular indorser; Story, Bills § 224.

The indorsement of a draft to a fictitious indorsee is usually treated as making it payable to bearer; see FICTITIOUS PAYEE; 140 N. Y. 556; but it is said not to be so unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends the paper to be made payable to a fictitious person; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 387; 126 N. Y. 318; 46 Ohio St. 512; contra, 26 Kan. 691.

In most of the cases a person not a party to the instrument who writes his name on the back of it before delivery is in many states considered an original promisor; 36 Me. 147; 9 Mass. 314; 30 Mo. 225; 14 Tex. 275; 20 Vt. 355; but in Pennsylvania one who indorses before the payee is not liable to the payee, though he is to a subsequent indorser; and it cannot be shown by parol that he was a guarantor to the payee; 59 Pa. 144. The cases on the effect of irregular indorsements are very numerous and conflicting in different states. See Wood's Byles, Bills 150, note 7, where they are collected.

A plaintiff, in suing the first indorsee may omit to state in his declaration all the indorsements but the first indorsement in blank, and aver that the first blank indorser indorsed directly to himself; but in such case all the intervening indorsements must be struck out; Byles, Bills *155; 20 La. Ann. 377.

An indorsement by an officer of a corporation, where the fact appears on the instrument, does not render him individually liable; 30 La. Ann. 813.

An indorsement by one of several executors will not transfer the property; 2 C. & K. 37; 9 Mass. 320; contra, in case of administrators; 6 J. J. Mar. 446; and see 9 Cow. 34. An executor cannot complete his testator's indorsement by delivering the instrument, which has already been signed by the testator; Wood's Byles, Bills 53; 1 Exch. 32.

By the general law merchant, the indorser of a negotiable instrument is bound instantly, and may be sued after maturity, upon demand and notice of non-payment. But by the statutes of some of the states the maker must first be sued and his property subjected; 1 Col. 385; 54 Ill. 349, 472; 48 Miss. 46.

The effect of acceptance upon a bill is to remove the acceptor to the head of the list as principal, while the drawer takes his place as first indorser.

A recent course of decisions with respect to restrictive indorsement has given rise to much discussion, resulting in so general a change in clearing-house rules as to amount to a revolution in banking methods.

The litigation arising from the relations between a bank, its depositor, and the indorsee of a check or draft commences with the early English case of Price v. Neal, followed in England and this country, in which it was held by Lord Mansfield that if the drawee pays a bill which he afterwards finds to be forged, he has no recourse against an innocent indorser; 3 Burr. 1354; nor has a bank which paid a forged check; Taunt. 76; 1 Binn. 27. See also 10 Wheat. 333; 59 Hun 495. The precise principle on which the doctrine of Price v. Neal was founded, has been a subject of varying opinion and the different theories concerning it, as also a voluminous citation of the cases, will be found in an article by Professor J. B. Ames in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 297. An extended review and discussion of the cases will also be found in Keener, Quasi-Cont. 154, note 1. While it is true that a bank pays a forged check at its own peril, if the depositor be free from negligence; 126 N. Y. 319; it was held that no title passed through a forged indorsement, and hence payment by a bank made on the faith of it may be recovered from an indorsee even if bona fide for value; 1 Hill 290.

A late decision has had a very far-reaching effect with respect to the effect of restrictive indorsements.

What has been characterized as "the doctrine, newly announced by the courts," has been thus stated: "Where a draft is indorsed to a bank for collection or for account of the indorser, the form of indorsement carries notice to the bank of payment that the bank to whom the paper is thus indorsed is a mere agent of the indorser to collect, having no proprietary interest in the paper; hence if the paper turns out to be forged (i. e. raised in amount, or payee's indorsement forged), the agent bank's own indorsement is not a guaranty of genuineness, and it is under no liability to repay the amount collected, after it has paid the same over to its principal." 13 Banking L. J. 75.

The first case was Park National Bank v. Seaboard National Bank, 114 N. Y. 28, and this, it was said at a convention of bankers, "proved a revelation to many of us, and pointed out the great danger which lurked in checks and other paper having restrictive indorsements," and the second case, National City Bank of Brooklyn v. Westcott, 118 N. Y. 468, was said "to have opened the eyes of banks, heretofore unacquainted with the decision (of the Seaboard Bank case), to the real status of liability in case of restrictive indorsement;" address of S. G. Nelson, 13 Bkg. L. J. 445. The same doctrine was followed in other cases, so that it is fully established in New York and some other states and in the Federal circuit court; 45 Fed. Rep. 337; 70 id. 232; 129 N. Y. 647; 70 Mo. 643; 90 Hun 285; 62 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 327; 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 982; and the basic principle of these decisions was already approved by the United States supreme court, which held that "the words 'for collection' evidently had a meaning. That meaning was intended to limit the effect which would have been given to the indorsement without them, and warned the party that, contrary to the purpose of a general or blank indorsement, this was not intended to transfer the ownership of the note or its proceeds." 1 Wall. 166, 173; which was followed in a case of indorsement "for collection"; 148 U. S. 50; and as to an indorsement "for account," it was said, "It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper, or the ownership of the money when received;" 102 U. S. 658. In one state the contrary view has been taken and the bank of deposit of a draft with a forged indorsement, although a mere "indorsee for collection," was held liable to refund to its correspondent bank which had paid the money; 8 Colo. 49. See 64 Fed. Rep. 703.

The result of the decisions cited was the general adoption of a rule by most of the clearing-house associations, substantially like that of New York, excluding, from the exchanges, paper having a qualified or restrictive indorsement, such as "for collection" or "for account of," unless the same was guaranteed. In Chicago such paper was absolutely excluded. The result has been to make the question, what is a restrictive indorsement, one of vital importance and the judicial opinion is not uniform. The following have been held to be restrictive: "for collection;" 1 Wall. 166, 173; 26 Md. 520; "for account;" 102 U. S. 658; "for my use;" 5 Mass. 543; "credit my account;" 1 Bond 387; "Pay to P. or order only;" 4 Call. 411; "for deposit;" 50 Fed. Rep. 647 (contra, 77 Ala. 168); "for deposit to the credit of;" 87 Ga. 45; contra (by a divided court), 79 Md. 192; but while the presumption is that it is restrictive, the bank may show by extrinsic evidence that it was not so, either by reason of a special agreement; 50 Fed. Rep. 647; or because the proceeds were passed to the depositor's credit and subject to check before collection; 89 Ga. 108.

Where a bank to which a forged check was sent for collection credited the person sending it with the amount, without actually remitting the money, it could, on discovering the forgery, charge back the amount; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 440. See articles critically reviewing the cases, in the latter of which the conclusion is reached that an indorsement for deposit is restrictive; 13 Banking L. J. 361, 429; and see also Norton, Bills & N. 123; Daniel, Neg. Instr. §§ 636-7, 698.

See GUARANTY; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; PROMISSORY NOTES; NEGOTIABILITY.

In Criminal Law. An entry made upon the back of a writ or warrant.

When a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a crime has been issued by a justice of the peace of one county, which is to be executed in another county, it is necessary, in some states, that it should be indorsed by a justice of the county where it is to be executed: this indorsement is called backing.

INDORSER. The person who makes an indorsement.

The indorser of a bill of exchange, or other negotiable paper, by his indorsement undertakes to be responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, if the latter shall make a legal demand from the payer, and, in default of payment, give proper notice thereof to the indorser. But the indorser may make his indorsement conditional, which will operate as a transfer of the bill if the condition be performed; or he may make it qualified, so that he shall not be responsible on non-payment by the payer; Chitty, Bills 179, 180.

To make an indorser liable on his indorsement to parties subsequent to his own indorsee, the instrument must be commercial paper; for the indorsement of a bond or single bill will not, per se, create a responsibility; 13 S. & R. 311. See Story, Bills 202; 11 Pet. 80.

When there are several indorsers, the first in point of time is generally, but not always, first responsible; there may be circumstances which will cast the responsibility, in the first place, as between them, on a subsequent indorsee; 5 Munf. 252; 69 Md. 352; 72 Mich. 393.

The fact that an indorsee, when he puts his name on a draft, did not think it would render him liable as an indorser, will not relieve him; 52 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 559. Where the owner and holder of a promissory note after maturity sells and indorses the note, signing his name after that of the original payee, he is an indorser and not a joint maker; 44 Kan. 594. See INDORSEMENT.

INDUCEMENT. In Contracts. The benefit which the promisor is to receive from a contract is the inducement for making it.

In Criminal Law. The motive. Confessions are sometimes made by criminals under the influence of promises or threats. When these promises or threats are made by persons in authority, the confessions cannot be received in evidence. See CONFESION.

In Pleading. The statement of matter which is introductory to the principal subject of the declaration or plea, and which is necessary to explain or elucidate it. Such matter as is not introductory to, or necessary to elucidate the substance or gist of, the declaration, plea, etc., nor collaterally applicable to it, is surplusage.

An inducement is, in general, more a matter of convenience than of necessity, since the same matter may be stated in the body of the declaration; but by its use confusion of statement is avoided; 1 Chitty, Pl. 259.

But in many cases it is necessary to lay a foundation for the action by a statement, by way of inducement, of the extraneous or collateral circumstances which give rise to the plaintiff's claim. For instance, in an action for a nuisance to property in the possession of the plaintiff, the circumstances of his being possessed of the property should be stated as inducement, or by way of introduction to the mention of the nuisance; 1 Chitty, Pl. 292; Steph. Pl. 257; Bac. Abr. Pleas, etc. (I 2).

When a formal traverse is adopted, it should be introduced with an inducement, to show that the matter contained in the traverse is material; 1 Chitty, Pl. 38. See TRAVERSE; INNUENDO; COLLOQUIUM.

In an indictment there is a distinction between the allegation of facts constituting the offence, and those which must be averred by way of inducement. In the former case, the circumstances must be set out with particularity; in the latter, a more general allegation is allowed. An "inducement to an offence does not require so much certainty." Com. Dig. Indictment (G 5). In an indictment for an escape, "debito modo commissus" is enough, without showing by what authority; and even "commissus" is sufficient; 1 Ventr. 170. So, in an indictment for disobedience to an order of justices for payment of a church-rate, an averment, by way of inducement, that a rate was duly made as by law required, and afterwards duly allowed, and that the defendant was by it duly rated, was held sufficient, without setting out the facts which constituted the alleged due rating, etc., although in the statement of the offence itself it would not have been sufficient; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 222.

INDUCIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. A truce; cessation from hostilities for a time agreed upon. Also, such agreement itself. Calv. Lex. So in international law; Grotius, de Jure Bell. lib. 3, c. 2, § 11; Huber, Jur. Civit. p. 743, § 22.

In Old Practice. A delay or indulgence allowed by law. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange; Bract, fol. 352 b; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 5, § 8. See Bell. Dict.; Burton, Law of Scotl. 561. So used in old maritime law; e. g. an induciæ of twenty days after safe arrival of vessels was allowed in case of bottomry bond, to raise the principal and interest; Locceivus, de Jure Marit. lib. 2, c. 6, § 11.

INDUCIÆ LEGALES (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The days between the citation of the defendant and the day of appearance; the days between the teste day and day of return of the writ.

INDUCTIO. In the Civil Law. Obliteration, by drawing the pen or stylus over the writing. Dig. 28, 4; Calv. Lex.

INDUCTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The giving a clerk, instituted to a benefice, the actual possession of its temporalities, in the nature of livery of seisin. Ayliffe, Parerg. 299.

INDULGENCE. Forbearance (q. v.); delay in enforcing a legal right.

As to the effect on the discharge of a surety of giving indulgence to a debtor, see SURETYSHIP.

INDULTO. In Spanish Law. The condonation or remission of the punishment imposed on a criminal for his offence. L. 1, t. 32, pt. 7. This power is exclusively vested in the king.

The right of exercising this power has been often contested, chiefly as impolitic for the reason set forth in the following Latin verses:—

"Plus sæpe nocet patientia regis
Quam rigor: ille nocet paucis; hæc incitat omnes, Dum se ferre suos sperant impune reatus."

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES. Societies formed in England for carrying on any labor, trade, or handicraft, whether wholesale or retail, including the buying and selling of land, and also (but subject to certain restrictions) the business of banking (I. and P. Soc. Act, 1876, 6). Such a society (which must consist of seven persons at least) when registered under the act becomes a body corporate with limited liability, and with the word "limited" as the last word in its name (id. 7, 11), and is regulated by rules providing for the amount of the shares, the holding of meetings, the mode in which the profits are to be applied, etc.; id. 9.

INDUSTRIAM, PER (Lat.). A qualified property in animals feræ naturæ may be acquired per industriam, i. e. by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education; or by so confining them within his own immediate power that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty. 2 Steph. Com. 5.

INEBRIATE. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD.

INEBRIETY. See DIPSOMANIA; DRUNKENNESS.

INELIGIBILITY. The incapacity to be lawfully elected; disqualification to hold an office if elected or appointed to it. 28 Wis. 99.

This incapacity arises from various causes; and a person may be incapable of being elected to one office who may be elected to another: the incapacity may also be perpetual or temporary.

Among perpetual inabilities may be reckoned, the inability of women to be elected to certain public offices; and of a citizen born in a foreign country to be elected president of the United States.

Among the temporary inabilities may be mentioned, the holding of an office declared by law to be incompatible with the one sought; the non-payment of the taxes required by law; the want of certain property qualifications required by the constitution; the want of age, or being too old.

As to the effect on an election of the candidate having the highest number of votes being ineligible, see ELECTION. See also ELIGIBILITY.

IN EST DE JURE (Lat.). It is implied of right or by law.

INEVITABLE ACCIDENT. A term used in the civil law, nearly synonymous with fortuitous event. 10 Miss. 572.

Any accident which cannot be foreseen and prevented. Though used as synonymous with act of God (q. v.), it would seem to have a wider meaning, the act of God being any cause which operates without aid or interference from man; 4 Dougl. 287, 290, per Lord Mansfield; 21 Wend. 198; 3 Blackf. 222; 2 Ga. 349; 10 Miss. 572. In Story on Bailments § 489, the two phrases are treated as synonymous, but in a later edition, the editor, Judge Bennett, notes the distinction just mentioned and considers the phrase inevitable accident one of wider significance. See 41 Pa. 379, where this and similar expressions are discussed and distinguished; Webb, Poll. Torts 160.

Inevitable accident is a relative term and must be construed not absolutely but reasonably with regard to the circumstances of each particular case, and where having reference to a collision, it may be regarded as an occurrence which the party charged with the collision could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill; 2 Wall. 560; 2 E. L. & E. 559. With reference to this subject Chief Justice Drake said that inevitable accident occurs only when the disaster happens from natural causes, without negligence or fault on either side; and when both parties have endeavored, by every means in their power, with due care and caution, and with a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident; 12 Ct. Cl. 491; 24 How. 307.

Where a rat made a hole in a box where water was collected in an upper room, so that the water trickled out and flowed on the plaintiff's goods in a lower room; L. R. 6 Ex. 217; where pipes were laid down with plugs, properly made, to prevent the pipes bursting, and a severe frost prevented the plugs from acting and the pipes burst and flooded the plaintiff's cellar; 11 Ex. 781; where a horse took fright without any default in the driver or any known propensity in the animal, and the plaintiff was injured; 3 Esp. 533; where a horse, travelling on the highway, became suddenly frightened at the smell of blood; 30 Wisc. 257; where a horse, being suddenly frightened by a passing vehicle, became unmanageable and injured the plaintiff's horse; 1 Bingh. 13; where a mill dam, properly built, was swept away by a freshet of unprecedented violence; 8 Cow. 175; it was held that no action would lie; otherwise when the falling of the tide caused a vessel to strand, as this could have been foreseen; 42 Cal. 227. A bailee is exempt from liability for loss of the consigned goods arising from inevitable accident; he may, however, enlarge his liability by contract; 150 U. S. 312.

INFALISTATUS. In Old English Law. Exposed upon the sands, or seashore. A species of punishment mentioned in Hengham. Cowel.

INFAMIA (Lat.). Infamy; ignominy or disgrace.

By infamia juris is meant infamy established by law as the consequence of crime; infamia facti is where the party is supposed to be guilty of such crime, but it had not been judicially proved. 17 Mass. 515, 541.

INFAMIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. One who, in consequence of the application of a general rule, and not by virtue of an arbitrary decision of the censors, lost his political rights but preserved his civil rights. Savigny, Droit Rom. § 79.

INFAMOUS CRIME. A crime which works infamy in one who has committed it.

The fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States declares that, with certain exceptions not here material, "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." A similar provision is contained in many of the state constitutions, although in some later ones there is a tendency to abridge the common-law strictness of requiring indictment by a grand jury.

It is settled that the provision of the federal constitution above quoted restricts only the United States so that a state may authorize an offence—capital or infamous —to be prosecuted by information; 21 La. Ann. 574; this rule of construction has been uniformly applied to the general restrictions contained in the first eight amendments; 7 Pet. 243; 2 Cow. 815; 3 id. 686; 12 S. & R. 220; Pom. Const. L. §§ 231-8.

It was said by Mr. Justice Miller, "There has been great difficulty in deciding what was meant a hundred years ago by the phrase infamous crime, which is used in this constitutional amendment. That difficulty is not diminished by the fact of the obscurity of the language itself as construed by what is known of the laws and usages of our ancestors at that time, in connection with the fact that both state and federal legislation in regard to crime may have made that infamous since, which would not have been so considered then;" Miller, Const. U. S. 504. The question was not authoritatively decided by the supreme court until 1885, when in Ex parte Wilson the theory that the true test is the nature of the crime, as understood at common law, was distinctly negatived, and it was said by Mr. Justice Gray for the court: "When the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment, if convicted, he has the right to insist that he shall not be put upon his trial except on the accusation of a grand jury;" and the fifth amendment, declaring in what cases a grand jury should be necessary, practically affirmed the rule of the common law. This was that informations were not allowed for capital crimes nor for any felony, i. e. an offence which caused a forfeiture; 4 Bla. Com. 94, 95, 310; thus the requirement of an indictment depended upon the consequences of the convict, and it was concluded that the constitutional substitution of the words "a capital or otherwise infamous crime" for capital crimes or felonies, "manifestly had in view that rule of the common law, rather than the rule on the very different question of the competency of witnesses. The leading word capital describing the crime by its punishment only, the associated words or otherwise infamous crime must, by an elementary rule of construction, include crimes subject to any infamous punishment, even if they should be held to include also crimes infamous in their nature, independently of the punishment affixed to them."

Having determined that the character of the punishment was to be the criterion applied in such cases, the court discussed the question what punishment would be considered infamous, and carefully confining the decision to the requirements of the case, continued thus: "Deciding nothing beyond what is required by the facts of the case before us, our judgment is that a crime, punishable by imprisonment for a term of years at hard labor, is an infamous crime, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment of the constitution;" 114 U. S. 417, 426, 429.

This decision was followed by a number of others which adhered to the same doctrine and decided that imprisonment in a state prison or a penitentiary with or without hard labor was an infamous punishment: 117 U. S. 348; 121 id. 1; id. 281; 128 id. 393; 134 id. 160; 135 id. 263; 140 id. 200.

Before this decision there had been a tendency on the part of the courts towards the doctrine that the question of infamy was to be determined by the nature of the crime and not at all by the character of the punishment.

Prior to the independence of the United States there were understood to be two kinds of infamy,—one based upon the opinion of the people respecting the mode of punishment, and the other having relation to the future credibility of the offender; Eden, Penal L. ch. 75. Because the legal bearing of the subject was mainly if not entirely with respect to the settlement of rules determining what crimes would disqualify the perpetrator from testifying. Accordingly the classification of crimes other than treason or felony, which were held to be infamous, were naturally those the commission of which would tend to cast discredit upon the veracity of the criminal,—denominated generally by the term crimen falsi. The manifest purpose of the constitutional provision under consideration was the incorporation into fundamental law of one of the great guarantees of liberty. And it was said by Foster, J., in the Maine supreme judicial court: "A mere reference to the history and adoption of this provision into the federal constitution is sufficient to show that it was not a question of competency or incompetency to testify that the framers of our government were considering, but rather in consequences to the liberty of the individual in securing him against accusation and trial for crimes of great magnitude, without the previous interposition of a grand jury;" 84 Me. 25.

As was said by Shaw, C. J., in an opinion quoted with approval in Ex parte Wilson, "The state prison for any term of time is now by law substituted for all the ignominious punishment formerly in use; and, unless this is infamous, then there is now no infamous punishment other than capital."

It is said in a case subsequent to that in which the supreme court settled the principle, under the laws of the United States, an infamous crime is one for which the statutes authorized the courts to award an infamous punishment. Its character as being infamous does not depend on whether the punishment ultimately awarded is an infamous one, but whether it is in the power of the courts to award an infamous punishment, or whether the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment; 40 Fed. Rep. 71; 114 U. S. 417; 84 Me. 25.

The authoritative settlement of this question by the supreme court renders it unnecessary to refer to the earlier decisions of the federal courts, which in some cases supported a different view. Many of them are referred to in the opinion of the supreme court, and the theories on which they are based are expressly disapproved. In some of the state courts the same conclusion was reached; 108 N. C. 593; 97 Mo. 668; 84 Me. 25.

It has also been held that a crime to the conviction and punishment of which congress has superadded a disqualification to hold office, is thereby made infamous: 112 U. S. 76; 114 id. 417. The course of decisions cited renders the cases as to particular crimes of little value, but of those held to be infamous under the principle stated are, larceny; 3 N. M. 367; 40 Fed. Rep. 71; assault with intent to kill; id. 81; selling liquors without paying a revenue tax; 35 id. 411; 135 U. S. 263; refusing to register voters; 43 Fed. Rep. 570; counterfeiting United States securities; 114 U. S. 417; embezzlement and making false entries by an officer of a national bank; 128 id. 393; 121 id. 1; 140 U. S. 200. When a state authorizes prosecution by information, one accused of grand larceny before its admission as a state cannot be so prosecuted; 10 Mont. 537. See 3 Cr. L. Mag. 77; 12 Myer, Fed. Dec. 795; INFAMY; INDICTMENT; INFORMATION.

INFAMY. That state which is produced by the conviction of crime and the loss of honor, which renders the infamous person incompetent as a witness, or juror.

The loss of character or position which results from conviction of certain crimes, and which formerly involved disqualification as a witness and juror.

When a man was convicted of an offence inconsistent with the common principles of honesty and humanity, the law considered his oath of no weight, and excluded his testimony as of too doubtful and suspicious a nature to be admitted in a court of justice to deprive another of life, liberty, or property; Tayl. Ev. 1137; 2 Bulstr. 154; 1 Phill. Ev. 23; Bull. N. P. 291; 67 Pa. 386; 3 Wash. C. C. 99.

The statutory abolition of this disqualification, see infra, has rendered the subject obsolete in England; Stark. Ev. (Sharsw. ed.) 118; and equally so in the United States as a question of evidence, but the constitutional guarantee against conviction of an infamous crime, otherwise than by indictment, has to a considerable extent involved the discussion of the common-law definition of such crimes. As to this branch of the subject, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

The crimes which at common law rendered a person incompetent were treason; 5 Mod. 16, 74; felony; 2 Bulstr. 154; Co. Litt. 6; 1 T. Raym. 369; larceny; 62 Ala. 164; even petit larceny at common law; 5 Mod. 75; 71 Ala. 17, 271; but not if reduced to a misdemeanor; 80 Va. 287; 3 Tex. App. 114; receiving stolen goods; 7 Metc. 500; 5 Cush. 287; see 3 Clark 290; all offences founded in fraud, and which come within the general notion of the crimen falsi of the Roman Law; Leach 496; as perjury and forgery; Co. Litt. 6;

Fost. 209; 3 Ohio St. 229; piracy; 2 Rolle, Abr. 886; swindling, cheating; Fost. 209; barratry; 2 Salk. 690; conspiracy; 1 Leach 442; subornation of perjury; 2 G. & B. 145; suppression of testimony by bribery or by a conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness, or other conspiracy to accuse one of a crime and barratry; 1 Leach 442; bribing a witness to absent himself from a trial in order to get rid of his evidence; Fost. 208. From the decisions, Greenleaf deduces the rule "that the crimen falsi of the common law not only involves the charge of falsehood, but also is one which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud;" 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373.

But the attempt to procure the absence of a witness, not amounting to a conspiracy; 8 Vt. 57; keeping a gaming house; 1 R. & M. N. P. 270; a bawdy house; 14 Mo. 348; adultery; 39 N. H. 505; maliciously obstructing railroad cars; 8 Cush. 384; deceits in false weights, etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; false pretences; 33 Fed. Rep. 544; 68 Mo. 458; embezzlement under some conditions of the law; 67 Pa. 386; conspiracy to cheat and defraud creditors; 33 id. 463; were held not infamous. The test has been said to be "whether or not the crime shows such depravity or such a disposition to pervert public justice in the courts as creates a violent presumption against the truthfulness of the offered witness,—the difficulty being in the application of this test." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. 974. By statute in England and in most of the United States, the disqualification of infamy is removed, but a conviction may usually be proved to affect credibility; 99 Mass. 420; 56 N. Y. 208; 21 Mich. 561; 50 N. H. 242. But the difference in statutory regulations is such as to preclude general statement and to require reference to the local law in particular cases.

In Alabama one convicted of an infamous crime cannot execute the office of executor, administrator, or guardian, and conviction extinguishes all private trusts not susceptible of delegation, and also disqualifies him from holding office or voting; 83 Ala. 84. Other disabilities have been created by statute in other states. See 15 Am. Dec. 322.

As the law was administered prior to the statutory removal of the disability to testify, it was the crime not the punishment which rendered the offender unworthy of belief; 1 Phill. Ev. 25; but that is not now recognized as the true test by which to determine what, in the sense of the American constitutional law, is an infamous crime. See that title.

In order to incapacitate the party the judgment must have been pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction; 2 Stark. 183; 1 Sid. 51. The disqualification came only from the final judgment of the court; Bull. N. P. 392; 48 Me. 327; 69 N. Y. 107; and not from the crime; 1 McMull. 494; or mere conviction, or the infamous nature of the punishment; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 975. The proof of the crime was by the record of conviction; 5 Gray 478.

It has been held that a conviction of an infamous crime in another country, or another of the United States, does not render the witness incompetent on the ground of infamy; 17 Mass. 515; 11 Metc. 304; contra, 3 Hawks 393; though this doctrine appears to be at variance with the opinions entertained by foreign jurists, who maintain that the state or condition of a person in the place of his domicil accompanies him everywhere; Story, Confl. Laws § 620, and the authorities there cited; Foelix, Traité de Droit Intern. Privé 31; Merlin, Répert. Loi, 6, n. 6. In some states such a record has the same effect as a domestic one; 15 Nev. 64; 10 N. H. 22; in some it is admitted only on the question of credibility; 9 Pick. 496; and again it has been held that the full faith and credit, required to be given to records of other states, does not extend to enforcing in one state personal disabilities imposed upon a person convicted of crime in another state; 75 N. Y. 466; reversing 12 Hun 231, and expressly disapproving 10 N. H. 24 and 3 Hawks 393. The question is to be determined by the law of the forum, and therefore the record should set forth a copy of the indictment; 9 Wis. 140. In some states the record is rejected altogether; 7 Gratt. 706; 23 Ala. 44. See 2 Harr. & McH. 120, 380; 1 id. 572; 1 Jones N. C. 526; 63 N. C. 294.

The competency of such a witness was restored by pardon; 2 Cra. C. C. 528; 33 N. H. 388; 41 Ala. 405; unless the disability is annexed to the conviction, by statute; 24 Ill. 298; whether granted before sentence; 4 Wall. 332; or after it has been complied with; 2 Whart. 451. See 142 U. S. 450; 144 id. 261; 21 Tex. App. 1. But the completion of the sentence does not remove the disability; 4 Cra. C. C. 607; 16 La. Ann. 273; contra, 7 id. 379. A pardon does remove it even if it contains a clause declaring that it is intended to relieve from imprisonment and not from legal disabilities incident to conviction, such clause being held repugnant; 3 Johns. Cas. 333; but after a pardon the conviction is admissible to affect credibility; 5 Hill 196; 50 N. H. 242.

The judgment for an infamous crime, even for perjury, did not preclude the party from making an affidavit with a view to his own defence; 2 Salk. 461; 2 Stra. 1148; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 374. He might, for instance, make an affidavit in relation to the irregularity of a judgment in a cause in which he was a party; for otherwise he would be without a remedy. But the rule was confined to defence; and he could not, at common law, be heard upon oath as complainant; 2 Salk. 461; 2 Stra. 1148. When the witness became incompetent from infamy of character, the effect was the same as if he were dead; if he had attested any instrument as a witness, previous to his conviction, evidence might be given of his handwriting; 2 Stra. 833; Stark. Ev. pt. 2, § 193, pt. 4, p. 733.

A person infamous cannot be a juror, if indeed the disqualification of infamy does not extend to more crimes in jurors than in witnesses; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 977; 1 Co. Litt. 6 b.

See INFAMOUS CRIME.

INFANGENETHEF, INFANG-THEF. The right of the lord of the manor to sit in judgment on the thief caught on his own land.

The jurisdictional powers granted in the charters of the thirteenth century frequently included this right, which extended to the hanging of the thief so caught, and, for this purpose, the manorial gallows was erected on the land of the lord. The privilege of ufangenethef, more rarely given, conferred the right of hanging the thief, wherever caught, if he had upon his person the stolen goods, and if he were prosecuted by the loser of the goods; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 564. See GALLOWS.

INFANS. In the Civil Law. A child under the age of seven years; so called "quasi impos fandi" (as not having the faculty of speech). Cod. Theodos. 8, 18, 8.

INFANT. One under the age of twenty-one years. Co. Litt. 171.

But he is reputed to be twenty-one years old, or of full age, the first instant of the last day of the twenty-first year next before the anniversary of his birth; because, according to the civil computation of time, which differs from the natural computation, the last day having commenced, it is considered as ended. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 182; 6 Ind. 447. Accordingly, a man is held entitled to vote on the day before the twenty-first anniversary of his birth; 3 Harring. 507. See AGE.

If, for example, a person were born at any hour of the first day of January, 1810 (even a few minutes before twelve o'clock of the night of that day), he would be of full age at the first instant of the thirty-first of December, 1830, although nearly forty-eight hours before he had actually attained the full age of twenty-one years, according to years, days, hours, and minutes, because there is in this case no fraction of a day; 1 Sid. 162; 1 Kebl. 589; 1 Salk. 44; Raym. 84; 1 Bla. Com. 463, 464; 1 Lilly, Reg. 57; Comyns, Dig. Enfant (A); Savigny, Dr. Rom. §§ 383, 384. See FULL AGE; FRACTION OF A DAY.

A curious case occurred in England of a young lady who was born after the house-clock had struck, while the parish clock was striking, and before St. Paul's had begun to strike, twelve, on the night of the fourth and fifth of January, 1805; the question was whether she was born on the fourth or fifth of January. Mr. Coventry gives it as his opinion that she was born on the fourth because the house-clock does not regulate anything but domestic affairs, that the parochial clock is much better evidence, and that a metropolitan clock ought to be received with "implicit acquiescence." Coventry, Ev. 182. It is conceived that this can only be prima facie; because, if the facts were otherwise, and the parochial and metropolitan clocks should both have been wrong, they would undoubtedly have had no effect in ascertaining the age of the child.

The sex makes no difference at common law; a woman is, therefore, an infant until she has attained the age of twenty-one years; Co. Litt. 161. It is otherwise, however, in some of the United States; 18 Ill. 209; 4 Ind. 464. In Idaho, act 1864, females come of age at the age of eighteen. The same rule exists in Vermont, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Maryland, Missouri, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington; see 18 Ill. 209; 65 Ga. 400; 90 Vt. 41; 24 Minn. 194; 21 Neb. 680; 4 Colo. 263. Before arriving at full age, an infant may do many acts. A male at fourteen is of discretion, and may consent to marry; and at that age he may disagree to and annul a marriage he may before that time have contracted; he may then choose a guardian, and if his discretion be proved, may, at common law, make a will of his personal estate; he may act as executor at the age of seventeen years. A female at seven may be betrothed or given in marriage; at nine she is entitled to dower; at twelve she may consent or disagree to marriage; and, at common law, at seventeen she may act as executrix. Considerable changes of the common law have taken place in many of the states. In New York and several other states an infant is now deemed competent to be an executor; in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other states, if an infant is named as executor in the will, administration with the will annexed will be granted during his minority, unless there shall be another executor who shall except, when the minor on arriving at full age may be admitted as joint executor; Tyler, Inf. & Cov. 133.

In general, an infant is not bound by his contracts, unless to supply him necessities; Selw. N. P. 137; Bacon, Abr. Infancy, etc. (13); 9 Viner, Abr. 391; 1 Comyns, Contr. 150, 151; 3 Rawle 351; 1 South. 87; but see 6 Cra. 226; 3 Pick. 492; 1 N. & M'C. 197; or unless, by some legislative provision, he is empowered to enter into a contract; as, with the consent of his parent or guardian, to put himself apprentice, or enlist in the service of the United States; 4 Binn. 487; 30 Vt. 357; but a contract of enlistment is not voidable like other contracts of an infant; 137 U. S. 157. A dwelling-house is not within the definition of necessities, so as to render an infant liable on a contract for its erection; 78 Hun 603.

At common law, contracts for articles other than necessities made by an infant, after full age might be ratified by him, and would then become in all respects binding. In England Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, § 5, required the ratification to be in writing. But now by the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 62, "All contracts entered into by infants for the repayment of money lent, or to be lent, or for goods supplied, or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessities), and all accounts stated shall be absolutely void," and "no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age."

Contracts made with him may be enforced or avoided by him on his coming of age; 20 Ark. 600; 12 Ind. 76; 4 Sneed 118; 13 La. Ann. 407; 32 N. H. 345; 24 Mo. 541;

154 Mass. 458; 39 Kan. 495; but must be avoided within a reasonable time; 15 Gratt. 329; 29 Vt. 465; 25 Barb. 399; 156 Pa. 91. See 148 Ill. 357. But to this general rule there may be an exception in case of contracts for necessities; because these are for his benefit. See NECESSARIES. 2 Head 33; 18 Ill. 63; 13 Md. 140; 32 N. H. 345; 11 Cush. 40; 14 B. Monr. 232; but an infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange at the suit of an indorsee of the bill, although it was accepted for the price of necessities; [1891] 1 Q. B. 413; bills and notes of an infant, whether negotiable or not, are voidable; 8 Ala. 725; 43 N. H. 413; 23 Me. 517; 63 Ind. 567. The privilege of avoiding a contract on account of infancy is strictly personal to the infant, and no one can take advantage of it but himself; 3 Green, N. J. 343; 2 Brev. 438; 6 Jones, N. C. 494; 23 Tex. 252; 30 Barb. 641; 31 Miss. 32; 94 Ala. 223. See 48 Fed. Rep. 810. When the contract has been performed, and it is such as he would be compellable by law to perform, it will bind him; Co. Litt. 172 a. And all the acts of an infant which do not touch his interest, but take effect from an authority which he has been trusted to execute, are binding; 3 Burr. 1794; Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 5, note c. The contracts of an infant, when not intrinsically illegal, are voidable, not void, and may be ratified by him upon arriving at maturity; 17 Colo. 506.

The contract cannot be avoided by an adult with whom the infant deals; 29 Barb. 160; 12 Ind. 76; 5 Sneed 659; 53 Mich. 238; 47 N. J. L. 457; 73 Me. 252; or by a third person in a collateral proceeding; 56 Me. 527; 96 N. Y. 201; 129 Mass. 129. See 136 U. S. 519.

The doctrine of estoppel is inapplicable to infants; 5 Sand. 228; 25 Cal. 147; 92 Ky. 500. Even where an infant fraudulently represented himself as being of full age, he was not estopped from setting up a defence of infancy to a contract entered into under the fraudulent representation; 11 Cush. 40; 10 N. H. 184; contra, 17 Tex. 341. But an infant cannot retain the benefits of his contract, and thus affirm it, after becoming of age, and yet plead infancy to avoid the payment of the purchase money; 33 N. Y. 526; 1 App. D. C. 359; but see 154 Mass. 458; 36 Neb. 51.

A conveyance of land by a minor without consideration is void; 90 Tenn. 705. The deed of an infant is not void but voidable only; 85 Ky. 288; and so is a mortgage; 66 N. C. 45; 43 N. H. 413; 33 Md. 128; but the deed may be ratified after reaching his majority, either expressly or impliedly; 84 Va. 509; but see 86 Ala. 442; 86 Ky. 572; and not before; 83 Ind. 182; 50 Mo. 82; 102 U. S. 300.

An infant is not competent to appoint an agent; 85 Wis. 504; his property is not liable to a mechanic's lien for material purchased by him during infancy; 36 Neb. 51. When avoiding an executory contract relating to his personal property, he need not refund the money received, where he has squandered it; 68 Hun 589.

The protection which the law gives an infant is to operate as a shield to him, to protect him from improvident contracts, but not as a sword to do injury to others; 7 Mont. 171. An infant is, therefore, responsible for his torts, as for slander, trespass, and the like; 29 Barb. 218; 29 Vt. 465; 2 Misc. Rep. 236; but he cannot be made responsible in an action ex delicto, where the cause arose on a contract; 3 Rawle 351; 15 Wend. 233; 9 N. H. 441; 10 Vt. 71; 5 Hill, S. C. 391. But see 6 Cra. 226; 15 Mass. 359; 4 M'Cord 387. It is well settled that an infant bailee of a horse is liable in an action ex delicto for every tortious wilful act causing injury or death to the horse, the same as though he were an adult; 2 Wend. 137; 50 N. H. 235; Field, Inf. 32.

With regard to the responsibility of infants for crimes, the rule is that no infant within the age of seven years can be guilty of felony or be punished for any capital offence; for within that age an infant is, by presumption of law, doli incapax and cannot be endowed with any discretion; and against this presumption no averment shall be received. The law assumes that this legal incapacity ceases when the infant attains the age of fourteen years, but subjects this assumption to the effect of proof; 40 Vt. 585. Between the age of seven and fourteen years an infant is deemed prima facie to be doli incapax; but in this case the maxim applies, malitia supplet aetatem: malice supplies the want of mature years; 1 Russ. Cri. 2, 3; 31 Ala. N. S. 323; 45 La. Ann. 1172; and the question whether such a child is capable of committing an assault with intent to murder, is for the jury; 15 So. Rep. Ala. 438. See 56 N. W. Rep. Ia. 403; 1 Bishop, N. Cr. L. § 368.

Infant defendants are not properly before the court when not served with summons, and there is no appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent them; 36 S. C. 354. Where infant defendants have no special or separate defence, no separate answer is necessary, but joinder in the general answer of defendants is sufficient; 94 Cal. 54. See GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

As to liability for necessities, see 12 L. R. A. 859; 35 Cent. L. J. 203; 2 id. 762; 22 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 607; 25 id. 698; 29 Sol. J. 42. As to the duty of the divorced father of an infant, see 19 Cent. L. J. 35; as to contracts of infants, generally, see 22 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 273; 24 Ir. L. T. 523; 2 Cent. L. J. 230; to marry; 20 Am. L. Reg. 447, 459; marriage settlement; 26 Ir. L. T. 694; power of attorney; 31 Cent. L. J. 104; partnership; 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 713; 27 id. 528.

INFANTICIDE. In Medical Jurisprudence. The murder of a new-born infant. It is thus distinguishable from abortion and feticide, which are limited to the destruction of the life of the fœtus in utero.

The crime of infanticide can be committed only after the child is wholly born;

5 C. & P. 329; 6 id. 349. But the destruction of a child en ventre sa mère is a high misdemeanor; 1 Bla. Com. 129. See 2 C. & K. 784; 7 C. & P. 850.

This question involves an inquiry, first, into the signs of maturity, the data for which are—the length and weight of the foetus, the relative position of the centre of its body, the proportional development of its several parts as compared with each other, especially of the head as compared with the rest of the body, the degree of growth of the hair and nails, the condition of the skin, the presence or absence of the membrana pupillaris, and in the male the descent or non-descent of the testicles; Dean, Med. Jur. 140; Tayl. Med. Jur. 534.

Second, was it born alive? The second point presents an inquiry of great interest both to the legal and medical professions and to the community at large. In the absence of all direct proof, what organic facts proclaim the existence of life subsequent to birth? These facts are derived principally from the circulatory and respiratory systems. From the former the proofs are gathered—from the character of the blood, that which is purely foetal being wholly dark, like venous blood, and forming coagula much less firm and solid than that which has been subjected to the process of respiration. From the condition of the heart and blood-vessels. The circulation anterior and subsequent to birth must necessarily be entirely different. That anterior, by means of the foetal openings,—the foramen ovale, the ductus arteriosus, and the ductus venosus,—is enabled to perform its circuit without sending the entire mass of the blood to the lungs for the purpose of oxygenation. When the extra-uterine life commences, and the double circulation is established, these openings usually close; so that their closure is considered probable evidence of life subsequent to birth; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 478; Dean, Med. Jur. 142. From the difference in the distribution of the blood in the different organs of the body. The two organs in which this difference is most perceptible are the liver and the lungs,—especially the latter. The circulation of the whole mass of the blood through the lungs distends and fills them with blood, so that their relative weight will be nearly doubled, and any incision into them will be followed by a free effusion.

From the respiratory system proofs of life subsequent to birth are derived. From the thorax; its size, capacity, and arch are increased by respiration. From the lungs; they are increased in size and volume, are projected forward, become rounded and obtuse, of a pinkish-red hue, and their density is inversely as their volume; Dean, Med. Jur. 149 et seq. The fact of the specific gravity of the lungs being diminished in proportion to their diminution in density gives rise to a celebrated test,—the hydrostatic,—the relative weight of the lungs with water; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 459 et seq. The rule is, that lungs which have not respired are specifically heavier than water, and if placed within it will sink to the bottom of the vessel. If they have respired, their increase in volume and decrease in density render them specifically lighter than water, and when placed within it they will float. There are several objections to the sufficiency of this test; for example lungs which have never respired may become so distended with putrefactive gases as to float, and, on the other hand, lungs which have respired may be the seat of congestion or inflammation which would cause them to sink; but it is fairly entitled to its due weight in the settlement of this question; Dean, Med. Jur. 154 et seq. From the state of the diaphragm: prior to respiration it is found high up in the thorax. The act of expanding the lungs enlarges and arches the thorax, and, by necessary consequence, the diaphragm descends.

The fact of life at birth being established, the next inquiry is, how long did the child survive? The proofs here are derived from three sources. The foetal openings, their partial or complete closure. The more perfect the closure, the longer the time. The series of changes in the umbilical cord. These are—1, the withering of the cord; 2, its desiccation or drying, and, 3, its separation or dropping off,—occurring usually four or five days after birth; 4, cicatrization of the umbilicus,—occurring usually from ten to twelve days after birth. The changes in the skin, in the process of exfoliation of the epidermis, which commences on the abdomen, and extends thence successively to the chest, groin, axillæ, interseapular space, limbs, and, finally, to the hands and feet.

As to the modes by which the life of the child may have been destroyed. The criminal modes most commonly resorted to are—1, suffocation; 2, drowning; 3, cold and exposure; 4, starvation; 5, wounds, fractures, and injuries of various kinds; a mode not unfrequently resorted to is the introduction of sharp-pointed instruments in different parts of the body; also, luxation and fracture of the neck, accomplished by forcibly twisting the head of the child, or pulling it backwards; 6, strangulation; 7, poisoning; 8, intentional neglect to tie the umbilical cord; and, 9, causing the child to inhale air deprived of its oxygen, or gases positively deleterious. All these modes of destroying life, together with the natural or accidental ones, will be found fully discussed by the writers on medical jurisprudence. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 509; Dean, Med. Jur. 179; Ryan, Med. Jur. 187; Dr. Cummins, Proof of Infanticide Considered; Storer & Heard, Criminal Abortion; Brown, Infanticide; Toulmouche, Etudes sur Infanticide.

INFANZON. In Spanish Law. A person of noble birth, who exercises within his domains and inheritance no other rights and privileges than those conceded to him.

INFEOFFMENT. The act or instrument of feoffment. In Scotland it is synonymous with saisine, meaning the instrument of possession; formerly it was synonymous with investiture. Bell, Dict. The word as used in Scotch law was infefment, which was, in its proper sense, the whole feudal right, but, afterwards, the instrument or attestation of a notary that possession was actually given. Ersk. Prin. 133.

INFERENCE. A conclusion drawn by reason from premises established by proof.

A deduction or conclusion from facts or propositions known to be true. 44 Wis. 336.

It is the province of the judge who is to decide upon the facts to draw the inference. When the facts are submitted to the court, the judges draw the inference; when they are to be ascertained by a jury, the jury must do so. The witness is not permitted, as a general rule, to draw an inference and testify that to the court or jury. It is his duty to state the facts simply as they occurred. Inferences differ from presumptions.

INFERIOR COURTS. An inferior court is a court of special and limited jurisdiction, and it must appear on the face of its proceedings that it has jurisdiction, and that the parties were subjected to its jurisdiction by proper process, or its proceedings will be void. Cooley, Const. Lim. 508. Another distinction between superior and inferior courts is: in the latter case, a want of jurisdiction may be shown even in opposition to the recitals contained in the record; id. 509; citing 5 N. Y. 431, 497; 26 Conn. 273; this is the general rule, though there are apparent exceptions of those cases where the jurisdiction may be said to depend upon the existence of a certain state of facts, which must be passed upon by the courts themselves, and in respect to which the decision of the court once rendered, if there was any evidence whatever on which to base it, must be held final and conclusive in all collateral inquiries, notwithstanding it may have erred in its conclusions; Cooley, Const. Lim. 509; citing 1 B. & B. 432; Freem. Judg. § 523; 10 Wis. 16; 16 Mich. 225.

INFICIATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Denial. Denial of fact alleged by plaintiff, —especially, a denial of debt or deposit. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Calvinus, Lex.

INFIDEL. One who does not believe in the existence of a God who will reward or punish in this world or that which is to come. Willes 550. One who professes no religion that can bind his conscience to speak the truth. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 368. One who does not recognize the inspiration or obligation of the Holy Scriptures, or generally recognized features of the Christian religion. 37 N. Y. 580.

This term has been very indefinitely applied. Under the name of infidel, Lord Coke comprises Jews and heathens; Co. 2d Inst. 506; Co. 3d Inst. 165; and Hawkins includes among infidels such as do not believe either in the Old or New Testament; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 46, s. 148.

The objection to the competency of witnesses who have no religious belief is removed in England and in most of the United States by statutory enactments; 1 Whart. Ev. § 395.

It has been held that at common law it is only requisite that the witness should believe in the existence of a God who will punish and reward according to desert; 1 Atk. 21; 2 Cow. 431; 5 Mas. 18; 13 Vt. 362; 26 Pa. 274; that it is sufficient if the punishment is to be in this world; 14 Mass. 184; 4 Jones, No. C. 25; contra, 7 Conn. 66. And see 17 Wend. 460; 2 W. & S. 262; 10 Ohio 121. A witness's belief is to be presumed till the contrary appear; 2 Dutch. 463, 601; and his disbelief must be shown by declarations made previously, and cannot be inquired into by examination of the witness himself; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 370, n.; 17 Me. 157; 14 Vt. 535. See 17 Ill. 541; 80 Ky. 248; 53 N. H. 55. See Tayl. Ev. 1178.

INFILT (Sax.). An assault upon an inhabitant of same dwelling. Gloss. Anc. Inst. & Laws of Eng.

INFIRM. Weak, feeble.

When a witness is infirm to an extent likely to destroy his life, or to prevent his attendance at the trial, his testimony de bene esse may be taken at any age. 1 P. Wms. 117. See WITNESS.

INFIRMATIVE. Weakening. Webster, Dict. Tending to weaken or render infirm; disprobabilizing. 3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 13, 14. Exculpatory is used by some authors as synonymous. See Wills, Circ. Ev. 120; Best. Pres. § 217.

INFLUENCE. Most frequently used in connection with "undue," and refers to persuasion, machination, or constraint of will presented or exerted to procure a disposition of property, by gift, conveyance, or will. Anderson, L. Dict.

INFORMALITY. Want of customary or legal form.

INFORMATION. In French Law. The act or instrument which contains the depositions of witnesses against the accused. Pothier, Proc. Civ. sect. 2, art. 5.

In Practice. A complaint or accusation exhibited against a person for some criminal offence. 4 Bla. Com. 308.

An accusation in the nature of an indictment, from which it differs only in being presented by a competent public officer on his oath of office, instead of a grand jury on their oath. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 141.

It differs in no respect from an indictment in its form and substance, except that it is filed at the mere discretion of the proper law officer of the government, ex officio, without the intervention of a grand jury; 4 Bla. Com. 308. The process has not been formally put in motion by congress for misdemeanors, but is common in civil prosecutions for penalties and forfeitures; 3 Story, Const. 659. The information is usually made upon knowledge given by some other person than the officer called the relator. "It comes from the common law without the aid of statutes; 5 Mod. 459; it is a concurrent remedy with indictment for all misdemeanors except misprision of treason, but not permissible in any felony." Bish. Cr. Pr. § 14; 5 Mass. 257; 9 Leigh 665.

As to the power of a legislature to dispense with indictment, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

Under United States laws, informations are resorted to for illegal exportation of goods; 1 Gall. 3; in cases of smuggling; 1 Mas. 482; and a libel for seizure is in the nature of an information; 3 Wash. C. C. 464; 1 Wheat. 9; 9 id. 381. The provisions of the U. S. constitution which provide that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment, etc., of a grand jury, have been held to apply only to the proceedings in the federal courts; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 88; 24 Ala. 672; 8 Vt. 57.

An information is sufficiently formal if it follows the words of the statute; 9 Wheat. 381; 14 Conn. 487; but enough must appear to show whether it is found under the statute or at common law; 3 Day 103. It must, however, allege the offence with sufficient fullness and accuracy; 10 Ind. 404; and must show all the facts demanding a forfeiture, as in a penal action, when it is to recover a penalty; 4 Mass. 462; 10 Conn. 461. Where it is for a first offence, the fact need not be stated; 9 Conn. 560; otherwise, where it is for a second or subsequent offence for which an additional penalty is provided; 2 Metc. Mass. 408. It need not show that there has been a preliminary examination or a waiver thereof; 48 Kan. 753. It cannot be amended by adding charges; 1 Dana 466; contra, that it can be amended before trial; 12 Conn. 101; 38 N. H. 314; 1 Salk. 471. By the common law a mistake in an information may be amended at any time; 64 Vt. 372. The information charging a statutory offence cannot be amended after verdict so as to include another offence found by the jury; 88 Mich. 359. It must be signed by the officer before filing; 15 Kan. 404; but not necessarily in Texas; 1 Tex. App. 664; and must conclude with "against the peace and dignity of the state;" 27 Tex. App. 538. In England, a verification was not required; but it is usually otherwise by statute in America; 4 Ind. 524; 1 McArthur. 466.

A part of the defendants may be acquitted and a part convicted; 1 Root 226; and a conviction may be of the whole or a part of the offence charged; 4 Mass. 137. In some states it is a proceeding by the state officer, filed at his own discretion; 9 N. H. 468; 6 Ind. 281; 4 Wis. 567; in others, leave of court may be granted to any relator to use the state officer's name, upon cause shown; 7 Halst. 84; 2 Dall. 112; 1 McCord 35, 52. See 45 La. Ann. 25. In England, the right to make an information was in the attorney-general, who acted without the interference of the court; 3 Burr. 2089. In former times the officer proceeded upon any application, as of course; 4 Term 285; but by an act passed in 1692, it was provided that leave of court must be first obtained and security entered; see 2 Term 190. It is said to be doubtful whether leave of court is necessary in this country; 1 Bish. Cr. Pr. § 144. A prosecuting officer may, on his own motion, present a bill to the grand jury, without presenting an affidavit charging the offence, if he deems it necessary for the public good; and his action in doing so will be disturbed only in case of abuse of discretion; 20 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 1010.

See INDICTMENT; GRAND JURY; INFAMOUS CRIME.

INFORMATION OF INTRUSION.

A proceeding instituted by the state prosecuting officer against intruders upon the public domain. See 3 Pick. 224; 6 Leigh 588.

INFORMATION IN THE NATURE OF A QUO WARRANTO. A proceeding against the usurper of a franchise or office. See QUO WARRANTO.

INFORMATUS NON SUM (Lat.).

In Practice. I am not informed: a formal answer made in court or put upon record by an attorney when he has nothing to say in defence of his client. Styles, Reg. 372.

INFORMER. A person who informs or prefers an accusation against another, whom he suspects of the violation of some penal statute.

When the informer is entitled to the penalty or part of the penalty, upon the conviction of an offender, he is or is not at common law a competent witness, according as the statute creating the penalty has or has not made him so; 1 Phill. Ev. 97; Ros. Cr. Ev. 107; 5 Mass. 57; 1 Dall. 68; 1 Saund. 262, c. See 16 Pet. 213; 4 East 180. The court is not bound to instruct the jury that the testimony of such a witness is to be received with great caution and distrust, since the credibility of witnesses is for the jury, and counsel are permitted to argue the question to them; 15 R. I. 1.

INFORTIATUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The second part of the Digest or Pandects of Justinian. See DIGEST.

This part, which commences with the third title of the twenty-fourth book and ends with the thirty-eighth book, was thus called because it was the middle part, which, it was said, was supported and fortified by the two others. Some have supposed that this name was given to it because it treats of successions, substitutions, and other important matters, and, being more used than the others, produced greater fees to the lawyers.

INFRA (Lat.). Below, under, beneath, underneath. The opposite of supra, above. Thus, we say, primo gradu est—supra, pater, mater, infra, filius, filia: in the first degree of kindred in the ascending line, above is the father and the mother, below, in the descending line, son and daughter. Inst. 3. 6. 1.

In another sense, this word signifies within: as, infra corpus civitatis, within the body of the country; infra præsidia, within the guards. So of time, during: infra furorem, during the madness. This use is not classical. The sole instance of the word in this sense in the Code, infra anni spatium, Code, b. 5, tit. 9, § 2, is corrected to intra anni spatium, in the edition of the Corpus Jur. Civ. of 1833 at Leipsic. The use of infra for intra seems to have sprung up among the barbarians after the fall of the Roman empire.

INFRA ÆTATEM (Lat.). Within or under age.

INFRA ANNUM LUCTUS (Lat.).

Within the year of grief or mourning. 1 Bla. Com. 457; Cod. 5. 9. 2. But intra anni spatium is the phrase used in the passage in the Code referred to. See Corp. Jur. Civ. 1833, Leipsic. Intra tempus luctus occurs in Novella 22, c. 40. This year was at first ten months, afterwards twelve. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 612.

INFRA BRACHIA (Lat.).

Within her arms. Used of a husband de jure as well as de facto. Co. 2d Inst. 317. Also, inter brachia. Bracton, fol. 148 b. It was in this sense that a woman could only have an appeal for murder of her husband inter brachia sua. Woman's Lawyer, pp. 332, 335.

INFRA CORPUS COMITATUS (Lat.).

Within the body of the county. The common-law courts have jurisdiction infra corpus comitatus: the admiralty, on the contrary, has no such jurisdiction, unless, indeed, the tide-water may extend within such county. 5 How. 441, 451. See ADMIRALTY; FAUCES TERRÆ.

INFRA DIGNITATEM CURIÆ (Lat.). Below the dignity of the court. Example: in equity a demurrer will lie to a bill on the ground of the triviality of the matter in dispute, as being below the dignity of the court. See 4 Johns. Ch. 183; 4 Paige, Ch. 364.

INFRA HOSPITIUM (Lat.). Within the inn. When once a traveller's baggage comes infra hospitium, that is, in the care and under the charge of the innkeeper, it is at his risk. See GUEST; INNKEEPER.

INFRA PRÆSIDIA (Lat. within the walls). A term used in relation to prizes, to signify that they have been brought completely in the power of the captors; that is, within the towns, camps, ports, or fleet of the captors. Formerly the rule was, and perhaps still in some countries is, that the act of bringing a prize infra præsidia changed the property; but the rule now established is that there must be a sentence of condemnation to effect this purpose. 1 C. Rob. 134; 1 Kent 104; Chitty, Law of Nat. 98; Abbott, Shipp. 14; Hugo, Droit Romain § 90.

INFRACTION (Lat. infrango, to break in upon). The breach of a law or agreement; the violation of a compact. In the French law this is the generic expression to designate all actions which are punishable by the Code of France.

INFRINGEMENT. In Patent Law. A word used to denote the act of trespassing upon the incorporeal right secured by a patent or copyright. Any person who, without legal permission, shall make, use, or sell to another to be used, the thing which is the subject-matter of any existing patent, is guilty of an infringement, for which damages may be recovered at law by an action on the case, or which may be remedied by a bill in equity for an injunction and an account.

The manufacture, sale, or use of an invention protected by letters patent, within the area and time described therein by a person not duly authorized to do so. Robt. Pat. § 890.

Infringement is a mixed question of law and fact; 113 U. S. 609. Whether a device is an infringement is determined by the claims of the patent, and not by the actual invention; 9 Blatchf. 363; 5 Fish. 285. There is no infringement unless the invention can be practised completely by following the specifications. An infringement is a copy made after, and agreeing with, the principle laid down in the patent; and if the patent does not fully describe everything essential to the thing patented, no infringement will take place by the fresh invention of processes which the patentee has not communicated to the public; 1

Fish. 298. Where the same advantages are gained by substantially the same means, there is infringement; 12 Fed. Rep. 790. The test is whether the defendant uses anything which the plaintiff has invented; 7 Fed. Rep. 199, 204.

However different, apparently, the arrangements and combinations of a machine may be from the machine of the patentee, it may in reality embody his invention, and be as much an infringement as if it were a servile copy of his machine. According to the Patent Law, if the machine complained of involves substantial identity with the one patented, it is an infringement. If the invention of the patentee be a machine, it is infringed by a machine which incorporates, in its structure and operation, the substance of the invention,—that is, an arrangement which performs the same service, or produces the same effect, in the same way, or substantially the same way; 3 Blatchf. 535. And a device may be an infringement though it be itself a new invention; 16 Fed. Rep. 539. To obtain the same result by the same mode of operation constitutes infringement; 30 Fed. Rep. 68; and so does a mere formal change; 11 Fed. Rep. 880; or variations in size, form, and degree; 27 Fed. Rep. 684; 13 id. 456.

An invention limited to certain forms is infringed only by the use of those forms; 31 Fed. Rep. 913.

Where the same result is accomplished, the same function performed, and the mode of operation is the same, a mere difference in the location of parts will not avoid infringement; 42 O. G. 297.

An improvement may be an infringement; 12 Fed. Rep. 621. An improvement and its original are separate inventions, and the inventor of one infringes by the use of the other; 29 Fed. Rep. 358; 15 id. 448. It is, however, presumed that use under one patent does not infringe another; 1 MacArthur 459; and the grant of a second patent is prima facie evidence that the inventions are different, and that the later patented invention is not an infringement of the former; 1 Bann. & A. 428; 3 Blatch. 190.

To experiment with a patented article for scientific purposes, or for curiosity, or amusement, is said not to constitute infringement; 4 Blatchf. 493; but this cannot be invariably true. To make and exhibit a device at a fair, but not for use or sale, is not an infringement; 15 Fed. Rep. 390; nor is mere exposure for sale; 4 A. & E. 251; nor advertising an invention; 19 O. G. 727; but the latter is strong evidence of infringement; 19 O. G. 727. To make an article for sale abroad is an infringement; 8 Fed. Rep. 586.

An infringement may be committed by repairing as well as making the invention, if it involves reconstruction either in whole or in part; 3 Bann. & A. 471. To make a part with intent to use it, or to sell it to be used, in connection with the other parts of the invention, is infringement; 30 Fed. Rep. 437.

One who makes and sells one element of a patented combination with the intention and for the purpose of bringing about its use in such a combination, is guilty of infringement; 80 Fed. Rep. 712; 132 U. S. 425; but not where the article made by the alleged infringer was not separately patented and was of a perishable nature (sheets of toilet paper); id. It has been held that replacing broken or worn-out parts is not necessarily infringement; 77 Fed. Rep. 739; 75 id. 1009. See 77 id. 288, citing many cases.

No act of making, use, or sale can be an infringement of a patented invention unless it is performed during the life of the patent; 128 U. S. 605; 37 Fed. Rep. 354; see 163 U. S. 55. An infringement may be committed by the use, after the patent issues, of a device constructed before the creation of the monopoly, notwithstanding the good faith of its purchaser or maker and his belief that it will never be protected by a patent; 3 Rob. Pat. § 907; 34 Fed. Rep. 789.

One who buys a patented article of manufacture from one authorized to sell it at the place where it is sold, becomes possessed of an absolute property in it, unrestricted in time or place; 157 U. S. 659; whether a patentee may protect himself and his assignees by special contracts brought home to the purchasers was not decided in the case. A licensee of a patent for Michigan sold pipes to be laid in Connecticut, where he had no patent right; it was held that he was not liable for infringement; 149 U. S. 355; see 17 Wall. 453.

A re-issue is not infringed by an act committed before the surrender of the original patent; 2 Rob. Pat. § 696. A re-issue with a broader claim is not infringed by the use of devices made before the original patent, though they are covered by the new claim; 11 Fed. Rep. 510; 20 Blatchf. 333. A device which does not infringe the original cannot infringe the re-issue, if the scope of the original is measured by its description and not by its claims alone; 4 Bann. & A. 159.

A patent for a combination of old elements is not infringed by using less than all the elements, where the two combinations are not the same in operation; 3 Fed. Rep. 456. A claim for a combination of three elements is not infringed by the use of two only, though the third is useless, for the patentee must stand by his claim; 1 Bann. & A. 78. A combination is not infringed where one essential element is omitted and another is substituted accomplishing the same result in a different way; 12 Fed. Rep. 563.

A patent for a manufacture is infringed in whatever way the article is made; 30 Fed. Rep. 437; 3 Bann. & A. 235.

Where a product is patented as the result of a certain process it is infringed only when made by that process; 111 U. S. 293.

A patent for a composition of matter is infringed if the new element does the same thing as the one for which it is substituted, though otherwise it is different; 5 Fish.

357. A composition of matter is not infringed, if elements are substituted producing different results; 27 Fed. Rep. 69.

One is not liable in damages as an infringer if the patentee put his invention on the market unstamped, unless he had notice of the patent; 21 Fed. Rep. 122; 152 U. S. 244; 155 id. 584. The burden is on the complainant to prove actual or constructive notice; 152 U. S. 244.

Speaking in the general sense, it is doubtless true that the test of infringement in respect to the claims of a design-patent is the same as in respect to a patent for an art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter; but it is not essential to the identity of the design that it should be the same to the eye of an expert. If in the eye of an ordinary observer, giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives, two designs are substantially the same; if the resemblance is such as to deceive such an observer and sufficient to induce him to purchase, one supposing it to be the other, the one first patented is infringed by the other; 5 Fed. Rep. 359; 14 Wall. 511.

That the United States government, when it grants letters patent for a new invention or discovery in the arts, confers upon the patentee an exclusive property in the patented invention, which cannot be appropriated or used by the government itself without just compensation, any more than it can appropriate or use without compensation land which has been patented to a private purchaser, we have no doubt. The constitution gives to congress power to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries,"—which could not be effected if the government had a reserved right to publish such writings or to use such inventions without the consent of the owner; 104 U. S. 356.

The United States is liable, under its contract, for the use of a patented article, but it is not liable in tort; 156 U. S. 552. While it has no right to use a patented device, yet no suit will lie against it without its consent; 161 U. S. 10; jurisdiction to recover royalties or compensation under a contract is in the court of claims; 128 U. S. 262. It is doubtful whether a government official who uses an invention solely for the benefit of the government can be sued for infringement, and whether the case is not one solely for the court of claims; 104 U. S. 356. Where an officer of the United States uses, in his official capacity, a patented device made and used by the United States, the patentee is not entitled to an injunction, and cannot recover profits, if the only profit is a saving to the United States; but such officers, although acting under its orders, are personally liable to be sued for their own infringement of a patent; 161 U. S. 10; see 163 id. 49. A city is liable for an infringement by its officers for its benefit; 3 Fed. Rep. 338; 5 Bann. & A. 486.

The managing officers of an infringing corporation may be made co-defendants and individually enjoined; 30 Fed. Rep. 123. An officer of a corporation acting for it in renting machines is a proper party defendant with such users, in a bill for an injunction; 7 Blatchf. 5.

It would be a great hardship if the directors of a railway or manufacturing corporation were bound, at their personal peril, to find out that every machine that the company uses is free of all claim of monopoly. No case precisely in point has been cited; but the practice certainly is to ask for damages only against the corporation. Joinder in equity for purposes of discovery and injunction is another matter; but I have not known damages to be asked for against the directors of a corporation, excepting in one case, which did not come to trial, but was discontinued as to the directors. I am of opinion that the only persons who can be held for damages are those who should have taken a license, and that they are those who own or have some interest in the business of making, using, or selling the thing which is an infringement; and that an action at law cannot be maintained against the directors, shareholders, or workmen of a corporation which infringes a patented improvement; 13 Fed. Rep. 392. But it has also been held that all who join in an infringement are liable for damages, though some are mere officers of corporations; 19 Fed. Rep. 514. In a suit against a corporation for infringement of a patent, officers of the company, who are simply employes receiving a fixed salary, not dependent upon the sale of the alleged infringed article, and who have not personally been guilty of infringement, are neither necessary nor proper parties defendant; 73 Fed. Rep. 212.

Expert evidence is admissible in determining a question of identity between two devices; 1 Fish. 298.

In actions at law for infringement, the state statutes of limitation apply; 155 U. S. 610.

See PATENTS; COPYRIGHT; TRADE-MARKS; UNITED STATES COURTS; SYLLABUS.

INFUSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. A pharmaceutical operation, which consists in pouring a hot or cold fluid upon a substance whose medical properties it is desired to extract. The product of this operation. An infusion differs from a decoction in that the latter is produced by boiling the drug.

Although infusion differs from decoction, they are said to be ejusdem generis; and in the case of an indictment which charged the prisoner with giving a decoction, and the evidence was that he had given an infusion, the difference was held to be immaterial; 3 Campb. 74.

INGENIUM (Lat. of middle ages). A net or hook. Du Cange; hence, probably, the meaning given by Spelman of artifice, fraud (engin). A machine, Spelman, Gloss., especially for warlike purposes; also, for navigation of a ship. Du Cange.

INGENUI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those freemen who were born free. Vicat, Vocab.

They were a class of freemen, distinguished from those who, born slaves, had afterwards legally obtained their freedom: the latter were called, at various periods, sometimes liberti, sometimes libertini. An unjust or illegal servitude did not prevent a man from being ingenuus.

INGRESS, EGRESS, AND REGRESS. These words are frequently used in leases to express the right of the lessee to enter, go upon, and return from the lands in question.

INGRESSU (Lat.). An ancient writ of entry, by which the plaintiff or complainant sought an entry into his lands. Abolished in 1833. Tech. Dict.

INGROSSING. In Practice. The act of copying from a rough draft a writing in order that it may be executed: as ingrossing a deed.

INHABITANT (Lat. in, in, habeo, to dwell). One who has his domicile in a place; one who has an actual fixed residence in a place. As used in the federal jurisdiction act of 1789, it means citizen. 145 U. S. 444.

A mere intention to remove to a place will not make a man an inhabitant of such place, although, as a sign of such intention, he may have sent his wife and children to reside there; 1 Ashm. 126. Nor will his intention to quit his residence, unless consummated, deprive him of his right as an inhabitant; 1 Dall. 153, 480. See 10 Ves. 339; 14 Viner, Abr. 420; 6 Ad. & E. 153.

"The words 'inhabitant,' 'citizen,' and 'resident,' as employed in different constitutions to define the qualifications of electors, mean substantially the same thing; and one is an inhabitant, resident, or citizen at the place where he has his domicile or home;" Cooley, Const. Lim. 755 and note; 16 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 535. But the terms "resident" and "inhabitant" have also been held not synonymous, the latter implying a more fixed and permanent abode than the former, and importing privileges and duties to which a mere resident would not be subject; 40 Ill. 197; 5 Sandf. 44; 1 Bradf. 69; 2 Gray 484; 23 N. J. L. 517. Where a question was to be submitted to the "inhabitants" of a municipality it has been held to mean legal voters; 103 U. S. 683. When relating to municipal rights, powers, or duties, the word inhabitant is almost universally used as signifying precisely the same as domiciled; 132 Mass. 98. See 17 Pick 231.

The inhabitants of the United States are native or foreign born. The natives consist, first, of white persons, and these are all citizens of the United States, unless they have lost that right; second, of the aborigines, and these are not, in general, citizens of the United States, nor do they possess any political power; third, of negroes, or descendants of the African race ; fourth, of the children of foreign representatives, who are citizens or subjects as their fathers are or were at the time of their birth.

Inhabitants born out of the jurisdiction of the United States are, first, children of citizens of the United States, or of persons who have been such ; they are citizens of the United States, provided the father of such children shall have resided within the same ; Act of Congress of April 14, 1802, § 4 ; second, persons who were in the country at the time of the adoption of the constitution ; these have all the rights of citizens ; third, persons, who have become naturalized under the laws of any state before the passage of any law on the subject of naturalization by congress, or who have become naturalized under the acts of congress, are citizens of the United States, and entitled to vote for all officers who are elected by citizens, and to hold any office except those of president and vice-president of the United States ; fourth, children of naturalized citizens, who were under the age of twenty-one years at the time of their parents being so naturalized, or admitted to the rights of citizenship, are, if then dwelling in the United States, considered as citizens of the United States, and entitled to the same rights as their respective fathers ; fifth, persons who resided in a territory which was annexed to the United States by treaty, and the territory became a state ; as, for example, a person who, born in France, moved to Louisiana in 1806, and settled there, and remained in the territory until it was admitted as a state, it was held that, although not naturalized under the acts of congress, he was a citizen of the United States ; Desbois' Case, 2 Mart. La. 185 ; sixth, aliens or foreigners, who have never been naturalized, and these are not citizens of the United States, nor entitled to any political rights whatever.

Property conveyed to the inhabitants of a town as a body politic and corporate vests in the town as a corporation ; 45 N. H. 87. See ALIEN ; CITIZEN ; DOMICIL ; NATURALIZATION ; HOME.

INHERENT POWER. An authority possessed without its being derived from another. A right, ability, or faculty of doing a thing, without receiving that right, ability, or faculty from another.

INHERITABLE BLOOD. Blood of an ancestor which, while it makes the person in whose veins it flows a relative, will also give him the legal rights of inheritance incident to that relationship. See 2 Bla. Com. 254, 255. Descendants can derive no title through a person whose blood is not inheritable. Such, in England, are persons attainted and aliens. But attainder is not known in this country. See 4 Kent 413, 424 ; 1 Hill, R. P. 148 ; 2 id. 190.

INHERITANCE. A perpetuity in lands to a man and his heirs ; the right to succeed to the estate of a person who dies intestate. Dig. 50. 16. 24. The term is applied to lands.

It includes all the methods by which a child or relation takes property from another at his death, except by devise, and includes as well succession as descent ; as applied to personal property, it can mean nothing else than to signify succession ; 33 N. J. L. 413.

The property which is inherited is called an inheritance.

The term inheritance includes not only lands and tenements which have been acquired by descent, but every fee-simple or fee-tail which a person has acquired by purchase may be said to be an inheritance, because the purchaser's heirs may inherit it ; Littleton § 9. This would now be called an estate of inheritance ; 1 Steph. Com. 231. See ESTATES.

In Civil Law. The succession to all the rights of the deceased. It is of two kinds : that which arises by testament, when the testator gives his succession to a particular person ; and that which arises by operation of law, which is called succession ab intestat. Heineccius, Lec. El. §§ 484, 485.

INHERITANCE ACT. The English statute of 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106, regulating the law of inheritance. 2 Chitty, Stat. 575 ; 2 Bla. Com. 37 ; 1 Steph. Com. 388 ; Will. R. P. 119.

INHIBITION. In Civil Law. A prohibition which the law makes or a judge ordains to an individual. Halifax, Anal. p. 126.

In English Law. The name of a writ which forbids a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending before him ; it is in the nature of a prohibition. Termes de la Ley ; Fitzh. N. B. 39. Also a writ issuing out of a higher court christian to a lower and inferior, upon an appeal ; 2 Burn, Ec. L. 339. In the government of the Protestant Episcopal church, a bishop can inhibit a clergyman of his diocese from performing clerical functions.

In Scotch Law. A personal prohibition which passes by letters under the signet, prohibiting the party inhibited to contract any debt or to do any act by which any part of the heritable property may be aliened or carried off, in prejudice of the creditor inhibiting. Erskine, Pr. b. 2, tit. ii. s. 2. See DILIGENCE.

INHIBITION AGAINST A WIFE. In Scotch Law. A writ in the sovereign's name, passing the signet, which prohibits all and sundry from having transactions with a wife or giving her credit. Bell, Dict. ; Erskine, Inst. 1. 6. 26.

INITIAL (from Lat. initium, beginning). Beginning ; placed at the beginning. Webster. Thus, the initials of a man's name are the first letters of his name : as, G. W. for George Washington. Initials are no part of a name ; 147 U. S. 47. A middle name or initial is not recognized by law ;

1 Hill, N. Y. 102; 4 Watts 329; 26 Vt. 599; 28 N. H. 561; 8 Tex. 376; Wharton, Am. Cr. Law 68; 37 W. Va. 665; 2 N. Dak. 295; 83 Ga. 332. But see 1 Pick. 388; but the first initial is, and a variance therein is fatal to an indictment; 30 Tex. App. 470. In an indictment for forgery, an instrument signed "T. Tupper" was averred to have been made with intent to defraud Tristram Tupper, and it was held good; 1 McMull. 236. Signing of initials is good signing within the Statute of Frauds; 12 J. B. Moore 219; 1 Campb. 513; 2 Mood. & R. 221; Add. Contr. 46, n.; 1 Den. 471. But see Erskine, Inst. 3. 2. 8. When in a will the legatee is described by the initials of his name only, parol evidence may be given to prove his identity; 3 Ves. 148. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" on the indictment, used only the initials of, instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; 4 Ind. App. 583. As to the use of an initial in a ballot, see ELECTION. See, generally, NAME.

INITIALIA TESTIMONII (Lat.). In Scotch Law. A preliminary examination of a witness to ascertain what disposition he bears towards the parties whether he has been prompted what to say, whether has received a bribe, and the like. It resembles in some respects an examination on voir dire in English practice.

INITIATE. Commenced.

A husband was, in feudal law, said to be tenant by the curtesy initiate when a child who might inherit was born to his wife, because he then first had an inchoate right as tenant by the curtesy, and did homage to the lord as one of the pares curtis (peers of the court); whence curtesy. This right became consummated on the death of the wife before the husband. See 2 Bla. Com. 127; 1 Steph. Com. 247.

INITIATE TENANT BY CURTESY. A husband becomes tenant by curtesy initiate in his wife's estate of inheritance upon the birth of issue capable of inheriting the same. The husband's estate by curtesy is not said to be consummate till the death of the wife. 2 Bla. Com. 127, 128; 1 Steph. Com. 365, 366.

INITIATIVE. In French Law. The name given to the important prerogative conferred by the charte constitutionnelle, art. 16, on the king to propose, through his ministers, projects of laws. 1 Toullier, n. 39. See VETO.

INJUNCTION. A prohibitory writ, issued by the authority and generally under the seal of a court of equity, to restrain one or more of the defendants or parties, or quasi parties, to a suit or proceeding in equity, from doing, or from permitting his servants or others who are under his control to do, an act which is deemed to be inequitable so far as regards the rights of some other party or parties to such suit or proceedings in equity. Eden, Inj. c. 1; Kerr, Inj. 9; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. b. 3, c. 2, § 1; Story, Eq. Jur. § 861; Will. Eq. Jur. 341; 2 Green, Ch. 136; 1 Madd. 126.

The writ of injunction may be regarded as the correlation of the writ of mandamus, the one enjoining the performance of an unlawful act, the other requiring the performance of a lawful or neglected act; Beach, Inj. § 9.

Under the present practice in England, injunction is not by writ, but the order of the court has the same effect.

The interdict of the Roman law resembles, in many respects, our injunction. It was used in three distinct but cognate senses. 1. It was applied to signify the edicts made by the prætor, declaratory of his intention to give a remedy in certain cases, chiefly to preserve or to restore possession; this interdict was called edictale: edictale, quod prætorii edictis proponitur, ut sciant omnes ea forma posse implorari. 2. It was used to signify his order or decree, applying the remedy in the given case before him, and was then called decretal: decretale, quod prætor re nata implorantibus decrevit. It is this which bears a strong resemblance to the injunction of a court of equity. 3. It was used, in the last place, to signify the very remedy sought in the suit commenced under the prætor's edict; and thus it became the denomination of the action itself. Livingston on the Batture case, 5 Am. Law Jour. 271; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 865.

Mandatory injunctions command the defendant to do a particular thing. Preventive, commands him to refrain from an act. The former are resorted to rarely and are seldom allowed before a final hearing; 40 N. Y. 191; 68 Pa. 370; 10 Ves. 192; 20 Am. Dec. 389; 45 N. J. Eq. 178.

Preliminary or interlocutory injunctions are used to restrain the party enjoined from doing or continuing to do the wrong complained of, either temporarily or during the continuance of the suit or proceeding in equity in which such injunction is granted, and before the rights of the parties have been definitely settled by the decision and decree of the court in such suit or proceeding.

Final or perpetual injunctions are awarded, or directed to be issued, or the preliminary injunction already issued is made final or perpetual, by the final decree of the court, or when the rights of the parties so far as relates to the subject of the injunction are finally adjudicated and disposed of by the order or decree of the court; 2 Freem. Ch. 106; 4 Johns. Ch. 69; 3 Yerg. 366; 1 Bibb. 184; Kerr, Inj. *12.

In England, injunctions were divided into common injunctions and special injunctions; Eden, Inj. 178, n.; Will. Eq. Jur. 342; Saxt. Ch. 504. The common injunction was obtained of course when the defendant in the suit in equity was in default for not entering his appearance, or for not putting in his answer to the complainant's bill within the times prescribed by the practice of the court; Eden, Inj. 59, 68, 93, n.; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; 18 Ves. 523; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. Special injunctions were founded upon the oath of the complainant, or other evidence of the truth of the charges contained in his bill of complaint. They were obtained upon a special application to the court or to the officer of the court who was authorized to allow the issuing of such injunction, and usually upon notice of such application given to the party whose proceedings were sought to be enjoined; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; 4 Eden, Inj. 78, 290; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 339; 3 Mer. 475; 18 Ves. 522. By the Judicature Act of 1873, no proceeding at any time pending in the high court of justice, or before the court of appeal, shall be restrained by injunction, and any court may issue injunctions of all kinds; Moz. & W.: Brown, Dict. In the United States courts and in the equity courts of most of the states of the Union, the English practice of granting the common injunction has been discontinued or superseded, either by statute or by rules of the courts. And the preliminary injunctions are, therefore, all special injunctions in the courts of this country where such English practice has been superseded.

When used. The injunction is used in a great variety of cases, of which cases the following are some of the most common: to stay proceedings at law by the party enjoined; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 51, 874; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 338; R. M. Charl. 93; 6 Gill & J. 122; 1 Sumn. 89; 4 Johns. Ch. 17; 23 How. 500; 27 Conn. 579; 4 Jones, Eq. 32; 5 R. I. 171; 23 Ga. 139; see 1 Beasl. 223; 13 Cal. 536; 20 Tex. 661; 35 Miss. 77; 128 Ill. 293; 123 U. S. 241; to restrain the transfer of stocks, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 906, 955; 1 Russ. 412; 2 Vern. 122; 3 Bro. Ch. 476; 9 Wheat. 738; 4 Jones, Eq. 257; 134 Ind. 442; 45 La. Ann. 120; to restrain the transfer of the title to property; 1 Beasl. 253; 14 Md. 69; 7 Ia. 33; 6 Gray 562; 37 Fed. Rep. 12; or the parting with the possession of such property; Story, Eq. Jur. § 953; 3 V. & B. 168; 4 Cow. 440; to restrain the party enjoined from setting up an inequitable defence in a suit at law; Story, Eq. Jur. § 903; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 134; to restrain the collection of illegal taxes; 97 Mo. 300; 85 Ky. 557; 74 Mich. 692; or taxes imposed in contravention of the U. S. constitution; 149 U. S. 164; to restrain the infringement of a patent; Story, Eq. Jur. § 930; 2 Blatchf. 39; 4 Wash. C. C. 259, 514, 534; 1 Paine 441; 36 Fed. Rep. 582; 35 id. 206; or a copyright, or the pirating of trade-marks; 17 Ves. 424; 1 Hill, N. Y. 119; 2 Bosw. 1; 44 N. J. Eq. 391; 118 Ind. 105; 37 Fed. Rep. 360; to restrain a party from passing off his goods as those of another by means of simulating his labels, packages, etc.; 138 U. S. 537; to prevent the removal of property; 3 Jones, Eq. 253; or the evidences of title to property, or the evidences of indebtedness, out of the jurisdiction of the court; to restrain the committing of waste; 4 Kent 161; 2 Johns. Ch. 148; 12 Md. 1; 4 Jones, Eq. 174; 2 Ia. 496; 32 Ala. N. C. 867; 2 Mer. 437; to restrain members of a firm from doing acts inconsistent with the partnership articles, etc.; 12 Beav. 414; to restrain waste, even though the title be in litigation; 113 U. S. 537; to restrain the cutting of timber on land the title to which is in dispute; 54 Fed. Rep. 1005; to restrain the construction of a permanent tunnel through a lot; 64 Cal. 62; or a continuous trespass, where a party claims a right of way over the land, the use of which if permitted will ripen into an easement; 63 Vt. 278; 78 Cal. 454; see 65 Miss. 391; 75 Cal. 426; 84 Ky. 254; to restrain trespass, leaving the question of title to be settled by a suit at law; 37 Fed. Rep. 36; to restrain a railway from entering and taking possession of land without first having acquired the right to do so; 117 Ind. 465; 97 Mo. 457; to restrain intimidation of workmen by labor unions; 51 Fed. Rep. 260; (see LABOR); to restrain a boycott; 45 Fed. Rep. 135; to restrain a defaulting or insolvent executor or administrator from getting in assets; Kerr, Inj. § 451; 1 Will. Exec. 275; to restrain a trustee from the misuse of his powers; 1 Hare 146; to protect certain liens, as that of an equitable mortgage, or of a solicitor upon his client's papers; 1 Y. & C. 303; 7 D. M. & G. 288; to restrain companies from doing illegal acts, either as against the public or third parties, or the members thereof; 13 Beav. 45; Kerr, Inj. § 473; to restrain the unlawful diversion of water; 75 Cal. 426; 128 Ill. 271; or the pollution of a stream; 42 N. W. Rep. Ill. 891; or the flowage of land by a water company, unless the award is paid; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1083; to restrain the erection of a house across a public alley; 81 Ga. 723. It lies to prevent a threatened breach of trust in the diversion of corporate funds by illegal payment out of its capital or profits; 157 U. S. 429; at the suit of a private person to prevent the publication of his picture (but not where the person is of public reputation); 64 Fed.

Rep. 280; but not to restrain the publication of a biography of the complainant or of a member of his family; 57 Fed. Rep. 434; but see 15 N. Y. Supp. 787. But equity will enjoin the publication of a picture of a deceased member of complainant's family, where the respondent had not observed the conditions under which he obtained it; 57 Fed. Rep. 434. Equity will enjoin the construction of a street railway over a part of a turnpike road, the fee of which is owned by the complainant; 6 D. R. Pa. 269; at the suit of a wife, whose title is not disputed, will enjoin her husband's creditors from selling her property for payment of his debts; 18 C. C. R. Pa. 560; and will enjoin a hardware store situated in a populous district from keeping and selling dynamite, and from overloading its building with a stock of hardware, when it thereby becomes a menace to passers-by; 8 Kulp, Pa. 433.

An injunction will be granted to restrain a company in voluntary liquidation from distributing its assets among its shareholders without providing for future liabilities under a lease; 33 Ch. D. 41; to restrain a husband from going to his wife's house settled to her separate use, in a case where proceedings are pending between them for divorce or a judicial separation, and they are living apart; 24 Ch. 346; to enjoin a husband from dealing with his property where alimony is claimed; [1893] P. 284; [1896] P. 36, but see [1896] P. 35; against trades unionists who maliciously induce employer's contractees to break their contracts; [1893] 1 Q. B. 715; for maliciously inducing an employer to dismiss his employees; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21; against picketing; [1896] 1 Ch. 811; to restrain the publication of notes of a lecture where the audience was limited and were admitted by ticket; 28 Ch. D. 374; to restrain the publication of any valuable information, e. g. of prices communicated to a limited public for a limited purpose; [1896] 1 Q. B. 147; to restrain the sale of a volume of letters; 2 Atk. 341; to restrain the publication of confidential information obtained during service; 19 Q. B. D. 629; such as drawings; [1892] 2 Ch. 518; advertisements; [1893] 1 Ch. 218; to restrain the vendor of a good will from soliciting his former customers; [1896] App. Cas. 7; or a photographer who had taken a negative likeness of a lady in order to supply her with copies for money, from selling or exhibiting copies; 40 Ch. D. 345; to restrain a nuisance; De G. & S. 323; or to prevent a fraudulent transfer or removal from the jurisdiction of a debtor's property, in aid of an execution; 136 N. Y. 252.

An injunction will not be granted, as a rule, to take property out of the possession of one party and put it into that of another whose title has not been established by law; 144 U. S. 119; 40 W. N. C. Pa. 121; nor to restrain a defendant in a case pending for the infringement of letters patent, from issuing circulars alleging that the plaintiff's patent in suit is invalid; 29 Fed.

Rep. 95; 28 id. 773; (contra, 34 id. 46; 65 Ga. 452; and it lies in England by statute; 14 Ch. Div. 763; 28 Fed. Rep. 774; L. R. 7 Eq. 488); nor to restrain a patentee who has begun, and is proceeding with, a suit on his patent, from notifying a manufacturer's customers, in a courteous way, that he intends to enforce his rights; 58 Fed. Rep. 577; nor to restrain defendant from falsely representing that a patentee's invention is an infringement of his, and thus deterring purchasers; 119 Mass. 484.

It is necessary to the obtaining an injunction, as to other equitable relief, that there should be no plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law; 30 Barb. 549; 5 R. I. 472; 121 N. Y. 45; 31 Pa. 387; 32 Ala. N. S. 723; 37 N. H. 254; 61 Hun 140; 145 U. S. 459; but where there is adequate remedy at law one will not be granted; 141 Ill. 572; 49 Fed. Rep. 517; 37 id. 67; 34 id. 357; 129 Md. 464; 109 N. C. 21; 83 Wis. 426; 115 Mo. 613. An injunction will not be granted while the rights between the parties are undetermined, except in cases where material and irreparable injury will be done; 3 Bosw. 607; 1 Beasl. 247, 542; 15 Md. 22; 13 Cal. 156, 190; 6 Wis. 680; 16 Tex. 410; 28 Mo. 210; 24 Fla. 542; but where it is irreparable and of a nature which cannot be compensated, and where there will be no adequate remedy, an injunction will be granted; 39 N. H. 182; 12 Cush. 410; 27 Ga. 499; 1 McAll. 271; 54 Fed. Rep. 1005; 64 Vt. 643. A preliminary injunction against the infringement of a patent will not be granted in case of doubt as to the infringement; 37 Fed. Rep. 691; 38 id. 112; 36 id. 691; where defendant confessedly intends to regain possession of certain premises by force, such act being punishable as a breach of the peace, he will not be restrained by injunction; 45 id. 721.

The owner of a dwelling-house, called for 60 years "Ashford Lodge," is not entitled to an injunction restraining the proprietor of an adjoining house known as "Ashford Villa" for 40 years from changing its name to "Ashford Lodge"; 10 Ch. D. 294. An injunction will not lie to prevent a club from carrying out the decision of the members when acting under their rules, unless it be shown that the rules are contrary to natural justice, or that what has been done is contrary to the rules, or that there has been bad faith in a decision; 5 Eq. 63; 13 Ch. D. 346; 17 Ch. D. 615. A bill in equity for an injunction against a crime or misdemeanor does not lie; but equity will interfere if the alleged criminal acts go further and operate to the destruction or diminution of value of property. A member of an incorporated club has a standing in equity for an injunction to restrain the club from carrying out its declared purpose of committing an act which, if found to be criminal, will imperil the charter of the club; 177 Pa. 224.

Where there was a conspiracy to prevent workmen by intimidation or persuasion, from entering into or continuing in the plaintiff's employment, an injunction was granted to restrain the maintenance of a patrol of two men in front of the plaintiff's premises, placed there in furtherance of such conspiracy; 44 N. E. Rep. Mass. 1077; but a corporation is not entitled to an injunction against persons or organizations, on the ground that they have conspired to exterminate it by compelling its members to leave it; 43 Pac. Rep. Col. 451. See BOY-CORR.

Where a city had power to build water-works, the fact that by so doing it would violate contract rights of an existing water company does not give an individual property owner the right to enjoin the city on the ground that his taxes would be increased thereby; 60 Fed. Rep. 961.

Equity will not enjoin a municipal corporation in the exercise of its lawful powers, unless the proposed act is ultra vires and would work irreparable injury; 43 Fed. Rep. 308; but a resident taxpayer and real estate owner is entitled to bring a suit to enjoin the execution of a municipal contract illegally awarded, whatever may be alleged to be his ulterior purpose; 8 D. R. Pa. 266; 137 Pa. 561.

Where a statute creates a new offence and neglects the penalty, the ancillary remedy of injunction may be claimed as well as the penalty; Brett, L. C. Mod. Eq. 327.

An injunction against a newspaper to restrain it from copying literary matter from another newspaper will not be refused because such is the practice of newspapers; [1892] 3 Ch. 489, where the cases are collected. An injunction will not lie to restrain the publication of an encyclopedia of the same name as complainant's, except as to copyright articles, where defendant has used no means to lead the public to believe that its publication is that of complainant; 44 Fed. Rep. 793.

In England, equity, in special cases of contracts for personal services, will restrain the violation of the contract, whenever the legal remedy of damages would be inadequate and the contract is of such a kind that its negative specific enforcement is possible. This rule was at first applied to contracts which were in form expressly negative, but has since been extended to affirmative contracts which imply negative stipulations; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1343; 1 De G., M. & G. 604; L. R. 16 Eq. 149; 1 McCra. 558, 565; 1 Holmes 253. But where there was a contract for personal service containing a stipulation by the employed that he will "act exclusively for" his employer, the employed will not be restrained by injunction from entering the employ of another person in the absence of a negative covenant in the contract, express or implied, which is clear and definite; 75 L. T. Rep. 526; 47 N. J. Eq. 270.

The American cases are said to have usually either refused to follow the English decisions or have considerably modified them; see 53 Cal. 201; 8 Baxt. 54, 242; 42 Md. 460. Equity will restrain a breach of his contract by a baseball player who had contracted to play with the plaintiff; 8 C. C. R. 57; contra, 8 C. C. R. 337; see also 42 Fed. Rep. 198.

An injunction will lie where the remedy at law, though there be one, is inadequate; thus: to protect an innocent purchaser of the stock and good-will of a business by enjoining the sale thereof by the sheriff, where the damages recoverable would be only for the value of the stock, without compensation for the loss of business; 138 U. S. 271; to prevent the illegal sale of a church-pew under an attachment, upon the ground that it would be an outrage to the owners' religious feelings; 27 Weekly Law Bull. (Ohio) 20; to prevent the illegal issue of corporate bonds; 113 Ind. 22; 5 Wall. 74; to prevent the destruction of ornamental trees on the plaintiff's grounds; 7 Md. 408; to restrain the cutting off of the supply of natural gas furnished under a contract; 50 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 283; where the redress at law would be inadequate by reason of the defendant's insolvency; 133 N. Y. 499. An injunction will lie to enjoin a public nuisance if it be continuous and peculiarly injures the plaintiff or his property; 135 N. Y. 239. An injunction will not be granted on the application of a private person, to protect purely public rights; Beach, Inj. § 13; 139 Ill. 419; nor, except in a great emergency, to interfere with public improvements; 40 N. J. Eq. 350; nor to restrain the abuse of a public trust, unless the complainant can show some peculiar interest therein; 102 Ill. 379; nor to compel the lessees of an opera house to allow the plaintiff to use the house under a contract therefor, where the effect would be to compel the lessee to break a contract with an innocent third party; 43 Fed. Rep. 831; nor to prevent the maintenance of a nuisance on a highway where it could be abated by indictment; 49 N. J. Eq. 11. Where a criminal prosecution is threatened under color of an invalid statute for the purpose of compelling the relinquishment of a property right, an injunction will lie; 80 Fed. Rep. 218.

Criminal acts may be restrained by injunction if they are of such a nature as to constitute a public nuisance; 147 Mass. 550. This recent development of equity jurisdiction is well settled. Its efficiency has been in preventing the evils of strikes. See Judge Taft's Address, Report of Amer. Bar Asso., 1895, p. 265; 6 L. R. Eq. 551; 51 Fed. Rep. 260; 54 Fed. Rep. 730; 60 Fed. Rep. 803; 63 Fed. Rep. 310; 62 Fed. Rep. 824; 158 U. S. 564; 18 Chic. L. News 306; 32 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1106; 33 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 609. An injunction has also been granted to restrain a prize fight; 28 L. R. A. 727; 35 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 100; an injunction will lie to restrain railroad employes from acts of violence and intimidation and from enforcing rules of labor unions resulting in irreparable injury to the company and the public, such as those requiring an arbitrary strike without cause; 54 Fed. Rep. 746; and also to restrain a railroad company and its employes from refusing to interchange interstate commerce, freight, and traffic facilities with a connecting line of railway; 54 Fed. Rep. 730.

The granting of an injunction is not limited to a case where damages could not be recovered in an action at law; 27 Abb. N. C. 387; but as a general rule it will not be granted where the party may be compensated in damages; 99 N. C. 11.

Injunctions are used by courts of equity in a great number and variety of special cases; and in England and in the United States this writ was formerly used by such courts as the means of enforcing their decisions, orders, and decrees. But subsequent statutes have in most cases given to courts of equity the power of enforcing their decrees by the ordinary process of execution against the property of the party; so that an injunction to enforce the performance of a decree is now seldom necessary.

Injunctions may be used by courts of equity, in the United States as well as in England, to restrain the commencement or the continuance of proceedings in foreign courts, upon the same principles upon which they are used to restrain proceedings at law in courts of the same state or country where such injunction is granted, the jurisdiction in this class of cases, however, being purely in personam; 3 Myl. & K. 104; Story, Eq. Jur. § 899; High, Inj. § 103; Bisph. Eq. 424. But a state court will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in one of the United States courts. But it is otherwise when the state court has first acquired jurisdiction; 9 C. E. Green 238; 15 Wisc. 401; 53 N. Y. (S. C.) 76. Nor will a United States court grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in a state court, except where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy; 4 Cra. 179; 96 U. S. 340; Rev. Stat. § 720; High, Inj. § 109. See generally 37 Cent. L. J. 4. And upon the ground of comity, as well as from principles of public policy, the equity courts of one state of the Union will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings previously commenced in a court of a sister state, where the courts of such sister state have the power to afford the party applying for the injunction the equitable relief to which he is entitled; 2 Paige, Ch. 401; 31 Barb. 364; 84 Ill. 20; but in a proper case, the equity courts of one state can restrain persons within their jurisdiction from the prosecution of suits in another state; 133 U. S. 107. A very strong case should be made out to warrant a court of equity in interfering with a judgment at law; 76 Ga. 9; 51 Ark. 341; but it will enjoin a judgment at law if the matters set up in the bill, as a ground of relief, constitute equities unavailable as a defence in the action at law; 128 U. S. 374; no injunction against proceedings at law will issue where the plaintiff has a good defence at law; 40 Fed. Rep. 517. An injunction will lie to restrain a multiplicity of suits; 54 Fed. Rep. 40.

In the United States, an injunction bill is usually sworn to by the complainant, or is verified by the oath of some other person who is cognizant of the facts and charges contained in such bill, so far at least as relates to the allegations in the bill upon which the application for the preliminary injunction is based. And an order allowing such injunction is thereupon obtained by a special application to the court, or to some officer authorized by statute, or by the rules and practice of the court, to allow the injunction, either with or without notice to the party enjoined and with or without security to such party, as the law or the rules and practice of the court may have prescribed in particular classes of cases; 1 W. & M. 280. Unless a preliminary injunction is to be applied for, a bill ordinarily need not be sworn to.

The bill must disclose a primary equity in aid of which this secondary remedy is asked; 4 Jones, Eq. 29; 28 Ga. 585; 14 La. Ann. 108; 12 Mo. 315.

Where the plaintiff has slept on his rights and allowed the alleged wrong to exist for a long time, he is not entitled to an injunction; 145 U. S. 317; 143 id. 224, 553; 62 Tex. 205; as where the plaintiff had permitted the completion of the building which he sought to enjoin; 143 Pa. 487; and where the plaintiff who was the owner of land bounded by a highway permitted a railway to be built on the highway; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 616. But it is otherwise where the plaintiff seeks the aid of an injunction for the protection of his legal rights, there being laches, but nothing to constitute an estoppel; 22 N. Y. Supp. 321. But delay in bringing suit is not a defence if it appear that matters still remain in statu quo; 2 Sim. N. s. 78. An injunction in a patent case will not be granted where, by reason of the plaintiff's delay, the defendant would be subjected to special hardship; 56 Fed. Rep. 152; nor where the plaintiff has been guilty of misrepresentations as to his goods, covered by a trade-mark; 108 U. S. 213; 28 Mass. 477; 96 Cal. 518. An injunction will not be granted when the plaintiff's right is doubtful; 54 Fed. Rep. 214; 26 id. 884; nor, it has been held, where the right on which it is claimed is, as a matter of law, unsettled; 29 N. J. Eq. 299; 43 id. 71.

Formerly the plaintiff could not obtain relief by injunction until his rights had been settled at law; 2 Johns. Ch. 162; but this doctrine is now now maintained.

Injunctions are not granted where complainant's rights are not clear, and where an injury more or less irreparable is not likely to result unless defendants are enjoined; 21 Ohio L. J. 390; 45 N. J. Eq. 50.

An injunction is ordinarily preventive, and will not be granted to correct a wrong already done or restore to a party rights of which he has been deprived; 43 Ill. App. 25; 58 Mich. 286.

There must be at least a reasonable probability of injury to the plaintiff in order to justify an injunction; 122 N. Y. 505; 96 Cal. 243; a mere threat of injury is not ordinarily a sufficient ground for an injunction; 107 N. C. 139; 55 Fed. Rep. 487. There must be a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury; 83 Mich. 285; 25 Fla. 656; 4 Nev. 142. It is not necessary to prove that a wrong has actually been committed; where rights had been infringed, and the party has good reason to believe they will be infringed, an injunction will issue; 4 Blatch. 184. A bill will lie for an injunction, if a patent right has been admitted, upon the well-grounded proof of an intention to violate the right; 3 Story 749. A bill in equity will lie for an injunction to prevent an anticipated infringement of a patent, no infringement having actually occurred; 35 Fed. Rep. 149; where there was no proof of actual sales, but the defendant had exhibited his lamps at a fair, and distributed circulars to the public and otherwise advertised his lamps for sale, it was held that if sales had not actually been made, such a wrong was threatened, and that was sufficient to call for an injunction; 10 id. 291. Where the defendant had formerly been engaged in infringing, the mere fact that since the commencement of the suit he had ceased to do so and did not threaten to renew his sales, is not an answer to an application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the continuance or renewal of such infringement. Perhaps as safe a criterion of what is to be apprehended from defendant as can be obtained, is to look at that which he has done, and in his answer justified the right to do, rather than to look to the fact of his having discontinued the alleged injury and his declaration of want of intention of renewing the same; 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 112. See Rob. Pat. § 1191.

An injunction should contain upon its face sufficient to inform the party enjoined of what he is restrained from doing or from permitting to be done by those who are under his control, without the necessity of his resorting to the complainant's bill on file to ascertain what he is to refrain from doing or from permitting to be done; 10 Cal. 347. Where a preliminary injunction is needed, the complainant's bill should contain a proper prayer for such process; 2 Edw. Ch. 188; 4 Paige, Ch. 229, 444; 3 Sim. 273. The order granting an injunction is to be construed in the light of the prayer for the same; 81 Ga. 567. Damages for breach of covenant may be decreed in conjunction with relief by injunction; 160 Pa. 529. A court of equity may impose any terms in its discretion as a condition of granting or continuing an injunction; 120 U. S. 206.

The remedy of the party injured by the violation of an injunction by the party enjoined is by an application to the court to punish the party enjoined for his contempt in disobeying the process of the court; Hill. Inj. 173; 78 Hun 154; 61 Fed. Rep. 494.

Where an injunction had issued against cutting timber, the agent of the party enjoined who had cut timber in breach of the injunction was held guilty of contempt; 11 Beav. 180. Where trustees of a friendly society who had been enjoined from distributing certain funds, resigned, and their successors, with notice of the injunction, proceeded to make the forbidden distribution, both sets of trustees were held to be in contempt and were committed; 51 L. J. Ch. 414. See 66 L. T. Ch. D. 267. To render a person amenable to an injunction, it is neither necessary that he be a party to the suit or served with a copy of it, so long as he appears to have had actual notice; 166 U. S. 548.

Equity will restrain the commission of injuries outside of its territorial jurisdiction, by a decree in personam, where it has acquired jurisdiction over the defendants. Such are suits for the specific performance of contracts, for the enforcement of trusts, for relief on the ground of fraud, for settling partnership accounts; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1318. Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 144; 100 Mass. 267; 66 Mo. 563; 53 Ga. 514; 16 Pet. 25; a defendant may be enjoined from committing waste upon property situated abroad; 32 Fed. Rep. 124. But where the suit is strictly local, the subject-matter is specific property, and the relief such that, if granted, it must act directly upon the subject-matter, and not upon the person of the defendant, the jurisdiction must be exercised in the place where the subject-matter is situated, as a suit to abate a nuisance; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1318; 2 Black 485.

In the United States courts special injunctions are granted only on notice, but in cases of danger of irreparable injury an order may issue (R. S. § 718) restraining the threatened act till the motion can be heard; and such order may be with or without security. Injunctions shall not be granted to restrain proceedings in the state courts except in bankruptcy proceedings; R. S. § 720; nor suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any taxes; R. S. § 3224. Injunction in a state court in cases afterwards removed to a federal court, remain in full force until dissolved or modified; 18 Stat. L. 470. See 34 Fed. Rep. 481; 46 id. 546.

Under the new equity rules in Pennsylvania evidence on a motion for a preliminary injunction is taken in open court.

An injunction, when granted, will usually not be modified or dissolved except by the judge who granted it; 35 Fed. Rep. 98.

By the federal practice a motion to dissolve an injunction should always, when practicable, be addressed to the judge who granted it; and, in case of his death, it would seem advisable that two judges should hear the motion to dissolve; 77 Fed. Rep. 783.

The sole object of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until the merits can be heard. The status quo is the last actual peaceable uncontested status which preceded the pending controversy, and a wrongdoer cannot shelter himself behind a sudden or recently changed status, though made before the chancellor's hand actually reached him; 180 Pa. 572.

As to injunctions in particular cases, see the title of the particular subject to which the remedy is to be applied.

INJURED. Obstructing access to property, or the drainage therefrom, is within a statutory provision requiring compensation for property injured; 111 Pa. 354; 124 id. 560; 151 id. 30.

INJURIA ABSQUE DAMNO (Lat.). Wrong without damage. Wrong done without damage or loss will not sustain an action. The following cases illustrate this principle: 6 Mod. 46; 1 Show. 64; Willes 74, n.; 1 Ld. Raym. 940, 948; 2 B. & P. 86; 5 Co. 72; 9 id. 113; Bull. N. P. 120.

INJURIOUS WORDS. In Louisiana. Slander, or libellous words.

INJURY (Lat. in, negative, jus, a right). A wrong or tort.

Absolute injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses as being a member of society.

Private injuries are infringements of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals considered as individuals.

Public injuries are breaches and violations of rights and duties which affect the whole community as a community.

Injuries to personal property are the unlawful taking and detention thereof from the owner; and other injuries are some damage affecting the same while in the claimant's possession or that of a third person, or injuries to his reversionary interests.

Injuries to real property are ousters, trespasses, nuisances, waste, subtraction of rent, disturbances of right of way, and the like.

Relative injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses in relation to the person who is immediately affected by the wrongful act done.

It is obvious that the divisions overlap each other, and that the same act may be, for example, a relative, a private, and a public injury at once. For many injuries of this character the offender may be obliged to suffer punishment for the public wrong and to recompense the sufferer for the particular loss which he has sustained. The distinction is more commonly marked by the use of the terms civil injuries to denote private injuries, and of crimes, misdemeanors, etc., to denote the public injury done: though not always; as, for example, in case of a public nuisance which may be also a private nuisance.

Injuries arise in three ways: first, by non-feasance, or the not doing what was a legal obligation, or duty, or contract, to perform; second, misfeasance, or the performance in an improper manner of an act which it was either the party's duty or his contract to perform; third, malfeasance, or the unjust performance of some act which the party had no right or which he had contracted not to do.

The remedies are different as the injury affects private individuals or the public.

When the injuries affect a private right and a private individual, although often also affecting the public, there are three descriptions of remedies: first, the preventive, such as defence, resistance, recaption, abatement of nuisance, surety of the peace, injunction, etc.; second, remedies for compensation, which may be by arbitration, suit, action, or summary proceedings before a justice of the peace; third, proceedings for punishment, as by indictment, or summary proceedings before a justice. When the injury is such as to affect the public, it becomes a crime, misdemeanor, or offence, and the party may be punished by indictment, or summary conviction for the public injury, and by civil action at the suit of the party for the private wrong. But in cases of felony the remedy by action for the private injury is generally suspended until the party particularly injured has fulfilled his duty to the public by prosecuting the offender for the public crime; and in cases of homicide the remedy is merged in the felony; 1 Chitty, Pr. 10; Ayliffe, Pand. 592.

There are many injuries for which the law affords no remedy. In general, it interferes only when there has been a visible physical injury inflicted, while it leaves almost totally unprotected the whole class of the most malignant mental injuries and sufferings, unless in a few cases where, by a fiction, it supposes some pecuniary loss, and sometimes affords compensation to wounded feelings. A parent, for example, cannot sue, in that character, for an injury inflicted on his child, and when his own domestic happiness has been destroyed, unless the fact will sustain the allegation that the daughter was the servant of her father, and that by reason of such seduction he lost the benefit of her services; but the proof of loss of service has reference only to the form of the remedy. And when the action is sustained in point of form, damages may be given not only for the loss of service, but also for all that the plaintiff can feel from the nature of the injury; 20 Pa. 354; 9 N. W. Rep. 599; 14 Cent. L. J. 12. Another instance may be mentioned. A party cannot recover damages for verbal slander in many cases: as, when the facts published are true; for the defendant would justify, and the party injured must fail. Nor will the law punish criminally the author of verbal slander imputing even the most infamous crimes, unless done with intent to extort a chattel, money, or valuable thing. The law presumes, perhaps unnaturally enough, that a man is incapable of being alarmed or affected by such injuries to his feelings. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 591; Cl. Cr. L. 347.

The true and sufficient reason for these rules would seem to be the uncertain character of the injury inflicted, the impossibility of compensation, and the danger, supposing a pecuniary compensation to be attempted, that injustice would be done under the excitement of the case. The sound principle, as the experience of the law amply indicates, is to inflict a punishment for crime, but not put up for sale, by the agency of a court of justice, those wounded feelings which would constitute the ground of the action.

The rule as indicated above has its limitations, however, in particular cases; 71 Me. 227. Thus, it has been held that, when bodily pain is caused, mental pain follows necessarily, and the sufferer is entitled to damages for the mental pain as well as for the bodily; 29 Conn. 390; 13 Cal. 599; 63 Pa. 290; 62 Barb. 484; but damages for the mental suffering of one person, on account of physical injury to another, are too remote to be given by court or jury; 2 C. & P. 292.

There is a material distinction between damages and injury. Injury is the wrongful act or tort which causes loss or harm to another. Damages are allowed as an indemnity to the person who suffers loss or harm from the injury. The word injury denotes the illegal act, the term damages means the sum recoverable as amends for the wrong; 103 Ind. 319.

In Civil Law. A delict committed in contempt or outrage of any one, whereby his body, his dignity, or his reputation is maliciously injured. Voet, Com. ad Pand. 47. t. 10, n. 1.

A real injury is inflicted by any act by which a person's honor or dignity is affected: as, striking one with a cane, or even aiming a blow without striking; spitting in one's face; assuming a coat of arms, or any other mark of distinction proper to another, etc. The composing and publishing defamatory libels may be reckoned of this kind; Erskine, Pr. 4. 4. 45.

A verbal injury, when directed against a private person, consists in the uttering contumelious words, which tend to injure his reputation by making him little or ridiculous. Where the offensive words are uttered in the heat of a dispute and spoken to the person's face, the law does not presume any malicious intention in the utterer, whose resentment generally subsides with his passion; and yet even in that case the truth of the injurious words seldom absolves entirely from punishment. Where the injurious expressions have a tendency to blacken one's moral reputation or fix some particular guilt upon him, and are deliberately repeated in different companies, or handed about in whispers to confidants, the crime then becomes slander, agreeably to the distinction of the Roman law; Dig. 15, § 12 de Injur.

INLAGARE, INLEGIARE. To restore to protection of law. Opposed to utlagare. Bract. lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 14, § 1; Du Cange.

INLAGATION. Restoration to the protection of law.

INLAGH. A man who is under the protection of the law, and not outlawed. Cowel.

INLAND. Within the same country. The demesne reserved for the use of the lord. Cowel. Inland, or domestic, navigation is that carried on in the interior of the country, and does not include that upon the great lakes; 24 How. 1; 10 Wall. 577. As to what are inland bills of exchange, see BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

INMATE. One who dwells in a part of another's house, the latter dwelling at the same time in the said house. Kitch. 45 b; Com. Dig. Justices of the Peace (B 85); 1 B. & C. 578; 2 M. & R. 227; 2 Russ. Cr. 937; 1 M. & G. 83; 28 Cal. 545. See LODGER.

INN. A house where a traveller is furnished with everything he has occasion for while on his way. Bac. Abr. Inns (B); 3 B. & Ald. 283; 9 B. Monr. 72. A public house of entertainment for all who choose to visit it. 5 Sandf. 247; 93 Cal. 253; 84 Ala. 451. A coffee-house or a mere eating-house is not an inn. To constitute an inn there must be some provision for the essential needs of a traveller upon his journey, namely, lodging as well as food; per Brown, U. S. D. J., in 13 Rep. 299, citing 54 Barb. 316. See INNKEEPER.

INNAVIGABLE. A term applied in foreign insurance law to a vessel not navigable, through irremediable misfortune by a peril of the sea. The ship is relatively innavigable when it will require almost as much time and expense to repair her as to build a new one. Targa, 238, 256; Emerigon, to. 1, 577, 591; 3 Kent 323, n.

INNINGS. Lands gained from the sea by draining. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Callis, Sewers 38.

INNKEEPER. The keeper of a common inn for the lodging and entertainment of travellers and passengers, their horses and attendants, for a reasonable compensation. Bac. Abr. Inns, etc.; Story, Bailm. § 475. Any one who makes it his business to entertain travellers and passengers, and provide lodging and necessaries for them, their horses and attendants, is an innkeeper. Edw. Bailm. § 450; even though the house is situated on enclosed grounds; 93 Cal. 253. But one who entertains strangers occasionally, although he may receive compensation for it, is not an innkeeper; 2 D. & B. 424; 7 Ga. 296; 1 Morr. 184. See GUEST; BOARDER. It is not necessary that he should furnish accommodations for horses and carriages; 3 B. & Ald. 283; the keeper of a tavern; id.; and of a hotel is an innkeeper; 2 Chitty 484. So is one who keeps a hotel on what is called the European plan, furnishing lodging to guests, and keeping an eating-house where they may purchase meals at their option; 2 Daly 200. But the keeper of a mere restaurant is not an innkeeper if he only furnishes meals to his guests; 1 Hilt. 193; 13 Rep. 299. Nor is the keeper of a coffeehouse, or of a boarding house, or lodging-house; 8 Co. 32; 2 E. & B. 144; 100 Mass. 495; 35 Wisc. 118. One who receives lodgers and boards them under a special contract for a limited time, or who lets rooms to guests by the day or week, and does not furnish them entertainment, is not an innkeeper, 2 Daly 15. See 87 Cal. 483. Where the plaintiff attended a ball given by an innkeeper, stabled his horse at the inn, drank and paid for liquors, and paid for his ticket of admission to the ball, it was held that the relationship of innkeeper and guest did not exist; 17 Hun 126. Where one boarded with his family at a hotel in New York, paying a specified amount for his rooms, and an additional amount for board if he took his meals regularly, and if not, paying for whatever he ordered at the restaurant attached to the hotel, it was held that the innkeeper was liable for personal property stolen from the plaintiff's room; 17 Hun 279 (criticized in 20 Alb. L. J. 64, citing many cases); and see 22 Minn. 468. Where one merely leaves his horse with an innkeeper, the relation of innkeeper and guest does not exist; 68 Me. 489; so where he leaves goods at the inn without indicating any intention to become a guest; 60 Hun 409. So when a guest paid his bill and left the inn, having deposited money with a clerk to be kept till his return; 2 Lea 312; but it terminates where the guest delivers his baggage to a porter to be checked for safe keeping, the porter having no authority to receive it, and pays his bill, and in his absence the baggage is stolen, the innkeeper is not liable therefor; 93 Ala. 342.

He is bound to take in and receive all travellers and wayfaring persons, and to entertain them, if he can accommodate them, for a reasonable compensation; Wand. Inns, 46; 3 B. & Ald. 285; 7 C. & P. 213; 4 Exch. 367. See 89 Cal. 156. For a refusal to do so he is liable civilly and criminally; 7 C. & P. 213. It is no defence that the traveller did not tender the price of his entertainment, or that the guest was travelling on Sunday, or that the innkeeper had gone to bed, or that the guest refused to tell his name, otherwise if the guest was drunk, or was behaving in an improper manner; Edw. Bailm. § 471; 34 Pa. 86; 7 C. & P. 213. The innkeeper may demand prepayment; 9 Co. 87. He may not exclude persons from entering the inn and going into the public room on lawful business; 8 N. H. 523. He must guard their goods with proper diligence. He is liable only for the goods which are brought within the inn; 8 Co. 32; 58 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 555. A delivery of the goods into the personal custody of the innkeeper is not, however, necessary in order to make him responsible; for, although he may not know anything of such goods, he is bound to pay for them if they are stolen or carried away, even by an unknown person; Wand. Inns 100; Dig. 4, 9, 1; 3 B. & Ald. 283; 1 Holt N. P. 209; 1 Bell Comm. 469; 1 Sm. L. C. 47; 14 Barb. 193; 8 Co. 32; 93 Cal.

253; 2 Ind. App. 303; 54 Mo. App. 567; 1 Hayw. 41; 14 Johns. 175; 23 Wend. 642; 7 Cush. 114; 62 Pa. 92; 27 Miss. 668. Thus, when a guest's luggage was, at his suggestion, taken to the commercial room; 8 B. & C. 9; and when a lady's reticule with money in it was left for a few minutes on a bed in her room; 2 B. & Ad. 803; the innkeeper was held liable; and if he receive the guest, the custody of the goods may be considered as an accessory to the principal contract, and the money paid for the apartments as extending to the care of the box and portmanteau; Jones, Bailm. 94; Story, Bailm. § 470; 1 Bla. Com. 430; 2 Kent 458. The particular responsibility of an innkeeper does not extend to goods lost or stolen from a room occupied by a guest for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as guest, such as the exhibition of samples of merchandise; 121 U. S. 383. The liability of an innkeeper is the same in character and extent with that of a common carrier; 7 Cush. 417; 9 Humphr. 746; 1 Cal. 221; 8 B. & C. 9; 53 Me. 163; 8 Blackf. 535. Even where the plaintiff's horse and wagon containing goods of value were destroyed in the night by fire, the cause of which was unknown, it was held that the innkeeper was liable; 33 N. Y. 571; contra, 30 Mich. 259; s. c. 18 Am. Rep. 127, n. See 6 L. R. A. 483, n. In a recent English case in the Luton county court against the proprietor of the George Hotel, Luton, an innkeeper was held liable for the loss of a bicycle, lost while the owner was at luncheon in the hotel.

He is responsible for the acts of his domestics and servants, as well as for the acts of his other guests, if the goods are stolen or lost; 7 Cush. 417; 5 Barb. 560; 54 Mo. App. 567; but he is not responsible for any tort or injury done by his servants or others to the person of his guest, without his own co-operation or consent; 8 Co. 32. The innkeeper will be excused whenever the loss has occurred through the fault of the guest, the act of God, or of the public enemy; 4 M. & S. 306; 1 Stark. 251, n.; 27 Tex. 547; 98 U. S. 218; 87 Pa. 376; 134 id. 262. An omission on the part of the guest to lock his door will not necessarily prevent his recovery; 6 H. & N. 265; 2 Sweeny 705. See 14 Daly 114. Where a guest was given a room temporarily and in his absence his baggage was placed in the hall, the innkeeper was held liable for its loss; [1891] 2 Q. B. 11. When the guest misleads the innkeeper as to the value of a package and thus throws him off his guard, it has been held that he cannot recover; Edw. Bailm. § 466. See 46 N. Y. 266. The failure of a guest to inform an innkeeper that his valise placed in the cloak or baggage room, contains valuables, is not negligence; 2 Ind. App. 303; 83 Ga. 696. It has been held that a guest who does not confide his goods to the innkeeper cannot recover; Schoul., Bailm. 302; 1 Yeates 34; but the guest may retain personal custody of necessary wearing apparel and jewelry worn daily, for which the innkeeper becomes liable; 93

Cal. 253; a guest may recover for the loss of goods brought into the inn in the usual manner; 27 Miss. 657; 37 Ga. 242. An innkeeper may make reasonable regulations as to the manner in which he will receive and keep goods; 9 Wend. 85, 114. He must furnish reasonable accommodations. See 8 M. & W. 269. When the proprietor of a hotel employs a servant to receive and keep the property of guests while at meals, his liability for the default of this servant in the custody of property so received is not affected by the fact that he has also provided a check-room for the safe-keeping of such property; 54 Mo. App. 567.

The innkeeper is entitled to a just compensation for his care and trouble in taking care of his guest and his property; and, to enable him to obtain this, the law invests him with some peculiar privileges, giving him a lien upon the goods brought into the inn by the guest, and, it has been said, upon the person of his guest (contra, 3 M. & W. 248), for his compensation; 3 B. & Ald. 287; see 61 N. Y. 34; 1 Rich. 213; 26 Vt. 335; 3 M. & W. 248; 13 Or. 482; and this though the goods belong to a third person, if the innkeeper was ignorant of the fact; Schoul., Bailm. 326; 12 Q. B. 197; 23 Pa. 193; 11 Barb. 41; 99 N. C. 523; 27 Wis. 202; 52 Minn. 516; a lien was also held to attach upon the goods of the wife; 25 Q. B. Div. 491. Sewing machines were sent by his principal to a commercial traveller while he was at an inn, to be used in the course of business for sale to customers in the neighborhood. The innkeeper had express notice that they were the property of the employer but he received them as the baggage of the traveller, who left the inn without paying his bill; the English Court of Appeal held that the innkeeper had a lien on the goods for the amount of the bill; [1895] 2 Q. B. 501, affirming id. 78. The court below considered that the question of knowledge was immaterial, because "the goods in question were of a kind which a commercial traveller would in the ordinary course carry about with him to the inns at which he put up as part of the regular apparatus of his calling, and which the innkeeper would consequently be bound to receive into his inn and to take care of while they were there. Here it is true that the goods were not brought by G—to the inn—they were sent to him while he was staying there. But that can make no difference. The defendant was bound to receive them and take care of them as a part of his duty towards his guest. It follows that the lien attached to them."

At common law this lien could be enforced only by legal proceedings, and not by a sale; 11 Barb. 41; Edw. Bailm. § 476. This has been changed in New York by statute. As to detaining the horse of a guest, see 25 Wend. 654; 9 Pick. 280. The landlord may also bring an action for the recovery of his compensation. Where an innkeeper owes his guest for labor more than the guest owes for board, he has no lien; 3 Col. App. 519. An innkeeper's lien does not attach to goods in possession of one who is received as a boarder and not as a guest or traveller; 52 Minn. 516.

An innkeeper in a town through which lines of stages pass has no right to exclude the driver of one of these lines from his yard and the common public rooms where travellers are usually placed, who comes there at proper hours, and in a proper manner, to solicit passengers for his coach and without doing any injury to the innkeeper; 8 N. H. 523. The common-law liability of innkeepers has been changed in England and in most of the states by statute which provides that the innkeeper shall not be liable for money, etc., if he provides a safe for safe-keeping, and duly notifies his guests thereof. It has been held that a hotel-keeper, in whose safe a regular boarder deposits money for safe-keeping, is no more than a bailee for him, and when the money is stolen from the safe by his night clerk, is not liable therefor, in the absence of any proof of want of ordinary care in employing him; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 716.

INNOCENCE. The absence of guilt. See PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

INNOCENT AGENT. One who does the forbidden thing, moved thereto by another person, yet incurs no legal guilt, because either not endowed with sufficient mental capacity or not acquainted with the necessary facts. Bish. Cr. L. § 310; 21 Tex. App. 107.

INNOCENT CONVEYANCES. In English Law. A technical term used to signify those conveyances made by a tenant of his leasehold which do not occasion a forfeiture: these are conveyances by lease and release, bargain and sale, and a covenant to stand seized by a tenant for life. 1 Chitty, Pr. 243.

INNOMINATE CONTRACTS. In Civil Law. Contracts which have no particular names, as permutation and transaction. Inst. 2. 10. 13. There are many innominate contracts; but the Roman lawyers reduced them to four classes, namely, do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, and facio ut facias. Dig. 2. 14. 7. 2.

INNONIA. In Old English Law. A close or inclosure (clausum in Clausura). Spel. Glos.

INNOTESCIMUS (Lat.). In English Law. An epithet used for letters patent, which are always of a charter of feoffment, or some other instrument not of record, concluding with the words Innotescimus per presentes, etc. Tech. Dict.

INNOVATION. In Scotch Law. The exchange of one obligation for another, so that the second shall come in the place of the first. Bell, Dict. The same as NOVATION.

INNOXIARE. To purge one of a fault and declare him innocent. Toml.

INNS OF COURT. Voluntary non-corporate legal societies seated in London having their origin about the end of the 13th and the beginning of the 14th century. Encyc. Brit. They consist of the Inns of Court and Chancery.

The four principal Inns of Court are the Inner Temple and Middle Temple (formerly belonging to the Knights Templar), Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn (anciently belonging to the earls of Lincoln and Gray). The other inns are the two Serjeants' Inns, one of which also called Faryndon Inn is in Chancery Lane, and the other in Fleet Street. The Inns of Chancery were probably so called because they were once inhabited by such clerks as chiefly studied the forming of writs, which regularly belonged to the cursitors, who are officers of chancery. These are Thavie's Inn, the New Inn, supposed to have been formed on the old foundation of St. George's Inn, Symond's Inn, Clement's Inn, Clifford's Inn, Staple's Inn, Lion's Inn, Furnival's Inn, and Barnard's Inn. These are connected with the respective Inns of Court. There were other inns, such as Chester Inn, Strand or Strode Inn, and Scrope Inn.

Of the origin of the Inns of Court Inderwick says: "The fixture of a certain court for the trial of civil causes in London also encouraged the calling or profession of advocacy, and led to the institution of the Inns of Court, where students of the law could congregate as at a University, hear lectures on the Roman law and the laws of their country, and prepare themselves for their future duties." King's Peace 91. "Each inn is self-governing, and quite distinct from all others, all, however, possessing equal privileges; but latterly they have joined in imposing certain educational tests for the admission of students. It is entirely in the discretion of an inn of court to admit any particular person as a member, for no member of the public has an absolute right to be called to the bar, there being no mode of compelling the inn to state its reasons for refusal. But practically, no objection is ever made to the admission of any person of good character. Each inn has also the power of disbarring its members, that is, of withdrawing from them the right of practising as counsel. This right has been rarely exercised, but of late years there have been examples of persons abusing their profession, and indulging in dishonest practices; in such cases, the inn has its own mode of inquiring into the facts affecting the character of a member, and is not bound to make the investigation public. By this high controlling power over its members, a higher character is supposed to be given to the bar as a body, than if each individual was left to his own devices, unchecked, except by the law." Int. Cyc. See also Encyc. Brit.

INNUENDO (Lat. innuere, to nod at, to hint at; meaning. The word was used when pleadings were in Latin, and has been translated by "meaning").

In Pleading. A clause in the declaration, indictment, or other pleading containing an averment which is explanatory of some preceding word or statement.

An averment of the meaning of alleged libellous words. 152 Pa. 187. The defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on words complained of, in an action for libel; its office is to show how they came to have that defamatory meaning and how they relate to him. 84 Wis. 129.

It derives its name from the leading word by which it was always introduced when pleadings were in Latin. It is mostly used in actions of slander, and is then said to be a subordinate averment, connecting particular parts of the publication with what has gone before, in order to elucidate the defendant's meaning more fully. 1 Stark. Sland. 431.

It is the office of an innuendo to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on the words, to show how they come to have that meaning, and also to show how they relate to the plaintiff, whenever that is not clear on the face of them; Ogd. Lib. & Sl. *100. See COLLOQUIUM. It may be used to point to the plaintiff as the person intended in the defendant's statement. It may show that a general imputation of crime is intended to apply to the plaintiff; Heard, Sland. § 226; 1 H. L. Cas. 637; 2 Hill, N. Y. 282; but it cannot be allowed to give a new sense to words where there is no such charge; 8 Q. B. 825; 7 C. B. 280. See 47 Minn. 278.

Where a defamatory meaning is apparent on the face of the libel itself, no innuendo is necessary, though often inserted; 93 Mich. 119; 3 Col. App. 568; where the words prima facie are not actionable, an innuendo is essential to the action; Ogd. Lib. & Sl. *99.

It may point to the injurious and actionable meaning, where the words complained of are susceptible of two meanings; 8 Q. B. 841; Moore & S. 727; and generally explain the preceding matter; 7 C. B. 251; 15 id. 360; 1 M. & W. 245; 12 Ad. & E. 317; but cannot enlarge and point the effect of language beyond its natural and common meaning in its usual acceptation; Heard, Sland. § 219; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 619, 620; 6 B. & C. 154; 9 Ad. & E. 282; 15 Pick. 335; 19 D. C. 534; unless connected with the proper introductory averments; 1 Cr. & J. 143; 1 C. B. 728; 6 id. 239; 2 Pick. 320; 16 id. 1; 11 Metc. 473; 8 N. H. 246; 12 Vt. 51; 11 S. & R. 343; 5 Johns. 211. These introductory averments need not be in the same count; 2 Wils. 114; 2 Pick. 329. Where the language of an alleged libel was ambiguous, the innuendo does averring the meaning plaintiff claimed should be attached to the words complained of, are proper; 63 Hun 626.

For the innuendo in case of an ironical libel, see 7 Dowl. 210; 4 M. & W. 446.

If not warranted by preceding allegations, it may be rejected as superfluous; Heard, Sland. § 225; but only where it is bad and useless,—not where it is good but unsupported by evidence, even though the words would be actionable without an innuendo; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 629; 3 H. L. Cas. 395; 1 Cr. & M. 675; 1 Ad. & E. 558; 2 Bingh. N. C. 402; 4 B. & C. 655; 3 Campb. 461; 9 East 93; Cro. Car. 512; Cro. Eliz. 609. See 3 Misc. Rep. 314.

In the case of words not per se actionable, the innuendo must be pleaded and proved; 51 Mo. App. 102.

INOFFICIOUS TESTAMENT. In Civil Law. A testament contrary to the natural duty of the parent, because it totally disinherited the child, without expressly giving the reason therefor. See next title.

INOFFICIOSUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Inofficious: contrary to natural duty or affection. Used of a will of a parent which disinherited a child without just cause, or of that of a child which disinherited a parent, and which could be contested by querela inofficiosi testamenti; designated by Blackstone as remarkable on the ground "that the testator had lost the use of his reason;" 1 Com. 447; 2 id. 502; 2 Steph. Com. 589; Dig. 2. 5. 3. 13; Paulus, lib. 4, tit. 5, § 1. Even a brother or sister could set aside such a testament if the person actually instituted heir was turpis or infamous. The old writ de rationabili parte bonorum, in the English law, resembled in some respects the querela inofficiosi testamenti; but there is nothing which corresponds to it in the English law at the present day; Moz. & W.

INOFICIOCIDAD. In Spanish Law. Every thing done contrary to a duty or obligation assumed, as well as in opposition to the piety and affection dictated by nature: inofficiosum dicitur id omne quod contra pietatis officium factum est. The term applies especially to testaments, donations, dower, etc., which may be either revoked or reduced when they affect injuriously the rights of creditors or heirs.

INOPS CONSILII (Lat.). Destitute of or without counsel. In the construction of wills a greater latitude is given, because the testator is supposed to have been inops consilii.

INORDINATUS. An intestate.

INPENY and OUTPENY. Money which by the custom of some manors is paid by an incoming and an outgoing tenant. Spelm.; Holth.

INQUEST. A body of men appointed by law to inquire into certain matters: as, the inquest examined into the facts connected with the alleged murder. The grand jury is sometimes called the grand inquest.

The judicial inquiry itself by a jury summoned for the purpose, is called an inquest. The finding of such men, upon an investigation, is also called an inquest, or an inquisition.

The most familiar use of the word is to designate the inquiry by a coroner (q. v.) into the causes of death, whether sudden, violent, or in prison. To justify an inquest it is not necessary that a death should be both sudden and violent; either is sufficient; 2 Grant, Pa. 262. The authority to hold an inquest extends to bodies brought into the county; 105 N. Y. 146; and when a person died in one county and was buried in another it was held that the inquest should be held by the coroner of the latter. After the verdict is returned the duty is completed and a second inquest cannot be held unless the first is quashed by a competent court; 3 El. & El. 137; 4 Park. Cr. Rep. 519. No inquest can be held in any case except upon view of the body; this is jurisdictional and can be waived by no one; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 341; 3 B. & A. 260; if buried it may be exhumed, but must be reburied; id. 260; 2 Hawk. P. C. 77. A post-mortem examination may be ordered; 3 Pa. 462; 4 id. 269; but it should not be made before the jury have viewed the body; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 336; nor should it be in the presence of the jury, but they are to be instructed by the testimony of the physicians designated to make it; 105 N. Y. 146.

In holding an inquest the coroner acts judicially; 3 Gray 463; 44 Cal. 452; 32 Mo. 375; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 333. No person is entitled by reason of being suspected of causing the death, to be present, or to have counsel, or cross-examine the witnesses or produce others; 2 Hawk. P. C. 77; 20 How. Pr. 111; 11 Abb. Pr. 406; 81 N. Y. 622, aff. 15 Hun 200. The coroner may select and summon the jurors of inquest and fine any who are absent for non-attendance; T. U. P. Charlt. 310; they must be sworn; 3 B. & A. 260; and this must appear in the certificate or be proved aliunde; 22 Wend. 167; they are the sole arbiters of the facts; but the coroner may instruct them in the law; id.; and compel the attendance of witnesses, for which purpose he has common-law powers; 11 Phila. 387.

After hearing the evidence the jury should retire to deliberate upon their verdict, without the presence of the coroner, and, when agreed upon, it should be put in writing and is final, and the inquisition should be signed by the coroner and jury; 6 C. & P. 179, 602; the jury may sign by marks; 27 La. Ann. 297; and if several bear the same Christian and surname they need not be distinguished in the caption by abode or otherwise; 7 C. & P. 538.

The effect of the inquisition is to authorize the arrest and commitment of the person charged by it, and upon his arrest he may make his own statement and have it returned with the inquisition, but he cannot be discharged until his case is passed upon by the grand jury; 11 Abb. Pr. 406; 20 How. Pr. 111; except of course after hearing by a judge upon habeas corpus.

The testimony of a witness, not charged with crime, given at the inquest may be used against him, if afterwards accused; he must claim his privilege if he wishes to protect himself; 29 Pa. 102; 7 Neb. 320; but if at the time of inquest he is in custody on suspicion, he cannot be examined as a mere witness, but only as an accused party in the same manner as if brought before a committing magistrate; 103 N. Y. 211; the doctrine that silence gives consent does not apply to a coroner's inquest; 92 id. 29. These rules were settled by the New York court of appeals as the result of a series of cases; 10 id. 13; 15 id. 384; 41 id. 7; 103 id. 211; 91 id. 241.

Preventing a coroner from holding an inquest over a dead body, when it is required by law, is indictable; 13 Q. B. D. 331; 7 Mod. 10. Where the captain of a man-of-war, mistaking his legal duty, had prevented the coroner from holding an inquest on the body of a man hanged on his ship, the court, granting an information, refused to proceed also against his boatswain, who had participated in the transaction under his order; Andr. 231; but, adds Bishop, "an information is in a measure discretionary with the court, and perhaps on an indictment the boatswain would have been deemed liable;" 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 688 (3).

In Massachusetts there is now no coroner, but an inquest is held in such cases by a justice of certain designated courts, after an examination by regular medical examiners and a report that the death was caused by violence, or without such report upon the direction of the prosecuting officer; Pub. Stat. c. 26. See CORONER.

INQUEST OF OFFICE. An inquiry made by the king's officer, his sheriff, coroner, or escheator, either virtute officii, or by writ sent to him for that purpose, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitles the king to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels. It is done by a jury of no determinate number,—either twelve, or more, or less; 3 Bla. Com. 258; Finch, Law 323. An inquest of office was bound to find for the king upon the direction of the court. The reason given is that an inquest concluded no man of his right, but only gave the king an opportunity to enter, so that he could have his right tried; 3 Bla. Com. 260; 4 Steph. Com. 61; F. Moore 730; 3 Hen. VII. 10; 2 Hen. IV. 5. An inquest of office was also called, simply, "office." As to "office" in the United States, see OFFICE.

INQUIRY, WRIT OF. A writ sued out by a plaintiff in a case where the defendant has let the proceedings go by default, and an interlocutory judgment has been given for damages generally, where the damages do not admit of calculation. It issues to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, and commands him to inquire, by a jury of twelve men, concerning the amount of damages. The sheriff thereupon tries the cause in his sheriff's court, and some amount must always be returned to the court. But the return of the inquest merely informs the court, which may, if it choose, in all cases assess damages and thereupon give final judgment. 2 Archb. Pr., Waterman ed. 952; 3 Bla. Com. 398; 3 Chitty, Stat. 495, 497.

INQUISITION. In Practice. An examination of certain facts by a jury impanelled by the sheriff for the purpose. The instrument of writing on which their decision is made is also called an inquisition.

The sheriff or coroner, and the jury who make the inquisition, are called the inquest.

An inquisition on an untimely death, if omitted by the coroner, may be taken by justices of gaol delivery and oyer and terminer, or of the peace; but it must be done publicly and openly; otherwise it will be quashed. Inquisitions either of the coroner or of the other jurisdictions are traversable; 1 Burr. 18, 19.

INQUISITOR. A designation of sheriffs, coroners super visum corporis, and the like, who have power to inquire into certain matters.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of an officer who is authorized to inquire into heresies, and the like, and to punish them. A judge.

INROLMENT, ENROLMENT (Law Lat. irrotulatio). The act of putting upon a roll.

Formerly, the record of a suit was kept on skins of parchment, which, best to preserve them, were kept upon a roll or in the form of a roll; what was written upon them was called the inrolment. After, when such records came to be kept in books, the making up of the record retained the old name of inrolment. Thus, in equity, the inrolment of a decree is the recording of it, and will prevent the rehearing of the cause, except on appeal to the house of lords or by bill of review. The decree may be enrolled immediately after it has been passed and entered unless a caveat has been entered; 2 Freem. 179; 4 Johns. Ch. 199; 14 Johns. 501. And before signing and inrolment a decree cannot be pleaded in bar of a suit, though it can be insisted on by way of answer; 3 Atk. Ch. 809; 2 Ves. 577; 4 Johns. Ch. 199. See Saunders, Ord. in Ch. Inrolment.

Transcribing upon the records of a court deeds, etc., according to the statutes on the subject. See 1 Chitty, Stat. 425, 426; 2 id. 69, 76-78; 3 id. 1497. Placing on file or record generally, as annuities, attorneys, etc.

INSANE PERSON. This includes every one who is: (1) An "idiot,"—from a person destitute of ordinary intellectual powers from any cause, and dating from any time; but, in common use, a person without understanding from birth. (2) "Lunatic"—A person of any form of unsoundness of mind other than idiocy; mental derangement, with intermittent, strictly periodically intermittent, lucid intervals. (3) "Non compos," which embraces "idiot" and "lunatic." (4) "Deranged," which embraces all the natural born idiots. Code W. Va. p. 124; 36 W. Va. 563.

INSANITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The prolonged departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual in health.

Insanity is such a deprivation of reason that the subject is no longer capable of understanding and acting with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life. 142 Ill. 60.

Legal insanity, which exonerates from crime or incapacitates from civil action, is a mental deficiency with reference to the particular act in question and not a general incapacity. It is the latter only as the result of judicial ascertainment that a person is non compos mentis, by inquisition in lunacy, or similar statutory proceeding, and this only results in a general civil disability and not, proprio vigore, in immunity from punishment for crime.

It results that there can be no general definition of legal insanity. It is a state or condition which must be noted with reference to each class of actions to which it is applied.

In criminal law it "is any defect, weakness, or disease of the mind rendering it incapable of entertaining, or preventing its entertaining in the particular instance, the criminal intent which constitutes one of the elements in every crime." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 381.

As a cause of civil incapacity it is such defect or weakness as prevents rational assent to a contract or due consideration of the facts properly and naturally entering into the testamentary disposition of one's estate. It is a want of due proportion in quality or quantity, or both,—between the mental capacity and power and the particular act, civil or criminal, as to which the inquiry arises.

The legal and the medical ideas of insanity are essentially different, and the difference is one of substance. The failure to keep it in mind has been the fruitful cause of confusion in trials involving the question of mental capacity for crime or contract, and has tended to render valueless and often absurd the testimony of witnesses called as experts. Many of these have testified without any conception of the real nature and definition of the insanity, which alone could have relation to the case.

The distinction between the medical and the legal idea of insanity has, perhaps, not been better stated than by Ray, who is quoted by Ordonaux, and again by Witthaus & Becker: "Insanity in medicine has to do with a prolonged departure of the individual from his natural mental state arising from bodily disease." "Insanity in law covers nothing more than the relation of the person and the particular act which is the subject of judicial investigation. The legal problem must resolve itself into the inquiry, whether there was mental capacity and moral freedom to do or abstain from doing the particular act." 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; 35 Fed. Rep. 730.

Of late years this word has been used to designate all mental impairments and deficiencies formerly embraced in the terms lunacy, idiocy, and unsoundness of mind. Even to the middle of the last century the law recognized only two classes of persons requiring its protection on the score of mental disorder, viz.: lunatics and idiots. The former were supposed to embrace all who had lost the reason which they once possessed, and their disorder was called dementia accidentalis; the latter, those who had never possessed any reason, and this deficiency was called dementia naturalis. Lunatics were supposed to be much influenced by the moon; and another prevalent notion respecting them was that in a very large proportion there occurred lucid intervals, when reason shone out, for a while, from behind the cloud that obscured it, with its natural brightness. It may be remarked, in passing, that lucid intervals are far less common than they were once supposed to be, and that the restoration is not so complete as the descriptions of the older writers would lead us to infer. In modern practice, the term lucid interval signifies merely a remission of the disease, an abatement of the violence of the morbid action, a period of comparative calm; and the proof of its occurrence is generally drawn from the character of the act in question. It is hardly necessary to say that this is an unjustifiable use of the term, which should be confined to the genuine lucid interval that does occasionally occur.

It began to be found at last that a large class of persons required the protection of the law, who were not idiots, because they had reason once, nor lunatics in the ordinary signification of the term, because they were not violent, exhibited no very notable derangement of reason, were independent of lunar influences, and had no lucid intervals. Their mental impairment consisted in a loss of intellectual power, of interest in their usual pursuits, of the ability to comprehend their relations to persons and things. A new term—unsoundness of mind—was therefore introduced to meet this exigency; but it has never been very clearly defined.

The law has never held that all lunatics and idiots are absolved from all responsibility for their civil or criminal acts. This consequence was attributed only to the severest grades of these affections,—to lunatics who have no more understanding than a brute, and to idiots who cannot "number twenty pence nor tell how old they are." Theoretically the law has changed but little, even to the present day; but practically it exhibits considerable improvement; that is, while the general doctrine remains unchanged, it is qualified, in one way or another, by the courts, so as to produce less practical injustice.

Insanity implies the presence of disease or congenital defect in the brain, and though it may be accompanied by disease in other organs, yet the cerebral affection is always supposed to be primary and predominant. It is to be borne in mind, however, that bodily diseases may be accompanied, in some stage of their progress, by mental disorder which may affect the legal relations of the patient.

To give a definition of insanity not congenital, or, in other words, to indicate its essential element, the present state of our knowledge does not permit. Most of the attempts to define insanity are sententious descriptions of the disease, rather than proper definitions. For all practical purposes, however, a definition is unnecessary, because the real question at issue always is, not what constitutes insanity in general, but wherein consists the insanity of this or that individual. Neither sanity nor insanity can be regarded as an entity to be handled and described, but rather as a condition to be considered in reference to other conditions. Men vary in the character of their mental manifestations, inasmuch that conduct and conversation perfectly proper and natural in one might in another, differently constituted, be indicative of insanity. In determining, therefore, the mental condition of a person, he must not be judged by any arbitrary standard of sanity or insanity, nor compared with other persons unquestionably sane or insane. He can properly be compared only with himself. When a person, without any adequate cause, adopts notions he once regarded as absurd, or indulges in conduct opposed to all his former habits and principles, or changes completely his ordinary temper, manners, and disposition,—the man of plain practical sense indulging in speculative theories and projects, the miser becoming a spendthrift and the spendthrift a miser, the staid, quiet, unobtrusive citizen becoming noisy, restless, and boisterous, the gay and joyous becoming dull and disconsolate even to the verge of despair, the careful, cautious man of business plunging into hazardous schemes of speculation, the discreet and pious becoming shamefully reckless and profligate,—no stronger proof of insanity can be had. And yet not one of these traits, in and by itself alone, disconnected from the natural traits of character, could be regarded as conclusive proof of insanity. In accordance with this fact, the principle has been laid down, with the sanction of the highest legal and medical authority, that it is the prolonged departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual when in health, which is the essential feature of insanity. Gooch, Lond. Quart. Rev. xliii. 355; Combe, Ment. Derang. 196; Meidway v. Croft, 3 Curt. Eccl. 671.

Insanity produced by alcoholism is of two kinds: Delirium tremens, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink, and called "settled insanity," to distinguish it from "temporary insanity," or drunkenness, directly resulting from drink; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 318. See DRUNKENNESS.

Criminal Responsibility. There is a concurrence in the law of civilized countries in absolving persons mentally unsound from criminal responsibility. In France, Germany, and Austria the rule is in substance that if a person is unconscious of the nature of his act, or his will is affected or the character of the act is not perceived, there is no crime; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; Krafft-Ebing, Ger. Psycho-Path.

That insanity, in some of its forms, annuls all criminal responsibility, and, in the same or other forms, disqualifies its subject from the performance of certain civil acts, is a well-established doctrine of the common law. In the application of this principle there has prevailed, for many years, the utmost diversity of opinion. The law as expounded by Hale, who divided insanity into partial insanity as to certain subjects, partial as to degree, and total insanity, was that partial insanity was not sufficient to excuse a person in the committing of any capital offence; 1 Hale, P. C. 30; and his doctrine was received without question until the beginning of the present century; 8 How. St. Tr. 322; 16 id. 764; 19 id. 947.

This ancient doctrine received its first serious shock in Hadfield's case, 27 id. 1281, 1311, in which Erskine, for the defense, admitted the language used by Coke and Hale as to requiring deprivation of memory and understanding to absolve from crime, but contended that, if taken literally, the words would apply to idiocy alone. He insisted that "of all the cases that have filled Westminster Hall with complicated considerations, the insane persons have not only had the most perfect knowledge and recollection of all the relations in which they stood towards others, and of the acts and circumstances of their lives, but have, in general, been remarkable for subtlety and acuteness; and that delusion of which the criminal act in question was the immediate unqualified offspring, was the kind of insanity which should rightly exempt from punishment." These views prevailed and Lord Kenyon held that the prisoner was deranged immediately prior to the act and that it was unlikely that he had meanwhile recovered, though, strictly speaking, proof might be required of his condition at the very moment of the shooting; accordingly the prisoner was acquitted with the approbation of the court. Subsequently, in Bel- lingham's case, 1 Collinson, Lun. 636; Shelf. Lun. 462, Lord Mansfield held that it must be proved that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that at the time of the act he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature; and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse crime. Similar language was used in Parker's case, Collin. Lun. 477; Higginson's case, 1 C. & K. 129; Stokes' case, 3 C. & K. 185, and so for about a generation the law of England was practically as settled by Hadfield's and Bellingham's cases, though there were occasional variations from it. The special feature of the law of that period was that, to make a person responsible for crime, there must be a knowledge of right and wrong in the abstract. But the tendency of the cases was towards the modification of the test, so as to make the knowledge of right and wrong refer solely to the act in question; 5 C. & P. 168; 9 id. 525; 1 Cox, Cr. Cas. 80; 3 id. 275. This was formally pronounced to be the law by the English judges, in their reply to the questions propounded by the House of Lords on the occasion of the McNaghten trial, 10 Cl. & F. 200, where it was said by Tindal, C. J., for himself and the other judges: "To establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act, the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature or quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he was not aware he was doing what was wrong." Most of the English cases will be found in 1 Russ. Cr., Shars. ed. 14, and in the notes will be found a collection of American cases.

The test laid down in McNaghten's case has been generally applied in England and this country. In the former it has been definitely recognized as the law, and in the latter it has been generally adopted, though with frequent variations as will appear infra.

In Coleman's case, in New York, Davis, J., charged the jury that the "test of the responsibility for criminal acts, when insanity is asserted, is the capacity of the accused to distinguish between right and wrong at the time and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry." He left it to the jury to determine "whether or not at the time the accused committed the act she knew what she was doing, and knew that in shooting him she was doing a wrongful act." 1 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 1. With variations of expression this is the prevailing doctrine of the American courts; 15 Wall. 590; 62 Cal. 50; 5 Harring. 512; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 166, 371; 45 Ga. 57, 190, 225; 57 Me. 574; 25 Kan. 182; 31 Fed. Rep. 134; 35 id. 730; 11 Gray 303; 56 Miss. 269; 62 id. 167; 38 Mich. 482; 10 Minn. 223; 74 Mo. 199, 247; 11 Neb. 537; 14 id. 572; 21 N. J. L. 196; 8 Jones, N. C. 463; 40 Tex. 60; 3 Heisk. 348; 109 Ill. 635; 30 S. C. 74; 1

Brewst. 356; 4 Pa. 264; 6 McLean 121; 4 Denio 9; 88 N. Y. 86; 2 Ohio St. 70; 10 id. 599. In many of the cases it is difficult to distinguish with certainty between what the court intends for a statement of the law and what is rather in the nature of practical suggestions addressed to the jury. In a New Hampshire case it was held that no one of the circumstances ordinarily relied upon is, as a matter of law, a test of mental disease, but that all symptoms and all tests of mental disease are purely matters of fact to be determined by the jury; 49 N. H. 399; and the same doctrine has been followed in other states; 31 Ill. 385; 31 Ind. 492, 485. Very similar were the remarks addressed to the jury by the Lord Justice Clerk in a Scotch Justiciary case: "The question is one of fact, that matter of fact being whether when he committed this crime the prisoner was of an unsound mind. The counsel for the crown very properly said that this was entirely for you. It is not a question of medical science, neither is it one of legal definition, although both may materially assist you. It is a question for your common and practical sense." 3 Couper 16.

It was said that mental unsoundness, to render one free from criminal liability, must be such on the particular subject out of which the acts charged as an offence are claimed to have sprung, as to render him incapable of discerning the wrong of committing the same; 35 Fed. Rep. 730; 11 Colo. 258. Occasionally the court has thought it sufficient for the jury to consider whether the prisoner was sane or insane,—of sound memory and discretion, or otherwise; see State v. Cory, State v. Prescott, in Ray, Med. Jur. 55. The capacity to distinguish between right and wrong has been held not to be a safe test in all cases; 25 Ia. 27, per Dillon, C. J.; 15 Wall. 580. See also 78 Pa. 122. In Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 120, this test is said to be generally satisfactory, but not to cover all cases. An instruction has been sustained, where there was a defence of insanity, that the defendant was not responsible unless he was conscious of his act at the time it was committed; 91 Cal. 35.

The definition of insanity, in the trial of a case involving that issue, is for the court; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 112; see 1 F. & F. 87.

The rule already stated as to partial insanity applies equally to delusions, which as has been stated were first brought within the law of mental irresponsibility for crime by Hadfield's case, supra. In McNaghten's case, supra, the question as to delusions was answered thus: "That if a person was acting under an insane delusion, and was in other respects sane, he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. That is to say, that the acts of the criminal should be judged as if he had really been in the circumstances he imagined himself to be in. For example, if, under the influence of delusion, he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take his life, and he kills him, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted an injury upon him in character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment." In the Guiteau case, the jury were charged by Cox, J., on this subject, as follows: "An insane delusion is never the result of reasoning and reflection. It is not generated by them and it cannot be dispelled by them. . . . Whenever convictions are founded on evidence, on comparison of facts and opinions and arguments, they are not insane delusions. The insane delusion does not relate to mere sentiments or theories, or abstract questions of law, politics, or religion. All these are the subject of opinions, which are beliefs founded on reasoning and reflection. These opinions are often absurd in the extreme, and result from naturally weak or ill-trained reasoning powers, hasty conclusions from insufficient data, ignorance of men and things, credulous dispositions, fraudulent imposture, and often from perverted moral sentiments. But still, they are opinions, founded upon some kind of evidence, and liable to be changed by better external evidence or sounder reasoning. But they are not insane delusions;" 10 Fed. Rep. 161. Following this opinion it was said that: "An insane delusion is an incorrigible belief, not the result of reasoning in the existence of facts which are either impossible absolutely or impossible under the circumstances of the individual." 20 Neb. 333.

It is a logical result of the nature of delusion and its legal relations as shown by these definitions that it will be of no avail as a defence unless, if true, the facts supposed to exist would have excused the crime; id.; 32 id. 224; 138 N. Y. 398; 55 Ark. 259. This rule is well illustrated by a case in which it was held that an instruction that "defendant would not be responsible if he killed deceased under an insane delusion that deceased was trying to marry defendant's mother, and that this delusion caused the killing," was properly refused; 54 Ark. 588.

In order that delusion may be a defence it must be connected with the crime, and if a person has an insane delusion upon any one subject, but commits a crime not connected therewith, he is equally guilty as if he were in all respects sane; 13 Minn. 341; 30 Miss. 600; 21 Mo. 464. "A man whose mind squints, unless impelled to crime by this very mental obliquity, is as much amenable to punishment as one whose eye squints." Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 264. See also Alison, Cr. L. 647; Ray, Insan. 106, 135, 227; 3 Couper 357; 71 Mo. 538; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 394.

"Where a defendant is acting under an insane delusion as to circumstances which, if true, would relieve the act from responsibility, such delusion is a defence;" Whart.

& St. Med. Jur. § 125; but such delusions must involve an honest mistake as to the object to which the crime is directed; id. § 127; 3 F. & F. 839. The term delusion as applied to insanity, does not mean a mere mistake of fact, or being induced by false evidence to believe that a fact exists which does not exist; 45 N. J. Eq. 726.

A disposition to multiply the tests, so as to recognize essential facts in the nature of insanity, has been manifested in this country to a much greater extent than in England.

The existence of an irresistible impulse to commit a crime has been recognized in the law; Steph. Cr. L. 91; and medical authorities are generally in agreement that, as it is put by Bishop, "the mental and physical machine may slip the control of its owner; and so a man may be conscious of what he is doing, and of its criminal character and consequences, while yet he is impelled to it by a power to him irresistible." 1 New Cr. L. 387; 3 Witth. & Beck. 270, 275; 1 Beck, Med. Jur., 10th ed. 723; Ray, Insan., 3d ed. §§ 17, 18, 22. But the writer last quoted adds: "Whether or not such is truly so must, in the nature of things, be a pure question of fact, it cannot be of law."

In England the courts have refused to recognize this ground of exemption from responsibility and limit the test to ability to distinguish between right and wrong; Clarke, Cr. L. 56; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 387; 3 C. & K. 185; 1 F. & F. 666; 3 id. 772; 3 Cox, C. C. 275.

The American cases are very difficult to classify with reference to this test, as indeed they are on most branches of the subject, nor is such the present purpose; all that is possible being, by reference to a selection of the cases, to illustrate the progress of the law and the direction in which, but not, critically, the precise extent to which, changes have been made since Lord Hale's time, keeping pace with the growth of scientific knowledge.

A full understanding of the scope of the doctrine now under consideration involves the further subject of power of resistance, which enters largely into this class of cases and is also more particularly referred to, infra.

In Roger's case, 7 Metc. 500, the jury were directed to consider, in addition to the test of right and wrong, whether the prisoner, in committing the homicide, acted from an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse; and this case has been much relied on in American courts; Ray, Med. Jur. 58.

In Freth's case, 3 Phila. Pa. 105, Judge Ludlow charged: "If the prisoner was actuated by an irresistible inclination to kill, and was utterly unable to control his will, or subjugate his intellect, and was not actuated by anger, jealousy, revenge, and kindred evil passions, he is entitled to an acquittal," etc.

In the leading case of State v. Harrison it was said by Brannon, J.: "This irresistible-impulse theory test has been only recently presented, and while it is supported by plausible arguments, it is rather refined, and introduces what seems to me a useless element of distinction for a test, and is misleading to juries, and fraught with great danger to human life, so much so that even its advocates have warningly said it should be very cautiously applied and only in the clearest cases. What is this irresistible impulse? How shall we of the courts and juries know it? Does it exist when manifested in one single instance, as in the present case, or must it be shown to be habitual, or, at least, to have evinced itself in more than a single instance? . . . I admit the existence of irresistible impulse and its efficacy to exonerate from responsibility, but not as consistent with an adequate realization of the wrong of the act. It is that uncontrollable impulse produced by the disease of the mind, when that disease is sufficient to override judgment and obliterate the sense of right as to the acts done, and deprives the accused of power to choose between them;" 36 W. Va. 729.

For other cases in which irresistible impulse is regarded as a defence, see 31 Ind. 485; 23 Ohio St. 146; 23 Ia. 67; 15 Wall. 580; but it is held that no impulse, however irresistible, is a defence, where there is a knowledge as to the particular act between right and wrong; 8 Jones, N. C. 463; 111 Mo. 542; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491; 91 Cal. 35; 71 Miss. 345; 86 Ga. 70; 94 Tenn. 106; Tayl. Med. Jur. 720; and that it was a crime morally, and punishable by the laws of the country; 30 S. C. 74; 50 Ark. 511.

As a perfectly natural outgrowth of the doctrine of irresistible impulse, there is to be found in the American cases a tendency more noticeable in late years, to add an additional qualification to the right and wrong test. These cases hold, not merely that the accused, to be considered accountable, must be able to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the act in question, but must have sufficient mental power to control his impulses.

As the theory of irresistible impulses owes much of its development to the courts of Pennsylvania, so also has this correlative doctrine of the necessity of power to control it received great attention in that state. In Mosler's case, 4 Pa. 264, Gibson, C. J., said: "His insanity must be so great as entirely to destroy his perception of right and wrong; and it is not until that perception is thus destroyed that he ceases to be responsible. It must amount to delusion or hallucination, controlling his will and making the commission of the act, in his apprehension, a duty of overruling necessity. The law is, that, whether the insanity be general or partial, the degree of it must be so great as to have controlled the will of its subject, and to have taken from him the freedom of moral action." And this language is repeated in Ortwein's case, 76 Pa. 414, by Agnew, C. J., who declares it to be the law of the state. The essential relation of power to such cases is thus put, in Haskell's case, 2 Brewst. 49, by Brewster,

J.: "A review of all the authorities I have been able to examine satisfies me that the true test in all these cases lies in the word 'power.' Has the defendant in a criminal case the power to distinguish right from wrong, and the power to adhere to the right and avoid the wrong? In these cases has the defendant, in addition to the capacities mentioned, the power to govern his mind, his body, and his estate? If he possess this power over his imagination he will be able to expel all delusive images, and the like control over his will would subdue all homicidal and other monomania. . . . I use the word power with reference to that control which humanity can expect from humanity."

Other cases supporting this view are, 1 Duv. Ky. 224; 7 Metc. 500.

Other cases seem to hold that one mentally disordered, though knowing right and wrong, and that the act is forbidden and punishable, is criminally responsible whether he has power over his conduct or not; 26 Hun 67; 62 How. Pr. 436; 52 N. Y. 467; 102 id. 238; 42 Ga. 9; 45 id. 57; 47 id. 553; 58 id. 296; 62 Cal. 120; 11 Or. 413; 41 Minn. 365; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 249; 92 Mo. 300. In a late case it was said, though a crime is committed through lack of sufficient will power to control the conduct, and under an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse, the offender is responsible for the act; 111 Mo. 542. In discussing this class of cases Bishop considers that a doctrine that "our law punishes any man for what he does under a necessity which it is impossible for him to resist," would be an "unprecedented horror." He assumes that the cases which appear to hold it are to be explained upon the theory that the judges do not believe in the existence of an irresistible or uncontrollable impulse. He himself does not assume to know whether as a fact there is, but as the experts assert it, he deems it to be the duty of a judge, where there is evidence tending to support the theory, to submit it to the jury and cast the responsibility upon them. 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 383 b, 387.

To this remarkable diversity of views may be attributed, in some measure, no doubt, the actual diversity of results. To any one who has followed with some attention the course of criminal justice in trials where insanity has been pleaded in defence, it is obvious that, if some have been properly convicted, others have just as improperly been acquitted. It must be admitted, however, that the verdict in such cases is often determined less by the instructions of the court than by the views and feelings of the jury and the testimony of experts.

The defence of irresistible impulse has been the subject of legislation in some states, as in New York and Michigan, where by statute a morbid propensity, or uncontrollable impulse to commit a crime, in the mind of one who is conscious of the nature of the act or that it is wrong, or to be incapable of such knowledge, is no defence.

See N. Y. Pen. Code § 21; Mich. Pen. Code §§ 19, 20.

What is sometimes called moral insanity, as distinguished from mental unsoundness, is not a defence to a charge of crime; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. §§ 164, 174; Tayl. Med. Jur. 677; 6 Jur. 201; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; 11 Gray 303; 52 N. Y. 467; 47 Cal. 134; 73 id. 222; 2 Ohio St. 184; Guiteau's case, 10 Fed. Rep. 161; 100 N. C. 457; 126 N. Y. 269; 52 id. 469; but see 1 Duv. 224; 4 Metc. Ky. 227; 43 Conn. 514; 6 Bush 268. See also Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. 66, 120, 135. Morbid religious feelings may be of such a character as to amount to partial insanity, which, though sometimes the basis of delusions affecting criminal cases, is more frequently met with in connection with the subject of undue influence. In a case in which it was alleged that a testator was insane on the subject of spiritualism, it was held that, as an abstract proposition, a belief in spiritualism, though a person may be a monomaniac on that subject or any other form of religion, does not prove insanity; 72 Cal. 556; 32 Wis. 557; 52 id. 543; 3 Wall. Jr. 88; nor belief in the transmigration of souls; 16 Abb. Pr. n. s. 128.

Insanity is not necessarily established by mere eccentricity of mind, manifesting itself in absurd opinions or extravagancies of dress and manners; 21 Barb. 407; 4 McCord 183; Milw. 65; or an irritable temper and an excitable disposition; 32 N. Y. 715; or depression coupled with a monomania or delusion that, by the lands wearing out and buildings going to ruin, starvation and the poorhouse were threatened; 5 Jones L. 157. Insanity produced by continued dissipation is a good defence; 9 Houst. 369; mania à potu is a species of insanity; 3 Harr. 551; and so is delirium tremens; 62 How. Pr. 436; 5 Ohio St. 77; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 216; but it must be shown to exist at the time the act is perpetrated, not antecedently; 3 Jones, L. 335. As to drunkenness in its varied forms, see that title. Suicide is not conclusive evidence of insanity, but is admissible to show the absence of a sound and disposing mind; 4 Humph. 491. Epilepsy alone does not establish insanity which will excuse crime; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 491; 153 Pa. 535; and in its milder forms, causing temporary fits of insanity, the prima facie presumption is in favor of mental soundness; 7 Ia. 60. See 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 319. Proof that insanity was hereditary was admissible; 61 Ark. 241; but that alone is insufficient when the other evidence clearly shows that defendant knew that he was committing a wrong; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 491; 28 Ill. 306.

In reply to a defence of want of criminal capacity proof was admitted that defendant had sometimes feigned insanity; 143 Ind. 299.

As to mental unsoundness produced by or connected with hypnotism, kleptomania, mesmerism, and somnambulism, see those titles.

The effect of the plea of insanity has sometimes been controlled by the instructions of the court in regard to the burden of proof and the requisite amount.

In many of the American states, there has been a tendency towards a relaxation of the rule settled in England, and which formerly prevailed in almost all the states, to treat a plea of insanity as being strictly one in confession and avoidance which must be proved by the defendant either beyond a reasonable doubt or, as was said in many American cases, by a preponderance of evidence. See BURDEN OF PROOF.

The English rule was thus stated in McNaghten's case: "Every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction;" 10 Cl. & F. 200; and it is the settled law of England; 3 C. & K. 188; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; 3 id. 155.

As to whether such proof must be by a preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt, the language of the English judges is not entirely free from ambiguity, but it is understood to mean the latter; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 28; 16 id. 454.

In many of the American cases this rule is adhered to; 21 N. J. L. 202; 76 Pa. 414; 145 id. 289; 8 Jones, L. 463; 109 N. C. 780; 5 Bush 362; 92 Ky. 630; 31 Tex. App. 491; 22 id. 379; 63 Ala. 307; 89 id. 150; 54 Ark. 588; 90 Cal. 195; 80 Ga. 650; 34 La. Ann. 186; 47 id. 1088; 57 Me. 574; 7 Metc. 500; 34 Minn. 430; 92 Mo. 310; 23 Ohio St. 349; 24 S. C. 439; 33 Gratt. 807; 11 W. Va. 747; see 36 Am. Rep. 467, n.; but many courts have held the contrary; 35 Fed. Rep. 730; 10 id. 161; 40 Conn. 136; 26 Fla. 11; 133 Ill. 382; 121 Ind. 433; 11 Kan. 32; 32 id. 205; 17 Mich. 9; 56 Miss. 269; 43 N. H. 224; 75 N. Y. 159; 88 id. 81; 91 Tenn. 617; 82 Wis. 295; and the Supreme Court of the United States has accepted this latter doctrine; 160 U. S. 469, where it was held that the jury, to convict, must be "able, upon their consciences, to say that the evidence before them, by whomsoever adduced, is sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged." As to the rule on the subject, applied by the class of cases last referred to, see BURDEN OF PROOF. The cases of the former class, which put the burden on the defendant, in very many instances hold that a preponderance of proof only is required; and in some states the later cases show a virtual abandonment of the rule formerly adhered to by them. As for example in Massachusetts as will appear by the review of cases in that state in 160 U. S. 481-3. It results that it is not practicable to state what might be designated as a prevailing American rule. The subject is very fully discussed by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case last cited. The cases holding different views of the subject will be found collected in the opinion and argument in that case and also in 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 25; 16 id. 449; Cl. Cr. L. 58; Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. ch. iii.; Witth. & Beck. 508.

In England, under 46 & 47 Vict. c. 38, relating to the trial of lunatics, the jury returns a verdict that the prisoner is "guilty, but insane at the time," whereupon the court records the verdict and orders the prisoner to be imprisoned during the pleasure of the Crown. Under 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, the verdict was "not guilty, on the ground of insanity."

In some states in this country, where the verdict is an acquittal by reason of insanity, the fact must be so returned by the jury, and in such case the court are required to direct the confinement of the prisoner in an insane asylum.

Side by side with this doctrine of the criminal law which makes persons, who from a medical point of view are considered insane, responsible for their criminal acts is another equally well authorized, viz.: that a kind and degree of insanity which would not excuse a person for a criminal act may render him legally incompetent for the management of himself or his affairs; Bellingham's case, 5 C. & P. 168. This implies that the mind of an insane person acts more clearly and deliberately, and with a sounder view of its relations to others, when about to commit a great crime than when buying or selling a piece of property. It is scarcely necessary to add that no ground for this distinction can be found in our knowledge of mental disease. On the contrary, we know that the same person who destroys his neighbor, under the delusion that he has been disturbing his peace or defaming his character, may, at the very time, dispose of his property with as correct an estimate of its value and as clear an insight into the consequences of the act as he ever had. If a person is incompetent to manage property, it is because he has lost some portion of his mental power; and this fact cannot be justly ignored in deciding upon his responsibility for criminal acts. Insanity once admitted, it is within the reach of no mortal comprehension to know exactly how far it may have affected the quality of his acts. To say that, possibly, it may have had no effect at all, is not enough: it should be proved by the party who affirms it. See Maudsley, Responsibility in Mental Disease 111.

By the French penal code there can be no crime nor offence if the accused were in a state of madness at the time of the act. Art. 64. The same provision was introduced into Livingston's Code and into the Revised Statutes of New York, vol. 2, § 697. The law of Arkansas provides that a lunatic or insane person without lucid intervals shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor with which he may be charged; Rev. Stat. 236. In New York, however, in spite of this clear and positive provision of law, the courts have always acted upon the doctrines of the common law, and instructed the jury respecting the tests of that kind of insanity which annuls criminal responsibility; 4 Den. 27. In this case, the court declared that the insanity mentioned in the statute means only insanity in reference to the criminal act, and therefore its qualities must be defined.

Civil Incapacity. The general principle governing the civil incapacity of a person of an unsound mind is that any civil act is invalid if the actor was at the time laboring under such mental defect as to render him incapable of performing the act in question, rationally and without detriment to any person affected thereby.

The rule as to contracts is that insanity is such a defect as precludes rational assent, with respect to the nature of the contract, whether marriage, partnership, sale, or the like.

A judicial ascertainment of the insanity of a person is said to deprive him of contractual capacity, as a matter of law, and subsequent contracts are void; 4 Co. 123 b; Bac. Abr. Idiots and Lunatics (F.); 8 N. Y. 388; 128 id. 312; 14 Pick. 280; 31 Pa. 243; but when no conservator was appointed and there was no appearance of incapacity, a purchase was held valid; 85 Ill. 62. See also 5 B. & C. 170; 5 C. & P. 30; 2 Atk. 412; 56 Me. 308; 13 Ired. 106.

Such incapacity is not retroactive; 30 S. C. 377; prior acts are not void but voidable; 2 Cow. 552; but the condition is conclusively presumed to continue, after the finding, until it is superseded; 101 N. Y. 580; 100 id. 215; but see 6 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 481; 89 Ga. 645. A deed or mortgage executed by such person during the period of lunacy, as found, is voidable, the presumption being against validity, but subject to be overcome by proof of sanity; 116 N. Y. 67; and see 49 N. J. Eq. 192; 1 Gr. Ev. § 556.

The marriage of a person insane is void; 12 Mass. 363; 5 Ired. L. 487; 1 Speer, Eq. 569; 18 Kan. 371; 4 Johns. Ch. 343; L. R. 1 P. & D. 335; 22 Ohio St. 271; 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 344; 21 N. H. 52; 22 id. 553. A marriage contracted while one party was insane from delirium tremens was held void; 3 Rich. L. 93; but mere weakness of mind not amounting to derangement is not sufficient; 28 Ala. 565; 3 Ired. Eq. 91; and for that merely, or intoxication, a court has no power to declare a marriage null and void; 1 Houst. 308. The same degree of mental capacity which enables a person to make a valid deed or will is sufficient to enable him to marry; 46 Me. 510. It was held that a marriage celebrated by a person while insane might be affirmed upon recovery without a new solemnization; 5 Sneed 57.

Other civil contracts made by insane persons are voidable, not void; 53 Md. 65; 34 Ark. 613; 77 Ind. 419; 46 Ia. 62; 9 N. Y. 45; 10 Mo. 277; Ordron. Jud. Asp. Insan. ch. 6; 15 Alb. L. J. 292; 3 Abb. N. C. 274, 280, note; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 35, 670.

With respect to contracts, persons non compos mentis and infants are said to be parallel, both in law and reason; 3 Mod. 301; 11 Pick. 304; 1 J. J. Marsh. 236. A power of attorney made by an insane person is absolutely void; 15 Wall. 9; and a contract executory on both sides cannot be enforced against an insane person; Ewell, L. Cas. Disab. 525, where the cases are collected.

The test of legal capacity to contract, it was said, is that the party is capable of recollecting the property he is about to dispose of, the manner of distributing it, and the object of his bounty; the particular act being attended with the consent of his will and understanding; 82 Va. 863.

Pollock enumerates three different theories as to contracts by insane persons which "have, at different times, been entertained in English courts and supported by respectable authority;" Poll. Cont. 87. These theories, with some of the authorities cited in support of them, are substantially as follows:—1. That it is no ground, whatever, for avoiding a contract; Co. Litt. 2 b; 4 Co. 123 b; Bract. fol. 100 a, 185 b. As to this it is characterized as a frivolous technicality and doubtful whether it was really supported by the authorities Coke had before him; Poll. Cont. 89. 2. If one who contracts is too drunk or insane to know what he is about, his agreement is void for want of the consenting mind, but if his mind is only so confused or weak that he may know what he is about, but not fully understand the terms and effect, and this is known to the other party, the contract will be voidable at his option. The first division of this class would be simply void for want of consent; 2 Stra. 1104; 3 Campb. 33; 37 Ind. 207; 20 N. H. 106; the second would come under the head of fraud; 26 Mich. 249; 12 B. Monr. 55; 35 Conn. 170. 3. The doctrine which has prevailed as already stated that all contracts by insane persons are voidable, not void, see supra.

In some courts what has been termed the Massachusetts doctrine prevails that contracts of insane persons are voidable without any reference to the knowledge of the other party; 11 Pick. 304; in others what is termed the English doctrine (because supported by more recent English authorities) that they are voidable if the other party knows of the insanity; 139 U. S. 176 and 46 Fed. Rep. 724 (under La. Civ. Code); [1892] 1 Q. B. 599; 78 Pa. 407; and reasonable ground for knowledge is equivalent thereto; 32 Vt. 652; and there is still a third doctrine supported by some courts that if the other party was ignorant and the contract reasonable and not capable of rescission, so that the parties could be restored to their original position, the contract will be sustained; 38 N. J. L. 536; 48 N. H. 133; 94 Ind. 535; 84 N. Y. 380; 68 Ia. 73; 92 Pa. 428; 51 Mich. 529.

The cases last cited rest upon Molton v. Camroux, 2 Ex. 487; 4 id. 17, which is considered the cornerstone of the law as to contracts with insane persons; Poll. Cont. 92; Leake, Cont. 248; but has been recently characterized as containing "loose statements" which have given rise to "an anomalous doctrine;" Harr. Cont. 235.

Whatever may be said of it, the case undoubtedly settled the law that such a contract was voidable and not void, and this was confirmed inferentially by a later case which held that such a contract might be ratified after the disability had passed; L. R. 8 Ex. 132.

It is generally considered that contracts for necessities for an insane person are binding, if suited to their condition in life; 5 B. & C. 170; 13 Ired. L. 106; 3 J. J. Marsh. 658; 31 Ga. 512; 2 Bradf. Sur. 122; 27 Cal. 376; 17 Miss. 94; and this rule has been extended to other things which were reasonable and proper; 10 Allen 59; but if the other party has knowledge of the insanity the nature of the liability is rather quasi-contractual; 44 Ch. D. 94; 56 Me. 308; 53 N. H. 627; Keener, Quasi-Cont. 20. This liability is not removed by the appointment of a committee, where necessities are furnished in good faith and the committee has failed to provide them; 66 Barb. 452; 63 Vt. 244.

Deeds executed by persons of unsound mind are absolutely void; 51 N. Y. 378; 95 id. 503; 2 Ired. 23; 5 Whart. 371; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 386. In other cases it has been held that such a deed is voidable only; 6 Metc. 415; 1 Gray 434; 24 Ind. 23; 12 Dana 452. Other cases again hold that want of perfect soundness of mind does not affect the conveyance if there is still capacity for fully comprehending the import of the act; 55 Me. 56; 36 Ill. 109; 44 N. H. 531; 21 Wend. 142; 3 Hill 513; 4 Ired. Eq. 443; see 3 Lea 567; 1 Patt. & H. 307. See 1 Pingr. Mortg. § 349.

As to testamentary capacity as affected by insanity, see WILL; DEMENTIA; UN-DUE INFLUENCE.

In most states the statutes of limitation do not run against a person insane, nor does adverse possession ripen into title while the person out of possession is insane; 59 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 52; but a plaintiff's claim is not affected by the insanity of the defendant's ancestor after the statute had begun to run; 111 N. C. 251. The time of sanity required in order to allow the statute to begin to run is such as will enable the party to examine his affairs and institute an action, and is for the jury; 1 Metc. Ky. 35.

Insanity is not a defence in an action of tort; but damages are compensatory and not punitive; 121 Ill. 660; 3 Barb. 647; 24 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 902; 54 Fed. Rep. 116; 143 N. Y. 442.

As to lucid intervals and the competency of insane persons as witnesses, see LUCID INTERVALS.

INSCRIPTION. In Civil Law. An engagement which a person who makes a solemn accusation of a crime against another enters into that he will suffer the same punishment, if he has accused the other falsely, which would have been inflicted upon him had he been guilty. Code, 9. 1. 10; 9. 2. 16 and 17.

In Evidence. Something written or engraved.

Inscriptions upon tombstones and other proper places, as rings, and the like, are held to be evidence of pedigree; Bull. N. P. 233; Cowp. 591; 10 East 120; 13 Ves. 145. But their value as evidence depends largely on the authority under which they were made, and the length of time between their establishment and the events they commemorate; 62 Ga. 407; 75 Miss. 253; 22 Mich. 415; 39 Miss. 326; 83 Hun 323; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 106. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

INSCRIPTIONES (Lat.). The name given by the old English law to any written instrument by which anything was granted. Blount.

INSENSIBLE. In Pleading. That which is unintelligible is said to be insensible. Steph. Pl. 378.

INSIDIATORES VIARUM (Lat.). Persons who lie in wait in order to commit some felony or other misdemeanor.

INSIMUL COMPUTASSENT (Lat.). They had accounted together. See AS-SUMPSIT.

INSINUACION. In Spanish Law. The presentation of a public document to a competent judge, in order to obtain his approbation and sanction of the same, and thereby giving it judicial authenticity.

"Insinuatio est ejus quod traditur, sive agitur, coram quocumque iudice in scripturam redactio."

This formality is requisite to the validity of certain donations inter vivos. Escriche, voc. Insinuacion.

INSINUATION. In Civil Law. The transcription of an act on the public registers, like our recording of deeds. It was not necessary in any other alienation but that appropriated to the purpose of donation. Inst. 2. 7. 2; Pothier, Traité des Donations, Entre Vifs, sec. 2, art. 3, § 3; 8 Toullier, n. 198.

INSINUATION OF A WILL. In Civil Law. The first production of it; or, leaving it in the hands of the register in order to its probate. 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5; Jacob, Law Dict.

INSOLVENCY. The condition of a person who is insolvent (q. v.). Inability to pay one's debts.

Bankruptcy, which is one species or phase of insolvency, denotes the condition of a trader or merchant who is unable to pay his debts in the course of business; 2 Bell. Com. 162; 1 M. & S. 338; 5 Dowl. & R. 218; 4 Hill, N. Y. 850; 4 Cush. 134. Insolvency, then, as distinguished from strict bankruptcy, is the condition or status of one who is unable to pay his debts; and insolvent laws are distinguished from strict bankruptcy laws by the following characteristics:

Bankruptcy laws apply only to traders or merchants; insolvent laws, to those who are not traders or merchants. Bankrupt laws discharge absolutely the debt of the honest debtor; 12 Wheat. 230; 4 id. 122, 209; 2 Mas. 161; 2 Blackf. 394; 3 Cal. 154; 26 Wend. 43; 4 B. & Ald. 654; Baldw. 296. Insolvent laws discharge the person of the debtor from arrest and imprisonment, but leave the future acquisitions of the debtor still liable to the creditor; 4 Wheat. 122; 3 H. & J. 61. Both laws contemplate an equal, fair, and honest division of the debtor's present effects among his creditors pro rata. A bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws, and an insolvent law may contain those which are common to a bankrupt law; per Marshall, C. J., 4 Wheat. 195; 1 W. & M. 115. And insolvent laws quite coextensive with the English bankrupt system have not been unfrequent in our colonial and state legislation, and no distinction was ever attempted to be made in the same between bankruptcies and insolvencies; 3 Sto. Const. 11; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 4.

Under the United States constitution the power to pass a bankrupt law is vested in congress, and this is held to include power to pass an act which provides for voluntary bankruptcy, or, strictly speaking, an insolvent law. So in the absence of congressional action, the states have passed laws which, though called insolvent laws, were in fact bankrupt laws, and their right to do so has been sustained, such laws being held valid; see BANKRUPT; except as limited by the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, which title see; see also 9 Metc. 16; 2 Ind. 463; 5 How. 295; 1 Cush. 430; 14 N. H. 38; 10 Metc. 594; 26 Me. 110; 1 Woodb. & M. 115; 5 Gill 437; 1 Wall. 229; Cooley, Const. Lim. 360; Miller, Const. U. S. 616. So far as the jurisdiction of the state extends, its insolvent laws may have all the essential operation of a bankrupt law, not being limited to a mere discharge of the person of the debtor on surrendering his effects. But a creditor out of a state who voluntarily makes himself a party and accepts a dividend, is bound by his own act, and is deemed to have waived his ex-territorial immunity and right; 4 Wheat. 122; 13 id. 213; 8 Pick. 194; 3 Pet. C. C. 411; 3 Story, Const. 252; 9 Conn. 314; 2 Blackf. 394; Baldw. 296; 9 N. H. 478. See 8 B. & C. 477; 3 Cal. 154; 4 B. & Ald. 654; 26 Wend. 43; 2 Gray 43; 4 Bosw. 459; 32 Miss. 246.

The effect of a discharge upon non-resident creditors is examined at large in 6 Harv. L. Rev. 349, where also may be found what is believed to be a complete list of all adjudications, federal and state, upon the subject. The conclusion reached is that it is the generally accepted doctrine that, in such case, a discharge will be of no effect (even in the courts of the state where the discharge is granted) against a non-resident, unless he becomes a party by voluntary appearance or personal service. The correctness of this conclusion, though it is admitted as established, is seriously challenged on grounds of expediency which are stated at large.

Insolvency may of course be simple or notorious. Simple insolvency is attended by no badge of notoriety. Notorious or legal insolvency, with which the law has to do, is designated by some public act or legal proceeding. This is the situation of a person who has done some notorious act to divest himself of all his property: as, making an assignment, applying for relief, or having been proceeded against in invitum under bankrupt or insolvent laws; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 3, n.; 1 Pet. 195; 2 Wheat. 396; 7 Toullier, n. 45; Domat, liv. 4, tit. 5, nn. 1, 2; 2 Bell, Com. 165.

It is with regard to the latter that the insolvency laws (so called) are operative. They are generally statutory provisions by which the property of the debtor is surrendered for his debts; and upon this condition, and the assent of a certain proportion of his creditors, he is discharged from all further liabilities; 9 Mass. 431; 16 id. 53; 2 Kent 321; Ingr. Insolv. 9. This legal insolvency may exist without actual inability to pay one's debts when the debtor's estate is finally settled and wound up. (See definition). Insolvency, according to some of the state statutes, may be of two kinds, voluntary and involuntary. The latter is called the proceeding against the creditor in invitum. Voluntary insolvency, which is the more common, is the case in which the debtor institutes the proceedings, and is desirous of availing himself of the insolvent laws, and petitions for that purpose.

Involuntary insolvency is where the proceedings are instituted by the creditors in invitum, and so the debtor forced into insolvency. The circumstances entitling either debtor or creditors to invoke the aid of the insolvent law are in a measure peculiar to each state. But their general characteristics are as follows:

Proceedings by creditors may usually be taken for fraudulent concealment, conveyance, or collusive attachment, of property; by petition in the designated tribunal, on notice to the debtor; possession of the property is taken by an officer of the courts, usually after proof of the allegations, and a meeting of creditors is called for the choice of an assignee by a vote of creditors, having relation both to number and amount. The assignee becomes practically the owner, in trust, with power to wind up the estate; he acts under the general direction of the court, calling meetings of creditors when required. The right to a discharge varies in different states, in some being conditioned upon payment of a certain percentage or the assent of the majority of creditors or upon more stringent conditions in case of subsequent insolvency. The statutes vary as to the grounds of refusing a discharge for fraud, as in cases of paying or securing debts within a certain time before the application, or when the debtor is insolvent, or has reasonable cause to believe himself so. As to all these details the state statutes should be referred to.

As to American and English bankrupt law proper, see BANKRUPT LAWS; BANKRUPT.

The English act 34 Geo. III. ch. 69, was called an insolvent debtor's act; but the first act of insolvency properly so called was passed in 1826. And the act of 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 70, called "an act for facilitating arrangements between debtor and creditor," is properly an insolvency law. This provided for the discharge of a non-trading debtor if he had a certain concurrence from his creditors. This was one-third, both in value and number, to the initiatory steps. To the discharge, a proportional consent at an initiatory meeting, and, finally, the consent of three-eighths in both number and value, or nine-tenths in value of creditors to the sum of twenty pounds and upwards.

Many of the states have laws for the distribution of insolvent estates, and also laws for the relief of poor debtors. These are not properly called insolvent laws in the sense in which we have used the words,—though the latter relieve the debtor's body from restraint upon a surrender of his goods and estate, and leave his future acquisitions still liable. See POOR DEBTORS.

INSOLVENT (Lat. in, privative, solvo, to pay). The condition of a person who is insolvent or unable to pay his debts. 2 Bla. Com. 285, 471; 9 N. Y. 589.

One who is unable to pay his debts as they fall due in the usual course of trade or business. 2 Kent 389; 3 Dowl. & R. 218; 1 M. & S. 338; 1 Campb. 492, n.; Sudg. Vend. 487; 3 Gray 600; 86 Me. 246; 116 Mo. 226; although his assets in value exceed the amount of his liability; 110 Cal. 488; or the embarrassment is only temporary; 26 So. W. Rep. (Tex.) 255; but it was held that mere liability to pay debts promptly as they mature is not conclusive; 26 id. 509; that one who has sufficient property subject to legal process to satisfy all legal demands is not insolvent; 10 So. Rep. (Ala.) 334; and also that a person who suspended business because of difficulties arising out of the commencement of an action was not necessarily an insolvent; 63 Hun 632.

One who is unable to pay commercial paper in the due course of business is insolvent; 10 Blatchf. 493; 33 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 884.

A corporation is insolvent when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts, and it has ceased to do business, or has taken, or is in the act of taking, a step which will practically incapacitate it from conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospect of success, or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue; 98 Ala. 68.

The clearing house rules, making members responsible for clearances of outside banks, for which they engage to clear, for one day after notice of the termination of their agreement, require payment of checks of such outside bank though known to be insolvent; and a contract for a deposit by the latter of cash and notes as indemnity for such clearances is valid, and the payments are not within a statute forbidding payments by an insolvent corporation made with intent to prefer creditors, and the money and securities held under the aforesaid contract are applicable to the amount of the checks so paid; 40 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 871.

An insolvent building association may make an assessment on stock of a borrowing member to cover losses, and thereby equalize the members, so that they may go out on an equal footing at the closing up of the association; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 694.

INSOLVENT ESTATES OF PERSONS DECEASED. See ADMINISTRATION.

INSPECTION (Lat. inspicere, to look into). The examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce. The decision of the inspectors is not final; the object of the law is to protect the community from fraud, and to preserve the character of the merchandise abroad; 8 Cow. 45. See 1 Johns. 205; 13 id. 331; 2 Cai. 312. Quantity is as legitimate a subject of inspection as quality; 40 La. Ann. 465.

In Practice. Examination. As to the right to inspect public records, see RECORDS.

INSPECTION LAWS. The right in the states to enact inspection laws, quarantine and health laws is undoubted and is recognized in the constitution; Story, Const. 515; Cooley, Const. Lim. 730. These may be carried to the extent of ordering the destruction of private property, when infected with disease or otherwise dangerous; id.; 5 How. 632.

Under the general powers reserved by the states in the regulation of its internal commerce and to protect its citizens from fraud, a state may declare that certain articles shall not be sold within its limits without inspection, and charge the cost of the inspection on those offering the article for sale; 52 Fed. Rep. 690. A state cannot, under the guise of exerting its police powers, or of enacting inspection laws, make discrimination against the products and industries of some of the states in favor of the products and industries of its own or of other states; 138 U. S. 78; 141 id. 62.

INSPECTOR. The name given to certain officers whose duties are to examine and inspect things over which they have jurisdiction: as, inspector of bark, one who is by law authorized to examine bark for exportation, and to approve or disapprove of its quality. Inspectors of customs are officers appointed by the general government.

INSPEXIMUS (Lat.). We have seen. A word sometimes used in letters patent, reciting a grant, inspeximus such former grant, and so reciting it verbatim: it then grants such further privileges as are thought convenient. 5 Co. 54.

INSTALLATION, INSTALMENT. The act by which an officer is put in public possession of the place he is to fill. The president of the United States, or a governor, is installed into office, by being sworn agreeably to the requisition of the constitution and laws.

INSTALMENT. A part of a debt due by contract, and agreed to be paid at a time different from that fixed for the payment of the other part. For example, if I engage to pay you one thousand dollars, in two payments, one on the first day of January and the other on the first day of July, each of these payments or obligations to pay will be an instalment.

In such case, each instalment is a separate debt so far that it may be tendered at any time, or the first may be sued for although the other shall not be due; 3 Dane, Abr. 493, 494; 1 Esp. 129, 226; 2 id. 235; 3 Salk. 6, 18; 1 Maule & S. 706.

A debtor who by failing to pay three instalments of rent due on a lease would forfeit his estate, may, in order to save it, tender one instalment to prevent the forfeiture, although there may be two due at the time; and he is not bound to tender both; 6 Toullier, n. 688.

As to sales on instalment, see SALES.

INSTANCE. Literally, standing on, hence, urging, solicitation. Webster, Dict.

In Civil and French Law. In general, all sorts of actions and judicial demands. Dig. 44, 7, 58.

In Ecclesiastical Law. Causes of instance are those proceeded in at the solicitation of some party, as opposed to causes of office, which run in the name of the judge. Halif. Anal. p. 122.

In Scotch Law. That which may be insisted on at one diet or course of probation. Whart.

INSTANCE COURT. In English Law. That branch of the admiralty court which had the jurisdiction of all matters except those relating to prizes. By the Judicature Acts (q. v.) the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts was transferred to the high court of justice.

The term is sometimes used in American law for purposes of explanation, but has no proper application to admiralty courts in the United States, where the powers of both instance and prize courts are conferred without any distinction; 3 Dall. 6; 1 Gall. 563; 3 Kent 355, 378.

See ADMIRALTY.

INSTANCIA. In Spanish Law. The institution and prosecution of a suit from its inception until definitive judgment. The first instance, "primera instancia," is the prosecution of the suit before the judge competent to take cognizance of it at its inception: the second instance, "secunda instancia," is the exercise of the same action before the court of appellate jurisdiction; and the third instance, "tercera instancia," is the prosecution of the same suit, either by an application of revision before the appellate tribunal, that has already decided the cause, or before some higher tribunal, having jurisdiction of the same.

All civil suits must be tried and decided, in the first instance, within three years; and all criminal, within two years.

As a general rule, three instances are admitted in all civil and criminal cases. Art. 285. Const. 1812.

INSTANTER (Lat.). Immediately; presently. This term, it is said, means that the act to which it applies shall be done within twenty-four hours; but a doubt has been suggested by whom is the account of the hours to be kept, and whether the term instanter as applied to the subject-matter may not be more properly taken to mean "before the rising of the court," when the act is to be done in court, or "before the shutting of the office the same night," when the act is to be done there; 1 Taunt. 343; 6 East, 587; Tidd, Pr., 3d ed. 508, n.; 3 Chitty, Pr. 112. See 3 Burr. 1809; Co. Litt. 157.

INSTANTLY. Immediately; directly; without delay; at once. The word is a frequent occurrence in indictments for murder where the death is charged as having been the immediate result of a wound or blow inflicted. Where the killing has been alleged to have been caused by a battery it is necessary to allege an assault and to specify the time when the mortal stroke was given and the time of the death; the allegation that he "instantly did die" is insufficient; 9 Mo. 666; as was an indictment which described the assault and then charges that of the mortal wound inflicted by defendant the deceased "did instantly die;" 65 id. 217; otherwise had the averment been that the deceased "did then and there instantly die;" id. 218.

INSTAR (Lat.). Like; resembling; equivalent; as, instar dentium, like teeth; instar omnium, equivalent to all.

INSTIGATION. The act by which one incites another to do something, as, to injure a third person, or to commit some crime or misdemeanor, to commence a suit, or to prosecute a criminal. See ACCOMPLICE.

INSTITOR (Lat.) In Civil Law. A clerk in a store; an agent.

He was so called because he watched over the business with which he was charged; and it is immaterial whether he was employed in making a sale in a store, or whether charged with any other business. Institor appellatus est ex eo, quod negotio gerendo instet; nec multum facit tabernæ sit prepositus, an cuilibet alii negotiationi; Dig. lib. 14, tit. 3, 1, 3. Mr. Bell says that the charge given to a clerk to manage a store or shop is called institorial power; 1 Bell, Com. 479, 5th ed.; Erskine, Inst. 3. 3. 46; 1 Stair, Inst. by Brodie, b. 1, tit. 11, §§ 12, 18, 19; Story, Ag. § 8.

INSTITUTE. In Scotch Law. The person first called in the tailzie; the rest, or the heirs of tailzie, are called substitutes; Erskine Pr. 3. 8. 8. See TAILZIE, HEIR OF; SUBSTITUTES.

In Civil Law. One who is appointed heir by testament, and is required to give the estate devised to another person, who is called the substitute.

To name or to make an heir by testament; Dig. 28. 5. 65. To make an accusation; to commence an action.

INSTITUTES. Elements of jurisprudence; text-books containing the principles of law made the foundation of legal studies.

The word was first used by the civilians to designate those books prepared for the student and supposed to embrace the fundamental legal principles arranged in an orderly manner. Two books of Institutes were known to the civil lawyers of antiquity,—Gaius and Justinian.

I. COKE'S INSTITUTES. Four volumes of commentaries upon various parts of the English law.

Sir Edward Coke wrote four volumes of Institutes, as he was pleased to call them, though they have little of the institutional method to warrant such a title. The first volume is a very extensive commentary upon an excellent little treatise of tenures, compiled by Judge Littleton in the reign of Edw. IV. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common-law learning, collected and heaped together from the ancient reports and year-books, but greatly defective in method. The second volume is a comment on many old acts of parliament, without any systematic order; the third, a more methodical treatise on the pleas of the crown; and the fourth, an account of the several species of courts. These Institutes are usually cited thus: the first volume as Co. Litt., or 1 Inst.; the second, third, and fourth as, 2, 3, or 4 Inst., without any author's name. 1 Bla. Com. 72.

II. GAIUS'S INSTITUTES. A tractate upon the Roman law, ascribed to Caius or Gaius.

Of the personal history of this jurist nothing is known. Even the spelling of his name is matter of controversy, and he is known by no other title than Gaius, or Caius. He is believed to have lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The history of Gaius's Institutes is remarkable. In 1816, Niebuhr was sent to Rome by the king of Prussia. On his way thither, he spent two days in the cathedral library of Verona, and at this time discovered these Institutes, which had been lost to the jurists of the middle ages. In 1817, the Royal Academy of Berlin charged Goeschen, Bekker, and Hollweg with the duty of transcribing the discovered manuscript. In 1819, Goeschen gave the first completed edition, as far as the manuscript could be deciphered, to his fellow-jurists. It created an unusual sensation, and became a fruitful source of comment. It formed a new era in the study of Roman law. It gave the modern jurist the signal advantage of studying the source of the Institutes of Justinian. It is believed by the best modern scholars that Gaius was the first original tractate of the kind, not being compiled from former publications. The language of Gaius is clear, terse, and technical,—evidently written by a master of law and a master of the Latin tongue. The Institutes were unquestionably practical. There is no attempt at criticism or philosophical discussion: the disciple of Sabinus is content to teach law as he finds it. Its arrangement is solid and logical, and Justinian follows it with an almost servile imitation.

The best editions of Gaius are Goeschen's 2d ed., Berlin, 1824, in which the text was again collated by Bluhme, and the 3d ed. of Goeschen, Berlin, 1842, edited by Lachman from a critical revision by Goeschen which had been interrupted by his death. Gneist's edition (1857) is a recension of all the German editions prior to that date. In France, Gaius attracted equal attention, and we have three editions and translations: Boulet, Paris, 1827; Domenget, 1843; and Pellat, 1844.

In 1859, Francesco Lisi, a learned Italian scholar, published, at Bologna, a new edition of the first book of Gaius, with an Italian translation en regard. The edition is accompanied and enriched by many valuable notes, printed in both Latin and Italian.

The reader who may wish to pursue his Gaiian studies should consult the list of some thirty-odd treatises and commentaries mentioned in Mackeldey's Lehrbuch des Röm. Rechts, p. 47, note (b), 13th ed., Wien, 1851; Huschke, Essay Zur Kritik und Interp. von Gaius Inst., Breslau, 1830; Haubold's Inst. Juris Rom. Prev. Line., pp. 151, 152, 505, 506, Lipsiæ, 1826; Boecking's Gaius, Preface, pp. 11-18, Lips., 1845; Lisi's Gaius, Preface, pp. x. xi., Bologna, 1859.

The following treatises on Gaius are noted by Vangerow, as of peculiar value: Schrader, under the title "was gewinnt die römische Rechtsgeschichte durch Gai. Institut." Heidel. 1823; Haubold, quantum fructum cepit Rom. juris. e Gaii.

inst.; Werke, 1-665; Göschen's ed. of Gaius, giving the history of the discovery and its value; Gans, Scholien zu Gaius, Berlin, 1821; Dupont, disquisitiones, etc., 1822; Brockdorf, Komment, etc., 1824; Heffter, Comment. 1827; Assen, adnotatio, etc., 1826; Unterholzner, Conject., etc., 1823; Scheurl, Beiträge, etc.; Puchta, Comm., 1837; Pöschman, Studien, 1854, 1860; Huschke, revised ed. 1861. See a valuable essay in Holzendorff's Rechtslexicon (1870), I. 97, 100. See, also, Abdy and Walker's translation of Gaius, published in 1876, and Poste's translation and commentary, published in 1871.

III. JUSTINIAN'S INSTITUTES are an abridgment of the Code and Digest, composed by order of that emperor and under his guidance, with an intention to give a summary knowledge of the law to those persons not versed in it, and particularly to students. Inst. Proem. § 3.

The lawyers employed to compile it were Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus. The work was first published on the 21st of November, 529, and received the sanction of statute law by order of the emperor. They are divided into four books: each book is divided into titles, and each title into separate paragraphs or sections, preceded by an introductory part. The first part is called principium, because it is the commencement of the title; those which follow are numbered, and called paragraphs. The work treats of the rights of persons, of things, and of actions. The first book treats of persons; the second, third, and the first five titles of the fourth book, of things; and the remainder of the fourth book, of actions. The method of citing the Institutes should be understood, and is now commonly by giving the number of the book, title, and section, thus: Inst. I. 2. 5.—thereby indicating book I. title 2, section 5. Where it is intended to indicate the first paragraph, or principium, thus: Inst. B. I. 2. pr. Frequently the citation is simply I. or J. I. 2. 5. A second mode of citation is thus: § 5, Inst. or I. I. 2.—meaning book I, title 2, paragraph 5. A third method of citation, and one in universal use with the older jurists, was by giving the name of the title and the first words of the paragraph referred to, thus: § senatusconsultum est I de jure nat. gen. et civil.—which means, as before, Inst. B. I. tit. 2, § 5. See 1 Colquhoun, s. 61.

The first printed edition of the Institutes is that of Schoyffer, fol., 1468. The last critical German edition is that of Schrader, 4to, Berlin, 1832. This work of Schrader is the most learned and most elaborate commentary on the text of Justinian in any language, and was intended to form a part of the Berlin Corpus Juris; but nothing further has been yet published. It is impossible in this brief article to name all the commentaries on these Institutes, which in all ages have commanded the study and admiration of jurists. More than one hundred and fifty years ago one Homberg printed a tract De Multitudine nimia Commentatorum in Institutiones Juris. But we must refer the reader to the best recent French and English editions. Ortolan's Institutes de l'Empereur Justinien avec le texte, la traduction en regard, et les explications sous chaque paragraphe, Paris, 3 vols. 8vo, sixth edition. This is, by common consent of scholars, regarded as the best historical edition of the Institutes ever published. Du Caurroy's Institutes de Justinien traduites et expliquées par A. M. Du Caurroy, Paris, 1851, 8th ed. 2 vols. 8vo. The Institutes of Justinian: with English Introduction, Translation, and Notes, by Thomas Collet Sandars, M. A., London, 1853, 8vo; 2d ed. 1860. This work has been prepared expressly for beginners, and is founded mainly upon Ortolan, with a liberal use of LaGrange, Du Caurroy, Warnkœnig, and Puchta, as well as Harris and Cooper. The English edition of Harris, and the American one of Cooper, have ceased to attract attention.

The most authoritative German treatises on the Pandects are the following: Windscheid, Dr. B., 3d ed., Dusseldorf, 1863; 2 vols.; Vangerow, Dr. K. A., 7th ed., Marburg, 1863; Brintz, Dr. A. B., 2d ed., Erlangen, 1879; Ihering, Dr. R., Jena, 1881. Incomparably the most philosophical exposition of the Roman system of jurisprudence is Savigny's Gesch. des röm. Rechts, coupled with his System des heut. röm. Rechts, the latter published in Berlin in 1840. Of both, French translations have been published by Guenoux. See also Sandars' Justinian, with an introduction by William G. Hammond (1876), and Abdy and Walker's translation of the Institutes (1876).

IV. THEOPHILUS' INSTITUTES. A paraphrase of Justinian, made, it is believed, soon after A. D. 533.

It is generally supposed that in A. D. 534, 535, and 536, Theophilus read his commentary in Greek to his pupils in the law school of Constantinople. He is conjectured to have died some time in A. D. 536. This paraphrase maintained itself as a manual of law until the eighth or tenth century. This text was used in the time of Hexabiblos of Harmenipulus, the last of the Greek jurists. It is also conjectured that Theophilus was not the editor of his own paraphrase, but that it was drawn up by some of his pupils after his explanations and lectures, inasmuch as it contains certain barbarous phrases, and the texts of the manuscripts vary greatly from each other.

It has, however, always been somewhat in use, and jurists consider that its study aids the text of the Institutes; and Cujas and Hugo have both praised it. The first edition was that of Zuichem, fol., Basle, 1531; the best edition is that of Reitz, 2 vols. 4to, 1751, Haag. There is a German translation by Wüsterman, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo; and a French translation by Mons.

Ilrégier, Paris, 1847, 8vo, whose edition is prefaced by a learned and valuable introduction and dissertation. Consult Moreuil, Hist. Du Droit Byzant., Paris, 1843; Smith, Dict. Biog. London, 1849, 3 vols. 8vo; 1 Kent 533; Profession d'Avocat tom. ii. n. 536, page 95; Introd. à l'Etude du Droit Romain, p. 124; Dict. de Jurisp.; Merlin, Répert.; Encyclopédie de d'Alembert.

INSTITUTION (Lat. instituere, to form, to establish).

In Civil Law. The appointment of an heir; the act by which a testator nominates one or more persons to succeed him in all his rights active and passive. Halifax, Anal. 39; Pothier, Tr. des Donations testamentaires, c. 2, s. 1, § 1; La. Civ. Code, 1598; Dig. 28. 5; 1, 1; 28. 6. 1, 2, § 4.

In Ecclesiastical Law. To become a parson or vicar, four things are necessary, viz.: holy orders, presentation, institution, induction. Institution is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice; for by institution the care of the souls of the parish is committed to the charge of the clerk,—previous to which the oath against simony and of allegiance and supremacy are to be taken. By institution the benefice is full: so that there can be no fresh presentation (except the patron be the king), and the clerk may enter on parsonage-house and glebe and take the tithes; but he cannot grant or let them, or bring an action for them, till induction. See 1 Bla. Com. 389; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 169.

In Political Law. A law, rite, or ceremony enjoined by authority as a permanent rule of conduct or of government: as, the Institutions of Lycurgus. Webster, Dict. An organized society, established either by law or the authority of individuals, for promoting any object, public or social. A private school or college may, by courtesy, be called an institution; but in legal parlance it implies foundation by law, by enactment or prescription; one may open and keep a private school, but cannot properly be said to institute it; 50 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1103.

In Practice. The commencement of an action: as, A B has instituted a suit against C D to recover damages for trespass.

INSTRUCTIONS. In Common Law. Orders given by a principal to his agent in relation to the business of his agency.

The agent is bound to obey the instructions he has received; and when he neglects so to do he is responsible for the consequences, unless he is justified by matter of necessity; 4 Binn. 361; 1 Liverm. Ag. 368. See AGENT.

In Practice. The statement of a cause of action given by a client to his attorney, and which, where such is the practice, are sent to his pleader to put into legal form of a declaration. Warren, Law Stud. 284.

Instructions to counsel are their indemnity for any aspersions they may make on the opposite party; but attorneys who have a just regard to their own reputation will be cautious, even under instructions, not to make any unnecessary attack upon a party or witness. For such unjustifiable conduct the counsel will be held responsible. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 43, p. 132. For a form of instructions, see 3 Chitty, Pr. 117, 120, n.

Also the written or oral address of the presiding judge, in jury trials, delivered usually at the close of the arguments of counsel to the jury, informing them of the law applicable to the cause at trial, and their duties thereunder. A. & E. Encyc.

An omission to give instructions is not assignable as error where no request was made therefor in the court below; 112 N. C. 851; 101 id. 153, 188; 26 Tex. App. 706; 69 Tex. 273; 71 id. 156; 75 Ia. 185; 72 Wis. 234; 77 id. 115; 76 Ga. 3; 123 Pa. 53; 37 Minn. 493; 97 Cal. 459; 133 N. Y. 595; and errors or inaccuracies in charging the jury cannot be considered on appeal unless duly excepted to on the trial; 37 Minn. 351; 130 U. S. 396; 66 Miss. 310; 74 Ia. 433; 50 Ark. 348; 25 Neb. 75; 101 N. C. 223; a refusal to give instructions not excepted to cannot be complained of on appeal; 126 Ill. 282. Where a charge correctly states the law of the case, a judgment will not be reversed because the charge was abstract; 97 Ala. 47; 111 Mo. 576; but an instruction is wrong which states hypothetically facts as to which there is no evidence; 88 Ga. 784; 45 La. Ann. 46; 48 Mo. App. 263. It is not error to recall a jury and charge them again at their request; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 304. The improper admission of evidence is cured by an instruction not to consider the evidence so admitted; 97 N. C. 222; 98 id. 566; 77 Iowa 54; 97 Mo. 62; 83 Ala. 287. Refusal to give correct instructions is not error if the court has already given them on the same point; 76 Ia. 105; 76 Cal. 521; 76 Ga. 452; 126 Ill. 408; 115 Ind. 394; 84 Va. 498; or where given in different language; 144 U. S. 408; 143 id. 60; 135 id. 554; 132 id. 172.

The principles governing the subject of peremptory instructions were clearly stated by Harlan, J., in the recent case of Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. Rep. 754:

"It is well settled that if, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the court refuses to give a peremptory instruction for the defendant, such refusal cannot be assigned for error if the defendant does not stand upon the case made by the plaintiff, but introduces evidence in support of his defence" (citing 106 U. S. 700; 120 id. 527, 530; 144 U. S. 202, 206; 155 U. S. 610, 612; 161 U. S. 91, 95). "But the failure of the defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, to ask a peremptory instruction will not, of itself, preclude such a motion at the close of the whole evidence." Id. 759.

"A mere scintilla of evidence in favor of one party does not entitle him of right to go to the jury (citing 14 Wall. 442, 448). Nor can it 'be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury simply because, in the judgment of the court, there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of the party asking a peremptory instruction. If the facts are entirely undisputed or uncontradicted, or if, upon any issue dependent upon facts, there is no evidence whatever in favor of one party, or, what is the same thing, if the evidence is so slight as to justify the court in regarding the proof as substantially all one way, then the court may direct a verdict according to its view of the law arising upon such a case. If a verdict is rendered contrary to the evidence, the remedy of the losing party is a motion for a new trial." Id. 759.

The conclusions were thus stated:

"That there must be something more than a scintilla of evidence supporting the case of the party upon whom the burden of proof rests, to require the submission of the case to the jury; that where there is a real conflict of evidence on a question of fact, whatever may be the opinion of the judge who tries the case as to the value of that evidence, he must leave the consideration of it for the decision of the jury; that where there are material and substantial facts which, if credited by the jury, would in law justify a verdict in favor of one party, it is not error for the trial judge to refuse a peremptory instruction to the jury; that it is not a 'proper standard to settle for a peremptory instruction that the court, after weighing the evidence in the case, would, upon motion for a new trial, set aside the verdict,' and that the court 'may, and often should, set aside a verdict, when clearly against the weight of the evidence, where it would not be justified in directing a verdict'; that, upon reason and authority, 'there is a difference between the legal discretion of the court to set aside a verdict as against the weight of evidence, and that obligation which the court has to withdraw a case from the jury, or direct a verdict for insufficiency of evidence'; and that 'in the latter case it must be so insufficient in fact as to be insufficient in law.'" Id. 760 (citing 20 C. C. A. 596, 74 Fed. Rep. 463).

In French Law. The means used and formality employed to prepare a case for trial. It is generally applied to criminal cases, and is then called criminal instruction; it is then defined the acts and proceedings which tend to prove positively a crime or delict, in order to inflict on the guilty person the punishment which he deserves.

INSTRUMENT. A document or writing which gives formal expression to a legal act or agreement, for the purpose of creating, securing, modifying, or terminating a right; a writing executed and delivered as the evidence of an act or agreement.

The writing which contains some agreement, and is so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, and wills, but scarcely accounts, ordinary letters or memoranda. The agreement and the instrument in which it is contained are very different things,—the latter being only evidence of the existence of the former. The instrument or form of the contract may be valid, but a contract itself may be void on account of fraud. See Ayliffe, Parerg. 305; Dun. Adm. Pr. 220. A forthcoming bond is an "instrument for the payment of money." 11 Wis. 72. A bank check payable in confederate currency was held not "an instrument payable in money" under the Alabama Code in relation to commercial paper; 42 Ala. 108.

A statute requiring "any instrument of writing" sued on to be filed, does not apply to a contract signed by both parties and deposited with a third person for safe keeping, it applies only to obligations executed only by the party sued; 55 Mo. 446.

INSTRUMENT OF SASINE. An instrument in Scotland by which the delivery of "sasine" (i. e. seisin) is attested. Moz. & W.

INSTRUMENTA (Lat.). That kind of evidence which consists of writings not under seal: as, court-rolls, accounts, and the like. 3 Co. Litt., Thomas ed. 487.

INSUFFICIENCY. In Chancery Practice. After filing of defendant's answer, the plaintiff has six weeks in which to file exceptions to it for insufficiency,—which is the fault of not replying specifically to specific charges in the bill. Smith, Ch. Pr. 344; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 376, note. Sanders, Ord. in Ch., Index; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 413.

Under the Judicature Act, 1873, order xxxi., rules 6, 9, 10, interrogatories are to be answered by affidavit, and if the party interrogated answers insufficiently, the party interrogating may apply to the court for an order requiring him to answer further. Moz. & W.

INSULA (Lat. island). A house not connected with other houses, but separated by a surrounding space of ground. Calvinus, Lex.

INSUPER. Moreover; over and above. An old exchequer term, applied to a charge made upon a person in his account. Blount.

INSURABLE INTEREST. Such an interest in a subject of insurance as will entitle the person possessing it to obtain insurance.

It is essential to the contract of insurance, as distinguished from a wager, that the assured should have a legally recognizable interest in the insured subject, the pecuniary value of which may be appreciated and computed or valued. A recent examination of the subject, as connected with life insurance, results in the conclusion from the authorities, that at common law that contract was not one of indemnity, and wagering policies were not unlawful, and therefore that logically, in such policies, an insurable interest should not be required, but that the American courts adopted what has been termed a rule of American common law that all wagers were void on grounds of public policy and, therefore, that there must be an insurable interest; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65. This rule, it was said, obtains in all the states except New Jersey and Rhode Island; 24 N. J. L. 576; 9 R. I. 354; and see 11 id. 439. The case of Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East 72, was so generally cited and relied on in the American cases that it is not easy to estimate the influence of that case before it was overruled by Dalby v. I. & L. L. Assurance Company, 15 C. B. 365. It is of special interest to note that the New Jersey case in which the court expressly refused to follow Godsall v. Boldero, was decided about the time of the case which overruled it, but before it was reported in the United States. See also 2 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 1530-64, where both the English cases mentioned are reported, and the authorities in both countries are collected, the conclusion of the American editors being, that as to fire, marine, and life insurance there must be some interest in the insurer. See also Biddle, Ins. § 184, where it is said that wagering policies were not void in England at common law. See WAGER.

Where the subject-matter is property, as in fire and marine insurance, the question whether there is an insurable interest is generally free from difficulty and the rule established by the decisions is comparatively simple. It is not requisite that the insured party should have an absolute property in the insured subject, or that the subject or interest should be one that can be exclusively possessed or be transferable by delivery or assignment. Insurable interest involves neither legal nor equitable title; 1 Pet. 121; 12 Ia. 287; 1 Sprague 565. The subject or interest must, however, be such that it may be destroyed, lost, damaged, diminished, or intercepted by the risks insured against. The interests usually insured are those of the owner in any species of property, of mortgagor, mortgagee, holder of bottomry or respondentia bond, of an agent, consignee, lessee, factor, carrier, bailee, or party having a lien or entitled to a rent or income, or being liable to a loss depending upon certain conditions or contingencies, or having the certainty or probability of a profit or pecuniary benefit depending on the insured subject; 1 Phill. Ins. c. 3; 11 E. L. & Eq. 2; 28 id. 312; 34 id. 116; 48 id. 292; 11 Pa. 429; 6 Gray 192; 2 Md. 111; 62 N. Y. 47, 54; 20 Am. Dec. 510; 63 Hun 82; 85 Ala. 607; 133 U. S. 387.

It was formerly held that the interest in property insured must exist when the insurance was effected, as well as the time of the loss; 3 Den. 301; 16 Or. 283; 38 Me. 414; Biddle, Ins. § 157. This is not now the rule; Arnould, Ins. 59; and in a case in which the insurance was upon a cargo, "on account of whom it may concern," the author just cited is approvingly quoted by Mr. Justice Swayne to the effect that, "it is now clearly established that an insurable interest, subsisting during the risk and at the time of loss, is sufficient, and the assured need not also allege or prove that he was interested at the time of effecting the policy," and he adds, "This is consistent with reason and justice, and is supported by analogies of the law in other cases." 98 U. S. 528.

It has been held that there is an insurable interest in an attaching creditor; 86 Me. 518; a purchaser in possession under a contract of sale; 63 Fed. Rep. 680; 5 Wash. 276; 21 N. Y. 378; 135 id. 298; 21 Can. S. C. R. 288; a person admitted as a partner, though the consideration was unpaid; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1100; a husband, in personal property in the name of his wife ; id. ; a commission merchant in goods consigned to him ; 19 Ia. 364 ; persons liable by contract, statute, or common law for the safe keeping of property, as bailees ; 5 Metc. 386 ; 36 N. Y. 655 ; for repair or manufacture ; 14 Ala. 325 ; common carriers ; 12 Barb. 595 ; railroad companies ; 113 Mass. 77 ; warehousemen ; 36 S. C. 213 ; a pipeline company in oil in its tanks ; 145 Pa. 347 ; a sheriff in goods levied on ; 26 N. Y. 117 ; 31 Ia. 464 ; one liable as indorser of a mortgage note ; 107 Mass. 377 ; or a trustee liable for the safe-keeping of property ; 5 Wall. 509 ; or who gives bond for its delivery ; 13 B. Mon. 311 ; one in possession for life under a parol agreement to pay repairs, taxes, and insurance ; 132 N. Y. 49 ; a carpenter or builder erecting or repairing a building, to be paid for on completion ; 15 B. Mon. 411 ; a vendor of land before payment in full ; 46 N. Y. 421 ; (but not one paid in full who has not conveyed ; 2 N. S. W. L. R. 239) ; a lessor ; 80 Ill. 532 ; a tenant ; id. ; or subtenant ; 49 Miss. 80 ; (but not a tenant of glebe land after death of the lessor ; 20 U. C. C. P. 170) ; a tenant by the curtesy ; 50 Pa. 341 ; a simple contract creditor of the estate of a deceased person in lands of the latter, though subject to dower and homestead rights ; 101 Ala. 522 ; a mechanic's lien holder ; 12 Ia. 371 ; the successful bidder at an execution sale ; 5 Sneed 139 ; the owner of lands, on buildings in process of erection ; 71 Hun 369 ; the grantee of property conveyed in fraud of creditors ; 34 Neb. 704 ; one holding property in trust ; 132 N. Y. 133 ; or who has an equitable interest ; 18 Vt. 305 ; a mortgagee, to the extent of his mortgage interest ; 52 Me. 333 ; 1 Curt. C. C. 193 ; and a mortgagor, on his interest in the same building ; 9 Wend. 405 ; 10 Pick. 40 ; but the interests are independent and insurance by the mortgagor cannot be claimed by the mortgagee ; 20 Ohio 185 ; where the mortgagor insures and makes the loss payable to the mortgagee, as his interest may appear, the company is estopped to deny the insurable interest ; 46 Wis. 23 ; a mortgagor who conveys subject to the mortgage, has an insurable interest in the real estate, being liable to the mortgagee for any deficiency ; 67 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 774. A partner may have an insurable interest in a building erected by the partnership on land of the other partner ; 10 Cush. 37 ; and an agent in control may insure the property in his own name ; 165 Pa. 55 ; a master of a ship, his right to primage on freight ; 1 Sprague 565 ; or a half-owner of property in possession, may, if so authorized by the other owners, insure all the property in his own name ; 55 Ill. App. 275.

A partnership has been held to have no insurable interest in household furniture and wearing apparel of one of the partners ; 94 Ga. 630 ; so also an administratrix in real estate of the intestate ; 8 Abb. Pr. 261, note ; a charterer, who advances on the personal credit of the owner, who must pay, without regard to the issue of the voyage ; 16 Md. 190 ; a stockholder as an individual, in the property of the corporation ; 20 Ohio 174. It was held that an interest in the profit to be derived by the insured from the adventure of laying an Atlantic cable was insurable ; though the insured was a shareholder in the company and would derive his profits from dividends ; L. R. 2 Exch. 139.

The insurable interest in life insurance rests upon a different basis from that on property. It has been said "that while in fire and marine insurance it is the interest and not the thing that is insured, in life insurance it is the thing and not the interest ;" 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79.

With regard to the nature and amount of interest necessary for a policy of life insurance, no definite general principle seems yet to have been established, though the classes of insurable interests have been increasing. Every person has an insurable interest in his own life ; 94 U. S. 561 ; 120 Ill. 121 ; 98 Mass. 381 ; 108 Pa. 6 ; 1 Moo. & Rob. 481. It has been a much mooted question whether the beneficiary must have an interest. It has been held in many cases that a person may insure his own life and pay the premiums, for a beneficiary designated by him ; 98 Mass. 381 ; 120 Ill. 12 ; 50 Mo. 44 ; 85 N. Y. 593 ; Biddle, Ins. § 194 ; and there are dicta to this effect, frequently referred to, of Sharswood, J., 26 Pa. 189, and Paxson, J., in 108 Pa. 6. To the contrary are, 104 Pa. 74 ; 122 id. 324 ; 21 Fed. Rep. 698 ; and see 46 Mich. 473, and a dictum in 94 U. S. 561. If the beneficiary pays the premiums, it is generally held that he must have an interest ; 79 Tex. 638 ; 111 Ind. 578 ; 104 Pa. 74 ; 166 id. 617. See Biddle, Ins. § 194 ; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79-87, where the authorities are collected.

It was held that when the policy is caused by the assured to be issued to another, the effect is the same as if issued to the applicant and assigned to the other, and an insurable interest is not required ; 84 Hun 350. A member of a beneficial association may change the beneficiary according to the rule and substitute a new one without regard to insurable interest ; 22 Wash. L. Rep. 329 ; and where the policy was for the benefit of the insured unless he sustained a fatal accident, and in that case to a nephew, the latter contingency having happened, the nephew was not required to show an insurable interest ; 68 Fed. Rep. 873.

The interest required to support an insurance on the life of another has been found by the courts difficult to define, and indeed as was said they "have left it very much undefined ;" 9 R. I. 346. Many attempts to formulate a definition have been made, but they are similar mainly in their vagueness and generality. One of those most quoted was that of Chief Justice Shaw, in 6 Gray 396 : "It must appear that the insured has some interest in the life of the cestui que vie ; that his temporal affairs, his just hopes and well-grounded expectations of support, of patronage, and advantages in life will be impaired so that the real purpose is not a wager, but to secure such advantage, supposed to depend on the life of another; such, we suppose, would be sufficient to prevent it from being regarded as a mere wager. . . . We cannot doubt that a parent has an interest in the life of a child, and, vice versa, a child in that of a parent, not merely on the ground of a provision of law that parents and grandparents are bound to support their lineal kindred when they may stand in need of relief, but upon considerations of strong morals and the force of natural affection between near kindred, operating often more efficaciously than those of positive law." The United States Supreme Court quoted this, with approval, in 94 U. S. 457, and in the opinion, Bradley, J., added some observations not more definite: "Precisely what interest is necessary in order to take a policy out of the category of a mere wager has been the subject of much discussion. In marine and fire insurance the difficulty is not so great, because there insurance is considered as strictly an indemnity. But in life insurance the loss can seldom be measured by pecuniary values. Still, an interest of some sort in the insured life must exist. A man cannot take out insurance on the life of a total stranger, nor on that of one who is not so connected with him as to make the continuance of the life a matter of some real interest to him. . . . Indeed, it may be said generally that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life. . . . The essential thing is, that the policy shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the insured has no interest." In the same court, later, Field, J., in 104 U. S. 775, says: "It may be stated generally, however, to be such an interest arising from the relations of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor or surety for the assured, or from the ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life. It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation. . . . But in all cases there must be a reasonable ground, founded on the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured." The last quotation was much approved in 113 Pa. 438.

Notwithstanding the high authority both of these judges and the courts for which they were speaking, their utterances have been characterized as dicta, and such they are technically, but they undoubtedly fairly represent the views of those courts and all others who recognize that the interest may be based upon kinship and need not be pecuniary. Any effort to extract a more precise definition from the American cases is likely to end in the conclusion of another able judge, who said: "The question, what is such an interest in the life of another as will support a contract of insurance upon the life, is one to which a complete and satisfactory answer, resting upon sound principles, can hardly yet be said to have been given;" Hoar, J., in 15 Gray 249.

In England a pecuniary interest is required and must be proved: 10 B. & C. 724; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; with the possible exception that it is presumed in case of a wife who insures the life of her husband; Peake, Add. Cas. 70. The American courts take a less restricted view as shown by the definitions quoted, but no certain rule can be stated and the cases must be referred to, to ascertain whether any given relationship has been held sufficient.

A creditor may always insure the life of the debtor; 143 Pa. 238; 126 Ill. 387; 70 Md. 261; 101 N. C. 122; and in such case it has been termed a contract of indemnity, differing from other life insurance; Sharswood, J., in 4 Big. L. & Ac. Cas. 458; but this would be only as to the creditor; 15 C. B. 365; 79 Tex. 638; 144 U. S. 621; and it is said that there is no further interest after the payment of the debt; id.; 143 Pa. 238; 144 id. 223; but the question of interest is determined at the time of insurance and not of loss; see infra; Biddle, Ins. § 189. When the debtor pays the premiums, and assigns the policy as collateral security, the policy is in trust for him, and he is entitled to have it delivered up to him on payment; 2 Giff. 337; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 32; but it is otherwise if the creditor pays the premiums and there is no agreement for redemption; 2 De G. & J. 582; 113 Pa. 438.

In cases other than these of creditors it may be said, in the language of Mr. Justice Bradley, that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life; 94 U. S. 457; s. c. 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 392, n.; 10 Cush. 244; 22 Pa. 65; 122 id. 324; 23 Conn. 244; 22 Barb. 9; 28 Mo. 383; 28 E. L. & Eq. 312; 92 Mich. 584.

It has been held that there was an insurable interest in a tenant, in the life of the landlord who had a life estate; 108 Pa. 6; or of one partner in the life of another; 20 N. Y. 32; whose interest was not fully paid for; 108 U. S. 498; 23 Conn. 244; 24 N. J. L. 576.

When an adequate interest exists at the time of the insurance, it is immaterial if there occur before death a diminution or entire cessation of it; 16 Fed. Rep. 650; 32 Hun 306; 27 N. Y. 282; 94 U. S. 457; and see note by J. D. Brannan on the last case in 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 399. But see 16 Or. 283.

On the subject of relationship there is little but confusion. It is said to be only of importance as tending to give rise to a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of the insured; May, Ins. § 107; Bliss, Ins. § 31; 122 Pa. 324; 35 La. Ann. 233; or when there is a legal claim on the insured for support or service; id.; 47 Mo. 419; 115 Pa. 446. The interest has been held to exist in the case of a wife in the life of her husband; 128

U. S. 195; Peake, Add. Cas. 70; 28 Mo. 383 (but see 47 id. 419); 46 N. Y. 674; 128 U. S. 195 (and see criticism of this case in 25 Am. L. Rev. 185 and 35 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 171); and the husband in the life of the wife; 41 Ga. 338; 57 Vt. 496; the marriage gives an interest; 115 Pa. 446; 2 Dill. 166; and it has been held that before marriage a feme sole has an interest in the life of her betrothed; 52 Mo. 213; and so, semble, in Pennsylvania; 113 Pa. 438. As to other relations, it has been held that a son has an interest (on different grounds) in the life of his father; 81 Pa. 154; 80 Ill. 35; but not merely as son; id.; 89 Ind. 573; (contra, 50 Hun 50;) a father, in that of a minor son; 45 Me. 104; or an adult son; 81 Pa. 154; 128 U. S. 195; 6 Gray 396; 15 Hun 74; (contra, in England, 1 Ch. D. 419;) and the interest exists when relationship is by adoption; 76 Ga. 272; as where the relation of father is assumed; 161 Pa. 9; but a stepson has no interest in the life of his stepfather; 122 Pa. 423; nor a son-in-law in the life of the mother-in-law; 22 W. N. C. Pa. 407. A grandmother has an interest in the life of a grandchild; 155 Pa. 295; an old woman who lived with her daughter and the father-in-law of the latter, who had promised to keep her for life, had an interest in his life; 16 Ins. L. J. 682. There is much difference of opinion as to brother and sister, but it is said that the relationship, without more, does not give an interest; Biddle, Ins. § 193; 39 Conn. 100; contra, 94 U. S. 561; however, it has been held that a policy will stand if there is dependence, or indebtedness; 12 Mass. 115; 16 W. N. C. Pa. 188; see 73 N. Y. 480; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; the last being the case of a stepsister. No interest exists in case of uncle or aunt and nephew or niece; 166 Pa. 617; 66 Mo. 63; but an aunt who stands in loco parentis to a nephew has an insurable interest in his life; 172 Pa. 111.

An insurance procured by a religious society, supported largely by voluntary contributions, on the life of one of its members, is void; 113 N. C. 244. In the absence of any insurable interest, the law will presume that the policy was taken out for the purpose of a wager or speculation; 122 Pa. 324; and wagering contracts in life insurance are not valid; 144 U. S. 621.

The amount of insurable interest is the value of the insured subject as agreed by the policy, or its market value, or the pecuniary loss to which the assured is liable by the risks insured against, though the insured subject—for example, life or health—has not a market value; 13 Barb. 206; 7 N. Y. 530; 24 N. H. 234; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 2, sec. 2.

In insurance cases generally an interest must be averred and some proof thereof be made; Biddle, Ins. § 197, and cases cited; but on fire policies if the application or policy shows an interest, it is generally sufficient, prima facie; id.; and so it was held on a life policy; 39 Conn. 100; and the fact that the policy was made payable to plaintiff made a prima facie case; 26 Mo.

App. 511. The facts showing interest are to be determined by the jury; 32 Ia. 421; 80 Ill. 37; 26 W. N. C. Pa. 569.

See, generally, articles by Erskine Hazard Dickson, 35 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 65, 161.

INSURANCE. A contract whereby, for an agreed premium, one party undertakes to compensate the other for loss on a specified subject by specified perils.

"An agreement by which one party, for a consideration (which is usually paid in money either in one sum or at different times during the continuance of the contract of the risk), promises to make a certain payment of money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest." 105 Mass. 149, 160.

An insurance in relation to property is a contract whereby the insurer becomes bound, for a definite consideration, to indemnify the insured against loss or damage, to a certain property named in the policy, by reason of certain perils to which it may be exposed. 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039.

"In fire insurance and marine insurance the thing insured is property; in life or accident insurance, it is the life or health of a person. In either case neither the time and amounts of payments by the assured, nor the modes of estimating or securing the payment of the sum to be paid by the insurer, affect the question whether the agreement between them is a contract of insurance. All that is requisite to constitute such a contract is the payment of the consideration by the one, and the promise of the other to pay the amount of the insurance upon the happening of injury to the subject by a contingency contemplated in the contract;" 105 Mass. 160; 2 S. Dak. 324.

Any one sui juris and capable of contracting generally may be insured, but insurance has been held not to be a necessary for which an infant might contract and be held liable against his option on coming of age; 32 N. H. 345; 53 Mich. 238. In recent years, contracts of insurance by married women have been generally held valid, usually under statutes; 15 R. I. 573; 86 Ala. 424; 52 Ill. 53; 47 Mo. 419.

Any one otherwise capable of contracting may become an insurer, and formerly the business was largely conducted by partnerships, but, with the exception of risks taken at Lloyds (q. v.) and some other large partnerships, the business is now conducted, mainly, by insurance companies (q. v.), though, in England, quasi corporations organized under the Joint Stock Companies Acts insure under the authority of letters patent securing limited liability. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

The insurer is sometimes called the underwriter, and the insured, the assured. The agreed consideration is called the premium; the written contract, a policy; the events insured against, risks or perils; and the subject, right, or interest to be protected, the insurable interest. See these several titles. As to insured and assured, see 108 U. S. 504.

The policy is usually issued upon the application (q. v.) of the insured in writing, which contains the statement of facts entering into and forming a part of the contract. See REPRESENTATION; WARRANTY.

Whether facts concealed or misstated in an application are material is a question for the jury; 44 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 756.

The happening of the event insured against and the consequent damage to the subject-matter, is termed the loss (q. v.).

Where the insurance is on property, an alienation will terminate the contract unless the insurance be transferred with the consent of the underwriter. See ASSIGNMENT. An alienation of part of the property or diminution of the interest of the insured will not, in the absence of an express condition, avoid the policy; 102 Pa. 568; 16 Wend. 385; 16 Fed. Rep. 650; 2 Pick. 249; 53 Mich. 306; 14 U. C. Q. B. 342; 27 id. 54; 18 U. C. C. P. 223; 25 Beav. 444; and the sale of a part does not avoid a policy forbidding merely "sale or transfer;" 10 W. Va. 507; 48 Ohio St. 533.

There is usually a clause, varying in exact terms, forbidding any change in title or possession, and, in such case, the sale of an undivided half interest is within its meaning and avoids the policy; 1 Mich. N. P. 118; but a distinction has been taken between a sale of an interest in property and a sale of the property, and the assignment by a new partner to his firm of his insured property as firm assets was not a forfeiture; 4 Biss. 511; 52 N. Y. 502. Clauses against alienation are conditions precedent; 125 N. Y. 82; 42 Ill. App. 475; and the question usually is whether there is a sale outright or by reason of something in the nature of a defeasance, either in law or by contract, the insured has not wholly parted with the property. As to such cases it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down any general rule, and each case must be governed by the application of the general principles of the law of contracts and conditions to the particular form of the policy and the facts of the case. If there is, in fact, a total alienation, the opinion or motives of the parties in respect to it is not material; 22 Minn. 193. A conveyance upon a condition to be performed before title vests will not avoid; 20 Vt. 546; so where the owner of an equity of redemption sells with a stipulation for payment of the mortgage by the purchaser and is compelled to take back the title for non-performance; 12 Allen 354; or where, for other reasons, the sale is not carried out and there is a reconveyance before loss; 19 La. 28; but see 71 Ia. 532.

Policies of insurance also usually contain conditions for forfeiture in case of incumbrance without notice, or in case the property be "levied upon or taken into possession or custody," and such conditions are valid; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039. A breach renders the policy void; id.; 82 Hun 380; and the question whether the execution of a mortgage increased the risk is immaterial; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 757; breach of any promissory warranty avoids the policy irrespective of its materiality; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 923; nor does it matter that the loss was not produced or contributed to by the breach; 1 N. Y. App. Div. 93. A judgment recovered in invitum is not within such condition; 39 W. Va. 689; but a confession of judgment is; 86 Pa. 227; 122 id. 128; and so was an agreement by one heir to pay the other heirs, in instalments, for property taken under a will; 168 id. 350. A technical seizure where the possession is unchanged is not an avoidance; 63 Hun 82; 89 Pa. 287; 5 Ont. App. 605. A provision for forfeiture for the levy of an execution relates to personality and not to land; 54 N. Y. 595; 54 Wis. 72.

Under these conditions, a breach as to part of the insured property, which is not destroyed or injured, may not avoid the policy as to another part unaffected by the breach. Thus it was held that a recovery, under a live-stock policy, for a cow killed would not be prevented by the existence of incumbrances, in violation of a covenant in the policy, where the property actually lost was not encumbered; 32 Neb. 750. Such contract is severable and any breach of the condition would avoid only such property as was covered by the incumbrance; 102 N. Y. 260; 11 Fed. Rep. 478; 46 U. C. Q. B. 334; 10 Ont. 236; 14 U. C. C. P. 549; 54 Ill. 164. The same principle applies to the defence that the property insured was sold and conveyed; if the contract is severable, a breach as to one part does not operate as a defence with respect to property not included; 33 Neb. 340.

In insurance on manufacturing establishments it is usual to stipulate for avoidance if operations should cease without the consent of the insurer, and such provision is valid and is violated though a watchman was employed and the risk not increased; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039; and the same is true of all conditions which are warranties. As to the distinction between representation and warranty and the law as to both, see those titles; and as to increase of risk, see RISKS AND PERILS.

Insurance on buildings or their contents is usually upon condition that if the former is suffered to be vacant or unoccupied, the policy will be void. In such case the forfeiture does not depend upon the insured's knowledge of the fact of vacancy; 161 Ill. 437; and a purchaser of the house and assignee of the policy is bound by the condition; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 967. Temporary absence of a tenant will not work a forfeiture; 92 Hun 223; 61 Ark. 108; nor will merely sleeping in the house occasionally and daily visits of the owner's wife to get provisions prevent forfeiture; 82 Md. 88; or visits twice a day by an employe; 16 Misc. Rep. 483. The insurer cannot establish a forfeiture without proving that the premises were unoccupied for any purpose; 2 Mo. App. Rep. 934.

Keeping on hand certain articles is usually prohibited, either specifically or as a class. The breach of a condition against keeping inflammable substances does not prevent recovery, when the use of the particular substance was a necessary and usual incident of the subject insured; 95 Ga. 604; as the use of gasoline, in a silver-plating business, one day's supply only being brought in at once; 170 Pa. 151; or keeping an inflammable substance for sale as was customary where there was a clause, written in ink on the policy, containing the words "merchandise such as is usually kept in a country store;" 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 189; 91 Wis. 158; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 75; and where a typewritten rider stipulated for insurance on such articles as are usually kept in a painter's shop, it prevailed against a printed condition against keeping benzine on the premises; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 75.

As to hazardous and extra-hazardous risks, generally, see RISKS AND PERILS.

In order to promote the accurate adjustment of the loss, there is usually included in policies of insurance, on such property as a stock of merchandise, what is known as the "iron safe clause," which, in one form or another, provides that the books of the insured showing all business transactions, and the last inventory of the business, shall be kept in a fireproof safe at night and when the store is not opened for business. Such a clause is an express promissory warranty; 60 Ill. App. 39; 28 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1027; 29 id. 218; 30 id. 384; 31 id. 321; but a substantial compliance only is required; 36 id. 591; (contra, 34 id. 35.) Keeping the books in the safe at night, does not mean from sunrise to sunset, but from the close of business of the day according to custom; 38 Fed. Rep. 19; and where according to custom the door was locked but customers could get in by knocking, and the clerk who was in the store writing up books was absent for a short time when the fire occurred, the store was "opened for business" and the policy was not void; 54 Ark. 376. But where the insurance was on a stock of liquor in a saloon, it did not excuse the violation of the iron safe clause that the same books were kept for a hotel and the saloon, the latter being opened night and day except Sunday, and the books being needed for constant settlements with the guests in the hotel; 61 Ark. 207; (distinguishing the last two cases.) The clause was held not to have been violated by failure to keep a blotter, containing the record of the sales of the day before, locked in the safe; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1060 (reversing 34 id. 462); 36 id. 590; and in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where a cash sales book covering twenty-one days before the sale was inadvertently left out of the safe and burned, and the books were kept in a primitive manner but showed purchases and credit sales, some cash sales, and an inventory, taken shortly before the fire, it was held that a finding of compliance with the policy was warranted; 68 Fed. Rep. 708; in another case it was said not to be an excuse for violation that through oversight the books were not put in the safe the night before the fire; 48 La. Ann. 223.

Where the bookkeeper, fearing the safe would not stand, took out the books to remove them to a safe place, and some of them fell and were burned, it was held that the covenant was not broken unless he was negligent; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 720.

Where such a provision was inserted by fraud, a verdict for the plaintiff was not disturbed; 84 Ga. 759; and where the application showed in answer to inquiry that the books were kept in a dwelling at night a breach of the condition was not enforced; 13 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 799.

The insurer must prove that the fire occurred at a time mentioned in the stipulation; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 243.

The character of the safe is not warrantable; 18 So. Rep. (Miss.) 928; and it is sufficient if it be one of a kind ordinarily known as fireproof; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 82. See FIRE-PROOF.

The stipulation in such a clause, that a set of books should be kept, including a record of all business transactions, does not require a book known as a "cash book," or any particular system of bookkeeping; 94 Ga. 785. The lost inventory of the business, within this clause, means the lost inventory of the goods insured; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 722. The clause is complied with, by an inventory made, and books kept from the date of the policy, but an invoice is not an inventory; 71 Miss. 608. The question whether there was reasonable time between the issue of the policy and the fire to make an inventory is for the jury unless the evidence is undisputed; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 15. Where the inventory was shown to the adjuster after the fire, and afterwards lost, there was a performance of the condition; 13 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1103. But where the books do not furnish the necessary data, to verify the accounts rendered, the policy is avoided; id.

Policies of insurance are frequently made available as collateral security to a mortgagee or other lienholder, by what is known as a mortgage clause, which see as to the rights of the several parties thereunder and the effect thereof upon the insurance and the right of action. See also MORTGAGE.

Conditions may be waived and the general principles of the law of waiver (q.v.) are to be applied, but it has been held that a waiver of the condition on one payment cannot be construed to cover violations on another which were not assented to; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039.

Though a policy is the usual instrument by which insurance is effected, it is not necessary; 19 N. Y. 305; 25 Ind. 536; 26 La. Ann. 326; and it may be evidenced by a memorandum or note; 25 N. H. 169; 76 L. T. N. S. 228; 3 Grant, Pa. 123; or a letter; 1 Ohio N. P. 71; 14 L. C. Jur. 219. Where the correspondence was held sufficient to create a valid contract for a policy of fire insurance, it was held that, after the property had been destroyed by fire, the insured was entitled to a decree for the amount agreed to be insured, less premium; 94 U. S. 621. In the absence of a statute forbidding it, it may be verbal; 2 Dill. 26; 5 Pa. 339 (though this had been questioned; 4 Yeates 468); 73 Ill. 166; 94 U. S. 574; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 854; 31 Ohio St. 633, overruling 16 Ohio 148; 63 Fed. Rep. 382; and when made without specifying any date for the insurance to take effect, commences immediately; id. A usage to show a parol contract was inadmissible; 14 Ins. L. J. (Mass.) 427. In Canada it was held that to recover at law, on a contract of insurance by a corporation, there must be a sealed policy, but on a parol contract the plaintiff may sue for a breach to deliver a policy, or proceed in equity; 16 U. C. Q. B. 477. The agreement to pay a premium is sufficient to support a verbal contract; 20 Fed. Rep. 766. See generally as to verbal contracts, Biddle, Ins. § 138, where the subject is treated historically.

An offer by a newspaper in each issue to pay a sum named to the heirs of one accidentally dying within twenty-four hours from the last issue, provided that the printed slip containing the offer should be found on the person of the deceased, is a contract of insurance; 15 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 463.

The usual practice is for the agent, upon the payment of the premium, to issue what is termed a binding receipt, which is, in effect, an executory contract to issue a policy if the risk is accepted by the company, and, meanwhile, the insurance is in force. Such contracts are valid and will be enforced at law and in equity; 9 N. Y. 280; 73 Cal. 216; 11 Paige 547; and a charter provision requiring "all policies or contracts" to be signed by certain officers has been held not to apply to such agreements; 73 Mo. 371; 20 Wall. 560; 19 N. Y. 305; 31 Ohio St. 633. See AGREEMENT FOR INSURANCE.

Where a loss occurs, the ascertainment of the amount due upon the policy is termed adjustment (q. v.). Notice of the loss must be given in accordance with the terms of the condition, which is precedent to recovery; 86 Ala. 558; L. R. 20 Ir. 93; 43 N. H. 621. This is distinct from proof of loss (q. v.), which must be also made as stipulated, or, in default of express provision, in a reasonable time; 128 Pa. 392. See Loss.

Other insurance may be taken on the same property without restriction unless there be such in the contract; 70 Md. 400; 14 Q. L. R. 293; 9 R. I. 346; and no notice is required unless so stipulated; 2 Wash. C. C. 186; but when the insurance is on property only one indemnity can be collected, and there is a right of contribution among insurers; 18 Ill. 553; 146 Pa. 561; but it is usual to stipulate that each insurer, if there are more than one, shall be liable only pro rata; 9 Fed. Rep. 813. As to excessive insurance on the same property, see DOUBLE INSURANCE.

It is usual in policies to have a time limit requiring an action to be brought within a designated period of the loss. Such condition is precedent to a recovery; 67 Ia. 338; 14 L. C. Jur. 256; and will apply in a forum other than that of the domicile of the insurer; 7 Gray 61. In some courts the time of the limitation is held to be computed from the date of the event which causes the loss; 91 Ill. 92; 47 Fed. Rep. 863; 51 Conn. 17; 19 Nov. Scot. Rep. 372; 18 Ont. 355; in others, from the time the loss was payable; 39 N. Y. 45; 132 id. 334; 83 Cal. 473; 81 Ia. 135; 17 Fed. Rep. 568.

Efforts have been made both by contract and by statute to limit the right of suit on a policy to a particular jurisdiction; such provisions in a policy or by law have been held illegal; 6 Gray 174, 185, 596; 31 Mo. 518; May, Ins. § 490. Statutes which attempt thus to limit the jurisdiction are strictly construed, and as they generally provide that, after a loss, the directors shall meet and adjust the loss, and if it is not paid in a given time, suit may be brought in a particular court, the limitation is in many states confined to the exact case mentioned, and it is only where the amount has been so determined that it takes effect; 25 N. H. 22; 53 Me. 419; 22 Wis. 516; 4 Metc. 212; 7 Ind. 25; but in other cases the limitation has been enforced without reference to such previous ascertainment of the loss; 18 Ohio St. 455; 6 id. 599; 17 Vt. 369. See May, Ins. § 491.

So, with respect to the effort to provide in the policy that the law of a certain state should determine its construction, where life policies have been issued in a state other than the same state of the company, it has been held that they are governed by statutory provisions in the state of the insured, although the policies stipulated that the contract was to be governed by the law of the same state. See LEX LOCI.

As to the rights and remedies of and against insurance companies in countries or states other than those of their domicile, and the effect of non-compliance with statutes regulating the manner of doing business, see FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

It has been held that a provision that where there are several underwriters each is liable pro rata, the assured shall not sue more than one of the underwriters at one time, and that a final decision in any action thus brought shall be decisive of the claim of the assured against each of the underwriters, who agree to abide the event of the suit, is not void as against public policy, but valid as tending to prevent a multiplicity of suits; and in an action to which all the underwriters were made parties defendant, a plea that it was brought in violation of the agreement was sustained; 6 N. Y. App. Div. 540. And under such condition timely service on one of the defendants is sufficient to prevent the running of the statute as against all the underwriters; id.

An insurer is entitled to subrogation (q. v.) in cases where such right would attach under the general principles applying to that subject; as, when payment is made for loss or damage to goods in transit, there is a subrogation to the rights of the owner against the carrier; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 560; 63 Fed. Rep. 34; 165 Pa. 428; 60 Minn. 382. And, on payment by the insurer of a loss which he was not legally bound to pay, he has a right of action against one through whose negligence the property was destroyed; 60 Ark. 325; he becomes entitled pro tanto, and should join the owner as plaintiff in an action for negligent burning; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1144. So, an insurer of title who paid off liens prior to a mortgage, as to which the mortgagee was indemnified by bond of the mortgagor, was subrogated to the right of action of the latter on the bond; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 543.

In a recent English case it was held that, since a policy of fire insurance is a contract of indemnity, the insurer is entitled to recover from the insured not merely the value of any benefit received by him by way of compensation from other sources in excess of his actual loss, but also the full value of any rights or remedies of the insured against third parties which have been renounced by him, and to which, but for that renunciation, the insurer would have a right to be subrogated; [1896] 2 Q. B. 377.

As to subrogation in insurance cases, see 54 Alb. L. J. 109 (credited to Sol, J.); 29 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 42; 18 id. 737.

Expected profits may be insured, as crops, against hail and frost or other risks, even before they are sown, but the profits must be insured as such; 3 N. & M. 819; 2 East 544; 5 Metc. 391; 2 Johns. Cas. 36; 1 Sandf. 551; 2 Rob. La. 131; or the future profits of one to whom the insured has advanced money to pursue an enterprise; 32 Conn. 244; 10 Cush. 282; 2 E. D. Sm. 168; or a portion of the cargo of a ship expected to arrive, even if the insured has no property in such cargo, but has only purchased, for a specified sum, the right to take such goods for a further specified sum; 16 Pick. 397; but even if the insured has an ownership in the property, if he becomes insolvent before the arrival of the cargo and the goods are intercepted by the vendor, by right of stoppage in transitu, there can be no recovery on the policy; 10 B. & C. 99.

As to reinsurance, see that title.

See, generally, Beach; Biddle; May; Richards; Wood, Insurance; Finch, Dig. 1889-96; Sansum, Dig. 1877.

The several forms of insurance contracts are classified mainly with reference to the character of the perils insured against. See infra.

Life Insurance. The insurance of the life of a person is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum or periodical payments, undertakes to pay the person for whose benefit the insurance is made, a stipulated sum, or annuity equivalent, upon the death of the person whose life is insured, whenever this shall happen, if the insurance be for the whole life, or in case this shall happen within a certain period, if the insurance be for a limited time.

An agreement by the insurer to pay to the insured or his nominee a specified sum of money, either on the death of a designated life, or at the end of a certain period, provided the death does not occur before, in consideration of the present payment of a fixed amount, or of an annuity till the death occurs or the period of insurance is ended. Biddle, Ins. § 2. Bunyon's definition varies little, as does that of Park, but the latter elaborates the consideration which is described as "a certain sum proportioned to the age, health, profession, and other circumstances of the person whose life is the object of insurance. Park, Ins. ch. xxii. In a leading case it was said by Parke, B., to be "a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person, in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life, the amount of the annuity being calculated, in the first instance, according to the probable duration of the life; and when once fixed, it is constant and invariable;" 15 C. B. 365.

A mutual contract by which the insurer, on the one hand, comes under an obligation to pay a certain sum of money upon the death of the insured, who, on the other hand, becomes bound to pay certain sums, either annually or otherwise, in the name of premiums, and these obligations are counterparts of one another. 3 Can. S. C., 4th ser. 1078.

This form of insurance, it has been said, "is substantially the purchase by the insured from the insurer of a reversionary interest for a present sum of money;" Biddle, Ins. § 4.

The person whose life is insured is frequently termed the "life."

The sum to be paid in case of loss depends entirely upon the stipulation in the policy, and not at all upon the amount of the pecuniary interest in the life; 23 Conn. 244.

It is settled that there must be an insurable interest, as to which see that title.

A large proportion of life insurance is now effected through the medium of beneficial associations (q. v.); they are generally formed under state incorporation laws and are subject to their own rules and regulations so far as they are consistent with the general or statutory law of the state. The benefits and advantages conferred by these associations are held to be insurance, and subject to regulation by the insurance laws of the state; 41 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 4; 67 Md. 117. While the rules and regulations enter into and become a part of the contract of insurance, the usage of the association will not bind courts in construing the contract, if the latter be clear and unambiguous; and words having a fixed meaning, either general or technical, will be interpreted according to that meaning as in other cases; 31 Fed. Rep. 122. See INSURANCE COMPANY.

Some of the conditions of policies of life insurance are peculiar to this class of insurance. Among the most important of these are those relating to self-destruction and insanity, as to which see SUICIDE.

Entering the military service is also usually stipulated against, but death at the hands of a roving band of thieves and robbers, while engaged as an engineer in building a bridge, under the direction of a military commander, is not within such a stipulation; 48 N. Y. 34; but even an involuntary entrance will defeat a recovery; 44 Ga. 119; as also, serving on the staff of a general, although the insured received no commission; Mitchell v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, cited in Bliss, Ins. 643. The receipt of the premium by the insurer, after a known violation of the condition against residence abroad, is a waiver of the right to a forfeiture; 23 Conn. 244; whether the knowledge be actual or constructive; 5 De G. M. & G. 265; L. R. 11 Eq. 197. Where a condition against absence from home beyond a stipulated time is violated, the insured will be excused if he be detained by reason of illness occurring within the time specified; 3 Bosw. 530; but not where the illness occurs after the limits of the stipulation; 5 R. I. 38. Where the contract restricts the insured to the settled limits of the United States, it covers all regions within the boundaries of the country, whether inhabited or not; 22 N. Y. 427; and a permission to travel by sea in "a first rate vessel" will cover any mode of travel whether by cabin or steerage; 13 Gray 434.

The weight of decision has been in favor of the view, that the contract of life insurance between citizens of different states is not dissolved, but only suspended, by a war between the states; 46 N. Y. 54; 9 Blatchf. 234; 9 Am. Rep. 169; 10 id. 535; 13 Wall. 159; but, contra, 41 Conn. 272; 93 U. S. 24.

Tontine. A system of insurance which under various forms is based upon the idea of a loan or investment of property for the benefit of a number of persons, the income at first being divided among all and the shares of members who die passing not to their own legal representatives but to increase the interest of the surviving member, until, at last, after the number of members has gradually diminished by successive deaths, the last survivor takes the whole income, or, if such be the terms agreed upon, the whole principal. The system took its name from Lorenzo Tonti, an Italian of the seventeenth century, who first conceived the idea and put it in practice. Merlin, Repert.; Dalloz, Dict.; 5 Watts 351.

A policy of this character was the subject of litigation in the Massachusetts Supreme Court in a case in which the system is illustrated. It was to continue ten years if the insured should so long live, but in case of his death before that time, the dividends would not inure to the benefit of his estate, but be held by the company for the benefit of other policy holders and forfeited by him. The estate of the deceased received only the amount of the policy, which, however, would be forfeited for non-payment of premiums during the tontine term; policies of this character are kept in classes of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, called respectively the tontine periods, and accounts are kept with the funds of each class to ascertain the amount due upon each policy at the expiration of its tontine term, at which time the surplus profits are apportioned equitably among such policies as complete the term; 145 Mass. 56. Under such an insurance the failure of the company to place all dividends accruing upon a policy in a reserve fund in accordance with the terms of the policy did not excuse the non-performance of his contract by the insured, and a suit by such policy holder for an accounting by the company cannot be maintained on the ground of the failure to keep and invest the fund accruing from the dividends separately; 101 N. Y. 328. No trust relation exists between the company and the insured but it is simply one of contract measured by the terms of the policy; 50 N. Y. 610; 78 id. 114; 98 id. 627. The situation of the parties is that of debtor and creditor merely, the amount of the debt being determined by the equitable apportionment to be made by the corporation through its officers; 101 N. Y. 421; 145 Mass. 56. The apportionment of the fund is not absolutely conclusive upon the policy holders. It is prima facie right, but may be shown to be based on erroneous principles; id. The rights under such a policy being absolutely vested, the possession by another of the evidence of their rights cannot change or affect them; 108 U. S. 498.

Fire Insurance. A contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium received by him, either in a gross sum or by annual payments, undertakes to indemnify the insured against all loss or damage which he may sustain to a certain amount, in his property mentioned in the policy, by fire during the time agreed upon.

Fire insurance is said to be in effect a contract of indemnity against loss or damage suffered by an owner or person having an interest in the property insured. 86 Me. 518.

The principles applying to the subject are, in general, those governing marine policies and other kinds of insurance of property against the various perils which attend its use and ownership, and therefore the point to be mainly considered, as applied to fire insurance alone, is the exact definition of the peril insured against. With respect to the nature of the contract as an indemnity, the necessity of an interest in the property, the policy and the application, the effect of warranties and representations, respectively, and the loss and its adjustment, reference should be had to the discussion of the subject generally, supra, and in the various titles referred to.

It has frequently been said that to recover under a fire policy there must be an actual fire or ignition, and that it is not sufficient that there has been an injurious increase of heat which caused damage to the insured property, while nothing had taken fire which ought not to be on fire. The authority usually relied upon, for this general statement, is the early and leading case of Austin v. Drewe, 6 Taunt. 436, but this case has been much criticised; Cushing, J., in 10 Cush. 356; 1 Bennett, Fire Ins. Cas. 104, note; 13 Ill. 676; May, Ins. § 402.

A fire in a theatre, caused by the excessive heating of its walls by a fire outside, was held to be covered by the policy; 11 Allen 336; and when a building is blown up by gunpowder to prevent the spreading of fire the insurer against fire is liable if, but for being blown up, it would have been burned; 21 Wend. 367; 3 Phila. Pa. 323; 41 Ill. App. 395; L. R. 3 Exch. 71. These cases are distinguished from explosion, which is not fire, within a fire policy, when it occurs some distance off; 19 C. B. N. s. 126; 15 La. Ann. 217; even though it was caused by fire; id.; and when the explosion is within the building, there must be ignition to bring it within the fire insurance; 11 N. Y. 516; but damage from fire caused by explosion on the premises is covered; 10 Cush. 356; 103 Mo. 595 (unless it is expressly excepted; 3 Phila. Pa. 323); so also if the damage is from explosion caused by fire, as where a steamboat was burned as the result of an explosion of gunpowder; 11 Pet. 213; or when coals were thrown out of the stove; 127 Mass. 346. In this case the policy contained the provision that "if a building shall fall, except as the result of a fire," the insurance should cease; and this was held to apply to inherent defects in the building. And when, under a similar policy "against fire originating in any case," there occurred an explosion and loss, it was held immaterial whether the fire resulted in combustion or explosion; 33 Mo. App. 394.

A loss by reason of fire started by an explosion caused by a fire coming in contact with escaping gas was not within a policy which excepted loss by reason of or resulting from any explosion whatever; 2 Ins. L. J. 190. When damages by explosion are excepted unless caused by fire, the insurer is held liable only for the result of fire and not of the explosion which caused it; L. R. 3 Exch. 71; or by one caused by fire in its course; id.; contra, 2 Fed. Rep. 633; 56 Md. 70.

A fire in a chimney, caused by accidental ignition of soot, or smoke issuing from such fire, is within a policy covering all loss or damage by fire to all goods contained in the building; 166 Mass. 67. So also a loss by spontaneous combustion was held to be within a fire policy; 9 L. C. Q. B. 448; but see a criticism of this case in 65 Md. 162. Where a policy insures against explosion and accident and there was an exception of explosion or loss caused by the burning of the building, a destruction of the property by an explosion caused by raising a cloud of starch dust in an endeavor to extinguish flames was held a fire loss and not within the policy; 57 Fed. Rep. 294, reversing 48 Fed. Rep. 198.

Fire insurance does not cover damage by lightning without combustion; 37 Me. 256; 14 N. H. 341; even when the policy covers "fire, by lightning;" 4 N. Y. 326. It is quite usual to add to a fire policy what is known as a "lightning clause," which covers loss from that cause with or without fire; but a company authorized to take fire risks is not thereby authorized to insure against lightning; 37 Me. 256. A policy of insurance against lightning was held to cover destruction by tornado when the former accompanied the latter; 54 Wis. 433.

Under a lightning clause attached to a fire policy, on horses "contained in" a barn, the insurer was held liable for a brood mare pasturing in a field. The policy against loss by lightning was said to be a contract of insurance of a peculiar kind, which must be construed in a reasonable, common-sense view, and so as not to reduce the contract to an absurdity; 114 Pa. 431; 20 W. N. C. Pa. 370; in these cases the insurance was on horses alone, and, on that ground, they were distinguished in a later case, in which the policy embraced also property kept in a barn, other than live stock, and the company was held not liable for a horse killed by lightning while in pasture; 130 Pa. 113.

Where an insurance policy excepts loss caused directly or indirectly by fire it is an accident, and not a fire, policy, and the complaint must show that the loss was not caused directly or indirectly by fire; 51 Fed. Rep. 155.

When the insurance was against loss by "fire or storm," it did not cover damage by a freshet caused by melting snow with prevailing south winds and rain; 3 Phila. Pa. 38.

The exception of "loss by fire occasioned by mobs or riots," does not extend to a loss from the burning of a bridge by military authorities in time of war; 50 Pa. 341; of the risks of this class, usurped power is not an ordinary mob but a rebellious one or one having political purpose; 2 Wilson 363; it is "rebellion conducted by authority;" Lord Mansfield in Langdale v. Mason, 2 Marsh. Ins. 792; but it is not necessary that the destruction be commanded by a superior officer; 42 Mo. 156; insurrection is "a seditious rising against the government, a rebellion, a revolt;" 1 Jones, N. C. 126; and a riot is "where three or more persons actually do an unlawful act, either with or without a common cause . . . the intention with which the parties assemble, or at least act, being unlawful;" id.; but in another case it was held that the destruction of property in a riot is within the exception even if the rioters assembled originally for a lawful purpose; 5 La. Ann. 482.

The exemption of loss "by explosion of any kind, by means of invasion," etc., means by explosion and invasion, etc., not explosion caused by invasion; 14 W. Va. 33.

See CIVIL COMMOTION; INSURRECTION; INVASION; MOB; RIOT; USURPED POWER.

Losses caused by the effort made to prevent the destruction of property by fire must be borne by the insurers and not by the insured; 3 Phila. Pa. 193; as by water; 19 La. Ann. 297; 10 Gray 159; or theft; 34 Pa. 96; 49 Me. 200; 30 Mo. 160; unless expressly excluded; 17 La. Ann. 131; or removal when required by due diligence, according to the circumstances; 11 Mich. 425; 13 Ill. 676 (but see 3 Pa. 407); or falling of walls after an interval of a day; 7 Sc. Sess. Cas., 1st ser. 52; but the fire must be the proximate cause; 37 Mo. 429. See 10 Gray 15.

Insurance against fire covers a loss by the negligence of the insured not amounting to fraud; 53 Pa. 419. The contract of fire insurance is to be construed with reference to the laws of the state in which the property is situated and the policy issued; 164 Mass. 291; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 731.

An insane person cannot be held, in setting fire to his property, to have had such a fraudulent or wrongful design as to defeat the insurance thereon, though his estate may afterwards be called upon to respond for the act; 20 N. Y. S. 344; 35 Hun 475.

Marine Insurance. A contract of indemnity by which one party, for a stipulated premium, undertakes to indemnify the other, to the extent of the amount insured, against all perils of the sea, or certain enumerated perils, to which his ship, cargo, and freight, or some of them, may be exposed during a certain voyage or fixed period of time.

A contract of indemnity (not perfect but approximate; 1 H. L. Cas. 287; 4 App. Cas. 755); against all losses accruing to the subject-matter of the policy from certain perils during the adventure. This subject-matter need not be strictly a property in the ship, goods, or freight; 2 B. & P. N. R. 269; L. R. 7 Q. B. 302; any reasonable expectation of pecuniary profit from the preservation of the subject-matter is insurable as a marine risk; as, where the joint owners of a vessel and cargo engaged in a joint adventure have a lien for their several interests and for advancements, each part-owner had an insurable interest in the joint venture; 124 Pa. 61.

The insured must have a lawful interest at the time of the loss. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

The contract is one recognized by the general law and usage of nations, and therefore either native or alien may be insured. It was settled in England after much judicial discussion (and some temporary legislation) that the insurance of enemy's property is illegal; 4 East 396; 13 Ves. 64; see 3 Kent 254. The same rule was recognized by continental jurists; id. 255, note (b); Val. Com. ii. 32; and in this country; 16 Johns. 438, where the subject was extensively discussed, and it is said that "it may be considered the established law of this country;" 3 Kent 256. Such contracts, made before the outbreak of war, are annulled by it; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 101.

It may also be in favor of A, or whom it may concern, but those general words will only apply to a person with an interest in the subject and who was in the contemplation of the contract; 2 Wash. C. C. 391; 98 U. S. 528; 6 Paige 483; 129 N. Y. 237; if such person has authorized or adopted it; 44 N. H. 238. The intention of the insurer need not have fastened upon the very person, who seeks to take the benefit; an intention covers a person who takes such relation to the insurer as brings him within the clauses of the policy; 129 N. Y. 237. See 40 Me. 181; 5 Bosw. 369. The insurance "on advances" is distinct from the ship itself; 1 U. S. App. 183.

As to who may be insurers in a marine policy there is no special rule.

An insurance on a ship named makes the latter a part of the contract and no other can be substituted, but a cargo may be changed from one ship to another; 3 Kent 257; and the master may be changed; 12 Johns. 138. An insurance on the ship includes everything appurtenant to it; Boulay-Paty iii. 379; 1 Term 611, note. An insurance on goods need not name the ship, but may be "on any ship or ships;" Enier. i. 173; 2 H. Bla. 343.

Marine policies in England and this country usually contain the words "lost or not lost," and in such case they cover losses already accrued as well as future ones; 27 N. J. L. 645. It is so without the words in other foreign countries; Roccus, de Ass. n. 51; 3 Kent 259; and it was said by Story, J., that "it would be so without reference to the words;" 2 Summ. 397.

The most perfect good faith is required in this contract with respect to representations, warranties, and concealment, as to all of which see the several titles.

The insured is required both to pay the premium, and to represent fully and fairly all the circumstances relating to his subject-matter of the insurance, which may influence the determination of the underwriters in undertaking the risk or estimating the premium. A concealment of such facts amounts to a fraud, which avoids the contract; 1 Marsh. Ins. 464; Park. Ins.; 3 Kent 282-7 and notes.

Where a policy covers a loss by perils of the sea or other perils, the insured may recover for a loss occasioned by the negligence of the master or crew or other persons employed by him; 11 Pet. 213; 2 Metc. 432; 14 How. 351; L. R. 4 C. P. 117; 117 U. S. 323. As to the perils insured against generally, see PERILS OF THE SEA; RISKS AND PERILS; and as to the different kinds of marine policies, see POLICY.

If, before the termination of the adventure, the assured has parted with all interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, he cannot recover on any loss subsequent to his transfer of the property; 11 M. & W. 10; L. R. 7 Q. B. 302; and the insurer can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured; 1 Pet. 193; 12 How. 466; 17 id. 152; 13 Wall. 367; 105 U. S. 630; 111 id. 584; 103 Mass. 219.

Accident Insurance. That form of insurance which provides for specified payments in case of an accident resulting in bodily injury or death, as distinguished from casualty insurance, which is a term applied to insurance against loss or damage to property occasioned by accident. 155 Mass. 404. A foreign corporation, although an accident insurance company, has been held authorized to issue "horse or vehicle policies," "elevator policies," "general liability policies," and "outside liability policies;" id.

Accident insurance is intended to furnish indemnity against accidents and death caused by accidental means, and the language of the policy must be construed with reference to that proposition. In case of doubt or uncertainty the construction should be liberal in favor of the insured; 133 Ill. 556, reversing 35 Ill. App. 17.

A form of insurance common in England is against accident caused by vehicles. Under such a policy where the amount of liability was limited to £250 in respect of any one accident and £1,500 in any one year, where forty persons were injured by the overturning of one vehicle, it was held that the injury caused to each person was a separate accident; 60 L. J. R. N. s. 260. An insurance by the owner of a vehicle against damage suffered by him for injuries caused by the vehicle to passengers is termed a third party risk; 29 Scot. L. Rep. 836.

The usual language of such policies insures against death through external, violent, and accidental means. This has been held to cover death from shock and physical strain resulting from being run away with in a covered carriage, where there was no mark of physical injury nor contact with any physical object; 80 Me. 251; and see [1896] 2 Q. B. 248; suicide by an insane man; 120 U. S. 527; death from drowning; 5 H. & N. 211; s.c., on appeal, 6 id. 839; falling into the water in a fit; 22 L. T. N. s. 820; 6 Q. B. Div. 42; death from inhaling illuminating gas; 112 N. Y. 472; 59 Ill. App. 297; 144 Pa. 79; 84 Va. 52; by taking poison; 133 Ill. 556; or an overdose of medicine; 44 Hun 599; 85 N. Y. 319; 105 Ind. 212; death caused by a piece of beef-steak passing into the windpipe while eating; 94 Ky. 547; death from blood-poisoning, caused by the bite of a mosquito (although poison was expressly excepted); 40 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 909; falling into the water as the result of a wound; 47 N. Y. 52; falling on a railroad track in a fit and being run over; 7 Q. B. Div. 216; being struck by the handle of a pitchfork while making hay and having peritonitis as a result of it; 69 Pa. 43; spraining the back while lifting a heavy weight; 1 F. & F. 505; being attacked and killed by a highwayman; 89 Ky. 300; 2 Bigelow, L. & Acc. Cas. 738; accidental shooting by a deputy sheriff who did not know at whom he was shooting and did not intend to kill the assured (there being an exception of death from design either of the insured or another person); 65 Mich. 545; hernia resulting from an accidental fall (although the policy excluded hernia); 17 C. B. N. s. 122; rupture of a blood-vessel sustained while exercising with Indian clubs; 8 Biss. 362; falling from the cars while walking in the sleep; 58 Wis. 13.

It has been strongly contended that such cases as those enumerated were not within the ordinary accident policy because there was no extraordinary injury according to the ordinary meaning of the term, but, in reply to this in a leading case of drowning, the court said: "That argument if carried to its extreme length would apply to every case where death was immediate;" 6 H. & N. 839; and in a case of death from the inhalation of gas, the court said: "We think it a sufficient answer that the gas in the atmosphere as an extraordinary cause was a violent agency in the sense that it worked on the intestate so as to cause his death; that death is the result of accident or is unnatural, imports the extraordinary and violent agency of the cause;" 112 N. Y. 472. The view which these courts considered untenable was, however, taken by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on a policy exactly similar. The court said: "The object of the company is to insure bodily injuries produced in a certain manner specified, that is, caused by external, violent, and accidental means; not injuries caused by any one of these means, but by all of them combined;" 102 Pa. 230; but this language seems to be a dictum, because there was a condition in the policy excepting death or injury caused by the taking of poison, and the point of the case was that an involuntary taking of poison by mistake was within the exception; but in a New York case of death from inhaling gas there was also a proviso excepting death caused by inhaling gas, and the court construed it "to mean a voluntary and intelligent act by the assured and not an involuntary and unconscious act;" 112 N. Y. 472. This case and the Pennsylvania case are therefore in direct opposition on the construction of the condition, and the former was decided after consideration of and with express dissent from the latter.

An exception that if the insured should die by his own hand, sane or insane, the policy should be void, "covers all conscious acts of the insured by which death by his own hand is compassed, whether he was at the time sane or insane, if the act was done for the purpose of self destruction, it matters not that the insured had no conception of the wrong involved in its performance;" 65 Mich. 199. In this case it was held that whether a fall six weeks before the insured shot himself was the cause of the killing was too conjectural to be submitted to the jury as a direct cause of the suicide. See CAUSA PROXIMA.

It has been held that death was not the result of accident within the meaning of the policy where it was occasioned by epilepsy; 31 Fed. Rep. 322; sunstroke; 3 El. & El. 478; rupture caused by jumping from a train where nothing unforeseen happened from the time the insured left the platform to the time he alighted on the ground; 34 Conn. 574; 131 U. S. 100.

Where the insured was assassinated, there could be no recovery under a policy which excepted death or injury inflicted by design of himself or another; 127 U. S. 661; 87 Ky. 300; but where the death was the result of an accident, the fact that the negligence of the assured may have contributed to it is no defence in the absence of an express stipulation in the policy to that effect; 24 Wis. 28; 32 Md. 310; 6 Lans. 71.

Accident policies usually cover the risk incident to a specific occupation, a substantial change of which will, if it increase the risk, render the policy void. Such a stipulation is held to mean engaging in another employment as a usual business; 49 Ill. 180; but it was not such a change for a school teacher while disengaged to be employed in building operations; id.; or for one to engage in pitching hay while visiting his grandfather; 69 Pa. 43; or for a locomotive engineer to climb over the tender to apply the brakes on a car; 32 Md. 310. In all such cases the question what is a substantial change of occupation is to be left to the jury; 34 N. J. L. 371.

The expression "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," used in stating the exceptions to the liability of an insurance company upon an accident policy, refers only to dangers of a real and substantial character which the insured recognized, but to which he, nevertheless, purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the same time to assume all the risks of the situation. Voluntary riding upon the platform of a rapidly moving railroad car is not, of itself and as a matter of law, a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger and presents a question of fact for the jury. Where an accident insurance policy exempts the insurer from liability for injuries received while violating rules of a corporation, the question is for the jury as to whether the insured knew of a rule of the corporation which he is alleged to have violated, and the court should charge that in order to bind insured, it must be one which the corporation enforced or used reasonable effort to enforce; 78 Fed. Rep. 754; opinion by Harlan, J., considering all the cases at length; and see 7 Am. L. Rev. 590, where the question whether death from freezing while climbing Mount Blanc was or was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger was discussed with reference to a case in which the point was raised but not settled, the suit being compromised.

In an exception prohibiting exposure to obvious or unnecessary danger and requiring due diligence on the part of the assured, there can be no recovery where death was caused by being struck by a railroad train while running along the tracks in front of it in the night-time for the purpose of getting on a train approaching in an opposite direction on a parallel track; 134 Mass. 175; nor where it was caused by falling from the platform of a railroad car between eleven and twelve o'clock at night when the train was in motion; 15 Blatchf. 216; or from unnecessarily passing on a dark and rainy night over a trestle known to be dangerous with two packages in his hands, although it was the usual route home of the assured and many others; 80 Ga. 541; or where a shop hand of a railway company went on the platform when the train was in motion to leave the train when it should stop to cross over by a switch to another track (the exception not being applicable to the exposure of railway employees in the performance of their duty); 41 Minn. 231; but where the insured by a voluntary act exposed himself to a hidden danger, the existence of which he had no reason to suspect, and thereby lost his life, his death was caused by accident and the company is liable; 102 Pa. 262; a clause prohibiting voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger does not prohibit one from walking or being on a railway bridge or road-bed; 74 Fed. Rep. 457; 39 N. Y. Supp. 912; see also where a passenger is overcome by the heat of the car, or nausea, and goes upon the platform; 39 Fed. Rep. 321; or getting from the platform at a depot upon the cars while in motion at a rate of speed less than that of a man walking; 24 Wis. 28; going to the rescue of a shipwrecked crew, although the policy prohibited the insured from engaging in the business of wrecking; 50 Hun 50; or by falling from the second story of a barn which the insured was having built, in consequence of the breaking of a joist having a secret defect; 34 N. J. L. 371.

The exception against death or injury happening while the insured was intoxicated, or in consequence thereof, prevents a recovery, without reference to the question whether the condition was the cause of the injury or not; 94 Ala. 434; 66 N. Y. 441; as, where the deceased, being under the influence of liquor, was killed by a pistol shot while dining with a friend; id. To be under the influence of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of such exception means to have drunk enough to disturb the action of the mental and physical faculties so that they are no longer in their normal condition; id.; the expression is equivalent to "intoxicated"; 94 Ala. 434.

Where the death was caused by inadvertently taking an overdose of opium which had been prescribed by a physician, it was held within the exception of any death caused wholly or in part by medical treatment for disease; 14 Blatchf. 143.

The question frequently arises what is total disability for which the policy entitles the insured to claim indemnity. In an English case in which this question was much discussed, it was held that a solicitor who had sprained his ankle while riding on horseback and was under the care of a surgeon for six weeks, unable to leave the house or transact business which could not be attended to in the house, but could write letters, read law, and the like while lying on a couch, was not totally disabled; 5 H. & N. 546. This judgment was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber. The provision in this and similar cases is usually for a weekly allowance in case of accident causing any bodily injury of so serious a nature as wholly to disable the insured from following his business. Under such a clause total disability to labor must be shown; 5 Lans. 71; by it is meant disability from doing substantially all kinds of the plaintiff's accustomed labor to some extent, and that the assured must be deprived of the power to do to any extent substantially all the kinds of his usual labor; 8 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 233; where the provision was for total disability there could be no recovery if the assured were able to do some parts of the accustomed work pertaining to his business or, if totally disabled in his own pursuit, he should be able to engage in some other; 46 Ia. 631.

Where the provision was that the injured must be "wholly disabled to prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," it was held error to instruct the jury that the defendant was to pay the amount agreed, if by the accident the plaintiff had been disabled in any way from prosecuting the business in which he was engaged, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for such time as he was "rendered wholly unable to do his accustomed labor, that is, to do substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent;" 67 Wis. 174. See, as to total disability, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 176.

It has been held that the meaning of the word accident, as used in a policy, is for the jury, as it is also to determine whether there was exposure to unnecessary danger; 50 Ill. App. 222; or whether the total loss of three fingers and a part of another on the same hand, destruction of the thumb, and a cutting of the hand is a loss of the hand causing "immediate, continuous, and total disability" within the meaning of that clause in an accident insurance policy; 61 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 292; and see 34 N. Y. Supp. 545, where the plaintiff's hand was cut off a short distance above the knuckles, leaving nearly the whole palm and part of the second joint of the thumb, and it was held to be a loss of the entire hand within the meaning of the policy; overruling 30 id. 881. See REPRESENTATION; ACT OF GOD.

A provision in a policy that the medical adviser of the insurer may examine the body of the insured or attend any post mortem examination which may be held, only authorizes examination of the body un-buried and does not warrant exhumation and autopsy, nor does an exception of injuries of which there is no visible mark; 11 Misc. Rep. 36.

See, generally, Cook, L. & Acc. Ins.; Niblack, Mut. Ben. & Acc. Insurance.

Casualty Insurance. A contract by which a person is indemnified against loss or damage to property, occasioned by accident. The term is thus applied in contradistinction to accident insurance by the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in 155 Mass. 404. The question was whether a foreign company licensed to do business in the state, but by statute restricted to one kind or class of business, was authorized to issue policies covering special classes of accidents, involving bodily injury and death. In this connection the court said: "The distinguishing feature of what is known in our legislation as 'accident insurance' is that it indemnifies against the effects of accidents resulting in bodily injury or death. Its field is not to insure against loss or damage to property, although occasioned by accident. So far as that class of insurance has been developed, it has been with reference to boilers, plate-glass, and perhaps to domestic animals and injuries to property by street cars, and is known as 'casualty insurance.'"

The distinction is founded in reason and the terminology is well adapted to the subject. Its precision is in sharp contrast to the vagueness and want of definiteness which characterize the references of text writers and judges to the various forms of insurance which have come into use with the increase in number of perils to life and property.

Among the perils covered by this kind of insurance are included: the loss of horses and cattle, theft of valuables, breakage of plate glass, loss by tornadoes or force of the elements, explosion or bursting of boilers, etc. These policies usually stipulate certain exceptions against which they will not insure, as fire and lightning; but such a policy was held to cover a loss by flood; 37 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 402.

A carrier may lawfully insure against liability for loss of goods occasioned by the negligence of a servant; 66 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 132; in such a case the liability of the insured becomes fixed on the happening of the accident, although the amount is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not yet been ascertained; 82 Md. 535.

A policy against loss or damage to property, and loss of life or injury to employees of the insured or other persons, payable to the insured or the benefit of such persons or their legal representatives, is a contract of indemnity, and a person who is injured by such explosion cannot sue the insurer; 4 N. Y. Supp. 450.

In a policy on live stock the insurer is estopped to deny that the sum named in the policy is the insurable value of the horse; 58 Ill. App. 557. Where the policy covering "two horses" was cancelled as to one, the insured may show that it was cancelled as to a mare covered by the policy; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1018. The provision for notice to the insurer by telegram, of the sickness of an animal, did not require such notice of a sickness which lasted only ten minutes and did not recur for seven weeks; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 215. Where the insured had given notes for the horse, and in his contract for purchase stipulated that in case of the death of the animal within a certain time the vendor should take the insurance and give up the notes, it was not a breach of the stipulation in the policy that the vendee "is the sole, absolute, and unconditional owner;" id. The insurer is not bound by the consent of his agent to kill the horse insured, although suffering from an incurable disease; 59 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1.

Where plate glass was insured and the insurer, exercising his option, employed a person with whom he had a contract for that purpose to replace it (the policy providing that the insured should when necessary remove any woodwork, gas fixtures, or other obstruction), the negligent removal of gas pipes by the contractor and a resulting explosion causing a breakage of the new glass, did not render the insurer liable; 38 N. Y. Supp. 773.

Credit Insurance. A contract by which the insured is indemnified against loss by the failure of his customers to pay for goods sold to them. It is insurance against excess loss by the insured, i. e. against a loss which is in excess of a specified percentage of gross sales. It usually limits the losses insured against to a fixed amount by reason of sales to any one person, and limits the sales, covered by the policy, to customers having at least a specified minimum commercial rating by a specified commercial agency.

The insured is frequently termed the "indemnified," and so referred to in the policy.

A contract by which a corporation, though called a guarantee or surety company, undertakes, in consideration of premiums paid, to indemnify the other party to such contract against losses of uncollectable debts, is not a contract of suretyship, but a policy of insurance; 73 Fed. Rep. 95; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528.

It is like any other insurance contract and is governed largely by the same rules; id. 63; id. 529; 41 id. 742; 132 N. Y. 540; 165 Mass. 501. It falls within the implied prohibition of a statute authorizing specified forms of insurance, against all not mentioned, and not being authorized by the Massachusetts Insurance Act it is invalid; id. The agent who solicits it is within the purview of a statute making him the agent of the insurer; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528.

There is a distinction between this loss and other kinds of insurance with respect to the value of the policy, which has been thus stated: The loss provable on a policy of insurance is ordinarily the reserve value of the policy, or the amount sufficient to re-insure the holder in a solvent company for the same amount, to be paid upon a loss happening on the same conditions and within the same time. Credit insurance is peculiar; there does not appear to be any reserve value to the policies, nor are there any general tables to show the rate of re-insurance, nor any other solvent company in which re-insurance could be obtained. When no losses occurred it may be assumed that the premium is a fair price for the risk, and the loss may be taken to be a proportionate part of the premium. When actual losses have been sustained after the insolvency and before the proof, these losses may be accepted as evidence of the value of the policy. 19 N. J. L. J. 18; s. c. 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 690.

Under a policy of indemnity to the insured, to the extent of $10,000, against losses in excess of one-fourth of one per cent. of their annual sales, twelve per cent. additional to be deducted from the total gross losses, the claim not to exceed $7,500, in any one firm, where there was a loss with one firm of $20,000, the total gross loss from which deductions were to be made was $7,500, and the balance was the indemnity to be paid; 164 Mass. 285.

A policy of credit insurance was terminated by the insolvency of the insured, and the deduction to be made before the "excess" was ascertained was calculated on the amount of sales made up to the time of insolvency and not on the amount stipulated for the term of the policy; 25 Ins. L. J. 842.

A provision in such a policy that amounts realized from other security or indemnity shall be deducted before the adjustment of a loss, does not entitle the insurer to deduct the proceeds of a policy in another company which provides that it shall not cover losses insured by the first company, but shall only attach when that company's policy is exhausted; 73 Fed. Rep. 81. One who is the agent of the insurer for the purpose of soliciting such insurance, transmitting applications, and collecting premiums, and who receives pay therefor, has power to make an additional agreement providing that if the customer is not rated in Dun's and is rated in Bradstreet's, the latter shall be binding on the insurer; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528; and to vary details of the policy as to credit rating; id.

Employer's Liability Insurance. A contract by which the company agrees to reimburse an employer for any loss occasioned by his liability for damages to an employe, injured in his service.

The liability of the insurer becomes fixed on the happening of the accident or casualty, even though the amount of such liability is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not been ascertained; 82 Md. 535.

Under a policy of insurance against damage for which the insured may be liable under an employer's liability act (q. v.) where the workman has recovered damages for injuries in a common-law action, and not under the statute, the insurer will not be liable to reimburse the amount so recovered; 16 Can. S. C., 4th ser. 212; but where the policy contained a clause agreeing to indemnify the insured against damages sustained by the employee while engaged in operations connected with the business of iron work, it was held to cover injuries received by reason of the construction of a building for the use of such business; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 46.

A policy which provides that the employer shall not settle with an employee without the consent of the insurer, who was to assume control of litigation, is a contract of indemnity against liability, and payment by the employer of a judgment recovered against him is not a condition precedent to the insurer's liability; id.; and a person who is injured cannot sue the insurer; 4 N. Y. Supp. 450. But where the insurer was prohibited from suing until after judgment against him, in which case an action might be brought within thirty days after such judgment, it was held that the contract was not one of indemnity merely, so that an action would lie after judgment was recovered against the employer, though it was paid by him, such payment not being a condition precedent to recovery; 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 353; nor is a discharge of liabilities by the insured, under a clause in the policy promising to pay "all damages with which the insured may be legally charged," such a contract being not one of indemnity alone, but also a contract to pay liabilities; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1051. When the insured was required to give immediate notice to the insurer upon the occurrence of an accident and notice of any claim on account of it, the notice under the condition is not required until an accident happens and the employer has received notice of a claim made on account thereof; 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 353.

Such a policy is in no sense a contract between the insurer and the employee, and any sum paid by the company to the employer on account of the death of an employee, whose widow had a right of action, is not an asset of the estate of the deceased; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ga.) 141.

It is generally provided in such policies that the insurer shall have control of the defence of any suits against the employer on claims covered by the insurance, and such a condition is strictly enforced; 15 Can. L. T. 86.

Fidelity Insurance. A contract to indemnify the insured against loss by reason of the default or dishonesty of the employee.

Bonds of indemnity given by fidelity insurance companies are analogous to ordinary policies of insurance, and are governed by the same principles of interpretation; 68 Fed. Rep. 459.

All conditions in the policy must be complied with as in other cases of insurance, and where one of them is the prosecution of the person whose action is insured against, before he can recover, against the insurer, it was held, by an equally divided court, that the insured must conform to this condition even if he thereby became liable to an action for damages; 9 Ins. L. J. 160.

A statement in the application as to the frequency of measures usually taken by the employer to secure the fidelity of the employed is a warranty the breach of which will defeat recovery; 28 Scot. L. Rep. 394; but in an application for insurance, declarations of the integrity of a clerk, in answer to questions which manifestly relate to the course of business of the employer, are mere representations and not warranties; 7 Exch. 744. Where the bond provides that answers made to questions asked in the application shall be warranties, and the answers are made on the employer's "best knowledge and belief," mere falsity of the answers is not sufficient to avoid the bond, but the company must show that they are "knowingly false;" 68 Fed. Rep. 459; and if such answers involved no misrepresentation or concealment, the contract could not be affected by loose parol statements, or concealment of facts about which no inquiry was made, or conduct on which no reliance was placed; 63 id. 48.

A representation that the person whose integrity is insured "has never been in arrears or default of his accounts" covers any which may have occurred prior to the time when he entered the service of the insured; 30 U. C. C. P. 360. To charge an embezzling employee with interest on the money embezzled converts the embezzlement into a debt and the insurer is not liable therefor; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 360.

Leaving money temporarily in an insecurely locked room when there were various means of safe-keeping available, was held a violation of a guarantee of "diligent and faithful performance of his duty," for which an insurer was liable; 6 Leg. N. (Can.) 311; 16 Can. L. J. 334. So allowing a customer to make an overdraft on a bank was held negligence in the bank's agent who permitted it, the agent and the customer being together involved in brokerage transactions; 7 Revue Legale 57; s. c. 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

Where the employer retains the employee in his service after he knows of the latter's dishonesty, and without notice to and assent of the insurer, he cannot recover; 71 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 261; but this rule will not apply to mere breaches of duty or contract obligation, not involving dishonesty of the servant or fraud and concealment on the part of the master; id.

The employee is bound to reimburse the insurer for the loss sustained through him; 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 351; but, upon the payment of a loss, the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the employer in the prosecution of dishonest employees; 22 Fed. Rep. 63, 639; as to any securities held with respect to the matter insured; 2 Vt. 518.

And a stipulation between the insurer and the employee that the evidence of payment by the insurer to the employer should be conclusive evidence against the employee as to the fact and extent of his liability to indemnify the insurer, is void as against public policy; id.

Where the indemnity was for one year, and it was provided that a claim under the bond or any renewal thereof should embrace only acts during its currency, it was held that each renewal was a separate contract, and the discovery, during the term of the renewal of theft committed during the running of the bond under a previous renewal, would not make the company liable therefor, when the discovery was too late to hold the insurer under the bond on the renewal in force when the thefts were committed; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 928; and when it was provided that any claim under the bond should cover only defaults committed during its currency, and within twelve months prior to its discovery, it was held that it did not cover a default committed more than twelve months prior to such discovery which would have occurred within the year but for the falsification of the books within the year preceding; 71 Fed. Rep. 116, reversing 67 id. 874.

In a recent federal decision on this subject, it was held (1) Where a policy stipulates for a notification of the dishonesty of the employee as soon as practicable after the occurrence of the act, and the evidence as to when the dishonesty was discovered was conflicting, the question what is a reasonable time is for the jury. (2) It is not necessary to give notice of suspicions of dishonesty. (3) The fact that the insured corporation has passed into the hands of a receiver will not absolve the insurer from liability. (4) Where proof of loss under the bond is set forth with reasonable plainness and in a manner which a person of ordinary intelligence cannot fail to understand, a failure to explicitly aver that a loss has been caused is immaterial. (5) The fact that one member of a corporation was cognizant of an employee's dishonesty, and that fraudulent collusion existed between them, cannot make the corporation responsible for a false certificate of character issued by him without the knowledge of other directors; 72 Fed. Rep. 470.

Guaranty Insurance. This term has sometimes been used to express indiscriminately the classes of insurance herein entitled Credit, Fidelity, and Title insurance, (q. v.). The latter designations are conceived to be better adapted to the subject-matter, and their employment is not only the better usage but undoubtedly leads to a clearer understanding of the varied subject-matter now involved in the law of insurance.

The expression "Guaranty Insurance" has, however, an extended use in England and Canada, and is there used to designate insurance of the integrity of employees, the phrase "policy of guaranty" being in frequent use by the courts; 7 Jur. N. S. 1109;

30 U. C. C. P. 360; 16 Can. L. J. 334; 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

The term is also used in a few English cases involving the guaranty of merchants against losses in business from the bankruptcy, insolvency, or assignment with preference of their customers; 7 H. & N. 5.

In an American case of a date long prior to the use of these modern forms of insurance, an action of debt was sustained upon a policy of insurance guaranteeing to the bearer the payment of a note, and it was held that there was authority to issue such a policy under charter powers such as were at that time conferred upon insurance companies generally, and it was also held that the policy passed by delivery; 8 G. & J. 166.

Title Insurance. A contract to indemnify the owner or mortgagee of real estate from loss by reason of defective titles, liens, or incumbrances.

Answers to questions in applications for such policies are held to amount to a warranty and the question of materiality cannot be raised; 50 Minn. 429.

Where a title insurance company undertook to defend the interest of insured in the premises against a lien, it was bound to protect him through all stages of the proceeding to enforce the lien, as well after as before judgment therein, or notify him that it could not do so, and furnish him necessary information of the status of the proceeding in time to enable him to protect himself; and if, after giving such notice, the company defended the proceeding, but thereafter abandoned the defence, it was necessary for it to give insured another such notice; 66 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 364.

Where an insurer agrees to indemnify a mortgagee against loss not exceeding $2,200 by reason of incumbrances, and to defend the land against such claims, a loss occurring by reason of the negligence of the insurer is not limited to the $2,200; 62 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 287.

Under a title insurance policy, the fact that the conveyancing was done, not by the insurer but by the conveyancer of the insured, was held no defence, and the right of the insurer to do conveyancing, draw deeds, write wills, or the like, was denied, and their action in assuming such right, unwarranted by their charter, was declared to be a usurpation on the commonwealth; 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 634.

In cases of defective title, or an incumbrance requiring removal, the insured would be entitled, in an action on the policy, to recover the costs and expenses incurred in curing the defect or removing the incumbrance; but in case of total loss of title the value of the property lost is the measure of damages, and where the insured had been compelled to pay more than the amount of the policy to get a good title, judgment was entered for that sum; id.

When the title was insured under a policy to the mortgagee and the latter bought in the property at a foreclosure sale, the purchase did not cancel the mortgage so as to annul the policy, but the insurer was liable to redeem the property from a sale under prior mechanic's liens; 70 Fed. Rep. 194.

See LIEN; MORTGAGE; TITLE; WARRANTY.

Insurance against Birth of Issue.

A form of insurance common in England by which the heir presumptive protects his interest against either the birth of an heir apparent or the attainment of majority, or to a particular age by an existing heir apparent. It is also and more commonly practised by tenants for life under settlements, who are entitled to reversions in fee simple subject to estates tail in their own issue by a particular marriage, and who, by this method, are enabled to mortgage their estates without burdening their life interests with premiums on life insurance. In this form of insurance the principal elements to consider are the age and the health of the party and the age at which women will cease to bear children. See Jac. Ch. 585, 586; 4 Hare 124; 5 De G. & S. 226; 10 Beav. 463; 19 id. 565; 12 Jur. 636; 17 id. 342.

INSURANCE AGENT. An agent for effecting insurance may be such by appointment or the recognition of his acts done as such; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1848; 4 Cow. 645. He may be agent for either of the parties to the policy, or for distinct purposes for both; 16 T. B. Monr. 252; 20 Barb. 68.

An insurance agent's powers may be more or less extensive according to the express or implied stipulations and understandings between him and his principals. They may be for filling up and issuing policies signed in blank by his principals, for transmitting applications to his principals filled up by himself, as their agent or that of the applicant, for receiving and transmitting premiums, for adjusting and settling losses, or granting liberties and making new stipulations, or for any one or more of these purposes; 19 N. Y. 305; 25 Conn. 53, 465, 542; 12 La. 122; 37 N. H. 35; 12 Md. 348; 1 Grant, Cas. 472; 23 Pa. 50, 72; 26 id. 50; 82 Tex. 631; 23 Or. 576.

A general agent is one who represents the insurer in the conduct of the business generally in a particular place or territory. The powers of the general agent are thus stated by Dwight, Com., in 65 N. Y. 6, "It is clear that a person authorized to accept risks, to agree upon and settle the terms of insurance, and carry them into effect by issuing and renewing policies, must be regarded as the general agent of the company. (43 Barb. 351.) The possession of blank policies and renewal receipts, signed by the president and secretary, is evidence of a general agency. (40 Barb. 292.) The power of such an agent of a stock company is plenary as to the amount and nature of the risk, the rate of premium, and generally as to the terms and conditions, and he may make such memoranda and indorsements, modifying the general provisions of the policy, and even inconsistent therewith, as in his discretion seems proper, before the policy is delivered, and in some cases even afterward. (May, Ins. 129.) He may also insert, by memorandum or indorsement, a description of the property inconsistent with the description of the same contained in the application, and such change will be effectual to protect the insured, although the policy itself provides that all conditions named in the application are to be fully complied with and that the application shall be a part of the policy, and a warranty on the part of the insured. (May, Ins. 129; 5 Gray 497.)"

An agent holding a commission from an insurance company authorizing him to take risks generally, without placing any limitation thereon, either as to the kinds of risks or as to the territory within which they may be, is a general agent; and the fact that the policy provides that, in any matter relating to the insurance, no person shall be deemed the agent of the company unless authorized in writing, and that the agent's commission states that he shall be subject to the rules of the company, and to such instructions as may be given him from time to time, do not impose on one dealing with the agent a duty to ascertain his authority to issue a policy on a risk extra-hazardous and located in a place other than the town in which is situated the agent's office; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 41.

The resident agent of an insurance company having general authority to issue policies and renewals, fix rates and accept risks, collect premiums and cancel insurance, and perform all the duties of a recording agent, is a general agent for the locality; 56 Ill. App. 629. If the agent acts as such for both the company and the insured the contract may be avoided by either party who, at the time of the contract, did not know of such business agency for the other party or had, not knowing the facts, ratified it; 40 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 147.

When an insurance agent solicited business in an adjoining state, assumed to act with full authority, received the premium and issued the policy, he may be considered as a general agent and not a special agent without authority to make the contract; 32 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 683.

It was held in a recent federal case that before the execution of a policy, the power and authority of a local and soliciting agent are co-extensive with the business intrusted to his care, and his positive knowledge as to material facts and his acts and declarations within the scope of his employment are obligatory on his principal, unless restricted by limitations well known to the other party at the time of the transaction; 74 Fed. Rep. 114.

The powers of agents were extensively discussed by the Kansas supreme court, which said:

"The bulk of the fire insurance business of the state is done by eastern companies, who are represented here by agents." "It is a matter of no small moment therefore that the exact measure and limit of the powers of these agents be understood. All the assured knows about the company is generally through the agent. All the information as to the powers of, and limitations upon, the agent is received from him. Practically, the agent is the principal in the making of the contract. It seems to us therefore that the rule may be properly thus laid down that an agent authorized to issue policies of insurance and consummate the contract binds his principal by every act, agreement, representation, or waiver, within the ordinary scope and limit of insurance business which is not known by the insured to be beyond the authority granted to the agent; 43 Kan. 497; s. c. 23 Pac. Rep. 637; and it was held in that case that an insurance company might, through its agents, by a parol contract, waive provisions stated in the policy with reference to the manner of altering or waiving its terms and conditions; 33 Mich. 143; the court, in considering the question whether an agent of a company might change by parol the conditions of a policy wherein it was provided that it could only be done upon the consent of the company written thereon, held that a written bargain is of no higher legal degree than a parol one. "Either may vary or discharge the other, and there can be no more force in an agreement in writing not to agree by parol than in a parol agreement not to agree in writing. Every such agreement is ended by the new one which contradicts it;" 11 Kan. 533; 49 Kan. 78.

"Where insurance companies deal with the community through a local agency, persons having transactions with the company are entitled to assume, in the absence of knowledge as to the agent's authority, that the acts and declarations of the agent are valid as if they proceeded directly from the company;" 20 Or. 547.

An attempted restriction upon the power of the officer or agents, acting within the scope of their general authority, to waive provisions of the policy, unless such waiver is written upon the policy itself, is ineffectual; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 742.

A provision in the application or in the policy making the person procuring the application the agent of the insured and not of the company, cannot change the legal status of such person as agent of the company or the law of agency if he is in fact the agent of the company; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 733.

A broker was held to be the agent of the company where he solicited applications which were sent by him to the agent, by whom policies were sent to the broker and the premiums were charged to the broker; in such case the finding by the jury that the broker was the duly authorized agent of the company within the meaning of the provisions in the policy requiring payments of the premiums to the company or its duly authorized agent within a certain time, will not be disturbed; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 515. In the absence of direct proof of the broker's authority to act for the insurer or insured he may establish his agency by showing that the act relied on was within the scope of his authority; 34 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 373. Where insurance is procured through a broker, though at his solicitation, he is the agent of the insured and his acts will not bind the company, but when his employment extends only to the procurement of the policy he ceases to be an agent of the insured on the execution and delivery; id. A broker employed by a firm of insurance agents to solicit business on commission, having a desk in their office, is not such an agent as that notice to him by a policy holder is notice to the firm; 49 Hun 610; and one is a mere broker who only represented the company in a single transaction and whose name did not appear on the policy, though he may have told the insurer that he represented the company, collected the premiums, and delivered the policy; 54 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1117.

An agent has no power to delegate his authority so as to impose a liability on the company; 15 Can. L. T. 49; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 931.

But an insurance company is bound by the acts of a clerk of its agent in accepting risks and issuing policies against the same in the performance of his duties, and one dealing with the clerk, as such, is not bound to inquire into his authority as to those matters; id.

An agent's solicitor who took applications on which policies were issued has been held the agent of the company in effecting such insurance; 31 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 868.

It has been held that a general agent (appointed by contract in this case) had power to waive cash payments of premiums and extend credit; 66 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 445; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1051; to receive notice of loss; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 286; waive proofs of loss; 2 Mo. App. Rep. 1375; 99 Mo. 50; contra, 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 635. An agent who has power to adjust losses may by parol waive formal proofs of loss; 40 N. Y. Supp. 300. He cannot waive the iron safe clause, when that authority is expressly withheld from him by the policy; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 955. He can insure goods subject to chattel mortgage by indorsement on, or annexation to, the policy, though it is forbidden in the printed conditions; 40 N. Y. Supp. 300. Local agents cannot bind the company by consenting to vacancies; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 583; or that insurance on a risk, not usually taken by the company should take effect from the application (nor will it matter that a special agent, having no power to contract, was present and approved); 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 298.

An agent, during the continuance of his agency, may at any time, even after loss, correct a policy issued by him by inserting the property included in the contract but omitted by mistake from the policy; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 577. The agent of a company, whose authority has been revoked by the execution by it of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, has thereafter no authority to cancel policies and pay rebates or to set off rebates against a claim by the assignee for premiums collected; 35 N. Y. Supp. 612. The agent is liable for failure to cancel policy when directed to do so; 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 320; and when directed to cancel or reinsure a risk cannot reinsure in another company for which he is agent without its assent; 138 N. Y. 446.

It was held that a lodge officer who receives money for dues to the corporation does so as agent and must pay it over to the company. He cannot return it to those from whom it was collected because he fears that his principal may not be able to perform the contract; 52 Leg. Int. 473.

Notice to an agent of matters within his commission is such to the company; 16 Barb. 159; 1 E. L. & Eq. 140; 6 Gray 14; 50 Kan. 449; 111 N. C. 45; 142 N. Y. 382. See May, Ins. Ch. v.

The insurer has been held bound or estopped by the knowledge or action of or notice to the agent in the following cases: By his knowledge of foreclosure proceedings; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 742; of the existence of a mortgage, and his attaching a clause making the loss payable to the mortgagee; 18 So. Rep. (Miss.) 414; of a chattel mortgage; 149 N. Y. 477; of incumbrance; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 125; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 719; 40 N. Y. Supp. 300; where the agent is informed as to incumbrances and fills out the application, describing the property as not incumbered; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 733; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 731; where the agent, having power to issue and cancel policies, allowed a policy to remain in force after notice of an incumbrance; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 810; where the application stated that no other company had refused to insure, and the agent had notice to the contrary; id.; where the agent incorrectly stated the title of the insured, after being correctly informed thereof; 44 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 756; where the agent was acquainted with premises of the insured and could have made an accurate description through his knowledge of them, the company is estopped to avoid its obligation by showing a mis-description of the property; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 146. Where the insured makes true answers to the questions in an application, the validity of the insurance is not affected by the falsity of the answers inserted by the agent; 37 N. Y. Supp. 146; 17 Misc. Rep. 115; 173 Pa. 16. In such case he will be regarded as the agent of the company, and not of the applicant and his knowledge of the falsity of the answer will be imputed to the company; 25 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 333. The company is not estopped by the agent's knowledge when that is acquired by him by virtue of his relation as attorney for the insured in a transaction with which the company was not connected; 71 Fed. Rep. 473; or when the knowledge of the agent is acquired after the issuance of the policy; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 577; 77 Fed. Rep. 114. Or where the notice was to one of a firm of insurance agents, another member of which issued the policy in suit and was given several months before the policy was applied for; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 829; and it was held that when the policy provided that no agent could stipulate for a modification of its provisions not brought to the knowledge of his principal officer, knowledge of the general superintendent that material statements in the application were false was not knowledge of the company; 66 Conn. 227. See, generally, an extended discussion and collection of cases on the authority of insurance agents, 34 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 654; WARRANTY.

INSURANCE COMPANY. A company which issues policies of insurance,—an incorporated company, and either a stock company, a mutual one, or a mixture of the two. In a stock company, the members or stockholders pay in a certain capital which is liable for the contracts of the company. In a mutual company, the members are themselves the parties insured; in other words, all the members contribute premiums to the fund, which is liable for indemnity to each member for loss, according to the terms of the contract. In the mixed class, certain members, who may or may not be insured, contribute a certain amount of the capital, for which they hold certificates of shares, and are entitled to interest on the same at a stipulated rate, or to an agreed share of the surplus receipts, after the payment of losses and expenses, to be estimated at certain periods.

There are in some states companies formed upon the plan combining a stock capital with mutual insurance and issuing both bonds of mutual insurance and stock policies based upon the capital.

In New York it has been held that, under the statutes then in force regulating the formation of insurance companies and their organization, they could not be organized upon this plan so as to accept premium notes from some customers and cash premiums from others and assess the premium notes to pay losses in either branch of the business; 28 Barb. 576. See also 16 N. Y. 310.

Beneficial societies are sometimes held to be insurance companies within the meaning of the statutes regulating such companies; 46 Fed. Rep. 439; and see 72 Mo. 146; 105 Mass. 149; 32 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 787; 118 Ill. 492. In Iowa it is said that where the main purpose of an order is that of life insurance, and insurance against sickness and disability, whatever purposes it may have, it is amenable to the laws of that state relating to insurance companies; it therefore must comply with the requirements of the statutes of that state (if the order is organized under the laws of another state), as to foreign insurance companies, before it can do business in that state; 78 Ia. 747. But in Wisconsin an association incorporated for the purpose of fraternal benevolent insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan was a charitable and benevolent order within the meaning of the statute which, in line with the defined policy of the state, was exempted from the general laws relating to life insurance; 75 Wis. 332. In Pennsylvania a foreign mutual aid association of the same character was held not liable for violation of the laws regulating insurance companies; 94 Pa. 481; and the same association was held not to be a mutual insurance company in Ohio, the state of its incorporation; 26 Ohio 19; so in many other states such associations are held not to be insurance companies within the purview of the general insurance laws of the state; 35 Kan. 51; 82 Ky. 102; 59 Ia. 125; 90 Ill. 166; 62 How. Pr. 386; 142 Mass. 224; 4 Mo. App. 429; 72 Mich. 603; 50 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1028. In Pennsylvania it was explicitly decided that an association organized not to do business for profit or gain but to aid pecuniarily the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of its members, is not an insurance company; 154 Pa. 99.

INSURANCE POLICY. See POLICY.

INSURED. A person whose life or property interest is covered by a policy of insurance. See INSURANCE.

INSURER. The underwriter in a policy of insurance; the party agreeing to make compensation to the other. Sometimes applied improperly to denote the party insured. See INSURANCE.

INSURGENTS. Rebels contending in arms against the government of their country who have not been recognized by other countries as belligerents. Insurgents have no standing in international law until recognized as belligerents. When recognized as belligerents the rules relating to contraband and other rules of war apply to them, but until so recognized their acts are merely the acts of individuals which may be piracy or any other crime according to the circumstances. The United States and other countries have statutes regulating dealings with insurgents in other countries and filibustering expeditions, as they are called, and expeditions to supply insurgents with arms and ammunition are forbidden; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 132.

In general insurgents have no belligerent rights. Their war vessels are not received in foreign ports, they cannot establish blockades which third powers will respect, and they must not interfere with the commerce of other nations. In the older books on international law they were usually treated as pirates. Their hostilities are never regarded as legal war. As late as 1885 in The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. Rep. 408, this subject was discussed and the authorities fully reviewed, and it was held that the liability of a vessel to seizure as piratical, turned wholly on the question whether the insurgents had obtained any previous recognition of belligerent rights, either from their own or any other government. The court only refrained from entering a decree of forfeiture of the vessel, as a pirate, because of an implied recognition of the insurgents as belligerents, contained in a letter of the secretary of state of the date of the seizure. In recent years, however, a certain amount of recognition has been accorded to insurgents. In 1894, when insurgents were bombarding Rio Janeiro, Admiral Benham took the position that American merchant vessels, moving about the harbor and discharging cargoes, did so at their own risk. But any attempt on the part of the insurgents to prevent legitimate movements of our merchant vessels at other times was not to be permitted. Of this official action it has been said: "This establishment of this point, which seemed to be the logical outcome of recent practice, almost recognizes an imperfect status, or right of action afloat, for insurgents;" Snow, Lect. Int. L. 25.

In U. S. v. Trumbull, 48 Fed. Rep. 99, it was held that insurgents may purchase arms in the United States without violating U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5283, provided the arms are not designed to constitute any part of the furnishings or fittings of the vessel which carries them. This case was a prosecution in connection with the Itata which was also libelled for forfeiture by the United States. There was much discussion as to the meaning of the word "people" as used in the statute. It had been previously said to be one of the denominations of a foreign power; 6 Pet. 467; and that a vessel could not be said to be in the service of a foreign people, etc., unless they had received recognition as belligerents; 37 Fed. Rep. 800; the case of The Salvador, L. R. 3 C. P. 218, cited to the contrary, is distinguishable as resting on the broader provisions of the English foreign enlistment act; but in the Itata case the question was not raised by the facts, and it was simply held that the neutrality laws did not cover the case of a vessel which receives arms and munitions of war, in this country, with intent to carry them to a party of insurgents in a foreign country, but not with intent that they shall constitute any part of the fittings or furnishings of the vessel herself; and that she could not be condemned as piratical on the ground that she is in the employ of an insurgent party, which has not been recognized by our government as having belligerent rights; 56 Fed. Rep. 505, aff. 49 id. 646. See also 5 Wall. 62; 6 id. 91; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 135.

In The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, the vessel was seized for a violation of U. S. Rev. St. § 5283, and was released by the district court upon the ground, inter alia, that the libel did not show that the vessel was fitted out and armed with intent that it should "be employed in the service of a foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace." The libel was amended so as to read "in the service of a certain people, to wit, certain people then engaged in armed resistance to the government of the King of Spain, in the island of Cuba." The district court held that the word "people" was used in an individual and personal sense and not as an organized and recognized political power in any way corresponding to a state, prince, colony, or district. The supreme court reversed the decree, holding that the vessel had been invidiously released, and that the word "people" in the statute covers any insurgent or insurrectionary body conducting hostilities, although its belligerency has not been recognized; and although the political department of the government had not recognized the existence of a de facto belligerent power engaged in hostility with Spain, it had recognized the existence of insurrectionary warfare, and the case sharply illustrated the distinction between recognition of belligerency, and of a condition of political revolt. See BELLIGERENCY.

INSURRECTION. A rebellion of citizens or subjects of a country or state against its government.

Any open and active opposition of a number of persons to the executive of the laws of the United States, of so formidable a character as to defy, for the time being, the authority of the government, constitutes an insurrection, even though not accompanied by bloodshed and not of sufficient magnitude to make success possible; 62 Fed. Rep. 828.

As to the distinctions involved in the several words used to express organized resistance to governmental authority, see REBELLION.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 8, gives power to congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the state, or states, most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders, for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, on application of the legislature of such state, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), to call forth such number of the militia of any other state or states, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection; U. S. Rev. Stat. pp. 287, 1029.

Whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth the militia of such state, or of any other state or states, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of congress.

Whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the president, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the president shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5300.

The president may declare by proclamation whenever the inhabitants of any state or part thereof are found by him to be in a state of insurrection, that such inhabitants are in a state of insurrection against the United States and thereupon all commercial intercourse between them and the citizens of the United States shall be unlawful and shall cease so long as such condition of hostility continues, and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise coming from such state or section into other parts of the United States or proceeding from other parts of the United States to such state or section together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same shall be forfeited to the United States; but commercial intercourse may, in the discretion of the president, be permitted and licensed with loyal persons residing in such insurrectionary section, so far as to supply such persons with necessities; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5300-5304.

Capital cases for insurrection by a citizen of the United States against the government of any foreign countries having treaties with the United States may be tried before the minister of the United States in such country; id. § 4090. See INSURGENTS.

INTAKERS. In English Law. The name given to receivers of goods stolen in Scotland, who take them to England. 9 Hen. V. c. 27.

INTEGER (Lat.). Whole; untouched. Res integra means a question which is new and undecided. 2 Kent 177.

INTEMPERATE. If the habit is to drink to intoxication whenever occasion offers, and sobriety or abstinence is the exception, then the charge of intemperate habits is established, and it is not necessary that this custom should be an everyday rule; 63 Ala. 152. See 76 Ill. 213; 9 R. I. 355. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD; DRUNKENNESS.

INTENDANT. One who has the charge, management, or direction of some office, department, or public business.

INTENDED TO BE RECORDED. This phrase is frequently used in conveying, in deeds which recite other deeds which have not been recorded. In Pennsylvania, it has been construed to be a covenant, on the part of the grantor, to procure the deed to be recorded in a reasonable time; 2 Rawle 14.

INTENDENTA. In Spanish Law. The immediate agent of the minister of finance, or the chief and principal director of the different branches of the revenue, appointed in the various departments in each of the provinces of the Spanish monarchy. See Escriche, Intendente.

INTENDMENT OF LAW. The true meaning, the correct understanding, or intention, of the law; a presumption or inference made by the courts. Co. Litt. 78.

It is an intendment of law that every man is innocent until he is proved to be guilty; see PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE; that every one will act for his own advantage; that every officer acts in his office with fidelity; that the children of a married woman, born during the coverture, are the children of the husband. See BASTARDY. Many things are intended after verdict, in order to support a judgment; but intendment cannot supply the want of certainty in a charge in an indictment for a crime: 5 Co. 121. See Com. Dig. Pleader (C 25), (S 31); Dane, Abr. Index; 14 Viner, Abr. 449; 1 Halt. Ch. N. J. 132.

INTENT. See COMMON INTENT.

INTENTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The formal complaint or claim of a plaintiff before the praetor. "Reus exceptionem velut intentionem implet:" id est, reus in exceptionem actor est. The defendant makes up his plea as if it were a declaration; i. e. the defendant is plaintiff in the plea.

In Old English Law. A count or declaration in a real action (narratio). Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 2, c. 2; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 7; Du Cange.

INTENTION. A design, resolve, or determination of the mind.

In Criminal Law. To render an act criminal, a wrongful intent must exist; 1 Leach 280; 7 C. & P. 428; Paine 16; 2 McLean 14; 2 Ind. 207; 30 Me. 132; 1 Rice 145; 4 Harring. 315; 19 Vt. 564; 3 Dev. 114; 90 N. C. 741. And with this must be combined a wrongful act; as mere intent is not punishable; 9 Co. 81 a; 2 C. & P. 414; 2 Mass. 133; 2 B. Monr. 417; 10 Vt. 353; 1 Dev. & B. 121; Gilp. 306; 5 Cra. 311; but see Jebb 48 n.; R. & R. 308; 1 Lew. Cr. Cas. 42; and generally, perhaps always, the intent and act must concur in point of time; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 207; Cl. Cr. L. 45, 238, 265; but a wrongful intent may render an act otherwise innocent criminal; 1 C. & K. 600; C. & Marsh. 236; 2 Allen 181; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 255; 6 Conn. 9; 22 id. 153.

Generally, where any wrongful act is committed, the law will infer conclusively that it was intentionally committed; 2 Gratt. 594; 4 Ga. 14; 2 Allen 179; 103 N. Y. 360; as the intent to take life may be inferred from the character of the assault, the use of a deadly weapon and the attendant circumstances; 94 Ala. 85; 82 Wis. 571; and also that the natural, necessary, and even probable consequences were intended; 3 Maule & S. 11, 15; 5 C. & P. 539; 3 Wash. C. C. 515; 13 Wend. 87; 3 Pick. 304; 2 Gratt. 594; 1 Bay 245; 9 Humphr. 66; 1 Ov. 305; 98 U. S. 67.

Generally speaking, when a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge, ignorance of fact is no defence; 118 Mass. 441; L. R. 2 C. C. 154; 56 Mo. 546; see 41 N. J. L. 552; contra, 32 Ohio St. 456; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 614, where the subject is fully treated. See IGNORANCE.

When by the common law, or by the provision of a statute, a particular intention is essential to an offence, or a criminal act is attempted but not accomplished, and the evil intent only can be punished, it is necessary to allege the intent with distinct-ness and precision, and to support the allegations with proof. On the other hand, if the offence does not rest merely in tendency, or in an attempt to do a certain act with a wicked purpose, but consists in doing an unlawful or criminal act, the evil intention will be presumed, and need not be alleged, or, if alleged, it is a mere formal averment, which need not be proved; Bigelow, C. J., 2 Allen 180. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 283; 6 East 474; 5 Cush. 306; 153 U. S. 603; 93 N. C. 516.

This proof may be of external and visible acts and conduct from which the jury may infer the fact; 8 Co. 146; or it may be by proof of an act committed, as, in case of burglary with intent to steal, proof of burglary and stealing is conclusive; 5 C. & P. 510; 9 id. 729; 2 Mood. & R. 40. When a man intending one wrong fails, and accidentally commits another, he will, except where the particular intent is a substantive part of the crime, be held to have intended the act he did commit; 13 Wend. 159; 21 Pick. 515; 1 Gall. 624; 1 C. & K. 746; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 272.

Where intent is a material ingredient of the crime it is necessary to be averred, but it may always be averred in general terms; 153 U. S. 584, 608.

In Contracts. An intention to enter into the contract is necessary: hence the person must have sufficient mind to enable him to intend.

In Wills and Testaments. The intention of the testator governs unless the thing to be done be opposed to some unbending rule of law; 6 Cruise, Dig. 295; 6 Pet. 68. This intention is to be gathered from the instrument, and from every part of it; 3 Ves. 105; 53 N. H. 511; 23 W. Va. 166; 103 Ill. 607; 128 Mass. 374; 60 Ala. 605; and from a later clause in preference to an earlier; 74 Me. 413; 94 Ill. 158; 62 Ala. 510. See WILLS; CONSTRUCTION.

As to statutes, see INTERPRETATION; CONSTRUCTION; STATUTES.

INTENTIONE. A writ that lay against him who entered into lands after the death of a tenant in dower, or for life, etc., and held out to him in reversion or remainder. Fitz. N. B. 203.

INTER ALIA (Lat.). Among other things: as, "the said premises, which, inter alia, Titius granted to Caius."

INTER ALIOS (Lat.). Between other parties, who are strangers to the proceeding in question.

INTER APICES JURIS. See APEX JURIS.

INTER CÆTEROS. Among others; in a general clause; not by name (nomina-tim). A term applied in the civil law to clauses of disinheritance in a will. Inst. 2, 13, 1; id. 2, 13, 3.

INTER CANEM ET LUPUM (Lat. between the dog and the wolf). The twilight; because then the dog seeks his rest, and the wolf his prey. Co. 3d Inst. 63.

INTER PARTES (Lat. between the parties). A phrase signifying an agreement professing in the outset, and before any stipulations are introduced, to be made between such and such persons: as, for example, "This indenture, made the — day of —, 1848, between A B of the one part, and C D of the other." It is true that every contract is in one sense inter partes, because to be valid there must be two parties at least; but the technical sense of this expression is as above mentioned; Addison, Contr. 9.

This being a solemn declaration, the effect of such introduction is to make all the covenants comprised in a deed to be covenants between the parties and none others: so that should a stipulation be found in the body of a deed by which "the said A B covenants with E F to pay him one hundred dollars," the words "with E F" are inoperative, unless they have been used to denote for whose benefit the stipulation may have been made, being in direct contradiction with what was previously declared, and C D alone can sue for the non-payment; it being a maxim that where two opposite intentions are expressed in a contract, the first in order shall prevail; 8 Mod. 116; Rolle 196; 7 M. & W. 63. But this rule does not apply to simple contracts inter partes; 2 D. & R. 277; 3 id. 273.

When there are more than two sides to a contract inter partes, for example, a deed, as, when it is made between A B of the first part, C D of the second, and E F of the third, there is no objection to one covenanting with another in exclusion of the third. See 5 Co. 182; 8 Taunt. 245; 4 Q. B. 207.

INTER SE, INTER SESE (Lat.). Among themselves. Story, Partn. § 405.

INTER-STATE LAW. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; COMMERCE; Rorer, Int. St. Law; 10 Am. L. Reg. N.S. 416.

INTER VIVOS (Lat.). Between living persons; as a gift inter vivos, which is a gift made by one living person to another. It is a rule that a fee cannot pass by grant or transfer inter vivos, without appropriate words of inheritance. 2 Pres. Est. 64. See DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS; GIFTS.

INTERCALARE. In the Civil Law. To introduce or insert among or between others; to introduce a day or month into the calendar; to intercalate. Dig. 50, 16, 98, pr.

INTERCEDERE. In the Civil Law. To become bound for another's debt.

INTERCHANGEABLY. By way of exchange or interchange. This term properly denotes the method of signing deeds, leases, contracts, etc., executed in duplicate, where each party signs the copy he delivers to the others.

INTERCOMMON. To enjoy a right of common mutually with the inhabitants of a contiguous town, vill, or manor. When the commons of two adjacent manors join, and the inhabitants of both have immemorially fed their cattle promiscuously on each other's common, this is called intercommoning. 2 Bla. Com. 33; Termes de la Ley.

INTERDICT. In Civil Law. The formula according to which the prætor ordered or forbade anything to be done in a cause concerning true or quasi possession until it should be decided definitely who had a right to it. But in modern civil law it is an extraordinary action, by which a summary decision is had in questions of possession or quasi possession. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1287. Interdicts are either prohibitory, restitutory, or exhibitory; the first being a prohibition, the second a decree for restoring possession lost by force, the third a decree for the exhibiting of accounts, etc.; id. 1290; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 252; Dig. 4, 15, 2. It is said by the writers of the Institutes that some (including Gaius) thought that from the true etymology of the word interdict, it should be applied only to prohibitory orders, and that those which were restitutory or exhibitory were properly decreta, but that "the usage has obtained of calling them all interdicts as they are pronounced between two parties, inter duos dicuntur;" id. Interdicts were decided by the prætor without the intervention of a judex, differing in this from actions (actiones).

According to Isidorus, however, the derivation is from quod interim dicitur. See Voc. Jur. Utr.; Sand. Just. 489; MacKeldey, Civ. Law §§ 258-64. In the formulary procedure the interdict was preliminary and conservative, and afterwards made final or not according to the result of the litigation. After the disappearance of this procedure, as a recent writer says, "no doubt the remedies remained by the forms of action which succeeded. Some of the most important of these were really injunctions, either prohibitory or mandatory." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 253. Like an injunction, the interdict was merely personal in its effects; and it had also another similarity to it, by being temporary or perpetual. Dig. 43. 1. 1, 3, 4. This similitude prompts the suggestion by the author last quoted, that "it is easy to perceive how they may have been adopted from the Roman and Canon law into the equity practice of England, and thence into that of America;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 254. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 865; Halifax, Anal. ch. 6. See INJUNCTION.

In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical censure, by which divine services are prohibited either to particular persons or particular places. These tyrannical edicts, issued by ecclesiastical powers, have been abolished in England since the reformation, and were never known in the United States. See 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 340. Baptism was allowed during an interdict; but the eucharist was denied, except in the article of death, and burial in consecrated ground was denied, unless without divine offices. For the ancient form of an interdict, see Tomlin's L. Diet. h. t.

INTERDICTION. A prohibition of commercial intercourse between the citizens or subjects of the country enacting or proclaiming it and some other specified country or port.

By act of March 1, 1809, congress interdicted commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, and in a case arising under this act, the United States supreme court held that the term interdiction means an entire cessation, for the time being, of all trade whatever.

It has been held in England and in this country that interdiction of commerce with the port of destination is not a loss within a policy of marine insurance; 11 East 22; 6 Wheat. 176; 3 Mas. 6; contra, 4 Dall. 417; 9 East 283; 3 Wheat. 183; 12 S. & R. 440; 1 Wash. C. C. 382. See 3 Kent 293.

In Civil Law. A judicial decree, by which a person is deprived of the exercise of his civil rights.

The condition of the party who labors under this incapacity.

There can be no voluntary interdiction, as erroneously stated by some writers: the status of every person is regulated by the law, and can in no case be affected by contract.

Interdiction is the civil law proceeding by which, as by inquisition in lunacy (q. v.) under English and American law, a person is found to be incapable of the management of himself and his estate. It is devised for the special protection of the rights and persons of those who are unable to administer them themselves, and although the person interdicted is not permitted to exercise his legal rights, he is by no means deprived of their enjoyment. These rights are exercised for his benefit by a curator, who is held to a strict accountability, and the fidelity of whose administration is secured, in most cases, by a bond of security, and always by a tacit mortgage on all his property.

By the law of the twelve tables, prodigals alone could be interdicted. Curators were appointed for those afflicted with mental aberration, idiocy, or incurable diseases, qui perpetuo morbo laborant; but no decree of interdiction was pronounced against them. By the modern civil law, prodigality and profligacy are not sufficient reasons for interdiction; but whenever a person is prostrated, either by mental or physical disease, to such a degree as to be permanently disabled from administering his estate, he may be interdicted.

A decree of interdiction can be pronounced only by the court having jurisdiction of the domicile of the person to be affected. The causes assigned are imbecility, insanity, and madness.

The application may be by any relative, or wife or husband; or, in case of madness, the public law officer must apply, or in case of imbecility or insanity he may do so. The proceeding is by petition; the acts relied on are stated in writing; and the opinion of the family council is taken, the petitioners not participating. The judgment must be given at a public sitting, and, pending the proceedings, temporary administration may be provided for. Even if the application is rejected, the person against whom the proceedings are taken may be forbidden to go to law, compromise, borrow, receive payment of capital or give discharges, conveyances, or mortgages without advice of counsel appointed by the same judgment.

An appeal is provided, and there may be another examination. The decree must be duly served and recorded, and posted in the tribunal of birth. From the day of judgment all acts are void, and it may have a retroactive effect, by which previous acts are annulled.

After death a person's sanity can only be attacked if he has been interdicted, unless the insanity result from the act questioned.

A guardian or curator is appointed, as in case of minors, to which it is by statute assimilated; the husband for his wife, as of right; the wife may be appointed for her husband, in which case the family council regulate the manner of administration.

No one is compelled to act as guardian for more than ten years. The income must be used primarily to better the condition of the interdicted person. If his child marry, the family council fix the dowry. Interdiction ceases with the causes which made it necessary, and it may be withdrawn by proceedings similar to those by which it was obtained.

Such are substantially the rules on the subject of interdiction found in the law of Louisiana; Civ. Code, Tit. ix. Art. 389-426, and the French Code, Art. 489-512, Cashard's translation. They are substantially the same in all the modern codes having the civil law for their basis.

In Louisiana it has been held that mental weakness is not sufficient unless interdiction be necessary for protection of person or property; 31 La. Ann. 757; the motives of the party applying should be fully investigated; 29 id. 302; trial by jury cannot be demanded and judgment may be at chambers; 38 id. 523; a non-resident cannot be interdicted; 32 id. 679; testimony of experts does not control the court and is of little weight when they had seen defendant only once; 31 id. 757; and opinions of non-experts are of little weight; they should state facts; 36 id. 563; costs of proceeding to interdict a wife, include fees of her lawyers, and are a debt of the community; 30 id. 336.

A judge may in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, without a special statutory authority, exclude relations from a family meeting to recommend a curator, and he is not restricted to a narrow construction of the term "conflicting interest" in the statute disqualifying persons, having such an interest, for participating in the family meeting; 44 La. Ann. 1027. In the selection of a curator the family meeting is not limited to applicants, nor to persons suggested by relations of the interdict; id.

In Scotch Law. A legal restraint laid upon persons liable to be imposed upon, though having, to some extent, the exercise of reason, to prevent them from signing any deed affecting heritage, to their own prejudice, without the consent of their curators or interdictors. It is nearly superseded in practice by voluntary trusts. In cases where a trust cannot be obtained, the law relating to unconscionable bargains and to facility and circumvention is usually sufficient protection. Interdiction was either voluntary, which was generally executed in the form of a bond, obliging the grantor to do no deed affecting his estate without the consent of certain friends therein mentioned, or judicial, imposed by the court of sessions upon an action commenced by a near kinsman to the party and sometimes by the nobile officium of the court. The latter sort of interdiction must be taken off by the authority of the court which imposed it. Voluntary interdiction cannot be recalled at the pleasure of the person interdicted, but it may be: 1. By a sentence of the court of sessions declaring that there was ab initio no sufficient ground, or that it no longer exists. 2. By the joint action of the person interdicted and the interdictor. 3. The restraint ceases where the bond requires a certain number of the quorum, if they be reduced by death below that number; Ersk. Prin. I. vii. 30-32.

INTERDICTION OF FIRE AND WATER. Banishment by an order forbidding all persons to supply the person banished with fire or water, they being considered the two necessities of life. This banishment was termed by Livy legitimum exilium.

INTERDICTUM SALVIANUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The Salvian interdict. A process which lay for the owner of a farm to obtain possession of the goods from his tenant who had pledged them to him for the rent of the land. Inst. 4, 15, 3.

INTERESSE (Lat.). Interest. The interest of money; also an interest in lands.

INTERESSE TERMINI (Lat.). An interest in the term. The demise of a term in land does not vest any estate in the lessee, but gives him a mere right of entry on the land, which right is called his interest in the term, or interesse termini. See Co. Litt. 46; 2 Bla. Com. 144; 10 Viner, Abr. 348; Dane, Abr. Index; Watk. Conv. 15; 1 Washb. R. P. Index.

INTEREST (Lat. it concerns; it is of advantage).

In Contracts. The right of property which a man has in a thing. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

On Debts. The compensation which is paid by the borrower of money to the lender for its use, and, generally, by a debtor to his creditor in recompense for his detention of the debt.

The compensation allowed by law or fixed by the parties to a contract for the use or forbearance or detention of money. 3 Tex. Civ. App. 81.

Legal interest is the rate of interest established by the law of the country, which will prevail in the absence of express stipulation; conventional interest is a certain rate agreed upon by the parties. 2 Cal. 568.

Who is bound to pay interest. The contractor who has expressly or impliedly undertaken to pay interest is, of course, bound to do so.

Executors; 12 Conn. 350; 7 S. & R. 264; administrators; 4 Gill & J. 453; 35 Miss. 321; assignees of bankrupts or insolvents; 2 W. & S. 557; but see 149 U. S. 95; guardians; 29 Ga. 82; 14 La. Ann. 764; and trustees; 1 Pick. 528; 10 Gill & J. 175; 15 Md. 75; 29 Ga. 82; 61 id. 564; 11 Cal. 71; who have kept money an unreasonable length of time; 18 Pick. 1; 29 Ga. 82; and have made or might have made it productive; 4 Gill & J. 453; 1 Pick. 530; 3 Woods 542, 724; Myrick, 8, 168; are chargeable with interest. Where a litigant claiming money as his own, was permitted to collect and retain it, subject only to the order of the court should it afterwards be decided he was not entitled to it, he is chargeable with interest; 93 Ky. 129. When a loan is negotiated, the retention of a portion of it for an unreasonable time entitles the borrower to a rebate of interest; 144 U. S. 451.

Tenants for life must pay interest on incumbrances on the estate; 4 Ves. 33; 1 Vern. 404, n.; Story, Eq. Jur. § 487; 5 Johns. Ch. 482. Where interest is reserved by contract, a mere readiness to pay will not relieve the debtor from liability therefor; 24 Pa. 110.

Who are entitled to receive interest. The lender upon an express or implied contract for interest. Executors, administrators, etc., are in some cases allowed interest for advances made by them on account of the estates under their charge; 10 Pick. 77; 6 Halst. Ch. 44. See 9 Mass. 37. The rule has been extended to trustees; 1 Binn. 488; and compound interest, even, allowed them; 16 Mass. 228.

On what claims allowed. When the debtor expressly undertakes to pay interest, he or his personal representatives having assets are bound to pay it. But if a party has accepted the principal, it has been determined that he cannot recover interest in a separate action: 1 Esp. N. P. 110; 3 Johns. 220. See 1 Campb. 50; 1 Dall. 315; 45 Me. 542; 9 Ohio St. 452.

On contracts where, from the course of dealings between the parties, a promise to pay is implied; 1 Campb. 50; 3 Brown, Ch. 436; Kirb. 207; 2 Wend. 501; 33 Ala. N. S. 459; 8 Ia. 163. On account stated or other liquidated sum, whenever the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it; 2 W. Bla. 761; 2 Ves. 365; 2 Burr. 1085; 5 Esp. 114; 1 Hayw. 173; 2 Cox 219; 20 N. Y. 463; 13 Ind. 475; 8 Fla. 161; 86 Ky. 668. But interest is not due for unliquidated damages, or on a running account where the items are all on one side, unless otherwise agreed upon; 1 Dall. 265; 4 Cow. 496; 5 Vt. 177; 1 Speers 209; 1 Rice 21; 2 Blackf. 313; 1 Bibb 443; 20 Ark. 410; 7 Utah 510; see 63 Hun 624; 8 Mont. 312; but when the damages are to be assessed on the principle of compensation, and with reference to a definite standard, the jury may give additional damages in the nature of interest. This, however, is not strictly interest, but compensation for delay, measured by the rate of interest; 124 Pa. 571; 130 Pa. 37. On the arrears of an annuity secured by a specialty; 3 Atk. 579; 9 Watts 530; or given in lieu of dower; 1 Harr. Del. 106; 3 W. & S. 437. On bills and notes if payable at a future day certain, after due; 3 D. & B. 70; 5 Humpl. 406; 19 Ark. 690; 13 Mo. 252; 50 Kan. 440; if payable on demand, after a demand made; 5 Ves. 133; 15 S. & R. 264; 1 McCord 370; 6 Dana 70; 1 Hempst. 155; 18 Ala. N. S. 300; 94 Mich. 411. See 4 Ark. 210; 83 Tex. 446. But see 40 Ill. App. 613, where interest on a note due on demand was held to run from its date. Where the terms of a promissory note are that it shall be payable by instalments, and on the failure of any instalment the whole is to become due, interest on the whole becomes payable from the first default; 4 Esp. 147. Where, by the terms of a bond or a promissory note, interest is to be paid annually, and the principal at a distant day, the interest may be recovered before the principal is due; 1 Binn. 165; 2 Mass. 563. An accepted draft bears interest from the time of delivery, when no time of payment is stated therein; 65 Hun 625.

When not stipulated for by contract or authorized by statute, interest is allowed by the courts as damages for the detention of money or property; 136 U. S. 211.

On a deposit by a purchaser, which he is entitled to recover back, paid either to a principal or an auctioneer; Sugd. Vend. 327; 3 Campb. 258; 5 Taunt. 625. But see 4 Taunt. 334. For goods sold and delivered, after the customary or stipulated term of credit has expired; 2 B. & P. 337; 2 Dall. 193; 11 Ala. 451; 1 McLean 411; 12 N. H. 474; 26 Ga. 465; 8 Ia. 163. On judgment debts; 2 Ves. 162. In a judgment on sci. fa. the interest is calculated on the old judgment and the new judgment entered for a lump sum; 5 Binn. 61; 1 H. & J. 754; 3 Wend. 496; 4 Metc. 317; 6 Halst. 91; 3 Mo. 86; 4 J. J. Marsh. 244; T. U. P. Charl. 138. See 3 McCord 166; 1 Ill. 52; 14 Mass. 239; 50 Ark. 416. On judgments affirmed in a higher court; 4 Burr. 2128; 2 H. Bla. 267, 284; 2 Campb. 428, n.; 3 Taunt. 503. See 3 Hill, N. Y. 426; 9 C. C. App. 468. In an accounting for profits made by selling an article contrary to contract, interest should be allowed; 48 Fed. Rep. 789; also on the amount found as damages for breach of contract; 82 Tex. 608. On money obtained by fraud, or where it has been wrongfully detained; 9 Mass. 504; 1 Campb. 129; 3 Cow. 426. On money paid by mistake, or recovered on a void execution; 1 Pick. 212; 9 S. & R. 409; 3 Sumn. 336; 64 Hun 632; see 160 Mass. 438. On money lent or laid out for another's use; 2 W. Bla. 761; 1 Dall. 349; 2 Hen. & M. 381; 1 Hayw. 4; 9 Johns. 71; 2 Wend. 413; 1 Conn. 32; 7 Mass. 14; 1 Mo. 718. On money had and received after demand; Perl. Int. 122; 1 Ala. N. S. 452; 4 Blackf. 21, 164. On the value of an animal in an action for causing its death; 50 Ark. 169; 125 Pa. 24. On purchase-money which has lain dead, where the vendor cannot make a title; Sugd. Vend. 327. On purchase-money remaining in purchaser's hands to pay off incumbrances; 1 Sch. & L. 134. See 1 Wash. Va. 125; 5 Munf. 342; 6 Binn. 435. On taxes wrongfully collected; 72 Tex. 509. See 159 Mass. 383. Rent in arrear due by covenant bears interest, unless under special circumstances, which may be recovered in action; 6 Binn. 159. See 46 Ohio St. 66; but no distress can be made for such interest; 2 Binn. 246. Interest cannot, however, be recovered for arrears of rent payable in wheat; 1 Johns. 276. See 2 Call 249; 3 Hen. & M. 463.

Interest cannot be recovered as damages for the detention of the principal, after the principal sum has been paid; 153 U. S. 456. Where interest is recoverable, not as a part of the contract, but by way of damages, if the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in unreasonably delaying the prosecution of his claim, it may be properly withheld; 135 U. S. 271; 140 id. 694. Interest allowed for non-payment of a judgment is in the nature of statutory damages; 146 U. S. 162.

On legacies. On specific legacies interest is to be calculated from the date of the death of the testator; 2 Ves. Sen. 563; 5 W. & S. 30; 3 Munf. 10.

A general legacy, when the time of payment is not named by the testator, is not payable till the end of one year after testator's death, at which time the interest commences to run; 13 Ves. 333; 1 Sch. & L. 10; 5 Binn. 475; 3 V. & B. 183; 16 R. I. 98; 29 W. Va. 784; and this is so whether the will has been proved during the year or not; 149 Mass. 82. But where only the interest is given, no payment will be due till the end of the second year; 7 Ves. 89.

Where a general legacy is given, and the time of payment is named by the testator, interest is not allowed before the arrival of the appointed period of payment, and that notwithstanding the legacies are vested; Prec. in Ch. 337. But when that period arrives, the legatee will be entitled although the legacy be charged upon a dry reversion; 2 Atk. 108. See, also, 3 Atk. 101; 3 Ves. 10; 4 Brown, Ch. 149, n.; 1 Cox, Ch. 133. When the executor can pay a legacy without any possible inconvenience to the estate, it has been held that interest begins to run at once; 113 N. Y. 207. When a legacy is given payable at a future day with interest, and the legatee dies before it becomes payable, the arrears of the interest up to the time of his death must be paid to his personal representatives; McClel. 141. And a bequest of a sum to be paid annually for life bears interest from the death of testator; 5 Binn. 475; 26 W. N. C. Pa. 374. And so also for a legacy of income for the support and maintenance of the legatee; 106 Pa. 268; especially is this so when the legacy is to be paid by the executors transferring to the trustees for the legatee interest-bearing securities belonging to the testator's estate; id.

Where the legatee is a child of the testator, or one towards whom he has placed himself in loco parentis, the legacy bears interest from the testator's death, whether it be particular or residuary, vested but payable at a future time, or contingent if the child have no maintenance. In that case the court will do what in common presumption the father would have done—provide necessities for the child; 2 P. Wms. 31; 3 Ves. 13, 287; Bacon, Abr. Legacies (K 3); 3 Atk. 432; 1 Dick. Ch. 310; 2 Brown, Ch. 59; 2 Rand. 409; 44 N. J. Eq. 506; 106 Pa. 268. In case of a child en ventre sa mère at the time of the father's decease, interest is allowed only from its birth; 2 Cox, Ch. 425. Where maintenance or interest is given by the will, and the rate specified, the legatee will not, in general, be entitled to claim more than the maintenance or rate specified; 3 Atk. 697, 716; 3 Ves. 286, n. And see further, as to interest in cases of legacies to children; 15 Ves. 363; 1 Brown, Ch. 267; 4 Madd. 275; 1 Swanst. 553; 1 P. Wms. 783; 1 Vern. 251; 3 V. & B. 183.

Interest is not allowed by way of maintenance to any other person than the legitimate children of the testator; 3 Ves. 10; 4 id. 1; unless the testator has put himself in loco parentis; 1 Sch. & L. 5, 6. A wife; 15 Ves. 301; a niece; 3 Ves. 10; a grandchild; 6 Ves. 546; 1 Cox, Ch. 133; are, therefore, not entitled to interest by way of maintenance. See 2 Wms. Exec. 743. Nor is a legitimate child entitled to such interest if he have a maintenance, although it may be less than the amount of the interest of the legacy; 1 Sch. & L. 5; 3 Ves. 17. But see 4 Johns. Ch. 103; 2 Roper, Leg. 202; 106 Pa. 268, cited above.

Where an intention, though not expressed, is fairly inferable from the will, interest will be allowed; 1 Swanst. 561, n.

Interest is not allowed for maintenance, although given by immediate bequest for maintenance, if the parent of the legatee, who is under moral obligation to provide for him, be of sufficient ability: so that the interest will accumulate for the child's benefit until the principal becomes payable; 3 Atk. 399; 1 Brown, Ch. 386; 3 id. 60, 416. But to this rule there are some exceptions; 3 Ves. 730; 4 Brown, Ch. 223; 4 Madd. 275, 289.

Where a fund, particular or residuary, is given upon a contingency, the intermediate interest undisposed of—that is to say, the intermediate interest between the testator's death, if there be no previous legatee for life, or, if there be, between the death of the previous taker and the happening of the contingency—will sink into the residue for the benefit of the next of kin, or executor of the testator, if not bequeathed by him; but if not disposed of, for the benefit of his residuary legatee; 1 Brown, Ch. 57; 4 id. 114; 2 Atk. 329.

Where a legacy is given by immediate bequest, whether such legacy be particular or residuary, and there is a condition to divest it upon the death of the legatee under twenty-one, or upon the happening of some other event, with a limitation over, and the legatee dies before twenty-one, or before such other event happens, which nevertheless does take place, yet, as the legacy was payable at the end of the year after the testator's death, the legatee's representatives, and not the legatee over, will be entitled to the interest which accrued during the legatee's life, until the happening of the event which was to divest the legacy; 1 P. Wms. 501; 5 Ves. 335, 522.

Where a residue is given, so as to be vested, but not payable at the end of the year from the testator's death, but upon the legatee's attaining twenty-one, or upon any other contingency, and with a bequest over divesting the legacy, upon the legatee's dying under age, or upon the happening of the contingency, then the legatee's representatives in the former case, and the legatee himself in the latter, shall be entitled to the interest that became due during the legatee's life or until the happening of the contingency; 2 P. Wms. 419; 1 Brown, Ch. 81, 335; 3 Mer. 335.

Where a residue of personal estate is given, generally, to one for life with remainder over, and no mention is made by the testator respecting the interest, nor any intention to the contrary to be collected from the will, the rule appears to be settled that the person taking for life is entitled to interest from the death of the testator, on such part of the residue bearing interest as is not necessary for the payment of debts. And it is immaterial whether the residue is only given generally, or directed to be laid out, with all convenient speed, in funds or securities, or to be laid out in lands. See 6 Ves. 520; 9 id. 89, 549, 553. Interest, in case of a remainder in an estate in money, does not run until the death of the life tenant; 81 Ga. 229.

But where a residue is directed to be laid out in land, to be settled on one for life, with the remainder over, and the testator directs the interest to accumulate in the mean time until the money is laid out in land, or otherwise invested on security, the accumulation shall cease at the end of one year from the testator's death, and from that period the tenant for life shall be entitled to the interest; 6 Ves. 520; 7 id. 95; 2 S. & S. 396. Where a gift is made of the residue of the testator's estate to one person for life, and the principal is given over to another one at the death of the life tenant, the legatee is entitled to interest from the testator's death; 44 N. J. Eq. 506.

Where no time of payment is mentioned by the testator, annuities are considered as commencing from the death of the testator; and, consequently, the first payment will be due at the end of the year from that event; if, therefore, it be not made then, interest, in those cases wherein it is allowed at all, must be computed from that period; 5 Binn. 475. See 6 Mass. 37; 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 356.

How much interest is to be allowed. As to time. In actions for money had and received, interest is allowed from the date of service of the writ; 1 Mass. 436; 15 Pick. 500; 12 N. H. 474. See 100 U. S. 119. On debts payable on demand, interest is payable only from the demand; 15 Pick. 500; 5 Conn. 222; 1 Mas. 117. See 12 Mass. 4; and supra. The words "with interest for the same" carry interest from date; Add. 323; 1 Stark. 452, 507; 57 N.W. Rep. (Minn.) 315. Interest upon a quantum meruit for services rendered, does not begin to run until a demand is made; 81 Wis. 230. It is allowed on the amount found as damages for breach of contract, from the date they accrued; 82 Tex. 608. Interest coupons bear interest from maturity of the coupons; 114 N. Y. 122; 64 Hun 120; 149 U. S. 122; 132 id. 107. Interest on a dividend declared by a receiver should be allowed from the time it was declared and ought to have been paid; 133 U. S. 433. Interest runs on liability of shareholders to creditors of a national bank from the time it goes into liquidation; 127 U. S. 27.

Interest may be computed from the commencement of an action for the balance due on a general account and the enforcement of lien; 73 Wis. 520; 39 Kan. 452.

The mere circumstance of war existing between two nations is not a sufficient reason for abating interest on debts due by the subjects of one belligerent to another; 1 Pet. C. C. 524; 4 H. & McH. 161. But a prohibition of all intercourse with an enemy during war furnishes a sound reason for the abatement of interest until the return of peace; Perl. Int. 145; 2 Dall. 102, 132; 1 Wash. Va. 172; 1 Call 194; 3 Wash. C. C. 396; 8 S. & R. 103; 62 Ala. 58. See infra.

A debt barred by the statute of limitations and revived by an acknowledgment bears interest for the whole time; 16 Vt. 297.

As to the allowance of simple and compound interest. Interest upon interest is not allowed, except in special cases; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 287; 31 Vt. 679; 34 Pa. 210; and the uniform current of decisions is against it, as being a hard, oppressive exaction, and tending to usury; 1 Johns. Ch. 14; Cam. & N. 361; 13 Vt. 430; 21 Or. 333. But interest on interest may be allowed if made after the interest which is to bear interest becomes due; 31 W. Va. 410; 79 Ga. 213. By the civil law, interest could not be demanded beyond the principal sum, and payments exceeding that amount were applied to the extinguishment of the principal; Ridley's Views of the Civil, etc., Law 84; Authentica, 9th Coll.

Where a partner has overdrawn the partnership funds, and refuses, when called upon to account, to disclose the profits, recourse would be had to compound interest as a substitute for the profits he might reasonably be supposed to have made; 2 Johns. Ch. 213.

When executors, administrators, or trustees convert the trust-money to their own use, or employ it in business or trade, or fail to invest, they are chargeable with compound interest; 1 Pick. 528; 1 Johns. Ch. 620. Nothing but very culpable conduct will justify the compounding of interest against an administrator; 87 Tenn. 172; 71 Mich. 356. Interest cannot ordinarily be compounded against a guardian; 73 Mich. 220; 118 Ind. 512; but it may be in some cases; 99 N. C. 367.

In actions for negligence, interest cannot be allowed by the jury as such, but they may, in computing their verdict, consider the lapse of time since the cause of action arose; 125 Pa. 24.

In an action to recover the annual interest due on a promissory note, interest will be allowed on each year's interest until paid; 2 Mass. 568; 8 id. 445; 1 N. H. 179; 16 Vt. 45; 9 Dana 331; 2 N. & McC. 38; 10 Am. Dec. 560; 69 N. C. 89; 26 Ohio St. 59; 61 Ga. 275; 34 Am. Rep. 101; contra, 8 Mass. 455; 2 Cush. 92; 1 Binn. 152, 165; 5 Pa. 98; 67 N. Y. 162. A note which provides for a conventional rate of interest, but omits to provide for the rate of interest after maturity, draws the legal rate; 22 How. 118; 100 U. S. 72; 68 Ind. 202; 42 L. J. Rep. N. S. 666; 39 Minn. 122; 39 Kans. 73; 135 N. Y. 354; but a different view has been held; 112 Mass. 63; 12 Vroom 349; 23 Alb. L. J. 130. See, as to charging compound interest, 1 Johns. Ch. 550; Cam. & N. 361; 1 Binn. 165; 1 Hen. & M. 4; 3 id. 89; 1 Viner, Abr. 457, Interest (C); Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 3); 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 371. An infant's contract to pay interest on interest after it has accrued will be binding upon him when the contract is for his benefit; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 286; 1 Atk. 489; 3 id. 613. The including in a note payable a year after date with a certain rate of interest, until paid, of a year's interest, is not compounding interest; 18 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1034. As to interest on interest coupons, see infra.

As limited by the penalty of a bond. It is a general rule that the penalty of a bond limits the amount of the recovery; 2 Term 388. But in some cases the interest is recoverable beyond the amount of the penalty; 4 Cra. 333; 15 Wend. 76; 10 Conn. 95; Paine 661; 6 Me. 14; 8 N. H. 491. The recovery depends on principles of law, and not on the arbitrary discretion of a jury; 3 Caines 49.

The exceptions are—where the bond is to account for moneys to be received; 2 Term 388; where the plaintiff is kept out of his money by writs of error; 2 Burr. 1094; or delayed by injunction; 1 Vern. 349; 16 Viner, Abr. 303; if the recovery of the debt be delayed by the obligor; 6 Ves. 92; 1 Vern. 349; if extraordinary emoluments are derived from holding the money; 2 Bro. P. C. 251; or the bond is taken only as a collateral security; 2 Bro. P. C. 333; or the action be on a judgment recovered on a bond; 1 East 436. See, also, 4 Day 30; 3 Caines 49; 1 Taunt. 218; 1 Mass. 308; Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 2); Viner, Abr. Interest (E).

But these exceptions do not obtain in the administration of the debtor's assets where his other creditors might be injured by allowing the bond to be rated beyond the penalty; 5 Ves. 329. See Viner, Abr. Interest (C 5).

Upon a bond given to appear in a United States court to answer to an indictment, no interest can be recovered; 127 U. S. 212.

As to the allowance of foreign interest. The rate of interest of the place of performance is to be allowed, where such place is specified; 10 Wheat. 367; 20 Johns. 102; 8 Pick. 194; 12 La. An. 815; 1 B. Monr. 29; 2 W. & S. 327; 23 Vt. 286; 21 Ga. 135; 22 Tex. 108; 7 Ired. 424; 5 C. & F. 1; otherwise, of the place of making the contract; 11 Ves. 314; 1 Wash. C. C. 521; 3 Wheat. 101; 12 Mass. 4; 1 J. J. Marsh. 406; 5 Ired. 590; 17 Johns. 511; 25 N. H. 474; 1 Ala. 387; 13 La. 91; 25 H. & J. 193; 3 Conn. 253; 5 Tex. 87, 262. But the rate of interest of either place may be reserved; and this provision will govern, if an honest transaction and not a cover for usury; 2 Pa. 85; 14 Vt. 33; 20 Mart. La. 1; 2 Johns. Cas. 355; 10 Wheat. 367. Coupons after their maturity bear interest at the rate fixed by the law of the place where they are payable, where there is no stipulation as to the rate after maturity; 149 U. S. 122; 132 id. 107. See also Dicey, Conf. L., Moore's ed. 616, 625.

How computed. In casting interest on notes, bonds, etc., upon which partial payments have been made, every payment is to be first applied to keep down the interest; but the interest is never allowed to form a part of the principal so as to carry interest; 2 Wash. C. C. 167; 1 Halst. 408; 2 Hayw. 17; 17 Mass. 417; 14 Conn. 445; 140 U. S. 247.

When a partial payment exceeds the amount of interest due when it is made, it is correct to compute the interest to the time of the first payment, add it to the principal, subtract the payment, cast interest on the remainder to the time of the second payment, add it to the remainder, and subtract the second payment, and in like manner from one payment to another, until the time of judgment; Perl. Int. 168; 1 Pick. 194; 4 Hen. & M. 431; 8 S. & R. 458; 2 Wash. C. C. 167. See 3 id. 350, 396; 3 Cow. 86.

The same rule applies to judgments; 2 N. H. 169; 8 S. & R. 452.

Where a partial payment is made before the debt is due, it cannot be apportioned part to the debt and part to the interest. As, if there be a bond for one hundred dollars, payable in one year, and at the expiration of six months fifty dollars be paid in, this payment shall not be apportioned part to the principal and part to the interest, but at the end of the year, interest shall be charged on the whole sum, and the obligor shall receive credit for the interest of fifty dollars for six months; 1 Dall. 124.

When interest will be barred. When the money due is tendered to the person entitled to it, and he refuses to receive it, the interest ceases; 3 Campb. 296; 60 Conn. 343; 83 Tex. 11; 38 Fed. Rep. 36. See 134 U. S. 68. A tender by a junior mortgagee to a senior mortgagee of the amount due on the senior mortgage, with accrued costs of foreclosure, does not, unless kept good, prevent the running of interest; 132 N. Y. 288.

Where the plaintiff was absent in foreign parts beyond seas, evidence of that fact may be given in evidence to the jury on the plea of payment, in order to extinguish the interest during such absence; 1 Call 133; 3 M'Cord 340; 1 Root 178. But see 9 S. & R. 263.

Whenever the law prohibits the payment of the principal, interest during the prohibition is not demandable; 2 Dall. 102; 1 Pet. C. C. 524; 2 Dall. 132; 4 id. 286.

If the plaintiff has accepted the principal, he cannot recover the interest in a separate action; 1 Esp. 110; 3 Johns. 229. See 14 Wend. 116.

For or against Government or State. Interest is not to be awarded against a sovereign government, unless its consent has been manifested by an act of its legislature or by a lawful contract of its executive officers; 136 U. S. 211. The United States is not liable to pay interest or claims against it, in the absence of express statutory provision therefor; 127 U. S. 251; 23 Ct. Cls. 144; 164 U. S. 213; but it must be allowed to the United States under U. S. Rev. St. § 966; id. A city is not liable for interest on its loans, after maturity, if it has provided funds to pay them; 131 Pa. 305.

The legal rate of interest is five per cent. in Illinois and Louisiana; seven per cent. in Arizona, California, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Washington; eight per cent. in Alabama, Colorado, Florida, Oregon, Utah, and Wyoming; ten per cent. in Montana; and six per cent. in the remaining states and territories.

Any rate may be agreed upon by contract in Arizona, California, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts, Montana, Nevada, Rhode Island, and Utah; but the rate by contract cannot be more than seven per cent. in Illinois; eight per cent. in Alabama, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, and South Carolina; ten per cent. in Arkansas, District of Columbia, Florida, Indian Territory, Kansas, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Oregon, Texas, and Wisconsin; twelve per cent. in Idaho, Oklahoma, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming; and six per cent. in the remaining states. In New York demand loans of not less than $5,000, with collateral, may be made at any rate of interest agreed upon in writing.

In Ontario and Quebec the legal rate is six per cent.; in the former there is no limit on the rate by contract, and in the latter it is seven per cent.

For exceeding the legal rates of interest the penalty is variously fixed by the different states. See USURY.

In Practice. Concern; advantage; benefit.

Such a relation to the matter in issue as creates a liability to pecuniary gain or loss from the event of the suit; 11 Metc. 395, 396.

When used as a criterion of the proper parties to a suit it means interest in the object, not interest in the subject-matter; 89 Va. 253.

A person may be disqualified to act as a judge, juror, or witness in a cause by reason of an interest in the subject-matter in dispute.

As to the disqualifying interest of judges, see JUDGE; as to the disqualifying interest of jurors, see CHALLENGE.

An interest disqualifying a witness must be legal, as contradistinguished from mere prejudice or bias arising from relationship, friendship, or any of the numerous motives by which a witness may be supposed to be influenced; Leach 154; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 46, s. 25; must be present; 1 Hoffman. 21; 14 La. Ann. 417; 33 W. Va. 616; must be certain, vested, and not uncertain and contingent; 2 P. Wms. 287; 5 Johns. 256; 7 Mass. 25; 25 Ga. 337; 2 Metc. Ky. 608; 35 Pa. 351; must be an interest in the event of the cause, or the verdict must be lawful evidence for or against him in another suit, or the record must be an instrument of evidence for or against him; 22 Tex. 295; 3 John. Cas. 83; 1 Phill. Ev. 36. See 142 Ill. 302. But an interest in the question does not disqualify the witness; 4 Johns. 302; 1 S. & R. 32; 1 Hen. & M. 165, 168; or the fact that he has a case of the same kind pending; 37 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 144.

An attorney will under most circumstances be permitted to testify in behalf of his client; but the courts do not look with favor upon the practice; 72 Pa. 229. See 32 Tex. Cr. R. 102.

The magnitude of the interest is altogether immaterial; a liability for costs is sufficient; 5 Term 174; 2 Me. 194; 11 Johns. 57.

Interest will not disqualify a person as a witness if he has an equal interest on both sides; 7 Term 480; 1 Bibb 298; 2 Mass. 108; 6 Pa. 322; 89 Ga. 532.

The objection to incompetency on the ground of interest may be removed by an extinguishment of that interest by means of a release, executed either by the witness, when he would receive an advantage by his testimony, or by those who have a claim upon him, when his testimony would be evidence of his liability. The objection may also be removed by payment. Stark. Ev. 757. In England and the United States it is no longer a cause of objection to the competency of witnesses in most cases that they have an interest in the subject-matter in issue. A growing consciousness that the truth in judicial investigations is best brought out by the production of all relevant testimony has led to the universal abrogation of the old rule of the common law; Tayl. Ev. 1187; 63 Pa. 156; 32 Tex. 141. In the trial of suits against the United States no person is excluded as a witness because he is a party to or interested therein; 1 Sup. Rev. Stat. 561; id. 403; id. 915. The interest of a party in the result of an action makes his credibility a question for the jury; 76 Hun 3. See, generally, Geenleaf; Starkie; Phillipps; Wharton; Miller, Evidence.

INTEREST, MARITIME. See MARITIME INTEREST.

INTEREST OR NO INTEREST. A provision in a policy of insurance, which imports that the policy is to be good though the insured have no insurable interest in the subject-matter. This constitutes a wager policy, which is bad in England, by statute 19 Geo. II. c. 37, and generally, from the policy of the law; 2 Par. Mar. Law 89, note. See INSURABLE INTEREST; POLICY.

INTERFERENCE. See PATENTS.

INTERIM (Lat.). In the mean time; meanwhile. An assignee ad interim is one appointed between the time of bankruptcy and appointment of the regular assignee. 2 Bell, Com. 355.

INTERIM CURATOR. A person appointed by justices of the peace to take care of the property of a felon convict until the appointment by the Crown of an administrator or administrators for the same purpose. Moz. & W.

INTERIM FACTOR. In Scotch Law. A judicial officer elected or appointed under the bankruptcy law to take charge of and preserve the estate until a fit person shall be elected trustee. 2 Bell, Com. 357.

INTERIM ORDER. An order to take effect provisionally, or until further directions. The expression is used especially with reference to orders given pending an appeal. Moz. & W.

INTERLAQUEARE. In Old Practice. To link together, or interchangeably. Writs were called interlaqueata where several were issued against several parties residing in different counties, each party being summoned by a separate writ to warrant the tenant, together with the other warrantors. Fleta, lib. 5. c. 4, § 2.

INTERLINEATION. Writing between two lines.

Interlineations are made either before or after the execution of an instrument. Those made before should be noted previously to its execution; those made after are made either by the party in whose favor they are, or by strangers.

When made by the party himself, whether the interlineation be material or immaterial, they render the deed void; 1 Gall. 71; 35 N. J. 227; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 232; unless made with the consent of the opposite party. See 11 Co. 27 a; 9 Mass. 307; 15 Johns. 293; 1 Halst. 215. But see 5 H. & J. 41; 2 La. 290; 4 Bingh. 123; Fitzg. 207, 223; 2 Pa. 191. See 126 id. 247.

When the interlineation is made by a stranger in an instrument in the hands of the promisee, though without his knowledge, if it be immaterial, it will not vitiate the instrument, but if it be material, it will, in general, avoid it; 11 Co. 27 a; L. R. 10 Ex. 330; see 6 Wash. 418; otherwise if the instrument be not then in the possession of a party; 6 East 309. If made while in the possession of an agent of the promisee, it avoids the instrument; L. R. 10 Ex. 330; contra, 35 N. J. 227; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 232. The insertion of the words "or order" without the consent of the maker constitutes a material alteration which avoids the note; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 53. An interlineation made in a bond, after its execution, by an agent of the obligee, without authority, will not invalidate it, but is only an act of spoliation; 86 Mich. 581.

The decisions vary as to the effect of interlineations, when an instrument is put in evidence. In a late case the rule is stated thus: If the interlineation is in itself suspicious, as, if it appears to be contrary to the probable meaning of the instrument as it stood before the insertion of the interlined words; or if it is in a handwriting different from the body of the instrument, or appears to have been written with different ink, in all such cases, if the court considers the interlineation suspicious on its face, the presumption will be that it was an unauthorized alteration after execution. On the other hand, if the interlineation appears in the same handwriting with the original instrument, and bears no evidence on its face of having been made subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and especially if it only makes clear what was the evident intention of the parties, the law will presume that it was made in good faith, and before execution; 3 Fed. Rep. 16. See 155 Pa. 152. Where interlineations in a deed are in the handwriting of the officer who attested it officially, the presumption is that they were made at or before the execution of the instrument; 89 Ga. 793; but it has been held that an alteration appearing on the face of a deed is presumed to have been made after its execution, and the burden is upon the party presenting it to explain the alteration; 44 Ill. App. 81.

If an instrument appears to have been altered, it is incumbent on the party offering it to explain its appearance. Generally speaking, if nothing appears to the contrary, the alteration will be presumed to be contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument; but if there is ground of suspicion, the law presumes nothing, but leaves the questions of the time when, the person by whom, and the intent with which it was done, to the jury, upon proofs to be adduced by the party offering the instrument; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 564; Tayl. Ev. 1547; 63 Mo. 63; 108 id. 352; 23 Pa. 244; 157 id. 473; 82 Tex. 352. See 45 Ill. App. 234. In cases of negotiable instruments, the holder is held to clearer proof than in cases of deeds; 2 Dan. Neg. Instr. § 1417. See 40 Minn. 531. In a carefully considered case, 20 Vt. 205, the court adopt what it calls the old common-law rule that an alteration of an instrument, if nothing appear to the contrary, should be presumed to have been made at the time of the execution. So, also, 1 Shepl. 386; 2 Johns. Cas. 198; contra, 11 N. H. 395; 48 Ind. 459. It has been held, when a place of payment was inserted, that it was a question for the jury, but that it lay on the plaintiff to account for the alteration, etc.; 6 C. & P. 273; 6 Ala. N. S. 707; such an insertion after delivery is a material alteration; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 411; 91 Ga. 827. But in 39 Conn. 164, it was held that the burden of proof of accounting for an alteration is not necessarily on the party producing the instrument. See 44 Ill. App. 81.

In 25 Kans. 510; s. c. 37 Am. Rep. 259, it was held that a negotiable note offered in evidence, bearing on its face an apparent material alteration, is admissible in evidence, and the question as to the time of alteration is for the jury. The court said: If there is neither extrinsic nor intrinsic evidence as to when the alteration was made, it is to be presumed that it was made before or at the time of the execution. Perhaps there might be cases where the alteration is attended with such manifest circumstances of suspicion that the court might refuse to allow the note to go to the jury without some explanation, etc. This title is fully treated in a note in 37 Am. Rep. 260. As to alteration of negotiable instruments, see 7 Harv. Law Rev. 1. See ALTERATION; ERASURE.

INTERLOCUTOR. Properly means a judgment or judicial order pronounced in the course of a suit, which does not finally determine the cause. But in Scotch practice, the term is extended to the judgments of the Court of Session or the Lord Ordinary, which exhaust the point at issue, and which if not appealed against will have the effect of finally deciding the case. Bell; Moz. & W.

INTERLOCUTORY. Something which is done between the commencement and the end of a suit or action which decides some point or matter, which, however, is not a final decision of the matter in issue: as, interlocutory judgments, or decrees, or orders. See DECREE; JUDGMENT; ORDER.

INTERLOPERS. Persons who interrupt the trade of a company of merchants, by pursuing the same business with them in the same place, without lawful authority.

INTERNAL REVENUE. See REVENUE; TAXATION.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION. The hearing and decision of disputes or differences between sovereign states by arbitrators or umpires chosen by mutual agreement.

Such an agreement may be by a special treaty negotiated with reference to the particular case or by a general treaty of arbitration.

Treaties of arbitration, with respect to special matters between the United States and Great Britain, have been frequently negotiated and carried into effect, and also, in many cases, between each of those countries and other nations. A summary of arbitrations to which the United States have consented is given infra.

The first instance of international arbitration is related by Herodotus as occurring between Artabazanes and Xerxes and was decided by Darius.

National arbitrations were known to the Greeks among themselves. They did not cover political questions but usually were confined to disputes touching commerce, religion, boundaries, and the possession of contested territories. Thus in the time of Solon five Spartans were chosen to decide between the Athenians and the Megarians as touching the possession of the island of Salamis.

The Romans were never willing to arbitrate their disputes with neighboring countries, though they acted as arbitrators in disputes between other nations.

The practice of arbitration appears to have obtained in the barbarian world.

There are historical instances of arbitration, especially after the Church exercised a preponderating influence and the Bishops of Rome called to their tribunal all differences between peoples and kings.

Saint Louis was called upon to arbitrate between Henry III. and his barons in 1263. Occasionally a city assumed the duties of arbitrator. Thus the Treaty of Westminster of October 23, 1655, stipulated that the Republic of Hamburg should act as arbitrator between France and England. The parliaments of France were chosen to settle disputes between foreign sovereigns.

Sometimes eminent lawyers were employed as arbitrators; thus the doctors of the Italian universities were often employed to settle disputes between the different states of Italy.

It has been said that arbitrations anterior to the seventeenth century were frequently cases rather of amicable settlement than of strict arbitration.

The first attempt by the United States to arbitrate with England was under the Treaty of 1794, commonly called the Jay Treaty, which provided for mixed commissions. Under this the northeast boundary line was settled in 1798. Another commission met in Philadelphia in 1797 to determine the compensation due British subjects in consequence of impediments which certain of the United States had, in violation of the provisions of the Treaty of Peace, interposed to the collection of debts by British creditors. It was unsuccessful, and the claims were afterwards adjusted by the Treaty of January 8, 1802.

Another commission under the Jay Treaty finished its report in 1804. The question before it related to contraband, the rights of neutrals, and the finality of the decisions of prize courts.

The Treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814, provided for three arbitrations. One related to certain islands in Passamaquoddy Bay, the second related to the ascertainment of the northeastern boundary of the United States. The commissioners failed to agree and each made a separate report to its own government, and finally in 1827 the points of difference were referred to the King of the Netherlands. The third was to determine the Northern boundary of the United States along the middle of the Great Lakes and thence to the Lake of the Woods. These questions were not determined until the Treaty of August 9, 1842, generally known as the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, and the boundary from the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains under the Treaty of 1846, was settled by a joint-commission of which the American member was appointed by Act of Congress of March 19, 1872.

Differences arose as to England's performance of the obligation touching slaves under the Treaty of Ghent. This was referred to the Emperor of Russia, who decided that Great Britain had failed to keep her obligations and must make indemnity. A convention was concluded between the two countries for a commission to determine the amount of the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain, upon whose decision that country paid $1,304,000 in full settlement of all claims.

On February 8, 1853, there was a convention at London for a general settlement of all claims pending between the United States and Great Britain. It sat from September 15, 1853, to January 15, 1855. On July 1, 1863, a convention was concluded between the two countries to determine the compensation due to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company on claims for damages as well as for the transfer to the United States of all their property and rights in territory acknowledged by the treaty of 1846 to be under the sovereignty of the United States. The commission met in 1865 and made an award September 10, 1869.

The Treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, provided for four distinct arbitrations, the principal of which was that held at Geneva covering the demands of the United States arising out of acts of confederate cruisers of British origin and generically known as the Alabama claims.

This arbitration declined to make an award to the United States for the loss in the transfer of the American merchant marine to the British flag; for enhanced payment of marine insurance; for the prolongation of the war and the increased expenditures for the suppression of the rebellion. It also declined by a majority of three to two to award compensation for expenses incurred in pursuit of the confederate cruisers, but awarded as a direct loss growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes the sum of $15,500,000. This arbitration began December 15, 1871, and ended September 14, 1872.

The dispute as to the San Juan water boundary was referred to the Emperor of Germany, who, on October 21, 1872, made an award in favor of the United States. Claims of British subjects against the United States, and of citizens of the United States against Great Britain (excepting the Alabama claims) arising out of injuries during the Civil War, were referred to a mixed commission respectively appointed by the United States, Great Britain, and Spain.

The fourth arbitration under the Treaty of Washington was to determine the compensation due to Great Britain for privileges accorded by that treaty to the United States in the northeastern fisheries. It was conducted by a commission of three persons, a citizen of the United States, a British subject, and a Belgian. It met June 15, 1877, and on November 23 following, awarded Great Britain the sum of $5,500,000.

Under the Treaty of February 29, 1892, the United States and Great Britain submitted certain questions relating to the protection of the fur seals in Behring Sea to a tribunal of arbitration which sat in Paris.

The only arbitration between the United States and France was one to determine the claims of citizens of France for injury to their persons and property during the Civil War, and for claims of the citizens of the United States for like injuries during the war between France and Germany. It sat from November, 1880, to March 1884.

The United States has had four arbitrations with Spain, one in 1795, relating to claims for illegal captures of vessels by Spanish subjects. In 1871, relating to claims growing out of the insurrection in Cuba. In 1870, relating to the seizure of a steamer by the Spanish authorities in 1870. In 1885, relating to damages to be paid by Spain for the wrongful seizure or detention of an American vessel.

There have been two arbitrations between Mexico and the United States, the first under the Treaty of April 11, 1839, the second under the Treaty of July 4, 1868, for the adjustment of miscellaneous claims.

By the convention of March 1, 1889, a permanent board, called an International Boundary Commission, was established for the determination of questions growing out of changes in the course of the Rio Grande and the Colorado River where they form a boundary between the two countries.

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was entered into between the United States and Mexico on February 2, 1848, and contained a general proposition to arbitrate under which all subsequent arbitration between the two countries may be in a measure referred. Under this treaty the two nations agreed to "endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves, using, for this end, mutual representations and pacific negotiations." In case of failure, a resort shall not be had to reprisals or hostility of any kind "until the government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborhood, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference, or the circumstances of the case."

There have been three arbitrations between the United States and Haiti, one under a protocol May 24, 1884, by which two claims against Haiti were referred to Mr. Justice Strong of the supreme court of the United States. His awards were adverse to Haiti, but the United States has thus far declined to enforce them. On March 7, 1885, there was an agreement for a mixed commission of two Americans and two Haitians to adjust the claims of citizens of the United States growing out of civil disturbances in the island. Under the protocol of May 22, 1888, Alexander Porter Morse, of Washington, was named as an arbitrator to consider the claim for damages on the part of Van Bokkelen, a United States citizen, who was imprisoned in Haiti for debt.

A commission was appointed between the United States and Venezuela under a convention of January 19, 1892, to settle the claims of an American steamship company for the seizure of its steamers on the Orinoco.

Three mixed commissions have been appointed under treaty with Colombia, the first and second under conventions concluded September 10th, 1857, and February 10th, 1864, covering rights under the treaty with New Granada of 1846. The third, August 17, 1874, for an award for the capture of the American steamer Montijo by insurgents in the State of Panama. Two commissions have sat for the adjustment of miscellaneous claims under conventions of January 12, 1863, and December 4, 1868, one with Costa Rica under the Treaty of July 2, 1860, and one with Ecuador under the Treaty of November 25, 1862.

Under a convention with Peru, December 20, 1862, claims against Peru for the seizure of two vessels were referred to the King of the Belgians, but they were afterwards withdrawn.

By a convention of February 4, 1859, the claims of the United States against Paraguay were referred to a commission composed of a representative of each government. The decision was against the claim, but the United States have repudiated the award and endeavored to settle it by negotiation.

The questions between the United States and Portugal arising out of the destruction of the American privateer General Armstrong in the port of Fayal, were referred to Louis Napoleon under the Treaty of February 26, 1851. The award was adverse to the claim. After an attempt on the part of the claimants to set it aside the United States paid the claim out of its own treasury. Another arbitration between the United States and Portugal under a protocol signed June 13, 1891, to which Great Britain is also a party, in relation to the seizure of the Delagoa Bay railway, is now pending.

The United States and Chile by the convention of November 10, 1858, referred to the King of the Belgians a claim growing out of the seizure of the American brig Macedonian by the Chilean navy. An award was made, 1863, in favor of the United States. Under the Treaty of August 7, 1892, these two nations provided for a general arbitration of claims by means of a mixed commission.

In 1890, the congress of the United States adopted a concurrent resolution requesting the president to invite negotiations to the end that differences arising between it and other governments may be referred to arbitration and possibly adjusted. On July 16, 1893, the British House of Commons adopted a resolution referring in terms to the above resolution of congress and expressing the sympathy of that house with its purpose and asking the British government to co-operate with the government of the United States.

The Institute of International Law, at its session in 1874 and 1875, discussed the subject of rules for the procedure of international tribunals of arbitration, and at the latter meeting adopted provisional rules. At the International American Conference held on April 8, 1890, and attended by delegates from North, Central, and South America, the plan of a permanent tribunal of arbitration was adopted.

Proposed rules for the International Tribunal of Arbitration were submitted by William Allen Butler to the Universal Peace Congress in Chicago in 1893.

In 1889, certain members of the British and French Parliaments formed at Paris a parliamentary union to be composed of members of the legislative assemblies of various countries for the purpose of considering the development of international arbitration. At its session at Brussels in 1895, it adopted certain provisions which it recommended to the consideration of the governments of civilized states.

A conference of a number of prominent men was held at Washington, April 22 and 23, 1896, for the purpose of furthering international arbitration. In the same year a treaty was negotiated between the United States and Great Britain providing for a tribunal to which all disputes of a certain class between those two nations were to be referred; but it failed to be ratified by the senate.

See Report on International Arbitration, by committee of American Bar Association, August 20, 1896, Vol. XIX., 10, 385; Historical Notes on the Subject of International Arbitration by John B. Moore, of New York, published in the report of this conference from which the above brief statement has been taken.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.* The system of rules which Christian states acknowledge to be obligatory upon them in their relations to each other and to each other's subjects. It is the jus inter gentes, as distinguished from the jus gentium.

[Another definition by President Woolsey is: "International law, as we have viewed it, is a system of rules adopted by the free choice of certain nations for the purpose of governing their intercourse with each other, and not inconsistent with the principles of natural justice." Introd. to Int. L. § 203. This, it is to be observed, differs materially from the first, with respect to a point to some extent discussed infra.

"That body of rules which governs the actions of states in their intercourse with one another. These rules are the outgrowth of the customs of nations, of international agreements, and of state acts which have, in the lapse of time, been accepted as binding by the civilized states of the world. It differs from the municipal or national law of individual states in that it has no superior or supreme tribunal whose function it is to enforce the law in the case of its infraction. Nevertheless, it is obeyed for the most part without question, and it is only on rare occasions that resort is had to war. Indeed, most states have adopted it as a part of their municipal law, and a great majority of the cases that arise under it are adjudicated upon by the courts of law of the individual states;" Snow, Int. L. 17.

* This title being reprinted without alteration of the text as written by the late President Woolsey, such additions as seemed necessary or desirable have been made within brackets, and to preserve the original completeness of the treatment of the subject, some parts of it are undisturbed, although relating to subjects elsewhere treated under the various titles of International Law.

A distinction is sometimes drawn between public international law, which is the subject here treated, and private international law, as it is termed by continental jurists, or the conflict of laws (q. v.), as it is more frequently designated in England and America. The former title is however used by many writers in the last-named countries. There is a concurrence of authority that they are but different names for the same subject. Dicey, Conf. L. 5. Professor Lorimer objects very earnestly to the term Private International Law, and denies that it is International Law at all, and Professor Holland agrees with him; 1 Law Quar. Rev. 100. See also Whart. Com. Am. L. ch. v.; Whart. Conf. L. 1; Woolsey, Int. L. 69; Westlake, Priv. Int. L. 1, 4.

A different terminology has been suggested, which attempts to differentiate Private International Law and the Conflict of Laws.

"The aggregate of rules and limitations which sovereign states agree to observe in their intercourse and relations with each other. As it deals with the relations of states in their sovereign capacity, it is sometimes called Public International Law, to distinguish it from that branch of the science which has to do with the relations of states to the citizens or subjects of other states, which is called Private International Law; or, as it is in question whether the court of a state shall apply their own municipal laws or those of another state in the determination of a given cause, this branch of the subject has sometimes been called the Conflict of Laws" (q. v.); Davis, Int. L. 2.

The only authority cited is Amos, Science of Law, and the quotations, made at some length, apply mainly to controversies between citizens of different states.

A recent division of the subject is as follows: "It is divided into three departments: the principles that should regulate the conduct (1) of states to each other; (2) of private parties arising out of the conduct of states to each other; (3) of private parties as affected by the separate internal codes of distinct nations. Its leading principles are three: (1) that every nation possesses an exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction in its own territory; (2) that no state or nation can by its laws directly affect or bind property out of its own territory, or persons not resident therein, natural born subjects or others; (3) that whatever force the laws of one country have in another depends solely on the municipal laws of the latter." Encyc. Dict.]

The scientific basis of these rules is to be found in natural law, or the doctrine of rights of the state; for nations, like smaller communities and individuals, have rights and correlative obligations, moral claims and duties. Hence it might seem as if the science consisted simply of deductions from certain fundamental propositions of natural right; but this is far from being the case, for national intercourse is the most voluntary possible, and takes a shape widely different from a system of natural justice. It would be true to say that this science, like every department of moral science, can require nothing unjust; but, on the other hand, the actual law of nations contains many provisions which imply a waiver of just rights; and, in fact, a great part of the modern improvements in this code is due to the spirit of humanity controlling the spirit of justice, and leading the circle of Christian nations freely to abandon the position of rigorous right for the sake of mutual convenience or good will.

[The operation of this law is upon sovereign states, as that of municipal law is upon the individual person (q. v.), using this word in its larger sense. Formerly the definitions of International law like that first above given applied the subject to Christian nations, the idea being that this branch of the law was in a special degree the outgrowth of an effort to apply to states the moral obligations and duties the recognition of which is largely and primarily due to Christianity.

It is true that President Woolsey recognized that the views embodied in International Law were beginning to spread beyond the bounds of Christendom, but he ascribed it to the fact that "Christian states are now controllers of opinion." Introd. Int. L. 20.

Sir R. Phillimore thus expressed the idea which generally prevailed, "the consent of nations to things which are naturally, that is by the law of God, binding upon them." But the extension of these very principles, which Christian states alone were assumed to regard, to such an extent that non-Christian nations have been gradually brought more and more within the pale of their influence, and led to the acceptance, more or less, of civilized ideas of government, requires some modification of the older phraseology.

It is now some years since Professor E. Robinson said, evidently with this thought pressing upon his mind, with much less reason for it than now exists: "In modern times, at least, it has included all the states of the Christian world; but at one time it excluded non-Christian states, and at this moment it would be difficult to say to what extent it covers the relation of such states inter se and with the Christian states of Europe and America;" Encyc. Brit.

And now with Mohammedan Turkey to a considerable extent recognizing some amenability to the rules of international law (even admitting that it is external and not internal influence which produces this result), and Japan, almost completely, and China, to a less degree, recognized as admitted to the family of nations, it may fairly be said that the definition of the subject must be broadened so as to apply, not merely to Christian states but to civilized sovereign states, using that term broadly.

Nor is it entirely consistent with the truth of history to assume that international law owes its origin entirely to Christian nations. All that can be positively affirmed is that international law had no existence as a science until moulded into a scientific system by the master mind of Grotius. But no more did he create it than did Coke and Blackstone create the common law. Nor can it be said without qualification that the principles of morality which underlie the scientific expression of international law are the product of Christianity. They are rather a part of that great body of fundamental principles which belong to humanity, and which we express by the term Divine law, because, although inherent in the nature of man, they are conceived to have been imbedded there by the Divine Author of his existence, and lying dormant through centuries of human history, now and then dimly manifesting themselves through human strivings and human reason, they could only become fully operative after humanity had passed through the general refining process which was the result of the teachings of the founder of Christianity. These principles have the same relation to the Christian system which is borne by those principles of what is termed natural law or natural morality, which have been found in a greater or less degree in the beginning of all the great religions of the world. It is in this sense, and this only, that international law finds its connection with Christianity and the so-called Christian nations.

Hence we find in systems of law prior to Christianity the recognition of fundamental principles of justice and morality which underlie international law, as of those which find their natural development and expression in various branches of municipal law.

Thus the independent Hellenic sovereignties recognized, and their existence as such favored the recognition of, certain general customs which may be considered, as suggested by a writer already quoted, as, at least, a parallel to modern international law. And the latter finds its prototype, if not more, in the jus feciale of the Romans which doubtless would have developed largely as a general system but for the fact that the universal domination of the Roman Empire reduced its operation to a minimum and practically terminated the necessity of its preservation as a distinct branch of the civil law. But this very fact contributed to its influence in the direction of forming a new system, even if it be not admitted as contended by many authorities that it was in fact its origin. A thoughtful writer, however, has said that the jus feciale "differs radically from the modern science of international law which is founded upon the consent of nations and presupposes the existence of many independent states, and rather expresses the imperfect and one-sided views of international obligation which were held by the most powerful state of the ancient world;" Davis, Int. L. 4. The strong concurrence of opinion is unquestionably in favor of the theory that the Roman law was a factor of the first importance. Mr. Carter, in his argument referred to infra, said, "The Roman law, that wonderful result of reason working upon a basis of abstract right, is largely appealed to in international discussions, as containing rules which, at least by analogy, may serve to settle international disputes. No one can be an accomplished diplomatist without a familiar acquaintance with much of this immortal code" (citing Phill. Int. Law 14-28). "Not only," says another commentator, "has the Roman law been preserved in the municipal and ecclesiastical jurisprudence of modern Europe: it has also exercised a marked influence on the growth of that body of rules by which the states of Europe are bound together in one moral commonwealth." Morey, Rom. Law § 207.

And Sir Henry Maine, in endeavoring to determine the place of international law in the general development of European jurisprudence, concludes that we may answer pretty confidently that its rapid advance to acceptance by civilized nations was a stage, though a very late stage, in the diffusion of Roman law over Europe; Int. L. 16. And the same writer says further on: "It is sometimes difficult to be quite sure how Grotius and his successors distinguished rules of the Law of Nature from religious rules prescribed by inspired writers. But that they did draw a distinction is plain. Grotius' famous work, the De Jure Belli ac Pacis, is in great part composed of examples supplied by the language and conduct of heathen statesmen, generals, and sovereigns, whom he could not have supposed to know anything of inspired teaching. If we assume him to have believed that the most humane and virtuous of the acts and opinions which he quotes, were prompted by an instinct derived from a happier state of the human race, when it was still more directly shaped and guided by Divine authority, we should probably have got as near his conception as possible. As time has gone on, some parts of this basis of thought have proved to be no longer tenable. . . . But nevertheless the system founded on an imaginary reconstruction of it, more and more calmed the fury of angry belligerency, and supplied a framework to which more advanced principles of humanity and convenience easily adjusted themselves."

It may be suggested that not alone through the jus feciale is the intimate connection of Roman law with modern international law to be sought. Those laws it is truly said concerned mainly, if not only, embassies, the declaration of war, and the making of peace; see FECIAL LAWS; but, after all, the relation of Rome to other states involved little more than questions of war or peace, and with these their only embassies were concerned. So that those laws did control all of foreign relations which then existed.

But after the jus civile, the law of a city, was replaced by the jus gentium, the law for the civilized world. as Sohm aptly puts it (Inst. Rom. I. § 13), we find the real foundation on which Grotius and those who came after him erected a stately modern structure. The jus gentium was an expression of what is variously termed natural law, universal morality, moral law, divine law, applied to the relations of states,—not independent ones (for there were none such contemplated under the empire), but readily adapted to the relations of sovereign and equal states. Perhaps the system and the principles framed for use by states bound together by the bonds of the empire were not less easily adapted to the use to which they have been put by the family of nations, in theory absolutely independent, but in practice rendered more interdependent even than the components of the empire by community of interest, commercial relations, mutual reliance on the exchange of products, and above all the unifying influence of modern civilization in its annihilation of the natural barriers of time and space.]

So much for the general foundation of international law. The particular sources are the jural and the moral. The jural elements are, first, the rights of states as such, deducible from the nature of the state and from its office of a protector to those who live under its law; second, those rights which the state shares with individuals, and in part with artificial persons, as the rights of property, contract, and reputation; and, third, the rights which arise when it is wronged, as those of self-protection and redress. To these have been joined by some the rights of punishment and of conquest,—the latter, at least, without good reason; for there is and can be no naked right of conquest, irrespective of redress and self-protection. The moral elements are the duties of humanity, comity, and intercourse.

[The propriety of the phrase "international law" has been challenged as being, strictly speaking, inexact. Among those who have taken this view was the late Lord Coleridge, who said that "Law implies a lawgiver and a tribunal capable of enforcing it and coercing its transgressors." This view, however, accepts the theory of Austin's definition of the law, as the command of a superior with coercive power. Lord Russell of Killowen, in his address before the American Bar Association in 1896, contended for the substantial accuracy of the term law in this connection; he considered Austin's definition as applying rather to the later development of arbitrary power than to that body of customary law which, in earlier stages of society, precedes law strictly so called, but which is made up of rules and customs which are laws in every real sense of the word, as for example the law merchant. And he continues; "in stages later still, as government becomes more frankly democratic, resting broadly on the popular will, laws bear less and less the character of commands, imposed by a coercive authority and acquire more and more the character of customary law founded on consent."

Addressing himself to the question what is international law, he defines it to be "the sum of the rules or usages which civilized states have agreed shall be binding upon them in their dealings with one another." He takes issue with the theory that there is any a priori rule of right of reason or of morality, or law of nature, which, by its own force, apart from and independently of the consent of nations, is part of the law of nations, and insists that international law is neither more nor less than what civilized nations have agreed shall be binding on one another as international law.

This was a repetition from an academic standpoint of views expressed by their author in a forensic spirit before the Paris tribunal of arbitration in 1893.

At that time the opposing view of the foundation and sources of international law was stated with great clearness by Mr. James C. Carter, counsel for the United States, substantially as follows: The rules which govern the mutual relation of states in their corporate capacity are "properly law, because they have been established by particular states as a part of their own municipal system, and are enforced . . . in the same manner as other portions of the local codes. They are in fact principles of the law of nature or morality put in the form of human command, and clothed with a human sanction." International law, in its general sense, he terms international morality, consisting of rules founded upon justice and equity and deduced by right reason, having no binding force in themselves as law, but observed in deference to the general public opinion of Christendom by a conviction that they are right in themselves, or at least expedient, or by fear of provoking hostilities. This moral sanction is so strong that it may be said to create rights and corresponding duties which belong to and devolve upon independent states; accordingly, a large portion of international law is rather a branch of ethics than of positive human jurisprudence, the sources of which are: 1. The Divine law; 2. enlightened reason; 3. the consent of nations. He contended that international law could not be confined within the limits of mere precedents or previously recognized rules for regulating the action of sovereign states, but being largely the result of enlightened reason acting upon the abstract principles of morality, "it is, as a science, the most progressive of any department of jurisprudence or legislation. The improvement of civilized nations in culture and refinement, the more complete understanding of rights and duties, the growing appreciation of the truth that what is right is also expedient, have told, and still do tell upon it with sudden and surprising effect."

"The result is that doctrines which were universally received a generation since are as universally rejected now; that precedents which were universally considered as binding a quarter of a century ago, would, at the present, be passed by as without force, as acts which could not endure the light of more modern investigation."

In the same line is the view of Professor Lorimer, who in his Institutes of the Law of Nations defines it to be: "the law of nature, realized in the relations of separate political communities."

On the other hand the view of Lord Russell of Killowen is thus expressed by Mr. Hall in his Treatise on International Law: "Existing rules are the sole standard of conduct or law of present authority; and changes and improvements in those rules can only be effected through the same means by which they were originally formed, namely, by growth in harmony with changes in the sentiments and external conditions of the body of states."

Various divisions of international law have been proposed, but none are of any great importance. One has been into natural and voluntary law, in which latter conventional or treaty law and customary are embraced. Another, somewhat similar, separates international rules into those which are deducible from general natural jus, those which are derived from the idea of estate, and those which grow out of simple compact. Whatever division be made, it is to be observed that nations are voluntary, first, in deciding the question what intercourse they will hold with each other; second, that they are voluntary in defining their rights and obligations, moral claims and duties, although these have an objective existence beyond the control of the will of nations; and, third, that when international law has arisen by the free assent of those who enter into certain arrangements, obedience to its provisions is as truly in accordance with natural law—which requires the observance of contracts—as if natural law had been intuitively discerned or revealed from heaven and no consent had been necessary at the outset.

The aids in ascertaining what international law is or has been, are derived from the sea codes of mediæval Europe, especially the Consolato del Mare; from treaties, especially those in which a large part of Europe has had a share, like the treaties of Westphalia; from judicial decisions, state papers on controverted points, and the treatises of text-writers. Among the latter, Grotius led the way in the seventeenth century, while Puffendorf, fifty years afterwards, from his having confounded the law of nature with that of nations, has sunk into deserved oblivion. In the next century, Cornelius van Bynkershoek, although the author of no continuous work embracing the whole of our science, ranks among its ablest expounders, through his treatises entitled, De Dominio Maris, De Foro Legatorum, and Quæstiones Juris Publici. In the middle of the eighteenth century, Vattel, a disciple of the Wolfian philosophy, published a clear but somewhat superficial treatise, which has had more than its due share of popularity down to the present day. Of the very numerous modern works we can only name that of Klüber, in French and German (1819 and since), that of De Martens, which came to a fifth edition in 1855, and those of Wheaton and of Heffter, which last two are leading authorities,—the former for the English-speaking lands, the latter for the Germans. The literature of the science must be drawn from Von Ompteda and his continuator, Von Kamptz, or from the more recent work of Von Mohl (Erlangen, 1855-58), in which, also, an exposition of the history is included. The excellent works of Ward (Inquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations, etc.), and of Wheaton (History of the Law of Nations from the Earliest Times to the Treaty of Washington in 1842), are of the highest use to all who would study the science, as it ought to be studied as the offshoot and index of a progressive Christian civilization.

Among the provisions of international law, we naturally start from those which grow out of the essence of the individual state. The rights of the state, as such, may be comprised under the term sovereignty, or be divided into sovereignty, independence, and equality; by which latter term is intended equality of rights. Sovereignty and independence are two sides of the same property, and equality of rights necessarily belongs to sovereign states, whatever be their size or constitution; for no reason can be assigned why all states, as they have the same powers and destination in the system of things, should not have identically the same rights. States are thus, as far as other states are concerned, masters over themselves and over their subjects, free to make such changes in their laws and constitutions as they may choose, and yet incapable, by any change, whether it be union, or separation, or whatever else, of escaping existing obligations. With regard to every state, international law only asks whether it be such in reality, whether it actually is invested with the properties of a state. With forms of government international law has nothing to do. All forms of government, under which a state can discharge its obligations and duties to others, are, so far as this code is concerned, equally legitimate. See GOVERNMENT; SOVEREIGNTY.

Thus, the rule of non-intervention in the affairs of other states is a well-settled principle of international law. In the European system, however, there is an acknowledged exception to this rule, and also a claim on the part of certain states to a still wider departure from the rule of non-intervention, which other states have not as yet admitted. See INTERVENTION.

It is conceded that any political action of any state or states which seriously threatens the existence or safety of others, any disturbance of the balance of power, may be resisted and put down. This must be regarded as an application of the primary principle of self-preservation to the affairs of nations.

But while certain states claim a right to interfere in the internal affairs of others in order to suppress constitutional movements and the action of a people without its own sphere, this is as yet an unauthorized ground of interference. The plea here is, on the part of those states which have asserted such a right, especially of Austria, Prussia, Russia, and at times of France, that internal revolutions are the result of wide-spread conspiracies, and if successful anywhere, are fatal to the peace and prosperity of all absolute or non-constitutional governments. The right, if admitted, would destroy by an international law all power of the people in any state over their government, and would place the smaller states under the tutelage of two or three of the larger. England has always protested against this enlargement of the right of interference, and France has established more than one revolutionary government in spite of it. See INTERVENTION.

In the notion of sovereignty is involved paramount exclusive jurisdiction within a certain territory. As to the definition of territory, international law is tolerably clear. Besides the land and water included within the line of boundary separating one state from another, it regards as territory the coast-water to the distance of a marine league, and the portions of sea within lines drawn between headlands not very remote, or, in other words, those parts of the sea which are closely connected with a particular country when it needs to defend itself against attack. The high sea, on the other hand, is free, and so is every avenue from one part of the sea to another, which is necessary for the intercourse of the world. It has been held that rivers are exclusively under the jurisdiction of countries through which they flow, so that the dwellers on their upper waters have no absolute right of passage to and from the sea; but practically, at present, all the rivers which divide or run through different states are free for all those who live upon them, if not for all mankind. It has been claimed that ships are territory; but it is safer to say that they are under the jurisdiction of their own state until they come within that of another state. By comity, public vessels are exempt from foreign jurisdiction, whether in foreign ports or elsewhere. See HIGH SEAS; FAUCES TERRÆ; NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The relations of a state to aliens, especially within its borders, come next under review. Here it cannot be affirmed that a state is bound, in strict right, to admit foreigners into or to allow them transit across its territory, or even to hold intercourse with them. All this may be its duty and perhaps, when its territory affords the only convenient pathway to the rest of the world, or its commodities are necessary to others of mankind, transit and intercourse may be enforced. But, aside from these extreme cases, intercourse is only a duty, and not definable with precision, as is shown by the endless varieties of commercial treaties. It can only be said that the practice of Christian states is growing more and more liberal, both as regards admitting foreigners into their territories and to the enjoyment of those rights of person and property which the natives possess, and as regards domiciliating them, or even incorporating them, afterwards, if they desire it, into the body politic. See ALIEN; NATURALIZATION.

[Formerly all criminals of one country who escaped into another were safe from pursuit. In modern times extradition treaties have been made providing for their return, but extradition has been regarded as a matter of treaty, and not an international duty. Political offenders are not usually extradited. In Spain and the Spanish American States a legation may grant asylum to persons charged with offences, but this right is not allowed in other countries. Nor can ships of war, as a rule, grant asylum except possibly in cases of political offenders. French naval officers are given the right to refuse asylum under any circumstances, but are forbidden to permit any pursuit or search of their vessels provided a refugee is once given asylum; Snow, Int. Law 38. See 17 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th. 93; Whart. Dig. Int. L. § 104; EXTRADITION; ASYLUM; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.]

The multiplied and very close relations which have arisen between nations in modern times, through domiciled or temporary residents, have given rise to the question: What law, in particular cases involving personal status, property, contracts, family rights, and succession, shall control the decisions of the courts? Shall it be always the lex loci, or sometimes some other? The answers to these questions are given in private international law, or the conflict of law, as it is sometimes called,—a very interesting branch of law, as showing how the Christian nations are coming from age to age nearer to one another in their views of the private relations of men. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI.

Intercourse needs its agents, both those whose office it is to attend to the relations of states and the rights of their countrymen in general, and those who look after the commercial interests of individuals. The former share with public vessels, and with sovereigns travelling abroad, certain exemptions from the law of the land to which they are sent. Their persons are ordinarily inviolate; they are not subject to foreign civil or criminal jurisdiction; they are generally exempt from imposts; they have liberty of worship, and a certain power over their trains, who likewise share their exemptions. Only within five centuries have ambassadors resided permanently abroad—a change which has had an important effect on the relations of states. Consuls have almost none of the privileges of ambassadors, except in countries beyond the pale of Christianity. See AMBASSADOR.

Nations, like individuals, have the right of contracts, and their treaties are subject to the same rules of interpretation and of morality which govern in municipal law. An interesting description of treaties are those of guaranty, by which sometimes a right of intervention in the affairs of other states is secured beforehand.

But treaties may be broken, and all other rights invaded; and there is no court of appeal (except by arbitration) where wrongs done by states can be tried. The rights of self-defence and of redress now arise, and are of such importance that but for redress by force or war, and to prevent war, international law would be a very brief science. The laws and usages of modern warfare show a great advance of the nations in humanity since the middle ages. The following are among the leading principles and usages:—

That declarations of war, as formerly practised, are unnecessary; the change in this respect being due chiefly to the intimate knowledge which nations now have, through resident ambassadors and in other ways, of each other's movements and dispositions.

That at the opening of war the subjects of one hostile state within the territory of another are protected in their persons and property, and this notwithstanding it is conceded that by strict right such property is liable to confiscation.

That war is waged between states, and by the active war agents of the parties, but that non-combatants are to be uninjured in person and property by an invading army. Contributions or requisitions, however, are still collected from a conquered or occupied territory, and property is taken for the uses of armies at a compensation.

That combatants, when surrendering themselves in battle, are spared, and are to be treated with humanity during their captivity, until exchanged or ransomed.

That even public property, when not of a military character, is exempt from the ordinary operations of war, unless necessity requires the opposite course.

That in the storming of inhabited towns great license has hitherto been given to the besieging party; and this is one of the blots of modern as well as of ancient warfare. But humane commanders avoid the bombardment of fortified towns as far as possible; while mere fortresses may be assailed in any manner.

The laws of sea-warfare have not as yet come up to the level of those of land-warfare. Especially is capture allowed on the sea in cases where it would not occur on the land. Yet there are indications of a change in this respect; privateering has been abandoned by many states (the first article of the Declaration of Paris recites that "Privateering is and remains abolished"), and there is a growing demand that all capture upon the sea, even from enemies, except for violation of the rules of contraband, blockade, and search, shall cease. See CAPTURE; PRIVATEER.

When captures are made on the sea, the title, by modern law, does not fully vest in the captor at the moment, but needs to pass under the revision of a competent court. The captured vessel may be ransomed on the sea, unless municipal law forbids, and the ransom is of the nature of a safe-conduct. If a vessel is recaptured, or rescued from other perils, a compensation is due to the rescuer, which is called salvage, which see.

In modern international law, questions of neutrality play a great part. A neutral is one, strictly, who affords assistance to neither party; for assistance afforded to both alike, in almost every case, would benefit one party and be of little use to the other. The neutral territory, on land and sea, must be untouched by the war; and for all violations of this rule the neutral can take or demand satisfaction.

The principal liabilities of neutral trade are the following:—

In regard to the nationality of goods and vessels, the rule, on the whole, has been that enemy's goods were exposed to capture on any vessel, and neutral's goods were safe on any vessel, and that the neutral vessel was not guilty for having enemy's goods on board. Owing to the declaration of the Peace of Paris in 1856, the humane rule that free ships make free goods will no doubt become universal.

Certain articles of especial use in war are called contraband, and are liable to capture. But the list has been stretched by belligerents, especially by England, so as to include naval stores and provisions; and then, to cure the hardship of the rule, another—the rule of pre-emption—has been introduced. The true doctrine with regard to contraband seems to be that nothing can be so called unless nations have agreed so to consider it; or, in other words, that articles cannot become occasionally contraband owing to the convenience of a belligerent. See CONTRABAND.

An attempt of a neutral ship to enter a blockaded place is a gross violation of neutrality; and, as in cases of contraband trade the goods, so here the guilty vessel is confiscated. But blockade must exist in fact, and not alone upon paper, must be made known to neutrals, and, if discontinued, must be resumed with a new notification. See BLOCKADE.

To carry out the rights of war, the right of search is indispensable; and such search ought to be submitted to without resistance. Search is exclusively a war right, excepting that vessels in peace can be arrested near the coast on suspicion of violating revenue laws, and anywhere on suspicion of piracy. The slave trade, not being piracy by the law of nations (though it is piracy by statute in the United States, Great Britain, and other countries), vessels of other nations cannot be searched on suspicion of being engaged in this traffic. And here comes in the question which has agitated the two leading commercial states of Christendom: How shall it be known that a vessel is of a nationality which renders search unlawful? The English claim, and justly, that they have a right to ascertain this simple fact by detention and examination; the United States contend that if in so doing mistakes are committed, compensation is due, and to this England has agreed. INTERNUNCIO. A Papal minister of the second order, accredited to minor states where there is no nuncio (q. v.).

INTERPLEADER. In Practice. A proceeding in the action of detainee, by which the defendant states the fact that the thing sued for is in his hands, and that it is claimed by a third person, and that whether such person or the plaintiff is entitled to it is unknown to the defendant, and thereupon the defendant prays that a process of garnishment may be issued to compel such third person so claiming to become defendant in his stead. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law c. 23; Mitt. Eq. Pl. 141; Story, Eq. Jur. § 800; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 141. Interpleader is allowed to avoid inconvenience; for two parties claiming adversely to each other cannot be entitled to the same thing; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader 4; hence the rule which requires the defendant to allege that different parties demand the same thing.

If two persons sue the same person in detainee for the thing, and both actions are depending in the same court at the same time, the defendant may plead that fact, produce the thing (e. g. a deed or charter) in court, and aver his readiness to deliver it to either as the court shall adjudge, and thereupon pray that they may interplead. In such a case it has been settled that the plaintiff whose writ bears the earliest teste has the right to begin the interpleading, and the other will be compelled to answer; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader, 2.

For the law in regard to interpleader in equity, see BILL OF INTERPLEADER.

Under the Pennsylvania practice, when goods levied upon by the sheriff are claimed by a third party, the sheriff takes a rule of interpleader on the parties, upon which, when made absolute, a feigned issue is framed, and the title to the goods is tested. The goods, pending the proceedings, remain in the custody of the defendant upon the execution of a forthcoming bond.

INTERPOLATION. In Civil Law. The act by which, in consequence of an agreement, the party bound declares that he will not be bound beyond a certain time. Wolff, Inst. Nat. § 752.

In the case of a lease from year to year, or to continue as long as both parties please, a notice given by one of them to the other of a determination to put an end to the contract would bear the name of interpolation.

INTERPRETATION. The discovery and representation of the true meaning of any signs used to convey ideas. Lieber, Leg. and Pol. Hermeneutics.

The "true meaning" of any signs is that meaning which those who used them were desirous of expressing. A person adopting or sanctioning them "uses" them as well as their immediate author. Both parties to an agreement equally make use of the signs declaratory of that agreement, though one only is the originator, and the other may be entirely passive. The most common signs used to convey ideas are words. When there is a contradiction in signs intended to agree, resort must be had to construction,—that is, the drawing of conclusions from the given signs, respecting ideas which they do not express. Construction is usually confounded with interpretation; and in common use, construction is generally employed in the law in a sense that is properly covered by both, when each is used in a sense strictly and technically correct; Cooley, Const. Lim. 49. A distinction between the two, first made in the Leg. and Pol. Hermeneutics, has been adopted by Greenleaf and other American and European jurists. Hermeneutics includes both. See CONSTRUCTION.

Close interpretation (interpretatio restricta) is adopted if just reasons, connected with the formation and character of the text, induce us to take the words in their narrowest meaning. This species of interpretation has generally been called literal, but the term is inadmissible. Lieber, Herm. 66.

Extensive interpretation (interpretatio extensiva), called, also, liberal interpretation adopts a more comprehensive signification of the word.

Extravagant interpretation (interpretatio excedens) is that which substitutes a meaning evidently beyond the true one: it is, therefore, not genuine interpretation.

Free or unrestricted interpretation (interpretatio soluta) proceeds simply on the general principles of interpretation in good faith, not bound by any specific or superior principle.

Limited or restricted interpretation (interpretatio limitata) is when we are influenced by other principles than the strictly hermeneutic ones. Ernesti, Institutio Interpretis.

Predestined interpretation (interpretatio predestinata) takes place if the interpreter, laboring under a strong bias of mind, makes the text subservient to his preconceived views or desires. This includes artful interpretation (interpretatio vaser), by which the interpreter seeks to give a meaning to the text other than the one he knows to have been intended.

The civilians divide interpretation into :-- Authentic (interpretatio authentica), which proceeds from the author himself.

Usual (interpretatio usualis), when the interpretation is on the ground of usage.

Doctrinal (interpretatio doctrinalis), when made agreeably to rules of science. Doctrinal interpretation is subdivided into extensive, restrictive, and declaratory : extensive, whenever the reason of a proposition has a broader sense than its terms, and it is consequently applied to a case which had not been explained ; restrictive, when the expressions have a greater latitude than the reasons ; and declaratory, when the reasons and terms agree, but it is necessary to settle the meaning of some term or terms to make the sense complete.

The following are the elementary principles and rules of interpretation and construction, which are here given together on account of their intimate connection and the difficulty of separating them.

There can be no sound interpretation without good faith and common sense. The object of all interpretation and construction is to ascertain the intention of the authors, even so far as to control the literal signification of the words ; for verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Words are, therefore, to be taken as those who used them intended, which must be presumed to be in their popular and ordinary signification, unless there is some good reason for supposing otherwise, as where technical terms are used : quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est. When words have two senses, of which one only is agreeable to the law, that one must prevail ; Cowp. 714 ; when they are inconsistent with the evident intention, they will be rejected ; 2 Atk. 32 ; when words are inadvertently omitted, and the meaning is obvious, they will be supplied by inference from the context, see 54 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 933. When language is susceptible of two meanings, one of which would work a forfeiture, while the other would not, the latter must prevail ; 71 Wis. 177.

In Constitutions. The following principles governing the construction of state constitutions are laid down by Judge Cooley. The construction must be uniform and unvarying ; 13 Mich. 138 ; 19 How. 393 ; and sensible, so as to effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, avoid an unjust or absurd conclusion ; 144 U. S. 47. The object of construction is to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it ; this intent is to be found in the instrument itself ; Miller, Const. U. S. 100 ; Ordon.

Const. Leg. 575 ; 2 Hill, N. Y. 35. The whole is to be examined with a view to arriving at the true intention of each part ; it is not to be supposed that any words have been employed without occasion, or without intent that they should have effect as part of the law ; if different portions should seem to conflict, the courts should harmonize them, if practicable, and should lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory ; 8 W. Va. 320 ; 2 Paine 584 ; 27 Wisc. 478. It must be presumed that words have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning ; 9 Wheat. 183 ; but technical words are presumed to have been employed in their technical sense. See Cooley, Const. Lim. ch. iv. Where two provisions of a constitution are irreconcilably repugnant, that which is last in order of time and local position will prevail ; 7 Ind. 570.

In Statutes. In construing written laws, it is the intent of the law-giver which is to be enforced ; this intent is found in the law itself. The first resort is to the natural significance of the words employed, in their order of grammatical arrangement ; 7 N. Y. 9, 97 ; Cooley, Const. Lim. 70 ; 130 U. S. 670 ; 60 Ill. 86. The whole law is to be examined, with a view to arrive at the true intention of each part ; Co. Litt. 381 a. It is a general rule, in the construction of writings, that a general intent appearing, it shall control the particular intent ; but a particular intent plainly expressed in one place must sometimes prevail over a general intent deduced from other parts of the writing ; 5 Tex. 441.

Where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms, whether those terms are general or limited, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction ; 130 U. S. 671 ; 99 id. 72 ; 2 Cranch 399. Statutes should receive a sensible construction, such as will effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, so as to avoid an unjust or absurd conclusion ; 144 U. S. 47.

Penal statutes must be strictly interpreted ; remedial ones liberally ; 1 Bla. Com. 88 ; 6 W. & S. 276 ; 3 Taunt. 377 ; see 120 U. S. 678 ; 134 id. 624 ; and generally, in regard to statutes, the construction given them in the country where they were enacted will be adopted elsewhere. Though penal statutes are to be strictly construed, yet the intention of the legislature must govern ; 134 U. S. 624.

Statutes should be so construed, if practicable, that one section will not destroy another, but explain and support it ; 147 U. S. 242.

The change of conditions as well as of the meaning of words in their ordinary use frequently creates difficulties in the application of statutes which in England led to the passage, in 1889, of the stat. 52 and 53 Vict. c. 63, known as the General Interpretation Act, which was intended to cover the whole subject of statutory interpretation. A synopsis of its provisions, together with an instructive collation of words having a marked difference in their ordinary and judicial meaning, will be found in Ordre-maux, Const. Leg. c. xi. In this country the subject is not so comprehensively treated, but there will usually be found in the general statutes of each state a chapter defining the meaning of certain words as used in the statutes.

In Contracts. There must always be reference to the surrounding circumstances and the object the parties intended to accomplish; 116 Ind. 60; 77 Ga. 36; and when the language is indefinite or ambiguous and of doubtful construction, the practical interpretation by the parties is of great weight, if not controlling; 122 U. S. 121. Where there was a doubt as to the nature of a contract, the court adopted its view of it, and held that even if the meaning were doubtful, the court would follow the interpretation put upon it by both parties in good faith; 74 Fed. Rep. 183. Impossible things cannot be required. The subject-matter and nature of the context, or its objects, causes, effects, consequences, or precedents, or the situation of the parties, must often be consulted in order to arrive at their intention, as when words have, when literally construed, either no meaning at all or a very absurd one. The whole of an instrument must be viewed together and not each part taken separately; and effect must be given to every part, if possible; 37 Minn. 338. Assistance must be sought from the more near before proceeding to the remote. When one part is totally repugnant to the rest, it will be stricken out; but if it is only explanatory, it will operate as a limitation. Reference to the lex loci or the usage of a particular place or trade is frequently necessary in order to explain the meaning; 2 B. & P. 164; 3 Stark. Ev. 1036; 16 S. & R. 126. A court of law should read a written contract according to the obvious intention of the parties, in spite of clerical errors or omissions which can be corrected by perusing the whole instrument; 55 N. J. L. 132; 16 Or. 283.

In the construction of a contract it is proper to consider the course of dealing between the parties, and the construction they had by their actions put on previous contracts between them of the same general character; 155 Pa. 22; 12 U. S. App. 193; 44 Ill. App. 627; 8 Misc. Rep. 61; 50 Fed. Rep. 764; 124 U. S. 505.

Words spoken cannot vary the terms of a written agreement; they may overthrow it. Words spoken at the time of the making of a written agreement are merged in the writing; 5 Co. 26; 2 B. & C. 634; 4 Taunt. 779. Where there is a latent ambiguity which arises only in the application and does not appear upon the face of the instrument, it may be supplied by other proof; ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; 1 Dall. 426; 3 S. & R. 609.

The rule that an agreement is to be construed most strongly against the party benefited can only be applied in doubtful cases; 125 U. S. 260; and when other rules of interpretation fail; 11 Col. 50. The more the text partakes of a solemn compact, the stricter should be its construction.

General expressions used in a contract are controlled by the special provisions therein. In agreements relating to real property, the lex rei sitæ prevails, in personal contracts the lex loci contractus, except when they are to be performed in another country, and then the law of the latter place governs; 2 Mass. 88; 1 Pet. 317; Story, Conf. Laws § 242; 4 Cow. 410, note; 2 Kent 39, 457. When there are two repugnant clauses in a deed, which cannot stand together, the first prevails. With a will the reverse is the case. In all instruments the written part controls the printed, if the two are inconsistent; 78 Hun 23; 13 Gray 37; 150 U. S. 312; 25 Neb. 849; 62 Mich. 546; 84 Ala. 109; when a contract is embodied in several instruments, its true meaning is to be ascertained from a consideration of all the instruments and their effect upon each other; 24 Fla. 560; 98 Mo. 315; 86 Ky. 141; 41 Kan. 763.

In addition to the above rules, there are many presumptions of law relating to agreements, such as, that the parties to a simple contract intend to bind their personal representatives; that where several parties contract without words of severalty, they are presumed to bind themselves jointly; that every grant carries with it whatever is necessary to its enjoyment; when no time is mentioned, a reasonable time is meant; and other presumptions arising out of the nature of the case. It is the duty of the court to interpret all written instruments; see 10 Mass. 384; 3 Cra. 180; 3 Rand. 586; 10 U. S. App. 352; 7 Misc. Rep. 710; 150 Pa. 8; written evidence; 2 Watts 347; and foreign laws; 1 Pa. 388; and where the terms of a parol agreement are shown without any conflict of evidence; 47 Mo. App. 1; 114 Mo. 55; 155 Pa. 67; contracts are to be construed liberally in favor of the public, when the subject-matter concerns the interests of the public 138; U. S. 1.

See CONSTRUCTION; IN MITIORI SENSU.

INTERPRETATION CLAUSE. A clause frequently inserted in Acts of Parliament, declaring the sense in which certain words used therein are to be understood. Moz. & W.

INTERPRETER. One employed to make a translation.

An interpreter should be sworn before he translates the testimony of a witness; 4 Mass. 81; 5 id. 219; 2 Caines 155.

A person employed between an attorney and a client to act as interpreter is considered merely as the organ between them, and is not bound to testify as to what he has acquired in those confidential communications; 1 Pet. C. C. 356; 4 Munf. 273; 3 Wend. 337.

Communications made to an interpreter are not hearsay when he translates and communicates what has been said to him, and the party to whom it is made may testify to it; 50 Minn. 91. Conversations carried on through an interpreter may be shown by either party thereto or a third person who hears it, its weight only and not its competency being affected thereby; 157 Mass. 393.

INTERREGNUM (Lat.). The period, in case of an established government, which elapses between the death of a sovereign and the accession of another, is called interregnum. The vacancy which occurs when there is no government.

INTERROGATOIRE. In French Law. An act, or instrument, which contains the interrogatories made by the judge to the person accused, on the facts which are the object of the accusation, and the answers of the accused. Pothier, Proc. Crim. s. 4, art. 2, § 1.

INTERROGATORIES. Material and pertinent questions in writing, to necessary points, exhibited for the examination of witnesses or persons who are to give testimony in the cause.

They are either original and direct on the part of him who produces the witnesses, or cross and counter, on behalf of the adverse party, to examine witnesses produced on the other side. Either party, plaintiff or defendant, may exhibit original or cross interrogatories.

The form which interrogatories assume is as various as the minds of the persons who propound them. They should be as distinct as possible, and capable of a definite answer; and they should leave no loop-holes for evasion to an unwilling witness. Care must be observed to put no leading questions in original interrogatories, for these always lead to inconvenience; and for scandal or impertinence interrogatories will, under certain circumstances, be suppressed. See Willis, Int. passim; Gresl. Eq. Ev. pt. 1, c. 3, s. 1; Viner, Abr.; Hind. Ch. Pr. 317; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4419 et seq.; Daniell, Ch. Pr.

INTERRUPTION. The effect of some act or circumstance which stops the course of a prescription or act of limitations. 3 Bligh, n. s. 444; 4 M. & W. 497.

Civil interruption is that which takes place by some judicial act.

Natural interruption is an interruption in fact. 4 Mas. 404; 2 Y. & J. 285. See EASEMENTS; LIMITATIONS; PRESCRIPTION.

In Scotch Law. The true proprietor's claiming his right during the course of prescription Bell, Dict.

INTERSECTION. The point of intersection of two roads is the point where their middle lines intersect. 73 Pa. 127; 74 id. 259.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION. A commission of five persons appointed by the president under the act of February 4, 1887, to carry out the purpose of the act. It sits usually in Washington, but can hold sittings at such other places as it may choose.

The Constitution of the United States, Art. I, Sec. 8, gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." The Interstate Commerce Act was passed on February 4th, and took effect on April 5th, 1887. It was amended March 2, 1889; February 10, 1891; February 8, 1895; supplementary acts were passed February 11, 1893; March 2, 1893; August 7, 1888. It applies to all common carriers "engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad or partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment," between states or states and territories; between states or territories and the District of Columbia; between places in the United States and any adjacent foreign country; between places in the United States when any part of the transportation is through an adjacent foreign country; and to transportation of property from any place in the United States to a foreign country which is carried from such place to a port of transshipment, and to property shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States, and carried to such place from a port of entry, either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country. It does not apply to the transportation of persons or property, etc., wholly within a state and not shipped to or from a foreign country. It extends to bridges and ferries used in connection with any railroad. It declares that all charges for services rendered in connection therewith shall be reasonable and just and prohibits all unjust and unreasonable charges.

Sec. 2. The charging of any greater or less compensation for any service rendered any shipper or person than is charged or collected from another for a like and contemporaneous service, etc., is declared to be unlawful.

Sec. 3 forbids the giving any undue or unreasonable preference to one person, etc., or locality over another person or place, or to one description of traffic over another, and prohibits the carrier from subjecting any shipper, locality, or traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage. It imposes a duty to afford reasonable, proper, and equal facilities to connecting carriers, for the interchange of business, without discrimination.

Sec. 4 prohibits charging any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of persons or of like kind of property, under substantially similar conditions, for a shorter than is charged for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

Sec. 5 prohibits any agreement between carriers for the pooling of freights of competing railroads or for dividing their joint earnings.

Sec. 6 provides that the carriers shall print schedules of their rates, duly classified, and file copies with the Commission and post copies in all their stations and offices for public inspection. These must specify terminal charges and any rules affecting the rates. These rates can only be advanced after ten days' public notice and an amendment of the schedules accordingly; nor can they be reduced except after three days' similar notice and the like amendment. Copies of all agreements between two or more carriers for making a line of through transportation are also required to be filed with the Commission. If joint tariffs of rates are provided for, copies of these tariffs must be filed with the Commission. Such publicity is to be given to these joint tariffs as the Commission may direct. This section contains the same requirement as to ten days' notice of any advance and three days' notice of any reduction in the joint rates, as is prescribed respecting the rates of the individual carrier.

Sec. 7 prohibits any scheme between carriers to prevent the continuous transportation of property without change of cars. No breaking of bulk, etc., unless necessary, shall be considered as breaking the continuous passage.

Sec. 8 provides that any carrier committing a breach of this act shall be liable in damages to the person injured, including a counsel fee to be taxed as costs.

By sec. 9 any person aggrieved may complain before the Commission or bring suit in the circuit or district court having jurisdiction, for damages. In the latter cases the court may compel all officers, etc., to appear and testify and to produce the books of the company; but no evidence which they may give shall be used against them in any criminal proceeding.

By sec. 10 any carrier, or, if a corporation, any officer, etc., thereof, guilty of an infraction of the act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000, or if the offence is an unlawful discrimination in rates, to imprisonment for not to exceed two years, or both in the discretion of the court. False billing, classification etc., of goods is made a misdemeanor, whether by the carrier or its officer, or by the shipper, and so is the act of inducing a common carrier to discriminate unjustly.

Sec. 11 creates the Commission, who have authority, by sec. 12 to inquire into the management of the business of common carriers and to enforce the act; they may institute proceedings for that purpose and for the punishment of violations of the act; they may require the production of all necessary books, contracts, etc.

By sec. 13 any person, corporation, association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization or State Railroad Commission may complain before the Commission of any infraction of the act, and the Commission itself may institute any inquiry on its own motion.

By sec. 15 if the Commission find that the act has been contravened, it shall notify the carrier thereof.

By sec. 16 if any carrier refuses to obey an order of the Commission, the latter or any party interested may apply to the circuit court of the district where such carrier has its principal office. Such court shall hear the case speedily, without formal pleadings; the findings of fact of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matter therein stated. If it appear that any lawful order of the Commission has been disobeyed, the court shall enjoin further disobedience thereof. If the matter in dispute exceeds $2,000, either party may appeal.

Common carriers are required to make annual reports to the Commission, and the latter may prescribe a uniform system of keeping accounts.

The act expressly excepts the carriage of property free, or at reduced rates, for the United States, state, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to and from expositions, etc., or the free carriage of destitute persons transported by charitable societies; or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; or giving reduced rates to ministers of religion; or to certain indigent persons; or the exchange of passes between the officers of railroad companies for their officers and employees.

The provisions of the act are declared to be in addition to all remedies by common law or by statute.

By the act of March 2, 1889, the United States courts are given jurisdiction to issue writs of peremptory mandamus commanding the movement of interstate traffic or the furnishing of cars and other transportation facilities.

By the act of February 11, 1893, no person shall be excused from testifying before the Commission, upon the ground that his evidence, documentary or otherwise, will tend to criminate him, etc.; but no person shall be prosecuted (except for perjury before the Commission) by reason of such evidence.

The Commission is made a body corporate, with legal capacity to be a party plaintiff or defendant in the federal courts, by reason of the provision in the act that it "shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed," and that making it lawful for it to apply by petition for the enforcement of its orders; 5 I. C. Rep. 405; * s. c. 162 U. S. 197. It has only administrative powers of supervision and investigation, which fall far short of making it a court, or its action judicial. Its action or

* The decisions of the Commission have been published in a series of Interstate Commerce Commission Reports, 5 vols. The Interstate Commerce Reports, 6 vols., contain the decisions of the Commission and commerce cases in the courts. The former series has been discontinued; it is cited as I. C. C. R.; the latter as I. C. Rep.

conclusions upon matters brought before it is neither final nor conclusive; nor is it vested with any authority to enforce its decision or award. It hears, investigates, and reports upon complaints made before it, but subsequent judicial proceedings are contemplated and provided for in all cases, where the party against whom the decision is rendered does not yield voluntary obedience thereto. Its findings of facts are prima facie evidence in subsequent judicial proceedings brought to enforce its orders. The circuit court is not the mere executioner of the Commission's orders or recommendations. The suit in that court is an original, independent proceeding, and the court hears and determines the cause de novo upon proper pleadings and proofs. The Commission may be regarded as the general referee of the court. The jurisdiction of the court depends upon the fact that it relates to a subject over which congress has exclusive control, independently of the citizenship of the parties; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; see also 56 id. 925. The Commission is authorized and required to execute and enforce the provision of the act. It can investigate, find facts, reach conclusions, and make orders, on complaint made by others, or upon inquiry instituted on its own motion. The conclusions and orders have no binding force; its reported findings of fact alone have legal effect, and its conclusions and recommendations can only be enforced through the courts; 3 I. C. Rep. 151; s. c. 4 I. C. C. R. 116. The Commission is not a court but a special tribunal whose duties though largely administrative, are sometimes semi or quasi judicial; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (U. S. C. C., M. D. of Tenn.); 3 id. 830; s. c. 5 I. C. C. R. 166; it is required to investigate and report, but its final act is not considered as a judgment; id.; its opinion has not the effect of a judicial determination, and, to enforce it, the court, in an original proceeding, hears the complaint de novo; 5 I. C. Rep. 282 (C. C., S. D. of Ohio); s. c. 62 Fed. Rep. 690; the order of the Commission is administrative, and not final or conclusive like the judgment or decree of a court; and the order of the circuit court enforcing it does not make it a final judgment, so that change or modification cannot be made when changed traffic conditions arise; and when the Commission files a petition in a federal court to enforce its findings, they are not conclusive of the facts or entitled to greater weight than a complaint filed by an individual; 49 Fed. Rep. 177; but the finding and opinion were said in another case to be entitled to great weight; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (U. S. C. C., M. D. of Tenn.); s. c. 73 Fed. Rep. 409.

The Commission has authority to investigate and deal with violation of the law independently of any formal complaint; 3 I. C. Rep. 151; it can only determine whether existing rates are in conflict with the statute, and not make rates itself; 5 id. 391; s. c. 162 U. S. 184; 76 Fed. Rep. 183.

It has no power to prescribe rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute, and it cannot secure the same result indirectly by determining what in reference to the past was reasonable and just, and then endeavor to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad company should follow such rates; 167 U. S. 479. It can apply the act only where an overt violation of its provisions by a carrier subject thereto is made to appear; 1 I. C. Rep. 323; s. c. 1 I. C. C. R. 102.

Subject to the two leading prohibitions that their charges shall not be unreasonable or unjust, and that they shall not unjustly discriminate, so as to give undue preference to persons or traffic similarly circumstanced, the act leaves common carriers as they were at common law, free to make special contracts, to classify their traffic, to adjust and apportion their rates, and generally, to manage their important interests upon the same principles which are regarded as sound in other pursuits; 162 U. S. 184; s. c. 5 I. C. Rep. 391 (C. C. of A.); id. 685. The act was not designed to prevent competition between different roads, or to interfere with the customary arrangements made by railway companies for reduced fares in consideration of increased mileage, where such reduction does not operate as an unjust discrimination. It is not all discriminations that are prohibited, but only those that are unjust and unreasonable; 145 U. S. 263, affirming 43 Fed. Rep. 37. The act is not to be construed so as to abridge or take away the common-law right of the carrier to make contracts and adopt proper business methods, further than its terms and recognized purposes require; a railroad company may lawfully charge low rates on coal in the summer months, if its rates are equal to all persons; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

The act should be liberally construed in favor of commerce among the states, but when complaint is made solely or mainly in the interest of the common carriers engaged in such commerce, the act complained of, or the right asserted, should not rest upon any doubtful construction, but should clearly appear to have been forbidden or conferred; 37 Fed. Rep. 567.

Where a railroad company by a contract with a bridge company had the right to use a bridge for its traffic, the railroad company is subject, as a common carrier, to the act, but the bridge company cannot invoke it to compel railroad companies to transact business with it; id. Carriers by water are not under the act except "when both are used under a common control, etc., for a continuous carriage, etc.;" 2 I. C. Rep. 486.

The act does not apply to express companies, independently organized; 42 Fed. Rep. 448; nor to the carriage of property by rail or otherwise wholly within a state; 30 id. 867; when the carrier issues no bills of lading to points beyond its line, receives no freight on through bills of lading, and has no arrangement with other roads for a conventional division of charges or a common management; 77 id. 942; but if a railroad company, whose line is entirely within one state, issues through bills of lading to points in other states, it is within the act; 1 I. C. Rep. 315. Receivers of railroad companies are common carriers and subject to the act; 6 I. C. Rep. 379; and a carrier subject to the act cannot, by leasing its road, free itself from liability for practices illegal under the act, nor after the termination of the lease escape liability for damages for injuries sustained during the lease; 6 I. C. Rep. 378.

The act does not come within the constitutional prohibition as to impairing the obligation of contracts, although its effect may be to prevent the literal enforcement of pre-existing contracts; 2 I. C. Rep. 102; s. c. 2 I. C. C. R. 162; 45 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. (Mont.) 234.

The act requires that all charges by common carriers subject to its provisions "shall be reasonable and just," and this is the sole requirement of the law upon the subject of rates which such carriers may demand for the transportation of interstate traffic; 37 Fed. Rep. 567. The terms "reasonable, just," "unreasonable, unjust," "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," "undue or unreasonable advantage in any respect whatsoever," used in the act imply comparison of relative locations, natural and acquired advantages, of the reasonableness of charges per se and in their relations to other roads or lines which serve competing localities, and consideration of all the facts and circumstances which affect rates to different communities; 6 I. C. Rep. 458.

The act is for the protection of the public only; 2 I. C. Rep. 137; s. c. 2 I. C. C. R. 231.

The mere circumstance that there is in a given case a preference does not, of itself, show that such preference is unreasonable; 5 I. C. Rep. 685 (C. C. of A.); s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 715. See DISCRIMINATION.

Evidence that the rates on a certain commodity are higher in certain cases than certain other rates, and that they produce a large revenue to the carrier, does not make a prima facie case that they are unreasonable. The reasonableness must be determined by an examination of the whole subject; 2 I. C. Rep. 162. The fact that a road earns little more than operating expenses is not to be overlooked in fixing rates, but it cannot be made to justify grossly excessive rates. Wherever there are more roads than the business, at fair rates, will remunerate, they must rely upon future earnings for the return of investments and profits; 2 I. C. Rep. 289.

There is nothing in the act requiring connecting lines of interstate carriers to make through routes and through rates with one connecting line because it has done so with another; 37 Fed. Rep. 567.

The relative fairness of a rate is not determined alone by its being low. Low rates to one place may not be just if still lower rates are given to another place; 2 I. C. Rep. 137. The legitimate interests of carrying companies, as well as of traders and shippers, should be considered in determining the lawfulness of rates under the act. Ocean competition may constitute a dissimilar condition, and conditions which exist beyond the seaboard of the United States can be legitimately regarded for the purpose of justifying a difference in rates charged by railroads between import and domestic traffic; 5 I. C. Rep. 405; s. c. 162 U. S. 197.

Trade centres are not, as a matter of right, entitled to have more favorable rates than the smaller towns for which they form distributive centres; and carriers may give the smaller places rates as favorable as the larger ones; when the rates are impartial in themselves as between large and small towns, the fact that one large centre may have an advantage over another in the business of the small places does not make out a case of undue preference. Impartial rates are not rendered illegal by their effect upon the business of localities; 2 I. C. Rep. 32; that rates should be fixed in inverse proportion to the natural advantages of competing towns with the view of equalizing "commercial conditions" is at variance with justice; 4 I. C. Rep. 65; 7 id. 180. A through rate does not unjustly discriminate against an intermediate point because less proportionally than the rate from such point to the common destination; 2 I. C. Rep. 393.

A railroad company is under special obligation to give reasonable rates for its local business. It may accept business from other carriers on through rates which, when divided between them, will give to any one of them for its division less than its own local rates; 2 I. C. Rep. 414.

Through transportation over connecting lines is favored by the act, and the rate is correctly adjusted upon the distance through, and not upon the shorter distances over, the several lines; 3 I. C. Rep. 460. While the question of distance is important in establishing rates, it is not an absolute and unconditional right from which a departure may not be justified by other considerations. The public benefits, the greater volume of business warranting lower rates to all, and the force of competition may furnish reasons that outweigh a claim of right founded merely on geographical considerations; 2 I. C. Rep. 436. See id. 604.

When rates are on their face disproportionate or relatively unequal, the burden is on the carrier to justify them; 2 I. C. Rep. 604. In determining rates on a short local line, where the cost of service is great, owing to steep grades, sparse population, and light traffic, such circumstances should have much controlling weight. This rule was applied where a road existing under such conditions was charged with unjust rates in transporting oil, as compared with the cost of piping it to the same point; 2 I. C. Rep. 298.

Ordinarily there is no better measure of railroad service in carrying goods than distance, though it is not always controlling. And where the rates for carrying freight from a certain territory over one road are considerably greater than the rates charged by another road from neighboring territory to the same place, the higher rates will be held excessive; 2 I. C. Rep. 609. Greater compensation in the aggregate for the shorter, than for the longer, haul over a direct line is unlawful; 6 I. C. Rep. 361.

Mileage, while a circumstance to be considered with the conditions in fixing rates, is by no means controlling or the most important; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

There may be cases in which a carrier legitimately engaged in serving some territory is compelled by some new and aggressive competition to reduce normal and reasonable rates, to retain business on its line, and where corresponding reductions at points not affected, or less affected, by such competition, might be unreasonable. But when a carrier voluntarily enters a field of competition where, by reason of a disadvantageous route, or the rigor of the competitive conditions, remunerative rates cannot be charged, and its service to a portion of its patrons is unprofitable, it accepts the legal obligation that its service shall be impartial to all who sustain similar relations to the traffic, and for whom the service itself is not substantially dissimilar; 3 I. C. Rep. 115. Where there has been a consolidation of competing lines that have formerly served the same territory in competitive traffic to the same market, the consolidated lines cannot deprive the public of fair competition, nor give oppressive discrimination with a view to its own interest; 3 I. C. Rep. 162.

In fixing reasonable rates on such articles as food products, the operating expenses, bonded debt, fixed charges, dividends on the stock and other necessary expenses are all to be considered, but the claim that any particular rate is to be measured by these as a fixed standard, below which the rate cannot lawfully be reduced, is subject to some qualifications, one of which is that these obligations must be actual and in good faith; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; nor, on the other hand, can these rates be so limited that the shipper may, in all cases, realize actual cost of production; 3 I. C. Rep. 93; S. c. 4 I. C. C. R. 48; in the carriage of great staples which supply an enormous business, and which in market value and actual cost of transportation are among the cheapest articles of commerce, rates yielding only moderate profit to the carrier are both necessary and justifiable; id.

The fact that one company controls parallel lines affords no warrant for giving superior advantages to the patrons of one line and denying similar advantages to those of the other line; 1 I. C. Rep. 608.

Ordinarily no adequate reason exists for a difference in rates for a solid carload of one kind of freight from one consignor and a like carload from the same point to the same destination consisting of freight from more than one consignor to one consignee, etc., and such difference is not justified by the difference in the cost of handling; 2 I. C. Rep. 742.

The Commission has no power to require the adoption of rates on a uniform and equal mileage basis; 2 I. C. Rep. 9.

The expense of carrying fruit, etc., from Jersey City, the railroad terminal, to New York, may be added to the rate charged to the latter place; 6 I. C. Rep. 295. As to the effect of free cartage at terminals, see 167 U. S. 633.

Party-rate tickets are not commutation tickets, and when party rates are lower than the fare for single passengers they are illegal; 2 I. C. Rep. 729. A sale of mileage tickets to commercial travellers, and a refusal to sell to other passengers except at a higher rate, is unjust discrimination within the act; and the fact that the former release the carrier from liability, or that they may influence business in favor of the road, does not justify such discrimination; 1 I. C. Rep. 369. The placing of passenger tickets in the hands of ticket brokers to be disposed of at reduced rates, under the pretence of paying a commission, is a violation of the act; 2 I. C. Rep. 340. A passenger rate war in which rates are repeatedly reduced by carriers without filing tariffs or reducing intermediate rates, is unlawful; id.; granting free transportation to city officials is unjust discrimination within the act; 3 I. C. Rep. 793; s. c. 5 I. C. C. R. 153.

Where the established rate for single passengers is three cents a mile, it is not unlawful to issue what are termed "party-rate tickets" for not less than ten persons, at two cents a mile, which is less than the established rate for single passengers, where such tickets are offered to the public generally; 145 U. S. 263. See 2 I. C. Rep. 445, where the Commission held that party rates and passenger carload rates lower than for single passengers are illegal.

The provision of sec. 22 that nothing in the act shall apply "to the issuance of mileage passenger tickets" applies only to the issuing of such tickets; the terms upon which they are issued must be in accordance with the general provisions of the act; 1 I. C. Rep. 369.

If a reduction in passenger rates be made between competing points, the rates must also be reduced between intermediate points; 2 I. C. Rep. 340.

A greater charge for a shorter haul than for a longer haul is permissible, if the conditions are not in fact "substantially similar," and the carrier may determine this question for itself, subject to a liability for violating the act. It is not necessary first to obtain a ruling from the Commission; 50 Fed. Rep. 295; s. c. 50 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 93.

The act does not prevent the making of the charge less in proportion to the distance for a long than for a short haul; 1 I. C. Rep. 764. The provision of sec. 4 prohibiting a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer distance, the shorter being included within the longer distance, is limited to cases in which the circumstances are substantially similar; nor is it a sufficient justification for such greater charge that the short haul is more expensive to the carrier, unless it be exceptionally so, or that the long haul traffic is exceptionally inexpensive; nor that the lesser charge on the longer haul has for its motive the encouragement of some branch of industry, or to build up business or trade centres, or that it is merely a continuation of favorable rates under which they had been built up; 1 I. C. Rep. 278. The long and short haul clause can be suspended only in exceptional cases, and not where there is only a general reason therefor, however serious the consequences of a refusal may be; id. 73.

The fact that a railroad company makes an unreasonably low rate does not authorize a rival, extending between the same points, to make greater charges for the shorter haul to intermediate points than it does to the terminal; 2 I. C. Rep. 137.

Where a road makes the same charge to one point that it does to another which is only from a third to two-thirds of the same distance, the charge to the shorter point is presumptively illegal; 2 I. C. Rep. 137. Actual water competition of controlling force relating to traffic important in amount, may justify a lower charge for a longer distance than for a shorter distance included therein; 3 I. C. Rep. 80; but disturbance of rates, secret or open, will not; 7 I. C. Rep. 61; nor will competition between markets or between carriers subject to the act; 7 I. C. Rep. 224; nor possible water competition; 3 I. C. Rep. 138. Water competition must be such that the freight would go to its destination by water, if the lower rate were not given; 3 I. C. Rep. 682; s. c. 4 I. C. C. R. 744.

On the ground that "through failure of crops" the people of long distance localities were without necessary food for themselves and animals, a temporary order was made in 6 I. C. Rep. 293, authorizing a carrier to charge less for a longer distance than they were authorized to charge for a shorter distance. And the need of additional facilities for passengers travelling to Chicago during the World's Fair was considered a ground for the same relief; 6 I. C. Rep. 323. An intermediate local rate should never exceed the through rate plus the local rate back to the intermediate place; 2 I. C. Rep. 1.

The classification of freight is expressly recognized by the act; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. But in classifying freights the carrier must respect the interests of the shipper on the basis of relative equality and justice; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. Common carriers should be held responsible for the correctness of the weight and classification of freight received, and in turn should hold every station agent responsible; 1 I. C. Rep. 813.

Lower rates on carload lots than on less quantities are not unlawful; but if the difference be so wide as to destroy competition between large and small dealers, especially upon articles that are of general and necessary use, and that furnish a large volume of business, the act is violated; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. When an article moves in sufficient volume and the demands of commerce will be better served, it is reasonable to give a lower classification for carloads than that which applies to less than carload quantities, but the difference in such classification should not be so wide as to be destructive to competition between large and small dealers; 4 I. C. Rep. 285.

It is the duty of a carrier to equip its road with suitable cars for its traffic and to furnish them alike to all who have occasion for their use; 3 I. C. Rep. 162. The public must be justly and equally served in furnishing cars; if in a time of special pressure, some one must wait, regular customers of the road are not entitled to preference; 1 I. C. Rep. 787. A carrier is not justified in refusing less desirable freights because more money can be made by using its cars in carrying another kind; 1 I. C. Rep. 787. See FACILITIES.

In an action for unjust discrimination in freight charges, under sec. 2, it is sufficient to set out the rates charged plaintiff and another shipper, and the circumstances and conditions under which plaintiff's shipment was made, with an allegation that the smaller charges made the other shipper were for like services, under substantially the same circumstances and conditions, without setting out such circumstances and conditions; 81 Fed. Rep. 80.

It is the duty of a carrier of live stock to provide proper facilities for receiving and discharging live stock free from all charges except the regular transportation charges; and it cannot receive and discharge such live stock at a depot, access to which must be purchased; 1 I. C. Rep. 601.

Under the statute shippers are not to be put in a position of subserviency to common carriers, and are not required to ask for rates, but are entitled to equal and open rates at all times; 2 I. C. Rep. 203.

Complaints, though brought by an individual, may challenge the entire schedule of rates to competing points; 6 I. C. Rep. 458.

The Commission can rehear a particular case and amend its original order therein, although the circuit court may have refused to enforce such original order; 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

In proceedings before the Commission, all offending carriers need not be made parties defendant, but the case may proceed only against the carrier whose lines the complainant uses; 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

The jurisdiction of the circuit court is limited to approval or disapproval, and to an enforcement, or a refusal to enforce, an order of the Commissioners. It cannot modify it; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

The right asserted by a petitioner in the circuit court under the act arises and is claimed under a law of the United States which relates to a subject over which congress has exclusive control; and this is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; 2 L. R. A. 289. A state court has no jurisdiction; 43 La. Ann. 511.

It is not necessary that a person making a complaint before the Commission should have a pecuniary interest in the violation of the statute complained of; it is sufficient if a responsible party complains of a matter which amounts to a public grievance; 1 I. C. Rep. 571; 7 I. C. Rep. 92.

It is not proper for railroad companies to withhold the larger part of their evidence from the Commission, and first adduce it in the circuit court in proceedings by the Commission to enforce its order; the purposes of the act call for a full inquiry by the Commission in the first instance; 5 I. C. Rep. 391; s. c. 162 U. S. 184. It is not necessary to file with a petition for the enforcement of an order of the Commission the transcript of the evidence taken before it, under the provision of the statute making the findings of the fact of the Commission prima facie evidence of the matter stated, but either party may use as evidence any competent testimony taken before the Commission; 5 I. C. Rep. 131; s. c. 64 Fed. Rep. 981. Where the Commission applies for an injunction to restrain a railroad company from disobeying an order of the Commission, a preliminary injunction will not be granted when the company's answer denies the facts upon which the order was based; 49 Fed. Rep. 177. A preliminary injunction will not be granted where the question involved is a new one; or where the injury to the defendant is likely to be greater than the benefit to the plaintiff; id. It is doubtful if a preliminary injunction should ever be granted; 62 Fed. Rep. 690; s. c. 5 I. C. Rep. 287. An action against the carrier for a violation of the act in making unlawful discriminations may be maintained in the name of the United States by the district attorney; 5 I. C. Rep. 106 (U. S. C. C., D. of Kans.). No appeal now lies to the supreme court from decisions of the Commission; 149 U. S. 264.

Under the 5th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," a person under examination by a grand jury, in an investigation into certain alleged violations of the act and its amendments, is not obliged to answer questions where he states that his answers might tend to criminate him; although section 860 of the Revised Statutes provides that no evidence given by him shall in any manner be used against him in any court of the United States in any criminal proceedings. The object of this constitutional provision is to insure that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime; 142 U. S. 547.

The provision in the act of February 11, 1893, "that no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, etc., before the" Commission, on the ground that the testimony, may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but that no such person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any matter concerning which he may testify or produce such evidence, affords absolute immunity against prosecution and deprives the witness of his constitutional right to refuse to answer; 161 U. S. 591; s. c. 5 I. C. Rep. 369. This act is said to have been passed in view of the decision in 142 U. S. 547, supra; see 161 U. S. 594.

The act of February 4, 1887, is not inconsistent with the act of July 2, 1890. "To protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies;" 166 U. S. 290.

So far as congress adopted the language of the English Traffic Act, it is to be presumed that it had in mind the construction given by the English courts to the adopted language; and intended to incorporate it into the statute; 145 U. S. 263.

INTERSTATE RENDITION. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

INTERVENING DAMAGES. Damages suffered by an appellee from delay caused by the appeal. 1 Tyler 267.

INTERVENOR. One not originally a party who, by leave of the court, interposes in a suit and becomes a party thereto to protect a right or interest in the subject-matter.

A person who intervenes in a suit, either on his own behalf or on the behalf of the public. See INTERVENTION.

INTERVENTION (Lat. intervenio, to come between or among). In Practice. The admission, by leave of the court, of a person not an original party to pending legal proceedings, by which such person becomes a party thereto for the protection of some right or interest alleged by him to be affected by such proceedings.

Persons who are not parties to a suit cannot in general file a petition therein for a stay of proceedings or any other cause; the remedy is by original bill. Exceptions are: where the pleadings contain scandal against a stranger, or where a stranger purchases the subject of litigation pending the suit, and the like; creditors are allowed to prove debts and persons belonging to a class on whose behalf the suit is brought are regarded as quasi parties and, of course, may have a standing in court; per Bradley, J., in 2 Woods 628. Third persons may be driven to intervene for their rights in equity if those rights are to be affected, and if at the hearing the court would be compelled to notice their absence and order the case to stand over until they were brought in; 19 Fed. Rep. 659. See 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 287; Story, Eq. Pl. § 220. It is not necessary to the right of intervention, in order to participate in a trust fund in the custody of the law, that the intervenor should first obtain judgment at law or should have any lien upon the fund. Intervention will be granted, after a foreclosure decree against a railroad company, to unsecured note-holders who pray to have their debts established as equitable liens upon the property and funds of the company paramount to the lien of the mortgage; 21 Fed. Rep. 264. A holder of railroad bonds secured by a mortgage under foreclosure has an interest in the amount of the trustee's compensation, which entitles him to intervene and to contest it and to appeal from an adverse decision; 111 U. S. 684. Where a part of a canal was sold and the fund brought into court, it was held that the contractor who built the canal could intervene for the protection of his rights either upon the fund or against the purchaser; 105 U. S. 509. Bondholders in a foreclosure suit brought by the trustee of the mortgage are quasi parties and may be heard for the protection of their interests; 53 Fed. Rep. 850.

If one who is a necessary party to a case in a state court is wrongfully excluded and denied leave to file a proper cross bill and answer and to present a motion for removal to the federal court, he will be treated by the latter court as if a party; 23 Fed. Rep. 356. A case in 8 Fed. Rep. 97 was based on special facts.

Where a suit in equity was properly instituted against a railroad company by a stockholder, a bondholder, and the trustees for the bondholders named in the land grant mortgages of the company, and the bill charged that the officers of the company were squandering its property, and the purpose of the suit was the preservation and administration of the assets of the company, and a decree pro confesso had been entered and a receiver appointed, individual stockholders were not permitted to intervene and file a cross bill on a general charge of fraud and collusion on the part of the receiver and erroneous judgment on the part of the court in making the order referred to. In such a suit, it is not the proper practice to allow individual stockholders to intervene to set aside the proceedings or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. Such stockholders may come in to take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, but not to oppose and nullify them. Rival creditors by proceedings before the master may fix the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object of the suit, to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property. Persons will not be allowed to intervene as general defendants unless they show that they have an interest in the results as stockholders, and are also able to show fraud and collusion between the plaintiff in the suit and the officers of the company; per Bradley, J., in 2 Woods 323. In 3 Hughes 320, the Amsterdam Bondholders' Committee, representing a very large number of bonds, filed a petition setting out the grounds for disapproving their trustees' management of the foreclosure suit, and praying intervention, but leave to intervene was denied; 55 Fed. Rep. 448.

Where the holder of a large amount of bonds, on which foreclosure proceedings were pending, asked leave to intervene, and it appeared that the mortgage trustee was already a party and there was no allegation that it was not acting properly for the interests of all bondholders, leave to intervene was refused (even for the mere purpose of requiring notice to such bondholder of successive steps in the proceedings), on the ground of excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause; Dallas, J., in the Reading Railroad foreclosure, U. S. C. C.

The practice in respect of intervention in ordinary railroad foreclosure cases probably differs somewhat in different circuits, and varies considerably in different cases. The question of the right to intervene by members of a class already represented on the record appears to be rather a matter of discretion, in view of what is deemed best for the due conduct of the cause. Probably the right to be heard will not ordinarily be refused in any case.

There would seem to be a distinction between the intervention of parties for the purpose of sharing in a fund and the intervention of parties in the course of the administration of a railroad property, during receivership. In the latter class of cases, it would appear, from the authorities, that unless good cause be shown for the intervention of new members of a class already represented on the record they will not be allowed to come in, upon the ground stated by Dallas, C. J., in the Reading foreclosure, —the excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause.

In a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage, certain persons prayed leave to intervene, alleging that the defendant company was made up by an illegal consolidation of three other companies, of one of which they were stockholders, that they never consented to the consolidation and were not bound by it nor by the mortgage, that the original company had no officers to defend for them, and that the consolidated company declined to set up the defence which they desired to make; leave to intervene was refused as there was no charge of fraud or collusion, and the proper remedy was by an independent suit; 48 Fed. Rep. 14.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale may be admitted as a party to the record and allowed to appeal; 1 Wall. 655; 2 id. 609; upon failure to ask leave to come in, the court should compel him to become a party of record; 49 Fed. Rep. 426. The purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a junior mortgage who takes subject to a prior mortgage, will be made a party to proceedings to foreclose such prior mortgage; 44 Fed. Rep. 115. Parties given leave to intervene in an equity suit after a degree pro confesso have a right of appeal from a decree affecting their rights, and the supreme court will enforce

When a creditor's bill in equity is properly removed from a state court to a federal court on the ground that the controversy is wholly between citizens of different states, the jurisdiction of the latter is not ousted by admitting in the circuit court as co-plaintiffs other creditors who are citizens of the same state as the defendants; 115 U. S. 61.

When property in the possession of a third person claiming ownership, is attached on mesne process issuing out of the United States circuit court, as the property of a defendant and citizen of the same state as the person claiming it, such person may seek redress in the circuit court by ancillary proceedings; as, for instance, if the original proceeding is in equity, by a petition pro interesse suo, or by ancillary bill, or by summary motion, according to circumstances; or, if it is at common law, by a summary motion or by a proceeding in the nature of an interpleader; or, if proceedings authorized by statutes of the state afford an adequate remedy, by adopting them as part of the practice of the court; Matthews, J., in 110 U. S. 276. Where, in a suit in equity, an execution is issued and a levy and sale made of certain lands, a third party claiming to be the real owner cannot intervene for the purpose of moving to set aside the execution when there is no privity of estate between him and the defendant in the execution; 55 Fed. Rep. 17.

On a creditors' bill, judgment creditors who choose to intervene may share ratably with complainants in the proceeds of a sale of the property, even if some do not intervene until after the decree of sale; 44 Fed. Rep. 117. The practice of permitting judgment creditors to come in and make themselves parties to a creditors' bill is well settled; 5 Wall. 205.

Stockholders of a corporation who have been allowed to put in answers in the name of the corporation cannot be regarded as answering for the corporation itself. In a special case, however, where there is an allegation that the directors fraudulently refused to attend to the interests of the corporation, equity may allow a stockholder to become a party defendant for the protection of his own interest and that of such other stockholders as may join him in the defence; 2 Wall. 283. Where any fraud has been perpetrated by the directors of a company by which the interests of the stockholders are affected, the stockholders have a right to come in as parties to a suit against the company and ask that their property shall be relieved from the effect of such fraud; 8 Biss. 193.

The state can intervene in proceedings to foreclose a railroad mortgage only where it is entitled as a bond or lien holder to share in the proceeds of a sale, or where public interests are at stake which are seriously threatened by the proposed disposition of the property. An intervening petition filed by a state in railroad foreclosure proceedings alleging that bonds and the mortgage securing them were void, and that the railroad company, by collusion and neglect to defend, was about to allow judgment to go against it by default, that the company in consideration of large land grants from the state had agreed to maintain low rates of transportation, which, by foreclosure, would be increased, gives no right of intervention, especially where neither the charter of the company nor any subsequent legislation showed any such contract as the one alleged; 81 Tex. 530. Permission will not be granted to a state to intervene for the stay of the sale of a railroad under foreclosure proceedings; 2 Woods 628.

In a controversy between two states in relation to the boundary line between them, the attorney-general of the United States may appear on behalf of the United States and adduce evidence, though he does not thereby become a party in the technical sense of the word, and no judgment will be entered for or against the United States; 17 How. 478.

A petition to intervene need not be as formal as a bill of complaint, yet it should exhibit all the material facts relied on, embodying so much of the record in the original suit as is essential, and proceedings taken therein which would fortify the right of the intervenor should be incorporated in the petition by amendment, and if this is not done, such proceedings cannot be noticed on a demurrer to the petition; 77 Fed. Rep. 700.

In bills brought on behalf of a class, an intervening member of the class will ordinarily be joined as a plaintiff and this will not generally deprive the court of jurisdiction; 115 U. S. 61. If there should be any danger that it would, he may be joined as a defendant or, if he intends to act in hostility to the original complainant, the court may make him a defendant; 1 Fost. Fed. Prac. § 201; 5 Blatchf. 525; 2 Woods 323.

A person claiming a right to share in a fund or claiming a right to property in the hands of a receiver is generally allowed to intervene pro interesse suo; 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 201.

One who, in an action at law, has been denied the right to intervene, because of his status, cannot afterwards maintain a bill in equity in the same court to enjoin the proceedings and to be permitted to intervene; 81 Fed. Rep. 753.

Under Codes. There are provisions in the codes of several of the states, which appear to have been originally adopted from Louisiana, permitting any person who has an interest in any matter in litigation to intervene by rule of court. This interest must be of such a direct and important character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct effect of the judgment; the interest must be that created by a claim in suit or a lien upon the property, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to or lien upon the property or some part thereof which is the subject of litigation; 13 Cal.

62, per Field, J. See 144 U. S. 518; 1 La. 425. Where, under a judgment, there were attachments against property, one who held attachments upon the same property subsequent to those of the plaintiff in the suit, sought to intervene, alleging that the notes upon which the judgment was based were fraudulent, and that the suit and attachment were in execution of a collusive scheme between the plaintiff and defendant to defraud the intervenor, it was held that when the judgment was entered against the defendants the whole subject-matter of the suit was disposed of and that the writ of attachment was a part of the remedy and had nothing to do with the cause of action; also, that the vindication of the right as against the attached property involved an independent judicial inquiry, and leave to intervene was therefore refused; 28 Minn. 428.

See A. & E. Enc., Intervention.

In Patent Law. Where a third party asked to be made a party defendant, alleging that it was the manufacturer of machines claimed to infringe; that the defendant was its vendee; that it desired to settle the question as to whether or not the machines did infringe, both the complainant and the third party being non-residents, the petitioner was allowed to become a party defendant; 32 Fed. Rep. 835. In a suit against a railway company for infringing a patent upon oil cars, the defendant set up that it merely transported the cars under its obligation as a common carrier; and upon petition by the owner of the cars, he was allowed to intervene and defend the suit; 54 Fed. Rep. 521.

In Admiralty. Any person may intervene in a suit in rem for his interest and he may do so notwithstanding the res has been delivered to a claimant on a stipulation in a certain sum to abide by and perform the decree, the stipulation as far as it goes standing for the res; 45 Fed. Rep. 62. An administrator may intervene in a suit in rem to recover the damages allowed by a law of the state for the death of his intestate, caused by the wrongful act or omission of the person in charge of the res; 42 Fed. Rep. 78. When a vessel libelled by a material man has been taken possession of by the court, other material men may intervene by libel praying warrants of arrest in order to retain the property in case security be given for its release; 57 Fed. Rep. 233. See Admiralty Rule 43.

In International Law. The right of one state to interfere in the internal affairs of another is a question that has been much debated in international law. The Holy Alliance which existed for so many years was a combination of European states to suppress all attempts to overthrow monarchy in any country, and religion and humanity have frequently given excuses for the exercise of the right. The United States, however, has usually adhered to the policy of non-intervention, but with some exceptions not extending to armed intervention but tending in that direction, as in Mexico, during Maximilian's rule, in the war between Chile and Peru, and in the recent difficulty between Great Britain and Venezuela. See Snow, Lect. Int. L. 57. It is sometimes termed interference. See Davis, Int. L. 74.

The doctrine has been thus spoken of by a distinguished writer, "Historicus": "Its essence is illegality and its justification is its success." Instances of intervention are in China, Armenia, Madagascar, and Nicaragua. In 1861 France made an armed intervention in Mexico. Coercive intervention has long been looked upon as justifiable in cases where one state has been guilty of undue punishment of citizens of another state, or of any arbitrary or capricious unfairness towards such citizens; 20 Law Mag. and Rev. 4th ser. 242. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

In Civil Law. The act by which a third party becomes a party in a suit pending between other persons.

The intervention is made either to be joined to the plaintiff, and to claim the same thing he does, or some other thing connected with it; or to join the defendant, and with him to oppose the claim of the plaintiff, which it is his interest to defeat. Pothier, Proc. Civ. 1ère part, ch. 2, s. 6, § 3.

In English Ecclesiastical Law. The proceeding of a third person, who, not being originally a party to the suit or proceeding, but claiming an interest in the subject-matter in dispute, in order the better to protect such interest, interposes his claim. 2 Chitty, Pr. 492; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 633; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137; 3 Phill. Eccl. 586; 1 Add. Eccl. 5; 4 Hagg. Eccl. 67; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 74. The intervenor may come in at any stage of the cause, and even after judgment, if an appeal can be allowed on such judgment; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137; 1 Eng. Eccl. 480; 2 id. 13.

Intervention is allowed in certain cases, especially in suits for divorce and nullity of marriage, by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 31, where it is usual for the queen's proctor to intervene, where collusion is suspected; Moz. & W.

INTESTABILIS. A witness incompetent to testify. Calv. Lex.

INTESTABLE. One who cannot lawfully make a testament.

An infant, an insane person, or one civilly dead, cannot make a will, for want of capacity or understanding; a married woman cannot make such a will without some special authority, because she is under the power of her husband. They are all intestable.

INTESTACY. The state or condition of dying without a will.

INTESTATE. Without a will. A person who dies, having made no will, or one which is defective in form. In that case, he is said to die intestate, and his estate descends to his heirs at law.

This term comes from the Latin intestatus. Formerly, it was used in France indiscriminately with de-confesse; that is, without confession. It was regarded as a crime, on account of the omission of the deceased person to give something to the church, and was punished by privation of burial in consecrated ground. This omission, according to Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, vol. 1, p. 116, could be repaired by making an ampliative testament in the name of the deceased. See Vely, tom. 6, page 145; Henrion de Pansey, Autorité judiciaire 129, and note. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; WILL.

INTESTATE SUCCESSION. A succession is called intestate when the deceased has left no will, or when his will has been revoked, or annulled as irregular. Therefore the heirs to whom a succession has fallen by the effects of the law only are called "heirs ab intestato." Civil Code La. art. 1096.

INTESTATO. In the Civil Law. Intestate; without a will. Calv. Lex.

INTESTATUS. In the Civil and Old English Law. An intestate. One who dies without a will. Dig. 50, 17, 7.

INTIMACY. As generally applied to persons, it is understood to mean a proper, friendly relation of the parties, but it is frequently used to convey the idea of an improper relation; an intimacy at least disreputable and degrading. 152 Pa. 187. See 157 Mass. 478.

INTIMATION. In Civil Law. The name of any judicial act by which a notice of a legal proceeding is given to some one; but it is more usually understood to mean the notice or summons which an appellant causes to be given to the opposite party, that the sentence will be reviewed by the superior judge.

In Scotch Law. An instrument of writing, made under the hand of a notary, and notified to a party, to inform him of a right which a third person had acquired: for example, when a creditor assigns a claim against his debtor, the assignee or cedent must give an intimation of this to the debtor who, till then, is justified in making payment to the original creditor. Kames, Eq. b. 1, p. 1, s. 1.

INTIMIDATION. The act of intimidating or making fearful; the state of being intimidated.

In Old English Law. By the stat. 38 and 39 Vict. c. 86, 7, every person commits a misdemeanor, who wrongfully uses violence to, or intimidates, any other person, or his wife or children, with a view to compel him to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which he has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. See DURESS.

INTIMIDATION OF VOTERS. Statutes have been enacted in some states to punish the intimidation of voters. Under an early Pennsylvania act, it was held that to constitute the offence of intimidation of voters, there must be a preconceived intention for the purpose of intimidating the officers or interrupting the election; 3 Yeates 429.

INTOL AND UTTOL. Toll or custom paid for things imported, or exported, or bought in or sold out. Toml.; Calv. Lex.

INTOXICATING DRINKS. See LIQUOR LAWS.

INTOXICATION. See DRUNKENNESS.

INTRA VIRES. An act is said to be intra vires ("within the power") of a person or corporation when it is within the scope of his or its powers or authority. It is the opposite of ultra vires (q. v.).

INTRINSECUM SERVITIUM. Common and ordinary duties with the lord's court. Kenn. Glos.

INTRINSIC. The intrinsic value of a thing is its true, inherent, and essential value, not depending upon accident, place, or person, but the same everywhere and to every one. 5 Ired. L. 698.

INTRODUCTION. That part of a writing in which are detailed those facts which elucidate the subject.

INTROMISSION. In Scotch Law. The assuming possession of property belonging to another, either on legal ground, or without any authority: in the latter case it is called vicious intromission. Bell, Dict.

In English Law. Dealing with stocks, goods, or cash of a principal coming into the hands of his agent, to be accounted for by the agent to his principal. 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 391. See AGENT.

INTRONISATION. In French Ecclesiastical Law. The installation of a bishop in his episcopal see. Clef des Lois Rom.; André.

INTRUDER. One who, on the death of the ancestor, enters on the land, unlawfully, before the heir can enter.

INTRUSION. The entry of a stranger after the determination of a particular estate of freehold, before the entry of him in reversion or remainder.

This entry and interposition of the stranger differs from an abatement in this, that an abatement is always to the prejudice of an heir or immediate devisee; an intrusion is always to the prejudice of him in remainder or reversion. 3 Bla. Com. 169; Fitzh. N. B. 203; Archb. Civ. Pl. 12; Dane, Abr. Index; 3 Steph. Com. 443.

The name of a writ brought by the owner of a fee simple, etc., against an intruder. New Nat. Brev. 453. Abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 57.

INUNDATION. The overflow of waters by coming out of their bed.

Inundations may arise from three causes: from public necessity, as in defence of a place it may be necessary to dam the current of a stream, which will cause an inundation to the upper lands; they may be occasioned by an invincible force, as by the accidental fall of a rock in the stream, or by a natural flood or freshet; or they may result from the erection of works on the stream. In the first case, the injury caused by the inundation is to be compensated as other injuries done in war; in the second, as there was no fault of any one, the loss is to be borne by the unfortunate owner of the estate; in the last, when the riparian proprietor is injured by such works as alter the level of the water where it enters or where it leaves the property on which they are erected, the person injured may recover damages for the injury thus caused to his property by the inundation; 9 Co. 59; 1 B. & Ald. 258; 4 Day 244; 1 Rawle 218; 3 Mas. 172; 7 Pick. 198; 3 Hill, N. Y. 531; 32 N. H. 90, 316; 1 Cox 460; 3 H. & J. 231; 27 Ala. N. S. 127; 3 Strobb. 348. See 79 Ga. 731; 155 Pa. 523; 112 Mo. 6; 111 N. C. 80; 43 Ill. App. 108; Schultes, Aq. R. 122; Angell, Wat. C. § 330; Pom. Ripar. Rt. 72; DAM; BACKWATER; IRRIGATION; WATER; WATER COURSE.

INURE. To take effect; to result. See ENURE.

INUREMENT. Use; user; service to the use or benefit of a person. 100 U. S. 583.

INVADIARE. To mortgage lands. Toml.

INVADIATIO (L. Lat.). A pledge or mortgage.

INVADIATUS. One who is under pledge; one who has had sureties or pledges given for him. Spel. Glos.

INVADING A JUDGE. Assaulting a judge. Patterson.

INVALID. Not valid; of no binding force.

INVASION. The entry of a country by a public enemy, making war. See INSURRECTION.

INVASIONES. The inquisition of serjeants and knights' fees. Cowel; Calv. Lex.

INVECTA ET ILLATA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things carried and brought in. Things brought into a building hired (ædes), or into a hired estate in the city (prædium urbanum), which are held by a tacit mortgage for the rent. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Domat, Civ. Law.

INVENTIO. In the Civil Law. Finding; one of the modes of acquiring title to property by occupancy. Heinecc. lib. 2, tit. 1, 350.

In Old English Law. A thing found; as goods, or treasure-trove. Cowel. The plural, "inventiones," is also used.

INVENTION. See PATENT.

INVENTIONES. A word used in some ancient English charters to signify treasure-trove.

INVESTIVE FACT. The fact by means of which a right comes into existence: e. g. a grant of a monopoly, the death of one ancestor. Holl. Jur. 132.

INVENTOR. One who contrives or produces a thing which did not before exist. One who makes an invention. The word is generally used to denote the author of such contrivances as are by law patentable. See PATENT.

INVENTORY. A list, schedule, or enumeration in writing, containing, article by article, the goods and chattels, rights and credits, and, in some cases, the land and tenements, of a person or persons. A conservatory act, which is made to ascertain the situation of an intestate's estate, the estate of an insolvent, and the like, for the purpose of securing it to those entitled to it.

When the inventory is made of goods and estates assigned or conveyed in trust, it must include all the property conveyed. It is prima facie evidence of the value as against the administrator; 5 Misc. Rep. 560; 74 Hun 358.

In case of intestate estates, it is required to contain only the personal property, or that to which the administrator is entitled. The claims due to the estate ought to be separated; those which are desperate or bad ought to be so returned. The articles ought to be set down separately, as already mentioned, and separately valued. It is not the duty of an administrator to inventory property which was conveyed by his intestate in fraud of creditors; 17 R. I. 751. The duty of having an appraisal and inventory made of a testator's estate, rests on the executor and not on the adult legatees; 65 Hun 619. An item inserted in the inventory by mistake may be stricken out after it is sworn to; 78 Hun 292.

The inventory is to be made in the presence of at least two of the creditors of the deceased, or legatees, or next of kin, or of two honest persons. The appraisers must sign it, and make oath or affirmation that the appraisement is just to the best of their knowledge. See, generally, 14 Vin. Abr. 465; Bac. Abr. Executors, etc. (E 11); Ayl. Par. 305; Com. Dig. Administration (B 7); 2 Add. Eccl. 319; 2 Eccl. 322; Shoul. Ex. & Ad. 230; 2 Bla. Com. 514; 8 S. & R. 128.

INVEST (Lat. investire, to clothe). To put in possession of a field upon taking the oath of fealty or fidelity to the prince or superior lord. Also, to lay out capital in some permanent form so as to produce an income.

The term would hardly apply to an active capital employed in banking; 15 Johns. 358. It would cover the loaning of money; 37 Ind. 122. Whenever a sum is represented by anything but money, it is invested; 23 N. Y. 242.

INVESTITURE. The act of giving possession of lands by actual seisin. The ceremonial introduction to some office of dignity.

When livery of seisin was made to a person by the common law, he was invested with the whole fee: this the foreign feudists, and sometimes our own law-writers, call investiture; but generally speaking, it is termed by the common-law writers the seisin of the fee. 2 Bla. Com. 209, 313; Fearn, Rem. 223, n. (z).

By the canon law, investiture was made per baculum et annulum, by the ring and crosier, which were regarded as symbols of the episcopal jurisdiction. Ecclesiastical and secular fiefs were governed by the same rule in this respect,—that previously to investiture neither a bishop, abbot, nor lay lord could take possession of a fief conferred upon him by the prince.

Pope Gregory VI. first disputed the right of sovereigns to give investiture of ecclesiastical fiefs, A. D. 1045; but Pope Gregory VII. carried on the dispute with much more vigor, A. D. 1073. He excommunicated the emperor Henry IV. The popes Victor III., Urban II., and Paul II. continued the contest. This dispute, it is said, cost Christendom sixty-three battles, and the lives of many millions of men. De Pradt.

INVESTMENT. A sum of money left for safekeeping, subject to order, and payable not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum; it may or may not bear interest, according to the agreement. 144 Pa. 499; 54 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 11.

As to investment of trust funds, see TRUSTEE.

INVIOABILITY. That which is not to be violated. The persons of ambassadors are inviolable. See AMBASSADOR; TELEGRAM.

INVITO. Against, or without the assent or consent; unwilling.

INVITO DEBITORE. Against the will of the debtor.

INVITO DOMINO (Lat.). In Criminal Law. Without the consent of the owner.

In order to constitute larceny, the property stolen must be taken invito domino; this is the very essence of the crime. Cases of considerable difficulty arise when the owner has, for the purpose of detecting thieves, by himself or his agents, delivered the property taken, as to whether they are larcenies or not: the distinction seems to be this, that when the owner procures the property to be taken, it is not larceny; and when he merely leaves it in the power of the defendant to execute his original purpose of taking it, in the latter case it will be considered as taken invito domino; 2 Russ. Cr. 66, 105; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 666; Bac. Abr. Felony (C); 2 B. & P. 508; 1 Carr. & M. 217; LARCENY.

INVOICE. In Commercial Law. An account of goods or merchandise sent by merchants to their correspondents at home or abroad, in which the marks of each package, with other particulars, are set forth. Marsh. Ins. 408; Dane, Abr. Index. An invoice ought to contain a detailed statement, which should indicate the nature, quantity, quality, and prices of the things sold, deposited, etc.; 1 Pard. n. 248. See 2 Wash. C. C. 113, 155. Invoice carries no necessary implication of ownership, but accompanies goods consigned to a factor for sale, as well as in the case of a purchaser; 4 Abb. App. Dec. 76. See BILL OF LADING. Invoice Price. The prime cost, or invoice of the cost. 7 Johns. 343.

INVOLUNTARY. An involuntary act is that which is performed with constraint (q. v.), or with repugnance, or without the will to do it. An action is involuntary which is performed under duress. Wolffius, Inst. § 5.

INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER. See MANSLAUGHTER; HOMICIDE.

IOWA (an Indian word denoting "the place or final resting place"). The name of one of the states of the United States, being the sixteenth admitted to the Union.

This state was admitted to the Union by an act of congress approved December 28, 1846.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The legislative authority is vested in a general assembly, which consist of a senate and house of representatives. The sessions are biennial and commence on the second Monday in January next ensuing the election of its members, unless sooner convened by the proclamation of the governor.

The members of the house of representatives are chosen every second year on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November; their term of office commences on the first day of January next after election, and continues two years.

Senators are chosen for a term of four years; their number is not less than one-third nor more than one-half the representative body, and they are so classified that as nearly one-half as possible shall be elected every two years.

After a bill has been vetoed by the governor, if upon reconsideration it pass by the vote of a majority of the members, by yeas and nays, of both houses, it shall become a law notwithstanding the governor's objections. Three days are allowed for approval, during the session, and thirty days after adjournment.

No law passed at a regular session, of a public nature, shall take effect until the fourth day of July next after the passage thereof, unless otherwise provided in the act. Laws passed at a special session shall take effect ninety days after the adjournment of the general assembly by which they were passed.

No divorce shall be granted, lottery authorized, or the sale of lottery tickets allowed by the general assembly.

Every act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, which shall be expressed in the title; and local or special laws are forbidden as to various specified matters, and all others where a general law can be made applicable.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The supreme executive power is vested in a governor, who is elected by the qualified electors at the time and place of voting for members of the general assembly, and holds office two years from his installation and until his successor is elected and qualified. His powers are those usually conferred on the executive by state constitutions.

A lieutenant-governor is elected at the same time and in the same manner as the governor, who is president of the senate, and in the usual contingencies performs the duties of governor.

The official terms of the governor and lieutenant-governor commence on the second Monday of January next after their election.

A secretary of state, auditor of state, and treasurer of state are elected by the qualified electors, and continue in office two years and until their successors are elected and qualified.

JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT.—The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, district court, and such other courts inferior to the supreme court as the general assembly may from time to time establish.

The supreme court consist of six judges, who are elected for a term of six years and hold court at such times and places as the general assembly may prescribe. They are so classified that one judge shall go out of office every two years, and the judge whose term first expires shall be chief justice during the last two years of his term.

The supreme court has appellate jurisdiction only in cases in chancery, and is constituted a court for the correction of errors at law under such restrictions as are by law prescribed; it has power to issue all writs and processes necessary to secure justice to parties and exercise a supervisory control over inferior judicial tribunals throughout the state.

The district court is the sole court of original jurisdiction, and for the purpose of such courts the state is divided into twenty judicial districts in each of which district judges, from one to four in number, according to the size and population of the district, are elected by the people of the district for a term of four years.

This court is a court of law and equity, which are separate jurisdictions, and has jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters arising in their respective districts, according to law. It has exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from justices of the peace, original and exclusive jurisdiction of the probate of wills, appointment and supervision of executors, administrators, and guardians of minors, idiots, and lunatics, the settlement of estates, and the like. The judges of the supreme and district courts are conservators of the peace throughout the state; the style of process is "the State of Iowa," and all prosecutions are conducted in the name and by the authority of the same.

A superior court may be established in any city having seven thousand inhabitants. It has jurisdiction in all civil matters concurrent with the district court in all matters except probate and divorce; and exclusive original jurisdiction of violations of city ordinances and matters theretofore in the jurisdiction of police courts; also concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace and may try appeals from them.

Justices of the peace have civil jurisdiction of cases (not involving title to real estate or chancery) when the amount is not over one hundred dollars, or by consent three hundred dollars.

An attorney general and a county attorney for each county are elected, each for the term of two years.

IPSISSIMIS VERBIS (Lat.). In the identical words: opposed to substantially. 7 How. 719; 5 Ohio St. 346.

IPSO FACTO (Lat.). By the fact itself. By the mere fact. A proceeding ipso facto void is one which has not prima facie validity, but is void ab initio.

IPSO JURE (Lat.). By the operation of law. By mere law.

IRELAND. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

IRRECUSABLE. A term used to indicate a certain class of contractual obligations recognized by the law which are imposed upon a person without his consent and without regard to any act of his own. They are distinguished from recusable obligations which are the result of a voluntary act on the part of a person on whom they are imposed by law. A clear example of an irrecusable obligation is the obligation imposed on every man not to strike another without some lawful excuse. A recusable obligation is based upon some act of a person bound, which is a condition precedent to the genesis of the obligation. These terms were first suggested by Prof. Wigmore in 8 Harv. Law Rev. 200. See Harr. Contr. 6, where this classification is very fully discussed. See CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

IRREGULAR DEPOSIT. See DEPOSIT.

IRREGULARITY. In Practice. The doing or not doing that in the conduct of a suit at law, which, conformably with the practice of the court, ought or ought not to be done. 2 Ind. 252. The term is usually applied to such informality as does not render invalid the act done; thus an irregular distress for rent due is not illegal ab initio.

A party entitled to complain of irregularity should except to it previously to taking any step by him in the cause; Lofft 323, 333; because the taking of any such step is a waiver of any irregularity; 1 B. & P. 342; 3 East 547; 2 Wils. 380. See ABATEMENT.

The court will, on motion, set aside proceedings for irregularity. On setting aside a judgment and execution for irregularity, they have power to impose terms on the defendant, and will restrain him from bringing an action of trespass, unless a strong case of damage appears. 1 Chitty, Bail. 133, n. And see Baldw. 246; 3 Chitty, Pr. 509.

In Canon Law. Any impediment which prevents a man from taking holy orders.

IRRELEVANCY. The quality or state of being inapplicable or impertinent to a fact or argument.

Irrelevancy, in an answer, consists in statements which are not material to the decision of the case; such as do not form or tender any material issue. 18 N. Y. 315, 321.

IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE. That which does not support the issue, and which, of course, must be excluded. See EVIDENCE.

IRREMOVABILITY. The status of a pauper in England, who cannot be legally removed from the parish or union in which he is receiving relief, notwithstanding that he has not acquired a settlement there. Thus a pauper who has resided in a parish during the whole of the preceding year is irremovable. Stat. 28 and 29 Vict. c. 79, § 8.

IRREPARABLE INJURY. As a ground for injunction, it is that which cannot be repaired, retrieved, put back again, atoned for. 28 Fla. 387; it does not necessarily mean that the injury is beyond the possibility of compensation in damages, nor that it must be very great; 142 Ill. 104. See INJUNCTION.

IRREPLEVIABLE. That cannot be replevied or delivered on sureties. Spelled, also, irreplevisable. Co. Litt. 145; 13 Edw. I. c. 2.

IRRESISTIBLE FORCE. A term applied to such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable; as, the inroads of a hostile army. Story, Bailm. § 25; Lois des Batim. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1. See INEVITABLE ACCIDENT.

IRREVOCABLE. Which cannot be revoked or recalled. A power of attorney in which the attorney has an interest granted for consideration is irrevocable. See WILL; POWER OF ATTORNEY.

IRRIGATION. The operation of watering lands or causing water to flow over lands by artificial means for agricultural purposes.

"The word irrigation, in its primary sense, means a sprinkling or watering; but the best lexicographers give it an agricultural or special signification, thus: 'The watering of lands by drains or channels' (Worcester); 'The operation of causing water to flow over lands for nourishing plants' (Webster). The term irrigation as used in Colorado, in the constitution and statutes and judicial opinions, in view of the climate and soil, is in its special sense, to wit: 'The application of water to lands for the raising of agricultural crops and other products of the soil;' 12 Colo. 529.

In Egypt as well as in other countries of the East and also among the ancient races of South America, irrigation was to a great extent a necessity, and its methods of accomplishment and the laws covering the rights incident to it were well known. But in England and until recently in all other countries where the common law prevailed, irrigation was seldom necessary and the law relating to it was but little developed.

At common law the right of the riparian proprietor to divert the water of a stream for the purposes of irrigation was well recognized, and it was described as an artificial use of the water and not a natural use like taking the water for drinking, domestic purposes, and watering cattle, which would allow the use of all the water in the stream. A riparian owner could use for domestic purposes and watering cattle as much of the water of the stream as he chose, and if he found it necessary, take all the water in the stream, but in using the water for irrigation he was allowed to take only a reasonable amount of it and could not diminish the flow of the stream, so as to cause loss to other riparian owners; Gould, Waters 217; Kinney, Irrig. § 66; 98 Am. Dec. 543 and note; 37 Tex. 173; 4 Mas. 400; Ang. Water C. 34; 2 Conn. 584.

This doctrine of the common law was sufficient for any irrigation that had been found necessary in England or in the United States east of the Mississippi River. But as civilization advanced into what was once known as the Great American Desert and is now called the Arid Region west of the Mississippi, "there has grown up or evolved out of the necessities of the people and the exigencies of the communities interested, a great body of law, custom, regulation, and judicial interpretation. These statutes in general form the principle of prior appropriation as wrought out by the earlier miners, and embodied in federal law, and then by the states and territories, being steadily sustained by the courts, with a few exceptions, as the common law of an arid region such as ours. The development of the beneficial use of water has of course modified the practice of prior appropriations to a first or prior pro rata share of the natural waters, when taken from bed or source for industrial purposes;" Senate Report on Irrigation, 1890.

The arid region in the United States covers an area of about a thousand miles from north to south and fifteen hundred miles from east to west, lying between the 100th meridian and the Coast Range of Mountains in California, extending from the British possessions to Mexico and including Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Nevada, and portions of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, Montana, California, Oregon, and Washington. The Arid Region Doctrine, however, was first worked out, not in the arid region itself, but in the mining districts of California.

After the discovery of gold in California had brought great numbers of people to that region, the miners developed a sort of code of their own, called the Mining Customs, which in 1851 were recognized by the legislature of California and made a part of the law of the state. By these customs a new principle in water rights was developed, called the Law of Priority of Appropriation, by which the person who first uses the water of a stream is by virtue of priority of occupation entitled to hold the same, and may use all the water in the stream for the purpose of carrying on his mining operations; Kinney, Irrig. § 104; 20 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 42. This doctrine beginning in the Mining Customs and sanctioned by the legislature of California and the supreme court of that state, was afterwards approved by the supreme court of the United States, and congress not only passed acts which sanctioned the doctrine as regarded mines, but extended it to all other beneficial uses or purposes for which water may be essential, as irrigation for the purposes of agriculture and horticulture and to milling, manufacturing, and municipal purposes, in the Arid Region, and this development was all based upon the principle that the portions of the United States known as the Arid Region require it; Kinney, Irrig. sec. 122.

An appropriator of water for the operation of a quartz stamping mill is liable to a prior appropriator for irrigation purposes for any injury to the land by tailings or debris discharged from the mill; 75 Fed. Rep. 384.

In order to make an appropriation of water valid under the Arid Region Doctrine, there must be a bona fide intention to use the water for some beneficial purpose; 21 Cal. 374; 6 Col. 540; 32 Cal. 33; 1 Mont. 543; 14 Nev. 167; 2 Utah 535; 17 Col. 146; 18 id. 1; 69 Cal. 255. The intention to appropriate must be shown by the work and labor usual in such enterprises to accomplish the end. If there is no actual intention to appropriate the water for a beneficial purpose, or if there is unnecessary delay in the completion of the works for the appropriation of the water, a subsequent appropriator who diverts and applies the water for a beneficial purpose has the superior right; 87 Cal. 505; 15 id. 271; 58 id. 80; 20 Wall. 682; 98 U. S. 453. In a case where a ditch or canal company appropriates or diverts the water and then sells it to other persons who apply it to beneficial purposes, there has been some doubt whether the ditch company, being only an appropriator of the water and not itself applying it to a beneficial purpose, could divert the water. The better opinion seems to be that it can, provided the water is all applied to beneficial purposes by the persons to whom it is sold, but if a company appropriates and diverts more water than is actually used for a beneficial purpose, this surplus water is open for reappropriation; 9 Col. 248; 16 id. 61; 17 id. 141. It is also necessary to the validity of an appropriation that the water be used continuously. If allowed to run to waste for any length of time it will be treated as abandoned and open for a fresh appropriation. But water once lawfully appropriated is not lost by a change in its use; 27 Cal. 476; 32 id. 26; 2 Col. 530; 7 id. 148.

All persons in the Arid Region competent to hold lands have also the right to appropriate water; 3 Nev. 507; 13 Col. 105; 68 Cal. 43; 11 Mont. 439. But under the Arid Region Doctrine an appropriator need not necessarily be a riparian owner of land. The right to appropriate is not an incident of the soil, but is simply a possessory right acquired by valid appropriation; 5 Cal. 445; 16 Col. 61; 3 Col. App. 212; 10 Nev. 217; 20 Wall. 670; 101 U. S. 276; 51 Cal. 288; Kinney, Irrig. § 156.

A provision that no land shall be included in an irrigation district, except such as may be benefited by the system of irrigation used in that district, means that the land must be such that it may be substantially benefited. It is not sufficient that such irrigation creates an opportunity thereafter to use the land for a new kind of crop, while not substantially benefiting it for the cultivation of the old kind, which it has produced in reasonable quantities, and with ordinary certainty, without the aid of irrigation; 164 U. S. 112.

In order to make an appropriation valid there must be sufficient notice to the public of the intention to appropriate; and the notice may be in any form which gives the name of the appropriator and a description of the stream and of the purposes for which the water is to be taken; 56 Cal. 571.

In Krall v. U. S. 79 Fed. Rep. 241, it was held by the circuit court of appeals that the previous establishment of a government reservation below the point of appropriation does not affect the right, except so far as the waters of the stream have been previously appropriated for the use of such reservation. But Gilbert, J., dissented on the authority of Steer v. Berk, 133 U. S. 541, which held that a homestead entryman on land over which the waters of a creek flowed had the right to the natural flow of the water as against a subsequent appropriation.

The rights of an appropriator of water for irrigating purposes are not interfered with by a subsequent appropriation for mining purposes at a point further up the stream, unless the use for the latter purpose impairs the value of the water for the purpose of irrigation. The liability of an irrigation company for failing to supply a certain volume of water to the holders of water rights, according to contract, cannot be determined on the theory that the company is a common carrier; 1 Col. App. 480.

Although in the Arid Region the doctrine of appropriation generally prevails, the old common-law doctrine of the reasonable use of water by a riparian owner for irrigation is not entirely abolished in all the jurisdictions. In some states the common-law doctrine has been entirely abolished, but in others it exists side by side with the doctrine of appropriation, and is applied usually in the case of riparian owners who, making no claim to an appropriation, wish to use some of the waters of a stream for irrigation; Kinney, Irrig. 273.

The constitution of California declares the use of all water a public use and subject to the control of the state, the rates for water supplied by any person or corporation to be fixed annually by the supervisors of the district. The constitution of Colorado declares all natural streams, not theretofore appropriated, to be the property of the public, and subject to appropriation as provided by law; and that the right to divert unappropriated water shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right as between those using water for the same purpose, when water is not sufficient for all, those who require it for domestic use have the preference, and those using it for agricultural purposes have the preference over those using it for manufacturing purposes.

Somewhat similar provisions will be found in the constitutions of Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming.

Dec. 543-5; 5 Special Consular Reports, 1891; Gould, Waters § 217; 69 Cal. 255; Senate Report on Irrigation, 1890, where all the acts in the irrigation states are set forth, together with a digest of reported cases; Mills, Constitutional Annotations §§ 510-13 and notes, where the cases on this subject and constitutional provisions are collected.

IRRITANCY. In Scotch Law. The happening of a condition or event by which a charter, contract, or other deed, to which a clause irritant is annexed, becomes void. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 5, n. 25. Irritancy is a kind of forfeiture. It is legal or conventional. Burton, Real Prop. 298.

IRRITANT CLAUSE. In Scotch Law. A provision by which certain prohibited acts specified in a deed are, if committed, declared to be null and void. A resolution clause dissolves and puts an end to the right of a proprietor on his committing the acts so declared void.

IRROTULATIO (Law Lat.). An in-rolling; a record. 2 Rymer, Foed. 673; Du Cange: Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Bracton, fol. 293; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 65, § 11.

ISH. In Scotch Law. The period of the termination of a tack or lease. 1 Bligh 522. See TACK.

If the tack does not mention the ish, it is good for one year only, unless an intention appear to continue it for more than that period, in which case it is limited to the minimum period the words admit of. If the tack is in perpetuity, the ish being indefinite, it has not the benefit of the statute giving effect to a tack for its full term, no matter into whose hands the lands might come. Ersk. Prin. II. VI. 10.

ISLAND. A piece of land surrounded by water.

When new islands arise in the open sea, they belong to the first occupant; but when they are newly formed so near the shore as to be within the boundary of some state, they belong to that state.

Islands which arise in rivers when in the middle of the stream belong in equal parts to the riparian proprietors. When they arise mostly on one side, they belong to the riparian owners up to the middle of the stream.

The owner in fee of the bed of a river or other submerged land is the owner of any bar, island, or dry land which may be subsequently formed thereon; 138 U. S. 226.

Where an island springs up in a navigable river, and by accretion to the shores of the island and the mainland, they are united, the owner of the mainland is not entitled to the island, but only to such accretion as formed on his land; 117 Mo. 33.

See ACCESSION; ACCRETION; BOUNDARY; 3 Washb. R. P. 56; 3 Kent 428.

ISSINT (Norm. Fr. thus, so). In Pleading. A term formerly used to introduce a statement that special matter already pleaded amounts to a denial.

In actions founded on deeds, the defendant may, instead of pleading non est factum in the common form, allege any special matter which admits the execution of the writing in question, but which, nevertheless, shows that it is not in law his deed, and may conclude with, "and so it is not his deed;" as, that the writing was delivered to A B as an escrow, to be delivered over on certain conditions, which have not been complied with, "and so it is not his act," or that at the time of making the writing the defendant was a feme covert, "and so it is not her act;" Bac. Abr. Pleas (H 3), (I 2); Gould, Pl. § 64.

An example of this form of plea, which is sometimes called the special general issue, occurs in 4 Rawle 83.

ISSUABLE. In Practice. Leading or tending to an issue. An issuable plea is one upon which the plaintiff can take issue and proceed to trial.

ISSUABLE TERMS. Hilary and Trinity Terms were so called from the making up of the issues, during those terms, for the assizes, that they might be tried by the judges, who generally went on circuit to try such issues after these two terms. But for town causes all four terms were issuable. 3 Bla. Com. 350; 1 Tidd, Pr. 121. Since the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 this distinction has become obsolete.

ISSUE. In Real Law. Descendants. All persons who have descended from a common ancestor. 3 Ves. Ch. 257; 17 id. 481; 19 id. 547; 1 Roper, Leg. 90.

In a will it may be held to have a more restricted meaning, to carry out the testator's intention; 7 Ves. Ch. 522; 1 Roper, Leg. 90. 2 Wills. Exec. 386, n.; but it has been held that a devise to "issue" means prima facie legitimate issue, and an intention to include illegitimates must appear from the will itself without resort to extrinsic evidence; 66 Fed. Rep. 182. See Bac. Abr. Courtesy (D), Legatee.

If the term be used in the sense of heirs, that is, as comprehending a class to take by inheritance, it is to be interpreted as a term of limitation, and brings the case within the rule in Shelley's case; and this is the interpretation that prima facie will be given it; 70 Pa. 70; 79 id. 333; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 297. But if the context indicate a different intention, it will be sustained as a word of purchase; 2 Wms. R. P. 603. In a deed it is always taken as a word of purchase; 63 Pa. 483; 4 Fed. Rep. 299; 2 Ves. Sr. 681; 2 Wms. R. P. 604.

In Pleading. A single, certain, and material point, deduced by the pleadings of the parties, which is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other.

The entry of the pleadings. 1 Chitty, Pl. 630.

Several connected matters of fact may go to make up the point in issue.

An actual issue is one formed in an action brought in the regular manner, for the purpose of trying a question of right between the parties.

A collateral issue is one framed upon some matter not directly in the line of the pleadings; as, for example, upon the identity of one who pleads diversity in bar of execution. 4 Bla. Com. 396.

A common issue is that which is formed upon the plea of non est factum to an action of covenant broken.

This is so called because it denies the deed only, and not the breach, and does not put the whole declaration in issue, and because there is no general issue to this form of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 482; Gould, Pl. c. 6, pt. 1, § 7.

An issue in fact is one in which the truth of some fact is affirmed or denied.

In general, it consists of a direct affirmative allegation on one side and a direct negative on the other. Co. Litt. 126 a; Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 1); 2 W. Bla. 1312; 5 Pet. 149. But an affirmative allegation which completely excludes the truth of the preceding may be sufficient; 1 Wils. 6; 2 Stra. 1177. Thus, the general issue in a writ of right (called the mise) is formed by two affirmatives; the demandant claiming a greater right than the tenant, and the tenant a greater than the demandant. 3 Bla. Com. 195, 305. And in an action of dower the count merely demands the third part of [] acres of land, etc., as the dower of the demandant of the endowment of A B, heretofore the husband, etc., and the general issue is that A B was not seised of such estate, etc., and that he could not endow the demandant thereof, etc.; which mode of denial, being argumentative, would not, in general, be allowed. 2 Saund. 329.

A feigned issue is one formed in a fictitious action, under direction of the court, for the purpose of trying before a jury some question of fact.

Such issues are generally ordered by a court of equity, to ascertain the truth of a disputed fact. They are also frequently used in courts of law, by the consent of the parties, to determine some disputed rights without the formality of pleading; and by this practice much time and expense are saved in the decision of a cause; 3 Bla. Com. 452. Suppose, for example, it is desirable to settle a question of the validity of a will in a court of equity.

For this purpose an action is brought, in which the plaintiff by a fiction declares that he laid a wager for a sum of money with the defendant, for example, that a certain paper is the last will and testament of A, then avers it is his will, and therefore demands the money; the defendant admits the wager, but avers that it is not the will of A; and thereupon that issue is joined, which is directed out of chancery, to be tried; and thus the verdict of the jurors at law determines the fact in the court of equity. A feigned issue is also formed for trial by a jury in certain interpleader proceedings; as in proceedings to test the title to goods levied upon by the sheriff and claimed by a third party.

The name is a misnomer, inasmuch as the issue itself is upon a real, material point in question between the parties, and the circumstances only are fictitious. It is a contempt of the court in which the action is brought to bring such an action, except under the direction of some court; 4 Term 402.

A formal issue is one which is framed according to the rules required by law, in an artificial and proper manner.

A general issue is one which denies in direct terms the whole declaration: as, for example, where the defendant pleads nil debet (that he owes the plaintiff nothing), or nil disseisin (no disseisin committed). 3 Greenl. Ev. § 9; Steph. Pl. 220; 3 Bla. Com. 305. See GENERAL ISSUE.

An immaterial issue is one formed on some immaterial matter, which, though found by the verdict, will not determine the merits of the cause, and will leave the court at a loss how to give judgment. 2 Wms. Saund. 319, n. 6. See IMMATERIAL ISSUE.

An informal issue is one which arises when a material allegation is traversed in an improper or inartificial manner. Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 2), (N 5); 2 Wms. Saund. 319 a. n. 7. The defect is cured by verdict, by the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 30.

A material issue is one properly formed on some material point which will, when decided, settle the question between the parties.

A special issue is one formed by the defendant's selecting any one substantial point and resting the weight of his cause upon that. It is contrasted with the general issue. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (R 1, 2).

ISSUE ROLL. In English Law. The name of a record which contained an entry of issue as soon as it was found. It was abolished by the rules of Hilary Term, 1834. Moz. & W. Dict.

ISSUES. In English Law. The goods and profits of the lands of a defendant against whom a writ of distringas or distress infinite has been issued, taken by virtue of such writ, are called issues. 3 Bla. Com. 280; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law 351.

ISSUES ON SHERIFFS. Fines and amercements inflicted on sheriffs for neglects and defaults, levied out of the issues and profits of their lands. Toml.

ISTIMRAR. Continuance; perpetuity; especially a farm or lease granted in perpetuity by government or a zemindar (q. v.). Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

ISTIMRARDAR. The holder of a perpetual lease. Moz. & W.

ITA EST (Lat.). So it is.

Among the civilians, when a notary dies, leaving his register, an officer who is authorized to make official copies of his notarial acts writes, instead of the deceased notary's name, which is required when he is living, ita est.

ITA QUOD (Lat.). The name or condition in a submission, which is usually introduced by these words, "so as the award be made of and upon the premises," which, from the first words, is called the ita quod.

When the submission is with an ita quod, the arbitrator must make an award of all matters submitted to him of which he had notice, or the award will be entirely void. 7 East 81; Cro. Jac. 200; 2 Vern. Ch. 109; Rolle, Abr. Arbitrament (L, 9).

ITALY. A country of Europe. The executive is the king who exercises his functions through responsible ministers. Legislative powers are vested in the king and two chambers. The senate is composed of princes of the royal house and an unlimited number of life nominees of the Crown. The Chamber of Deputies is elected every five years. There are five supreme courts, "Corti di Cassazione," in Rome, Naples, Turin, Florence, and Palermo; also 24 courts of appeal. The codes of law are the civil code, the code of civil procedure of 1866, the code of commerce of 1882, and the penal code and code of criminal procedure of 1889. This law made penal legislation uniform throughout the country.

ITEM (Lat.). Also; likewise; in like manner; again; a second time. These are the various meanings of this Latin adverb.

It is used to introduce a new paragraph, or chapter, or division; also to denote a particular in an account. It is used when any article or clause is added to a former, as if there were here a new beginning. Du Cange. Hence the rule that a clause in a will introduced by item shall not influence or be influenced by what precedes or follows, if it be sensible, taken independently; 1 Salk. 224; or if there is no plain intent that it should be taken in connection, in which cases it may be construed conjunctively, in the sense of and, or also, in such a manner as to connect sentences. If, therefore, a testator bequeath a legacy to Peter, payable out of a particular fund or charged upon a particular estate, item a legacy to James, James's legacy as well as Peter's will be a charge upon the same property; 1 Atk. 436; 1 Bro. Ch. 482; 1 Mod. 100; Cro. Car. 368; Vaugh. 262; 1 Salk. 234.

ITER (Lat.). In Civil Law. A way; a right of way belonging as a servitude to an estate in the country (prædium rusticum). The right of way was of three kinds: 1, iter, a right to walk, or ride on horseback, or in a litter; 2, actus, a right to drive a beast or vehicle; 3, via, a full right of way, comprising right to walk or ride, or drive beast or carriage. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. § 406. Or, as some think, they were distinguished by the width of the objects which could be rightfully carried over the way; e. g. via, 8 feet; actus, 4 feet, etc. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 290; Bracton 232; 4 Bell, H. L. 390.

In Old English Law. A journey, especially a circuit made by a justice in eyre, or itinerant justice, to try causes according to his own mission. Du Cange; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 11, 12, 13; Britton, c. 2; Cowel; EYRE.

ITINERANT. Wandering; travelling; who make circuits. See EYRE.
